The question of the liquor problem has been, and continues to be, difficult. At the best, it cannot be easily and satisfactorily settled. You have heard, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, evidence given by returned officers who have observed conditions on the other side. When in England in January, in conversation with a Canadian officer, who occupies one of the highest positions in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and an officer who has without exception the confidence of the whole Canadian force and, I believe of all the people of this country, stated that he had seen the dry canteen in operation in England and he had seen the wet canteen in operation. He had seen both tried out and it was his opinion that the troops were better off with the system of the wet canteen under which beer is sold to the troops than they were under the dry canteen. I am not myself qualified to express an opinion, but he is eminently qualified and that is his opinion. You are aware Mr. Speaker, and the House is probably aware, that conditions in the Old Country and Canada are entirely different in regard to the liquor traffic. The issue of licenses and the control of this traffic are under the civil authorities in England. In the vicinity of, and closely adjoining the camps occupied by the Canadian troops in England, are numerous public houses. If the civil authorities in England were prepared to do as the civil authorities in some of the provinces of Canada have done, that is to deal with the liquor problem in the same way that some of the provinces deal with it and abolish the sale of spirits, we would have a different condition to meet entirely. But what do you have? Immediately adjoining the camp areas, where troops are quartered and in training, you have public houses in large numbers. It is open to the boys, the moment they are off duty, to go to these public houses, they have gone to them and the experience of the most respected military authorities overseas, who have the confidence of the troops and of the people of this country, is that under the conditions as they exist in England the best results are obtained by operating a canteen such as is operated by our forces on the other side. It is better, they say, for the boys to have access to beer within the camp than that they should have recourse to public houses where strong spirits are sold. This canteen is not, as one might infer from some of the statements made this afternoon, operated without restrictions. On the contrary, it is operated under regulations which make such occurrences as those referred to in the letter read by the hon. member for Rouville most unusual and extraordinary.

I would hesitate to make a suggestion to an old parliamentarian as is my hon. friend from Rouville but I would draw his attention to the fact that he has received advice this afternoon from colleagues sitting on his own side of the House who questioned whether he was altogether wise in bringing this matter up in the form in which he has brought it up. I would further remind him that there are other members sitting on that side of the House who, when they had any suggestion to offer in the interest of the troops or for the improvement of methods, would forward that suggestion to the Minister of Militia. Such suggestions, I can assure him, are always welcome.

Whenever anything is apparently wrong in connection with the forces, I am certain that any suggestions which may be privately made to the Minister of Militia will be gladly received. I will content myself with that remark. I am not questioning the right of my hon. friend from Rouville to bring this matter up in the House. I believe we have all our opinions and some very strong opinions have been expressed this afternoon, but I am not going to express any opinion in that regard. But I would make this suggestion that in case there are operations which might be improved, possibly the advice which he and other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House have received this afternoon from a clear headed member of their own party may be worthy of the consideration of my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux).

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here working at my memory and trying to ascertain if there is any subject under the sun in the way of criticism that we in this House could bring up that the other side would not object to. Of all the foolish—no, I must not say that—of all the peculiar utterances to which I have ever listened in this House, I think the most peculiar is that which harks back whenever any matter is mentioned to questioning the loyalty or wisdom of members on this side of the House. Well, to put it shortly, I am getting heartily tired of being a member of Parliament and being met with that kind of an argument every time anything of importance is suggested. The member for Rouville brought up a question which, even if you treat it as lightly as did the Minister of Labour, is one that touches the domesticity of almost every family in Canada. I was astounded at the Minister of Labour.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not I.

Mr. GRAHAM: He edited a letter which he was reading, and if anything could be deduced from his editorial additions, it was that he did not believe in a dry canteen; that men would get liquor any way so long as it was manufactured. No, times have changed in Canada since this war began. The old argument that prohibition did not prohibit has been used all over the country, but the fact remains that nearly all Canada believes that prohibition does greatly restrict the sale and consumption of liquor. I believe that at least 90 per cent of the members of this House hold the same opinion. If that be true, is it wrong for men in this House whose sons are under the colours to say something about this matter? One would think, to hear the Minister of Labour talk, that we were in Russia before the revolution. Does he not know that every government of the Allies except the Canadian Government has either turned itself inside out or been turned inside out by some other power since the war began, on account of criticism offered by serious men who had the interests of their country at heart just as much as those to whom their criticism was directed? The soldiers at the front are intelligent and are not to be fooled by such talk as the Minister of Labour indulged in to-day. They are sons of men in this House; they are sons of Canadian families, and any discussion regarding them should be entered into from an intelligent standpoint, not by a silly appeal to those who are fighting for us while we are at home. They understand just what a man means, no matter what he says, whether in this House or elsewhere. To bolster up the idea that the men would get whisky whether there was a dry canteen or not, the Minister of Labour related some very peculiar conditions that existed at Valcartier.

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend is misrepresenting me entirely; I did not argue for a wet canteen or a dry canteen or prohibition. I was simply setting forth what Goforth argued, and Goforth is at the bottom of this discussion.

Mr GRAHAM: As I remarked when the minister was out, he edited the letter as he went through it. I explained that one could make no other deduction from his editorial comment than that he believed that the soldiers would get whisky whether there was a dry canteen or a wet canteen.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is what Goforth said.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend edited Goforth.

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, no.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You commented on it.

Mr. GRAHAM: All the way through. We will not argue that; Hansard will tell. Canada has moved forward during the last two or three years; where there formerly were public houses all around the camps, there are now practically none. We have removed the temptation from the men in the Canadian camps. The ex-Minister of Militia established the principle of dry canteen—and where is he now? He is not in this Government, and I should judge from the remarks of the Minister of Labour that the Government had changed its mind on this dry canteen question. For my part, whether the Canadian Government or any other Government has control, I am absolutely in favour of the principle that there should be no wet canteen in the camps where our boys are located.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is the whole question.

Mr. GRAHAM: I want to differentiate; no one can accuse me of being an extremist. I have no sympathy with the idea entertained by some good-thinking people that we should not give our boys at the front cigarettes and that kind of thing. I am in favour of letting the men have anything that will comfort them without injuring them. But it cannot be for the benefit of our men in the training camps—I am applying my remarks solely to the training camps—that they should have wet canteens. The member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy) pointed out a condition in England that did not exist here. It did exist here, until a few months ago, at Camp Niagara, Borden Camp, Toronto, London, Brockville, Ottawa—the very conditions that he outlined as now existing in England. Nothwithstanding that, the Government of which he is a near member, established the principle of a dry canteen. If that principle be right so far as the training camps in Canada are concerned —and the Government is committed to the principle—surely it would not be wrong to ask that the same principle be adopted and carried out when our boys go overseas.

As to the men in the firing line, some hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured to draw a red herring across the trail. No one is discussing what is done in the trenches. If the experienced officers in charge of the men on the firing line believe that under trying circumstances—the seriousness of which not a man in this House save one, perhaps, thoroughly understands—a certain ration each day or at certain periods should be given to the men, I am not going to say that they are wrong. What I wish to emphasize as my position, however, without desiring to embarrass any one, is this: the Government of Canada, having established the principle of dry canteens in this country, ought not to depart from that principle when our boys go overseas, so long as they are in the training camps. It is idle to say to those of us who live in provinces which have adopted prohibitive legislation that as much liquor is consumed under a dry canteen system as is consumed with the wet canteen. The greater the number of obstacles thrown in the way of getting liquor, the smaller the consumption will be. I care not whether it is by the authority of the British Government or by the authority of any other Government, this Government is responsible for the welfare of our boys wherever they have control. And in saying this I mean not only the Government, but Parliament. Having made myself clear, let me suggest one other thing.

To this Parliament has been entrusted, for five years by the people and for one year by ourselves, the duty of looking after the affairs of Canada whether she be in peace or in war. We cannot escape that responsibility, and we ought to accept the responsibility of discussing these things with each other in a fair way, because it makes no difference whether a man sits on that side or on this side of the House, we are all equally interested, in more ways than one, and we should not fly at each other's heads the minute there is a difference of opinion about these things. I will not quietly allow any member on either side of the House to question my right to discuss the conditions of our Canadian troops either here or in the Motherland. With all due deference to the stirring appeal of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), I believe our boys at the front look to this Parliament as their guardian (not to any one set of men in it), and any man who hesitates to assume that responsibility, no matter what the criticism, is not performing his full duty. I do not look upon the position of the House of Commons, no matter upon which side we sit, as one that demands silence on these things. If we were all to sit silent, we would soon ascertain that our boys at the front condemned us, believing we were not doing our full duty to them, and no matter what the criticism may be, I believe every member in this House ought to take the situation seriously, and we ought to feel a freedom, particularly in this time of stress through which we are passing, perhaps greater than we ever did before, in pointing out where we can where things may be remedied and efficiency become more efficient. What is Parliament for? Is it for the Government to come in and say: You must do this and you must do that, and everybody quietly acquiesce? In that case, we might as well all stay at home. Why have a Parliament at all? This is the forum of the people, and if there be any portion of the people of Canada that need protection, need care, need looking after, that portion of the people is to be found in the training camps of the Old Country or fighting for us in France. Surely we are looking at this thing from the wrong angle; we ought to be united as one man in seeing that the very best that can be done for our soldiers at the front is done, and no matter what the views of a man, honestly expressed, may be, the Parliament of Canada is the place in which to express those views.

In conclusion, I want to say again that I am in favour of pursuing this course so long as Canada has control in regard to the canteens, no matter where our boys may be. When they leave the training camps to go into the firing line, I do not intend to set up my opinions against that of those of long experience, but I do say this, that because a man lives in London or elsewhere, he is not a bit better qualified to judge of whether there should be a dry canteen or a wet canteen for the Canadians than we are in this Parliament, and we have said once for all that we are in favour of dry canteens. I am in favour of dry canteens for our boys, no matter whether they be in Canada or in the training camps in the Old Country.

Hon. Mr. ALBERT SEVIGNY (Translation): I followed with close attention the speeches delivered in the course of the debate on this resolution. I have come to the conclusion that far too much significance has been given Mr. Goforth's criticism as expressed in his letter published in the Financial Post. I came across many officers and soldiers who had returned from the front and they were unanimous in the statement that discipline in the camps left nothing to be desired and that they had no trouble whatever from intemperance. The officers stated that in England and France, beer could be had at the canteen after drill hours, and there is not a man in this House who could find fault with the military authorities for allowing our soldiers to partake of such light refreshments after hours of hard training, just as the French soldier is allowed his glass of wine.

I have just said that we are making too much of Mr. Goforth's letter; the same is true of many other documents that find their way in the public press of this country. This very afternoon we have had another instance. At the opening of the House, our attention was drawn to a newspaper item alleging that soldiers who cross the province of Quebec are subjected to insults as they march through Montreal, Quebec or Rivière-du-Loup. Whoever is in touch with the prevailing sentiment in the province of Quebec cannot but realize how much it is below the dignity of the House of Commons of Canada to take notice of such abuse, which is launched through the medium of the press by irresponsible parties and is a mere concoction of slanderous untruths. I am quite aware, Mr. Speaker, that if any gentleman this afternoon had moved the adjournment of the House in order to call attention to a statement appearing in a newspaper edited in the province of Ontario suggesting that soldiers had been insulted in the province of Quebec, all my colleagues from our province, standing up in their indignation, would have replied before the House and before the country: "It is injudicious for us to take so much stock in a letter published in Ontario or elsewhere on happenings in the province of Quebec." I take this opportunity of asserting that the criticisms appearing in certain newspapers concerning events alleged to have happened in the province of Quebec are absolutely groundless. Canadian soldiers leaving for the front, from whatever part of the country they hail, are cheered and congratulated as they march through our cities along our country roads. Some are prone to criticise because in the City of Quebec for instance, the people are not continually displaying their feelings in outward manifestations. If to-day we are less demonstrative, the reason comes not from our lack of interest in the war, but from a peculiarity of human nature. Mr. Speaker, the City of Quebec, since the month of August 1914, has seen thousands and thousands of soldiers marching past; thirty thousand filed through its gates on their way to Valcartier and later other regiments, going to other camps. So, if the people of the City of Quebec are not on every occasion turning out to give public ovations to our boys parading through the street, does it mean that they are insensible to the sacrifices made by our soldiers? No indeed, Mr. Speaker; heretofore the province of Quebec has been all soul in the war like the rest of the country, and no matter to what extent French Canadians may be belittled in other provinces, they understand their duty and will perform it to the end, and never will they be wanting in admiration not only for our boys from the province of Quebec, but for every Canadian soldier from any part of the Dominion.

Should we have been justified, Mr. Speaker, to take six hours of the time of this House to discuss the accusations contained in the letter read to us early in the day? Certainly not. And I say we are not justified in spending six hours over what Mr. Goforth may have thought fit to say in his letter. I heard the minister of Labor (Mr. Crothers) giving Mr. Goforth's account of what took place at Valcartier. I was in the City of Quebec in 1914 and every day that our boys were in camp, I made it my duty to go to Valcartier, where I had friends to whom I could be of assistance. In three weeks' time thirty-three thousand men were gathered at that one point. Can it be thought possible that such a large body of men as yet unaccustomed to military discipline, may be collected from every corner of the country without some slight disorders taking place before embarking for the front? Why should those slight disagreements be magnified? Why not, instead, point to the splendid discipline of the troops at Valcartier in 1914, so much admired by all visitors to the camp? The same order prevailed last year. Why be shocked if in a very few cases insignificant breaches of discipline were noticed? Mr. Speaker, there are men right here in Ottawa, a prohibition city, as well as in Montreal and elsewhere, who are not enlisting and nevertheless have their little fling. Should we exhibit unflinching severity on account of an occasional infringement of the law by some soldier? I know the members of this House are too broad-minded for such petty criticism.

Hon. gentlemen who have been to the front and have spoken on this question, called attention to the admirable behaviour of all our boys. We all agree that they are well disciplined and made heroes of themselves on the battlefield. I ask whether we who stay behind, and who for the most part lack military training, have the right to say to the military authorities, to say to such a distinguished officer as general Turner, for instance,—a Liberal, by the way—who has charge of the Canadian forces in England, that he does not know what he is about and should in future forbid his men to take a glass of beer... Should we dictate to the highest military experts commanding our boys in England and on the Continent? I claim not. As for me, Mr. Speaker, so long as our soldiers, whatever be their nationality, fight as they fought at Ypres, Langemark, Festubert, Givenchy, and especially Vimy, the military heads who train men for such struggles will have my most entire confidence.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): I do not know that I can add anything of great value to the discussion that has taken place this afternoon and evening, but I think I would be recreant to my trust, coming, as I do, from a military city, if I sat silent and allowed to pass unchallenged the remarks that have been made here to-day. I quite agree with the position taken by my hon. friend for South Renfrew (Mr. G. Graham) that this House should welcome discussion, but it should be discussion of a constructive rather than of an iconoclastic character. I doubt very much if we are justified in indulging in criticism that cannot be of much advantage, and which, under certain conditions, may be of great disadvantage to the country. I think I can appreciate the position of many women in this country who allowed their sons, their brothers and husbands to go to the front, realizing that having gone to the front these men would be subjected to great temptations, and I am not unaware of the heartaches there will be throughout Canada tomorrow when the press carries from one ocean to the other the wild statements that have been made in this House to-day in reference to the alleged excesses of troops at the front. I was at Valcartier on the Sunday when that magnificent force of 33,000 men were gathered there before proceeding overseas. I know nothing of Captain Goforth; he may be a man of character and a man of reputation, and he may be an irresponsible scribbler, but until I know the worth of the man and the facts on which his letter is founded I am not prepared to assume that the criticism he passes upon the men that I knew at Valcartier is entitled to any weight. No finer body of men were ever gathered together in Canada than the 33,000 troops I saw at Valcartier, and if they had indulged to excess in alcoholic beverages they gave no evidence of it as they marched before the Duke of Connaught that Sunday afternoon. They went over to England. We had a dry canteen in Canada. Captain Goforth says it was not a success. Those troops went from Valcartier to Salisbury Plain, and those of us who followed conditions there know that for about two weeks there was a dry canteen at Salisbury. I have never been a soldier in a military camp; I know nothing of military discipline or how soldiers should be managed, but I know men from Salisbury told me that after a short time the dry canteen was found impracticable. Conditions in England were very different from conditions at Valcartier. At Valcartier the camp was in the country; at Salisbury it was in a thickly settled district. Places at which liquor could be got surounded the camp, and if the men could not get what they wanted at the camp it was a simple thing to go outside the camp and get it. Some men did forget themselves. The strict enforcement of the regulations on shipboard may have made some men more "dry" than they otherwise would have been, and at Salisbury excesses by some were indulged in. But there is one thing this country should never forget. If some few of the men at Salisbury indulged to excess and did not know how to live, they taught Canada that they knew how to die at the second battle of Ypres. I am not going to sit quiet in this House and hear the reputations of all these men slandered, men who in my judgment will go down in history as heroes, not as drunkards and men given to excess.

I saw something of the dry canteen in my own district, in the city of Kingston, the headquarters of the third military district. Not long after the camp was established complaints began to come in that a dry canteen was of no advantage if the men could get liquor outside after hours. The military authorities complained that, though the men were kept in until six o'clock, after that hour they went to the city and until the time when the bars closed they got what they wanted. The closing hour for the bars was then fixed at seven o'clock, but still there were complaints. An arrangement was made with the license holders that nothing should be sold to soldiers in uniform, but beer and then only for one hour. That was more satisfactory and was maintained until an end was put to the entire sale of liquor by the Prohibition Act. Now, a word as to the conditions overseas. Only a week ago I got a letter from a Canadian officer in England, who stated that he had honestly tried to carry on a dry canteen—and he was a man who did not indulge in intoxicating liquor—but found that it was impossible, that if he wanted effective discipline and a maximum of training, it was essential that he should have a wet canteen in which men could get beer, rather than have them go from the camp ground to other places in which they could get stronger liquor and more of it, and at the same time be subjected to other temptations. We should be careful not to be too ready in our criticisms and to avoid doing the men in England an injustice. Last year I saw something of the conditions at the front. I was at the front, in France, and talked to men in charge of the Colonials, and these men told me that they had no difficulty in regard to temperance, that the men were sober and well-behaved, and were doing their duty as they should. Mr. Goforth's letter does not deal with present day conditions, but with the conditions he alleges prevailed in 1914; and, even assuming that he is correct in everything he says, why should we send far and wide statements to the disadvantage of our men concerning conditions which may have been irregular but which do not now exist?

But a criticism far more damning than that in regard to intemperance has been spoken here this afternoon, and that is in regard to venereal disease. I have documents in my possession that bear on that subject, and I thought I would draw attention to one or two statements of fact. The first is made by Surgeon General G. C. Jones who, referring to Dr. Bruce's report in a letter of 2nd March, 1916, says:

> The total number of Canadian venereal patients in England is 740.

That is, on the second day of March, 1916, there were only 740 men of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces in England suffering from venereal trouble. Dr. Bruce, in his report, states that on 13th August, 1916, there were 695 venereal cases in the Shorncliffe area. I had been at Shorncliffe, and I confess it astounded me to hear it said in this House this afternoon that a great percentage of our men were suffering from venereal trouble. If Surgeon General Jones and Colonel Bruce are correct that there were fewer than eight hundred men suffering from venereal disease, then it will be seen that the statement made here this afternoon is not supported by the facts. I heard statements made at a recent meeting of the Soldiers' Aid Commission in Toronto that six hundred cases were held up for pension suffering from venereal trouble. I was amazed at that, but on inquiry I was assured by Major Todd that there was no truth in the statement, and that they had only a few cases of that character before them for consideration. I have discussed this matter with doctors in my own city and elsewhere, and they tell me that in their experience the returned soldiers are not found to be suffering from venereal disease in much larger proportion than civilians. I think the men are entitled to have these statements made on their behalf and that we should take pains to make it plain to the country that the statements made this afternoon were not founded on a careful review of the facts.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I certainly had no intention to delay the business of the House when I brought this question before my fellow-members. I do not regret the course I took, notwithstanding the aspersions and suggestions from the other side, and even from this side. After twenty-one years as a member of this House I know something of my public duty, and, as to loyalty, in that I yield to no one. I did not bring this question forward as suggesting an attack upon the Government, or upon the Minister of Militia and Defence. I made a very mild statement, inspired by a newspaper published in Toronto by a man who is well known to the members of this House and to the community in general, a personal friend of several of the ministers. That newspaper published the letter of Captain Goforth and commented strongly in favour of his attitude. It was my duty as a public man, it was my duty as a friend of the Canadian army in the field, to bring this matter before the House, and I have done it without questioning the bravery, the patriotism, or the fighting qualities of our soldiers. I listened to the speeches that have been delivered in this debate, including that of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers). I can understand a speech of that nature delivered in a back concession by a fifth-grade politician, but when such a speech is delivered in this House by a minister of the Crown it causes me no little surprise. The hon. minister suggested that I should not have spoken at all on this question. Let me tell him that if I had slandered and defamed soldiers I should be in good company, as I will show. But I have not slandered, I have not defamed, I have not libelled our soldiers. Were I to slander and libel them I should slander and libel my own kith and kin. Let me remind my hon. friend, in case he may repeat that address before his electors, that if he ever refers to my statement this afternoon he may tell them that in my family there is one veteran of South Africa, there is one nephew at the front, one nephew killed at Ypres, and my own son is in the army. Therefore, it is as a Canadian, as a loyal subject of His Majesty the King and as the father of a boy who will soon be at the front that I have spoken this afternoon. I dare say that of these hon. gentlemen who have delivered these loyal utterances this afternoon not one of them stated whether he was in favour of a dry or a wet canteen, and not one of them would take issue with me if he were standing before his electors. More than that, let me say that I am ready to join issue with any of the hon. gentlemen who have lectured me on loyalty and patriotism not only before this House but in any of their constituencies. I am ready to take the same attitude in front of their own electors—aye, before the Canadian soldiers themselves. I challenge any one to deny me the privilege as a Canadian to speak the language I have spoken this afternoon. The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) should know that I brought this matter before the House because I thought it was in the public interest, but he has approached the question in the way which we might expect from a gentleman of his size. Listening to him, when he was suggesting that I had defamed, slandered and libelled the Canadian soldiers, instinctively I thought of Johnson's definition of a certain loyalty and a certain patriotism.

This is not a political issue in the narrow sense. I claim that this is a national issue. It affects the welfare of our soldiers and of their families. The duty of a public man who happened to possess the information which I imparted to the House this afternoon was to focus the attention of the public on these facts in order to know whether the alleged evil exists or not. What did I say to arouse the anger of my hon. friends? I beg each of my hon. friends to read my remarks in to-morrow's Hansard. They will find that first I made the statement that the ex-Minister of Militia had wisely established a dry canteen for the Canadian soldiers. Does anybody take exception to that? I stated that having established a dry canteen, some one whom I do not know had taken it upon himself to substitute wet canteens. In that statement, happily for me, I was corroborated by the hon. ex-Minister of Militia himself (Sir Sam Hughes), who stated that he craved the honour of having established the dry canteen, but that his ex-colleague the Minister of Militia overseas, in order to insult him, had restored the wet canteen in the camps in England. I did not make the statement; the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton made it this afternoon. What did I say further, Mr. Speaker? I said that disorder was alleged to have taken place as a result of the establishment of wet canteens in the camps, and I brought specific cases to the attention of hon. gentlemen. The Minister of Labour suggested, a few moments ago, that this letter had never been written, that it was not signed, that, indeed, it may have been a forgery. A forgery? The letter is not signed, but on the first line of the first page what do you read, Mr. Speaker?

> What the army loses through drink.
> By Capt. Paul Goforth.

And my hon. friend thinks it is an argument to state that the letter is not signed after the last line. Mr. Speaker, I stated the specific cases given in that letter by Capt. Goforth, who gives the dates, the circumstances, and the names of the camps. Are the facts true or not? Did I state that they were true? I stated that evils were alleged to exist, that they ought to be investigated, and that if, on investigation, they are found to be true, the plain duty of the Minister of Militia is to humbly request the Imperial authorities or the War Office to restore the dry canteen in the camps where our Canadian soldiers are assembled. That is the gist of the remarks I made this afternoon. Why all this anger, why these lessons in loyalty and patriotism? Is the Canadian Parliament afraid to face the issue? Is an issue or a grievance to be settled by discarding it? Either the facts are true or not. If they are not true, so much the worse for Captain Goforth. He is still at the front, and if he has libelled, slandered and defamed his fellow officers and soldiers under him, well, Mr. Speaker, I leave him to the care of his soldiers and his fellow officers. But if they are true, what of it? If the statements contained in Captain Goforth's letters are true, I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Labour will he stand by the wet canteen or will he not stand by the dry canteen?

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend suggests an investigation. It occurs to me that it was his duty to do some investigating before he brought these serious charges before the House and the country. I think it was for him to get some evidence that they were true or untrue.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend ought to read the Lemieux Act enforced by his own department. He will find it on the Statute Book. There is such a thing as compulsory investigation, but I dare say that in the present instance, when statements are made in a respectable and responsible paper like the Financial Post by a friend of the Government, and when the charges of Captain Goforth are endorsed in a strong editorial, it is the duty of the Government to investigate such charges and find out

10 p.m. if they are true. Every father, every mother, every clergyman, yes, and every respectable citizen in the country will expect that much from the Government.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Who is the owner of this paper?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think he is a namesake of yours. It is Mr. Maclean of Toronto, if I mistake not. Perhaps the Minister of Finance could tell us that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure; I do not know.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is the proprietor of that paper?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not certain as to that, but I think Colonel Maclean.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Colonel Maclean, a soldier, holding rank in the Canadian militia, would publish in his paper statements of the nature of a forgery, would defame and slander and libel the four hundred thousand Canadians who are serving abroad? What does my hon. frined think of that?

Mr. CROTHERS: My hon. friend has stated several times that he does not know whether these are facts or not. He admits now he does not know Mr. Goforth or the editor of the paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The House will surely not expect that I shall answer the interjection of my hon. friend. I say that according to Captain Goforth, who is still in the army, who therefore comes under discipline, disorders of a very serious nature have taken place and those disorders are enumerated by the Financial Post published by Colonel Maclean of Toronto, a supporter of the Government, a friend of the Minister of Finance. Mr. Speaker, if the alleged facts which I have mentioned are untrue, we have a board of censors in Canada. Why not suspend the publication of the Financial Post? If the statements by Captain Goforth, which I have quoted, are not facts, why not cashier him at once? But no, the Minister of Labour would like the member for Rouville to investigate the facts beforehand.

Mr. MACDONALD: As the minister investigated the cost of living.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The member for Huron (Mr. Lewis) spoke of his experience and stated that drunkenness in the army in England was an unpardonable sin, and that anyone guilty of drunkenness was court martialled. Exactly; and I find that Captain Goforth speaks of such a case. He says:

Soon after our arrival at Shorncliffe there was a special meeting of the officers' mess to decide whether we would go on with a "wet" mess or follow the example of Lord Kitchener and the King—

A disloyal Kitchener and a disloyal King I suppose.

Broadminded arguments about "liberty" and "moderation" won the day. Yet, within a month from that time, I had the unwelcome task—

Mr. Speaker, mark my words.

Yet, within a month from that time, I had the unwelcome task of prosecuting two of my brother officers for drunkenness before a General Court Martial, and our Regimental Sergeant-Major for the same offence before a District Court Martial. The Sergeant-Major was found guilty of drunkenness at Hythe on the line of march and was dismissed from the service. He appealed to the Privy Council, but the judgment of the court was sustained. There was a man who knew his work to perfection, who had served in the South African war, and who wore on his breast the ribbon of the long service and good conduct medal; and yet he was broken completely, and broken through nothing but drink. Why should a capable warrant officer be dismissed from the service? Why should an efficient officer be cashiered? Is it not high time that we determined to dismiss the liquor traffic from the service? Is it not the liquor traffic that should be cashiered?

That is the language of an officer in His Majesty's army, a Canadian, and yet, because I report to the House that serious state of things, I am told that I should have kept silent, that I should not have even mooted the subject before the House this afternoon. I repeat that I have done only my duty. Now I am told by the member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury), who lost his temper, that this Captain Goforth is nothing else but a crank. Well, if Captain Goforth is a crank, it is a very serious aspersion on the Minister of Militia and the military authorities generally who have sent our boys under fire commanded by a crank. That is not a certificate of very great wisdom on the part of the military authorities.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance also stated that it was a slander to mention such facts, a slander against our soldiers at the front. I do not know if he listened to my statements this afternoon, but if his accusation of slander is based on hearsay, I would tell him that the hearsay comes from warped and twisted interpretations of my statements. I simply enumerated the various statements made by Captain Goforth, and the mere stating of these allegations should not bring on my head the thunder which was brought this afternoon. As I stated a moment ago, if I have slandered the soldiers I am in good company, because in England, in the British Parliament, the mother of all Parliaments, the Prime Minister was not afraid to tackle the problem of liquor in the army. I have his very words here, delivered a few months ago. He said:

We are fighting Germany, Austria, and drink, and so far as I can see the greatest of these deadly foes is drink.

Is Lloyd George a libeller? Is he a slanderer? Is he disloyal? Surely not, since he is at the head of the present Government. If he were disloyal he would be in excellent company with Rt. Hon. Walter Long, Lord Milner, Rt. Hon. Bonar Law and all the other leaders of the Tory party in England. Mr. Speaker, no, it is the duty of a member who has the interest of his fellow citizens at heart, to bring to light facts such as I have revealed to-day. I resent more especially the remarks which were made by my friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark). I regret that he is not in his seat at the present moment. He thinks that because the Empire is at war, and because Canada is at war, we should maintain silence and not divulge abuses and weaknesses such as are set forth in the statement made by Captain Goforth. Of course, if there was no war there would be no soldiers and no camps, and if there were no camps there would be no wet canteens and therefore there would be no disorders and we would have nothing to say. But unfortunately there is war and, as I said a moment ago, it is not by ignoring a grievance which exists that you settle it. The hon. member for Red Deer claims to be and is an excellent Liberal. As a Liberal of the English school I believe that, after all, the cure for all evils is publicity. My hon. friend lectured me with regard to the soldiers fighting in the trenches. Did I speak of the trenches? The only reference I made to the trenches was when I said that the Russian Government, having sent soldiers to France, had exacted from the French military authorities an agreement that in the trenches where the French soldiers were served wine the Russian soldiers should not receive any liquor at the hands of their Allies. My hon. friend hinted that I had spoken with some disparagement of the work done in the trenches. He spoke of Verdun and of the heroic battles in which the French soldiers were engaged. I did not need that lecture, for I know what the French soldiers have accomplished just as well as I know what the English and the Canadian soldiers have accomplished at the front. I do not begrudge the small rum ration which is served to our soldiers in the mud of the trenches. I did not speak of that: I spoke of the life of the soldiers at the camps in England. I said that it was alleged that the wet canteens at these camps had been the cause of innumerable disorders and I pleaded that the Government take action to restore the dry canteen and to make representations to the Imperial authorities to that end. If my hon. friend from Red Deer were in his seat, I would remind him that it is the essence of Liberalism to expose evils in order to free society from their effects. Describing the aim of Liberalism, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman said:

> We would endeavour to secure to every man the best conditions of living, and so far as can be done by laws and customs, to secure him also an equal chance with others of a useful and happy life.

Lord Willoughby de Broke has said:

> The essence of our policy is to give each individual the elements that will afford him an opportunity of at least living a free and a decorous existence, and the opportunity to raise himself or herself to the highest point of moral and material efficiency.

I say that it is the act of a true Liberal to ask for the suppression of intoxicants in the training camps, because liquor does not make for the moral or material efficiency of the soldier. My hon. friend, I know, has three sons at the front. I have only one who will be at the front very soon, and I would rather have my son live in a camp under respectable conditions than have him exposed to the temptations to which our soldiers are constantly subjected because of intoxicants. Mr. Speaker, I beg to withdraw the motion that I made this afternoon.

Motion of Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux for the adjournment of the House negatived.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

Friday, April 27, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill No. 40, to incorporate La Société des Artisans Canadiens Français.—Mr. Achim.

Bill No. 41, respecting The Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company.—Mr. J. A. Currie.

APPOINTMENT OF ULDERIC TREMBLAY.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White, the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 20th instant, respecting the appointment of Mr. Ulderic Tremblay to the Blue Book Translation Branch of the Translation Staff of the House of Commons was concurred in.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 42, to amend the Chinese Immigration Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Explain.

Mr. ROCHE: This Bill is intended to allow Chinese students to visit Canada without their being subject to the usual head tax. In the past the head tax has been imposed and collected, but has been refunded upon the students leaving Canada. In the United States they admit Chinese students without any head tax. A great many complaints have been made by and on behalf of the Chinese in this matter, and it has been decided to introduce an Act placing the Chinese students on the exempt list, along with merchants, tourists, and others of that class.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMPANIES AMENDMENT ACT.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 43, respecting companies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Explain.

Mr. MACLEAN: I introduced this Bill at the suggestion of a committee of the Canadian Bar Association, by whom it was prepared. I would prefer, however, that any explanation of the measure be left in abeyance until the second reading, when the Bill will be printed. The Bill is rather lengthy, and an explanation would also be lengthy. I trust that the House will agree to give the Bill a first reading so that it may be printed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NAVAL AEROPLANE SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. D. REID: The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) asked me a question yesterday in reference to hydro-aeroplane service, and I promised to get the answer to-day. Mr. Desbarats, the deputy minister, has sent me the following memorandum:

> With reference to question by Mr. E. M. Macdonald, M.P., on page 838 of the Hansard of April 26, it is not at present the intention of the Naval Department to organize a hydro-aeroplane service. The department is not aware that any of these machines have been brought into Canada for the establishment of such a service.

Mr. MACDONALD: If I did not ask the minister the other day to bring down what papers there were on this subject, I should like to be understood now as asking him to do so.

Mr. REID: Of course, the answer I gave was prepared by Mr. Desbarats, whom I instructed to read the question and give me an answer which I could give to the House. I shall ask Mr. Desbarats to get the papers ready and all that can be brought down will be brought down.

INTER-IMPERIAL PREFERENCE—FRENCH TREATIES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): A cable despatch appeared in the press yesterday to the effect that at the Imperial Conference now sitting in London an agreement was reached in respect to inter-Imperial preference arrangements. I desire to inquire whether the minister has had any official notification of the same. The press also informed us that there was contemplated a somewhat summary cessation of certain treaties with France. While the minister is answering the first question, he might inform me as to the second.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: May I ask my hon. friend in what paper or papers these reports appeared?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In all the papers.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: In the Montreal Star, I think, of Monday night.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no information respecting the matter, nor has it been brought to my attention. I shall be very glad to look at the articles in question and be prepared to give a further answer in a day or so. The matter has not been brought to my attention; therefore I should judge that there is no substantial foundation for the report.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

STATEMENT BY HON. WM. PUGSLEY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY: In a discussion which took place on April 25 in regard to the Intercolonial railway, I am reported in Hansard to have used the word "loyalty" in one or two portions of my remarks in connection with the employees. I am inclined to think that the report is accurate, but it does not convey the meaning that I had intended to convey. In other parts of my speech I used the word "efficiency." I think that the use of the word "loyalty" was doing an injustice to the employees, and I wish to substitute for it the word "efficiency." What I really intended to say was that the present system had interfered with the efficiency, not with their loyalty, of the employees.

QUEBEC-SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE: Nearing the close of the last session, an Act was passed by this House in reference to the Quebec-Saguenay Railway, and under that Act a case in respect to the value of that railroad was submitted to the Exchequer Court. I understand that the judge of the Exchequer Court has filed a decision which should be interesting to the members of this House in view of the fact that a further investigation in connection with that road will, I believe, come up before the close of this session. I was going to suggest to the Minister of Justice or to the Minister of Railways that if they would be good enough to have copies of that decision distributed, it would be of interest to myself and to the other members of this House.

Mr. COCHRANE: An Order of the House has been passed for the production of those papers, and they will be brought down in a day or two.

PENSIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: Might I ask the hon. gentleman who is leading the House whether it is the intention of the Governnment this session to introduce any Bill providing for an amendment to the Pensions law?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is the intention to present a Bill dealing with the entire subject of pensions. My hon. friend will recall that a joint committee of the House was appointed last session to report upon pensions, and that subsequently an Order in Council was passed constituting a Board of Pensions Commissioners for Canada, and authorizing that Board to carry out the administration of pensions. The Order in Council also fixed the rates of pensions for the several ranks. The Board of Pensions Commissioners have been proceeding with their administration under the authority of that Order in Council. It is the intention, as I stated, to bring down, a little later in the session, a Bill dealing with the entire subject of pensions. Of course, the Board of Pensions Commissioners is proceeding lawfully at the present time under the present Order in Council, but it is thought advisable that the matter should be dealt with by a Bill carried through Parliament in the usual way.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE ON ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment of Mr. Turriff thereto, was resumed from Tuesday, April 24.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is worth while at all times to review with care the financial position of our country in each recurring fiscal year, but it is doubly necessary that the review in these times be with especial care, fairness and thoroughness. The outcome of the struggle in which we are engaged will be decided by a preponderance of military skill on the one hand and of business organization and financial strength on the other. Which, in the ultimate, will be the controlling factor, it may be difficult to say, but our business is to see to it that whichever is supreme in the end, the one factor or the other, we are the stronger party.

The Budget deliverance this year is the most inspiring message ever given to the people of Canada by any Minister of Finance. This is the fiftieth Budget of this Dominion and it is incomparably the best of all. I say this not to boast nor to ascribe credit to the Administration in particular for these results; I say it because the results themselves are of sufficient importance and sufficiently vital to us at this time to warrant impressing them upon this House and upon the people of Canada. It is a matter of secondary concern who are chiefly to get the credit or what measures are especially to get the credit for the enviable position we are in to-day. The matter of prime importance is that we have attained the commercial strength we have and that, at this critical hour, we can face the balance of the conflict with renewed courage and vigour.

What are the results and what briefly is our position? We find ourselves in the first place in the possession of a revenue unheard of in the history of Canada, indeed undreamed of in any previous year. I realize the significance of the statement made by the leading financial critic of the Opposition, that no one could have anticipated that we would at this time be in the financial position in which we are; that we could have attained along commercial lines to the results that we have attained. We find ourselves in possession of a revenue of $232,000,000, or $60,000,000 in advance of our receipts in any previous year of our existence. The advance alone is more than the whole revenue of Canada fifteen years ago. We find ourselves in receipt of that revenue without having strangled or crippled or even impaired any line or class of industry in this country or any individual in this country, and we are able to look abroad over the land and to say that all classes of our people from the humblest to the highest are individually and generally in a better position than they have ever been before. As against that revenue, we have an expenditure, outside of war expenditure (which, for the moment, I leave out of account), totalling $172,000,000, or practically the same as last year, included in which is the capital expenditure of $27,000,000, and an interest and pensions expenditure attributable to the war debt alone of $25,000,000. Did our system of bookkeeping assign to war expenditure all that is in reality its due, we would have an expenditure in this year of only $147,000,000, and the surplus revenue over that total expenditure, ordinary and capital, would reach the enormous total of $85,000,000. It is argued on the part of Opposition critics—as inevitably it must be and no complaint can be found for that attitude—that even at that figure we are in excess of our expenditure of only four or five years ago. That is correct, but we are in reduction of what we have spent during the past three years.

Last year, not including interest on war debt and pensions, that expenditure of $147,000,000 on ordinary and capital account would have amounted approximately to $155,000,000. The year before it was $180,000,000, and the year before that about $183,000,000. So that within the last four years there has been a most pronounced, a most emphatic retrenchment. Going back of that again, to the times when our revenue was very much smaller, when the scope of the operations of the Dominion Government was very much more contracted than it is to-day, and when the cost of living was very much lower, we find the figure somewhat less. But what is the figure? There is no lesson to be learned, even though the result is truly told and not falsified, by taking individual patches and comparing one year with another. A great historian has said that by taking mere fragments of history you can learn nothing at all, or any lesson you like, but that if you take history as a whole you get great and salutory lessons, valuable for all time. It is the same with the history of our finance.

Looking back to the year 1909, let us say, or I will take any other year that is named, our expenditure for that year was ony 16 per cent less than the expenditure for the year we have just passed, leaving out all war accounts. Just 16 per cent difference in almost eight years of this country's history, and in the course of that time the cost of everything has increased; the scope of the operations of this Government has increased; the services we have performed for the public of Canada have multiplied. So much is this so that it would be impossible for any business concern in Canada with a like increase in its duties to show an equally small increase in its expenditure. While eight years ago we spent a sum of money on capital and ordinary expenditure of $128,200,000, only 16 per cent less than what we spent last year, our revenue in that year was only some $85,000,000. Our revenue this year is $232,000,000, or almost 300 per cent more than it was in 1909. As against almost 300 per cent of an increase in revenue we have an increase in expenditure, all things together outside of the war, of only 16 per cent. That is a broad view of the situation. The figures are almost as favourable for any year you like to take back of 1911; there would be very little difference. That is a broad outlook on the way we are moving, and on the efforts that have been made to retrench effectively in large sums. Our revenue is $232,000,000, and our expenditure $172,000,000; we have paid all our accounts on capital and ordinary expenditure—and that is what counts, it is neither the one nor the other, but the two together that counts—we have paid our interest on war debt and pensions, and have $60,000,000 to the good. Before this Government took office only in four complete years since Confederation did this country ever pay its way; two of those years were under the late Administration, and two were prior to their time. But there have been four years in which there were surpluses since this Government took office. Last year there was a surplus of about $2,000,000; another year, 1912-13, there was a surplus of $25,000,000, and the previous year a surplus of about $122,000. As I said before, previous to the taking of office by this Administration only in four complete years since Confederation did this country ever pay its way. On the other hand, those who came in Parliament at the same time as myself will remember that commencing with 1908 and going on through 1909, 1910 and part of 1911 there were very large increases in the debt. Taking the first three of those years and not the fraction of the last, this country ran behind in its expenditure over revenue to an amount exceeding $72,000,000. That was the increase in our capital debt in three years, and part of the expenditure that we have to make to-day, which adds to our total outlay, is the interest charge on that $72,000,000 that the country ran behind in 1908, 1909 and 1910.

Now we have an increase of 16 per cent in expenditure over 1909. I will give a few reasons for that. In the first place, were all the conditions the same? The increase in the price we have to pay for our services would account for at least 16 per cent increase in expenditure, and we have other expenses and other services that we did not have then. It takes a great deal more to run a railway when that railway is making $16,000,000 of revenue than it does when it is only making $8,500,000. The total revenue of the Intercolonial in 1908 was only $8,500,000, but its revenue this year is over $16,000,000, almost twice what it was in 1908; consequently, the expenditure incumbent upon us to keep up that road is greater than it was then. But whereas in 1908 we lost $800,000 on the Intercolonial, in the year that has just gone by the Intercolonial had a surplus of over $1,200,000.

I will give another reason why our expenditure is greater. There was a government that built the National Transcontinental Railway, and as a result of the necessity placed upon us by our predecessors of running that road, we are out many millions more. If they had succeeded in building another transcontinental road the expenditure of this country would necessarily be much more than it is.

On the other hand, what is the state of the country generally with regard to trade? There is no figure that is comparable in importance to the people of this country with the figures of our export trade. A country of less than eight millions of people stripped of almost 400,000 of its young manhood by the call of war, produces and manufactures goods sufficient for the consumption of its own population, and then sells to the outside world $1,178,000,000 of surplus. War time or no war time, high prices or no high prices, there is no country in the world that can present figures comparable with those. Our total trade is $2,043,000,000 and of the total trade we have a balance in our favour of $314,000,000. So that $864,500,000 is our total import and $1,178,500,000 is our total export; that is, we sold to the outside world $1,178,500,000 and bought from the outside $864,500,000 worth. The importance of the volume of our sales is very much greater than is the volumn of our purchases.

Ordinarily, large imports are not to be deplored; we cannot become a great exporter unless we import largely also. But the country that regulates and organizes its trade so as to use fully its own resources and to bring those resources to the highest value by its own industries, makes its exports greater than its imports, and so makes money out of its trade. That is the position we are in to-day; we are selling $314,000,000 more than we are buying from the outside world. This is what makes us prosperous. For we are not great carriers of trade, nor have we great investments in foreign lands. Therefore, unless we are able to make goods and sell them to the outside world we could not hope to pay our obligations. Fortunately, we have reached that position, a position of great strength and one that must be gratifying to every citizen of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Do these export figures include the munitions and war supplies furnished to Great Britain and the Allies, and also those for the use of the Canadian troops at the front?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The exports undoubtedly include munitions and war supplies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Those for our own soldiers?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Everything made in this country and sold to the outside world. Let us give a moment's thought to that point. Let us assume that our exports of munitions of war amounted for last year to $300,000,000—and I think that is a high estimate. Even deducting that amount you still have $878,000,000 left. "But," we are told, "the prices are higher than before the war, and consequently the increase is not what would be indicated by the total value." Well, how are we to arrive at an estimate of the increase in prices? I adopted a method which I think is a fair one. I find that in 1914 the United Kingdom had a total trade of the value of £1,222,000,000 and that in 1916 in the following year these sales amounted to £1,553,000,000. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) was, I think, astray in his figures according to the official record. Here is an increase in the exports of the United Kingdom of 25 per cent. I think it is fair to assume that they are selling to the outside world about the same quantity of goods as before the war. It is hardly likely that they are selling any more, for the restrictions on shipping would make that impossible. The inference is that the increase in the total value is due to an increase of prices. Making a similar allowance in the case of Canada's trade, you find that our exports on the basis of prices before the war would be over $600,000,000. That is a colossal figure and illustrates what may be done by great efforts and under a sound fiscal system. It shows what can be brought about by trade organization as opposed to a policy of laissez faire.

The ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) was in office for three years, and we sat facing him in opposition. We heard him, and we also heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce of that day speak with pride—and with just pride—of the trade of Canada of that time. But take the trade of Canada for all the three years while the ex-Minister of Public Works was in office, and the aggregate is less than the trade of Canada for last year alone. Take the exports alone —and the exports have grown more rapidly than the imports—and you find that for last year they were greater than the total exports for four years of the late Administration. These are facts that mean a great deal to Canada; they speak of the destiny of our country, and give us courage and confidence to maintain this struggle to the end.

I wish to refer briefly to certain arguments advanced by the hon. member for Red Deer. I refer to them for this reason—that I know he advances them out of regard for what he believes to be a truth, namely, that the fiscal policy of this country at this time is important from a war standpoint. It is from a war standpoint that he discusses matters in this House, and the arguments he has advanced are worthy of courteous consideration for that reason. He tells us that it would be the best thing we could do at this time to throw down our tariff wall entirely and let all goods into this country free. To follow any other course, he says, is to imitate the example of Germany and not that of Great Britain. I am as far as the hon. member from desiring to imitate the example of Germany in anything that pertains to honour, humanity, or other higher qualities of man; but I do not think it wrong to study the methods of Germany in matters of business organization, because we have not yet reached the stage at which we can ignore the results which that country has achieved by its methods. The hon. gentleman pointed out that Germany, at the opening of the war, had thrown down the barriers and had removed tariff restrictions from certain goods, such as bread-stuffs, fats, and other foods. Well, if we were to do that also we should be following Germany's example. But I cannot understand the attitude of mind that would cite this as being a denial of the protective system by Germany in time of war. What is the object of that protective system? It is to give German producers a better hold upon the German market. After the war broke out and the British navy was on the water, there was not much necessity to use the tariff to keep the home market for the German producer—the British navy saw to it that there was not much competition from outside. Consequently, there was no longer reason for a tariff on foodstuffs—quite the contrary. The hon. gentleman said: The ship of free trade in Great Britain stood the storm, the ship of free trade is the ship that I go in; free trade has been maintained by Great Britain in this struggle. It is nothing but a misnomer to say that Great Britain is a free trade country. It levies duties greater in amount than those levied in Canada; last year Great Britain collected $350,000,000 in tariff duties. We collected only $134,000,000. And, instead of diminishing or removing tariff duties because of the war, they have put on new duties and increased old ones. And these increases of duty are not on luxuries only, but on necessities also. They have resorted to the tariff to raise revenues for this war, and in doing so they have added to the protective effect of that tariff. Let me give you a few of the articles upon which they have increased their duties. They have diminished duties, as far as I can find, on nothing whatsoever. They have removed no duty at all. But they have increased duties on tea, on sugar, on cocoanut, they have put a duty of 33⅓ per cent on clocks and watches, they have put a duty of 33⅓ per cent on automobiles —clearly protective duties in both cases—

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Should not my hon. friend say that that was done to prohibit the import altogether and not for revenue purposes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would say so if it were correct, but it is not.

Mr. MACLEAN: I submit that it is correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The fact is that they have prohibited many things altogether by special enactment but they have not prohibited these things.

Mr. MACLEAN: These articles of clocks and watches and automobiles were subjected to a very high rate of duty purely for the purpose of prohibiting the import, and that was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in bringing down that particular budget.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When Great Britain sets about to prohibit the import of any articles she sets about it directly, and she enacted legislation prohibiting the importation of many articles and restricting the importation of many others, but when she set about to collect revenue she set about it directly also, and she collects revenue from clocks, watches and automobiles. If she wanted to keep them out why did she not do it directly the same as she did with respect to other articles? The revenue collected is set out in the revenue of the British Government, which returns I hold in my hand. On motor cars they have collected over £530,000, from that article alone in the first year in which they had a duty. Under the increased duty on tea they collected £4,500,000 and on sugar £11,700,000. These are articles that are on the table and in use by the poorest people in the country. Yet my hon. friend from Red Deer assumes that our system levies a tax on the poor and lets the rich off, whereas their system levies on the rich and lets the poor off. We, on the contrary, have no duty whatever on tea in this country, neither war tax nor anything else, and we have not increased the duty on sugar since the war began for war taxes or any other purposes.

A study of the situation reveals a very great and important and useful truth to this country. What is the result of the British system now? Great Britain finds herself with a total trade of £1,533,000,000, of which £949,000,000 is import and £604,000,000 export. The balance of trade against that country is £345,000,000, or over a billion and a half of dollars. Now, in view of this outstanding fact that has existed in its main features for many years, in consequence of buying to the extent of a billion and a half of dollars more than she is selling, the question comes: How is she to face her enormous obligations incurred in this war? Well, she may face them by a reversal of her fiscal policy. That is her business, it is not ours. It must be remembered that Great Britain has an enormous business in shipping. Great Britain is the carrier of the world, she makes a great deal of her money in that way and she has had enormous investments in foreign lands extending back for many decades. Great Britain, in a word, as a result of the system she has adopted, as a result of the investment of her money in other countries, is developing the industries and resources of other countries, increasing the population of other countries and making other countries greater commercially instead of herself. That is the position she is in whereas, on the other hand, it is unfortunately true that her rivals in this struggle have enormous balances of trade in their favour and have, within their own borders, every great industry brought to its highest point of perfection. That is one of the great elemental truths that has enabled Germany to maintain the struggle to this day. The British Government, only a short time ago, made an investigation into the situation as to the manufacture of dyes, in that country, one of the most vital industries of the Empire. What was the result? A commission appointed by the British Government reported that the dye inventions were made by a subject of Great Britain, who, unable to establish his industry at home, went to Germany and as a result of the system adopted there, the dye industry became the dominant dye industry of the world. That commission further reported that there was one way, and one way only, by which the dye industry could ever be established in England and England could become independent of the German supply, and that was by means of tariff taxation. Other commissions have similarly reported on other matters and other subjects of manufacture. It is argued that all great countries develop an enormous import trade and that without an import trade there cannot be a sufficient export trade. That is true, but the larger the proportion of the export business to the import business, providing both advance, the better for the country. We find the United States at this time not in the position in which Great Britain finds herself in this regard. We find the United States selling goods in volume away beyond the goods which she is importing, selling goods last year to an extent of double the imports of that country. The balance of trade in favour of the United States is over $2,000,000,000 as compared with a balance of trade against Great Britain of $1,500,000,000. That is the inevitable result of failure in adopting systematic and well reasoned means of bringing to their full development within the country itself all the resources of the country before they are sold.

I do not need further to elaborate the point I am making. I have made it clear, I think, that I am as firm a believer as ever I was in the principle of a moderate protective system for this Dominion of Canada. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Red Deer cannot, on a great matter of fiscal principle of this kind, see eye to eye with us. I would be glad indeed if he could but I fear that the very energy of his rhetoric, the virility and resourcefulness of his powers of composition, sometimes overmaster or becloud his mind and prevent him reasoning with that care and precision which alone bring the best results. Imagine, for example, an argument along this line. We, in this great war, he says are struggling for freedom and liberty, and he concludes that we are struggling for freedom of trade. The freedom that we are fighting for in this war is not freedom for an individual within a nation to do as he likes. It is not freedom for the people within the country to trade with each other just as they individually please or with the outside world as they like. We are not fighting for protection or freedom of trade or freedom in that sense at all; we are fighting for the freedom of our nation and of every other nation to decide for free trade or protection or to decide for anything else that the democracy of that country demands. We are fighting for the freedom of our nation as a nation, and freedom not only for ourselves, but for every country, within its own domain, to decide upon its own course as it wishes, undisturbed and unprovoked by aggression from without. Freedom of trade is no more what we are fighting for than is the protective system. We are fighting for the right, once and for all, to decide which we will have, free trade, protection, or anything else that we may desire.

It is inevitable in Canada, where we have a tremendous geographical extent, where we have a wide diversity of interests, and a wide diversity of activities, and where that diversity is chiefly marked by a long stretch of country that separates the one portion from the other, where we have in one-half of the Dominion a very large, preponderant agricultural community producing a share of the raw material of the world, the foodstuffs of the world, and where we have in the other half of the Dominion, with a much larger proportion of population, a more highly commercialized people, a manufacturing population on a very considerable scale, a population engaged in many industries and many activities and manufacturing to a larger extent than is possible in our western country—it is inevitable, in such a country as we have here, that the protective tariff which we maintain must be only a moderate protective tariff, a tariff that has regard to the preponderant views of both sections of this country. It cannot have sole regard to any preponderance of sentiment in the East, nor can it have sole regard to any preponderant sentiment in the West. Both must be most carefully considered with a view to that unity which is essential if a nation is to prosper and which at this time is doubly essential, is vital to our success. It is an inevitable and indisputable fact that the prevailing sentiment west of the Great Lakes, and particularly in the three grain-producing prairie provinces, favours a lower tariff than does the prevailing sentiment in eastern Canada. That is not only an admitted truth, but it is a truth that is born of and imbedded in our geography, that is born of and imbedded in the conditions of our national life. The people in those three provinces are the great producers of our grain. They are not a manufacturing people. Consequently they do not get as immediate or as direct results from the maintenance of a protective tariff as do the people in the other portions of Canada. One cannot argue from that that they should not in that country have regard to the whole interests of Canada and not merely to those of the three provinces. Nor can it be argued that the sentiment of western Canada can be ignored by the citizens of this eastern country, or by the Parliament or Government of this Dominion in the framing of its fiscal policy.

That brings me to the discussion of a subject that is embodied in an amendment moved in this House by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). On the 16th day of the present month the Government of Canada, under the powers vested in it under the War Measures Act, placed wheat and products of wheat upon the free list, the effect being that, on the authority of the Underwood tariff of the United States, the same goods, and, indeed, all products of wheat were placed on the free list entering the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think my hon. friend has made a mistake. He states that this Government, on the 16th of April, placed all products of wheat on the free list. Is he not wrong? It only placed wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list, not bran and shorts.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I spoke generally. Bran and shorts were not included. I do not see that the point is material.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is quite material to the eastern stock raiser, very material.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To attain the end in view all that was necessary was to place wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list, the result being that wheat, wheat flour, semolina and all products of wheat were admitted free to the United States.

Mr. PUGSLEY: All products go free to the United States, but they do not come free into Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the bringing of bran and shorts into Canada free of duty is a matter of great consequence, it is a wonder that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) did not see that it was done when he was in power and could have had it done.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The arrangement of 1911 provided for it, as I understand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not understand that. I do know that it did not provide for flour coming in free.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, not free, but it provided for a very great reduction in duty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A great reduction? Ten cents a barrel.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And I understood that bran and shorts were free.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I never so understood it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think bran and shorts were free and flour was reduced.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not looked it up, but I do not think my hon. friend is correct. However, those are fragments hanging to the main issue, and I think it is better to touch the main issue before we touch the outskirts. For many years in the West, at all events for from five to seven years, there has been a very considerable agitation, growing in extent, in favour of the admission of these products to the free list. It ante-dates the proposal of the late Government in 1911, at which time the agitation assumed the greater scope I have just described. But it has prevailed up to the present time. It has had its source, at all events it has had its chief inspiration, in hon. gentlemen opposite and in the organs of public opinion which support their views and defend their political interests.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has been the chief source of the agitation, and, that being so, the chief source has been political and the object of the agitation in the main has been political. Notwithstanding that truth, that undoubted truth, a truth that was never in plainer evidence than it has been in recent months, and never in so plain evidence as it has been in this House since this debate commenced, never so clearly stated in writing as in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia in this debate—that truth now more manifest than it ever was, that this agitation has been in its source, in its inspiration, and in its progress mainly political, it does not follow that those who have joined in it, those who have adopted these views, expounded many times in an unfair and most one-sided way, are not sincere and honest in their convictions. For the most part they are. The result of the agitation was that there grew up in this country a conviction that there existed an element of injustice in the tariff as it stood, and that the people of eastern Canada being preponderant in numbers, did an injustice to the wishes of western Canada. Such a fact as that is of a character which all governments that see their duty from every angle are bound to take cognizance of. This Government was elected to office in 1911, chiefly because the party led by the present Prime Minister refused to accept the reciprocity agreement negotiated by the late Administration; because they opposed that reciprocity agreement as contrary to economic and national interests of Canada. That is why they were elected to office, and it was their duty to carry out the intent of the people in electing them upon that platform. Consequently, this Government opposed until recently, for reasons which I shall refer to very shortly, the removal of these duties upon flour, wheat and semolina, because they did not believe that the removal of those duties and the consequences that would ensue would on the whole be in the best national interests of Canada. I do not need to review the reasons that were adduced. I know that there were not as powerful objections to that course as applied in this way to wheat and flour alone as those that obtained against the reciprocity agreement itself. The arguments that could be urged against the reciprocity agreement were wider in their scope and stronger in their import than were the arguments that could be urged against the placing of wheat, flour and semolina on the free list. I do not think any hon. gentleman who wishes to be fair will dispute that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In a very humble way, I would dispute it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for St. John believes that all arguments apply equally to the one as to the other. Well, I can quote against the hon. member for St. John the opinion of a gentleman whose views expressed in this House will, at all events in our western country, carry very much more weight than those of the hon. member for St. John. I quote the opinion of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark, who, speaking in this House in the month of January, 1914, used these words—words that were true, honest and manly. They may be found on page 42 of the Hansard of that year:

> Many arguments that were used in regard to the reciprocity pact of two years ago do not apply to this matter at all.

Pretty straight language!

> This question is not now part of a large general agreement; it cannot be argued that it interferes with our fiscal independence. We simply have to take the tariff off wheat, which would be no sacrifice whatever, and we get entry into the United States market for our wheat.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The same with the articles under the arrangement of 1911.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say that that does not conflict with the view, which he just expressed, that the same arguments are applicable to both?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I say that the same reasons apply to both.

Mr. MEIGHEN: As against that, I quote the opinion of the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am speaking of my own view.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The words of the hon. member for Red Deer could not more directly or more forcibly contradict the manifestly erroneous expressions of opinion just given by the hon. member for St. John.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to correct my hon. friend. The hon. member for Red Deer does not, as I understand it, say that the argument against the articles being admitted free under the agreement of 1911 would be stronger than the argument to be made against the admission of free wheat. He says it could not be argued; that is, people might not argue in the same way——

Some hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He does not admit the correctness of the argument at all. That is very different.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You will understand, Mr. Speaker, why I said that the hon. gentleman's position was manifestly erroneous. It was so much so that he himself could not state it. "Many arguments that were used in regard to the reciprocity pact two years ago—not one, but many—do not apply to this matter at all."

Mr. PUGSLEY: The member for Red Deer does not say that they were sound arguments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He would not dignify them with the name of arguments unless he believed that they were such. This question is not now a part of a large general agreement. It cannot be argued that it interferes with our fiscal independence, and on that account the hon. gentleman urged upon the Government at that time to place wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list. What he said was absolutely correct. There is in this Act no general agreement, large or small. It is an independent act of ours which has regard to a previous independent act of others—no one of them arranged or agreed upon at all—it is an independent act on our part and of our own volition, and it stands there, subject only to the regulation and disposition of this Parliament or of the Government acting under the authority of this Parliament. In that truth—and it is a big truth—the big fundamental objection which applied to the reciprocity agreement fails to have any force at all when used with reference to the course that the Government has just pursued. I am not and never was of the opinion that to the extent that it was necessary to secure admission for our wheat, wheat flour and wheat products to the United States, the removal of the requisite duty would to any very disastrous extent be prejudicial to this country. I believed—and I still think that I was right in my belief—that the balance of argument was against that course; that from a national and economic standpoint—I emphasize economic in particular—the balance of the case was against the change. I recognized at the same time that in those three provinces there was growing a preponderance of opinion, ever more general and ever stronger, that to refuse it was an injustice to those provinces. Now, upon what did I base the opinion that the weight of argument was against the change? It was argued on the other side of this House, that, were such course taken, there prevailed in the United States higher prices for our wheat than we were obtaining in Canada and the great object of those who sought for this course was to secure admission to those markets in the alleged belief—and, on the part of the great majority, the sincere belief—that they would secure a higher price for their own products. I argued on the contrary—and others who opposed the movement argued also—that although it was true that at all events for the more important parts of the year, a higher figure by a margin, there did obtain in the Minneapolis market, than obtained in Canada, we would not get the benefit of that higher figure if the tariff were removed; that instead of the price to the Canadian producer rising, the price to the American producer would fall by the amount of duty or by such narrower amount as the American premium price stood over ours. It was argued also that, in so far as there was result at all from the action we took, we could not reasonably expect to get any better price for our product; that inasmuch as we had a market for our surplus—the very same market that the American people had for their surplus—across the Atlantic, and inasmuch as the export price prevailed in Canada, we would of necessity be losing part of the carriage of our wheat; that we would likely lose part of the milling of our wheat and that those disadvantages, limited but important as they were, had no corresponding benefit to be set off against them. That was the argument we advanced, and that argument, in my humble judgment, was good, and the principle at the back of it stands good to-day. Not only can I say that that argument was sincerely advanced, but I can say that the course of the market and the course of events in general since this step was taken, vindicate to the full the position we took and also the argument we advanced against the removal of the duty on wheat. Hon. gentlemen opposite argued times without number, out on the stump and in this House, and in the main they convinced the majority of the population of the three Western provinces, though I doubt if even yet the majority of the people of Canada agree with them on even this one point, and I am inclined to think it does not—they argued that he result would be an increase in the price to the Canadian producer varying anywhere from the limited figures advanced by the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. MacNutt), placed on Hansard in great detail a year ago aggregating, as I figured them out, exactly 2.82 cents a bushel, to the enormous and ludicrous figures advanced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) of anywhere from 17 to 27, to 50, to 60 cents a bushel. That was the argument they gave. They said: Open up to us the American market and immediately you will find a levelling of the prices; Canada will go up; the United States will either stand still or just reduce a very little; we will go up to their level; we will get the benefit of the increase in price, and that is what we want.

Before I proceed to discuss the conditions that prevailed in bringing about the removal of these duties now, let me follow up the events that have transpired and refer those events to the arguments of ourselves and of hon. gentlemen opposite and see which of us was correct, and ascertain whether they or we were proprounding to this Parliament sound and lasting arguments that stood the test of time? What are the facts? I have before me a record of market conditions before this step was taken and since. I read from the leading organ of Liberal opinion in western Canada—the Manitoba Free Press. I have no reason to think these figures are incorrect in any particular; certainly they will not be incorrect in our favour, but I believe they are correct. The Manitoba Free Press was in the habit, throughout many months gone by, of giving comparative prices on wheat. I started the Saturday, April 14, preceding the 16th day of April, the day the Order in Council was passed and I find the comparative figures as follows:

Winnipeg, wheat No. 1 Northern, $2.20; Minneapolis, wheat No. 1 Northern, $2.34⅛ to $2.37⅝, or a clear difference of 14⅛ cents per bushel in favour of Minneapolis.

Winnipeg, wheat, No. 2 Northern, $2.15⅛. Minneapolis, wheat, No. 2 Northern, $2.27⅛, or a clear difference of 12 cents a bushel in favour of Minneapolis. That was the condition. On No. 1 Northern the clear difference being 14⅛ cents a bushel, or 4⅛ cents a bushel over the duty that at that time obtained for admission into the United States, that difference of 4⅛ cents being attributable, of course, to speculative or other market conditions of a local character. On the following Monday, the day before the Order in Council took effect the quotations were as follows: No. 1 Northern, Winnipeg, $2.29⅛, Minneapolis, $2.44⅛ to $2.46¼, or a clear difference in favour of Minneapolis of 15⅛ cents a bushel, or 5⅛ cents per bushel beyond the amount of the duty that obtained between the two countries. No. 2 Northern, Winnipeg, $2.24⅝, Minneapolis, $2.38⅛ to $2.46¼, or a clear difference of 14 cents a bushel. Those are the prices that prevailed prior to the passing of the Order in Council which was passed on that Monday afternoon and was heralded to the world that afternoon. The buyers of both countries and of all continents knew that night and without doubt cogitated upon it over night prior to the opening of the market the next day. What was the result the following day? I read from the same journal, the leading organ of Liberal opinion in western Canada, taking the figures from the Free Press of April 18: No. 1 Northern, Winnipeg, $2.29½. That is just the price it was the day before. I understand it had dropped lower than that during the day, but it came back to $2.29½. These are the comparative prices the day after the Order in Council went into effect.

No. 1 Northern, Minneapolis, $2.34¼. What is the lesson? Winnipeg, $2.29½, and Minneapolis $2.34¼, the day after the Order in Council was passed; Winnipeg, $2.29½, Minneapolis, $2.44¼, the day before. That means that the Minneapolis price dropped by the amount of the duty the very day after we took it off, and there was no advance whatever in the Winnipeg price; the latter remained just where it was the day before. Could there be anything clearer than that? What has been the course of the market since? The margin of difference that existed prior to the Order in Council, over and above the duty, remained just as it was. I do not know enough about the wheat market to tell of the complicated conditions that may have brought that about; at all events, they existed before as now, and I presume they are speculative and local conditions. The price in Chicago at the same time is lower, but the margin of difference between Winnipeg and Minneapolis, Minneapolis over Winnipeg, that existed over and above the ten cents duty remained the same after the Order in Council was passed removing the duty, but the price at Minneapolis dropped the ten cents when we took the duty off, the Winnipeg price remaining the same. Where are the hon. gentlemen who in this House year after year assured us that as soon as we let down these iniquitous barriers the Winnipeg price would advance to the Minneapolis level to the benefit of the Canadian producer? If we follow the market after the 17th of April, we find that both markets advanced together with the same smaller spread between them that obtained the day after the Order in Council was passed. I do not know figures that can be more instructive that were ever advanced to this House, nor can I conceive of an event that more fully vindicates the argument advanced year in and year out by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and accepted by the Canadian people in the year 1911. The premium that obtained was swept away by the removal of the duty for the very simple reason that the conditions that supported the premium and that advanced the United States market above ours were removed when the duty was removed. What kept it up was swept away, and consequently there was a surplus over the whole area of production and the price went down to the export level. Now I am asked, if that is the case, what benefit do you hope to obtain, and what is the altered condition of affairs that justified you in removing the duties on the 16th day of April? It was not that we believed anything different would take place from what actually did take place in the quotations on wheat. We still maintain that it was clear to those who fairly and without prejudice studied the supports that kept each market where it was, that exactly that would happen which did happen. Is it not clear that grain of all grades would follow the same course as grain of grades No. 1 and 2, and indeed of No. 3 Northern? The farmers of this country had one market only for their wheat, and that was Liverpool; other destinations of our wheat were not worth considering. Our market was across the water at Liverpool, and as a consequence the price of wheat in this country was fixed by the Liverpool market, less the freight and less one cent a bushel which the grain dealer retains for his profit; I believe that is the rate obtaining with every dealer in grain. The secretary of the Winnipeg Exchange has advised me that the prices fixed for grain have been arrived at by that process, and by that only; and that has always been the case. From the Liverpool price is deducted the freight and expenses at the various terminals, and a cent a bushel for the dealer, and the balance is the price they give out each morning for western Canada. I refer to that fact because it has been argued by hon. gentlemen opposite that there has been a combine among our millers to keep the price down. I have never believed that a combine existed. If it did, if any reasonable progress had been made towards showing in this House that it did exist, it would have been the duty of this Government to investigate that combine and take steps to see that it did not continue, if it were shown to exist. But there was manifest to all of us this consideration: There existed in western Canada a tremendous grain concern, a product of the activity and enterprise of the farmers of those western provinces, known in the eastern part as the Grain Growers' Grain Company, and taking the form of other organizations in Alberta and Saskatchewan; but all of the same nature, all for the same purpose, and all doing the same work. Those three organizations bought the greater part of the grain of that country; I am not sure that they bought over half, but I do know that they purchased much more than any one, and I think more than any three other concerns put together, and they were increasing in their activities and in their business year after year. The business shown in their annual reports for the last two or three years would have brought the blush to almost any miller in this country, at the thought of its very, very large volume indeed. They were in a position to see that the full export value of his grain was obtained by every farmer, and so far as I have been able to investigate they did pay to each and every farmer the export value of his grain. I believe that the conditions that obtained in the South were local condition and local conditions only supported in the main by the tariff, and events have shown that those conditions were removed the day we removed the tariff. Therefore, it was clear that if any combine existed to keep the price of grain below its natural level, these organizations, the great purchasers of grain in eastern and western Canada, were in a position to break that combine of their own act and without the slightest injury to themselves. That was the great outstanding fact, the rock above the mist of all arguments, and no government could ignore it. That fact stood out and was never explained, and consequently there was no reason to believe that any such combine existed. Furthermore, it was stated in the frankest possible way in the annual statements of the larger of these three organizations, the Grain Growers' Grain Company, and I read it to the House only a year ago, that they were not able to make the profits on No. 2 and No. 3 Northern and lower grades of wheat that they were able to make on No. 1 Northern; they were not able to maintain their legitimate profit on the lower grades because the millers could make better use of that grain than they could, and the millers were outbuying them on No. 2 and No. 3 and lower grades, and consequently the company could not do the business in those grades that they wished. That was the very frank statement of that organization itself, and instead of pushing on its activities in our own country, instead of getting a wider grasp of the grain trade in the West, which they designed to achieve, we find them extending their enterprise into the republic to the south, and purchasing for export in that country, because they could make more money in that way than by buying for export in Canada; and they purchased larger quantities of American wheat than of Canadian wheat, showing that on certain grades at least of American wheat they were able to do better than on Canadian grain.

These are the facts that presented themselves, and which could not be without their import, and, to my mind, their very clear and manifest import.

Furthermore, it was manifest that that organization and its sister companies were financially competent, and in point of manning and personnel they undoubtedly were competent, to extend of their own accord their activities into the field closest to them, namely, the milling field itself. There was, so far as I know, nothing in the world to prevent them branching out into the milling industry, if there had been a combine in that industry to bring about enormous profits in milling. But instead of entering the field right adjacent to them, and protecting the farmer against such a combine and such enormous profits in milling, they were going into other countries and engaging in the grain business in the United States. It was clear, and must always be clear, that if they believed that the profits which have been complained of in this Parliament as existing in the milling industry to the detriment of the farmer actually did exist they themselves have remedied that condition by entering the field and compelling the miller to pay a legitimate price for the wheat. But instead of doing that, they come out frankly and say that the miller is able to pay a higher price than they can afford to pay if they are to make a profit. Is it any wonder that I stood in Parliament a year ago and criticised the statement of a director of the Grain Grower's Grain Company who has been very active in all political matters, in which he complained that the Government of this country had no right to maintain a duty which enriched a few grain dealers and millers to the detriment of the general public, when he himself was director in a company which could have forced every miller in Canada, if it had had the will and had believed that there was anything wrong to raise the price he was paying the farmer for his wheat, and his company could have done that without a dollar of injury to itself. That was one of the reasons—and I have a far stronger one to-day—I had for saying that the motive on the part of these men, who themselves were chiefly the authors of that agitation, was political and nothing but political.

The war has progressed for many, many months and the activities of German submarines and many other activities have had the result of diminishing to a very great degree the volume of British shipping.

One result of that is that it has been impossible for Great Britain to permit the free importation of goods on the same scale as before. They have been compelled to restrict their purchases to such classes of goods, and to such qualities of those classes, as would bring them the greatest returns in foodstuffs and necessities for the space engaged. As a consequence, they have not been able, notwithstanding the pressure of this Government, to purchase any wheat in this country except of the three higher grades—1, 2 and 3 Northern. The market that obtained for years for the lower grades was wiped away, for nobody else was able to purchase these grades—or, indeed wheat of any kind—for export, except the British Government. The British Commission purchasing in Canada—and no doubt this is true in the United States as well—is the only purchaser for export, for nobody else can get space in ships. In our western country there was a large proportion of the wheat that could not reach any of these higher grades, a larger proportion indeed, by reason of the conditions described by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), than usually has prevailed. There was no export price, because there was no export market. When the duty was taken off, on the 16th of April, the Minneapolis price on 1, 2, and 3 Northern fell at once to the export level, that—

Mr. McCRANEY: The Order in Council was passed on the 16th of April. When was this Government notified by the United States Government that the duty on wheat entering the United States had been taken off?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The duty on wheat entering the United States was actually taken off on the 17th of April, but we were notified of it only two days ago. I will come to that later. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCraney) need not think that any one could sanely argue that the effect of taking off the duty did not appear the very next day. Because there was no question as to the fact, it was known to everybody. It took some days to carry out the formalities to be gone through in the United States Treasury Department, but the duty was actually taken off as of April 17. In this connection, I may read—perhaps I should have read it before—the very interesting comment of the Manitoba Free Press on the market of April 17, the day after the duty was taken off:

> When the bell rang this morning there was a moment of silence, then a small voice offered to sell wheat at $2.29, at $2.28⅞, and at $2.28¾. No response was made and the voice shut up. For a period of about thirty seconds the crowd waited, holding their breath. When Minneapolis was put on the board six cents under the previous close there was a howl.

I wonder if the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) was there:

> Thus started one of the most upset markets in history. Winnipeg May was offered down from $2.28 to $2.25 without a trade. At that point the Government agent bought a little and the prices took a sudden swing back to $2.27½.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the Government also speculating on this exchange?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Better put that question to the British Government. We are not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I thought the British Government was advised in all these matters by the Canadian Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are purchasing of their own volition entirely, and I think they are quite capable of doing so. Does any one suggest that free wheat did not have this effect? Let us see what the Free Press says:

> The predominating factor, "free wheat," completely upset the spreads between the different months. There were no new spreads made in the morning and very little scalping trade. The market moved too quickly to permit of taking any liberties. The buying credited to the government agents was the only good buying.

If it had not been for the Government buying, where would the market have gone?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the hon. gentleman the latest quotations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Right down to date. But the margin of five, six, or seven cents in favour of the Minneapolis price has been maintained until now, notwithstanding that the duty is off. So, it is clear that the taking off of the duty depressed the Minneapolis market by the 10 cents duty and did not raise the Winnipeg market, but that under world market conditions which affect them both, they have advanced together since.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Both have advanced.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. gentleman think they would remain for ever stationary?

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the price to-day in Winnipeg?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is about five or six cents less than the Minneapolis price.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the figure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know. It is the relative price that counts. Does the hon. gentleman wish now to consider the absolute price? It was the relative prices that we heard of in this House for five years.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the average advance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no advance at all. The effect of free wheat was seen the very next day when the Minneapolis market went down.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) argue that the Government made a mistake in giving free wheat?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all, I am coming to that in a moment, but I was swerved from it by the very proper interruption of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney). On the frank statement of the Manitoba Free Press, free wheat was the cause of the market phenomena of the 17th of April.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: On the higher grades.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the higher grades. I am asked why the Minneapolis market on the lower grades did not fall to the export level. Because there was no export level to fall to; there was no export market and no export buying; consequently, there was no market for this surplus wheat except in the United States. And what did we find? We found that wheat of that quality was passing over the tariff wall of ten cents a bushel in very large quantities, and, I believe, at considerable profit, as stated by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The increase in the quantities of these grades of wheat sent to the United States runs from one hundred to one thousand per cent over the quantities of a year ago. The farmers had to sell their surplus wheat there; there was no place else to sell it. There was a market in Canada, it is true, but the market in Canada without the export market was not sufficient to do justice to the producer. As a consequence it became necessary, if justice was to be done to the producer, to see that other markets were open if possible.

Now I have treated this subject from the point of view of wheat alone. I have never been one of those who contended that markets of any kind were not an advantage to a country. The business of the Government is to get for our people all the markets we possibly can, far markets and near markets, and, other things being equal, the nearer the markets the better. That is only common sense. But I will tell you what is still more common sense and still more vital. The market that is important is not the market for the raw product that comes out of the ground; it is the market for the finished product that is worth twice or ten times as much. Surely that is an economic truth that took root in the hon. member for Assiniboia's mind at least forty years ago. It is important to get markets, it is true, but it is far more important to get markets for a valuable article that you make valuable by labour than to get a market for an article in the state it is first produced. How does that apply? Had there been only the question of free wheat, in my judgment, in the way of price there was nothing much to be gained by the removal of the American duty. Still, there would be little if any loss. On the question of flour, an important question affecting an important product of Canada, conditions obtained a few years ago, and obtained a year ago, that do not obtain to-day. There was very much in the contention of the millers, not so much those big millers who have always been quoted by the hon. member for Edmonton, the hon. member for Saskatoon and the hon. member for Dauphin, not so much those large flour producers, the Lake of the Woods Milling Company, the Ogilvy Milling Company, the Maple Leaf Milling Company and those other men, as the 303 other small millers in Ontario and as the 540 other small millers in this Dominion of Canada, that it would be unfair to them, who were producers of a manufactured article, and who had to make very large investments for machinery and to import many other articles in order to conduct their industry, that there should be no protection whatsoever for their flour so long as they paid a protective duty on what they imported. Am I presenting something on their behalf that has no foundation? Am I arguing something that is not sound? No, hon. gentlemen opposite themselves retained this duty of 50 cents under their reciprocity pact. That anyway is what they advanced. I have always felt that there was something in it. I was not very much concerned with the big producers. By reason of the enormous quantity of their output they are able to produce more cheaply than their competitors who operate on a smaller scale, but it was argued that it would be doing a great injustice to these 540 small milling companies, who are competing with the larger millers and serving the country too in a real sense with the production of flour. I know of one milling company in this country which, in a single year, paid into the treasury of Canada $200,000 in duty on articles used by that company. Other smaller companies pay less, and they argued, and argued with great force, that while it would be well to make a concession to public opinion in western Canada, it would not be right that they should be compelled to pay these duties and get no protection whatsoever or get no advantage in the market which they were paying to keep up. That argument had great force. But what are the conditions now in that regard? At the present time the price of wheat has so advanced and the price of flour has so advanced that while the important part of their industry has always been the milling portion of it, it now seems to be comparatively small compared with the business of dealing in wheat. The fifty cents a barrel that they have had by way of protection on flour became a comparatively insignificant consideration. With flour running up to $11, $12 and $13 a barrel, what is fifty cents a barrel—less than five per cent, and relatively of trifling importance in the milling trade. Consequently by removing that small amount of protection for them in the presence of conditions that have far more to do with their success or failure than the small amount of duty, we were not paying the same price by any means for the removal of the duty on wheat against us to the United States that we would have paid in years gone by. Having regard for the fact that there was a manifest necessity in regard to the lower grades of wheat, if there was to be a fair market under the conditions obtaining now in the transportation world, in the presence of the fact that the only people buying will not buy that article at all for export, and having regard also to the fact that the price we are paying in the way of a removal of the flour duty amounts to a trifling sum, means very little indeed to the miller and is indeed small in magnitude compared with what it was a year, or three years ago, there exist very substantial reasons why this should be done now as compared with the reasons why it should have been done two years or even one year ago.

Speaking of flour, it is interesting to remember some of the arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite on that subject. I remember that I heard the hon. member for Edmonton in particular only a year ago taking the ground with thunderous emphasis that by taking this course we were going to split up the combine in this country and reduce the price of flour to the consumer. I remember the hon. member for Assiniboia telling us that just as soon as we took the duty of fifty cents a barrel off flour the poor fellow getting $1 or $2 a day would be able to get his flour fifty cents cheaper. Well, we took the duty off flour on the 16th April of this year. Has he got it any cheaper? No, wheat did not rise next day, but flour rose next day, rose fifty cents a barrel and it has been rising ever since. True the rise at that time no one would attribute to the removal of the duty. It had nothing whatever to do with it. No one would argue that the removal of the duty had increased the price of flour. At all events, the fact is that it did not go down and the fact is that it did increase. The removal of the duty had no effect whatever in reducing the price of flour in this country contrary to the arguments advanced in this House for years by hon. gentlemen opposite. So much for that.

There is the further fact to which some importance may be attributed recited in the Order in Council that it is well under conditions obtaining now when the United States are our allies, and when the surplus foodstuffs of both countries are pooled together, that there should be a freer movement between them. There is some force in that and for this reason: transportation conditions are now so abnormal and methods of transport for our crop are so limited that we have to have every facility to reach them and to reach them with just as little interference as we can have. If there is going to be a boat at a certain time sailing out of New York, or any other port, we want to be able to get the grain there even though it is milled in transport or milled and mixed at Minneapolis in order that we may be able to get it on the way to the ports quickly because of the necessity for food that exists in the British Isles and in allied countries. There is much in the further statement which I purpose to make now. This is something to which I must attach more importance perhaps than is usually attached to it. I believe it is of importance in this country that there should be no section of the people who are allowed to live under conditions that they believe are unjust. I believe that any discontent that exists in any part of this country, particularly if that discontent is geographically centred, should if possible be removed even though we pay a price to remove it. I am not in a position to say—others are just as good judges as I—that were a vote to be taken to-day in the whole of Canada the opinion of the majority numerically would be in favour of the course we took, I cannot say that the majority would not have preferred that we had not taken that course, except out of regard for the wisdom of making a concession to the West. But if you have regard to that fact, it is wise, particularly at this time, as was cited in the Order of Council, to remove all possible cause of discontent on this subject. I believe the majority in this country, East as well as West, are prepared to make a concession in order that there may be no such feeling of injustice. Whatever may be the majority numerically one way or the other, it is undoubted to my mind that the strength of the sentiment in those western provinces in favour of free wheat is deeper than the sentiment against it here. The sentiment in favour was more pronounced, than with regard to this one act and one step, would have been the sentiment in eastern Canada against it. And eastern Canada is big enough and always has been to meet in some measure a predominating feeling of their western fellow citizens.

I have cited the four considerations of consequence. I have recited the reasons which prevailed when we took this course which did not prevail before. I have no apologies to make. I have endeavoured to make capital out of no ir-

5 p.m. relevant fact. I believe the course we took is just, I believe our former course was just, and the course we shall take in the future we will endeavour to make equally just.

I wish now to say a few words on this specific amendment. It is a most remarkable amendment. It is based, if I understand it, on two claims. One of them was advanced by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean); both of them, as indeed all claims are always advanced, by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) who leaves nothing out. The claim advanced by the hon. member for Halifax was that our Order in Council was illegal, that it transcended our powers under the War Measures Act, and secondly—I believe the hon. member for Halifax referred to this as well—that though it may have been within our legal powers it would die automatically when the war was ended; and they were very anxious to legislate not only for the present but for the far or near distant future when the war shall be over. I do not think that the hon. member for Halifax, now that he has had two or three nights to think it over, would dare to repeat in this House any doubt—expressing it as a lawyer and not as a politician—that that Order in Council was within the powers conferred on the Government by the War Measures Act. The Deputy Minister of Justice who was in office throughout the entire regime of hon. gentlemen opposite and whose opinion has been, in Canada at all events, unexcelled on subjects such as this, and whose opinion, let me say furthermore, we as the Government are bound to accept, (provided it is not in conflict with that of the Minister of Justice), thought that the Order in Council was sufficient. And apparently the opinion of the law officers of the United States agrees with that of the Deputy Minister of Justice, because they have promptly accepted the Order in Council as a legal removal of those duties and have acted upon it. In this connection I shall read a letter addressed to the Minister of Finance by the Consul General of the United States, dated the 24th instant, three days ago:

Dear Sir Thomas:

I am to-day in receipt of a telegram from the Department of State which acknowledges my telegram of April 16, relative to free wheat, wheat flour and semolina, and informs me that the Customs Division of the Treasury Department states that "wheat, wheat flour and semolina entered and in bonded warehouses on and after April 17, are free of duty."

That is the result of what has been done, and that was the result that was in view. The officials of other countries beside Canada have acted on similar legislation. But the language of our Act is so clear and forcible that there is no room for doubt as to the power of the Government to take the course it did. The result, anyway, has been achieved, and argument on that point becomes academic in view of the result.

Now, as to the alleged point that this Order in Council will die at the termination of the war and that consequently it would be wise now to legislate as to what should be done afterwards, I say, first, that if ever an amendment bore on its face the earmarks of political chicanery it is this amendment. It is an attempt to raise a doubt in the minds of western Canadians; it is an attempt to raise a doubt in the minds of the officials of the United States of America—although it has failed in that object—as to whether or not this Act is not of some peculiar temporary character on which we should not rely. Nobody ever thought of such a doubt before. I never heard it even whispered. The War Measures Act gives to the Government of Canada power to enact Orders and regulations having regard to a number of subjects recited in the Act, and one, if not more than one, of those classes of subjects clearly embraces the action we took. That legislation having been passed, the Government was then in a position to do what otherwise only Parliament could do, enact and enforce orders, regulations and laws binding upon the people of this country. We so enact, and what we do is to enact a law just as if it had been done by this Parliament. It is done by the Government under the authority of this Parliament, which means that it is done by this Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Just as if it were in the Act itself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad that I have convinced a legal member of the Opposition.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It does not need any convincing; it is absolutely clear on its face.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Consequently it takes effect just as if we legislated in Parliament that these duties were removed and it has just the same effect as if this Parliament, by specific enactment, had removed the duty. It is argued by the hon. member for Halifax that at the end of the war the Order in Council lapses and that consequently the duties that were removed under the Order in Council must be restored, or, rather, would be automatically restored. I hardly know how to put the absurdity of that position in clearer form than I put it to the hon. member while he was speaking, that once we legislate by Order in Council under an Act that gives us power to legislate, that is legislation, and it has the same effect, the same permanence and the same finality that any other legislation has. All legislation may be amended, may be repealed. This, like all other legislation, may be amended or repealed. It has the same permanence and the same finality as any legislation passed by this House. What is done by Order in Council while the War Measures Act is alive is legislation and remains legislation just the same as any legislation passed by this House.

If it were different, what would be the result? Under the War Measures Act—to take the example that I took before—we by Order in Council appropriated to this country the title to the Ross rifle factory in Quebec. We have enacted other Acts of a similar character. If the legislation lapses with this Parliament and the effect of what we do must be reversed, what will be the result in the case I have mentioned? In March of this year we declared that the title of Sir Charles Ross to that factory ceased to be his and became ours. If the hon. member for Halifax is correct, when the war is over that title ceases to be ours and goes back to Sir Charles Ross, although we have paid for it, although he has the money, although he may be dead or may have spent the money. This is utterly absurd and clearly shows that there cannot be the faintest reason or ground for the contention that the hon. gentleman advances.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not read the War Measures Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I helped frame the statute; perhaps that is sufficient for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not believe the hon. gentleman drafted it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I had to do with framing it, and that would likely give me some information concerning it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman must have forgotten its terms, since he argues as he does about the Ross rifle factory.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The draftsman is usually a poor interpreter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Under the Order in Council based upon the War Measures Act, on April 16 we removed the duties on wheat, wheat flour and semolina. Does the hon. gentleman argue that these duties, which have been wiped away, come back again when the war is over any more than the title of Sir Charles Ross in the Ross rifle factory goes back to him when the war is over? What is the difference? The hon. member for St. John would, I know, very much like to expatiate on this question; let him tell me now what the difference is.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will endeavour to answer the hon. gentleman when—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman will not answer now, when he may be caught on the very point. He will not stand on his feet and attempt to draw a distinction, because there is no distinction. If when the war is over the duties again apply to wheat, wheat flour and semolina, the title of Sir Charles Ross also reverts to him.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the hon. gentleman serious in that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Much more serious than the hon. member for St. John. If he were serious, he would get up and state the difference.

An hon. MEMBER: He does not look very serious.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not like to look as serious as hon. gentlemen opposite have looked this afternoon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is about as serious as he was when he made those famous charges in the House of Commons about a year ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Was that the charge which showed a waste of $80,000,000 on shells?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The charges that were investigated and declared false by the Meredith-Duff Commission, yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Oh, no, you refused an investigation on that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be rather unfortunate for Canada if my hon. friend's argument were correct. I will tell you something else that would go back, besides the title of the Ross rifle factory; the title to about 23 acres of land which hon. gentlemen opposite, without the slightest reason or justification, conferred as a free gift upon a political friend or favourite of some kind, without any remuneration to the people of Canada. The title to this land, which hon. gentlemen opposite filched or took from the people and presented to Sir Charles Ross, would revert back to him if their argument on this question were correct.

Here is an amendment to a motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means. It calls upon us to pass a vote of adulation on hon. gentlemen opposite, to pass a reflection on this House and on the law officers of the Crown, and to do so for no purpose in the world except that of meeting the political exigencies of hon. gentlemen opposite. What they are sorry for is that this grievance in which they have revelled for so many years is now removed. They want to keep alive the agitation which has been their chief hope in western Canada. They are anxious to stir up and keep white the embers of a controversy without which there is not very much light for them on the horizon. Now that that controversy is removed and removed with such permanence as it is within the power of this Parliament to effect they are not satisfied; they want to do something which will retain to them some of the advantages they hoped to gain by that agitation all through these years. That is the purpose of this amendment. The Deputy Minister of Justice says that the legislation has the same permanence as any legislation ever passed by this Parliament. We must be governed in matters of law by the opinion of the law officers of this Government; otherwise we are untrue to our trust. The amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia, boiled down, is nothing more or less than this: "Whereas I, John G. Turriff and somebody else whose name I will not give, should be accepted on matters of law by the Parliament of Canada in preference to the responsible law officers of the Crown; therefore be it resolved that we do over again something that is already done, with all the finality and permanence that is in the power of Parliament to do it." That is the amendment which the hon. member for Assiniboia solemnly asks us to pass.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Would it not be possible for this Government to repeal that Order in Council by another Order in Council? And, if that is so, how can the hon. gentleman say that the Order in Council has the same weight and permanency as though it were an Act of Parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly it is in our power to repeal it, and if we pass this resolution and bring in a statute we could also repeal the statute. They are both on the same ground exactly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The authority under which we may remove duties as a war measure is the very same authority under which we may impose duties as a war measure. Both are exactly on the same basis; consequently, if we pass the amendment and introduce the legislation that it calls for, that legislation would be temporary in the same sense that this is temporary and it would be permanent in the same sense that this is permanent.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That is, if your majority did not change its mind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Exactly so; the hon. member for Red Deer has the point exactly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But you could not do it behind the backs of the representatives of the people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, the power would undoubtedly exist. I have to thank the House for the patience with which my altogether too much prolonged discourse has been received. I refer again to the matter of greatest moment in this Budget. The motion of my hon. friend is not the matter of greatest moment; it was my duty to refer to it fully and at length because I, in part, represent western Canada in the Administration. But the outstanding feature is the successful commercial course that this country has pursued, the strong position that it occupies, the course that we have taken in bringing business to Canada and in retaining business here by our policies. And in the bringing of some of that business to Canada no one deserves more credit than the ex-Minister of Militia himself. The outstanding feature is that by the business we are doing, the goods we are producing, we are able to sustain our country through this struggle and can sustain it to the end. That is the gratifying element of this Budget. It is important that no one should allow any mere secondary feature or any amendment, whatever be its design, to draw our attention from this great achievement, and it is important that the people of Canada, reviewing the statement for the year, take from it that renewed inspiration, courage and confidence which the awful tasks confronting us require, and which an enlightened study of our deeds already done can scarcely fail to command.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: By the courtesy of the hon. member for St. John I have been given a minute and a half to draw the attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) to a statement he made with regard to myself, based upon a figure, as far as I could follow him. It is not of any very great importance, and I am sure that my hon. friend will be just as glad to have it cleared up as I myself shall be. He said that I was a little wrong in my figures after he had made a statement, if I understood him, that in some recent year Britain exported £1,500,000,000 worth of goods.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said was that the total trade was £1,553,000,000. I understood the hon. gentleman to say it was £2,000,000,000.

Mr. CLARK: My speech as reported in Hansard will show that I was speaking purely of exports at the time, and I spoke of $2,000,000,000 as the exports of Britain in one year, not the total trade.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is $3,000,000,000. The hon. gentleman is well within the mark.

Mr. CLARK: I understood my hon. friend to say that the total export trade was £1,500,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. CLARK: I am not at all sure that my hon. friend did not make a mistake, because I took the precaution of going to the Hansard office, and if the hint is worth anything to my hon. friend, I would like him to look up the report of his speech before the unrevised Hansard appears. If I made a mistake, it was one that tended to weaken my argument because I was showing at the time what Britain was able to do in time of peace, being my argument upon the assertion that she had actually exported in round figures $2,000,000,000 worth of goods in one year. It appears that I was a little below the mark, and to the extent that I was below the mark, I weakened my own argument. That is a form in which I should always like to err.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is quite correct, if the hon. gentleman said that. I understood him to say that the total trade was £2,000,000,000. The figures for Great Britain for 1916 are: Total trade £1,553,307,393, of which £604,154,714 are exports and £949,152,679 are imports, a balance of trade against Great Britain of £344,997,965.

Mr. CLARK: In no case could a quotation from last year have been any correction of what I stated, because my figures were quoted from some recent year in time of peace.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The export trade would be about $2,000,000,000 in time of peace.

Mr. CLARK: A little over.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure as to whether my sympathies ought to be extended more to the gentlemen who are sitting behind the Government benches than to my hon. friend the Solicitor General during the course of his speech this afternoon. It is evident that the hon. gentleman's efforts were directed entirely to justifying the conduct of the Government in the eyes of their supporters. There could be no other reason for his long speech, first in condemnation, and, secondly, in justification of this Order in Council. The hon. gentleman devoted a good deal of his time to showing that the Government had been right in resisting the demands of the Liberal party and of the people of the West that wheat and wheat products should be placed upon the free list. He gave very strong reasons, and I think anyone reading that portion of his speech in Hansard would come to the conclusion that there would be a very great danger to-morrow, or within a week, or within a month, if the hon. gentleman had his way in the Cabinet of having this Order in Council repealed, because, as I have said, the hon. gentleman has told us that he has not changed his mind, and that he believes the refusal of the Government in the past to place wheat and wheat products upon the free list was entirely in the best interest of the country and in accordance with the great principles of the national policy. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman was obliged, of course, to give some reasons why the Government had acted. The extraordinary thing which the hon. gentleman has done is that at last he seems to have been driven by the peculiar workings of his own mind to justify this Order in Council on the ground that it has given to the small millers in Canada a market for their flour in the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, because, as I understood him to say, it gives them the opportunity to dispose of their finished product. The hon. gentleman says that it is much more important for the people to have a market for their finished product than for their raw material, and that on that ground the Order in Council may be supported.

I intend to deal with the points which my hon. friend has made with regard to this Order in Council, to refer to the amendment, and to show that instead of being the very horrible thing that my hon. friend thinks it is, it is an amendment which ought to commend itself to all the members of this House. Before doing this, however, I should like to refer very briefly to the remarks which my hon. friend made with reference to the state of the trade of the country. That was the subject of my hon. friend's remarks in the earlier part of his discourse, and after the lugubrious performance which he had given us with respect to free wheat, he returned to this cheerful trade condition in order, I suppose, to bring his supporters out of the slough of despond into which he had driven them by his reference to the free wheat policy. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the trade of Canada—and in this respect he followed the Minister of Finance—had reached, during the past fiscal year, the enormous sum of upwards of $2,000,000,000. He spoke of this, as did the Minister of Finance, as being a most cheering condition of affairs. Think of it, said my hon. friend, that in a very few years the export and import trade of Canada had risen from $600,000,000 to upwards of $2,000,000,000. I almost wondered why my hon. friend did not come down with a resolution thanking the Kaiser for the magnificent prosperity which he had brought to Canada, because it is the Kaiser who is responsible for it all; it is not the Minister of Finance nor the Solicitor General; it is not the Government of this country; it is not the ordinary business development or the ordinary prosperity of the people of Canada; it is by reason of the bringing about of this bloody war by the Kaiser and his Government. Surely, when we are considering as to whether Canada is in a prosperous condition or not, we ought to have regard to the normal condition of affairs; we ought to consider whether the manufactures of Canada are developing in such a way as to bring permanent prosperity to the people of this country; we ought to consider whether the country is being developed by new settlers who are coming in and cultivating our vacant land. If that were the condition of affairs, we might rejoice at it. But instead of rejoicing at the fact that this condition of affairs exists to-day, the people of Canada ought to have a feeling of sadness because it is owing to these terrible war conditions that we have this vast trade, and as I said not long ago in this House, the export and import trade of which these hon. gentlemen boast is a trade that is washed with the blood of the young men of this country who have gone to the front and have risked their lives on the battlefields of France and Belgium. This condition of affairs is nothing to be proud of; it is nothing to rejoice at; it is something which we ought to deplore.

Surely, in order to give to this House any fair estimate of what has really been the increase in our exports and imports, we ought to know in tonnage what that increase has been. Giving it to us in dollars and cents gives us no idea of what the increase has been. For instance, as has already been stated in this House, the export of 50,000,000 bushels of wheat does not mean to-day what it meant a few years ago when wheat was worth 70 cents a bushel, that 50,000,000 would be worth only $35,000,000, but to-day it would be worth $100,000,000. That does not mean a larger employment of labour; it has added nothing to the transportation business of this country; but by reason of the inflated prices, it has counted in the exports which give to my hon. friends on the other side so much comfort, and of which they boast so loudly. And so with all the other exports, and so with the imports, which have greatly increased in price. Surely hon. gentlemen opposite should give this House a statement as to what portion of these exports is represented by rifles, by powder, by shot, by shells, by boots and shoes, by clothing and other supplies which have gone to our soldiers at the front, all of which, so far as the export business of the country is concerned, should be treated as if they were not exports at all, because they are articles that are going to the boys at the front who are fighting the battles of Canada, and are not sold to any foreign country; they are paid for out of the treasury of Canada by our own people, and yet these goods have been added to the exports with a view to inducing the people of this country to believe that we have a vast export trade.

It has been stated in this House this afternoon that the Munitions Board have actually given orders in Canada, on behalf of the British Government, to the extent of $850,000,000 for munitions of war. Now, although the product of these munition factories all goes to the front, and part of it will be paid for by the people of this country when the accounts between this country and the British Government are adjusted, yet we find this whole amount added, as if it represented part of the legitimate exports of this country and ought to be taken into account when determining our prosperity; and so with regard to imports. Surely hon. gentlemen should have told us what quantity of the raw material that has been brought into Canada from other countries was to be used in the manufacture of shells, powder, clothing, boots and shoes and other supplies for our troops at the front. There has been an increase of millions and millions of dollars in our imports of anthracite coal to supply the factories in this country that are making supplies for the front, and the same remark would apply to bituminous coal. I do not know what the figures are, but surely they should have been given, and deducted from our total imports, so that we might know what was the real and permanent prosperity of the country. I do not intend to deal at any length with the financial situation of this country, as I want to be as brief as possible and this phase will no doubt be dealt with by other hon. gentlemen in the course of this debate. But I desire to say that an examination of the cost of running the different departments of the Government, the cost of running the Public Works Department, for instance, where the expenditure rose in three years under this Government to double what is was during the last three years of the previous Administration, and an examination of the vast increase of expenditure in the Department of Railways, and I venture to say of all the departments of the Government, will convince this House and the people of this country that ever since this Government came into office, and more particularly during the first three years of their administration, they carried on the affairs of Canada with a reckless disregard of the resources of the country and the ability of our people to carry the large burdens they were placing upon them. If this Government had exercised reasonable economy, when the war broke out there would have been from $50,000,000 to $70,000,000 of a surplus available, which could have been devoted towards the cost of our share in the war.

I wish to say a few words on the question of free wheat. I shall speak on this question not as a stranger to the West, or as one who is only interested in the West by being a citizen of Canada, because while I am a resident of the province of New Brunswick and represent one of its constituencies, I have for the last thirty-six years been closely identified with a very important section of our northwestern country. It happened that away back in the fall of 1881 I went to Manitoba, and from there on to Saskatchewan, and from that day to this there has never been a time when I have not been financially interested, and for one of my means very deeply interested in that country, and I am as interested in its prosperity probably as much as any member of this House who does not come from one of our western provinces. I have followed the course of events there pretty carefully, and have seen great areas develop; I have seen the discouragements of the West, and its sources of encouragement and of hope. I have seen it pass through dark days. I can remember when farmers were willing to sell their wheat in the market of Regina for forty-three cents a bushel, and when people talk of the high prices farmers are receiving to-day, they ought to remember the hard years through which these men have gone, and should not begrudge them a fair and reasonable return for their labour in the cultivation of their farms. I am one of those who recognize that upon the development and prosperity of the West depends in a large measure the prosperity and development of the whole of Canada. The West is a country of glorious possibilities, a country of tremendous resources, with vast areas of fertile land the like of which I do not believe can be found anywhere else in the world. There are vast opportunities for development, and if the West only has a fair chance it is going to increase in population and increase enormously in prosperity, and in the years which are to come it will be the pride and the very backbone of this country. It has been a consideration of those conditions that has induced me ever since I have been in this Parliament to support anything which might give to our western provinces free access to the market of the United States, not only for their wheat and wheat products, but also for their oats, flax and whatever else the farmers of the West are capable of producing. It has always seemed to me that it would be very easy indeed, with an increase in population, and with cheaper farm machinery for the West, to glut the markets of Canada and of Great Britain, and for that reason it is of vital importance that we should have a market for our farm products in the great Republic to the south of us. There is a law of supply and demand which governs as to farm products as well as with all other products.

Free access to a large consuming population means a large market, which is of advantage to the farmer even though it may not to any great extent increase the price of what he has to sell. As I said the other day, the farmer cultivating, let us say, 160 acres of land, sells his products at certain prices and has a certain aggregate return. But the farmer, like every other producer, has his overhead charges, and as his total product is increased the overhead charges grow proportionately less. If this same farmer can cultivate twice as much land, or three times or four times as much, and can sell all his products, he will make more money than by selling the product of the smaller acreage. But, if there are not large markets to which the farmer may have free access, there is no encouragement to him to increase production, for if he and his neighbours follow that course they may easily glut the market and cause prices to fall, thereby wiping out their profits. While the United States is a great agricultural country, it is a great consuming country as well. Near the Canadian border there are great cities, such as St. Paul, Minneapolis, Chicago, Milwaukee, Cleveland, New York, Baltimore, Boston and others, containing a vast consuming population to which, under free conditions, the farmers of Canada might look for a market for their products. In the great state of New York alone there is a population of about ten millions, or two millions more than the population of Canada, and I am told that of that population only 375,000 may be properly described as rural. If this be true, you have a consuming population of over 9,600,000. And this is but an instance of the markets which the farmers of Canada could find in the United States.

It is true that the Liberal party for years past has joined hands with the farmers of the West in urging that wheat and wheat products should be placed on the free list. I have no apology to make for that; I am proud to have been associated with the gentlemen who, in the best interests of the people of the West and of the whole Dominion, sought to bring about this reform. On the same grounds I heartily supported the reciprocity arrangement of 1911. It is to be borne in mind that the most important product of this country, free access for which to the United States market would have been secured under that reciprocity agreement, was wheat. A number of other articles would have been afforded easier access to that market—lumber, hay, potatoes, cheese, and many others—but wheat stood at the very top of the list. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) tells us that this granting of free wheat is a very different proposition from the reciprocity arrangement. It is different only in degree. Suppose that there was no statute of the United States permitting the free entry of wheat into that country on our making it free in this country, and suppose that the Minister of Finance, impressed by the reasons that induced this Government to pass the Order in Council in favour of free wheat, had gone to Washington to secure for Canada that benefit; discussing the matter with the Secretary of State of the United States he would say: we do not wish to arrange for the free admission of a large number of articles, but we would like to make an arrangement for free wheat, wheat flour, and semolina, but it must be understood that each country is to be absolutely free to repeal this legislation whenever it thinks it in the interest of its own people. Had this been done, in what respect would it have been different from that which has been done to-day? When these gentlemen were confronted with this problem did they draw up an Order in Council having no regard to what the United States had done? Not at all. They consulted the statutes of the United States and adopted the very wording of their statute on this subject. They did not even use words broad enough to confer upon the eastern farmer the boon of free bran and shorts from the United States with which to feed his cattle. They did not use the words they might have used, "wheat and wheat products," but they used the words "wheat, wheat flour, and semolina," the very words used in the statute of the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) interrupted me to say that the reciprocity agreement made these products free, but I find that it provided a duty of $2.45 a ton on bran. Will the hon. gentleman explain why the Government of which he was a member did not give the farmers at that time the "boon" of which he speaks?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman may be correct as to its not being free, but at all events the arrangement made a great reduction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No reduction, I think—it was 12½ cents per hundred pounds.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will be glad to have that looked into. It will probably be found that the duty on bran in Canada was equal to that in the United States—it was equalized.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But why was not the "boon" of free bran given?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps it could not be got at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But there was nothing to prevent the Government taking the duty off bran coming into Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: To-day my hon. friend has found that the United States has allowed free into that country wheat and all wheat products, because Canada has allowed free entry of wheat, wheat and semolina. Why were these words, "wheat, wheat flour, and semolina," used unless this Government was guided by the statutes of the United States? I doubt very much if the Solicitor General knew what semolina was until he found the name in the United States statute. I frankly confess that I did not.

There is another question I would like to ask: Why did not this Government wait until Parliament opened before it passed this Order in Council? Here is the inauguration of a policy of enormous importance affecting the trade between these two countries. It applies to the most important product of Canada. It is the chief natural product of the two countries and here it is proposed to take advantage of the reciprocal provision—you cannot call it anything else—in the statutes of the United States under which this great product will pass freely between the two countries. This Government, and the party which stands behind it, had, in 1911, told the people of Canada that our great railway systems had been built east and west for the purpose of carrying trade east and west instead of north and south. They had taken the ground that it would bring down the very keystone of the National Policy if this should be adopted. They had taken that ground when, in 1911 it was proposed to make an arrangement with the United States, not an arrangement binding either country for all time but an arrangement which, just like this statutory arrangement could have been repealed at the will of the Parliament or Congress at any time, as clearly appears from the correspondence which took place between the Hon. Mr. Fielding and Secretary Knox. Now, they are proposing to reverse the policy for which they had asked the approval of the people of Canada. Did they wait until the representatives of the people had gathered in this Parliament from the Western shores of Canada, from the East, from the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec and from other sections of Canada? Did they await to consult Parliament's opinion? Did they even wait to consult their own supporters? No, Sir, instead of doing that they gave them no opportunity of presenting their views, and the views of the people who sent them to this Parliament, but on the 16th April, three days before Parliament re-assembled, behind the backs of the people's representatives, they passed this Order in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is my hon. friend aware that the hon. member for Assiniboia, a year ago, complained that we had not done this very thing by Order in Council?

Mr. GRAHAM: When Parliament was not in session.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We were demanding that this should be done in the interest of the people, of the country and gentlemen on the other side of the House were saying that it was utterly indefensible to do it, that it was contrary to the policy which the people had sustained in 1911, that it would be contrary to the pledge they had made to the people of Canada upon which they secured their support and upon which they relied to get into this Parliament as their representatives that they should do anything of the kind. Why did they not consult their friends? It was because they knew that they would not be likely to support them in caucus. But they know also that when they get a measure passed in Council so that they are committed to it they can rely upon their friends not going back upon them and sustaining them even though it is with many heartburnings. The Government perhaps felt a greater degree of confidence in getting support after the order was passed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. gentleman consult caucus in 1911 on the reciprocity pact?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In 1911?—yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, and it was submitted to, and had to meet with the approval of Parliament before becoming law. By the terms of the letters which passed between the two negotiators it was expressly stated that it should be submitted both to the Parliament of this country and to the Congress of the United States before it should go into effect. Our Government would not have so defied public opinion as to enter into an arrangement of that kind except it was subject to the approval of Parliament.

Was there any great urgency? Can you think of any urgency that there was? It was the 16th of April. The wheat had practically all passed out of the lands of the farmers in the West. We know that in the West the farmer threshes his grain in November. He gets it to the elevator and markets it just as speedily as he can. There are very few farmers, I venture to say—my hon. friends from the West will correct me if I am wrong—who hold any large quantity of grain in their hands after the first of February, or the first of March, subsequent to the year in which it is harvested. All the elevators are filled with grain. It is largely in the hands of the speculator. Can any one suggest any great object in passing that Order in Council on the 16th of April when Parliament was reassembling on the 19th of April and when their supporters in Parliament should have been consulted before taking that step?

An hon. MEMBER: And the Budget speech had not been delivered.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Budget speech had not been delivered. I venture to say that the people will want to know the reason for this hurried action. I would not charge that it was intended to put money into the hands of these sepeculators for the reason that it would raise the price of wheat and would make a product which they had bought from the farmers at from 75 cents to $1.25 a bushel very largely worth from $2.25 to $2.40 a bushel. I would not suggest anything of the kind. What, then, was the reason for it? Why not wait until Parliament and the people's representatives could be taken into the confidence of hon. gentlemen? Parliament is the great council room of the nation. It is the place where the people, through their representatives, ought to be informed as to these questions and consulted in regard to actions of this nature which the Government propose to take. But, no Sir, they passed it through without first consulting their own supporters.

Now, my hon. friend the Solicitor General makes the statement that the Deputy Minister of Justice says that this Order in Council has the effect of legislation. I am glad that my hon. friend and I are in accord as to the effect of the Order in Council. The Order in Council has exactly the same force and effect as if it had been made part of the statute. There is no doubt about that. That is the way that it is construed always.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has the force of any statute.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It has the force of any statute on which it is based.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of any statute.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of any statute on which it is based. It is like the rules made under a judicature Act. These Orders in Council are not unknown at all, they are not unusual and they are not unique in character. Take a statute providing for a judicature Act; in England and wherever a judicature act has been passed, the Legislature has given to the Supreme Court the power to make rules which have the force of the statute just the same as if they were enacted in the judicature Act itself. So, in regard to boards of health; every board of health act provides that the provincial board of health may make rules and regulations which have the force of law just as if they were enacted by statute. In England and in this country you will find numbers of statutes which are passed giving to certain bodies, sometimes to the Governor in Council, sometimes to another public body, power to make orders or rules and regulations which are to have the force of law. Now, Sir, these rules and these orders are what are known as subordinate legislation. But, Sir, they must depend for their validity and their endurance must depend upon the basic Statute upon which they are founded and for the carrying out of which these different parties are given power to make such orders. Take the case of a Board of Health which is created and power given to it to make regulations which are to have the force of law just as if they were enacted in the Statute creating the Board of Health. But that Board of Health is to last three years, the Act creating it is to come to an end in three years. Would it be argued that when the Board of Health goes out of existence as the result of the expiry of the temporary Statute that the regulations would still stand and that they could still be enforced?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The effect of them would stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not at all.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: Anything done under them would stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There are two kinds of Statutes known to the law, as my hon. friend knows. One of them is what is known as a perpetual Statute and the other a temporary Statute or Act. A perpetual Act is one to which there is no limitation. While it can be repealed at any time by Act of Parliament, it is known as a perpetual Act. You will find that distinction in all text books. Now this War Measures Act happens to be a temporary Act. My hon. friend has not called attention to that. He has spoken of this as if it were like any other Statute; it is called the War Measures Act but he treats it as though it were like any other Act. Some parts of it are perpetual but some parts and the most vital are temporary and are to expire at the termination of the war.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The House in Committee on Private Bills, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Bill No. 8, to incorporate the Bishop of Mackenzie River—Mr. R. B. Bennett—in committee.

On section 1—incorporation:

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. gentleman explain the Bill?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It is a Bill in the usual terms for the incorporation of the Bishop of Mackenzie River, who happens to live without the bounds of the province. It involves nothing contentious in any sense. The Private Bills Committee made the necessary amendments to make it conform to other Bills of a similar nature.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does the hon. member know what the amendments are?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Merely verbal.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—investments:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I see that the corporation may invest its funds and moneys in first mortgages on freehold property.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Corporations of that character in western Canada have in many instances found it advisable to invest what little funds they have in productive mortgages rather than in other forms of securities, and that power has been granted by the provinces. The only reason why this Act is before the committee is because the corporation is in the unorganized territory of the Dominion. Otherwise the matter would be dealt with by the provinces.

Mr. GRAHAM: The stock in which they invest has to pay a dividend of three years?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Last year similar legislation was passed in respect of a Catholic corporation in the northern country.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—lands conveyed in certain deeds, letters patent, etc., vested in corporation:

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The power of vesting property would not belong to this Parliament were it not for the fact that the district concerned is outside of organized territory. There is no doubt as to the right of Parliament to exercise that power.

Mr. GRAHAM: If this Parliament did not do it, no power could.

Section agreed to. Bill reported.

Bill No. 14, respecting the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited, and to authorize it to change its name to "United Grain Growers, Limited."—Mr. Bradbury—in committee.

On section 1—power to change name:

Mr. STEELE: This Bill went through the Private Bills Committee without amendment except one slight change in clause 3.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—head office and other places of business:

Mr. STEELE: There was a slight amendment to that clause. After the words "place or places" in the second last line the words "in Canada" were inserted.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—grouping of shareholders in local societies based on territorial districts:

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: This had better stand until the member for Selkirk comes. It is an important section.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would suggest that it stand. This section seems to have some unusual feature, and I think it should be explained to the committee.

Section stands. Progress reported.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill No. 25, to incorporate the British American Telephone and Telegraph Company.—Mr. Jameson.

Bill No. 31, respecting The Cariboo, Barkerville and Willow River Railway Company.—Mr. Stevens.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY HON. GEORGE GRAHAM AS TO INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I ask the indulgence of the House to complete a statement that I made yesterday, by reading a telegram?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That can be done only with the consent of the House.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If any one objects, the hon. member is out of order. I have no objection.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I have no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM: The telegram reads:

Montreal, April 27, 1917.

Hon. George P. Graham,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Referring to Mr. Bennett's statement and your denial respecting an alleged agreement of the late Governmtnt to hand over the Intercolonial Railway to the Canadian Northern Railway, a press report represents Mr. Bennett as having said in the House of Commons yesterday that if you (Graham) would consult the former Minister of Finance, you would find that the capital value was fixed, the rate of interest on this capital agreed upon and the term of years of the agreement fixed. I desire to give this statement the most unqualified contradiction. I never saw or heard of such an agreement. I never had any negotiation or discussion with anybody representing the Canadian Northern Railway Company respecting transfer of the Intercolonial Railway.

(Signed) W. S. Fielding.

PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY MR. J. H. BURNHAM.

Mr. BURNHAM: With the consent of the House—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The House will now resume the adjourned debate.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) having brought to the attention of the House a matter that can be dealt with only by consent, possibly members will be willing to extend similar indulgence to the hon. member for Peterborough, who, I understand, desires to make a brief statement.

Mr. GRAHAM: As this is Friday night, if the statement is not made now, there will be no opportunity to make it until next week. We, on this side of the House, have no objection to the hon. gentleman's making a statement.

Mr. BURNHAM: I wish to rise to a question of privilege. On Thursday evening, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), as appears by Hansard, spoke regarding my remarks on venereal diseases. I wish to say that my reference was to the question of venereal diseases and the war at large, and not to any specific army, as a perusal of the reporter's notes will show. I have re-read the reporter's notes and find no instance of the use of the word "Canadian" by me in that connection, but simply a reference to Canada's possibly being in danger after the war, meaning, of course, to refer to immigration, although I did not use the word "immigration."

THE BUDGET.

Consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, and of the amendment of Mr. Turriff thereto, resumed.

Hon. Mr. PUGSLEY (resuming): Before the House rose at six o'clock, I was proceeding to argue that this Order in Council was of a temporary character. It is in the nature of temporary war legislation, and the Solicitor General and myself both agreed—in fact, he was rather pleased, as he thought, to convince me of his assertion, but I did not require any convincing because it was absolutely clear law that any subordinate legislation which any body, whether the Governor in Council or a Board of Health, or any similar body has the power to make, has the same effect as if it had been enacted by Statute.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I said was "in any statute."

Mr. PUGSLEY: I said, if the order had been included in the Statute of 1914, in section 6, it would necessarily expire at the termination of the war. My hon. friend dealt with the matter this afternoon as if the War Measures Act were a permanent measure. I stated that there are some clauses in it which are of a permanent character and the effect of which may be spoken of as perpetual, whereas there are other clauses— and the most important clauses so far as the present question is concerned— which are of a temporary character. I would call the attention of hon. members to the War Measures Act, from which they will see that I am correct in that statement. This Act was passed on the 27th of August, 1914. First is the citation:

> This Act may be cited as The War Measures Act, 1914.

Then by section 2, it provides:

> All Acts and things done or omitted to be done prior to the passing of this Act and on or after the first day of August, A.D. 1914, by or under the authority of or ratified by,— > (a) His Majesty the King in Council;
> (b) any Minister or officer of His Majesty's Imperial Government;
> (c) the Governor in Council;
> (d) any Minister or officer of the Government of Canada;
> (e) any other authority or person;
> which, had they been done or omitted after the passing of this Act, would have been authorised by this Act or by orders or regulations hereunder, shall be deemed to have been done or omitted under the authority of this Act, and are hereby declared to have been lawfully done or omitted.

That, of course, has no application to the present question. Then it is provided by section 3:

> The provisions of sections 6, 10, 11 and 13 of this Act shall only be in force during war, invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended.

Sections 4, 5, 7, 8, 9 and 12 are in the nature of perpetual legislation. Now, it is under the 6th section, which is declared to be temporary and to remain in force only during the war, that this Order in Council was passed. Section 6 says:—

> 6. The Governor in Council shall have power to do and authorize such acts and things, and to make from time to time such orders and regulations as he may by reason of the existence of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms, it is hereby declared that the powers of the Governor in Council shall extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:—
> (a) Censorship and the control and suppression of publications, writings, maps, plans, photographs, communications and means of communication;
> (b) arrest, detention, exclusion and deportation;
> (c) control of the harbours, ports and territorial waters of Canada and the movements of vessels;

(d) transportation by land, air, or water, and the control of the transport of persons and things;

Next is the clause under which this Order was passed.

(e) trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture;
(f) appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property and of the use thereof.

To make my argument at this point clearer, let me ask, if this Order in Council is to have the same effect as a statute what would have been the effect if, instead of paragraph (e), which gives authority to make Orders in Council relating to trading, exportation, importation, production and manufacture, the Act had declared that wheat, wheat products and semolina should be placed on the free list? I admit that the Order in Council is just as strong as would have been a clause to that effect in the Act, but in that case it would, of course, come under section 6 and, by section 3, section 6 is to be in force only during the war. Therefore, unquestionably, if, instead of the Order in Council passed by the Governor in Council under the authority of section 6, Parliament had exercised this authority itself, its effect would cease at the end of the war. Now, the question is, does the Order in Council have a more extensive operation than the section of the statute on which it is founded? I submit not. It is merely subordinate legislation which Parliament, instead of enacting itself, has given authority to the Governor in Council to enact. As I have said, it is similar to the case of boards of health established by provincial legislatures and given power to make regulations. If the Act establishing the board of health is temporary in its character the moment the time arrives when the Act becomes inoperative then ipso facto any orders or regulations made by the board of health cease to have any effect. If there can be found in the statute itself any evidence of an intention on the part of Parliament that any Act which was done by Order in Council should remain in operation after the Act itself went out of force, then a court would construe it as being the intention of Parliament that it should be so continued in operation after the Act had terminated, but under the authorities there must be a clear intention on the part of Parliament that anything which is done shall continue in force after the Act has ceased to operate. My hon. friend the Solicitor General said, "If the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite is correct, how would it be with regard to the Ross Rifle factory? The Government has expropriated that property; suppose they should not pay for the property until after the war ceases, would the property revert back to the Ross Rifle Company?" Well, Parliament had that in view, and by section 7, which is of the nature of perpetual legislation, provides that the Government shall pay for any property that has been expropriated. Parliament realized that if all the sections of the Act were to be of the same temporary character as sections 6, 10, 11 and 13 there might be cases where grave injustice would be done, and section 7, therefore, provides:—

Whenever any property or the use thereof has been appropriated by His Majesty under the provisions of this Act, or any order in council, order or regulation made thereunder, and compensation is to be made therefor and has not been agreed upon, the claim shall be referred by the Minister of Justice to the Exchequer Court, or to a Superior or County Court of the province within which the claim arises, or to a judge of any such court.

That section does not end with the war, as do sections 6, 10, 11 and 13. Section 7 provides for the payment of any property which has been expropriated under the temporary Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does not my hon. friend see that Section 7 simply provides the means for paying for the factory? It does not affect the point at all. If what my hon. friend says is correct, the title would revert back to the Ross Rifle Company after the war. Section 7 makes no provision of that kind whatever.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Anything that has been completed while the temporary Act is in force is carried to a conclusion and becomes effective.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is completed.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Parliament may have taken the property, but not have paid for it before the end of the war, and to meet such a case, Parliament provides the means of paying for the property even after the war has come to an end; section 7 was passed for that purpose. But, as I have said, section 6, under which this Order in Council was passed, is temporary in its character, and ends immediately on the conclusion of the war. It has very often happened that a question has arisen as to the effect of a temporary Act, and there is one important case referred to in a very valuable book entitled Craie's Statute Law, which is based upon Hardcastle, an authority of the very greatest merit. In this text book a case will be found where a question arose as to whether a temporary Act had the effect of repealing a franchise under which certain tolls were collected, or whether it merely suspended the operation of the franchise. The court held that it would depend upon what was the apparent intention as expressed by the Act of Parliament. In one case it was provided that the temporary Act should continue for a certain period of time and until the close of the then next session of Parliament, and the court was convinced that the intention of Parliament in passing the temporary Act was that, at its expiration application should be made to Parliament to deal with the matter. The court held that as the intention was that application should be made to Parliament, the franchise was repealed. It is always a question, no matter whether the Act deals with regulations, tolls or anything else provided for by another Act, whether the latter Act is simply suspended in its operations, or repealed.

There is not a line or a word in this statute from which it could be inferred that Parliament had any intention of continuing sections 6, 10, 11, and 13 or anything done under these sections one day beyond the termination of the war. If that be so, this subordinate legislation, this Order in Council, must end with the basic legislation upon which it is founded. It certainly could not have been intended by Parliament to give a subordinate body, which is what the Governor in Council is, greater power than that which is exercised by Parliament itself. Parliament in this legislation is dealing with temporary matters, it is enacting that which it is desirable to enact because of the exigencies of war. Had the provisions of this Order in Council been enacted directly by Parliament as part of section 6, instead of as subordinate legislation by Order in Council under that section, it would have come to an end with the war. The Solicitor General admitted that—he was obliged to do so. As the authorities show that subordinate legislation is to be construed as if it were contained in the basic Act itself, and as this section of the statute comes to an end with the war, the Order in Council based upon it cannot have a longer life. On this point I will refer to this same authority, Craies. At page 262 he gives examples of what in England are called "statutory rules"—subordinate legislation having the force of law. He says:

> The most salient examples of statutory rules are the Rules of the Supreme Court (including the Crown Office Rules), the County Court Rules, the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, the Regulations to Prevent Collisions at Sea, and many, if not most, Orders in Council.

There is nothing sacred about an Order in Council any more than about a regulation made by any other authority given power by statute to make it. Craies further says:

> Under certain statutes it is directed—
> (1) That Orders in Council, etc., made under the statute are to have the same effect as if enacted therein; or
>
> (2) That rules when made are to lie on the tables of both Houses of Parliament for a certain time; or
>
> (3) That the validity of the order, etc., shall not be judicially questioned.
> The case of Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood suggests that in the first of these cases "the proper canon of construction is to read the original Act and the subordinate legislation together as if they were one Act and were to be construed together;" and it is submitted that the same rule applies to cases (2) and (3).

Thus, when a statute gives authority to any body or person, whether the Governor in Council, or a board of health, or a court, any order made under that statute is to be constructed with the statute on which it is founded, and when, by effluxion of time, the statute becomes of no effect, the order made in pursuance of it and based upon it also comes to an end. That is subject always to this consideration—that if Parliament has clearly shown an intention that the subordinate legislation is to continue after the expiration of the statute, the courts will give effect to it. In cases where a temporary Act suspends the operation of a franchise or the levying of tolls, then, when the temporary Act expires, the statute whose operation was by it suspended ipso facto comes into force again, just as before the temporary Act was passed.

That nothing can be done under a temporary Act after it expires has been established in a number of cases. There is one rather interesting case to be found in Craies at page 338. Mr. O'Connell was charged with an offence under a temporary Act. When brought to trial he pleaded guilty. But he was not punished, and many thought that this was because of political pressure having been brought to bear. But when inquiry was made it was found that, though he had been tried and had pleaded guilty during the continuance of the temporary Act, afterwards that temporary Act had expired before sentence and there was thus no power to sentence him.

I have spoken of instances in which Parliament has clearly made provision that subordinate legislation shall continue in effect after the temporary statute on which it is based has come to an end. But there is nothing of that kind in this Act. On the contrary, you have the strongest evidence that the intention of Parliament was the very opposite. Power is given to the Governor in Council to make, unmake, repeal, or vary these Orders in Council. That shows clearly that Parliament never intended that when subordinate legislation was enacted under this law it should be permanent

That is a reasonable consideration. Parliament said, as it now must be presumed to have intended, that amongst the powers relating to trade and commerce as a war measure it may be deemed advisable to take the duty off wheat, wheat flour and semonila and other articles during the war. How reasonable it is that it should be done by way of suspending the customs duties act during the war. That is the effect, as I have said, speaking as a general thing, of all temporary acts which in any way relate to duties or customs or franchises under which certain tolls, charges or duties, may be collected. In addition to that view being in accordance with the authorities, it seems to me that it is a reasonable view to take because Parliament, if it intended to give authority as the Solicitor General contends—a position which is doubted by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) but which it is not now material to discuss—but if Parliament intended to give authority during the war to have these articles transferred to the free list, everybody can see that to suspend the customs duties in the meantime would have been the most effective and most reasonable way to carry that into effect and, under the authorities, that would be effected under this temporary statute. It would not be a repeal of the customs law in these particulars but it would be the suspension of the operation of the Customs Act during the pendency of the temporary Act, and when the temporary Act ceased to be operative, suspension would cease and the customs duties would again come into force. If I am right in that view it sustains the position that was taken by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) which he said he took upon the advice of a legal gentleman possessing a good knowledge of the law. I have no idea who the gentleman was who so advised him but, if my opinion had been asked, I certainly would have felt bound to give the same opinion to the hon. member for Assiniboia as that gentleman did.

As far as the statement of the Deputy Minister of Justice is concerned, I submit that his opinion in no way differs from the view which I have presented. Evidently he steers clear of the issue. He knows what the Minister of Finance wants and he does not want to give the Minister of Finance a wrong opinion, but if he can satisfy the minister without giving him a direct opinion he is not averse to doing so.

Mr. BURNHAM: If the Government advance a certain opinion they are certainly denying the contrary but when the hon. gentleman finds a certain section demonstrating that this Government can do a certain thing would he interpret it as being intended to prevent them from doing that thing?

Mr. GRAHAM: Put it on the Statute Books so that there would be no mistake.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If I were in power I would say absolutely that I would feel bound to take the position that this is a temporary Act, and that the customs duties would at its termination come into force. The temporary Act expires when the war terminates and the customs duties again become operative. The Deputy Minister of Justice says that the order has the effect of legislation—we all admit that—of subordinate legislation—and then he says that these duties are removed by this temporary Act, which, of course, is entirely consistent with the position I take that they are temporarily removed, and that they can only come into operation again by the authority of Parliament. And he says that wheat, wheat flour and semolina will remain free unless fresh duties be imposed by or under the authority of Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read the whole of the last sentence, please.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will read it.

> Therefore, I am of opinion that the Order in Council became effective as from its date permanently to remove the duty imposed by the present customs tariff on wheat, wheat flour and semolina and that these products accordingly become free of customs duty, and will remain free unless fresh duties be imposed by or under the authority of Parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does "permannently" mean?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Upon reading it again I am inclined to think that Mr. Newcombe must mean permanently. The idea I had before was that it was until the duties were reimposed under the authority of Parliament, but the word "permanently" would rather indicate that Mr. Newcombe's opinion is that it is permanent, and I should be disposed to leave it at that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is the pride of members of the legal profession that they admit at once when they make an error, and I gladly admit that I misinterpreted Mr. Newcombe. But, while I have great respect for Mr. Newcombe's opinion, I am inclined to think that there has been a failure to call his attention to the authority of Hardcastle and Craies, because these authorities are absolutely clear that when an Act temporary in its character prevents the collection of duties and tolls and the exercise of franchises, that Act, at the end of the time when it is declared that it shall be in operation, shall cease to be in force, and, ipso facto, the ancient franchise will be restored and the tolls or duties provided by statute will go into force again unless there is an expression of a clear intention on the part of Parliament to the contrary.

Supposing I should be in error as to this, then there is the other fact which cannot by any possibility be gotten over, that the Governor in Council is expressly given by this statute the power to revoke this order at any time during the war. They cannot do it afterwards because the authority ends with the war. Under section 6 they have authority to revoke it at any time during the war. These are the words contained in section 6, sub-section 2, the statute under which this order is passed, and they are as clear as language can be:

> All orders and regulations made under this section shall have the force of law and shall be enforced in such manner and by such courts, officers and authorities, as the Governor in Council may prescribe, and may be varied, extended or revoked by any subsequent order or regulation.

There is the clear authority given by section 6 of this statute, the same statute which, during the war, gives the power to make an order and to enforce it during the war and also the power to revoke it. There is no question about that. That shows that the order is temporary in its character. It shows that if the Government should desire to do so, they might, behind the back of the public and behind the backs of members of this Parliament, in secret session, in council, at any time, revoke this order and restore the duties on wheat, wheat flour and semolina under the Customs Act.

So that whether its temporary character is ensured by the fact that that Act is temporary and will expire at the termination of the war, or whether it is temporary in its character because, without reference to Parliament, the Governor in Council has the power, to-morrow or at any time it pleases to do so, to revoke this Order and to place these products again under a duty, the argument which is made by the gentleman who moved the amendment and those who support it from this side of the House in favour of placing these products on the free list by Act of Parliament and so doing away with its temporary character, takes on the greatest possible force. Can anybody dispute that? And if any one were to pay attention to the argument of the Solicitor General to-day I should say there would be the greatest possible danger, if that hon. gentleman can carry weight with Council, that the Order may be revoked very soon, and particularly in view of the fact that we had not a full Cabinet Council in Canada when the Order was passed. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), another important minister representing a Manitoba constituency, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) were all absent; indeed, I think even the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) was away at the time; so that four very important members of the Cabinet were absent. Now, what may happen a little later on, when, perhaps, a different view may prevail? The Solicitor General, if any weight is to be given to his argument to-day, has endeavoured to convince this House and this country that he and his colleagues were right in the view which they took a year ago, when they stood up in this House and voted against free wheat. His argument is along these lines, and I am sorry to say that his argument places the Solicitor General and this Government in the rather unenviable position of bringing down an Order in Council which they do not believe will be in the public interest, if we may credit what they say. Because what is the fact, and what does the Solicitor General say when you boil it down? He says, as a last reason why this Order should have been passed, that while he thinks that a majority of the whole people of Canada would be against it, yet out in the West, through the act of these dreadful Grits, through their repeated agitation, they have really convinced the people out there that free wheat would be in the interest of the country; the majority of the people of Canada do not believe that, but the people in the West, these poor easily misguided farmers, have been persuaded by Grit speakers on the platform and in this House, and it is not desirable, particularly when an election is at hand, to have any large section of the people dissatisfied.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Election?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, that is the effect of what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What election?

Mr. GRAHAM: Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What does it mean? It means that upon a great question, a question of the trade relations between these two great countries involving the greatest natural products of both countries, upon a great question upon which the Conservative party came into power in 1911, upon which they asked the people to give them their support and their confidence, and upon which they succeeded in getting a majority of the representatives of the people, the hon. gentleman in effect says: Notwithstanding all that, notwithstanding our position at that time and ever since upon the trade question, notwithstanding that we have asked our followers to stand up in this House and vote down resolutions of a similar character in the past, and although I thought then we were right and I think still we were right, yet for fear that we shall lose some Conservative support out in western Canada, we are going to swallow our principles and give to these dreadful Grits what they have been asking for.

Mr. GRAHAM: It hurts but we are going to do it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to read this Order in Council. I think it is the most unique document ever presented to Parliament, particularly coming from a Government that thinks it was unwise to pass it, particularly coming from a Government whose Solicitor General has eagerly searched the newspapers from day to day in order to present to this Parliament evidence that it was unwise to pass it, that instead of having the effect of increasing the price of wheat it has really lowered the price of wheat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No I did not, not at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me read it Mr. Speaker:

> At the Government House, Ottawa, Monday, the 16th day of April, 1917. Present: His Excellency the Governor General in Council.
> Whereas the Minister of Finance reports that certain conditions arising out of the war seriously affect prices obtainable in Canada for wheat, especially of the lower grades—

And, Sir, bear in mind that that was passed at a time when Canadian wheat was quoted at $2.20 per bushel. On the 16th day of April, the very day when this Order in Council was passed, wheat was quoted at more than $2.20, and yet the minister says:—

> Whereas the Minister of Finance reports that certain conditions arising out of the war seriously effect prices obtainable in Canada for wheat, especially of the lower grades—

Now, you see, that is rather put on the ground that it is owing to the low prices of wheat that they have been brought to the serious consideration of the passing of this Order. Wheat was only 2.29½ when this Order was passed. Why, what sympathetic consideration the Minister of Finance must have for the farmers of Canada when he will violate every principle which has animated him for the last five years on this trade question, when he recognizes that he got into this Parliament upon the cry of "No truck or trade with the Yankees." How tremendously he must have been overwhelmed by the low price of wheat, $2.29 a bushel, when he sat down to write this recommendation to Council. He says:

> Whereas in normal times there exists a good commercial export demand for milling purposes from Great Britain and the Continent for wheat of all grades—

Now Sir, what are meant by normal times? They would be times of peace, would they not? And what is the highest price of wheat in times of peace? Not one dollar a bushel and in normal times the minister would do nothing for the farmers, when the farmers were getting only one dollar a bushel.

9 p.m.

Mr. GRAHAM: Less.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Less than a dollar a bushel. In 1915 it was only ninety cents a bushel.

> Whereas in normal times there exists a good commercial export demand for milling purposes from Great Britain and the Continent for wheat of all grades—

There was no necessity of doing anything for the farmer when wheat was at the price it was in normal times, ninety cents per bushel.

And whereas this demand has for some time past almost entirely ceased on account of shortage of ocean shipping due to submarine warfare, practically all available tonnage being required to transport grain of the higher grades and flour made therefrom, purchased in Canada and the United States by the British and Allied Governments for their respective needs.

One would suppose that, getting as they do a price 100 per cent more than they ever got before or even dreamed of getting in normal times, the farmers would not have found it a very great hardship to pay the duty upon the lower grades of wheat going into the United States. Even then they would not do too badly as compared with their condition in normal times, when their appeals never touched the hearts of members of this Government. This order proceeds:

And whereas in consequence of this condition wheat is being exported to the United States market for sale there, notwithstanding the customs duty payable thereon under the provisions of the United States tariff.

So it is in consequence of the fact that the farmers are getting $2.29 a bushel for their high grade wheat and that they are sending their lower grade wheat to the United States and paying duty thereon, that the attention of the Minister of Finance is directed to this most important and most disturbing question. So they would have us believe, by this beautiful Order in Council.

Mr. GRAHAM: Disorder in Council.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They must get this thing through quickly before Parliament reassembles, and they make inquiries from the Grain Commissioners. The order recites:

And whereas from inquiries recently made from the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada and other authentic sources the Minister of Finance is satisfied that the prices now prevailing in Canada for wheat, particularly of the lower grades, are, owing to the cause above mentioned, much lower than the prices obtained therefor in the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: "Much lower than the prices obtained therefor in the United States."

Mr. GRAHAM: Who admits that?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The farmers are getting, as I said before, $2.29 for wheat of the higher grade, and they are selling large quantities in the United States, paying duty of 10 cents a bushel. Then the order proceeds:

In fact, there are strong grounds for the belief that advantage is being taken of the situation to maintain prices of the said grades at figures lower than are warranted by general market conditions, and from information at hand it appears that there still remains a large amount of last year's Canadian crop unmarketed.

And whereas it is desirable at a time when a special appeal is being made for increased agricultural production to supply grain and foodstuffs to Great Britain and her Allies, which now include the United States of America, that the Canadian farmer should feel that he will obtain the best market prices obtainable for product of his industry.

But the Government having waited until April 16, after the cropping season is opened, the farmer will not be able to avail himself of this order so as to enlarge his crop during the present year. If my information is correct, the people whose unfortunate financial condition appeals to the Minister of Finance and his colleagues are the speculators who months ago bought up the wheat from the farmers and have it stored in the elevators all the way from Calgary to Montreal and Quebec. The order proceeds:

And whereas, the Minister of Finance is of the opinion that it is in the circumstances advisable that such action should be taken which would give to Canadian wheat free access to the markets of the United States—

Now the minister is beginning to talk upon broad principles.

Mr. MACDONALD: He was against that.

Mr. GRAHAM: One year ago.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is when he began to be against it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How pitiable it is that when we come near the time that we have to face the electors, our principles are scattered to the dust. "In the circumstances." In what circumstances? In the circumstances that Western wheat to-day is 100 per cent higher than it has ever been in the history of the country. (Reading):

It is in the circumstances advisable that such action should be taken which will give to Canadian wheat free access to the markets of the United States in lieu of the commercial markets in Great Britain and on the European continent.

In lieu of them! A man is sometimes appointed to a position in lieu of somebody that is dead. The minister is now going to seek the American market in lieu of the European market. He goes on:

In lieu of the commercial markets in Great Britain and on the European continent, formerly available under the conditions then existing, and, with this object in view, he directs the attention of His Excellency to certain provisions of the Customs Tariff of the United States.

Have you not, Sir, often heard the Prime Minister and other members of the Government, speaking in this House of the reciprocal statutory arrangement which was to be made under the negotiations between Mr. Fielding and the Secretary of State of the United States, assert in tones of thunder that we should legislate in the interests of Canada independently of what the Congress of the United States might do in the way of legislation? And yet the Finance Minister calls the attention of His Excellency to certain provisions of the United States tariff. He goes on to say:

By item 644 thereof wheat, wheat flour, semolina, and other wheat products, shall be entered free of duty from countries which do not impose a duty on wheat or wheat flour or semolina imported from the United States; otherwise the duty upon wheat is fixed at ten cents per bushel, and upon wheat flour at forty-five cents per barrel, and upon semolina and other products of wheat ten per centum ad valorem.

Mr. MACDONALD: Read that again, to make sure that you are quoting the United States tariff.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will read it again, because it seems hardly possible that the Minister of Finance should quote the United States tariff. The Minister of Finance actually points out to His Excellency the Governor General, that the United States has made a statutory offer to this Government to admit wheat, wheat flour, semolina and other wheat products into the United States free of duty if the Canadian people through their executive authority or their Parliament will place them on the free list. Is there any negotiation there? None, my hon. friend says. Is it not this, that when this legislation has gone into effect under the authority of the Order in Council, the admission of the products of the one country into the other is dependent upon the reciprocal legislation which these two countries have passed? How different is that from the arrangement of 1911, except as to the number of articles which were to be admitted under reciprocal legislation?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is the same thing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: These hon. gentlemen have said that they want no entangling alliances with the country to the south of us. In 1911 it was agreed that there should be no entangling alliances; it was agreed that each Parliament should be free and independent to legislate at any time to alter the duty in any way that might be thought in the best interest of its people. So, to-day, this Parliament is free; so to-day the Congress of the United States is free. Both cases are exactly similar. As I have said, there is not the slightest difference except as to the number of articles which were in the reciprocal arrangement of 1911 and the number in the reciprocal arrangement which you have to-day. What did my hon. friend do? Did he have no truck or trade with the Yankees? Did he not, the moment this Order in Council was passed, send a copy of it to the United States consul, so that he could inform the authorities at Washington that Canada would allow wheat, wheat flour and semolina to enter the United States free of duty? Then the Order in Council says:—

And whereas, if Canada should place wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list, our wheat and wheat products would gain free entry to the markets of the United States.

For the last six years you have said that Canada is going to legislate in her own interest; that Canada is to have no truck or trade with the Yankees that Canada is not going to base her fiscal policy on that of the United States. It is, however, put forward to His Excellency as a reason for placing these articles on the free list, not that that is to be of any advantage to the Canadian people, but that thereby we will get free entry into the great American market for the wheat and wheat products. Then the Order in Council says:—

And whereas it is desirable, in the national interest that, for the reasons stated above, free access should be obtained to the markets of the United States for Canada's wheat.

Not for Canada's low grade of wheat, not for this wheat that it is said we cannot sell to anybody else, but for Canada's wheat, her Manitoba hard, everything, all kinds of wheat. This Order in Council says, under the guiding hand of him who was once a strong Liberal, under the teachings which he had, in years gone by, when he was taught to believe it was desirable that Canadians should be given access to all the markets possible, and that there should be the greatest freedom possible in trading between these two great countries—under the guidance of the Minister of Finance, because it is he that makes this report, not the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Acting Premier—

Mr. GRAHAM: Not the Solicitor General.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, it is not the Solicitor General, but the Minister of Finance, who says:—

> And whereas it is desirable in the national interest that, for the reasons stated above, free access should be obtained to the markets of the United States for Canada's wheat. Therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under the authority of the War Measures Act, 1914, section 6—

This temporary section, which expires when the war ends.

> —is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered that wheat, wheat flour and semolina be transferred to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty or customs.

The minister says that this is desirable in the national interests for reasons stated above. In view of the allegation that it is, as we on this side say that it was, that it has been for the last six years, and that it always has been, in the national interest that there should be a free exchange of wheat and wheat products between these two countries, what are the reasons that animate this Government in advising His Excellency that Canadian wheat should have free access to the United States? One is that a large amount of tonnage of wheat goes to the United States for shipment to Europe. I do not see that that would be any reason, because wheat could go into the United States under the law as it was before this Order in Council was passed, simply on the payment of the customs duty for bond, I think, of about one cent a bushel, or it may be even less than that. I have here a communication from the Secretary of the Board of Trade at Quebec. This is a public document, copies of which have probably been sent to other members of Parliament. It is dated the 14th of April, and says:

> I would draw your attention to the following questions specially dealt with in this report:
> 1. The alarming diversion of the grain trade of the Canadian Northwest to the United States ports. Notwithstanding the sacrifices made by Canada in building three transcontinental railways, 181 million bushels of our grain went to New York and other United States ports for shipment in 1916, as against 131 million bushels to points in Canada, for consumption as well as for export, of which 40 million bushels subsequently went to Portland.

If the Quebec Board of Trade is right, then 221,000,000 bushels of Canadian grain during the last year went through the United States to United States ports, as against 91,000,000 bushels that went to points in Canada for consumption as well as for export. Yet this is one of the actual conditions existing at this time which have induced the Minister of Finance to tell to His Excellency that it would be in the national interest that all restrictions should be taken away from the importation of wheat into the United States. Another circumstance is that the lower grade wheat cannot be marketed in Canada, and vast quantities of it—and that would seem to be borne out by the report of the Board of Trade—are marketed in the United States, notwithstanding the duty of ten cents per bushel, and—and this is one of the important and convincing circumstances—as at the present time the Canadian farmer is only able to sell under present circumstances his first class wheat at $2.29 per bushel, and is obliged to pay a duty of ten cents a bushel on even inferior grades of wheat imported into the United States, as he is to-day selling vast quantities of wheat in the United States and paying the duty, and as it is desirable to supply all the goods possible to the United Kingdom and her Allies, of which the United States is one—under these circumstances and in the national interest it is desirable to waive the duty and so to secure these wheat and wheat products shall go into the United States free. Have I not given the circumstances just as they are divulged by the Order in Council? If there are any other reasons to be given, tell me what they are. The Solicitor General, in one part of his speech, dwelt upon this fact, that it was desirable to send all the Canadian wheat possible through United States ports so that it would get to the Allies.

The fact that last year this vast quantity of Canadian wheat went into the United States would seem to destroy the argument which the solicitor submitted in that particular. No, Sir, the only justifiable ground upon which it can be put at all, is that this provision ought to be of a permanent character; that in times of war and in times of peace, so far as food products are concerned the tariff wall between the two countries should be torn down and the producers allowed to secure the best markets wherever they can in either one country or the other and the consumers buy at the lowest possible price. In setting forth their reasons hon. gentlemen opposite are deceiving themselves, and they think they can pull the wool over the eyes of the people of this country, but they will not be able to do it. They have done what they have done, because they have not been able to stand up against the strong expression of opinion from the farmers of the North West. Let them confess that they dare not face the electorate in those constituencies with the tariff wall unremoved, and that in order to secure votes they have sunk the principles upon which they professed to stand here in Parliament, principles to which they asked their supporters in this House and the people of this country to rally. Let hon. gentlemen opposite confess that they have thrown away those principles because they feared that if they did not give the farmers free wheat they would lose a vast number of votes in the North West of people who hitherto had been ranked among their supporters. I am happy myself that these hon. gentlemen are gaining knowledge; they are improving slowly. It is true that we have been hammering away at them for a number of years, as a teacher hammers away at a dull boy to develop his mind. I am only one humble member of this party who has been seeking to instruct hon. gentlemen opposite. They have had good instructors on this side of the House and in a great many people in this country, and they have been learning slowly, and it is not only on this question that they have made progress. I wonder if my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) is in the House? If I may digress for a moment, I would like to call attention to the wonderful development that has taken place in his intellect in the last few years. I happened to read in the Montreal Star the other night the report of a banquet that was given to my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue at Valleyfield on the 16th of April, the very day, by the way, when this other marvellous intellectual development was manifested in the passing of the Free wheat Order in Council. The Minister of Inland Revenue is reported as follows:

Can you condemn him, Sir, very much for that? He was only thirty years of age when he appealed to the electorate in 1911. It is true that the younger Pitt was Prime Minister of England when he was only twenty-one. But there are not many William Pitts, and perhaps it is not wonderful that this young man was not fully developed intellectually at the youthful age of thirty. He said at the banquet that he had learned much since then. Now that the hon. gentleman has had six years of intellectual growth, and has come to the conclusion that Canada ought to participate in the wars of the Empire, and that we should have a Canadian navy, let me express the hope in all sincerity, and with the best intentions, that he will endeavour to exercise that influence which his ability and high standing and excellent qualities entitle him to exercise; let him have the courage and confidence that should distinguish those who have arrived at intellectual maturity.

Mr. McKENZIE: What did he say at the banquet?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will read it again as I see the Minister of Inland Revenue has just come in. The Montreal Star gives a report of a very delightful banquet at Valleyfield on the 16th of April at which the Minister of Inland Revenue was present; it says:

> When, said Mr. Sevigny, only thirty years of age, lacking the experience I acquired later, I declared I was opposed to all contributions by Canada to the wars of the Empire and opposed to a local navy. I won't deny that I committed that error. I frankly admit, etc.

I was saying in the absence of my hon. friend that he was only thirty years old when he declared that he was opposed to all contributions by Canada to the wars of the Empire and opposed to a local navy, and that we cannot expect too much of a young man only thirty years old. I was speaking of the delight it gives me to find the Solicitor General and his colleagues developing along intellectual and patriotic lines, which development if carried to a conclusion, must inevitably result in benefit to this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us how old he was at the various times he changed his political views.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me tell my hon. friend that never in my political life did I change my views except upon justifiable grounds, and if the Minister of Finance will tell us what age he was when he performed a similar act,—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I never tell my age.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If the Minister of Finance tells me that I shall endeavour to tell my age, but I can tell my hon. friend that I never changed my political views except on justifiable grounds, for whenever I appealed to the people to approve of my conduct they never had any hesitation in supporting me, and therefore I feel pretty comfortable so far as my public life is concerned. Let me give just a little attention to the Minister of Inland Revenue; the Solicitor General must not think he is the only pebble on the beach, and try to attract all the attention to himself.

Mr. MACDONALD: How old was he when he changed his views?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I was glad that the Minister of Inland Revenue made the statement he did at that banquet, and I hope that during the short time he will occupy a position in the Cabinet he will be able to influence for the good of his country the gentlemen with whom he has heretofore been associated in the province of Quebec. Yesterday a very deplorable incident took place in this House. We had the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) bringing in, without making inquiry as to whether its statements were true or not, an article from a newspaper, which I regret to say, has done a great deal to stir up race and religious feeling in this country. The Solicitor General and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) did not call him to task or rebuke him. The Minister of Inland Revenue stated what he would have done if the hon. gentleman had made a motion to adjourn the House, and also said that the outrageous statements in that article were untrue. Let me express the hope that the fact that the Minister of Inland Revenue did not at the time rise in his place and take advantage of his position as a member of the Government to rebuke the hon. member for Dufferin was the result of an oversight, and that the minister will take the earlist opportunity, in caucus, to rebuke hon. gentlemen who are disposed to follow that course, and will use his undoubted influence—

Mr. SEVIGNY: Was the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) in the House when the statement was read by the hon. member for Dufferin?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Does not he know that at that time I tried to speak and was called to order by the Speaker?

[Sir Thomas White.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: I said that I trusted it was an oversight. I am glad to know that it was because he was prevented from speaking. Let me express the hope, and I do it in all sincerity, that if any of his colleagues are disposed to take the improper and ill-advised course taken by the hon. member for Dufferin he will endeavour to prevent such action in the future.

Mr. SEVIGNY: I am ready to do anything to prevent discord between the two races, but I shall succeed better if the hon. gentleman will stop the Liberal party from campaigning as they did in the county of Dorchester in January last.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me tell my hon. friend I am not aware that any hon. member on this side of the House has ever sought to introduce race or religion here. I come from a province in which one-quarter of the people speak the French language —usually they speak English as well, but they are French-speaking. They are among our very best citizens. English-speaking and French-speaking people do business together, they associate together, their children go to the same schools, and they live in the utmost harmony. I think it is greatly to be deplored that there should be found gentlemen who will raise these race and religious issues. I was not able to follow the speech of the hon. gentleman as I should like to have done. I am sorry that I cannot follow French easily, nor understand it perfectly; it would be the greatest delight of my life if I could do so, for I admire the French language as much as I admire the French people. I liked the hon. gentleman's speech, but I think he failed in this, that he did not offer rebuke to the hon. gentleman who followed the course of which I have spoken. It seems to me that if those who have influence would show a disposition to prevent in every way possible the repetition of conduct such as that of the hon. member for Dufferin, the effect could not be other than good.

My hon. friend stated at Valleyfield, that in 1911, when he was only thirty years of age, and his mind was not fully developed, he had opposed a local navy. There is a feeling in this House and in the country that the reason this Government returned the tenders and refused to give a contract for the construction of ten war vessels—cruisers and destroyers—under the Naval Act of 1909, was the pledge which the Minister of Inland Revenue and his associates had exacted that there should be no Canadian navy. Now, after a lapse of six years, and when his mind has presumably, as he himself says, developed far beyond what it was when he was thirty, he regrets his conduct at that time in opposing a local navy. Let me appeal to him to say to his colleagues, with all the influence which he ought to be able to command as coming from the great province of Quebec, so wealthy and with such a large population, that the time has come when the Government of Canada might well follow the example of Great Britain and the United States and engage with all its resources and all its energies in the building of ships. If he does this he will not only show that he regrets his action in 1911, but he will take the most effective measures to undo the harm done by the pledge which he and his associates exacted from the Conservative party at the elections of 1911. In view of the difficulty which England and her Allies are experiencing in getting foodstuffs, in view of the appeals made by Mr. Balfour to the United States, to send whatever ships they can, whether wooden vessels, cruisers, destroyers, or even tug boats, I say that the greatest crime that any government ever committed against the people was the deliberate determination on the part of this Government not to build ships in Canada. We have lost five or six years, during which great results could have been obtained.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And we have lost prestige.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And we have lost prestige. Incalculable harm has been done to the Empire and to Canada. Let me implore my hon. friend to declare at an end the promise which he is alleged and believed to have exacted from the Prime Minister in 1911; let him declare that the past is forgotten and that we must, even at this late date, begin to do our duty to Canada and the Empire by engaging in the building of ships, not war ships alone, but also commercial vessels.

I was going to read some numerous Orders in Council which have been passed under the War Measures Act rescinding Orders which had been previously made, but I do not think it is necessary to do so because no one can question that this Government to-morrow could revoke that Order in Council and that it is merely temporary in its character. Therefore, I think that the mention of the fact that orders have been passed over and over again repealing previous orders will be sufficient without taking up the time to refer to them.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let me call your attention for a few minutes to this amendment proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) and which my hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) says is wholly political in its character. I would have thought, had it not been for the remarks of the Solicitor General, that it was one of the most inoffensive amendments that was ever presented in this House of Commons by a member of the Opposition. There is not one word in it, not a breath, of want of confidence in this Government in so far as the present is concerned.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think they ought to accept it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: One would think so. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) says that it was not intended as a party resolution at all. It is not intended as a vote of want of confidence. If it were carried by the unanimous vote of this House, even against the Government, we would not ask the Government to resign because it is not a motion of want of confidence. I am authorized by the acting leader of this side of the House to-night to say that the gentlemen who will be called upon, and who will cheerfully, we hope, vote for this resolution, will not be doing it as expressing any want of confidence in the Government in the ordinary sense. Therefore, if they can support this resolution, they can support it in perfect confidence that it will only express what this House ought to express and that no immediate harm can be done to the Government because we must wait until the people have an opportunity of exercising their judgment in reference to their conduct. Let me read it and see just what it says:

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor.

The hon. gentleman says that it contains a great laudation of the Opposition. It does not. It says:

> This House desires to take the earliest opportunity of expressing its pleasure that the Government has at last yielded to the persistent demands of the Grain Growers of the West as frequently set forth by delegations and resolutions of the representatives of the farming interest, and repeatedly voiced by the Liberal party in this House, by placing wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list, and thereby securing a free market for wheat and wheat products in the United States.

Is not every word of that true? Is there any objection to be taken to our expressing our gratification that this has been done? We do not take a childish view of this order. We do not want to gain any political kudos from it. We might seek to embarrass the Government, but what we say in effect is that we as members of the Liberal party in this House and in this country have been for years demanding, in the national interest, that wheat and its products be placed on the free list, we have been calling attention to the opportunities for vast growth, development and increased prosperity in our western country if this were done, and we have been urging that it should be done in the interest of Canada. Well, now, should the Government object to our expressing our gratification that they have at last yielded to our demands and the demands of the people of the West and passed this order? The Solicitor General himself has said that everything here is true, because he says in effect that the western farmers kept agitating and agitating, and that the Liberal party helped them during all these years, that the Liberal party egged them on and encouraged them until it got to be so infernally hot that the Tory Government could no longer resist the demand made upon them. Is not that in effect what the Solicitor General said? Why should we not express pleasure that the Government have at last acted upon our suggestion and placed wheat on the free list? That is all we ask you gentlemen to do. Are you not gratified that you have done it? I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, may I ask, through you, Sir, if they are not gratified that they have done it? We are accustomed to see their smiling faces, but, looking at them this afternoon and seeing how glum and solemn they looked while the Solicitor General was giving utterance to his very eloquent, but, it seemed to me, laboriously conceived speech, it indicated that perhaps they were not so gratified as the Government would like to think them to be. But pretend to be; let me appeal to them to look as if they were gratified, to join with us on this side of the House and as a unanimous Parliament, representing the people of this country, let us declare that we are all gratified that at last this great measure of trade freedom has been passed into law, and that hereafter the farmers of our western country can move ahead with hope and confidence in their farming operations towards the realization of Canada's destiny as the granary, the greatest grain-producing country in the world. Let us all join together so that word will go out to the people of the East, to the people in our western country, to the people in the United States who are casting longing eyes on our fertile prairies and who desire to go there and to live and to help to develop the country that they can continue permanently to have this free market of the United States. What a wonderful effect it would have if we could pass this resolution unanimously declaring our satisfaction, our gratification, that the Government have at last passed this Order in Council giving to the people of this country free wheat and free flour! What a glorious thing it would be! Is it possible that for purely partisan purposes the Government will vote down a resolution that reads like that? Well, to go further:

> This House is of the opinion that if the policy of Free Wheat is made permanent it will enormously increase the prosperity of the West and be to the general advantage of the whole Dominion.

Why do you object to our agreeing in the reason which the Minister of Finance has set forth in his order along with the passing of the order? The minister has said that:

> And whereas if Canada should place wheat, wheat flour and semolina upon the free list our wheat and wheat products would gain free entry to the markets of the United States.
> And whereas it is desirable in the national interest that, for the reasons stated above, free access should be obtained to the markets of the United States for Canada's wheat.

All we ask you, as supporters of this Government, as members of this House is to join with us in saying that the Finance Minister was absolutely correct when he stated to His Excellency the Governor General that it is desirable in the national interest that free access should be obtained to the markets of the United States for Canadian wheat. Are you going to vote that down? Are you going to vote down a resolution couched almost in the very words of the Order in Council that you yourselves have passed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is in the words of the order why pass it again?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend says that the people are divided in opinion as to the desirability in the national interest of placing wheat on the free list.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I do not say that—it was of placing wheat and wheat flour on the free list.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, the hon. gentleman said that while he thought in the west they were strongly for it, he thought that would not be the opinion of the majority of the people of Canada.

If we all believe in it as I think we do, let us unanimously declare that it is in the national interest to place wheat and wheat products on the free list. Let us take this question, not as the Minister of Trade and Commerce says out of the realm of trade, but out of the realm of politics and make it part of the permanent policy of this country, and by our legislation say to the Government of the United States: So long as that provision remains in your tariff, so long will it remain the policy of the people of Canada; so far as we, a united Parliament, can speak for the people of Canada, so long will it remain on the Statute-book of this country. I hope that will commend itself to hon. gentlemen. The concluding paragraph of the amendment of my hon. friend from Assinaboia (Mr. Turriff) reads:

> In order that the country may be assured of such permanency and that the action of the Administration is not a mere temporary expedient which may be revoked at any time by the Government without reference to Parliament, this House would urge upon the Government the desirability of submitting early in the present session a measure to place by statute wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list, and thereby encourage the farmers to engage in the largest wheat production possible.

Now that is the resolution. Will anybody dispute that? Will anybody dispute that it is desirable? If it is in the national interest, if it is the universal demand of the farmers of the West, is the mere fact that we, the Liberal party, have been in favour of it and have been pleading with gentlemen opposite to finally establish this policy, any reason why we should not to-day give to it the stamp of permanency? Why should it not be permanent if it is good and if it is in the national interest? Why should it be made permanent? Well, that is manifest to everybody. The object of the opening of these markets is, as is alleged by the Order in Council and as we all know, to encourage the farmers to increase production. What does increasing production mean? You cannot go out into the fields —as the Minister of Agriculture, even with his slight knowledge of farming knows— you cannot go out into the field and wave a magic wand and say to the wheat and oats and turnips: Come forth from the ground to feed the people of this world. No, Sir, the farmer has got to get to work to get his ploughs and horses and oxen or his gasolene tractors, he has to get his seed, he has to increase his acreage largely. He has to go to large expense, to borrow money from the his acreage largely. He has to go to heavy expense before he can very largely increase his production. It is not desirable that he should know that there is to be permanency about this policy? He will not engage in increased production, he will not go to the increased expense involved unless he knows that this policy is to have the character of permanency. Everybody knows that this is not going to be a bit of good this year so far as increased production is concerned. The land, in order to be available this year, should have been broken up and prepared last year; the seed bed should have been got ready last year in order to give good results this year. Therefore these gentlemen have passed this Order too late to be of any good to the farmers this year, so far as increased production is concerned. If they wanted to pass this by reason of the conditions, which must have been pressed home upon them months and months ago as much as to-day, they should have passed this Order last year if it was intended to operate this year, or they should have passed it as early at least as last July so that the farmer could have got the seed bed ready for the crop of this spring. Therefore, if this is to be made of any value in relation to increased production, the farmers must begin next summer to plough their land and get ready for the seeding of the spring of 1918. And one year would not be enough for them. They want, as I have said, permanency in order to warrant them in going to the expense necessary to insure increased production.

The hon. Solicitor General says that this is a political resolution and that our course is political. I fail to see on what he bases that statement. Is it political in the sense in which the course of my hon. friend and of his colleagues appears to be political? They say in effect that they have swallowed their principes in order to meet the views of the people of the West, even although they are not satisfied that it is going to be of any great advantage. That is what the Solicitor General says to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And he has argued for the purpose of convincing the people that he was right last year to take a position directly opposed to this resolution. But it does seem to me that it is absolutely necessary to make this policy permanent in order that it shall have that beneficial effect that we desire that it should have. In our western country, out of perhaps one hundred million acres or perhaps two hundred million acres of arable land, we have only about twenty million acres under cultivation. We want to encourage settlers to come in from the United States. They form perhaps the best settlers who can be brought into that country. I know one section of our Northwest where up to 1900 or 1902 there was scarcely any settlement at all. There had been a railroad running through that section for six years, but for sixty or seventy miles there was not a settler upon that line. About 1902 American settlers began to come across. They had experts analyze the soil, they undertook the cultivation of the land, and in that section of the country to-day vast areas are sown with wheat, and it is among the very garden spots of the Dominion of Canada. Americans make splendid settlers. Now, if you can show to these people that it is the permanent policy of the people of Canada to have free wheat, you will encourage people to come over from the United States, not by thousands but by hundreds of thousands, because they will look forward to farming in that country becoming very profitable indeed. They know that the large market of the United States is of enormous benefit to the farmer. They will be encouraged to come in, and our country will move ahead with very much greater rapidity and certainty. Leave the matter indefinite, leave it to have a temporary character, leave it so that the Government might tomorrow or three months from now or next fall even, when the war is over or before, cancel this Order, destroy the effect of this Order altogether and re-impose a duty on wheat and wheat products, and you make the farmer timid, you make the settler timid and you will not achieve any important results either in the way of immigration or in the way of development of our country or advancement of prosperity.

Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, sincerely to apologize to the House. I had not the slightest idea that I had taken up so much time. I hope it has not been entirely useless. I would be well repaid even for all the weariness I have inflicted upon the House if I can do something in the way of convincing our hon. friends to join with us in passing a unanimous resolution in support of their own Order. I should be glad indeed if we could to-morrow send out word to the people of this country that in the opinion of this Parliament this policy is in the national interest, that it would result in enormous benefit to Canada, and that the intention of Parliament is to make the policy one of a permanent character.

Mr. FRANK S. SCOTT (South Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) will pardon me if I do not attempt to follow him in the arguments which he has presented in his speech to-night.

I am an ordinary layman, one not learned in the law, and he will understand how impossible it would be for me to attempt to follow him in a discussion that took such a legal turn as the speech which we have listened to to-night.

There appears to be some difference of opinion on the part of gentlemen of the legal profession on both sides of the House as to the procedure which has been followed in giving free wheat that we have heard so much about to the western farmers. I confess that I am not very greatly concerned about the manner in which free wheat has been brought about. Lawyers may differ about that, but the grain growers of the West, the people who are chiefly interested, will not be deeply concerned about the method by which free wheat was granted. Since April 16 they have realized that free wheat is an accomplished fact, and they will be given an opportunity of observing whether their anticipations respecting the adoption of a policy of this kind will be realized.

In the Budget introduced a few days ago by the Minister of Finance there were no new principles, no new methods of taxation. In the Budget of 1915 a very radical change by way of tariff increase was made. I have noted, however, a very great difference between the way in which the Budget of 1917 has been received by hon. gentlemen opposite and their reception of the Budget of 1915. Hon. gentlemen opposite took very strong exception to the Budget of 1915 and the proposals that were therein made. So strong was their opposition to the Budget of that year that an amendment was introduced. One of their chief objections was that it would not produce revenue. I have not heard any hon. gentleman opposite who has taken part in this debate argue that the present Budget, although there is no change in that respect, will not produce revenue. Another argument that was advanced two years ago was that the Budget of 1915 would stifle trade. In the discussion that has taken place upon the Budget it has not been argued by hon. gentlemen opposite that the present proposals of the Finance Minister will stifle trade. We know that since 1915 the trade of Canada has been more buoyant than it ever was before. We were told in 1915 that the tariff proposals of that day would be a burden on the people; yet it has not been contended during the last few days by hon. gentlemen opposite that the tariff of to-day, which is identical with the tariff of 1915, would place any undue burden upon the people. The Budget of 1915 produced revenue without parallel in Canada's history. As to the so-called burdens that were imposed upon the people, the taxes were paid willingly and cheerfully, and there has been no undue hardship. In the light of our experience during the past few years, the Minister of Finance can take a great deal of encouragement from his recommendations of 1915, and can look forward with confidence to the future.

Since the bringing down of the Budget a few days ago, another line of argument has been followed by hon. gentlemen opposite. They claim that a sufficient share of the burden of the war is not being borne by the people of to-day; that we are leaving too much to posterity. The words of the chief financial critic of the Opposition were:—

> Are we now doing our full duty, or are we leaving too much to the future to pay? I believe that we are borrowing too much and paying too little.

What are the facts? We were told by the Finance Minister the other day that after paying all expenses for one year and providing for capital expenditure, out of the revenue of this Dominion there still remained a surplus of $60,000,000 to be applied to the carrying on of the war. Included in the ordinary expenditure was $25,000,000 interest upon war expenditure and for pensions. We were told by the member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) the other day that the Canadian public have contributed to the Patriotic Fund, Red Cross and other patriotic organizations the annual sum of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. Taking the surplus of $60,000,000, the amount of $25,000,000 that has been paid for interest on war debt and for pensions, and the amount at least of $15,000,000 that has been subscribed voluntarily by the Canadian people for patriotic purposes, you have a total of $100,000,000. In 1912 the total revenue of Canada was $135,000,000, and in 1914, $175,000,000. The people of Canada during the last year have contributed directly toward the carrying on of the war a total of $100,000,000, 73 per cent of the total revenue in 1912 or 57 per cent of the total revenue in 1914.

In every country it has always been a difficult question and one which has given rise to much difference of opinion, to decide what proportion of the cost of war should be paid out of current revenue and what proportion should be obtained by borrowing. I think that financial people, the world over, will agree that for a country like Canada so to re-arrange her financial affairs as to be able to make a contribution of this kind directly towards the war, is certainly a splendid record. As this debate has proceeded, there has been perhaps too much of a tendency, one perhaps not confined alone to this House, but a tendency that has been somewhat general throughout the country, to deprecate, to belittle what the Dominion of Canada has done in connection with this war. It is right, of course, that we should keep spurred on, as it were, that we should do all possible in connection with the war; but, from a national standpoint, it seems to me we would make a mistake if we tried to minimize what we have accomplished. It is a good thing for a man sometimes to get an outside view of his own business, and as it is with individuals, may it not be so with a nation? If, as Canadians, we could come in contact with the people of the neighbouring republic to the south, visit the cities of New York and Boston, meet there the average American citizen and hear what he has to say, hear the estimate which he has placed upon what Canada has done in this war, we would have a different idea, and a greater satisfaction than we ever had before, of the appreciation in which we are held by outside observers.

I do not intend to say anything upon the question of free wheat, because that has been so fully dealt with by other speakers. There was, however, one criticism that was made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) in connection with the action of the Government on this matter of free wheat, and it seemed to me that his point was not well taken. His argument was that the Government of to-day had adopted a policy of free wheat. He went further than some of the other critics of the Opposition in that he very warmly commended the Government for it; but his criticism was this, that while the Government had adopted this policy, it should have adopted it two years ago, and that great disadvantage had accrued to Canada. His argument was that countries like Sweden, Germany, Austria and other countries, immediately after the outbreak of war, had taken the same action; that they had removed the duties from foodstuffs, and that they had given their people this advantage. As I have understood all this agitation for free wheat, the arguments that have been advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, and the position taken by the grain growers of the West, their standpoint was, not that it would reduce the price of wheat in the Dominion of Canada, but rather that it would enable them to get a higher price for it in the American market. In my view, an argument or criticism of that kind is quite unjustifiable and illogical. The hon. member for Red Deer also said that the world had learned many lessons as a result of this war. There can be no doubt of that, and that things in general, in Canada and in every other country in the world, will be changed vastly as a result of this war; but the deduction which he drew was that, as a result of this war, the Dominion of Canada, having regard for what free trade Britain had been able to do, her splendid record of achievement, would be well advised to adopt a policy of freedom of trade as they have had it in Great Britain for so many years. He compared Britain's present record with that of Germany. As I said a moment ago, there are many lessons to be learned from this war, but the lesson that Canada should learn from it is directly opposite to the lesson which the hon. member from Red Deer would attempt to apply to Canada. Compare Germany and Russia. This war has demonstrated beyond any possible doubt that no agricultural nation can withstand a war with an industrial nation. Forty years ago Britain was unrivalled as an industrial nation; there was no comparison at all in an industrial sense between Great Britain and Germany. Forty years ago Germany adopted a policy of protection, and under it her industries developed until she became Great Britain's most powerful competitor in all the markets of the world. The comparison I want to draw is this: Russia is a land of great natural resources; her soil is more fertile, and she has a greater population than Germany. Russia continued as she had been doing; she had in effect the conditions as described by the hon. member for Red Deer, namely, absolute freedom of trade. She depended upon agriculture; she bought her manufactured goods in the most convenient and cheapest markets. Yet, if the statesmen of Russia could live over the past forty years, is there any reasonable-minded man to-day, who, in view of the events which have occurred during the last two years, will believe that the statesmen of Russia would abide by a policy of that kind?

It was, I think, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) who said that we could thank the Kaiser for the prosperous condition that had existed in Canada during the past two years. A statement of that kind is scarcely fair. We can thank the Kaiser for the war, but we can thank the Government, and the late Minister of Militia in particular, in very large measure, for the prosperity which has come to this Dominion, through the manufacture of munitions of war. I would say further than that, that the people of Canada to-day can thank not only the present Government that has founded this great munition work, and the Minister of Finance for the credit of hundreds of millions of dollars which he has established in Canada for the benefit of the British Government, but we must go farther back than that. Almost forty years ago this Dominion of Canada embarked upon the National Policy of Protection, and I ask you, Sir, if the statesmen of Canada had not adopted that policy forty years ago, would Canada to-day be in a position to take the part she has taken in the war during the last two years. A great industrial fabric such as we have in Canada is of slow growth; it cannot be built up in a day, and it is fortunate indeed that when this war came on the Dominion of Canada had a well established system of industries that enabled us not only to provide munitions for the carrying on of the war, but to discharge our heavy financial obligations in a way that we otherwise could not have done.

The hour is late and I do not intend to trespass further on the time of the House, but I wish to take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Finance on the splendid statement he has been able to present. From the experience which Canada has already had of the operation of the tariff as laid down in the budget of 1915, and of the special methods of taxation which have been adopted, I am convinced that Canada will be able to carry on successfully the part she has chosen for herself in this war, and will win a high and creditable place for herself among the nations of the world in this great struggle.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): The observations made by ordinary members of the House such as myself on an occasion such as this, when the Budget is being discussed, are in the way of a review of the record of the Government, or so much of it as is already written, and in the way of an analysis of the policy of the Government so far as its future programme is disclosed. This duty which is cast upon a member, and, indeed, upon all sections of our people when they peruse a budget debate, is emphasized and intensified when the occasion is one such as this, when there is the probability of a general election before very long. I am not saying either yes or no to the question whether there should be a general election in the Dominion of Canada this year, but the fact remains that there is a great possibility, and even a probability, of one being held. In analysing the record of this Government one naturally examines it under two distinct heads: their administration during the times of peace, and their administration during the war. You cannot examine these two periods together for they are essentially and organically different, and a separate stewardship has to be rendered for each period. If before we have another Budget speech the people are asked whether this Government shall be continued in office, it will be their duty first and foremost to examine the two periods in a composite way. The first three years the Government were in office was a period during which ordinary normal conditions prevailed, that is to say, it was a time of peace as contrasted with war times. I am not going to dwell on the record of the Government during these three years other than to emphasize that in our perusal of their record during the war period we must not forget that just as much importance, if not more so, should be attached to an examination of their record during the days of peace, because the peace days, after all, are the days when normal conditions prevail.

Let us throw our minds back for a moment to those three years of peace when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and I think on that score the Government stand almost self-convicted. We are so engrossed in the war that we are sometimes apt to forget what a mighty deliverance it was to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Before the war came they were in sore straits; desperation was written on their brow. They did not know whether to go to the country and dare the worst, or wait a few months longer, when conditions might be still more desperate. You will recall, Sir, that tragic and eventful summer and fall of 1914, when hon. gentlemen opposite had almost got their courage screwed up to the point of taking the plunge, before things got more desperate. The record of the Government during those three years, I say, was one of failure, and we have every reason to believe that the same policy will prevail and the same sort of administration be given in times of peace if hon. gentlemen opposite are returned to power.

Let me recall the condition of affairs in 1914. I do not know whether you live in a city or town, Mr. Speaker, but throughout Canada at that time there prevailed the greatest stagnation; there was a condition of poverty almost in many of our cities and towns. In my own city of Moosejaw, which before that day had always been prosperous, and where the bread-winner of the family never need worry, men walked the streets by the hundreds, if not by the thousands, unable to get work, earnestly as they desired it. Those are the facts, and those were the conditions that prevailed throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. They had said, Let well enough alone; do not encourage the farmer by giving him reciprocity; we will have no truck and trade with the Yankees; and the result was the unfortunate conditions of affairs that we saw throughout the whole Dominion of Canada. At the time these men were walking the streets of our cities looking for work, what did we see in our great agricultural districts? Great zones of land were calling for men to till them, simply crying out for labour, and although there were thousands of men walking the streets of our cities and towns, the two were never brought together. The secret of the development and prosperity of Canada during the fifteen years the Laurier Government was in power was that conditions on the land were made inviting to labour, and the men responded to the call of the soil, and made possible the great development of this Dominion. And if on that occasion reciprocity had been adopted, if encouragement had been given to the husbandmen by the opening of markets, the lowering of tariffs and the making of conditions more inviting, we have every reason to believe, the Dominion of Canada would have continued after 1911

the prosperity that it had experienced for fifteen years before that time. But these hon. gentlemen decided that they had a chance to demonstrate the success or failure of their policy, and they most successfully demonstrated the failure of it. So, I say, the question we shall have to ask ourselves is, whether or not it will be wise for the people to continue the Government in power. We have the experience of three years at least to test them by, and they are very important years to enable us to estimate the profitableness or the reverse of the administration they have given and the policy they have carried into effect. We have had three years of war. All that is fresh in our minds, three sad, bloody years of war. And we have seen sights that have made us ashamed day and night. We have seen men lining their pockets, we have seen men doing things such as those for which, even in Austria, men are lined up against a stone wall and shot—that is, taking advantage of their country's dire distress for their own gain. For things not so bad as we have seen here, men in Manchester, as I read in one account, were sent to penitentiary for five years—men who had some patronage to give and who accepted gifts, though not a word was said about bribing them. We have made such men honorary colonels or have given them other honours. But, as I say, when we come to ascertain whether this Administration is worthy of our confidence because of its record in the war years, we shall have to consider two things if nothing more —the Ross rifle, and the case of John Wesley Allison. These are enough, in my opinion, to drive ten governments out of power. I do not lay these things at the door of the late Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) but I lay them at the door of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). He was warned—I heard him warned in this Chamber and in the old House, again and again over a period of eighteen months —that he was putting into the soldier's hands a weapon that was useless. But for some reason, I will not say what the reason was, the lives of our soldiers were counted as nothing against the desire to continue the Ross rifle.

Mr. SEVIGNY: Does the hon. gentleman know that the Liberal press of Quebec, French and English, have published strong protests against this Government because they had ceased to manufacture Ross rifles in the factory?

Mr. KNOWLES: I join in the same condemnation. The Ross rifle factory should be running, should have been kept running, to make rifles, not to help the German Empire, but to help the British Empire. And what I have just been saying with regard to the case of the Ross rifle is true of the case of John Wesley Allison. Warning was given by no less a person than the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder)—and there is no more honourable member than he—as to the nature of John Wesley Allison—that he was a man who had never done a day's work in his life, a pure parasite, leaving, as has been said, his slimy trail wherever he went. But we entrusted him with millions and millions of dollars in the service of the country. And when any one criticised the Ross rifle or John Wesley Allison he was declared to be disloyal; it was said that he did not love the Empire, and again they shouted "God Save the King."

I say that when we come to present to the electors the record of this Government that has been in office for nearly six years there will be a sorry story to be told. I will not deny that certain ministers have had to work hard, but the others have had a very easy time, indeed. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) told us: There are no scandals in the Interior Department. I admit it. There are no scandals in the cemeteries. And there is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell)—but do not let me say anything that would be misunderstood. I have not said that the hon. gentleman knows anything about agriculture; I say he holds the official position of Minister of Agriculture. I come from a province that abounds in agricultural potentialities. A Minister of Agriculture who was really filling the position would be found in that province, mingling with our grain-growers, attending their association meetings, making himself known, and studying the problems of the people with a view to helping in developing the possibilities of that province. But we can only class him with the majority of the heads of departments who are only nominally, technically and professionally holding their portfolios, which is about all you can say of them. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) has made a few trips backwards and forwards, and has trouble of his own. I am brought into contact with a great number of labour men, office-holders in their unions, and others as well. The Minister of Labour is known to these people, and they have their opinion about him. He has that honour at least—that they have taken the trouble to form an estimate of him; I do not think that the farmers of Saskatchewan have ever troubled to form an estimate of the Minister of Agriculture. The labour men have formed their estimate of the Minister of Labour, and it is one that I would rather they themselves should tell him. The whole Government, in fact, apart from a few departments, have had the snap of their lives, and they have not risen to the occasion—except to enjoy the snap. The Minister of Militia (Sir Edward Kemp) has to work, and so has the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), and the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), of course, is a busy man. But the others have an easy time. This is the time of testing—not in the drawing of salaries and having a good time because no public buildings are going up and no immigration coming in; it is the testing time to show whether a minister has the good of the country at heart. And, so far as I can observe conditions, none of the ministers are working except those that have to work, perhaps three out of the fifteen. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) has done a little, because, as I understand, he has doubled up in the absence of other ministers, but even at that he is having the time of his life.

The amendment before the House has particular reference to the question of wheat. I regret that the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) is not in his place at the moment. He has spoken on this subject, but the only reason he has given for the change that has been made is that there was so much fuss and threatening on the part of the farmers that he decided to let them have their way because he did not want any more bother with them. That, I take to be his argument. He says the war is raging in Europe and he wants peace on earth here in Canada; consequently, he thinks he had better let them have free wheat. He has scriptural authority for that. An unjust judge once was persuaded to do something only because a woman was importunate and rather than be bothered and have his rest disturbed he let her have what she wanted. But, if that be his reeason, then there is justice for our keeping this debate going till doomsday, because we want to keep bothering the Solicitor General until we can be assured of permanent free wheat. If he is only going to give us our rights because he is bothered, and cannot withhold justice from us any longer, we must keep on bothering him until out of his majestic condescension he will give us permanent free wheat.

The resolution is such a harmless one that I do not see how any person can take any exception to it. As my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) said, it merely asks that we join together and say that we are gratified at getting what we have got. If hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied, they will have to vote accordingly, but surely they should be ready to take their leader's word for it. If their leaders are going to have peace now, and if they are not friendly enough to be gratified because the Solicitor General and others are going to have peace they are not very friendly amongst themselves. I notice that every magazine you pick up is looking for permanent peace. We will give the Government permanent peace if they will give us permanent justice in this matter.

It is remarkable that no longer than a year ago the Solicitor General was not so strongly influenced by this desire; nor was the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), nor the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) as they are now. I have before me Hansard containing the speeches of these hon. gentlemen, and without exception they expressed the view that it would be a very wrong thing to give us free wheat. The Minister of Finance put it on different grounds, but he had two main objections. One of the two main grounds was that the United States exported fifty per cent more wheat than we and that therefore we had better stay out of that country altogether. He has not said that he receded from that belief, and I presume it stands as a orrect statement of what he said; yet, we find no recantation of his views other than that he has simply done the reverse of what he says. Then, there is the further reason, to use his own words, that he was against any interlocking of our tariff. These words will be found at page 868 of last year's Hansard:

> And for another thing, there was the fact of the pact itself, the fact that it was an agreement, an interlocking of our tariff with the tariff of the country to the south.

He did not believe in an interlocking tariff last year. He said it would be a wrong to the country, and yet we find that although Parliament was to meet on a Thursday, the minister, sitting in his office on a Monday, could not wait seventy-two hours to do the thing in a constitutional way. Talk about swallowing himself; he was in such a hurry that he bolted himself, because he could not wait seventy-two hours to make this change constitutionally, but rushed it through by an Order in Council under the War Measures Act. If, a year ago, this was an outrageous thing to do, it is hard to take the minister seriously when he says that it was urgent, immediate, pressing, that the Government could not wait until Parliament met seventy-two hours afterwards. No sooner is it done than the same afternoon it is hustled off to Mr. Foster, the representative of the Yankees, and wired into Washington, in order that they might have it in force if possible next morning at ten o'clock when the customs offices opened. Talk about truck and trade with the Yankees; if the hon. gentleman experienced a conversion, it came to him with terrible suddenness, it came to him like a bolt, because he could not wait until the House met when the matter might have been attended to by Parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: He might have lost the inspiration.

Mr. KNOWLES: We would like him to make it permanent lest he get another inspiration and take it away from us just as suddenly. The views of the hon. Minister of Public Works were along the same lines. The minister used these words, Hansard, 1916, page 884. He says that Canadian wheat has such a high name that it would be wrong to detract from that high standard, and he goes on:

> The fact is that Canadian wheat commands a price at the American seaboard of from twenty to twenty-five cents a bushel more than the American wheat. That is one of the reasons why I say this House would fail in its duty to the farming community of Western Canada if it did not reject the resolution of my hon. friend.

And the same hon gentleman a few days later spoke along similar lines, Hansard, 1916, page 1049:

> We have to-day a position of great advantage with our wheat, a position which we have won gradually by our own efforts. Beyond question of doubt all these conditions justify us, having in view the interests of the farmers themselves, in rejecting this resolution, and thereby permitting these favourable conditions to continue.

His view was that if that resolution was adopted those favourable conditions would be taken away and a serious wrong would be done to the people of the West. At page 1050 he said:

> Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is our plain duty, having in regard the best interests of the Canadian farming community, to adhere to our good old traditional policy of keeping Canada for the Canadians.

And he goes on at page 1051 and says:—

> I say that we should appreciate the advantage of our position and that we would fail in our duty, especially to the farming community of Canada, and more especially of Western Canada, if we did not reject the resolution of my hon. friend for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), in which he proposes to divert our wheat into American channels as much as possible and thereby allow it to be mixed with American wheat, in which case we would have to go over again all the work that we have done in the past to establish our own transcendent identity in the markets of the world.

Similarly, the hon. Solicitor General expressed himself on different pages, for instance pages 1071 and 1073; I shall not take the time to read what he said. But one thing he said was that of the desire for free wheat, 90 per cent was politics and 10 per cent falsehood, and now he is going to give us the whole 100 per cent for no other reason than that he may get a little peace. So, I wish to emphasize the point that we are driven to the conclusion that the Government are not sincere in dealing with the question on its merits. It is remarkable that a Government, elected to power as that Government was, should come out plainly and flatly and announce a change of view on this question of the tariff and of trading with the Yankees. We should know where we are. We are not content with a mere bone thrown to us while they still deny the underlying principle which is the subject of division between the two parties. Hon. gentlemen opposite would like to make it appear that there is nothing between the Liberals and the Conservatives. That is their stock argument especially in the West. I would say frankly that I regret there is not more difference between them, but there is enough difference between them to make it clear that the Liberal party is the one we should support. The Liberal party favours a lower tariff and open markets, and these are grand British doctrines. I believe that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), with his knowledge of agriculture, will agree that an open market is not a bad thing for a farmer who has things to sell. And so I say there is that cleavage between the two parties. But we in the West are not satisfied with what has been given to us. Do not let any one suppose that we are. We are not content with this moiety that is given to us, much less than a moiety. We want the rights that are ours. We want the open market in all things we have to sell, above all things in our flax. We raise great quantities of flax. Hon gentlemen opposite said in 1911 that if we sold our flax to the Americans, which we did in any event and paid twenty-five cents a bushel duty on it, into the treasury of the United States we remained loyal Britishers; but if we got our flax into the United States without paying twenty-five cents a bushel to Uncle Sam's treasury our British blood would all go away with our flax and we would become Yankees. By what reasoning we know not, they tried to get away with this kind of argument, and did largely get away with it in Ontario. We are not content, we want free flax into the United States. Our flax goes there anyway, and it is simply a matter of enriching the American treasury. We want free trade in fruit and many things that are denied to us which we would have secured under reciprocity. Let me say that whatever the policy of the Liberal party may be, and I am not high enough up in it to give a lecture on that policy, my policy is everything free that you can get free and a great many more things than were free under Liberals or Conservatives. Our own side were in power for fifteen years. I have said and repeat that my mind is clear as to which party it is my duty in the interest of my constituents to support. But my mind is just as clear in saying that neither party is anywhere near what I should like to see. Both parties, I think, have too many Conservatives in them, whether you call them Liberals or Conservatives. There are too many Conservative-Liberals in our party to suit me. I wish that a committee of western Canadians could be allowed to nominate all candidates for the Liberal party in the next election. That would ensure the selection of true Liberals; there would be no reactionaries in the party, but as the Liberal party ought to do, it would come out frankly and say what its policy was. There are forty-two seats and will be forty-two candidates in the Prairie Provinces, and I have counselled—and I hope it will be done—that the forty-two candidates of the Liberal party should act as one unit and have their arrangements to act as a unit before the election, and then they will come down here with the power they ought to have. I am not for separating from the rest of Canada, as yet certainly. So far as the money goes, we are paying all right for our connection with Canada. There is no protection to us. We are paying for protection at every turn we make, and it is a terrible burden on our poor homesteaders, and there are many of them in my own riding. There have been more homesteaders come into my riding than into any other two ridings in the West during the ten years I have been a member. Therefore I say that the western members in the future should lay down a policy to act as one unit, and if they cannot make the two parties sit up and take notice it will be a strange thing. We have the numbers now and we are going to have them. I think it time the people in this House understood that the people of western Canada are not tied up to either party eternally, but they are tied up with the principle of low tariff and open markets, and for my part, whether I should be a member of the next House or not—and I do not expect I shall because I do not expect to be a candidate—I believe the time has come when the Dominion of Canada should realize that the best prosperity of the whole Dominion is synonymous and parallel with the prosperity of western Canada. Which has made the whole of Canada prosperous to-day is that the late Laurier Government adopted a policy which made conditions so attractive in our great undeveloped prairies that people went in by hundreds of thousands, and having gone in they developed the country and made national wealth; and it is by a resumption and restoration of that policy and further development of it that the same good, prosperous conditions will be restored to the Dominion of Canada.

We want freedom of foodstuffs, freedom of fruit, freedom of lumber, of agricultural implements, and we want all the open markets of the world which we can get. If one party will not get those advantages for us it is time we made a party in the West and gave the people to understand that we are really in earnest in our desire to get what we believe to be justice in these matters. We believe that justice was denied us in 1911. We believe that a political trick was played on the people of Canada, in Ontario by making one cry, in Quebec by making another. A false, spurious un-British cry was made there, one that was a disgrace to the whole Dominion of Canada. But it turned the trick for the time being. But the people of the West are not the kind to give up on one election, and they will continue to fight. Even if they have free wheat temporarily, they are not satisfied with it but are determined to keep up the struggle to the end that they may receive justice at the hands of the whole Parliament of Canada, from which legislation must come. They are not secessionists, but their belief is that the prosperity of the Dominion of Canada will be found to be synonymous with the prosperity of western Canada.

Nothing can be more sane and reasonable than the resolution before the House; and if our friends opposite will not even agree to remove the doubt, and there certainly is a doubt, it seems to me that they are not desirous of meeting us half way. It seems to me beyond question that it is the purpose of the Government, according to their plausible statement, to give free wheat, and, if so, why not set the matter beyond peradventure and agree to this resolution in the House when it comes to a vote. I regret that I shall not be able to be here for the vote. I hope, however, that hon. gentlemen opposite will then have reconsidered this matter, and that they will show a united front with us in agreeing to this resolution and making it unanimous.

On motion of Mr. Barnard the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. GRAHAM: Monday is Private Members day, but if we finish with private business what will be taken up?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In that event we will either resume this debate or take up Supply.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there anything to report with regard to the proposed invitation to the Anglo-French Commission to visit Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no further information with respect to the matter, which is in the hands of Sir George Foster.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Monday, April 30, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REQUISITIONING OF CANADIAN SHIPS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. D. REID: In accordance with the request of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy), I lay on the Table several Orders in Council in connection with the transfer of ships.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I notice by the press a report—I do not know whether it is correct or not—that representations have been made by the Canadian Government to the Government of the United States suggesting the appointment of a commission to take into consideration matters of dispute between the two countries in reference to fisheries. I should like to inquire of the Government if there is any foundation for this press report, and if so, what matters in dispute it is proposed shall be referred to a commission for settlement.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This matter was brought to my attention the other day by an hon. member—I think the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), but perhaps by my hon. friend from Halifax. I communicated with Sir George Foster who is at present at Washington representing the Government, and I am informed that there is no truth in the report.

HEAD TAX ON CANADIANS ENTERING UNITED STATES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): It was rumoured a long time ago that the United States proposed exacting a head tax of $8 upon Canadian citizens entering that country. Will the Government inform the House if this rumour is correct and, if so, if they are taking any steps to remove this exaction which will be very irritating to Canadians?

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): I understand that a new Immigration Act passed by the United States Congress does levy a tax of $8 on Canadians as well as those from other countries. The matter has been taken up by Sir George Foster with the United States Government.

Mr. NESBITT: They do not levy a head tax on travellers.

Mr. ROCHE: The head tax is levied on those who enter the United States to reside there permanently; but according to the Act, if it is in force, $8 head tax will be levied even on Canadians who go into the United States temporarily, the amount to be refunded upon their leaving the country again.

Mr. NESBITT: They do not exact that.

Mr. ROCHE: The Act does not come into force until the 3rd of May.

Mr. NESBITT: They have not exacted the tax so far.

MISUSE OF MAILS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. TURRIFF: I have here a clipping, which I just received this morning, from the Carlyle Herald, Carlyle being a town in my constituency. The clipping reads:

> Here is a begging letter which is being circulated in "chain" form by the responsible officials of one of the largest corporations in Canada:—
> Mr. T. E. Kirkpatrick, of the New York Central Railway Company, has sent me the following letter, which I pass on to you:—
>
> Owing to the scarcity of anesthetics, operations that cause indescribable pain have to be performed without their aid to mitigate suffering. We make a complete appeal to you to contribute 24 cents towards the purchase of chloroform to use in the hospitals of the Allies.
>
> Please send five copies of the appeal to your friends and put No. 148 on your letters. Do not fail or the chain will be broken.
>
> Please send the money to Miss Elizabeth Whitman, Superintendent of Nurses, New York Eye and Ear Infirmary, 218 Second Avenue, New York City.
> Now, the above letter, hinting as it does, of conditions of indescribable misery among the boys at the front, is one of two things. It is either the meanest, most despicable fake yet exposed or the most damnable disgrace to our Government that could very well be imagined. Personally, we feel sure it is a fake. In spite of the size of the corporation circulating the appeal, and the undoubted integrity of the signatory, we would refuse to send even two cents—to New York—on the strength of the appeal. We refuse to believe that the Allies have to cadge shillings in Carlyle for chloroform.

I have no doubt that this is a fake; but if it is a fake, then our Canadian mails are being used to extend this fake in order to collect money. It is possible on the other hand that this nurse, Miss Elizabeth Whitman, may be all right, but I think the matter is of such importance that the Postmaster General and the Minister of Militia should look into it.

Mr. PATENAUDE: I will make inquiries into the matter.

CONSCRIPTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MACDONALD: In view of the position taken by the Government through the Premier last year that they were emphatically not in favour of conscription, and of the letter of the Minister of the Interior published in the western United States, and of advertisements published by the Interior Department to the effect that conscription was not deemed either advisable or necessary in Canada, I would like to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence whether it is the intention of the Government to change their policy in regard to enlistment and provide for a policy of conscription, or whether they intend to put in force compulsorily the provisions of the Militia Act.

Mr. KEMP: The question to which my hon. friend refers has not yet had the consideration of the Government.

PRIVATE JOSEPH MARCIL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL: I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence to a letter that I received from Louis Marcil, 1425 St. Dennis Street, Montreal, stating that his son, Joseph Marcil, who is the only support of an aged father and mother, has enlisted in the Forestry Battalion and gone to the front. He has assigned $25 a month to his parents but they have received nothing since he has gone. Mr. Ross of the Patriotic Fund, Montreal, and Major Hudon have communicated with the department, but no reply has been received. I will send the letter over to the minister and shall be glad if he will look into the matter.

Mr. KEMP: I shall be very glad to have the letter.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 8, to incorporate The Bishop of Mackenzie River.—Mr. R. B. Bennett.

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS.

Further consideration in Committee—Mr. Rainville in the chair—of Bill No. 14, respecting the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited, and to authorize it to change its name to "United Grain Growers, Limited."—Mr. Bradbury.

On section 6—grouping of shareholders in local societies based on territorial districts.

Mr. BRADBURY: There does not seem to be anything very unusual about this section, which provides for the abolition, by by-law, of the right to vote by proxy. Under the proposed form of government the shareholders will be grouped in local societies based on territorial districts, and the societies will be represented at the meetings of the company by delegates. The reason for this change is that in such a large company as the Grain Growers' Grain Company, with something like 18,000 members, there is danger of a few men collecting a large number of proxies, and then it would not be a fair representation at all, so the proposal is to have delegates. I am authorized to say that this form of government is not a new one. It is now applicable and applied in the Alberta Co-operative Elevator Company, with which the Grain Growers' Grain Company proposes to amalgamate, and has been found to work very satisfactorily. It is also the form of government applicable to the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company. As this form of government has already been adopted by these two companies with which the Grain Growers' Grain Company proposes to amalgamate, I do not think the committee will make any serious objection to this section. I might quote the following from the last Annual Report of the directors of the Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited:—

At the present time out of 18,000 shareholders not more than 300 attend the meetings in person; not more than 2,000 of the remaining shareholders are represented by proxy, and a great many of these send their proxies in to the annual meeting to be distributed among the delegates present. The effect of this is that not more than 20 per cent of the shareholders are represented in any way at shareholders' meetings, and this unquestionably leaves the way open for a group of designing shareholders to secure control of an annual meeting. It is a notorious fact that a few years ago one shareholder came to the meeting with over 250 proxies which he was entitled to vote. Half a dozen shareholders coming armed with a similar amount of proxies could at our annual meeting do just as they pleased. Discussions have frequently taken place in the past at our annual meetings as to the advisability of doing away with proxy voting, and opinions have been expressed of the danger that lay in this system. This was particularly discussed at the annual meeting two years ago when the following resolution was unanimously passed:

"That in connection with By-law No. 51 dealing with the proposed amendments to the Act incorporating the Company, the Board of Directors are hereby instructed to take the necessary steps, and to use their fullest possible powers to have deleted from the charter those sections of the Act permitting proxy voting."

The above resolution was passed at the annual meeting held November 4, 1914.

By the substitution of delegate voting a great many more of the shareholders can be directly represented than is possible at the present time, the idea being that the shareholders, when formed into a local group, will have an organization as a group that would be registered in the head office books of the Company. They will meet once a year, or oftener, and select a delegate or delegates to represent them at the annual meeting. The expenses of the delegates to the meeting will be paid by the Company, and when they return to their locals they will be expected to report to the shareholders composing them the result of the Company's Annual Meeting, and to give them any information they can as to what business has been done in the past year. This is the same principle as that by which delegates are appointed to attend the Annual conventions of the Grain Growers' Associations and the United Farmers of Alberta.

As pointed out this is the form of government in the Alberta Farmers Co-operative and the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Companies. The Directors of the Alberta Farmers Co-operative Elevator Company are firmly convinced that it is a much superior method to that at present in practice in The Grain Growers' Grain Company, and your Directors are in unanimous agreement with them in this respect.

This is part of the report made at the meeting of the Grain Growers' Association, and I think it covers the point.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know whether I am in favour of this Bill or against it, for I do not understand it. If some legal gentleman would tell us the effect of the changes proposed to be made in the by-laws by omitting certain words and inscribing others, we should know better what we are doing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am much in the same state of mind as the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I observe, for instance, that section 5 may be acted upon without section 6 being acted upon. That is, the company would have the power to abolish voting by proxy altogether without adopting any substitute, and if this were done shareholders would have to be present in person if they wished to have a share in the management of the company. Personally, I should like to hear from the Chairman of the Private Bills Committee, by which the Bill has been considered, as to the effect of these changes and the reasons for them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The point taken by the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) I think is of some importance. I am not objecting to the Bill, nor to the provision now under consideration, but I think it very desirable that sections 5 and 6 should be very carefully considered in order that we may be sure that the shareholders are not deprived of any right which they now enjoy. I understand that, on account of the large number of shareholders, it may be deemed advisable to enact a by-law providing that the shareholders shall not vote by proxy. It is clear that it is anticipated that the shareholders cannot be present at the meetings, and as there seems to be objection to the proxy principle applying, it is proposed that the shareholders shall be grouped in local societies, the grouping to be determined by the directors, if they are authorized to do so by by-law of the shareholders. Now the question that arises—it may be provided for elsewhere in the Bill, but I do not see it in this section—is how the delegates from the local society are to be chosen. It seems that the warrant for this legislation is that no step can be taken except under by-law approved by a vote of the shareholders. The other question that arises is that mentioned by the Solicitor General, that we shall be taking away the right of voting by proxy, because it is not clear that section 5 is dependent upon the action taken under section 6. I do not desire to delay the passage of the Bill, but think it might be well, as several members appear to be in doubt as to the effect of the provision and as it is desirable that the legislation, when passed, should be complete, that the Bill should be allowed to stand until we get an explanation covering these and any other points that may call for consideration.

Mr. GRAHAM: As some words of the old statute are omitted and others substituted, there should be some person to tell us what the old statute is and what the effects of each change will be. Otherwise, we are working in the dark.

Mr. NESBITT: Personally, I do not see the object of doing away with voting by proxy—the fact that the Company is a large one does not seem to me a sufficient reason, for there are many companies in the world much larger than this that vote by proxy. Under the Bill, power is given to the directors to vary the districts for which representatives shall be chosen. Is not that putting a great deal of power in the hands of the directors? They might not give proper notice of changes, and I think that provision should be made that notice shall be given before the districts are varied. I tried to follow the statement of the promoter of the Bill (Mr. Bradbury), but did not quite catch why this change from proxies to delegates is wanted.

Mr. BRADBURY: The reasons were given by Mr. Crerar, the President of the Association, before the Private Bills Committee the other day. He seemed to convince the committee that everything was all right. He handed me the statement which I have read to this committee. The main reason why they want proxies done away with, I think, is because of the two companies with which they are amalgamating. Neither of these companies allow proxies and the Grain Growers are asking to be amalgamated with these two companies.

Mr. NESBITT: What are the other companies?

Mr. BRADBURY: The Alberta Co-operative Elevator Company and the Grain Growers Company amalgamated with the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company and with the United Farmers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is not a delegate a proxy? What is the difference?

Mr. BRADBURY: I presume that would be so, but a delegate would be chosen at a meeting of shareholders.

Mr. GRAHAM: A shareholder acting as a delegate will vote for a certain number of shareholders besides himself. Really he will have a proxy for the society he represents.

Mr. BRADBURY: That question was asked and the understanding is that a delegate would only have one vote.

Mr. NESBITT: He will not have a written proxy but he will represent a certain number of shareholders.

Mr. BRADBURY: He will only have one vote.

Mr. NESBITT: But every delegate having one vote will represent a number of others who would vote if there were proxies.

Mr. BRADBURY: Perhaps. I think this will appeal to some hon. gentlemen who know how proxies work out at political conventions. It is really on the same principle. The proxies might come in the pocket of one man and the Grain Growers are trying to protect themselves against that sort of thing. However, I accept the suggestion of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think I should point out the principal reason why the Grain Growers Grain Company are asking for this change in their form of Government in order to do away with proxy voting. There are over 18,000 shareholders. Each of these shareholders has a vote; that is a man with one share has the same voting power as a man with ten shares. There have not yet been at any of their annual or other meetings, I understand, over 300 shareholders out of 18,000. On one occasion a man came in with some 400 proxies. It would be the easiest matter in the world for three or four men to spend a little time or a little money, in writing for proxies, come to the annual meeting, vote the president and directors out of business, change the whole system and set aside the wishes of the great majority of shareholders. This has been found to work well in actual practice with the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company, another huge company, not connected with the Grain Growers Grain Company, but a company that handles between 10,000,000 and 20,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. They have some 230 elevators throughout Saskatchewan and applications are in for some 300 more. They adopt the same system in their government. The Alberta Co-operative Elevator Company also adopt the same principle, and it has been found to work very well. This request comes from the Grain Growers Grain Company, and it is based on a resolution passed unanimously by their directors. Personally, I think it is in the interest of the individual shareholders that this change in the government should be made, when you consider the fact that under the amalgamation their shareholders will extend from here to Banff. While I think it is right, I am quite agreeable to the suggestion made by the hon. Minister of Finance that the matter should stand over until another day in case there is any real objection. At the present time I do not know of any real objection to it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the wording the same as in the provincial statutes, which enable them to appoint delegates for these two Alberta and Saskatchewan companies?

Mr. TURRIFF: I could not say.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

THE RACING FORM.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Is the Minister of Justice aware as to whether or not the Post Office Department excluded from the mails The Racing Form, published in the United States?

2. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the said publication is finding its way into Canada through the agency of the express companies?

3. Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent the coming into Canada of the said publication through the agency of the Express Companies?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Minister of Justice has no information upon the subject of these questions except that upon inquiry of the Deputy Postmaster General he is informed that the attention of the Post Office Department was called to the fact that the Daily Racing Form was publishing racing tips, so-called stable information, and practicing other incitements to betting, and an order prohibiting the paper was therefore issued by the Post Office Department on 25th February, 1916. Subsequently, however, the publishers of the Daily Racing Form wrote to say that the issues which had been specially objected to as containing racing tips had been sent by mistake to Canadian subscribers; that the Canadian edition was not intended to contain advertisements of sellers of tips, and that it was the intention of the publishers to conform scrupulously to the terms of the Miller Bill as regards this Canadian edition. In view of this assurance the order prohibiting the paper was withdrawn. So far as known to the Post Office Department the promise has been faithfully lived up to, and there would now appear to be no reason under the post office regulations why this paper should be excluded from the Canadian mails. In view of the above information, the minister does not feel called upon to take any steps against this paper at present.

TREATMENT OF THOMAS KELLY IN PENITENTIARY.

Mr. MOLLOY:

1. Has Thomas Kelly, who is confined in the penitentiary in Manitoba for offences committed in Winnipeg in connection with contracts with the former Provincial Government there, been given any special treatment different from the other prisoners?

2. If so, what are the concessions given him, and for what reason are they given?

3. Has any request been made for his discharge?

4. If so, what reasons are alleged why he should be discharged?

5. What action has the Minister of Justice taken in respect to the request?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1 and 2. When Kelly was received at the penitentiary the cutting of his hair, his criminal identification and his wearing of prison clothing was postponed upon the erroneous understanding that judicial proceedings were still pending affecting the finality of his sentence. It was represented that he had considerable business pending which required his personal direction, and for that reason his solicitors and members of his family were permitted to converse with him at reasonable times in the presence of the warden. He was in a very critical state of health as certified by the prison surgeon and by a consulting physician who was on that account called in upon the advice of the prison surgeon. For that reason his wife was permitted to provide a chair for him, and his diet was regulated according to the recommendation of the prison surgeon. When it was ascertained that there were no longer judicial proceedings pending affecting his case directions were given for his identification, hair cutting and prison clothing, but the execution of these was postponed upon the recommendation of the prison surgeon, who certified his belief that in view of Kelly's condition, bordering upon a complete nervous breakdown, any change in his treatment with regard to accommodation, diet, exercise, etc., would precipitate this threatened breakdown, and strongly advising in consideration of Kelly's health, no changes of treatment for the present. Subject to the above Kelly received no special treatment different from other prisoners, nor did the treatment which he so received differ from that which would have been accorded to other prisoners in the like condition.

3. Yes.

4. His advanced age; very bad state of his health; large family; two of his sons at the front; his expressed willingness to make restitution of any money which it may be legally ascertained he is liable for; and that though he was sentenced on the 18th November last he has been imprisoned in connection with the offence, continuously since 1st October, 1915.

5. Matter is awaiting receipt of further information, which steps have been taken to obtain, before it is submitted to Governor General.

HARBOUR MASTER OF QUEBEC.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. What is the salary of Captain Murray, Harbour Master of Quebec?

2. What was the salary of his predecessor?

Mr. REID:

1. $3,500 per annum. Captain Murray up to the time of his appointment was master of the Canadian Pacific Railway liner Empress of Britain. He was selected for the position by reason of the special qualifications he was known to possess, and was appointed at the time extensive works were authorized in connection with the new organization of the Harbour Commission.

2. $1,750 per annum.

POSTMASTER AT STELLARTON, N.S.

Mr. MACDONALD:

Mr. PATENAUDE:

The post office inspector reported that it was not possible to receive any reply to communications sent from his office on official matters, and it was only by writing to the assistant postmaster that results could possibly be obtained. He was reported to the department as openly insubordinate both to the public and to the department. His failure to recognize the sacredness of correspondence passing through his office and his refusal to answer official correspondence in regard to matters pertaining to the department constitutes an insubordination which it was impossible to gloss over and the postmaster was changed.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the necessary legislation should be enacted to provide that members of the House of Commons should be elected by a system of proportional representation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with a good deal of hesitation that I bring this subject to the attention of the House, particularly for the reason that when a member brings up a motion of this kind he should be better posted on the subject than I am.

This subject is coming very much to the front in all democratic countries. Not only in the British Isles, but in the overseas dominions as well, the matter is being discussed and in many of the British dependencies the principle of proportional representation is being adopted. Even in Canada a good deal has already been accomplished. In the city of Ottawa a few years ago a vote was taken on the subject as applied to the elections for the city government, and on that occasion a majority of two to one declared itself in favour of proportional representation. Application was made to the Ontario Legislature that the city charter be so amended as to permit the application of the principle, but so far that has not been done. In Alberta the United Farmers elect their officers under the principle of proportional representation, and the city of Calgary has passed the necessary legislation to enable it to use the system in electing its municipal government.

This question is absolutely free from political bias. The adoption of a system of proportional representation would have no effect on the standing of the parties, except, possibly, that both parties might lose a few members, due to the fact that other groups of thought throughout the country would be enabled to elect a certain number of representatives to the House. I know that this subject is one that the average member is not very familiar with. I knew nothing whatever about it until two months ago, when I decided to bring the matter up. I have spent some little time looking into it, and it might be just as well for me to endeavour to explain to the House what proportional representation would involve.

The object of proportional representation is that the majority should rule in every case, that the minority should be represented in the House in proportion to its support throughout the country, and that any considerable body of opinion—labour socialists, our nationalist friends, or the farmers—would, if they felt that no other party carried out their views, be enabled to elect to the House a number of members in proportion to their strength.

In order to bring about proportional representation certain methods have to be adopted. First of all, you have to do away with the single-member constituency. You cannot have proportional representation as long as you have constituencies that return only one member to the House, or two members, as in the case of Ottawa. It would be necessary to arrange the present constituencies in groups of three, five, seven, nine, or any number which might be deemed expedient. From what I have read, I think that five or seven of the constituencies as arranged at present would form the ideal constituency for purposes of proportional representation.

Many members of the House may be more familiar with the subject than I am, and all that I expect to accomplish at the present time is this: after there has been a debate I would consider it advisable that a committee be appointed to look into the matter and report to the House. I do not desire or anticipate that the principle of proportional representation should be applied at the next Dominion election, nor do I consider that it would be advisable to go so fast as to adopt proportional representation for the whole of Canada at the next following Dominion election. If the committee should investigate the matter and report that the present system is not altogether satisfactory and that some improvements could be made by adopting a system of proportional representation, then it might be advisable before the second election comes round to do what they are now doing in Great Britain—adopt it in certain cases; apply it to large cities or to groups of constituencies that are not too large and where the population is somewhat dense.

The method of voting under a system of proportional representation is not an untried one.

Proportional representation has been in force in many European countries and in some of our own British overseas dominions, and in no case where that system of one man, one vote has been tried, has it been abandoned and the old system brought in again. There may be one exception to that statement. The system was tried in the municipalities of Australia, although not in the form that is usually adopted now, and I understand that it was not continued, but that is the only case of that kind that I ever heard of. In order to carry out a system of proportional representation, four or five of the present constituences would be joined together, one of the advantages of the system being that a candidate does not require to secure a majority of the votes in that large constituency. As an illustration, let us suppose that Ottawa, with its two seats, and the counties of Carleton and Russell were joined together, four ridings to elect four members. Were it not for the dividing line of the Ottawa river between the two provinces, I would add the county of Wright to make five; but let us take the four, and let us suppose that 20,000 votes were cast in those four ridings. All that any candidate has to get to be elected will be one-fifth of that vote plus one, because there are only four men who can get 4,001 out of 20,000 votes.

Mr. GRAHAM: That one shuts them out.

Mr. TURRIFF: The short system adopted to ascertain the number of votes necessary to elect a candidate is to add one to the number of seats, divide the number of votes cast by that and add one to the result. Under proportional representation, the system of marking the ballot is somewhat different from what it is at present. The ballot would be printed with the names of all the candidates. In a constituency such as I have described, including Ottawa, Carleton and Russell, there would be four Liberal condidates, no doubt, four Conservatives, and there would also likely be a labour candidate, a socialist candidate, a Nationalist candidate or an Imperialist candidate. There might be several different groups of thought throughout the constituency and they would each nominate their candidate.

Hon. CHAS. MARCIL: What about women candidates?

Mr. TURRIFF: There might be some women candidates. I hope to see the present Government shortly adopt the principle of equal suffrage, and in that case we may have some women candidates, but let us leave that out of the question at the present time. Under proportional representation every vote counts; no man loses his vote. Let us say that in this four-seated constituency of Ottawa, Carleton and Russell, my leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, is one of the Liberal candidates, his right hand man, Mr. Graham, another candidate, Mr. Lemieux the third candidate and Mr. Murphy, the present member for Russell, the fourth candidate.

Mr. GRAHAM: Those would be all the candidates you would need.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am sure my hon. friends on the other side would have four candidates also, including doubtless Sir Robert Borden; and Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden being the leaders of their respective parties, there is no doubt that both of them would poll many more first-choice votes than the necessary quota. Out of 20,000, they would require only 4,001. Sir Wilfrid Laurier might easily poll 6,000 votes, or 2,000 more than he required. My hon. friend Mr. Graham—

Mr. GRAHAM: I would need votes in Carleton.

Mr. TURRIFF:—might not get very many votes in Carleton, and he would require a few extra votes. This is the way in which that would be remedied. Each man has four choices. He marks on the ballot the figure one after his first choice, the figure two after his second choice, the figure three after his third choice, and the figure four after his fourth choice. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we will say, gets 6,000 votes, or two thousand more than he requires. After Sir Wilfrid Laurier was declared elected, the balance of the votes over 6,000 would be divided amongst the other candidates. One-third of the ballots on which Mr. Graham was marked second choice.

would go to him. For instance, if there were 1,000 ballots marked Mr. Graham for second choice, 333 votes would be credited to him, and if that was sufficient to elect him, well and good. But if Mr. Graham had received 4,001 ballots on which he was marked first choice, he would be declared elected, and the balance over and above the number of votes necessary to elect Sir Wilfrid Laurier would go to the next choice, Mr. Lemieux or Mr. Murphy, and so on down through the whole list, the over-plus, after one man was elected, being transferred to the next man; and similarly with the Conservative candidates.

In a constituency such as I have described, the labour men would be able to elect at least one man if 4,000 voters or anything like that number, marked the labour man as their first choice. If the labour candidate was short a few hundred votes, he might still be elected by the ballots on which he was marked as second or third or even fourth choice. In discussing this question, people have occasionally asked me, what better off should we be if we had in the House more labour men, or Socialists or Independents, instead of representatives of the two big parties that have always ruled in this country, Liberals and Conservatives? Well, my idea is this, and I think my right hon. leader would agree with me if he were here, and the Prime Minister also, or any other man who has had experience in governing in Canada. I think it would be better for the people of Canada, and immeasurably better for the Government, whichever party happened to be in power, if instead of having a certain amount of dissatisfied public opinion throughout the Dominion, which never in the past has found itself properly represented in proportion to its strength in our legislatures or on the floor of this House—in my opinion it would be better to have that body of opinion represented in the House, rather than remain unrepresented and dissatisfied outside, because all who have been any time in the House know there is no place like the House of Commons to rub the corners off a man, and where a man of extreme views so quickly finds his level; it does not take them very long to find out what can and what cannot be done by Parliament. If the labour party were represented in this House according to its strength in the country, if instead of having one labour man in this House, we had ten, I am quite satisfied that it would be of advantage to the House and of advantage to the labour party, because they would soon find out that it was not the easiest thing in the world with the legislative machinery we have at present to put their theories all into practice.

There are other advantages in this system, and one of the main ones is this: proportional representation in my judgment would strike a heavy blow, a body blow, to bribery and corruption in elections, and for this reason. We all know that in single-member constituencies where the vote is close and the majority around one or two hundred, particularly in the older-settled parts of the country, the politics of the voters is pretty well fixed; you can generally tell about how many Liberal and how many Conservative votes there will be at any election. In a constituency like that it is possible for some interests, or a combination of interests, who were able to swing say one hundred or two hundred votes, probably one hundred votes would be sufficient, to go to a candidate and say: "You only have a narrow margin, but if you will vote in our interests on certain lines, or vote against certain other interests, we will swing our full support in your favour. If not, we will vote against you." Under proportional representation that kind of thing could not be done to anything like the same extent, and the candidate would be freed from that sort of pressure. That, to my mind, would be one very, very great advantage. Under proportional representation, if I have sized it up correctly, you would get a better class of candidates. Lots of good men have been kept out of politics for the simple reason that they did not want the strenuous work of fighting a close election, with all the unpleasantness that it involves. But in a five or seven-member constituency a big man who was well known in the district might put up as a candidate, because if five members were to be elected he would only require one-sixth of the vote, plus one, or if seven were to be elected one-eighth of the vote plus one, and that would do away with the necessity of making a close personal canvass like many of us have to make at the present time, because every one of us has to get one more than half the total number of votes polled to be elected. But under proportional representation, where only a percentage of the vote is required to elect a man, you would get a better class of candidates, and that would be to the advantage of the electors, and of advantage to the country as a whole.

Proportional representation would also do away with certain anomalies that exist at the present time, but before dealing with that I will take up one or two other objections that are sometimes made. One objection is that under proportional representation the parties in Parliament would be very evenly divided. That is true, you would have it more evenly divided than at the present time. But in every case you would have the majority ruling. We are not exempt from the possibility of a very even division of the House under the present system. In the province of Ontario a comparatively few years ago, the Hardy Government was returned by a very small majority. When the late Sir George Ross became Prime Minister and went to the country, he had a majority of only three, as I recollect it, and yet he held office for several years. And we see the same thing to-day. In the province of New Brunswick there is a very small majority—

Mr. CARVELL: It is big enough.

Mr. TURRIFF: My own opinion is that we have better government when the majority is not too large, whatever party may be in power.

Mr. GRAHAM: The majority in New Brunswick is bigger than that in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. TURRIFF: But under the present system we face the possibility of a still worse evil, for you may have a majority in the House when that majority is representative of an actual minority of the popular vote. This could not happen under proportional representation; it is one of the anomalies that this reform would do away with.

This is not a new proposal. It was brought up in this House by the late Mr. Monk, who was a very ardent supporter of proportional representation. The late Sir Richard Cartwright was also strongly in favour of this reform, and made a speech on the subject in the Senate, of which he was then a member. Sir Richard Cartwright gave some very striking instances of small majorities in the country being represented by large majorities in the House. He said:

> Let me suppose that one side controls 100,000 voters, and the other side controls 90,000, and that there are 190 representatives to be elected. It is perfectly just and right, it appears to me, that 100,000 voters should return 100 representatives, and that those who control 90,000 should return 90 representatives; but it is not fair that those who control 100,000 voters should return 150 representatives, and that those who control 90,000 should return but 40. Yet that is what I have seen.

He then gives the following table:

Statement showing the total Liberal and total Conservative vote in the Province of Ontario in the Commons general elections for the years 1882, 1887, 1891, 1896 and 1900:

Year.	Total Vote. Lib.	Con.	Majority Per Cent.	Members Elected. Lib.	Con.
1882	131,618	132,615	½ of 1	37	55
1887	170,371	174,080	1	40	52
1891	179,451	175,639	1	44	48
1896	185,415	179,181	Nearly 2	48	44
1900	193,417	199,138	1½	37	55

So it will be seen that our present system, while it has worked fairly well in a general way, may result in very great anomalies. This misrepresentation in the House of the votes cast in the country has not been one-sided by any means, for in many cases the Liberals have had the advantage. The year I entered this House, 1904, our friends came up from Nova Scotia with eighteen members, and not a single Conservative, though the Conservatives had polled one-third of the votes. Had we had proportional representation the members from Nova Scotia would have been twelve Liberals and six Conservatives, and I am sure that everybody will agree, whether on this side of the House or on the other, that it would have been much better to have had the parties in Nova Scotia represented in proportion to their voting strength. Look at the present representation of the province from which I come, Saskatchewan. We on this side have nine out of ten of the members elected from that province. Nobody will say that on the basis of the votes cast we are entitled to nine members and the Conservatives to only one. Had we voted under the proportional representation system the returns would have been about three Conservatives to seven Liberals. And the same is practically true of Alberta. But when we come to British Columbia we find that in this same election of 1911 our friends on the other side of the House elected seven members, and we did not elect one. Were the Liberals of that province fairly represented we should have on this side of the House at least two or three members from that province. It would be much better if there were two or three Liberals from British Columbia and three or four Conservatives from Alberta and Saskatchewan. There would be a better representation all around.

I could read many more figures on this phase of the question, but I think I have read enough to make the point clear that under our present system parties are not represented in accordance with the popular vote. Now, I may be asked where proportional representation is in operation. Let me read one paragraph from a little journal called Representation, one of the issues of the year 1908:—

It cannot be too often impressed upon politicians at home that, in one form or another, proportional representation is in force in Belgium, Switzerland, Sweden, Finland, Denmark, Wurtemberg, Japan, Cuba, and Tasmania.

I may say that in Finland, while they have constituencies electing as few as three members, there is one constituency that elects twenty-three members. And, of course, the larger the constituency the more exact the representation, for there is less waste, in the division of the vote. Then, in addition, when the Government in Great Britain, a few years ago, was struggling with the Bill to give Home Rule to Ireland, it was found that there would be difficulty because in the southern part of Ireland, where the Nationalists are in force, in a single member constituency, the Unionists would not get in at all. They would not have a single member from the southern portion of Ireland. Practically the same thing would occur in some of the northern portions of Ireland; the Unionists would have absolute control where they were in the majority and the Nationalist would not have a look-in. Therefore, you would have Ireland divided north and south. The British Government, seeing the difficulty there, adopted the principle of proportional representation for the election of senators in Ireland. I am speaking now subject to correction because I have not followed this very closely, but I have been told that later on, when it was expected that the Bill was going to be put in force, it was amended so that the principle of proportional representation should be applied to the election of members of the Legislature as well as to the election of senators.

An hon. MEMBER: What Bill is that?

Mr. TURRIFF: The Home Rule Bill that has not yet been put into force. But what is far more important, to my mind, as showing the trend of public opinion in Great Britain even at the present time with all the troubles of the great war on their hands, is that the whole subject of elections has been dealt with and dealt with very vigorously by a committee known as the Speaker's Committee and this committee has been selected to represent the Liberals, the Unionists, the Nationalists and the Laborites—the two main parties and the two main groups. They have brought in a report. I have a copy of that report under my hand. This was a conference on electoral reform and I have here the findings of that committee. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that outside of the question of proportional representation, they have brought in a very drastic report, a report that is of a very radical character when you consider the present existing conditions in Great Britain. This committee represented all the parties in the House of Commons. It is expected that the report will be adopted by Parliament and that in the next election in Great Britain the principle of proportional representation will be applied to a considerable extent. They deal with the metropolitan district excluding the city of London. Well, the city of London proper is only a small constituency a mile square which elects two members. They say:

For the purpose of this rule the Metropolis, (excluding the city of London,) shall be treated as a single area and divided into constituencies returning not less than three nor more than five members.

The Metropolis, as I understand, returns some fifty odd members and now they will all, with the exception of the city proper, which returns two members, be elected under the proportional representation system. They further say:

Provided that constituency entitled to return more than five members shall be divided into two or more constituencies each returning not less than three nor more than five members.

That is in the large counties that return a number of members and in which the population is somewhat dense. I am perfectly well aware that it has been argued, and argued with some force, that England is a small country geographically as compared with ours and is densely populated and that what might work very satisfactorily in Great Britain might not work satisfactorily here. Personally, I would not like to see proportional representation put suddenly into force all over Canada. I think that would be going too fast. I would like to see it tried in a district represented by a number of members; try it, for instance, in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. GRAHAM: Try it in Toronto.

Mr. TURRIFF: In Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver, St. John or any of the large cities. It could be tried out there and if it is found to work well then it might be adapted to other constituencies.

Another objection has been raised that it would be expensive for the candidate. I do not believe that. I represent a considerable area. Personally I would like to see Saskatchewan divided into three constituencies, a southern with five seats, a central with six seats and a northern with five seats. I would much rather campaign the whole of the southern portion of Saskatchewan containing five constituencies, some of them very large, and I could do it on a good deal less money than it costs me to canvass one local constituency as closely as you have to canvass it if you want to be sure of election.

Mr. WILCOX: How much does it cost you now?

Mr. TURRIFF: Seventy-eight dollars.

Mr. M. CLARK: No, cents.

Mr. TURRIFF: Leave it at that. As to the matter of cost, I feel sure that the objection is not a good one. We do know that where there is a big constituency we have to spend months in driving around either in livery rigs or in automobiles. I do not know whether my hon. friends on this and the other side of the House have had the same experience with liveries as I have had but they are very expensive in election times when you are driving around and going to meetings. I am satisfied that in a large constituency, composed of three or five of the present constituencies, any candidate could canvass it fully as cheaply, and in my judgment, more cheaply than the present single member constituency. I do not think that the objection is a very valid one. Another objection, and I think possibly it has more to it than the one I have just dealt with, is that the candidate could not become so well acquainted with the electors in a three or four constituency seat. That is an objection but I think that most men representing a large constituency geographically do not know anything like all the electors as it is. Then, instead of having one man around a constituency, you would have three or five candidates on each side and others besides. So that the electors would become more conversant with the questions of the day in constituencies where there were half a dozen or a dozen candidates canvassing than where there were only two. Another thing that has been urged against the system is that it would affect party Government. Well, I have read everything I can get my hands on in this connection, and to my mind the great bulk of the argument is exactly the other way. It would not affect party Government at all; the parties would remain just the same, except that I think the two main parties would be somewhat less numerous in the House, and there would be groups that might affiliate with one or the other, and that in my judgment would not be a bad thing for the country. It is absolutely non-political in that respect.

The objection that I think would appeal more than anything else to the general public is that you could not get the returns of the elections on the night of the election as quickly as we get them at the present time. If you had large constituencies electing five members, in all probability it would be the next day before you would have the final returns. I have here an account of a test election taken in Great Britain, in which something over 21,000 votes were cast, and in six hours they had the returns completed absolutely. In very large constituencies like Manchester, where there would be 70,000 votes cast, it was suggested that they would have all the returns completed within twenty-four hours. Thus the delay in getting the final returns would probably be one day. I think that is not a very serious matter, and that it would be better to wait for one day for final returns if, by waiting for that day, you had a better election and a better representation. So that that objection, to my mind, although it is the most serious that has been raised, is not by any means a grave objection. I have a number of leaflets illustrating how a test election is held, and shall be glad to give one to any member who wishes to examine further into the subject. There is no doubt that when you first look at the system it appears very complicated. But if you handed the rules of the game of baseball to a man unacquainted with that game, they would look very complicated to him. I admit that it looked very complicated to me when I first looked into it two or three months ago; but the more I have examined it and the more familiar I have become with the working out of the scheme, the more simple I have found it. In Tasmania they have a local Legislature of thirty members, and since 1896 those members have all been elected under the proportional system of representation I am here advocating, one man one vote, a transferable vote. They have tested this scheme and have found it to work very well. They have there three different systems of electing members. They elect their members to the Federal House by the ordinary system of the single constituency, such as we have here. It has been found that there are fewer spoiled ballots with proportional representation than with single constituencies, so that the objection that the system is too complicated does not hold at all. In Belgium they have found that this system works extremely well, and they would not think of going back to the old system.

I would suggest to my hon. friend who is leading the House (Sir Thomas White) that if he thinks the subject is worthy of any further consideration it might be advisable to appoint a committee and gather information on it. There is a proportional representation association in the city of Ottawa that is capable of supplying a great deal of information, and any committee of this House that might be appointed would be able to get all the information necessary. I know that if we had a committee the association in the Old Country would probably be willing to send a man over to explain the system; but that would not be necessary as I think there are men here who have for years been working in connection with this matter of proportional representation and who could give all the information that could be desired, and all that would be necessary to enable us to come to a conclusion whether or not it would be a good thing for Canada to try to bring about a change. It might be that after looking into this question a committee might decide that it would be better not to adopt the new scheme, that there would not be sufficient virtue in it to make it worth while changing the system. There is no doubt that it is quite a serious matter to change the whole method of electing members of Parliament. I leave the matter with the House, and my hon. friend who leads the House (Sir Thomas White) will decide whether or not it is desirable to go further with the matter.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we have all, on both sides of the House, listened with much interest to the presentation of this important subject by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). It is a matter with which the general public has not greatly concerned itself, and, as my hon. friend has said, it is an unfamiliar subject, except as a public question that has engaged the attention of political thinkers—to most members of the House. But we cannot disguise from ourselves the fact that it has attracted a great deal of attention and has been given a great deal of thought by men interested in the subject of constitutional and electoral reform, and therefore it is a proper subject for the consideration of this House. As my hon. friend has stated, it is not a party question. He is actuated by no partisan motive in bringing it to our attention, and I think we may all congratulate him upon the fairness with which he has presented it. The hon. member has pointed out that the matter has been and is being considered by many of the most advanced countries in the world. It has been considered in Great Britain and France; it has been adopted, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, by Belgium, Finland, Switzerland and Japan. The hon. gentleman has told us, also, that the principle has been adopted by municipalities. I do not know that the argument that it has been adopted by those countries and by municipalities is of much service to us in reaching a conclusion upon the merits of the system as applied to a country such as this, because their constitutional system differs from ours. In very few continental countries, indeed, does the assembly in which gather the representatives of the people take the part in government that is taken by a deliberative body such as this, or by the British Parliament. In some cases in Europe a representative assembly is a sort of glorified debating society. The executive carries on the work of the government. It has the benefit of discussions in the representative assembly, but the representative assembly has not the power, the influence or the supreme control of affairs which is exercised by the British House of Commons and by a House such as this, which is modelled upon the British principle. However, there must be merit in the system, or it would not have been adopted by the countries to which my hon. friend refers.

There is this to be said with respect to municipalities. Municipalities are usually governed by councils, and the distinction between the Government and a municipality, generally speaking, of a government such as ours, is this: that the municipal government lacks a cabinet system. Representatives of the people meet together in a council—county council or city council. They debate the affairs of the municipality and they reach certain conclusions, which are translated into action. That is essentially different from the system of government under which the affairs of Canada are administered, because the essential feature of a government such as ours—and the remark applies also to the British Government—is the cabinet system. According to Bagehot, who used to be regarded as a very high constitutional authority, the essential feature of the British constitutional system is that the cabinet forms an efficient link between the executive and the legislative branches of government. Parliament, while supreme, does not rule. The real ruler, I take it, under the British constitutional system, subject of course to the limitations of the constitution, is the Prime Minister, subject to his being able to maintain a majority in the House of Commons. We all know that Parliament is supreme, but it is a mistake to assume that Parliament is in any sense an executive. Parliament is the legislative branch; the Prime Minister and his ministers constituting the cabinet, are the executive. According to Bagehot, the link between the legislative and the executive is the cabinet. I do not know that Bagehot's view would be concurred in to-day by all constitutional authorities, but he did advance thought considerably upon the subject when he drew attention to the fact that the cabinet was really a link between the executive and the legislature, and that the real ruler under a constitutional system is the Prime Minister so long as he continues to maintain a majority in the House of Commons. So that it is not a conclusive argument—it may not be a weighty argument—to say that a system which is found advantageous under the constitutions of the European governments or in municipal administration, would be equally advisable in connection with an administration such as ours. The object of proportional representation as pointed out by my hon. friend—I may say that I have not turned my mind upon the matter, except in a very academic way, until to-day—is to ensure that minorities will be represented. Well, I have had a more limited experience in this House than most of the members who are here, but I cannot help thinking that minorities are pretty well represented in this House. I can hardly imagine any interest that is not discussed in this House in the course of our deliberations during a session of Parliament. I rather incline to the view that many

5 p.m. opinions are put forward in this House that are not supported by any interest in the country. One of the functions of a House undoubtedly is to discuss all manner of questions which may have the support of individuals, may be few in number, through the country. That is one of the safeguards of our constitution, and it is one of the most important functions of the House of Commons. That is one reason why I think we should have patience in debates upon subjects in which most of us may not be very much interested. Sections of the community may think they have grievances. The grievances may not be real, but they are aired in the House of Commons and debate usually discloses whether they are real grievances or not. The mere fact of their being brought forward in the House of Commons is regarded with satisfaction by those who think they have those grievances, and the result is that Parliament discharges one of its most essential functions in providing a deliberative body in which the opinions of various minds, the views held by different sections of the community, may be discussed and their merits tested. I am the first to admit the desirability of all interests in the community having, I will not say a specific representation, but at least representation in this House. This House is a great educative body. I do not care what man comes into this House, what his experience may have been, how able he may have been, what his professional or business attainments—he is learning all the time in this House. He gets opinions from all parts of the Dominion of Canada; he could not possibly have got them in connection with his own business. After all the greatest business of this country is, in a sense, a narrow business. Parliament in its scope is much wider than business. Parliament is much wider than any or all professions. Parliament deals with everything that pertains to human affairs; everything that concerns the rights and interests of mankind. The subjects dealt with in Parliament are wider than those that come before any man or any set of men outside of Parliament.

My hon. friend is of the opinion that under proportional representation, more special interests would be represented in Parliament. While there is a good deal to be said as to the desirability of that, we must bear in mind that under the British system, government can only be carried on if the Government of the day has a working majority, and that is where the party system comes in. At present, so far as I can see, it is indispensable.

When an election takes place there is an issue either on some great public question or on the record of the Government of the day. The issue is presented in a broad, general way; we do not get down to details. There is a rough judgment of the electorate upon the Government of the day and upon the Opposition as they are viewed by the electorate, and the result is that the Government is sustained or the Government is defeated. One naturally inquires, in connection with the subject, what would be the advantage of departing from the present system and adopting the system of proportional representation. By our present system, under the British North America Act, there is a fixed number of representatives returned from each province, the basis being the population as determined by the decennial census and having relation to the fixed number of 65 provided by the constitution for the province of Quebec. The anomalies of our system are many; the defects are many. In a city such as Toronto or Montreal you may have a representative with a constituency of 100,000 or 150,000 people; on the other hand, you may have a constituency of only a few thousand in population returning its member to the House of Commons. The result is an inequality of representation, although I believe there is a great deal to be said for the rural part of the community having a greater representation, in proportion to population, than the cities, and that principle, I think, has been generally recognized in connection with the question of representation in the House of Commons. Under our system, as I have pointed out, the public affairs of the country and of every department thereof are pretty thoroughly discussed in Parliament. Every section is represented. One would naturally like to see a more equal representation, but that is not something to be accomplished at an early date, because changes of this nature, very far reaching in their character, are not likely to be brought about suddenly. Any change involving disturbance in the limits of constituencies and the representation of those constituencies must, like an organic change, come very slowly, that is, having regard to practical considerations of which we must never lose sight. The public, after all, are not governed very much by academic arguments; it is practical considerations that appeal to them. They seldom take or support a step until the wisdom of it is clearly seen and appreciated.

My hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) has mentioned that he thinks it is an advantage for a Government to have a small majority. I do not agree, and I doubt if many men in this House agree with him in that. On the one hand, I think it would be a great misfortune if an opposition should be unduly weak; on the other, I think it would be a misfortune that a Government should have an overwhelming majority. But that a Government should have a substantial working majority is essential to government in a country such as ours. A Government that is dependent upon merely two or three votes for a majority is at the mercy of conditions that do not make for good government. The two extremes are objectionable; the medium, a good substantial working majority, is the thing to be desired.

This question was brought up in the House, I understand, in the session of 1909 at the instance of the late Hon. Mr. Monk. It was debated at some length, and finally referred to a select committee of the House. I have made inquiry, but I have not been able to ascertain that the committee held any meetings, much less made any study or investigation into the subject. That showed that there was not a very great deal of interest in the subject at that time, and I think there must necessarily be still less interest in it at this time when we are engaged in a war that is engrossing our attention and absorbing our energies from day to day. As the matter, however, is one that is attracting a great deal of attention and has many strong advocates, I see no objection to the appointment of a select committee, provided that my hon. friend thinks that course is advisable. For myself, if I were bringing the matter to the attention of the House, I should be content at this time, with a war on, and with the House engaged as it is, with bringing the subject to the attention of the House and having it discussed. If my hon. friend desires that a select committee should be appointed, the Government is entirely agreeable to that course. I leave that to my hon. friend to consider. If he desires to have a select committee appointed, then I would suggest that he alter his motion to this effect:

> That a select committee of five members of this House be appointed to consider and report on the advisability of enacting legislation to provide for the election of members of the House of Commons by a system of proportional representation, and that such committee have power to send for persons, papers and documents.

My hon. friend must have observed that it is not necessary to call experts and political thinkers who have had this question under consideration in Great Britain, to aid the committee in its study and investigation of this subject. There are many in this country who have made this question a special subject of study, and who, without doubt, could give the committee useful information; but I would submit to my hon. friend that unless he is reasonably certain that if a committee be appointed, it will take up this subject, will study it, will investigate it, will call before it those men who may be able to give it advice and assistance, he might better just content himself with bringing the matter to the attention of the House. I do not think there is anything further I can usefully add. We have all listened with much interest to my hon. friend and are indebted to him for the very fair manner in which he has expounded this subject for our consideration.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, it is possible for a Government and even for a Parliament to get into such a frame of mind that it is afraid of everything new. We have not to go so far as Russia to find out that the world is moving along very distinct democratic lines, and unless the Government or Parliament keeps slightly ahead of the movement, it will get pushed off the national map as a party. We have come to the point in Canada when we have to be more radical in all our legislation than we have been in the past. The war has taught us and is teaching us certain lessons; but above all things it is teaching us that our ideas on any subject are not as immovable as they were a few months ago. We are looking at things from a new view point, and he, whether he be in a high position or in a low one, who refuses to yield to this pressure, will, I think, find himself away behind in the advancement of everything that is for the national good and for the personal good as well. We have had our fixed theories on tariff; we have had our fixed theories on forms of government, and we have had our fixed theories on taxation. But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the mind of the public, yes, the mind of the entire world, is in a state of evolution, and before very long we shall find ourselves considering things from altogether different viewpoints than ever before. If the war do not bring about that result, then one of the results which I look for will not have been attained. In western Canada, for instance, from which my hon. friend comes, we have people from the various countries of the Old World. They are not slow people; they have come to our new country looking for better things than they found at home; they are in this country looking not only for better opportunities for making a living, but looking also to Parliament for more advanced ideas, and we will have to meet these views, not only by tariffs, by special taxation, but with just such measures as my hon. friend has brought before the House to-day. That we have succeeded under our present form of government, which is based on what we have always thought the best form of government in the world, is not a sufficient guarantee that the same form of government is the best for the future. Our basic principle has always been representation by population. Now, under our present method, as it works out under the Redistribution arrangement, this Parliament is not based on representation by population. I will give the Minister of Finance a concrete case. Take the constituency which he or some one else will represent after the next general election, the riding of Leeds and Brockville. The adjoining riding is represented by the Minister of Customs. Now, the riding represented by the Minister of Customs has about 17,000 people, whereas the riding represented, or to be represented, perhaps, by the Minister of Finance, has over 35,000 people. Now, that is not representation by population, but in this House, and in the Government —no, I would not like to say in the Government—but in the House at all events the Minister of Customs has as much to say as the Minister of Finance; that is to say, he is an entity in the House. Now, that is not representation by population. Either the constituency of Grenville will be over-represented, or Leeds and Brockville is going to be under-represented. When we make our redistribution after the decennial census, as my hon. friend says, we should keep as close as possible, and that is largely done now, to a certain unit representation. but there are cases such as I have pointed out where one member represents twice as many people as the member in the adjoining constituency. Under proportional representation that condition would not exist; not only a part of the population, but all the population would be represented. The two ridings I have mentioned, and I only cite them because I know the conditions, are not represented at all from the viewpoint of Liberalism, to put it mildly. But there are a large number of people in those ridings who entertain those views, and their representative in this House does not represent those views. I would not for a moment suggest that representatives in the House here do not look after the interests of their constituents, whether Liberal or Conservative; I do not mean that at all, but I say that the principles which they hold have no mouth-piece in this House.

Take the city of Toronto as another example. Now, it will be admitted that there are in that city many thousands of men who are opposed to the general policy of this Government, and who have no mouth-piece in this House. There are also in that city thousands of men who believe in the principles of the labour movement more thoroughly than in the principles of the two great parties, and under the present system these men have not a direct voice in the legislation of this country. Again, the province of Ontario, for instance, has only fourteen Liberal members in this House, but no one will say for a moment that that represents the Liberal view of the province of Ontario from the number of votes cast, and the same applies to the other side of the House in other places.

What I want to point out is this: The conditions that will arise in this country in the near future, and which may be present with us even now, are such that we must not hang our hats on what has been in existence heretofore. Canada is a new country full of democratic thought, and into this country are coming men of democratic and advanced views. It is because of those views that they have left their own countries and come to us, and we will have to enact legislation that will in a measure meet those views, and I am inclined to think that the legislation in this particular instance is of the proper character. Something along that line ought to be done. My hon. friend says that municipalities have not the cabinet form of government. Some place have, in a measure. In Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, for instance, they have what is called a Board of Control, which although elected at large, is really the executive of the municipal body; they prepare and bring before that body matters for legislation, matters of policy, and matters of practice for the carrying out of what is best for the municipality. In a minor degree the board of control is a cabinet, and the principle of cabinet government seems to be evolving more and more. So the objection raised by the Minister of Finance does not apply, because the larger cities already have a form of cabinet government.

On the question raised by the Minister of Finance as to the connection between the people and the Executive, I am not going to say much. In discussing these matters we must not forget that we are in an altogether different position from our friends across the line. Their Cabinet has no seat at all in Congress or in the House of Representatives. In this country the members of the Cabinet are not only directly responsible to Parliament, but to a group of electors as well. They have a seat in our legislative body, where they answer directly to the representatives of the people. The Cabinet of the United States has no seat at all, either in the Upper or Lower House, and does not have to meet the representatives of the people face to face to discuss public matters, except that the President occasionally goes on the floor of the House and makes a statement.

Proportional representation, in my opinion, would do two things: First, it would give to minorities an opportunity to be represented according to the democratic age in which we live, an opportunity which they do not now possess. I might say in passing that the different viewpoints represented in this House—I am not speaking of men who are merely in sympathy with certain views, but of men who are actually the advocates of principles—these principles are our chief concern, and the views of these men expressed on the floor of Parliament would have a two-fold effect. They would have an effect on the men who heard them and on the country generally, and the arguments that would be advanced and the discussion that would take place, and in which these men would have a prominent part, would have a direct influence on their own minds, and by co-ordination we would get the best from these different viewpoints thus brought together.

And men with extreme views might see that there are other angles from which these questions might be discussed. This would lead to better legislation on the whole than we have at the present time. Another great advantage is that it would do away with the grievances that certain classes have because they are not represented on the floor of this House. You may ask: why do they not get representation? It is easier to ask the question than for these parties to elect representatives. In many cities labour organizations run candidates. But even though these candidates have the unanimous support of the labour organizations, they find themselves opposed by the candidates of the two strong parties, one of whom is pretty sure to win. Such minorities are apt to think that there is something unfair in our election methods, and I think there is some justification for that complaint. Proportional representation, in practice, I believe, would go far to justify itself by bringing into this House men voicing different views, which would result in better legislation. The Minister of Finance touches a very vital point when he speaks of the question of majorities in the House. Conditions might arise when the best interests of the country might not be advanced by men who had not the interests of the country supreme in their minds taking advantage of the fact that the majority in the House was very small. Suppose that through some peculiar forgetfulness on the part of the electorate three or four men got into the House who were not strong in their views as to what was best for the country. Even in a House with 250 members these three or four might decide the fate of a government. I think it would not be well for the people to have a system that would bring about that result. On the other hand, we know that a government with a small majority behaves itself better than one with a large majority. Besides, I do not believe that the difficulty indicated by the Finance Minister would arise in practice. I do not think the majority could be, in practice, so reduced as to make this a real difficulty. We have a country of such vast extent, and the membership of the House after next election will be so large that there is no practical danger that the majority of one party or the other would be so small as to be influenced in that way.

Proportional representation, I believe, would make for cleaner elections. There would be many candidates in a constituency, and so the clash between two men only, which is now the rule would be avoided. In some cases, when this clash is on, money is expended—so I have heard. But I am of opinion that when the number of candidates is large, as would be the case under proportional representation, there would not be the opportunity for illegal expenditure that there is now. Further than that, the territory covered would be so vast that there would be less concentration of effort along the lines I have indicated.

The one objection that I see to proportional representation is that pointed out by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). That objection is that our territory is so large and our population so sparse that, with larger constituencies, great labour would be entailed upon the candidates. Certainly, it would make it impossible for the candidate to canvass every man in his riding as he sometimes thinks he has to do now. But would that be an unmixed evil? I believe that the system that we have fallen into in this country under which the candidate feels it necessary to meet every man personally and say, "How do you do," without reference to the great principles which divides the parties, does not uplift public life. Many men are elected because they are good fellows. I am not taking objection to that, for that is one qualification of a public man that he can get along with quite well. But I fear that we have to a certain extent failed to grow, on lines of public sentiment, public principles, public opportunities, and public policy. We get down too often to the question of which candidate is the better chap, which will shake hands with the larger number of people, who will attend the more quilting-bees and give more to this or that object. With proportional representation, I believe, we should rise above that, and candidates would not be judged by these smaller things, but first by the policies they advocate, and secondly by their character and ability to carry those policies into effect.

I believe this matter should be further investigated and more widely discussed. This is a splendid subject for discussion before our Canadian clubs and by public men everywhere. I would suggest that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) allow his motion to stand for a day or two, that he may decide what course it is best to pursue.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): I cannot say absolutely, from the study I have given proportional representation, that it would wipe out all the evils existing under our present system of representation, but I think it certainly would aid in that direction.

Within my own recollection political parties have not been represented in the legislatures of the provinces and in this House in proportion to the votes recorded in the elections. I have found our friends across this floor complaining in years gone by that they did not have the representation in this House which the popular vote entitled them to, and as to the election of 1911, we on this side have the right to make the same complaint. This evil would be largely removed under a system of proportional representation. That system would not wipe out the rule of the majority, but at least it aims in the direction of securing proper representation for minorities. In nearly every country cases also have arisen where minorities in the popular vote actually returned majorities to the representative body. That should not be. To remove the possibility of these evils and bring about more representative government, and what we are aiming at is to have as perfect a system of representative government as possible, proportional representation provides a solution. We recollect the recent election in the United States. While the system there is entirely different from that existing in this country, still I might mention that for a few days it was possible that a president would be elected who did not represent the majority of the voters. The electoral vote in two states practically returned the popular candidate. If the electoral vote in these two states had gone Republican, the minority candidate would have been elected President of the United States. A system of that kind should not exist and we should try to avoid it. I want also to mention the city of Toronto, not because it sends at the present time all representatives of the Conservative party, but for the purpose of pointing out that by this system it would be possible for the minority in that city to elect at least one representative. There are also cases where our Conservative friends are in the minority, where they do not secure any representation, and where, under this system, it would be possible for them to do so.

I believe that by the adoption of the principle of proportional representation we would secure a better class of representatives because under the existing system, as my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has said, public life does not appeal to many men to whom it should appeal and whom it would be to the greatest advantage of this country to have in the House. There is the question of the personal canvass. That is largely due to our small constituencies. We are forced into it largely but under the larger constituency plan that practice would be more or less put out of business. In that way we would remove one of the weaknesses of our present system and there would be an appeal to better and bigger men to come into public life and serve their country.

The hon. Finance Minister (Sir Thomas White) has entered into a defence of the party system. I believe in the party system. I do not know of any better system, but if we could introduce some system that would give independence a greater opportunity for expression of opinion in this House it would be better for Canada. While we have the party system, we have far too much partisanship. If we could get rid of some of our partisanship by giving an opportunity to independent men to come into this Parliament, and into the legislatures of the provinces, it would be better for Canada and for the provinces. I presume I can call myself a partisan. At the same time I sometimes agree with my opponents and I believe there are hon. members on the other side of the House who sometimes agree with expressions of opinion from this side of the House. But under our party systems we do not always express ourselves as we think. Under this new system, we would have men in this House who would express themselves as they think and who would be more or less independent. It may be possible even for strong advocates of the party system to see evils in it but if under some other system of electing representatives, we could do something to remove these evils, to improve public life and to bring into public affairs a higher type of men, we would be doing something for the advantage of our country.

I have not made a very close study of proportional representation, but, as I said at the beginning, the very little information I have about it, appeals to me as something that would bring about an improvement in the character of our representation in this House and in the provincial legislature. In my own city we have what we call a commission form of government. We have no city council. We have three paid commissioners who control the affairs of the city. I think it is the only government of its kind in Canada. There are other forms of commission government in Canada but of this particular type the city of Lethbridge has the only one. Each year one of these commissioners retires and we have a preferential ballot for use in these elections. In the municipal election two years ago, on the first ballot, the retiring commissioner would have been elected by a majority of vote but by counting the preference ballots he was defeated. He would have been elected over the second candidate but he would have been the minority representative, taking into consideration the total vote. By this system under which there are first, second and third choices another candidate was returned who was the majority representative of the people voting. Our people are satisfied with the system. It is somewhat the same as proportional representation. The man who has a majority on the first ballot but who is in the minority as compared with the popular vote does not like the system. This system, in my judgment, is the best means of getting the opinion of the electors as to the most suitable man for the office. That is our system of electing this commission government and it works out well. I believe we will find it worth while to take up the proportional representation system in Canada in order to bring about a proper representation of the opinion of the people of Canada in our Parliaments.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the subject of proportional representation received its first impetus in Canada through the interest and activity of Earl Grey, one of our distinguished Governors General. It is well known that for many years he had manifested a very lively enthusiasm on this question and to him is due credit for the interest in the subject that was manifested at that time throughout this country. I was a member of the committee that was appointed by Parliament in the session of 1910 for the purpose of inquiring into this question with a view of ascertaining if it might be made applicable to our conditions in Canada. The late Hon. Mr. Monk, who was a strong advocate of the principle, was elected chairman of the committee. After the committee was appointed, we organized and held our first meeting, but unfortunately before a second meeting of the committee could be convened Mr. Monk became ill. He was obliged to go south for his health, and he did not ag in appear in the House during that session. Next session another question arose which for the moment transcended all other questions that engaged the attention of this country, and the consequence was that for the time being the subject of proportional representation was set aside. I am glad my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has taken this opportunity of bringing it to the attention of the House. I listened very attentively to the speech of the Minister of Finance in which he expressed the belief that proportional representation, while it might be suited to the forms of government in force in European countries, was not of a nature to fit in very well with the constitution of Great Britain and her dependencies.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I said it might not.

Mr. KYTE: It might not fit in. I might recall once more the name of Lord Grey. He is a gentleman who is certainly familiar with the workings of the British constitution. He is not only a stateman who has occupied a high and distinguished place in the British House of Commons, but he is descended from a long line of eminent statesmen who during the last one hundred years took a very prominent part in the government of Great Britain. Lord Grey could not find in the principle of proportional representation anything inconsistent with the ideas of the British form of government as it exists at the present time, and I can scarcely imagine that if such an objection should exist in regard to it, it would not appeal to the imagination of Lord Grey himself. There are, however, other objections which might be urged, perhaps successfully, to the principle. It might be said that while the system of proportional representation may work out very well in the more densely populated countries of Europe, it could not be as successfully worked out in Canada. It is pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that in order to apply the system successfully it would be necessary to enlarge our constituencies. Unfortunately in Canada we have not as dense a population as there is in countries of Europe where the principle has been adopted, Belgium, Switzerland and Finland. Some of our constituencies in Canada are already very large, and if we were to apply the principle of proportional representation to our rural constituencies and enlarge the area of some of those now existing in order to have four or five candidates voted upon by the electors, we would be imposing upon the candidates obligations which under present circumstances and conditions they could scarcely discharge. With regard, however, to our cities, I think the principle might be well worked out. There are cities in Canada that at the next general election will return five, six or seven representatives each, and it does seem to me that if we take into consideration the benefits that could be achieved under the improvement suggested by my hon. friend for Assiniboia, we might well seek to apply it to those cities. I do not think it could be successfully urged that we ought not to take up consideration of this question because it is a new one or one that has not been pressed strongly on the minds and imaginations of the people of this country. There is one subject that appertains to the election of members of the House of Commons that has made rapid strides in the last few years; I refer to women suffrage. Not so many years ago women suffrage did not find an advocate in the House of Commons. Certainly it did not find an advocate in many of the legislatures of the provinces of Canada which within the last two years have adopted the principle of women suffrage. The adoption of that principle by these legislatures has given encouragement to its advocates, and it is hoped that it will bring about great reforms, advantages and benefits to the people of this country. So it is with proportional representation; a beginning has to be made with all reforms, and I know of no better time than the present to begin to take into account the benefits and advantages that might be involved in the principle of this resolution.

I shall refer for a moment to a speech delivered by Mr. Asquith, the former Premier of England,in the British House of Commons, a year ago last August, when the subject of electoral reform was discussed. He said:

> With regard to the Parliament which is going to undertake the work of reconstruction after the war, it is eminently desirable that you should provide an electoral basis which will make that Parliament reflective and representative of the general opinion of the country, and give to its decisions a moral authority which you cannot obtain from what I may call a scratch, improvised, and makeshift electorate. Let us by all means use the time—those of us who are not absolutely absorbed in the conduct of the war—in those months to see if we cannot work out by general agreement some scheme under which, both as regards the electorate and the distribution of electoral power, a Parliament can be created at the end of the war capable and adequate for discharging these tasks, and commanding the confidence of the country.

I submit that those statements might very well be translated by the members of this House in respect to problems that will arise here after the war, and for the purpose of conceiving the best possible means of meeting the changed conditions that will arise therefrom. The speech of Mr. Asquith was made upon a resolution moved by a member of the House of Commons who sought to bring the question of proportional representation once more to the attention of Parliament. As a result of that motion a strong committee was appointed to take up the question. As was to be expected, our respected ex-Governor-General, Earl Grey, was made chairman of that committee; and among the names on it we find those of such well known statesmen as Viscount Gladstone, Sir Frederick Banbury, the Right Hon. Lloyd George, the Right Hon. Sir Harry Samuel, and Sir R. Finlay, the present Lord Chancellor of England. The movement is making great headway in Great Britain, and I think it might well receive some attention from the members of this House. The advantages that will be derived from the adoption of that system have been elaborated by hon. gentlemen who have already spoken, but two features appeal to me as being especially important. These are the diminution of charges of bribery in elections, and the putting of the party political machine out of existence. Any scheme of reform which would have those two results we should heartily support. It will be impossible for the corruptionist, the man who has a personal interest in seeking the election of a particular candidate, to successfully effect his purpose under proportional representation, because he would not know whose vote it would be in his interests to purchase, whereas where there are only two candidates and two parties, as at present, every elector is bound to vote for one or the other, if he votes at all. So the man who has a personal and dishonest interest in seeking the election of one candidate has only to go to an elector and seek by means of the influence, corrupt or otherwise, which may be at his command, to secure the support of that elector for his particular candidate. But under proportional representation, where there is a first, second, third or fourth choice, it will be absolutely impossible for the man with a corrupt intent to direct his energies to the elector in such a way that his vote will be cast for the particular candidate whom the corruptionist is seeking to elect.

Another advantage would be that it would put the political party machine out of commission. I do not know that there is anything in the public life of this country that has done more to impoverish it than the existence of the party political machine. The results of this are not quite as apparent in Canada as in some parts of the United States. In the United States the party caucus and the party primary are a part of the recognized legal machinery in relation to the selection of candidates and the holding of an election. Some years ago I happened to be in a town in one of the states of the American Union upon the day on which both political parties held their caucuses. According to American law, a man who votes at the primary of one party must swear before he is permitted to vote that he has not voted in the primaries of the other political party within a year. In this particular town I first visited the caucus of the Democratic party. I found that the number of votes being polled was exceedingly small, out of all proportion in its minority to the number of voters supporting the Democratic party in that town. I asked my friend: Is it possible that the voters here to-day fairly represent the number of Democrats in this district? He said: No, you will find the Democratic voters at present over in the Republican caucus. There is one man seeking to get on the Republican ticket. He is not persona grata to his political friends, so he has hired the Democratic vote for the day in order that his name may be put on the Republican ballot. I went over to the Republican caucus and I found an enormous number of men lined up to the ballot box. My friend pointed out to me a throng of people seeking another way up to the aisle towards the platform where the ballot boxes were. He said: "You see all those men going up to the ballot box? They are all Democrats who have been asked by the Republican candidate to poll their votes in his behalf." I said to him: "That probably explains why the Democratic vote is so small." He said: "Certainly. These men could not go to the Democratic caucus, because if they did they would be challenged and would have been unable to vote here, as they would then have voted in the opposite caucus during the year." I said: "When it comes to an election, will these Democratic voters vote for the Republican candidate whom they are now nominating?" "Oh, certainly not; when the election comes around they will vote for the Democratic party." The party machine is not quite as bad in Canada as this illustration shows it to be in some parts of the United States, but it is bad enough in all conscience. A man who seeks public honours in this country must in many places undertake all expenses and go through all the worry of two elections. If he is actually determined to obtain a position in public life and is seeking these honours, he must first go out and make terms with the party machine in order that the party machine will support his nomination. It very often happens that a man who is most competent, most deserving and who would be the most effective representative, is not the one who is most anxious to seek the party nomination. As a matter of fact, in many instances the very reverse is the case. The person who seeks a nomination, who has time upon his hands, and who has the money to spend to secure the nomination, is not always the man who would make the best representative if he were elected to Parliament. Under this system of proportionate representation the party machine would not be as successful in placing its candidates in Parliament as it is at the present time. The choice of electors for the first, second, third or fourth candidates that are to be elected under this system absolutely prevents the possibility of the party machine ultimately electing its candidate should it succeed in getting its candidate selected in one of the party caucuses.

These considerations have come to me in the course of a casual study of the subject of proportional representation. At the time when I was selected as a member of the committee I gave some attention to it, and I was extremely sorry that the illness of the late Mr. Monk prevented us from resuming our meetings. If we had been able to resume them, I am quite sure, from the interest that Mr. Monk took in the matter and from the stimulus which Lord Grey gave to the movement, that a very comprehensive and interesting report upon the subject of proportional representation would have been presented to Parliament as a result of the deliberations of that committee.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was about to say a word or two in reference to the proposed motion of my hon. friend from Assiniboia. As the question, however, is somewhat new to myself and, I believe, new to a number of other hon. gentlemen, it may be well for us to have a little further time for reflection, and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and the debate adjourned.

BRITISH EMBARGO ON CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. F. L. SCHAFFNER (Souris) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, an early opportunity should be taken to endeavour to have removed the embargo on Canadian cattle entering the British Isles.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the House for more than a few moments in regard to this question of the removal of the embargo which has existed since 1892 on Canadian cattle entering the British market. Although this question has not been before the House of Commons recently, it is by no means a new one. Immediately after the embargo was placed upon Canadian cattle in 1892, members of the Federal House, some of whom are still members, brought forward long and very effective arguments why this embargo should never have existed, and why, after it was put into force, it should be removed. In 1905, the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. William Smith), who is still member for that Riding, Mr. T. S. Sproule, the then member for East Grey, and the hon. member for the St. Lawrence Division of Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike) who is also still member for that constituency, made long and what should have been conclusive arguments why this embargo should cease to exist. I do not purpose repeating those arguments to-night, because I do not think that is necessary, but the time would be well spent if the House were to discuss this question once more.

Previous to 1892, a very large cattle trade had grown up, especially in Ontario and western Canada, and in looking over the history of what has occurred since the embargo was put into force, I was surprised at the effect which that embargo had upon the raising of stock in this country. Farmers and others who are engaged in this particular industry seem to have become discouraged, and it is remarkable how the number of cattle has diminished, and how discouraged the people have become in producing more stock. It may be argued that this is not an opportune time to discuss this question when prices are so high.

I notice in to-day's paper the statement that even the packers of this country are suggesting that Canada should have two meatless days a week. I maintain—and I have maintained for a year or two—that it is high time that the Canadian people and their representatives in this House began to think of the conditions which must occur after the termination of the war. I believe that a short discussion on this question of the removal of the embargo and a request to the Government and the Minister of Agriculture, in particular, that special measures be taken for the removal of the embargo, will do much to enhance Canada's prosperity. There seems never to have been any good reason for the imposition of the embargo. The stated cause is that our cattle contain a disease called contagious pleuro-pneumonia, but I believe that one old cow out of all the cattle shipped to the old country was responsible and has been responsible for the condition in which we have been placed so far as our market for cattle in Great Britain is concerned. This subject is important as an after-the-war question, because I believe, so far as the raising of cattle is concerned, we are going to return to conditions somewhat similar to those which existed before 1892. A great many young men from western Canada and Ontario have gone out of banks and out of stores and have gone to the front, and I feel convinced that such young men, when they return, will not be content to go back to their indoor occupations, but will desire to go on the farms. Although that is not the opinion of every one, it is certainly mine. We have heard members of this Government and gentlemen who are not in the Government advocating a great increase in production. I am one of those who are very much pleased that we have free wheat, but I am also one of those who believe that in the future, when all our soldiers return and agriculture at once becomes, as it ought to be, the supreme occupation of Canada, the high prices that the farmer is receiving to-day will not be maintained. Just before the war the farmers in the West were not getting, by any means, paying prices for wheat, because 70 or 80 or 90 cents a bushel will not, under any condition, prove a paying proposition. We hear some members of the Government, and some gentlemen who are outside of the Government and outside of this House continually advocating mixed farming. No one can gainsay the advantages of mixed farming, because the argument is absolutely sound that we should not put all our efforts into the raising of wheat—and I am speaking now more particularly of western Canada, although perhaps the same argument applies to Ontario and the eastern provinces. After the war wheat will not remain at the present high price, and perhaps it will not command even a paying price.

Thus it may become necessary for us to go in for mixed farming, which, to speak plainly, consists of growing wheat and raising different kinds of stock, and it is up to us right now to have this embargo removed if possible.

Before taking my seat, I should like to quote something that was placed on Hansard many years ago, in 1893, in reference to this poor old cow that was accused of having had pleuro-pneumonia, and which has been responsible for the embargo ever since; and while on this point, let me say it was proved by my hon. friend from St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) and by others who spoke at that time, that Canada possessed the cleanest record in regard to the health of our cattle of any country in the world, and the same is true to-day. I took the pains of consulting Dr. Torrance, the Veterinary Director General of Canada, and he told me that we have not, and never have had, any pleuro-pneumonia among our cattle.

What was the cause of all this trouble? It seems that the cattle that we call stockers were formerly taken over to Great Britain, where, on the splendid English pastures, they developed into the very finest of beef. Our cattle when finished were superior to any that came from Ireland, that great agricultural country which has produced so many cattle; and I am convinced, after reading all the arguments, and according to the best information that I can get, that the embargo was purely a case of self-interest and self-protection on the part of the Irish rather than because of any danger of pleuro-pneumonia. In the Sessional Papers of 1893 we learn that:

> A portion of the lungs of the affected animal was sent to Principal Williams and Professor W. G. Williams of the new veterinary college, Edinburgh, and naked-eye microscopic examination convinced those experts that broncho-pneumonia, (the well-known cornstalk disease of America,) had been mistaken for pleuro-pneumonia contagiosa. I have subsequently examined the lungs and microscopic sections made from them, and I had no difficulty in recognizing that the pathological appearances presented were identical with those of the cornstalk disease, which I had the opportunity of seeing in Washington in 1890 by the courtesy of Dr. D. E. Salmon, the distinguished chief of the bureau of animal industry of the United States. The differences in the post-mortem appearances and in the actual seats of the two diseases, make it extremely unlikely for any one versed in morbid anatomy to mistake the one for the other. In pleuro-pneumonia contagiosa the true seat of the disease is not in the bronchial tubes, although the smaller of these become gorged with an inflammatory coagulated exudate.
> Broncho-pneumonia, not unknown in this country, is not a specific disease like pleuro-pneumonia contagiosa, but one which originates spontaneously when animals are exposed to cold and wet, especially after being heated, as cattle are during transit by rail and sea. It may fitly be compared with influenza in the human species, not of the recent epidemic type, but of the old and familiar form of a severe cold.

That was the opinion of one of the most eminent scientific men in England at that time. The embargo, however, was put on, and it was impossible for us to send our cattle over to England to be finished as we had done formerly. Our farmers used to have a very profitable market in the Old Country not only for finished beef, but also for short-keeps, which were sent over to England and finished on the splendid pasturage there.

What happened when this embargo was put on by England? A large number of breeders in Ontario and the West were at that time raising short-keep cattle for export, and they were compelled to hold them here as they were not finished sufficiently for export. Trainloads of calves were shipped to Winnipeg, killed and placed in cold storage. The same thing occurred in Calgary and Toronto. Great numbers of our young cattle have been shipped across the line to the United States in recent years. Our American friends realize how excellent and profitable Canadian-raised cattle are, and American buyers are to be found on the Toronto and Winnipeg stock yards buying all the young cattle they can get. I have some figures here of the Toronto and Winnipeg stock yards and find that from Winnipeg 1,306 head were shipped in the month of June, 1916; in July, 1,564; in August, 4,895; in September, 6,977; in October, 9,087; a total from Winnipeg to the United States of 23,829 in five months.

It might be asked why I am bringing up this question now, with prices so high and cattle so scarce. My object is entirely for the benefit of the farmers of this country and of our young men. As you know, Sir, Canada is to-day sending thousands of her best young men overseas to fight in the cause of freedom. They are over in France to-day fighting the battle of liberty By-and-by they will come back. I feel that I should be remiss in my duty if I did not raise my voice, if I did not do the best I can in my humble way, to make provision for the occupation for these young men when they return. I say this resolution is opportune, for, it seems to me, never in the history of the Empire did Great Britain recognize as she does to-day what Canada is and what the name Canada means. I believe that Great Britain can be approached to-day in the interest of this great Dominion as never before, and, perhaps, no such opportunity will ever offer again. I am sure that it is the opinion of every member of this House that this Government, through the Minister of Agriculture, should put forth every effort to the end that this embargo upon our Canadian cattle, which has existed since 1892, and, as I claim, has existed unjustly, should be removed, and that we may once more have the freedom of the markets of Great Britain.

Mr. ROBERT BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St. Lawrence): I congratulate the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) on the stand he has taken, but I am afraid he will find that we shall be received as we have always been received in England on this subject. I have been fighting this cause ever since it needed a champion in this House and out of it. I do not exactly accept what the hon. member for Souris says, that there was no disease amongst our cattle, for I claim that there was a disease and a very bad one, but they gave it the wrong name. They called it in Great Britain pleuro-pneumonia; they should have called it protection, because it was as a matter of protection for the British agriculturist that this embargo was first put on and continued to this day. There is no doubt about that. What the hon. gentleman says is perfectly true—the herds in Canada are the healthiest in the world. I probably know as much about the cattle business as any hon. member of this House, for I think I was the largest shipper of cattle from Canada; I shipped 40,000 head the last year our cattle were allowed to go into England—and that was 40,000 too many. No question about it, the poor old cow was used as an excuse to get the votes of the Irish and English farmers. It was represented that we had disease in our cattle, but as the hon. member has said, there was no disease—except the one I have just mentioned.

Mr. WILCOX: As the hon. member (Mr. Bickerdike) is familiar with this subject, can he say how much the price of cattle in Ireland was reduced by the competition of the Canadian cattle?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I could not answer that question. Of course, it must have been reduced, for in some years we shipped as many as 150,000 head, and these, being store cattle, they would come into competition with the Irish cattle, as the hon. member for Souris has said, Mr. Long, who was then Minister of Agriculture, refused to take any steps in the matter. This subject has been up in this House many times, as the hon. member has said, and it has been brought forward by the Scotch farmers, deputation after deputation having been sent to make representations to the British Minister of Agriculture in favour of removing the embargo. But all this has been without success, and I am afraid we shall have no better results now.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (Oxford North): I have no desire to oppose the resolution, but like my hon. friend from Montreal, (Mr. Bickerdike) I have no hope that it will lead to anything. There has been a great change in the cattle industry of this country since the embargo was put on. The putting on of the embargo was a shock to our people, but, as so often happens, they have adapted themselves to the change. Our people now finish their own cattle and the slaughter-houses in Canada have greatly increased. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) talked about Americans coming in and buying cattle. That is purely a mattter of competition. If Americans will pay more for the stockers, as they are called, than the English or Canadians do, the Americans will get them. The farmer is a peculiar individual, he is going to sell where he can get the best terms; but perhaps he is not more peculiar in that than any other class of the community. I am glad that nearly all our people in Ontario who formerly sold stockers in the Old Country to be finished by the Scotch farmer, now finish their cattle themselves. One result of this is that the resultant fertilizer is kept for the farms of Ontario. The embargo seemed a great misfortune at the time, but it did not altogether prove to be a misfortune. Many of our people are in favour of having the embargo lifted, but many others are not in favour of it.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: It would not do any harm.

Mr. NESBITT: No, it would not do any harm, I have already said I am not opposing the resolution. To lift the embargo would mean that the Englishmen would come in to buy our stockers, and unless he offers a better market than the Americans can offer, or better terms than the Canadian farmer can secure by finishing the stockers for himself, he will not get them. Taking off the embargo will mean three markets for our cattle instead of two.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): Though this question is an old one, as the hon. member for Souris has said, it is a question that is very much alive. The facts are substantially as my hon. friend has related them, and as they have been touched upon by the hon. member for St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike). There was an alleged case of pleuro-pneumonia in 1892, but I do not think that there has been any doubt in men's minds since then that it was only an alleged case, and that the examination which took place proved absolutely that there was no case of contagious pleuro-pneumonia. Within the next few years after the imposition of the embargo, no fewer than 3,000,000 head of Canadian cattle were sent to the British market and slaughtered on arrival, and not one of them showed evidences of disease. Since then, as has been pointed out, not only has the case been debated in this House, but representations have been made by the Canadian Government on various occasions, and also, as my hon. friend has pointed out, by delegations from Scotland and various parts of England, in favour of the removal of the embargo as being against the interests even of the Scotch and English agriculturists. However, the several British Governments have seen fit to retain the embargo, which I might say was made statutory within two or three years after it was first placed, and has been kept in that position ever since. It did not seem worth while to argue very much, for the authorities there took the ground the embargo was justified by the danger to their own herds of the disease being brought from this country. It was spoken of as purely a matter of health. I am not going to touch on the point raised by my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Lawrence, because I do not think it is my business to say what motives may or may not be imputed to our kinsmen on the other side of the water. But I can say that the ground they took, that the embargo was justified as a health measure, was not sound. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) when Prime Minister, took up this matter at one of the Imperial Conferences, and brought it before the Minister of Agriculture, that office being held at that time, I think, by Mr. Long. The British authorities took the position that, with a border line three thousand miles long for Canada to guard, and there being many cattle diseases in the United States, it was especially necessary that they should take any necessary means to safeguard the health of their animals against any possible importation of disease from the United States via Canada. I might point out to the House that while we have never had a disease of the first class and contagious character, such as pleuro-pneumonia, or foot and mouth disease, in Canada, our friends on the other side of the water, who embargo us, have a great many times had serious diseases for which we have been compelled to embargo them. In reference to the condition of our cattle and the danger of disease from the United States, I would like to point out to the House, because it is interesting, that they have had no less than three outbreaks of foot and mouth disease in the United States, the last of which was of an extraordinarily serious character, lasting nearly a year, and entailing the slaughter of thousands of cattle and inflicting a loss of millions of dollars on the various states and the federal authorities of the United States. In spite of that, owing to the vigilance of our own veterinary service, and the extraordinary precautions which we thought we were justified in taking, we came out at the end of the outbreak with absolutely not a single case in the whole of Canada. That is why I say that the argument that they have tried to sustain has proved absolutely unsound. There has been nothing gained practically by pressing this matter very much of late years from the fact that it was taken up on a number of occasions, but the attitude of the British Government was such that it became scarcely a dignified matter to press it further, because it was a matter entirely within their own jurisdiction. The last time that it was taken up was, I think, in 1913, when I had an informal talk with the Right Honourable Walter Runciman, who was president of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries. We discussed the question pretty thoroughly, but it was quite obvious that there was no good in pressing the matter officially any further, and so we let it drop.

There will be no two opinions as to the desirability of removing this embargo in so far as the embargo reflects upon the health of the herds of this country. It does reflect upon them to a certain extent. While there cannot be any two opinions on that point, because there is no justification for the embargo on that ground, I am quite aware that there may possibly be a difference of opinion as to the economic results which followed the imposition of the embargo and the economic results which may follow its removal. It is true, as the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) pointed out, that there are some people in this country who think that the embargo was perhaps not an unmixed evil in that it led to the finishing of our cattle and therefore helped the fertility of the farm. I am sure also that it helped to build up our great packing industry, and led undoubtedly to the strengthening of the big export trade in meats which also is a very important question. Nevertheless, I would like to put myself on record in this House as believing that the stability of our cattle industry, which, I think is of supreme importance to the agriculture of this country, would be benefited by the removal of the embargo because it is desirable that the farmer should have two outlets, that he should be able to sell his product for export as well as to the packing houses. As a matter of fact, the western farmer and the eastern farmer have sold a good many stockers to the United States which trade we have tried to counteract this year as far as we could and I am glad to say that there has been a notable change in that regard and that a very large number of cattle at the Winnipeg and other markets which otherwise would have been disposed for slaughter, or have gone to the United States, have been bought in and sent back to the Canadian western farms.

I believe it would be a permanent benefit to have the embargo removed. The depletion of the herds of Europe that is going on now is appalling and must have its effect in every part of the world. In France, especially, and, of course, in Belgium, Serbia, and other countries which have been ravished by our common enemy, that depletion has to be made up and it will take a long time to make it up. I doubt not that in so far as this continent may be able to supply it, there will be a strong demand for cattle of all kinds, especially in France and Belgium, after this war is over, and we hope it will be finished by driving the common foe out of those countries. As France has not been disposed to impose any restriction, they apparently, having no fault to find with our cattle, it would be regrettable if the Government of Great Britain should maintain a restriction against one of her dominions against which France and her other Allies impose no restriction whatever.

May I say to the House, and to my hon. friend who brought up this resolution, that when my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) left for England to take up, first, questions affecting the war, second, questions regarding the making of peace and, third, problems after the war, he asked the various members of the Government to put before him any statement of questions that they thought it important we should have taken up. It seemed to me that from the point of view of agriculture, there was no more important question than the one which my hon. friend has brought up, and so I took the opportunity to prepare a very careful case, or brief, on the whole subject dealing with it from its origin in 1892. I think we left no argument untouched and put the matter in such shape that the Prime Minister would be able to lay it before the British Government in the hope that we would be able to make some headway at this particular time.

I do not altogether agree with my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike), because, although I know that the efforts that he and many others have made, have not met with very much response, I am not altogether as sceptical as he is at this particular time. I believe that this is the psychological moment and for various reasons which I am not now going to touch on, I think there is strong hope that the British Government, at this particular time, may see their way to do what they have not been inclined to do for twenty-four years, and that the result may be the removal of the embargo. I am quite hopeful of it. I want to assure my hon. friend again that the matter has been placed before the Prime Minister in the strongest possible way, and I am confident that he will put it before the Imperial authorities in an equally strong way. I will not say more than that, because, after all, it is within their right and within their power to do as they like; it is a domestic matter, and whatever may be our views we have to abide by their decision. In view of what I have said, I will ask my hon. friend, as this practically fulfils the spirit of his resolution, if he would be good enough to withdraw it, because we have already taken the question up and dealt with it in a way that we hope will give practical results.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I see no reason, why this resolution should not be adopted as expressing the opinion of this House. I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) that whether we adopt it or not it will have very little effect upon the results. I would be very sorry, indeed, as a Canadian citizen and a member of the House, if there was any disposition on the part of the people of this country, after this war, to go to Great Britain and use as an argument to get something we want our participation in this great struggle. I do not think that position will be taken. My hon. friend from St. Lawrence is a little bit wrong in his diagnosis of the cause of the trouble. That may be attributed to the fact that he has had little experience along medical lines, and, therefore, is not practised in the art of diagnosis. He said that the trouble was not due to the disease of pleuro-pneumonia, but to a disease called protection. I think he would have been more nearly correct had he said that the disease was free trade as they have it in England. I might remind my hon. friend, if he will accept my correction of his diagnosis along that line, that at one time that was a battle cry of the party he supported. What was really the reason why Great Britain placed this embargo upon our cattle? I think the hon. Minister of Agriculture suggested the reason without putting it in plain words, being a very modest man. Let us look back to the time when the embargo was placed upon our cattle in 1892. In 1891 there was a political party in this country declaring for unrestricted reciprocity, for breaking down all tariff walls between Canada and the United States. British statesmen, whatever may be said of them, cannot be characterized as men who are not alive to what is going on in the world around them. They no doubt looked the situation over as it was in Canada, and while they were not apprehensive of any danger to their herds from any disease in Canada, they naturally thought that if an irresponsible party like the Grit party was to get into power, take down the tariff walls and allow American cattle to come in here free, as that disease was rampant among American cattle they would, by admitting cattle from Canada free, be opening their doors to cattle from both Canada and the United States. At this time when English statesmen were wondering how to get out of this great difficulty some person—I do not attribute this to the hon. member for St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike), who is in the export trade—sent over an old cow showing some symptoms of disease, and the British Government said: Now, this is our opportunity; we are a free trade country and all that, we have to have an excuse to offer, and while the danger that we are apprehensive of is that this Liberal party will get into power and remove the barriers, allowing American diseased cattle to come free into Canada, we must protect ourselves against the possibility of this party coming into power in Canada; this old cow which had been sent over by some exporters from Montreal or elsewhere has provided us with the excuse we want; we will simply raise that as the cry, that we are afraid of disease in Canadian cattle, and we will put an embargo on. I think possibly that is the true estimation of why this was done. It was really a measure of protection on the part of a free trade Government such as they have in England. It was a part of a policy known to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House as free trade as they have it in England which, of course, was inscribed on their banner for one election. They will bear me out when I say that they have had a new motto inscribed on their banner for every election.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: That was since the cow.

Mr. EDWARDS: The best way to get this embargo removed from Canadian cattle—and I am free to say I should like to see it removed—is for hon. gentlemen opposite to announce publicly here on the floor of this House to the country that they have departed from the error of their ways in regard to trade matters, that they are no longer going to hobnob with these free trade principles and doctrines, and that England will not be in any danger from that source in years to come, if, unfortunately for Canada, they should come into power. If they as a party would only give an assurance of that kind, the Minister of Agriculture could go over to England and ask for the removal of the embargo and it would be granted at once, as soon as the authorities there knew that there was no danger of cattle from the United States being mixed with ours and so carrying the disease to England. While I think there is not at the present time as unanimous an opinion in favour of the embargo being removed as there was some years ago, still it can do no harm, and I should be very much in favour of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner).

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH (Ontario S.): Mr. Speaker, the resolution moved by the hon. member for Souris should appeal to members of this House in a number of ways. My name has been mentioned in connection with a somewhat similar resolution which was moved a number of years ago; but if I remember rightly that resolution was on the line that the British authorities should appoint a Commission to investigate diseases, if any, to be found in the herds of Canada. At that time Canadian breeders were looking for a market in South America. They were paying enormous prices in Great Britain for pure bred animals and it was thought that it might be possible to gain a footing there. My object was to prove that there was no disease among the herds in Canada. That has been stated very strongly here to-night, and I think it can be borne out in every way. So far as the resolution is concerned, it appears to me that it could do no harm. It will have a bearing rather more in the future than at the present moment. We have not enough cattle in Canada to-day for our own purposes, and it is possible that we will not be looking for a market on the other side of the water. The day may come when mixed farming will play a part and will possibly be the great hope of our western farmers, and they will go in extensively for the breeding of cattle. It appears to me that to-day we would not hear so much about free wheat if the Canadian western farmer had been alive to his larger interests. He has had nearly three years since the war commenced to prepare for the production of cattle, and the wheat for which he complains that he cannot now find a market might have been used for the feeding of live stock in the western provinces. But looking to the future, it appears to me that the number of our cattle may greatly increase, and if this motion were adopted to-night it would not do any harm. I should have preferred had the Minister of Agriculture allowed it to pass.

Mr. BURRELL: In suggesting that it should be dropped, I meant simply that the matter was already under consideration. But there is no objection to the motion being carried.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that no further appointments be made to the Senate of Canada until after the next Federal elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I move this resolution not as an academic question, but rather as a practical question, to be fairly considered by this House, and I would ask for a fair expression of the opinion and judgment of the House upon it. The resolution is a fair, just and timely one and should be accepted by the House; and from the Government we should have a declaration of acceptance of the principles which it sets forth.

On October 7, 1916, the present Parliament would have ended had it not been for the fact that during the last session of Parliament an Act was passed in the form of an amendment to the British North America Act extending the term of this Parliament for the period of one year. Since October 7, 1917, this Parliament has been a war emergency Parliament and the Government a war emergency Government. It was the obvious intention of Parliament and, I think, the opinion of hon. gentlemen of this House who voted upon the resolution favouring the extension of Parliament, that the business which should engage Parliament and the Government during the year's extension should relate entirely to war, the incidents of war, and such civil affairs as, in the interest of the State, required immediate action by Parliament or the Government. It would appear, upon reference to the speech delivered to Parliament upon the opening of the session by His Excellency, that the purpose of the extension was to enable the Government to carry on during that period the affairs relating to the war without encountering the distractions of an election. Upon that ground the question was placed before hon. gentlemen and it was with such circumstances in view that the House consented unanimously to the extension of the twelfth Parliament of Canada for one year beyond the constitutional period. The wisdom of this extension was doubted by some. It was thought by many hon. gentlemen, although that opinion was not expressed in Parliament, that the extension might do violence to the well-settled provisions of the British North America Act, which is our constitution. That was the view held by some hon. gentlemen opposite. During the debate on the extension of Parliament resolution last session, some hon. gentlemen referred to a statement made by the Minister of Public Works, some time previous to the occasion to which I refer. It was his view that the people of Canada were being robbed of their rights and liberties because the Government were not appealing to the people. The statement of the Minister of Public Works, then read to Parliament, was as follows:

Is it, then, any wonder that the cry comes, from every individual that one meets and that understands the conditions, in tones louder than thunder, demanding that this Parliament be dissolved, that the rights and liberties of the people of this Dominion be granted to them under our form of democracy and that that form of democracy be restored to them?

The Minister of Public Works evidently felt very strongly against an extension of Parliament. He thought that to abstain from an appeal to the people was an unjustifiable attack upon democracy. Possibly his views at that time were rather extreme, and were not shared by many hon. gentlemen in this House. In any event, the extension of Parliament was unanimously granted, solely for the purpose, as I have said, of enabling the Government to carry on the affairs of state specifically referable to the war, free from the distractions and turmoil of an election. It was hoped that after the expiration of the extension the situation in Europe would be such as to permit the Government to make an appeal to the people.

Many vacancies have occurred in the House of Commons since the extension of Parliament was granted. During a period arranged between the parliamentary leaders, vacancies caused by death or otherwise were filled by the election of a member holding the same political views as the former representative of the constituency. It is my recollection 9 p.m. that this arrangement, which was a fair one, was not fully carried out. Some differences, I think, occurred between the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government and the right hon. leader of the opposition as to the proper course to be pursued in the event of a voluntary or enforced vacancy. I think they were unable to come to a clear understanding as to the exact meaning of the arrangement they had made in its application to such cases. During the last year and a half or two years no vacancy occurring in the House of Commons has been filled unless it was a vacancy occurring by the elevation of a member to the Cabinet. There are many vacancies to-day in the Commons, but I doubt if anybody feels deeply aggrieved because of that. The rule, just or unjust, applies to both political parties; therefore very little has been said about it.

Hon. gentlemen know that our Parliament is composed of two bodies, a Senate and the House of Commons, the members of the latter being elected by the people and those of the former being appointed by the Crown on the recommendation of the Executive. My resolution asks for a declaration that from now on until the election of a new Parliament no further appointments be made by the Government to the Senate. It is so eminently reasonable that it must impress hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that no other arrangement is fair to the country or to an Opposition. If no vacancies in the House of Commons are filled by reason of an arrangement between the party leaders, that rule should apply with equal force to vacancies occurring in the Senate, namely, that there should be no appointments made, or, if any are made, that the vacancies should be filled by the nominees of the party leaders, in accordance with the same rule as was in force in this branch of Parliament for a time at least.

An Opposition is a constitutional institution; it is a part of the establishment of the Government; it is a part of the fundamental law of this country and of all other portions of the British Empire. The Opposition is referred to frequently by speakers in and out of Parliament as His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and its rights have been well established and recognized for a great number of years in the constitutional history of the British Empire. It is unfair that during that period, that is, from the 7th day of October, 1916, up to the dissolution of Parliament, that the party which is in office by the grace of an Opposition party should exercise the right which it would ordinarily properly exercise, of making appointments to the Senate of Canada. I cannot conceive of any argument that can be advanced against my contention; it is simply applying to the Senate the terms of the agreement made between the party leaders in respect of vacancies in this branch of Parliament. It is not fair for the dominant political party, in office by the grace of the Opposition party, under an extension of the Parliamentary term, granted to them for one purpose alone, to take upon themselves the making of appointments to the Senate. I trust that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will look at the matter in the same way as I do, and if so, there will be little doubt as to the course this House should pursue this evening in respect to this resolution. I do not think it is necessary that I should say anything further upon the resolution. It is so eminently fair that I trust some member of the Government, speaking for hon. gentlemen on the other side, will immediately say that the principle of the resolution is accepted. I cannot ask the Government to revoke appointments that they have recently made to the Senate, although I submit, in all fairness, that those appointments were unfairly made in pursuance of a power which should have been left in abeyance, if justice were to be done to the Opposition party.

My attention has been called to a fact which I had forgotten, namely, that in request to the western provinces, the power has been bestowed upon the Government of making additional appointments to the Senate just prior to dissolution, and I understand that that power was confirmed by an Act of the British Parliament. I am not clear in my mind as to the exact course which Parliament took in respect of this matter; but at least, I assume that hon. gentlemen opposite understand the mattter to which I refer. If by Statute or otherwise the Government had the power granted to them prior to the war and prior to the extension of Parliament, one could not fairly ask that the Government forego the right of making those appointments. That is a power granted to them by Statute prior to the extension of Parliament, and it is one which I hardly think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House could very well ask the Government now to forego. Therefore, I feel that I should amend my resolution by adding to it the following words, which I think express what I have in mind:

> Excepting, however, the additional appointments to be made from the western provinces of Canada prior to the dissolution of Parliament.

I beg to move the resolution as amended.

My attention has just been called to the fact that the Act which provides for the appointment of additional senators to the Senate of Canada to represent the group of western provinces does not take effect until the termination of the now existing Canadian Parliament, and, of course, if that is correct, there is no necessity of my amending the resolution, and consequently I shall not have to amend it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand that by the rules of the House, the hon. member cannot amend his own resolution.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I propose withdrawing the suggested amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, the resolution moved by the hon. member is by no means of an ordinary character. There are some phases of the subject which naturally he would not touch on and which would not ordinarily come to the mind of an hon. member whose attitude was wholly favourable to the resolution. The hon. member's resolution seems to be based on the assumption that the prerogative of appointments to the Senate of Canada is purely a matter of party patronage. The appointments to the Senate of Canada are made on the recommendation of the Governor in Council, and under the constitution of Canada are part of the duty of the Government. The Senate of Canada is one of the three factors in the fabric of our constitution, and the matter of appointments to that Senate is by no means on a mere party patronage footing. The appointments are on the footing of appointments to the public service, and would be better compared to the subject of the appointment of judges, the filling of the judiciary caused by vacancies. There is at the present time an unusual situation. The West of this country is inadequately represented in the Senate now.

Mr. GRAHAM: And in the Commons, too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And in the Commons as well. As the hon. member has his mind on the Commons, I might as well touch on that phase of the subject first. There are at the present time, I believe, about fifteen or sixteen vacancies in the House of Commons. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) is I believe correct that for some time after the outbreak of war vacancies were filled by acclamation, the acclamations taking place in accordance with an understanding that the candidate so elected should be of the party that the retiring or deceased candidate belonged to. That practice was followed for some time. The hon. member states that then there was some misunderstanding as to the continuance of the practice. Well, I do not know that "misunderstanding" is the word that properly describes it. The subject fortunately is dealt with in correspondence that passed between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition. The leader of the Government proposed that the election of members to this House should continue unconditionally along that line. It was his desire in furtherance of his well-known attitude to prevent schism and federal electoral contests during the war, that by-elections should be avoided. As a consequence he made the proposal, in writing, that vacancies should be filled according to that method. The leader of the Opposition, in the exercise of his right, did not see fit to accede. As part of another arrangement, however, he did agree that the practice should be followed in part, and part only, namely, in the case of vacanies caused by death, but not in the case of vacancies caused by resignation. That was his election; that was his choice. That being the case, vacancies caused by resignation, if they were to be filled at all, would have to be filled only after election contests, which it was the desire of the Government, and which I think it is the desire of the people of Canada, should be avoided. As to the responsibility for that choice, the leader of the Opposition took it; it was his right; but the responsibility is his, and his alone. As a consequence, there are a number of vacancies in this House. There are a number in the West, a number in the central provinces, and a number in the East, but the West is under-represented in the Commons on that account. Furthermore, Western Canada is under-represented in the Commons by reason of a growth in the population of that country, and the fact that the British North America Act provides for a revision only upon a decennial census. The continuance of this Parliament intensifies that situation, and as a matter of fact there is to-day a very, very substantial under-representation of the four western provinces as a result. I agree with the hon. member for Halifax that in the western country, as in other provinces, we are prepared to forego our rights in that regard with the idea that we achieve a greater object in the avoidance of an election in time of war. However, the fact remains, and it has its import with respect to the resolution.

As to the Senate, the West is again very much under represented, and I do not hesitate to say that the responsibility in this regard lies with hon. gentlemen opposite, or rather I should say with hon. gentlemen above. Some four years ago an address was introduced in this House looking to the amendment of the British North America Act, with the object of securing for the four western provinces a normal approach to a more equitable representation in the Upper House than they had heretofore enjoyed. This, of course, was necessitated by the increase in population, which had been so marked in that section of Canada. Up to then Manitoba was represented in the Senate by four, Saskatchewan by four, Alberta by four, and British Columbia by three; and as against that Ontario had twenty-four representatives in the Senate, and Quebec twenty-four. The Maritime Provinces had their numbers fixed by Confederation, twenty-four for the three provinces, the three together being on a parity with either of the two major provinces. The address at that time was to provide that there should be six representatives from Manitoba, six from Alberta, six from Saskatchewan, and six, I believe, from British Columbia; that is to say, there was an increase of fifty per cent, or of two members for each of the four western provinces. The Bill was introduced in 1912; I may be wrong, it might have been early in 1913, but my recollection would place it in the year 1912—a long time, it will be observed, before the war broke out. The Bill passed this House with the consent of both parties, I believe, and went to the Senate, where, at the dictation of the Senate majority, it was mutilated to this extent: they felt, for some reason that never found any lodgment in my mind as a logical one, or I might use a stronger term, Mr. Speaker, if I were not in the House, that it should not go into effect until the termination of the present Parliament of Canada. Why it would be right on the termination of this Parliament, and wrong at that time, the under-representation being most emphatic when the Bill was before the Senate, is very hard indeed to conceive. The responsibility for that constitutionally is upon the Senate itself, but as a matter of fact the responsibility is on that portion of the Senate of Canada whose political sympathies are in accord with those of hon. gentlemen opposite. On them rests the responsibility of depriving four provinces of this Confederation for four long years of their fair representation in the Upper Chamber. The province of British Columbia, for example, has at the present time one representative in the Senate, and if this resolution were passed that province would have to be content to remain with this solitary representative, while the province of Prince Edward Island, whose population is very small compared to that of British Columbia, and the other provinces east of Manitoba have the representation they have. Surely that could not be argued as just to British Columbia; a more gross and palpable injustice could scarcely be inflicted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: How long have these vacancies existed?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For some time. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will argue that they should have been filled. But it does not lie in the mouths of hon. gentlemen to say at one and the same time that these vacancies must not be filled until after this House is dissolved, or after a general election, and also that they should have been filled already.

Mr. MACLEAN: But the Government party have had the opportunity of filling such vacancies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But hon. gentlemen opposite cannot complain that they were not filled, because the hon. member (Mr. A. K. Maclean) himself is asking that they should not be filled—

Mr. GRAHAM: The Government cannot blame us that the positions have not been filled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not attaching responsibility to the Opposition for that, but for asking us that the seats shall not be filled until after the general election, something which they themselves seem to feel is a palpable and manifest injustice to British Columbia.

Now, the hon. member argues that the extension of Parliament was given as a matter of grace. I do not think I should comment on that further than to say that when the resolution for extension was introduced, it was stated by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) in language the purpose of which, if not the words, I remember, that it was not being asked as a matter of grace or because of our needs, but was simply submitted to this House, and particularly to the members of the Opposition, and they were to decide whether they deemed it in the interests of this country that that extension should be granted, having regard to the times we were passing through. I apprehend that it being granted, the rights, duties, and obligations of the Government remain exactly as they were before. One of the duties of the Government is to see to it that the Upper Chamber is, within such reasonable limits as may be allowed, kept at its strength. The hon. gentleman says the extension was given only to enable the Government to conduct such of its business as appertains to the war. I cannot accede to that. The Government was absolved from no duty whatsoever by the extension of the term of Parliament. True, its duties with regard to war were primary and paramount, but it could not be said to be released from its other duties each in its proper order and subordination. Let me cite a plain illustration. One of the duties of the Government is to see to it that the judiciary is properly maintained, numerically and in point of qualification. Can it be said that if vacancies exist on the bench they should not be filled, because the extension of the term of Parliament was given to enable the Government to continue the war? I might give many other illustrations of the same character and which the hon. gentleman must admit are exactly in line with appointments to the Senate, unless he is prepared to say that filling vacancies in the Senate is purely a matter of party patronage. I would suggest that to place the Senate on that footing is not to maintain that respect for the Upper House which the rules of this House call for.

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not care whether you call it party patronage or not, if you admit that the Government has the appointment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have the appointment, just as we have the appointment of judges, and I put these appointments to the Senate upon the same footing. I did not say this was political patronage, but I say that this resolution can only be justified on the assumption that appointments to the Senate are matters of political patronage, and I do not think that is a fair or dignified position in which to place the Senate. The passing of the resolution would leave a large portion of the country in a condition of gross under-representation, in the Senate even more gross than that which it suffers under by reason of the action of friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in this House. The functions of the Government are still just as wide and as important as they were before the extension, and from those duties the Government cannot absolve itself. Nor could it fulfil its duties as a Government were the resolution to pass.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (South Renfrew): This question, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) has said, is a very important one. I am glad he takes the ground that appointments to the Senate are not a matter of party patronage. I think I have heard, perhaps not the hon. gentleman himself, but members who are very close to him insinuate some years ago that these appointments were matters of party patronage. This much, I think, all members of the House will agree to, that, in the main, whichever party is in power, that party notices that the best men to go into the Senate are its own supporters. Call that by any name you like, but I would not for a moment say that it was derogatory to the Senate, because I am of the opinion that, on the whole, the Upper Chamber of Canada is a great credit to the country, and that its members bring to the consideration of many questions that we discuss in this House a mature experience and unbiased judgment ,which, perhaps, sometimes some of us in the heat of political conflict might not possess. The Solicitor General has referred to the question of the under-representation of the West in the Senate, but I would call his attention to the fact that the West is under-represented also in the House of Commons. My hon. friend argues that a portion of this Parliament ought to have new representation from the West, but the other portion is debarred under the British North America Act from having any similar increase. There is only one way by which Parliament as a whole can give to the West a proper representation, and that is by a general election. But the Solicitor General intimates that that would not be a good thing for the country, and says that the West, like the East, is prepared to get along without its full representation until the war is over. If that argument be good in one case why not in another? If it be good for the House of Commons, why not for the Senate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not need an election in the Senate.

Mr. GRAHAM: But while the hon. member is willing that one section of Parliament should be fully representative, he is willing that the other section, though it represents the people directly, should not be fully representative. In other words, that the branch of Parliament which is appointed by the Government should be filled up to its capacity while the people should be deprived of having their representation sent to the House of Commons. The Government, in the words of my hon. friend, has the right to do that thing, but they say that the people ought to be deprived of their representation in the other Chamber. The reason for which the Senate made a certain amendment, I think, is quite clear. As stated by the Solicitor General, this extra representation comes after the decennial census is taken. That is why there is a shortage of representation in the West in both Houses. The Senate takes the ground, and rightly so, that this new representation would come when Parliament in its entirety would have that representation, when the people would have a chance of voting on the extra representation in the House just as the Government would have the right to complete the representation by appointments to the Senate. They did add an amendment which is not unfair to the people, but which is eminently fair to the people, and much fairer to the people than that the Government should send its appointees to the Senate while the people were deprived of the right to send their representatives to the House of Commons. What does the section say:

> The first section of this Act, paragraphs 1 to 6 inclusive, shall not take effect until the termination of the now existing Canadian Parliament.

I am not going to argue when that time arrives, but one thing is sure, that this Government accepted that amendment when it said that new appointments to the Senate from western Canada could not be made till after the dissolution of Parliament. Some eminent lawyers say that these appointments could not be made until the new Parliament is elected. I leave that to the House to discuss. But, it is certain that new appointments cannot be made until after the dissolution takes place. I think that is not unfair.

The Solicitor General gave an outline of a certain arrangement or understanding that had taken place between the two leaders. In the main I think he was correct although he adroitly attributed—I would not say motives—but a certain frame of mind to the leader of the Opposition, although he admitted that he had a right to be in that frame of mind if he so desired. As I remember, this is what occurred: An arrangement was made by which certain constituencies then vacant should be allowed to return their members to the House of Commons in the bye-elections without a contest, the members so returned to be of the same political stripe as their predecessors. That was fair when the vacancies took place in the ordinary course through the death of the member. But a condition arose—I do not want to go into the horrible details—under which I submit neither the Minister of Finance nor the Solicitor General nor any hon. member on that side of the House would say it was reasonable that the constitutencies of Carleton in Ontario and Kings in Nova Scotia would come under any such arrangement on account of the manner in which they had become vacant. It was possible—yes, more than possible—that one of the very gentlemen who was asked to retire by the leader of the Government would have again been elected by acclamation in one of these constituencies. Under these circumstances the leader of the Opposition very rightly took the ground that he could not consent to these constituencies having their representatives returned by acclamation. Then, in Manitoba, two members retired, not for appointments to positions, though they both received appointments since. They retired solely for political purposes. Sir James Aikins and now Senator Sharpe, then members of this House, retired for the purpose of accepting the leadership and management of the campaign of the Conservative party in Manitoba. In view of these two retirements for the purposes named, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they think the leader of the Opposition would have been doing his duty to the people of this country had he consented to successors being elected to these two gentlemen without a contest. These are the constituencies that were in question. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, the argument of the Solicitor General as to there being a departure by the leader of the Opposition rather vanishes, because he adhered to his former proposal in so far as vacancies would occur through death to allow successors to be appointed, but this arrangement could not apply to members who had retired under the conditions which I have named.

The Solicitor General says Senate appointments are not party patronage, but appointments have been made for party advantage. It was understood that we were to have no bye-elections and if, under the amendment to the Act made by the Senate itself for the representation in its own body, it having a perfect right to decide that question for itself, these conditions exist both east and west with respect to the Commons, why should the Government take advantage of the situation to appoint their own men to one branch of this Parliament while by general consent on the one hand and by statute on the other there were to be no members elected to the House? Technically speaking, the Government have a perfect right to do it, but I believe if the spirit and intent of the arrangement had been carried out no appointment would have been made to the Senate under the present circumstances. The member for Halifax is not questioning the right, but he is calling the attention of the House and the country to the fact by way of resolution that while no vacancies are filled in the House of Commons except by the consent of the parties, the Government should not exercise its technical right and appoint members to the Upper Chamber.

[Mr. Graham.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), in bringing forward this motion, gives the ground on which it is based. As far as I gathered from his remarks, his argument was put forward not for the reason that the general public interest was in any way injured by further appointments to the Senate which this Government might make. I did not understand him either to say that any of the sections of Canada entitled to senatorial representation would be in any way injured by the continuance of appointments to the Senate by the Government. I did understand him to use this argument: that the sole ground upon which he puts forward this motion is that it is to the political disadvantage of the party opposite that the Government should continue to make these appointments.

In other words, he says it is an advantage to the Government to exercise, I should not say this patronage, but the power of appointment which they possess under the British North America Act in filling senatorial vacancies as they occur. My hon. friend said further that this Government was in office by the grace of the Opposition. I submit that that is an unfair, an improper and an erroneous statement as to the existing situation. This Government is in power in the same sense as it was in power in 1912, in 1913, in 1914 and in 1915, precisely in the same sense. It is here exercising all the powers which a Government may exercise under the British North America Act without any exception whatsoever. We are not only carrying on the war, but we are carrying on the civil administration of this country, carrying on all the business in all the departments of Government, and making all appointments which it is within the jurisdiction and province of a Government to make under the constitution. There is no curtailment, so far as I know, in any sense whatever. What does that mean? It means that this Government has the full obligation of carrying on the business of the country, including the making of these appointments to the Senate. That is the obligation devolving upon us, and with that obligation goes the responsibility. The Senate is a branch of this Legislature, and it is the duty of the Government of the day to fill the vacancies in the Senate as they arise, at all events to fill them within a reasonable time. When the question of this extension was considered, as the Solicitor General said, the Government came down and submitted its views to the House, and the Opposition acquiesced in those views. They properly acquiesced in those views because the country, as a matter of fact, acquiesced in them. It was not only the consensus of opinion in this House that an extension of Parliament should be granted, but it was also the consensus of opinion in the country. So that no question can possibly arise as to the position of this Government under the extension. It is precisely the same as its position was in any year since its accession to power in 1911, all the duties of Government devolving upon us, all the responsibilities of Government, and all the powers. We have not been dispossessed of any.

My hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. Graham) says: If you are unwilling to allow the vacancies in the Senate to go unfilled, why are the vacancies in the House of Commons allowed to go unfilled? He said: Why should the vacancies continue in this House if you fill them in the Upper House?

Mr. GRAHAM: I put it the other way around.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: So long as I put it properly.

Mr. GRAHAM: Improperly from my standpoint.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will my hon. friend correct me?

Mr. GRAHAM: Put it the reverse way.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend said in substance: You have vacancies in the House of Commons; you do not fill these; but you do fill the vacancies in the Senate, or you are unwilling to say you will not fill them.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is better.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It seems to me that there is a perfectly clear distinction for precisely the same reason that the extension of Parliament was granted. Why was the extension of Parliament granted? Was it because there was any thought of party advantage or disadvantage? Not by any means. The extension was granted because it was the consensus of opinion in this House and in this country that it would be a monstrous thing to hold a general election in Canada in time of war.

Mr. GRAHAM: Notwithstanding the ballots?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was the reason for extending the life of Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Who ever said it would be a monstrous thing?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend thinks that the term monstrous is not strong enough, then if he rises to his feet I know his power of language and he will be able to employ a term which will express the proper degree of turpitude of such a suggestion.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is too strong altogether.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Last year we had the greatest war in the history of the world, progressing upon a scale unparalleled in human history. We had our soldiers going overseas; we had them by tens of thousands at the front. We had the papers filled, as they are to-day, with lists of casualties; we had homes darkened with sorrow, and hearts broken with grief. We had this country carrying a burden of care such as never before

Mr. PUGSLEY: Even including this Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Prime Minister then came down to this House and said: Our view is that there should be an extension of the life of Parliament. That was acquiesced in by the Opposition. Why? We all realized the situation that would result from a general election at that time. Here were ministers of the Crown engaged practically day and night in the discharge of the onerous duties devolving upon them in this war.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister of Labour—

Mr. REID: The Minister of Labour is doing his part.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Minister of Labour has exceedingly heavy duties devolving upon him in connection with this war. How it would be possible to carry on a general election with the duties, urgent, immediate, and all-important, devolving upon ministers of the Crown at the time an extension was granted, I think no one can conceive. Those were the grounds, and in addition to those grounds the further ground of the public turmoil and the excitement that would take place over this country and the diversion of the activities of the people from the war, the all-important question of the hour, to the hustings and an election campaign, with the ensuing disturbance, not to say the ill-will that might result. All those considerations apply to contested elections to the House of Commons because it is the people's Chamber, but not at all to appointments to the Senate. The Government of the day is empowered, authorized and obligated under the constitution to fill vacancies in the Senate, and that is what this Government has been doing. It is one of the ordinary duties devolving upon Government, and the Government is discharging it, and would not, I think, be justified in undertaking to refrain from discharging it. The mere fact that some party advantage may accrue to this side or some disadvantage to the other side is at this time of no national significance. If hon. gentlemen opposite had chanced to be in power when the war broke out, an extension would have been granted in the same way, and they would have gone ahead exercising the powers of Government, including the power of making appointments to the Senate. It chanced that this Government was in at the time war broke out, and we proceeded and have been proceeding with our duties, carrying on the affairs of the country, including the prosecution of the war, the making of appointments, and all other duties devolving upon us. So that, analyzing this down to the very last analysis, my hon friend's only grievance is not that the public interest is in any way infringed on, not that here is any detriment to any province or any section of Canada entitled to senatorial representation, but simply this: you should not make these appointments because you would probably make them from those who are friendly to the Government and not friendly to us. I do not believe that the public are very much interested in that question at this time. They would probably say: Well, the Conservative Government is in power; if the Liberal Government had been in power they would have continued to carry on the business of government inclusive of making appointments to the Senate. But there is a very clear distinction when it comes to holding election campaigns throughout the country in time of war, and that is the distinction which I believe the public will make. I have been unable to discover any reason whatever, except from a purely party standpoint and the consideration of alleged party advantage, why this resolution should be adopted by the House.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): It will be observed that the Minister of Finance, in speaking to this motion, instead of discussing the resolution of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has treated us to a homily on the question as to whether or not it is wise to extend the life of Parliament. The question of the extension of Parliament is not before the House at this time; if it is submitted by hon. gentlemen opposite, it will be discussed upon its merits in the light of our duty to the people, and we shall be prepared to take the responsibility of whatever course we decide upon.

The resolution of the hon. member for Halifax affirms the principle that during the period of extension of the term of Parliament beyond the time set forth by the provisions of the British North America Act, this Government should refrain from making appointments to the other Chamber. By consent of the Government itself, the appointment of additional senators in the western provinces has been deferred until after the termination of this Parliament. The Solicitor General has told us that this was done on account of some course that was adopted in the Senate. While the Senate did in 1914 take the action suggested, in 1915 the proposal that the appointment of senators in the western provinces should be deferred until after the termination of this Parliament was accepted by the Prime Minister and the motion to agree to that amendment was put through the House by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government. The members, therefore, who, by virtue of the Redistribution Act of three years ago, would have been entitled to go to the Senate are not permitted to go by reason of the Act of the Government itself.

The acceptance of that principle by the Government, however, was accompanied by a rather suspicious circumstance. The motion to defer the appointment of senators from western Canada was made by the Government on April 10, 1915, in contemplation of their going to the country immediately afterward. Notwithstanding the war, notwithstanding the homily of the Minister of Finance, when this Government, in 1915, declared that the people of western Canada should not have senatorial representation until after the termination of this Parliament, they believed that Parliament was to terminate in a few weeks. My hon. friends have forgotten the words of their colleague, the Minister of Public Works, who is now across the ocean. He said:—

> Is it, then, any wonder that the cry comes from every individual that one meets and that understands the conditions, in tones louder than thunder, demanding that this Parliament be dissolved, that the rights and liberties of the people of this Dominion be granted to them under our form of democracy, and that that form of democracy be restored to them?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: That was in 1915.

Mr. MACDONALD: That was in April, 1915.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Wild applause from the Government benches.

Mr. MACDONALD: At the time my hon. friend the Solicitor General and the Minister of Finance were declaring that the people of Canada should not have senatorial representation until the voice of the people was heard, as their colleague, the Minister of Public Works, said these words.

10 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We could not help ourselves. We would lose the Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD: If hon. gentlemen wanted to settle the question at that time, and if they were not preparing for an election, all they had to do was to let the matter run a year or two until they should have a majority in the Senate that would have carried the Bill.

Mr. GRAHAM: They printed the ballots; too; what is the good of talking?

Mr. MACDONALD: In 1915, when the Minister of Public Works declared that the people of Canada were crying for an election in tones of thunder, he immediately proceeded to have the ballots printed and sent over to England. After Parliament rose he went to the city of Montreal and, in those thunder-tones in which he usually utters his declamations, he announced that the time had come for the people of Canada to say which party should rule. The Minister of Finance, therefore, should remember when he speaks to us about elections, that, beyond a shadow of a doubt, he and his colleagues had decided in 1915, while war was on—whatever stopped them, we do not know—that there would be an election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then what did the Minister of Public Works mean when he made the utterances to which I have referred?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I suggest that my hon. friend ask the Minister of Public Works. He is not quoting the Prime Minister, and he is not quoting any of the ministers here to-night.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He spoke in the presence of his colleagues.

Mr. MACDONALD: Surely you are not going back on your colleague. In that very session the Minister of Justice made careful preparations for taking the votes of the soldiers across the seas. Then came the announcement of the Minister of Public Works; then came the printing of the ballots; then came the speech in Montreal —and for some reason the matter ended. I repeat that the Minister of Finance—whatever he may say now—together with his colleagues, decided that there should be an election during war time. When the Solicitor General and his colleagues accepted the amendment of the Senate in April, 1915, declaring that there should be no additional senatorial representation until after the termination of Parliament, they either settled the principle definitely, or they settled it with the full knowledge and belief that there would be an election in 1915 within one or two months. This Government is the only one in all the Dominions of the Empire which has during the war pursued its functions upon purely partisan lines, which has carried out a system of patronage in connection with military and public expenditures, notwithstanding the fact that the extension of time was given, as the member for Halifax very well says, by the grace of the Opposition. In Australia there have been two elections since the war began, and a coalition Government has gone to the country now. In the meantime, in Australia, under the coalition Government, if any appointments are made, such as judges or appointments of that character, they have been made upon lines entirely free of any question of party interest; they have been made for considerations which are behind the existence of the Government as a coalition Government. The same principle applies in South Africa and in Great Britain. The only question that my hon. friend from Halifax has submitted—and he has done so in a very reasonable way—is this: seeing that his Government has had its term of office extended by the grace of the Opposition; seeing that there is no public interest that will suffer by permitting these vacancies in the Senate to exist any more than any interest suffers by permitting vacancies in the House of Commons to exist, will the Government agree to this principle that, until the termination of this Parliament and until the people of Canada say who shall govern this country after the war is over, the vacancies in the Senate shall not be filled? If hon. gentlemen make an appeal to the country or to this House to sink party considerations on account of any reason they may put forward why such party considerations should be disregarded, is it an unreasonable proposition on the part of my hon. friend to say to hon. gentlemen opposite: Will you not also, pending the termination of the war and the decision of the people of Canada as to who shall govern them, sink party interest, and seeing that no public interest shall suffer, let these vacancies in the Senate remain unfilled? If hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere in asking that the first interest before this country should be the performance of our duty in regard to the war, they should give us an illustration of what they can do in great, big, broad lines, by sinking party considerations and refraining in the public interest from making appointments which can be justified only for partisan reasons. My hon. friend's proposition is a reasonable one, and I fail to see how, if hon. gentlemen opposite do not accept it, they can expect from the opposition in the future that consideration which we have given them in the past. How is it possible for this Government to come before the people of Canada and say: in regard to our administration of the war, in regard to the performance of our several duties we have not acted in a partisan way, we have done that which was broad and generous and big upon this question and therefore we are entitled to favourable consideration from the Canadian people and the party that are opposed to us, if they decline to accept this reasonable request put forward by my hon. friend from Halifax, when manifestly in the judgment of the people of this country there is no public interest which would suffer by holding in abeyance vacancies in the Senate, just as no public interest suffers by holding in abeyance vacancies in the House of Commons?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, from the outbreak of hostilities to the present moment, I think it has been possible to contend that every Canadian whose patriotism was at once strong and enlightened, had one object before him, altogether paramount to anything else that could occupy us as public men in this country, and that object is the winning of the war. Another proposition can be laid down as to the method by which that object could best be obtained. For the winning of the war, it was absolutely necessary for strong and enlightened men to combine, irrespective of previous differences, to preserve the national unity. Those propositions are obvious. They prevail in Germany; they prevail in Britain; they are not questioned there for a moment. When the question of the extension of the term of Parliament came before us last year, these considerations animated both sides of the House. I would not say that the Government are in power by the grace of the Opposition; I do not think that is quite a fair way to put it; the government are in power under an extended term of Parliament because last year the Opposition shared with the Government the two views which I have just said are the views which have prevailed with Canadians whose patriotism was at once strong and enlightened once the war broke out. It was perfectly obvious that for a continuance of those conditions—and I agree with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that the general question of extension will be far better discussed when it is again before Parliament—it is necessary that there should be give and take between the two sides of this House, because after all whence does the threat to national unity come? It must come and can come only from an outbreak of partisanship. That is possible on the part of an Opposition; it is obviously equally possible on the part of the Government benches, and the duty to refrain from partisanship on the part of the Opposition must be enforced upon the Opposition by the example and the conduct of the Government and their supporters. I think that my reasoning up to this point would require my hon. friend the Solicitor General in his very best form to puncture it, even by methods of which I am not at all sure that he always approves himself. It is no use speaking to plain men about appointments to the Senate being the same as appointments to the judiciary. Of course, during the war, it goes without saying that the judiciary must go on, and I should be sorry to think that appointments to the judiciary are largely political at any rate in any British country; but as my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) has pointed out, there is such a uniform course of action in regard to appointments to the Senate that a strong suspicion of partisanship regarding the matter does arise. The two cases are not alike. There is really strong ground for suspicion that appointments to the Senate are very generally political. I do not put this thing on the ground of the interest of the Government. I do not say the Government are in power by the grace of the Opposition; they are in power during an extended term of Parliament on a mutual understanding that party politics should be dropped and that the Government and the Opposition should achieve glory for their position in history as politicians and as statesmen by dropping their politics and uniting for a common purpose of paramount importance. All things are lawful to me, but all things are not expedient. Is it wise for the Government who, I take it, assent to every proposition I have laid down hitherto, to offer provocations to the Opposition that are only human? Is it in accordance with the general principles animating the country, animating the people, and, I hold, animating Parliament last year? I put it on that ground. Is it a wise thing? Is it not certain to have the effect of leading the political parties to lock horns and destroy the national unity, and to that extent interfere, I would say terribly if not monstrously, with Canada's efficiency in the prosecution of the war? I do not want, in the words I am using, to refer to conditions in the spring of 1915 at all. I am too intent, Sir, upon the main objects which I say command the attention of Canadians at this time to want to refer to that. I am glad to be able to say that the Government, for some reason or another, did not have an election anyhow, and I am prepared to give them credit for that. The country knows perfectly well, of course, that there were members of the Government at that time who were thinking in terms of elections. I do not think it possible to convey any other impression to the country than that. I do not want to be unfair to anyone, but that speech on the Senate could not leave any doubt in any reasonable mind as to what the emergency man of the Administration was thinking about anyhow. But I noticed from their countenances that many of the other members of the Administration from the Prime Minister downwards were filled with doubts as to the procedure of the emergency man. That I took to be the psychology of the Cabinet at the moment. I do not think cabinets always agree, not for a moment, but the fact remains and will go down in history that the Government did not have an election, and from that day on they have kept reasonably before them—and I have conceded it fully to them from this side of the House—the objects which I have said ought to command the consensus and agreement of Canadian opinion at this time. Now, in view of that, I would ask the Government to hold over a final decision on this question, if need be, until the Prime Minister returns, and until the subject can be carefully discussed and considered in the Cabinet. Because, after all, if an election comes, tremendous blame will be attached by the country to the party which brings on that election if it comes at a time when our men are falling in thousands, and when it is bound to have the effect of harming to a dreadful extent the national unity.

I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) made an admirable speech in presenting this resolution, a speech of very great moderation, and of very strong reason. I do not think that what he advanced has been met by the speeches we have heard from the other side and I would ask the Government to give the most careful consideration to the views I have tried to put before them in these few words.

Motion (Mr. A. K. Maclean) negatived on division.

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I be allowed a word of explanation? We would certainly have asked for a vote on this resolution but for the fact that an arrangement was entered into by the whips on Friday night that there would be no division on Monday.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That was my understanding. The motion is lost on division at the request of the Government. I may be allowed to observe that the motion as it stands includes all appointments from this date forward, which would cover the vacancies at the present time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It includes all since last year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It includes all.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

Tuesday, May 1, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE POTATO SUPPLY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (West Kent): As there is a very great shortage of potatoes at the present time in different parts of Ontario, both for food and seed purposes, I should be glad if one of the ministers, possibly the Minister of Agriculture, who stated some time ago that there was a large surplus of potatoes in different parts of Canada, would tell us where these surplus potatoes can be obtained.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): The condition of the potato industry, very briefly, is this: When we heard of reported shortages and a scarcity in some parts of the country, I communicated with every provincial Minister of Agriculture in Canada to ascertain as closely as he could the conditions in his own province; this was at the end of February. As nearly as we could ascertain, a conservative estimate put it at about one and a half million bushels surplus over and above the food and seed requirements of the whole country. The surpluses were chiefly in the provinces of Alberta, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. In some other provinces shortages were reported, and other provinces were not quite sure. We checked up the figures at the end of March by following all the exports from the country, and again up to the 15th of April, and from the time we estimated the amount of potatoes in the country up to the 15th April about half a million bushels were exported, leaving—if our estimate was at all correct, and it was based on the information I have indicated—about one million bushels surplus still in this country. Of course that may be only approximate. I might also say to my hon. friend that a summary of all the replies I received was sent to each Minister of Agriculture in the different provinces, in order that he might know the exact condition throughout the country, together with the suggestion that it might be advisable for those ministers whose provinces were likely to be short, to watch the situation as closely as possible with the idea of doing what they could to supply the needs of their own province.

[Sir Thomas White.]

THE LORD'S DAY OBSERVANCE ACT.

SUSPENSION SUGGESTED.

Mr. S. F. GLASS (East Middlesex): At a meeting of the Ottawa Greater Production Committee yesterday, the following resolution was passed:

> In view of the urgent and pressing need for the production of the largest possible quantity of foods, and by reason of the uncertainty of weather conditions permitting work to be done on land when in a suitable condition for planting and sowing, this committee recommends to the Organization of Resources Committee for Ontario that it petition the Dominion Government to take action under the War Measures Act to suspend the Lord's Day Observance Act as it applies to farm labour for seeding and harvesting work.

I should like to ask if the Government have received representations from any other source as to the desirability of suspending the Lord's Day Act in accordance with this suggestion.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not to my knowledge. No similar representation has been made. I saw the report in question in this morning's paper, but the matter has not been brought to our attention in any other way.

STATE OF RECRUITING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: I desire to call the attention of the leader of the House (Sir Thomas White) to a statement made by the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario, (Sir Sam Hughes). Speaking in Lindsay on Saturday he said:

> More than one year ago an agitation was begun on the question of labour. We were recruiting too many regiments; we were 'taking too many men away from work'; 'munitions manufacturers and others would be at a standstill'; 'farmers could not put in their crops'; and 'Canada has already done her full duty' were daily recited. They, unfortunately, had an effect upon the Prime Minister. The result was that I was asked in March, 1916, not to press recruiting, and recruiting to-day is and has been dead in Canada for fighting purposes.

Will the hon. gentleman say whether that statement is correct or not?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would suggest that my hon. friend address that question to the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden). So far as I know the statement referred to has no foundation.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE ON ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment of Mr. Turriff thereto, was resumed from Friday, April 27.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): By Order in Council, under authority of the War Measures Act, the Government, on 16th April, placed upon the free list three commodities, wheat, wheat flour and semolina, and by that action brought into operation the provision of the Underwood Tariff under which wheat and wheat products from the country taking such action become entitled to free entry to the markets of the United States. The matter was not referred to in the Budget but my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has moved an amendment, and it is to that amendment and to the subject of free wheat that I purpose for a short time to give consideration. It seems to me that the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to this action of the Government in placing wheat, wheat flour and semolina on the free list is a most extraordinary one. These hon. gentlemen have asserted for the last three years—the Underwood Tariff having come into effect in October, 1913—that they were in favour of free wheat. One would have thought that when the Government took the action which has been taken these hon. gentlemen would rejoice. One would have thought that the hon. member for Assiniboia, and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) when speaking on the question, would at least have looked pleased. The impression goes out from the House that hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken on this question are glad that the Government has taken this action, but to us in the House they do not look glad, they appear to be sorry. I wonder if the real explanation is not that these hon. gentlemen prefer to have the cry rather than the wool, that they would rather have free wheat as a political issue rather than free wheat as an actuality. At all events, that seems like a reasonable explanation of their attitude on the action of the Government in placing these three commodities on the free list and calling into operation the provision in the Underwood Tariff that I have mentioned.

The criticism of the Opposition upon the action of the Government in this regard proceeds upon several grounds. First, they say it was a departure from the fiscal policy of the Government and of the Conservative party. Second, they say: You have granted it now; why did you not grant it before the war? Third, they say: You grant it now during the war, why did you not grant it earlier in the war? Fourth, they say: The measure is temporary, and with the end of the war the duties are automatically restored. And fifth, they have the temerity to say that the Government was actuated by political consideration in view of an approaching election. I am sure my ears did not fail me and that I distinctly heard my hon. friend from Assiniboia make that last statement.

Mr. TURRIFF: You are quite right.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend admits it. Now let me say—because I desire to discuss this matter seriously and earnestly—that we on this side, ever since the Underwood Tariff came into effect in 1913, have viewed this matter of free wheat upon what we regarded as its merits; we have never declined to grant free wheat on the ground that it involved a departure from the traditional fiscal policy of the Conservative party. I proceed now to prove that what I state is correct. In the Budget speech of 1914, which was the first occasion upon which I discussed the Underwood Tariff in the House of Commons, I set forth the arguments pro and con on the subject of free wheat; I set them out fully, I set them out, I submit, judicially; I did not take the ground that the Government would have nothing to do with this because it was a violation of the fiscal policy of the Conservative party. I examined the whole question from a business, economic, and public standpoint. I said:

> So much for these opposing arguments and contentions. Speaking generally, it is not advisable that a nation's tariff should be so arranged as to fit into the particular features of that of another nation. This, however, would not be a conclusive reason for not making a change clearly in the national interest.

At that time we came to the conclusion, having regard to the fluctuations of price between Winnipeg, Minneapolis and Chicago, that there was not the advantage to the farmer that was claimed in this matter of free wheat, and, having regard to other considerations—industries in Canada of an important character and the condition of our railways—we thought it was not advisable at that time to grant free wheat. But we did not argue it upon the ground that it would be a departure from the fiscal policy of the Conservative party. On the contrary, we said by implication that if it were in the national interest we were prepared to consider it. I desire to make that perfectly clear. Let us see what I said when this matter was before the House in February, 1916. I spoke on a resolution moved by the hon. member (Mr. Turriff), who now brings forward this amendment. I had been giving the matter my most painstaking attention during the whole of the year. If the Government held the view at that time that it was a departure from the fiscal policy to consider this question, what would be the reason for my giving consideration to the matter in my office continuously as I did? This is what I said, as reported in Hansard on page 861, February 16, 1916:—

> I have caused a record to be kept of prices of grain both in Canada and in the United States, with a view to thoroughly familiarizing myself with the merits of the question in order to reach a sound and just conclusion in the national interest. When I say in the national interest, I need not say how important a factor in the national interest I consider the interest and material well-being of the three great grain-growing provinces of the West. It is in that spirit that I have approached, from time to time, the consideration of this question.

And I expressed the opinion on that occasion, in February, 1916, that it was unwise in the national interest that free wheat should be granted. It was not clear to me that the advantages that would be gained would outweigh the disadvantages, but I repeat, and the point I am making is that we always considered the question upon its merits and had regard, in dealing with it, only to what we regarded as the national interest. The position of the Government, in its view upon the question of free wheat in 1914, in 1916, and in April of this year, when we took action, has been absolutely sound and consistent throughout. I make that statement without the slightest hesitation; I say our action has been sound and consistent throughout. How can it be urged that it was a violation of Conservative fiscal policy? Sir John A. Macdonald was a fairly good Conservative; so I have heard. Sir Leonard Tilley was the finance minister of Sir John A. Macdonald. Sir Leonard Tilley introduced the National Policy budget about 1879. The National Policy budget of 1879 has been the charter of the fiscal policy of the Conservative party from that day to this. Let us see what Sir Leonard Tilley said in regard to reciprocal provisions in the tariff. Sir Leonard Tilley, in 1879, in introducing the National Policy budget, said:—

> The Government, requiring more revenue, have determined to ask this House to impose upon the products of the United States that have been free, such a duty as may seem consistent with our position. But the Government couple with the proposal, in order to show that we approach this question with no unfriendly spirit, a resolution that will be laid on the table containing a proposition to this effect: That, as to articles named, which are the natural products of the country, including lumber, if the United States take off the duties in part or in whole, we are prepared to meet them with equal concessions. The Government believe in a reciprocity tariff, yet may discuss Free Trade or Protection, but the question of to-day is—Shall we have a reciprocity tariff, or a one-sided tariff?

That was the National Policy budget of Sir Leonard Tilley in 1879. Is it contrary to the fiscal policy of the Conservative party either to have a reciprocity provision in the tariff which remains under you control absolutely or to take advantage of a reciprocal provision in the tariff of another country? I submit that the action of Sir Leonard Tilley in 1879 is absolutely conclusive evidence that the attitude we have taken is in no way inconsistent with the fiscal policy of the Conservative party.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No; it was the election that you were thinking of.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have a great personal regard for my right hon. friend. He weathered the storm for many years and he was always on firm ground when he followed the policy of Sir Leonard Tilley. My right hon. friend notwithstanding his free trade professions in 1893, when he got into office followed in the footsteps of Sir John Macdonald and Sir Leonard Tilley and while he continued in that path he got on well in regard to his fiscal policy. But, my right hon. friend instead of continuing to follow the true lights was allured by a will-of-the-wisp and that brings me to the reciprocity agreement of 1911. My right hon. friend I think, would admit, if he would tell us his opinion candidly, that he then made a political mistake of the first magnitude——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: He did nothing of the kind. The policy of Sir Leonard Tilley in 1879 was that reciprocity of tariff would conduce to reciprocity of trade.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am sorry that my right hon. friend has not got over 1911. He tried upon that occasion to prove the impossible. He tried to prove that under reciprocity the farmer would get more for his product but that the consumer would pay less. We all know that when my right hon friend attempted to prove that to the people of Canada he was fore-doomed to failure. Not even my right hon. friend could do that. He could not prove the impossible. My right hon. friend in connection with the reciprocity agreement, was like a mariner who disregarded the beacon lights. He disregarded the beacon light that was hung up by one of the greatest Liberals of the day, Hon. George Brown. When the Hon. George Brown was a member of the coalition government formed to bring about Confederation, he went to Washington in connection with the matter of reciprocity and he absolutely declined to become a party to an agreement such as was entered into by my right hon. friend's Government with the Government at Washington. Hon. George Brown stated that every tariff agitation over there would find its echo at Ottawa and he actually resigned from the coalition Government upon that ground. You will find authority for that in the letters and memoirs of the Hon. George Brown.

There were many objections to the reciprocity agreement as has been shown by our experience in 1911. Quite a number of articles, which, under the agreement would nave entered the United States, subject to duty, enter the United States to-day free. I repeat there were many objections to the reciprocity agreement. The chief objection was the fact of the agreement. It is true that on its face it was stated that it was not a treaty, but in substance and in fact it was a treaty and when it was entered into the late Government lost to a considerable degree the control of its own tariff. That was the feature of the reciprocity agreement to which chief objection was taken. There were many other objections but that was one of the chief ones, and it was, that when that agreement was entered into the Government of Canada lost in a measure the control of its own tariff. Under the National Policy Budget of 1879, Sir Leonard Tilley did not lose control of his tariff for a moment, and in the action which we have taken under the authority of the War Measures Act, we have not for one moment lost control of our tariff.

Our action was not preceded by any negotiations There was no agreement with the United States. We took action under the War Measures Act, and we placed wheat and wheat flour and semolina on the free list. The tariff is just as much under the control of this Parliament as it was on April fifteenth. There is a clear distinction between taking advantage of reciprocal provisions in the tariff of another country or offering advantages by reciprocal provision in your own tariff, control of which you do not lose for a moment, and negotiating an agreement under which you lose such control. That is a clear distinction that any one can make.

Mr. TURRIFF: If, under the agreement of 1911, Canada would have lost control of her tariff, would the United States have lost control of its tariff under that agreement?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would to a certain extent, but not to the extent that Canada would. The United States was a very much larger country than Canada and there would not be the same considerations weighing with the Government of the United States contemplating the recision of agreement that there would have been upon the Government of Canada considering recision.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) should have made a fresh start after 1911; he should have said: I have made a mistake with regard to reciprocity, and I am going to make a new start. I often think that my right hon. friend was more partial to the reciprocity agreement than to any other child of his political brain. One reason was that it was the youngest. Reciprocity was my right hon. friend's youngest political child, and we must not blame him from being partial to it, because it was his Benjamin. I mention that because, like parents whose children who have been lost, my right hon. friend sees resemblances to reciprocity in many measures brought forward in this House. For example, if I borrow in New York my right hon. friend says: Oh, that is reciprocity.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, that is truck and trade with the Yankees.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend says that is truck and trade with the Yankees and he has said in this House that it was. But it is not his long lost child, reciprocity; it is a very much more healthy and robust infant; it is legitimate business, borrowing in the United States, just as I might borrow in Great Britain. We sell our securities to the United States just as for generations past we have sold goods to the United States. But my right hon. friend sees in it a far away resemblance to reciprocity.

Then when we, under the War Measures Act, take the action which we have taken and bring into operation the reciprocal provision in the Underwood Tariff of 1913, my right hon. friend again says: Reciprocity! But it is still a case of mistaken identity. This is a very much more self-respecting child than reciprocity or the reciprocity agreement of 1911 because, as I have pointed out, in this action that we have taken we have not lost for one moment control of our tariff. The fundamental and essential difference between our action respecting free wheat and the reciprocity agreement is that we retain in its fulness and entirety our control over our own tariff. We have not in the slightest degree abridged our freedom of fiscal action or surrendered one jot or tittle of our fiscal independence.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the hon. gentleman mean by that that the Government can at any moment repeal this provision in regard to free wheat?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall later on deal very fully with that criticism, which was made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley).

The second criticism that is offered is this: Why do you do this now and not be-before the war? I answer: because conditions have been profoundly changed by the war. Conditions affecting trade, international conditions affecting ocean transport have been radically and profoundly changed. There has been a revolution in trade and in transportation methods and conditions since the outbreak of this war. Let us take our condition three years ago, before war broke out. We exported largely to Great Britain. We borrowed largely in Great Britain, that is to say, we exported our securities and sold them there. We were obligated to pay in Great Britain interest upon huge sums which we had borrowed for the development of this country. We imported to a considerable extent from Great Britain. We imported to a large extent from the United States. Our imports from the United States greatly exceeded our exports to the United States. We were, I think, the second best customer of the United States. How did we pay the United States for the balance of trade? We paid the United States for the balance of trade through Great Britain. Great Britain exported to the United States, and those exports would be a set off to her imports from the United States. But in addition to that the United States owed Great Britain vast sums for interest upon securities. In addition to that Great Britain, by the services of her carrying fleet, established a large indebtedness on the part of the United States. The result was, as I have stated, that it was England that paid the United States the balance that we owed the United States upon international trading. Now let us see what has happened since the war has broken out. Our imports from the United States have immensely increased.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear!

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend says "hear, hear."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Certainly.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, our imports from the United States have immensely increased. How can we liquidate that adverse balance to-day with existing conditions of transportation and exchange between England and the United States unless we increase the sale of our products to the United States?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear, by all means.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: At last my right hon. friend and I are together in agreement.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is what reciprocity would have done.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But reciprocity was a peace time measure.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Oh, oh.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am speaking about war conditions, and they have brought this about.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You seem very much involved.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Let us see what the conditions were in 1911, or even in 1914. My right hon. friend need not take my opinion or my statements; I shall cite to him one whose authority not even my right hon. friend will question. But let us see, just for a moment, the change that has taken place in the exchange of commodities between Great Britain and the United States since the outbreak of this war. In 1914 the exports from the United States to Great Britain were $594,000,000, let us say $600,000,000, merchandise only, and in 1916, last year, those exports had risen to $1,500,000,000 from the United States to the United Kingdom, or an increase of $900,000,000 in favour of the United States as compared with pre-war exports.

At the same time, the exports of Great Britain to the United States had increased only from $293,000,000 to $308,000,000. This means that exchange has completely broken down between the United Kingdom and the United States; that the conditions which prevailed before the war do not prevail to-day; that an entire change has taken place both as to the channels of trade and the conditions under which trade is carried on.

I told my hon. friend that I would quote an authority to which he would defer. At the Guildhall a few days ago, Mr. Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain, referring to the transportation situation and the food conditions in Great Britain, made a most important statement Speaking about the shortage of ocean transport and its effect in Great Britain, he said that arrangements were being made whereby imports would be cut down by over 10,000,000 tons yearly without interfering with any essential industry in Great Britain. Why is the Government of the United Kingdom devoting its energies to cutting down imports? Because of the shortage in tonnage brought about by submarine warfare. Sir Edward Carson said yesterday that the losses from submarines were growing. There is no use minimizing or blinking matters; the submarine menace is a terrible one. During the week before last 40 large British and allied vessels and 15 smaller ones were sunk, to say nothing of neutral shipping. That is the condition with which we are confronted to-day: the submarine menace to British and neutral shipping; regulations as to food enforced in the United Kingdom. Mr. Lloyd George further said: "We are placing under cultivation 3,000,000 fresh acres of land so that in 1918 we shall be able to support ourselves within the confines of the United Kingdom." Will that have any effect upon trade or upon imports of foodstuffs? This war has brought about a limitation of ordinary imports into Great Britain, and of exports from Great Britain. Every day of my life I am asked by some interest in Canada to see if I can get the embargo lifted whereby exports from Great Britain of commodities in which they are interested are prohibited from leaving the ports of the United Kingdom—the reason being, of course, the shortage of shipping.

Coming to the wheat question, what does Lloyd George say? I direct the attention of my right hon. friend and of the member for Assiniboia to the following words:

> There are 85,000,000 bushels of wheat in Canada—

That is an under-statement.

> —I would not say for the asking, but for the fetching. It ought to have been here. I believe that about twenty or thirty million bushels of this wheat had to go to the United States for lack of another market. We must cut down our food until we discover a method of destroying this ocean bacillus. That is one thing that has got to be done.

The British Prime Minister then says that there is plenty of wheat in Canada, not for the asking, but for the fetching. He says: It is impossible to fetch it on account of the submarine menace and of the shortage of shipping; consequently it has to find a market in the United States. This indicates that formerly the wheat had found a market in the United Kingdom, and that normally it would find its market there to-day if the British authorities had the shipping to fetch it.

So far as conditions affecting the sale of Canadian wheat were formerly concerned, there was a good export demand from millers and others in the United Kingdom for all grades of our wheat. There was a better demand for the high grades, but there was, nevertheless, a demand for the lower grades. While there is still a certain demand locally and by millers for the low grades of Canadian wheat in our West, it is a fact that the export demand for low grade wheat has diminished—this is precisely what you would expect—because of the food regulations in the United Kingdom and the shortage of cargo space. They adopted regulations in the United Kingdom with a view to getting the greatest amount of food product out of a given amount of grain. For a considerable part of the last few months Stoddart & Company, who have been purchasers for Great Britain of wheat in Canada, have been purchasing the higher grades of wheat—only recently have they been purchasing any of the lower grades—and the result was that while there was a good market for the higher grades of wheat, there was not as good a market for the lower grades. The hon. member for Assiniboia knows that. In addition, it is perfectly clear to me that advantage was being taken of the situation with regard to the lower grades of wheat and that the farmer was not receiving for the lower grades of wheat the money that he should have received. That was the position with which the Government was confronted. If anybody is disposed to challenge that, let him examine the figures for March, which show in most illuminating fashion what has happened with regard to the channels of trade. In the month of March, 1916, 400,000 bushels of wheat only went from Canada to the United States, and in the same month of this year 2,400,000 bushels of wheat went into the United States—six times as much, an excess of 2,000,000 bushels. This occurred, as I have stated, because the exchange situation and the shortage of ocean transportation has given Canadian wheat and other products a tendency to move towards the United States.

Mr. ROBB: Who paid the duty on that wheat going into the United States?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would have to be paid in every case, but there might be a drawback with respect to a good deal of it. I am unable to say how much, and I am sure that my hon. friend is unable to say how much. The fact remains, however—and it is a most illuminating fact—that the increased amount of wheat going into the United States in the month of March of this year was as I have stated.

The hon. member for Assiniboia then makes his third criticism of the action of the Government. He says: "Why was not free wheat granted early in the war? If you did this owing to war conditions, why did you not do it in 1914?" But even the hon. member for Assiniboia would not have had the temerity to ask the Government in 1914-15 to grant free wheat, because the market at Winnipeg was so very much higher than the market at Minneapolis or Chicago. There was no resolution with regard to free wheat in 1914-15, immediately after the outbreak of war.

Mr. TURRIFF: We advocated it every year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend could not have advocated it in 1915, because, as a matter of fact, for many months in the fall of 1914 the market at Winnipeg was much higher than the market at Minneapolis or Chicago.

Mr. TURRIFF: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend shakes his head—but there is no doubt about it—that the market at Winnipeg was better, and there are reasons for that.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is my hon. friend not contrasting, say, No. 2 Northern Manitoba grade with No. 2 Northern Minneapolis grade?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I am familiar with all those distinctions.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is what my hon. friend has done.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I make the statement that after the outbreak of the war the Winnipeg market was better than either the Minneapolis market or the Chicago market.

Mr. TURRIFF: That is not the case.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There were reasons for that. The exchange, instead of being favourable to the United States, as it is to-day, was unfavourable to the United States. That is sufficient answer to my hon. friend, who says: Well, if it is proper to do it in war time, why did you not do it earlier in the war? The reason was that conditions earlier in the war were such that the exchange was unfavourable to the United States.

We come down now to last year. It was uncertain, during last year, as to what the position was. Sometimes the price at Winnipeg would be a little higher than the price at Minneapolis; sometimes the price would be a little higher at Minneapolis than at Winnipeg. The statement was made here that on the lower grades of wheat there was a considerable spread. There was likely to be a greater spread on the lower grades at that time than on the higher grades, but that argument was put forward last year. There are, however, two considerations to be borne in mind. In the first place, the submarine menace had not yet developed on the scale that it is at the present time. It is a well known fact that during the early part of 1916 it was believed that the submarine menace had been mastered. I am speaking now of the small submarine. What has transpired since that is this: There has appeared upon the scene for many months the super-submarine with an enlarged area of operation, and it is the super-submarine and the multiplication of submarines by Germany devoting the energies of her shipbuilding plants to the building of submarines that has brought about this acute situation. But it took a long time to develop; it was only on February 1 of this year that Germany declared a blockade of the British Isles and announced to the entire world that she would sink the shipping, not only of Great Britain but of neutrals. Up to that point she was sinking the shipping of Great Britain; she had not dared to sink the shipping, at all events, of that great neutral, the United States; but since February 1, she has been sinking, not only British shipping, but neutral shipping, and she has in that way profoundly affected the carrying capacity of the Atlantic fleets, although last year it was not apparent that the situation, which has since developed, would develop. But there is another very important situation. The United States at that time was not an ally. It 4 p.m. might have been possible that Great Britain would require the entire wheat crop of Canada. What is the position to-day? The United States has taken her place with the Allies in this great war. The wheat and other food products of the United States and of Canada are practically pooled to-day for the use of the Allies. The British buyers, buying for Great Britain and for her Allies, are purchasing the exportable wheat crop of the United States and of Canada.

Mr. TURRIFF: Is that the reason why my hon. friend has put wheat on the free list?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am developing this argument beautifully.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend cannot fail to understand. He who runs may read. I am giving my reasons why we did not do last year what we did in April this year.

Mr. TURRIFF: There is one you have not yet given.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And if my hon. friend's mind were open for a moment, he would understand and agree that the course which we have pursued has been, not only consistent, but beneficial.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Giving many reasons and fishing for a good one.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Those reasons do not tally with those given by the Solicitor General.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Our reasons usually tally. The Solicitor General is usually correct in the facts, and I try also to be correct. I was amazed the other night to hear my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) actually jeer—not so much in express words, but by his manner—at the high prices which the farmers of the West are receiving for wheat. I would have thought, if my hon. friend rejoiced, as he stated that he rejoiced, at the placing of wheat, wheat flour and semolina upon the free list, thus giving access to the United States for our wheat and wheat products, he would at least look pleasant; but he did not; he was rather annoyed.

Mr. MACDONALD: He always looks pleasant.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend says that he always looks pleasant. Well, if he looked pleasant the other night, then all I have to say is that I should not like to see him when he looks unpleasant. He looked pleasant in the same sense that a man looks pleasant when he is having his photograph taken. My hon. friend from St. John has just come in. I was saying that if he looked pleasant the other night—and no one in this House can look more pleasant than my hon. friend when he is really pleasant—

Mr. TURRIFF: He is pretty good looking.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: then all I have to say is that I should not like to see him when he is looking unpleasant.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The sadness of the Government's supporters would make anybody feel sad.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend looked pleasant in just the same sense that a man having his photograph taken looks pleasant—my hon. friend knows what I mean by that. He had very little sympathy for the high prices the farmers in the West were getting for their wheat. We often hear statements made as to the energy which Governments should devote in order to bring immigrants into this country, and I agree with all that has been said as to the desirability of the greatest possible activity being shown in bringing immigrants into this country; but the best immigration agent for Canada is a good price for wheat.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The situation was the same last year as it is this year. Is that a new idea?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend the other night from his seat in the House rather jeered at the high prices which the farmers of the West were receiving for their wheat—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I leave it to you, Sir; you were in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Perhaps I had better put it this way: I will not say that my hon. friend jeered at the high price of wheat; I will say that my hon. friend apparently had no sympathy with the high price which the farmer was obtaining for his wheat. The agricultural community is entitled to every possible consideration. Agriculture is the very base of our industrial fabric; the farmers are the real producers; the pyramid rests squarely upon the base of agricultural production. There is nothing too good for the farmers because they earn all they get; they are not in any combines. I was raised on a farm; I know what it is to get up at five o'clock in the morning, and I know how the farmer earns his money. I know what he gets, he earns by hard work.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some times he earns what he does not get.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a good thing then that the farmer is getting a good price for his product. I do not know of anything that will relieve the high cost of living later more than the fact that there is a good price for agricultural products. What stimulates production is a good return for the effort expended and the capital invested; and that principle applies to agriculture as it does to any other business. I have no sympathy with stock exploitation, with stock gamblers or wheat gamblers, but I have great sympathy with the farmer getting a proper price for his product.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would my hon. friend be good enough to elaborate that idea and show how high prices for agricultural products will reduce the cost of living.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend tried and failed in 1911 to establish that very thesis.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And the Minister of Finance argued the other way then.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend was out of the House when I pointed out that among other reasons why my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) signally failed in 1911, was that he attempted to prove to the intelligent people of this country that the farmer would get more for his product and the consumer would pay less. My hon. friend would hardly expect me to embark upon that undertaking after the example of 1911.

Another argument of my hon. friend was: Why should we do this at this time with the price of low grade wheat at a dollar or $1.30, as the case may be, as it only means ten cents a bushel to the farmer? Well, ten cents on fifty million bushels means $5,000,000, and on twenty-five million bushels, $2,500,000. Does my hon. friend mean to say that if this is a proper course for us to take in the national interest at this time of war conditions, the farmer in the West is not entitled to that ten cents? That was practically the argument of my hon. friend the other night, and I was surprised at him making it.

To come to another matter. It was argued in 1914 and in 1916 that the milling industry might be injuriously affected by such a measure as this. Now, there are few industries in Canada that have had greater profits since the outbreak of the war than the milling industry; enormous profits have been made by the large milling companies. It has been suggested on the other side of the House, what about railways, what about the transportation situation? Well, the war has materially changed that also. The war has changed the entire situation in Canada. What is the situation so far as the railways are concerned? My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) knows that wheat is not being taken out of the West to-day as it should be.

Mr. TURRIFF: Why?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Because of the shortage of rolling stock.

Mr. TURRIFF: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Because of the shortage of rolling stock and motive power.

Mr. TURRIFF: A farmer in the West told me within the last six weeks that he sold 50,000 bushels of wheat. He went down to New York and made arrangements for shipping it across the ocean, and he said that there were hundreds and hundreds of cars standing on every siding in his part of the country, and the railroads would not take them away.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Because of the shortage of motive power and the blocking of the eastern lines and terminals. If my hon. friend desires information on that point, let him do what I did. I am not talking at random; I consulted the Chairman of the Railway Commission, and I know what the railway situation is in this country. Does my hon. friend mean to say that wheat is coming out of the Goose Lake District to-day, and that there are not millions of bushels in the hands of the farmer that cannot be moved by reason of the blockade on our railways and the shortage of rolling stock? Let my hon. friend ask the Chairman of the Railway Commission what is the greatest need of railways to-day, and he will be told rolling stock.

Mr. TURRIFF: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I ask my hon. friend to go and see him.

Mr. TURRIFF: I can only tell my hon. friend that if he travels along the roads in the west he will find hundreds and thousands of cars standing idle on the tracks. It is not a shortage of rolling stock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What is my argument? I am showing that the railway situation has materially changed since the war.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The trouble is the want of elevators at the Atlantic terminals. The St. John elevators were burnt three years ago, and have not been rebuilt yet.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: So on all grounds the action of the Government was the right and proper course to take, having regard to the conditions which existed at that time. My hon. friend has a further criticism. He says: Why did you act under the War Measures Act? Why didn't you come down to Parliament and make these changes in your Budget? I think this Budget debate itself is a sufficient answer to that. How long will it be before this debate will close and before the measures which are now before the House will be enacted into law by this House and by the Senate? How long does it take to have Budget proposals translated into legislation? They go into effect immediately, so far as the Customs Department is concerned, but as a matter of fact they do not become law until the legislation is passed by this House and by the Senate and the Governor General has given his consent.

Mr. GRAHAM: They go into practical effect when the Budget speech is made.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They go into practical effect, but they would not meet the conditions of the tariff of another country. Hon. gentlemen say that we should not have taken this step under the War Measures Act. They say we should have included this free wheat measure in the Budget, and debated it for a month or six weeks, and two months from now the proposals would be enacted into law. Supposing we had done that? It would mean that the farmer of the West would have been deprived all that time of ten cents a bushel in respect of the low grade wheat he exported to the United States. I believe myself that in a clear case, where you are certain as to the propriety of what you are doing, what is called for is action, if you have the power to take that action. My hon. friend's criticism that this action should have not have been taken under the War Measures Act is one that I am sure will not appeal to the people of the West. What the people of the West want in this particular situation is a market for their low grade wheat.

Mr. TURRIFF: A permanent market.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that later. I will round up the job before I finish, and will answer my hon. friend fully, thoroughly and conclusively. The farmers of the West do not care whether my hon. friend from Assiniboia is deprived of a political cry or not; they do not care two straws about political cries, but I am afraid my hon. friend from Assiniboia does care for political cries. The Government had power to deal with this matter under the provisions and by the authority of the War Measures Act. That is admittted by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). Sometimes I think he is a good lawyer, and sometimes I think he is not. Sometimes he puts forward sound opinions in this House, and sometimes unsound opinions, and he smiles just as genially when he puts forward one kind as when he puts forward the other; but my hon. friend admits that the Government had the power to act. Well, if we had the power to act and the case was such as I have mentioned, why should not the Government act? And the Government did act. My hon. friend from Assiniboia says, and my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) too and I was amazed at him because he is a real lawyer—

Mr. GRAHAM: That is not an absolute qualification.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They both put forward the argument, "Under the War Measures Act you have taken off the duties, but those duties are merely suspended, and as soon as the war is over they will jump back again."

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is also what my hon. friend from St. John says.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what the law says.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But that is not what the Department of Justice says, and the Department of Justice is right. There has been presented to this House the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, a man who has absolutely no political reason for misstating the law or the facts, or for coming to any particular conclusion as opposed to any other conclusion. He is there to advise Liberal Governments and Conservative Governments alike. He is a good counsel, a sound lawyer. And what does he say? He says, as any lawyer who looks at it from a legal standpoint would be bound to say: you have taken the duties off wheat, wheat flour and semolina, and those duties are permanently taken off until fresh duties are imposed by or under the authority of Parliament. That is what he advises the Government, and that is what the Government believes has been done.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the hon. minister undertake to say that the Deputy Minister of Justice expresses the opinion that the Government could not, by Order in Council, during the pendency of the war, transfer these articles back to where they were before?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, I do not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How, then, does it become permanent?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will explain in a moment. Wheat, wheat flour and semolina are upon the free list in precisely the same sense as any other article is on the free list under the tariff to-day. Any article can be changed from the free list to the dutiable list by or under the authority of Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the hon. minister mean to say that any article can be changed from the free list to the dutiable list by Order in Council?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend asks me that question, which embraces this particular case, I express my opinion that it can. But I will say this, speaking now on behalf of the Government, that the Government regard wheat, wheat flour and semolina as upon the free list in the same way that any other articles on the tariff are on the free list, and that fresh duties will not be imposed except by Parliament. Why do I eliminate " or under the authority of Parliament?" For this reason: Under the general legislation, apart altogether from the War Measures Act—

Mr. MACDONALD: Why did not the hon. gentleman submit the proposition to Parliament?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have covered that ground so fully that I thought even a child could understand it. The hon. member (Mr. Macdonald) must have been asleep, or else he was talking to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) who is a charming companion. But I make the statement that the Government understands what has been done in the same sense that its legal adviser understands it, and I say that if these duties are ever reimposed it will be by Parliament. Why do I say that? Under the general legislation the Governor in Council at any time can place upon the free list any article or commodity that is used in connection with Canadian manufactures. Further than that, the Government can at any time grant remission of the duty under the Audit Act in cases where duty has been paid on articles imported. It is not an unusual thing for a government to reduce a duty, or even to place an article upon the free list. It is not altogether unusual—though power in this respect is more seldom exercised for the Government to grant remission of duty on articles that have been imported. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), when, in power, remitted the duty on coal; and we remitted the duty on cement on one occasion, because there was a scarcity of cement in the West. It is not an unusual thing, I say, for the Governor in Council to reduce or remove duties. But it is an unprecedented thing, so far as I know to impose duties by Order in Council; and I have no hesitation in saying that this Government, or any Government that succeeds it, if it desires to impose fresh duties upon these articles, will bring the proposal down to Parliament and have it enacted into law in the usual way. So we need not worry ourselves about these legal disquisitions and arguments about the validity of the Government's action under the War Measures Act—that argument entirely disappears.

Let me summarize what I have said: In the first place, there has been no departure from the traditional fiscal policy of the Conservative party, which has meant so much for the prosperity of this country since 1879; the policy of Sir John Macdonald, the policy of Sir Leonard Tilley, the policy of the present leader of the Opposition down to 1911. In the second place, conclusions as to what should be done in this matter has been reached upon the merits at the time decisions were taken, and having regard to the national interest. And when I speak of the national interest I repeat what I said in 1916, that no one can think of the national interest of Canada without thinking of the interest of the three great prairie provinces.

Now, the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) put forth a fifth criticism. It is really as unfounded and as little worth as criticisms one, two, three and four. He says: You are actuated by political considerations. One would hardly suspect my hon. friend from Assiniboia of suggesting that anyone could be actuated by political considerations. It would surprise me to learn that such a thought has ever crossed my hon. friend's mind. He says there is a coming election. What coming election?

Mr. GRAHAM: Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) merely interjects that. What have the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan to do with the question of free wheat?

Mr. GRAHAM: Just as much as they had to do with cement.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And they had nothing to do with cement. But my hon. friend from Assiniboia said "election," he did not say "elections."

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, and I meant the Dominion elections.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Absolutely. That is what the hon. gentleman meant. What does my hon. friend from South Renfrew say to that?

Mr. GRAHAM: The hon. member for Assiniboia makes it stronger than I did, that is all.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But he puts my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) in error.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all. The Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) will tell you.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member for Assiniboia said that we had acted for political reasons having regard to the "coming election." Now let me say this: the Prime Minister of this country is about to introduce a Bill into this House for the extension of Parliament. We on this side of the House do not believe there should be an election at this time. Should there be an election, who will be responsible for it? Is an election to be apprehended? Did the Government take this action under the War Measures Act by reason of its expectation that there would be an election when, at the same time, it is about to bring down a Bill to extend the term of Parliament? What then, is the force, and weight, and validity of the argument of my hon. friend?

Mr. LEMIEUX: The ballot boxes were sent to England two years ago.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Oh, we have heard all about that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: May I ask my hon. friend a question? My hon. friend has touched upon something that has nothing to do with the free wheat question?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend touched upon it for two hours last week.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend says the Government is going to bring down a Bill for the extension of Parliament. I would ask if the Government intend to deal with that as with other Government measures and carry it through by virtue of the majority they have in this House?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is an old and experienced parliamentarian, and I am surprised at him asking a question like that. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister is also an old and experienced parliamentarian, and I believe that when he brings down a Bill to this House he will bring it down in such fashion that no fault can be found with his action. My hon. friend from Assiniboia says: You are very blameable, you are really censurable because your action has pleased the West. He spoke with a sob in his voice. He said: Your action has pleased the West. I have to admit frankly to my hon. friend from Assiniboia that the fact that the West is pleased pleases the Government and pleases me. I am glad the West is pleased. We are all glad the West is pleased, and we are glad not as politicians but as Canadians. For the last five years of continuous campaign I have been represented as the sponsor for the big interests. The impression has been sedulously and persistently created through the West that the Government is hostile to the people of the West. I represent the interests in this House, all the interests in Canada, big and little, great and small, industrial, financial and agricultural. That is my conception of my duty. I have never favoured one interest at the expense of others, and if there is any interest in this country which I have favoured in this House, in the Cabinet, and in the councils of the Government, it has been the interest of agriculture. The people of the West and the people of the East are brothers; all the people of Canada are the children of Confederation. We have no favourites. Any public man who is discharging his duty to the state regards the interest of every individual and every section of the country, and action is taken not in the interest of this section or of that section but in the national interest. That is the policy which we attempt to follow, and have attempted to follow, since our accession to power in 1911.

I desire to say, because this question has been raised, that this Government has done more for the West than all of the Governments that preceded it, and I am glad that we have. It is right that we should. Let me tell you some of the things that we have done. Our first action when we came into power was to enlarge the boundaries of Manitoba. We placed the finances of that province upon a sound basis, we increased her annual subsidy, because we wanted to place her on an equality with the other provinces of the west, by $600,000, and we paid over $2,000,000 of back subsidies. We enlarged the boundaries of Manitoba. It was a proper thing to do and we did it. What have we done for agriculture? My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) introduced a Bill into this House whereby $10,000,000 was set aside for agriculture in the East and agriculture in the West. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) introduced a Bill for the building of highways throughout Canada. That would have been a great boon to agriculture both East and West but the Senate threw out that Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, no.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, they changed the Bill so that it was lost to the country. Then we established a system of interior elevators in the West. We were most interested in that subject. We said: Whatever money is necessary we should spend. Some doubt was raised as to whether these interior elevators would be used. It was thought that the grain would not be detained at these elevators but would find its way to those at the great terminal points. What has happened during the last two years? These elevators have been of the greatest possible value to the people of the West. When the war broke out we appropriated $13,000,000 for seed grain and supplies. It came back four, five and six fold to the people of this country. I am not taking any credit for these things. We do not take credit at all for what we do on this side. If we did less and talked more we would be stronger politically. If my right hon. friend had done one half for the people of the West what we have done since we have been in power he would have gone in annual procession through the West. I say in all sincerity that if we talked more and did less I believe we would be stronger politically in this country. But, we are content with doing.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You had better sit down then.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have learned in the course of my life that it is not always wise to follow the advice tendered by an opponent. My right hon. friend perhaps remembers the old Latin saying: Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes—I fear the Greeks when they come bearing gifts. When my right hon. friend makes a suggestion it does not necessarily follow that I am wise to carry it out. I have referred to a few of the measures which this Government has introduced. Take the banking legislation. We have amended the Bank Act repeatedly in order that the farmer may be able to pledge his grain and may be able to hypothecate his cattle in order to get advances from the bank. We have continually kept before us the interests of the agricultural industry. Then, take the taxation measures introduced since this war broke out. They are very seldom talked about in this House, although they are criticised sometimes outside of this House by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us see how our taxation has been raised for this war—$1,000,000 from the banks, taxation upon circulation; a few hundreds of thousands from trust companies, loan companies and insurance companies; taxation upon luxuries; business profits tax. There has been no discrimination against the farmers in our taxation measures to meet the expenditures of this war. I stated in my Budget last year that it would be my object to avoid direct taxation upon the income or effects or property of the farmer. Why did I say that—because I have repeatedly said in this House that agriculture is the very foundation of our national prosperity. When all goes well with agriculture, all goes well with every other class and industry in this country, and all goes well with finance. That is the reason why we have adopted the policy we have in raising revenue for the purpose of meeting the expenditure of the war. It is well for Canada that we should have diversified industries in both East and West. The National Policy is a policy that tends to promote diversified industry throughout the length and breadth of Canada. It is not well that the East should be wholly industrial; it is not well that the West should be wholly agricultural. There will be boys raised upon farms in the West as well as the East, with a genius for mechanics, boys destined to be captains of industry. Should we not have a policy under which those boys can employ their genius at home, or must we lose them to the great republic to the south? There should be diverse industries in this country, and that is the reason why this Government is devoted to the fiscal policy which has been often enunciated in this House. The population of this country of ours is made up of various races and nationalities. It is a sparse population scattered over half a continent, a country as large as Europe. The policy of any Government should be to promote national unity in this country.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE:—so that if we are at war, all parts of this country should be as one in the prosecution of the war. Now then, my hon. friend puts forward as a criticism of this Budget that it would please the people of the West. I say again, for myself and the Government, that if the people of the West are pleased with what has been done, they are not more pleased than we are that we have been able to do it for them.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) puts forward an amendment. He is not content with what has been done. He puts forward a useless, an unnecessary, a trivial amendment. Is it a genuine amendment? Or is it a political expedient destined to fail of its purpose? Well, we know what it is. My hon. friend from Assiniboia has no doubt as to the validity of what has been done. I have enunciated the policy of the Government to-day, and there has been read to this House the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice as to the effect of our action under the War Measures Act. Why does he put forward this needless amendment? He desires to embarrass the Government, he moves it on a resolution to go into Committee of Ways and Means. His amendment will not deceive the people of the West for one moment, not for one moment. It suggests on its face a want of confidence in the Government. It reflects on our intentions, it asperses our motives, it casts unfounded doubt upon our action under the War Measures Act. It should, without hesitation, be voted down by this House.

Mr. GEO. E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) is entitled to the thanks of this House for introducing the amendment which is now under consideration, if only for the reason that it has brought from the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) a most important statement with regard to this great question, which he did not think it necessary to refer to in his original budget speech, and also for the very definite pledge which he gave to Parliament that there would be no new duties added except by an Act of this House. The Minister of Finance gave us many reasons why free wheat should not have been given before the present Order in Council was passed, and he entirely justified its passage at the present time. He says that he would not have done anything contrary to the national interest. No one would expect a finance minister, of this country, or any person in this House to declare that he would act contrary to the national interest. We agree with him that he is acting in accord with the national interest now. What we say to him is that the Government, in having delayed this relief for so long a time, was not acting in the national interest heretofore. If one reads over the Order in Council he finds that emphasis is laid upon the fact that this is to be a great relief with reference to the lower grades of wheat. That would always have been the case. That was one of the great reasons always urged in this House heretofore for free wheat. And it has been with respect to the lower grades rather than to the higher grades that the farmer heretofore has been losing in great amount. The explanation which the Finance Minister gives as to the change of attitude from then to now matters little, but the conclusion of his Order in Council is very important. He advises the Government that it is desirable in the national interest that free access be obtained for our wheat in the markets of the United States. I heard my hon friend the Solicitor General the other day. In reading over his speech, it seems to me that he took other ground than that of the Finance Minister. He not only proved that free wheat would have been an evil before the Order in Council was passed, but he also proved that it is an evil now. He laid great stress on public opinion in the West. I think that I am doing him full justice when I say that the conclusion that one would reach after reading over his speech is that there were no economic reasons which would justify the Government in having placed wheat on the free list, and that the reason which appealed to him most and which he put forward with all the force of which he is capable, is that it was a measure to conciliate the West, and that it was in the national interest, to have the West satisfied. When one decides to adopt a policy of which the economic effect is not certain, but in order to satisfy a public sentiment, whether economically sound or not, the inference is very clear that the reason is political; and one is reminded of the statement which the Solicitor General made only a short fourteen months ago that he thought that 90 per cent of the agitation for free wheat was political and that ten per cent was economically unsound. Apparently he holds that the ten per cent is still unsound and he has adopted the ninety per cent to himself. Why? The change was made in response to public sentiment in the West. As we read the war news we find that leaders of armies which have to make great retreats explain their withdrawal as a problem of strategy. They devastate the ground between the old lines and the new, and they claim to have entrapped the enemy and to have shortened their own line. So it is with this Government. Their retreat from the old position to the new is only strategy. They have given up some of their trenches; they have shortened their lines, but they have not saved themselves from defeat. There are more trenches to be taken, and victory will come to the forces which have driven them back. The battle of lower tariffs and freer trade is still going on and will come to a victorious conclusion.

Mr. TURRIFF: I would like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the Government has abdicated. There is not a minister in the House.

Mr. McCRANEY: The hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) correctly interpreted the spirit in which this measure has been put before the country. He accepted it as a temporary measure and held out the hope that the substitute for it in a short time would be a preference in the British market. We have had the announcement from London that there are to be Imperial preferences, and we have also the statement of Mr. Bonar Law that foodstuffs are not to come within that preference. Agriculture, the growing of foodstuffs, is our basic industry, and the effect of Mr. Bonar Law's statement is that that great industry will have no preference. We do not feel badly about it; our farmers have never asked for a preference and I do not think they want it. They want free trade in that market as they want it in this. One wonders what class of product this country will manufacture that will have a tempting preference in the mother country. One wonders whether our people will be satisfied to abandon the newly-added market for our great products in the United States in order to obtain a market for our manufactured products in the Old country. When this Government wants to do something to mystify the public and to convince a portion of the community that they would not go as far as they actually do, they issue a proclamation under the War Measures Act. When they attempt to raise 50,000 men for home defence, and find that their Nationalist supporters do not want them to have conscription, they use the War Measures Act instead of the Militia Act. Their attitude with regard to free wheat is in much the same class. They are afraid of some of their eastern supporters, and they have not taken the strong stand that they might have taken by legislation; they prefer to give reasons which are only temporary in their character for the introduction of such important legislation. It matters very little to me whether the effect of this Order in Council ceases automatically at the end of the war. I accept the statement of the Minister of Finance that he at least will not repeal the provision of free wheat by Order in Council. I think it is most unfortunate, however, that the public are led to believe that there is hesitation on the part of the Government, and that the course they have adopted in the matter of free wheat, which should be in the line of a permanent principle, is of such a temporary character. One must recall the reasons which were given in the public press for opposing free wheat in order to see how completely those reasons are negatived by the Order in Council. Some of the objections were as follows:

It ships our raw products into another country, there to be manufactured, thus making our Canadian farmers hewers of wood and drawers of water to the Americans.

It permits Washington to fix our tariff for us.

It will lead to the destruction of the reputation now held by our grain by enabling the Americans to mix it with their baser grades.

It will give the United States millers a supply of hard wheat, thus enabling them to chase Canadian flour out of the markets of the world.

It will deflect our grain to United States channels, to the ruin of our transcontinental systems.

It will destroy the Canadian mills.

It will encourage the Canadian farmer to continue wheat mining instead of going into mixed farming.

It will ruin the Canadian farmer by subjecting him to the competition not only of the United States farmer, but of the wheat raisers in the thirteen countries with which Canada has most favoured nation treaties.

It will prevent Canadian farmers from getting preferential treatment under the Chamberlain scheme.

And, Sir, all these reasons, so relied on two years ago by the Government, fall with the passage of the Order in Council conceding free wheat.

In the Budget speech, the Finance Minister placed before us a condition of things for which the public of Canada is to be very highly congratulated. We have an income of $232,000,000. The minister points out that our war debt arising out of the war alone has been increased to the extent of $600,000,000, and that the total is in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000,000. In addition to that, we have been able this year to appropriate $60,000,000 to war expenditure which would otherwise have been added to our national debt. A year ago the minister was able to announce an appropriation of $45,000,000 in the same way, making a total of $105,000,000 by which we have been able to reduce the war expenditure and save the public debt. That is to say, we have added to the debt $600,000,000; we have expended another $100,000,000, a total of $700,000,000, and of that amount of $700,000,000 we have paid on account only $100,000,000, in round figures.

The means which have been adopted by this Government to meet this most extraordinary expenditure are the increasing of the general tariff by 7½ per cent, the lowering of the preference on British goods by 5 per cent, the imposition of the stamp duties and the business tax; and this year the minister announces in his Budget Speech a further addition to the Business Profits War Tax. The minister has pointed out that there is no tax on luxuries, for one reason, namely because the great bulk of imports from France under our treaty with that country are in that class, and that it is necessary, in order to keep up the credit of France on this side of the water that nothing should be done to reduce those imports. One is reminded that while the Minister of Finance of this Government is so solicitous for the credit of France on this side of the water, in respect of luxuries which do us little or no good, the same Government has restricted from the mother country, which is more than our ally, importations of necessaries and not luxuries by the addition of a duty of 5 per cent, and has embarrassed the mother country in that way in the matter of exchange on this side of the water. The additions to taxation are largely out of war profits. If we are carrying on the war with our best energy, we hope that these profits will soon come to an end; and when the war is over, we must turn to altogether new sources of income in order to reduce this tremendous debt. There is to be no income tax, so the minister says, and one of the strong reasons given is that so many people have bought war bonds and that those bonds are not taxable. Those war bonds have been purchased by some 35,000 or 40,000 citizens of Canada, a comparatively small number, and the tendency will be that the bonds of the small holders will get into the hands of the big holder, and thus the poorer part of our population will be paying interest to the more wealthy part; yet instead of taking more from the public, the minister promises that he will borrow more.

Our men in France and Flanders are making tremendous sacrifices. One cannot read in the papers of to-day of their heroism and of the mutilation that is going on there, without thinking that we have never really appreciated what our men at the front are doing. We speak about our volunteer system as though, when men were willing to go to fight, they liked to go. I cannot imagine that any man of choice would go into the experiences and scenes that are occurring at the front at this moment. It is only because of the very highest sense of patriotism, of devotion to this Empire and to this country, and of faithfulness to principles that any man would expose himself to the danger of mutilation and death. Perhaps, if when the war began, we had a different conception of what it meant, we might have taken stronger measures for getting men to go, and those of us who remain in this country, would, I am sure, have been willing to do much more than at this time we can ever hope to do in making provision for the future of those brave men and of their families. We have enlisted 400,000 men, but we are allowing their ranks to be depleted. This Government is not acting courageously in this matter and is not doing fairly by the men who are in France, although I am sure that the people of Canada will be behind this Government or any government that takes radical measures to maintain the strength of our fighting forces.

While we have incurred a war expenditure of $700,000,000 and have paid only $100,000,000 on account of it, we are saying to the men at the front that not only are they doing our fighting for us, but they will be expected to, help ur to do the paying for the munitions which they use. We are reserving for them and their children, along with ourselves, the payment of this debt. We are not even providing them free with the guns and munitions which they use, and I believe that if this Government will adopt a stronger policy; if they will take more from the public and borrow less, they will merit the appreciation of all well thinking citizens.

The minister points out that the future should help to bear this burden. I entirely agree with him. The fight that is being made is being made for humanity's sake, and it is our hope that the results of this war will free the world—we hope, forever—from a campaign of Prussian conquest and world domination, but we must bear in mind that each generation has its own troubles, and that we are not doing much for posterity if those of us who are not fighting are simply handing down a burden. I believe that to a greater extent this generation should relieve the soldiers who are at the front and their families and the generations to come of the burden of this war.

The minister gave us as one reason why we should not now put on more taxes, that we look for immigration after the war, and that our burden of taxation must not be so great as to alarm possible immigrants. I am not afraid of the great public debt which we are piling up. The people of Canada have not felt the effects of this war, apart from those who have their sons at the front or who have lost them on the field, and, from a financial point of view, apart from those who have lost the breadwinner in the family; or that large class, salaried class, of our community, or those who are living on a limited income. These people are feeling the burdens of this war, but in eastern Canada our people are growing more wealthy. The very war itself has brought great contracts for munitions. The capitalist has become wealthy, and the skilled mechanic has been receiving wages that before the war no one would have thought possible. In western Canada, because of war conditions, our great staple, wheat, has reached a high price and our people are better off than they were before.

I am not alarmed, Sir, about the national debt. I am not alarmed at the burdens which incoming immigrants may have to share with us. We can by reducing the cost of living and by personal thrift, with which our people have up to the present time had little concern, place ourselves in an economic condition to meet all these great burdens. In that connection I want to refer to one great movement that has not directly arisen out of the war, but which has been accelerated by it, and that is the abolition of the liquor traffic in so many of our provinces. Apart from the moral results which it may bring about, I believe that it will mean a great saving among our people, and will be of an economic advantage that we cannot at this present time estimate.

After the war, we have been told there are to be preferential tariffs, and special tariffs against those who are now our enemies. We all appreciate the fact that the United States in coming into the war, has re-united herself, after 140 years, with the family of the great Anglo-Saxon mother, and that for humanity's sake, she is now standing on the side of liberty and of freedom; she is also taking up burdens at this time for which she will have to pay, and which are of great benefit to us. But the advantage to us is not only on the material side. There is the great advantage to the United States in having arrived at a moral status which gives the nation self-pride, instead of being as it was—a reproach to some of the best minds in that country. I cannot but rejoice in the fact that the United States has become one of our allies, and we Canadians must treat that country as our economic friend rather than as our economic enemy, as we have been disposed to do in the past. I cannot imagine anything which would gratify our own people more, and be of greater economic advantage to us than that the United States should have a place at the Peace conference, and take part in the mutual arrangements of which such a question as we are discussing to-day is only the forerunner.

There is also a great deal of talk as to what we are going to do with Germany when the war is over, and it is said that we are going to put on such tariffs as will discourage any trade with her; that we will not only see her bankrupt economically, but prevent her increasing her strength, and see to it that for an indefinite time to come she remain in a position of economic helplessness. I allude to that because I feel that those who talk that way are not out to win the war. This "war after the war" means that the present war is not to be won. I want to see this war so thoroughly won that we will be sorry for the Germans, and that our people, as the British have always done, will be willing to lend a hand to the defeated one, and, while fully protecting ourselves, I trust that we will encourage and inspire a spirit of friendship which will be the best guarantee of peaceful relations for the future.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would my hon. friend explain that phrase "fully protecting ourselves"?

Mr. McCRANEY: I do not suppose that my hon. friend understands any other kind of protection than the protection of tariffs. My idea would be a protection of good will, which is the surest foundation of peace.

Mr. JOHN WEBSTER (Brockville): Mr. Speaker, as I do not often impose on the time of honourable members of this House, I feel that I may be permitted to offer to the Minister of Finance my most hearty congratulations on the very successful war-time Budget that he has been able to bring down at this time, being the third year of Canada's participation in this great war. I also wish to express to the hon. gentleman my hearty congratulations on the success that attended his latest war loan, which, like the two former issues, was very largely over-subscribed. I am sure it must be very pleasant for the Minister of Finance to see the confidence that not only the people generally in this country have in him, but also the directors of our financial institutions and the citizens of the great republic to the south of us, who have invested so largely in these loans and helped to make them such a decided success. I am sure that I voice the sentiments of the greater majority of the people of this country when I say that we hope and trust that the Minister of Finance may be spared his usual good health for a long time to come, to guide and direct the financial affairs of this country.

I am going to make a few remarks from the standpoint of the dairy farmer and to endeavour to reply to some of the questions advanced in this debate. I have no brief for the farmers of this country, but as four of the products of the farm of this particular section have been referred to in the discussion, I think it is my duty to endeavour to place the matter in a proper light before those who dwell in our towns and cities. The four articles to which I refer are used in every household—milk, butter, cheese, and bacon. Upon these items the farmers of this section depend for their income at this season. I was amused at the remarks of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville). It seems to me that the dwellers in the cities do not fully understand the position of the farmer. They seem to believe that the farmer is producing these articles to which I have referred at about the same cost as in years gone by. But that is a very wrong conclusion to arrive at. The remarks made by the hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred on the subject of the high cost of living are likely to give what seems to me a very wrong impression. I think the only solution of this very vexing problem is to turn some of the consumers of this and other countries into producers. I gathered from the remarks of these hon. members that they thought that the farmers of this part of Canada were receiving altogether too much hard cash for the products of their dairies. I do not agree with that view. The farmers of this country, as was stated by the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) this afternoon, are the hardest working class we have, and I rejoice that they are coming into their just rights. If the farmers are prosperous to-day I congratulate them, and I also congratulate the Government that has made it possible for them to be prosperous. Any country that has agriculture as its basic industry is bound to be prosperous. That is why Canada enjoys so much prosperity at this time.

Some of the utterances in this debate would go to show that the dwellers in our cities have not yet grasped the true position of the farmers. What is the great need of the farmers of this section to-day? Is it not labour? Why do the labouring men in the cities refuse to go to work on the farms? They say that the hours of work are altogether too long and that there are no places of amusement for them at the end of their day's labour. But if the farmers of this country were to cease their operations at the end of eight or nine hours' work, as the dwellers in cities and towns do, the production of this country would be much less than it is at the present time. I personally know farmers who are working fifteen long hours a day owing to the scarcity of labour. We have just passed through one of the heaviest winters that this part of Canada has experienced for many a year. Yet what has been the condition of the people in our towns and cities? Is it not a fact that the labouring classes were never so well off as they are to-day? They have money to buy the products of the farm, even at the advanced prices. The charity committees of our municipal councils in this part of Canada never had as little demand upon their aid in any winter as in that which has just passed. This was due to the fact that the labouring classes have their own money to spend, and they live better, I believe, than ever before. But the farmer has to pay double the price for his help that he paid five years ago. Upon what could we depend to stimulate production from the soil if the Government were to interfere with the farmers' prices? Every man loves to dispose of his products at the best possible price.

Now let us consider the cost of producing milk. We have heard a great deal about the high price the farmer is obtaining for this product. But the cost of producing this article is more than double what it was five years ago. It would be unreasonable to suppose that the farmer is not to receive the full benefit of his labour. What are the reasons for the high cost of production to-day? One very important reason is the failure of the corn crop in the Western States as well as here in Canada. Cornmeal to-day is worth $55 a ton; bran, $45 to $48 a ton; oats, 85 cents a bushel, and so on. Compare these prices with prices paid by the farmers five years ago, and you will see that they are now more than double.

Let me say a word now as to cheese. I do not purpose to elaborate on the quality of the cheese made in Canada. I put it briefly but fairly when I say that to-day Canadian cheese stands on the highest rung of the ladder as the finest article of that product in the world. The price of cheese was particularly referred to in this debate the other evening. Coming as I do from the banner dairying county of Ontario, and having been engaged in this particular line of trade for the past forty years, I think I am in a position to speak confidently regarding this particular product. In the town I have the honour to represent we have a weekly meeting of the Dairymen's Board of Trade, where it is no unusual thing, in the flow of the season, to see anywhere from 8,000 to 10,000 boxes registered for sale at the highest price obtainable by auction. At present prices, this represents a value of $160,000 to $200,000 of a cash income for that particular district each week. Now, it is all very well to consider the prices of to-day; they are very, very high, I am free to admit. But, if you compare them with the prices the farmer had to sell this article for in the year 1904 and take the average, you will see that the farmer is only getting what is right. In 1904, the farmers sold their cheese at 6¾ cents a pound at the first meeting of the board in May. The average price for the season of 1904 was 8½ to 9 cents a pound. Owing to the war conditions last year it averaged nearer to 19 cents a pound. While the farmer is obtaining high prices for his product, he is paying nearly double to the manufacturer or proprietor for manufacturing his milk into cheese, and he is paying also extra high prices for feed and labour. I will not detain the House by enumerating all the articles that enter into production, but I will refer to just one. Previous to this war I have sold thousands of gallons of extract of rennet for $1.50 per gallon, but to-day that rennet is worth $10 per gallon, and it cannot always be obtained even at that advanced price. That is one of the reasons why prices are so high to-day. Then take the butter question. What do we find to-day throughout the sections where the butter factories are located? They have to return to the farmer as much money for the milk they receive to make into butter as their competitors who are making cheese, or possibly they may be next door neighbour to the man who is sending the whole of his milk to the city for domestic use. Therefore, the butter manufacturer must get as good a price for his product because of the fact that labour and supplies are just as high as in the case of cheese. There is another factor that the farmer must consider to-day. The man who is producing milk for the city and who raises no calves to replenish his herd, must go out into the country and buy his milking cows. Five years ago he could go into any farmer's barnyard and pick out the best cow in the herd for $50, while to-day he has to pay from $100 to $125 for an ordinary good grade cow. That has increased his capital expenditure.

The price of bacon was referred to the other evening. Now, let us consider for a few minutes the situation as to the cost of this article. Bacon hogs are bringing fancy prices to-day. If you will refer to the Montreal market you will see that select bacon hogs are bringing $17 per hundredweight, but the farmer has to pay an additional price to the man who is so fortunate as to have the little pigs for sale. Five years ago, you could buy those little pigs in this country for $1.50 to $2 each. To-day they cost the farmer $12 to $15 a pair at four to six weeks of age. Skim milk at that time was worth practically two cents a quart, but to-day it is worth five cents a quart. Therefore, I claim that the farmer is not receiving any extraordinary advance in this line. If you will compare the prices which the farmer received for this product in 1904 with those of to-day you will see a vast difference. I know a member of this House who, in 1904, sold 40 select bacon hogs for 3½ cents per pound. Is it not right that the farmer should enjoy the prices that he is getting to-day to enable him to even up the losses made at that time? The bacon hog is a by-product of the dairy, and cannot be retained or produced to advantage in its younger days without skim milk or sweet whey, which to-day for feed purposes is worth double the amount of what its cash value was five years ago. In addition to the higher cost of the by-product of the dairy, the farmer is compelled to-day to pay $48 per ton for shorts, which he formerly purchased at a cost of from $18 to $20 per ton. If we consider those high prices the farmer has to pay for cows, help and feed, we will be free to admit that he must get higher prices for his product.

If it were not for the destruction of shipping by the German submarines, the food supply of the world would not be in such a precarious position as it is to-day. If Great Britain and her Allies had the wheat, flour, cheese, bacon, and meats that have been sunk in the ocean, there would be no immediate shortage of food supplies. Take the situation of New Zealand to-day with 400,000 boxes of cheese ready for shipment, and also a large amount of butter, to say nothing of three and a half millions of carcasses of dressed mutton and no vessels in sight to solve the transportation problem. I think, Mr. Speaker, that our friends on the Opposition benches will be free to admit that there is a real German submarine menace in existence at the present time.

I do not intend to discuss the question of free wheat, as it has been thoroughly aired from all points of view but there is one thing that I have remarked in the Liberal press of this country, and that is their earnest endeavour to belittle everything possible done by the present Administration. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugley), the other evening, did not appear to like the idea of clippings from the press being read in the House, but I hold one in my hand taken from the paper of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), the Brockville Recorder of April 25, 1917, which I am inclined to believe is another one of their endeavours to prove the incompetence of the Borden Administration. I will read it for the benefit of the House:

> Another evidence of the incompetence or worse of the Borden Government is found in the fact that when Sir Thomas White had passed the free wheat enactment, the authorities at Washington were not notified of the order and in consequence the Canadian product was held up by the United States Customs Officials and the Canadian producers were mulcted for large sums in the way of car demurrage. It was a not unusual oversight for Borden's men and a costly one to the Canadian wheat exporters.

Let me say that I have learned from undoubted authority that the American Consul here was promptly furnished with a certified copy of the action of the Government as stated by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) in his address the other evening, and he duly forwarded the information to Washington at once. Now, I wonder if the hon. member for South Renfrew will be sufficiently fair to correct this false statement in his newspaper.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is the first time I have seen that item. I presume it is the item which appeared in very many of the papers. I read it in dozens of papers and I took occasion the other evening to ask the minister as to that and he corrected it at the time.

Mr. WEBSTER: It appeared on April 25, 1915. While I am on my feet I am going to take this opportunity to congratulate the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and his colleagues on the success that they have achieved in their efforts to aid the Mother Country since the outbreak of this great world war. Let me say, Sir, that through those efforts they have succeeded in sending to the front a great army of young men, the flower of the manhood of this country, whose valorous deeds on the battle field have resulted in writing the word "Canada" high up on the scroll of honour among the nations of the world. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the brightest pages in the history of this war will be those that chronicle the achievements of our Canadian troops and let me say, Sir, that the record will be read with the greatest possible pleasure by Canadian posterity. It was nobly said by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) the other evening that Canadians knew how to live and that they had proven to the world that for the cause of freedom they knew how to die. In passing, Sir, I think it is only right that I should also pay my tribute of respect to the women of Canada for the efforts they have put forth. Let me say that the wives, the mothers, the daughters and the sisters and sweethearts of Canada are those on whose shoulders have rested the greatest possible responsibilities and anxieties, and only by the supreme patriotism which they have displayed have they made it possible for this Government to achieve what they have accomplished. They have given freely of their best, both sons and daughters, and I read with great pleasure the other day that there is no better class of nurses doing service in the great armies of the Allies than those who have gone from our own Canadian shores. Our doctors also have done a noble and humane work, but, Mr. Speaker, I think at the present time, we are too close to this great war to fully realize or appreciate what our own Canadian boys have succeeded in doing.

Let me say that the immortal deeds of the men of the maple leaf, the men who are proud to call Canada their home, will be recorded by the historians of the future; and generations of Canadians yet unborn will read with noble pride these pages in the book of history. When this great conflict has come to an end, when this cruel war is over, and when the dove of peace has again unfolded and spread her wings over the warring nations of Europe, then Canada will stand out pre-eminently among the nations of the world as the one nation that went into this fight, not from compulsion, but from a higher, loftier and nobler motive, a sense of duty and a patriotism that would not be denied, to secure for all time to come justice and liberty for the smaller nations of the world.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we, the people of Canada, like all the citizens of the great British Empire to which we are so proud to belong, are fully resolved to face to a finish whatever the future may bring, until, in the providence of God and through the valour of our noble men, victory shall rest on our flag, and righteousness shall have been vindicated.

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, the intervention of the Minister of Finance in the Budget debate this afternoon for the second time would seem to indicate that something has happened to disturb the serenity which he usually displays in his addresses to this House. The papers of yesterday contain the statement that on Saturday last the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) delivered an address to his electors in the county of Victoria. In the course of that very interesting address he said:

> In New York I was informed by a leading American financial magnate that I should not sail; that an attempt was about to be made to destroy me, and I was urged to cancel my trip. Thinking reference was had to torpedoes, I laughingly passed it off. The gentleman assured me, however, it was not torpedoes at sea, but "envenomed poison on the part of some of your own colleagues in the Cabinet who seek to get rid of the Prime Minister, but who realize that you are behind him solid, and in order to get rid of him they must first get rid of you."

The sequel to the statement of the ex-Minister of Militia is to be found in the presentation of the Finance Minister this afternoon. We remember that on Friday last the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) addressed this House upon the question of free wheat. There is apparently a feeling in this country supported by electors who are in sympathy with the Finance Minister that, should the conspiracy of which the ex-Minister of Militia speaks succeed, the Minister of Finance will be selected to lead the Conservative party. On the other hand, there are electors in the West supporting the Conservative party who believe that the honours and the mantle of the present Prime Minister should fall upon the youthful shoulders of the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). I beg to assure the Finance Minister that the speech made by the Solicitor General on Friday evening last did not at all require his intervention in this debate. While the Solicitor General did the very best he could, I assure the Finance Minister that he did not enhance his reputation as a special pleader by the address which he delivered to the House as to the reasons why the Government granted free wheat under the Order in Council of the sixteenth of April. I may with equal confidence assure the Solicitor General that the speech made by the Finance Minister this afternoon did not put him in a light superior to the Solicitor General in special pleading as to a subject on which neither of them appear to have much enthusiasm.

The Minister of Finance endeavoured to get some consolation out of the volte-face which he and his colleagues turned upon the subject of free wheat, from the traditional record of the Conservative party with respect to reciprocity. He pointed out that the principle of reciprocity was accepted by the Conservative party away back in 1878 and that he was not acting inconsistently with that policy in adopting the platform of free wheat as he did on a recent occasion. I might say that the resolution moved in the House of Commons by the Conservative party in 1879 in which the subject of reciprocity was mentioned, was formulated from a platform that was intended only for the purpose of getting into power, and the moment the Conservative party got into power they spurned the policy of reciprocity. Only when they were driven by the force of public opinion to accept its tenets was it adopted as part of their policy. We remember that in 1891 the Conservative party, having regard to the growing sentiment in favour of reciprocity throughout Canada, and being then face to face with a Dominion election, thought it would be to their interest to catch the vote of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada by professing to be in favour of reciprocity. But the gentlemen who formulated that policy did not receive the sanction of the Government of the United States, notwithstanding that Sir Charles Tupper, the spokesman of the Conservative party on that occasion avowed in the midst of the campaign that it was unnecessary for the people of Canada to support the Liberal party in order to get reciprocity, that they themselves were negotiating an extended measure not confined to natural products alone, but embracing manufactured goods as well. We know that the Secretary of State in the United States Government of that day took an early opportunity to repudiate the statement made by Sir Charles Tupper, and since then the Conservative party did not again venture to take up the subject under the name of reciprocity, notwithstanding that, in 1879, the policy of the party was adopted to bring about a reciprocity of tariffs and thereafter a reciprocity of trade. The speech of the Finance Minister this afternoon also accentuated the fact that he and the Solicitor General are not in accord as to the results which will flow from the placing of wheat on the free list. The Solicitor General, in his speech on Friday afternoon, said:—

> Where are the hon. gentlemen who in this House year after year assured us that as soon as we let down these iniquitous barriers the Winnipeg price would advance to the Minneapolis level to the benefit of the Canadian producer? If we follow the market after the 17th of April, we find that both markets advanced together with the same smaller spread between them that obtained the day before and the day after the Order in Council was passed.

The whole argument of the Solicitor General to this House on Friday last was that placing wheat upon the free list was of no advantage whatever to the western farmer, and he endeavoured to prove this by quoting figures.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understood the Solicitor General to be referring to the higher grades, and I was speaking this afternoon with regard to the lower grades when I mentioned the payment of duty by the farmer.

Mr. KYTE: The Solicitor General was referring to the price of wheat at Minneapolis. As I said, his whole argument was built up for the purpose of trying to convince the House that the placing of wheat on the free list would be of no advantage to the western farmer. He stated, further, that the only time when the placing of wheat on the free list might be of advantage would be when there was an export trade in wheat from the United States to Great Britain, but as there was no export trade at the present time, the result that the Liberals anticipated in the way of advantage to the farmers under an arrangement for free wheat could not possibly accrue to them now. If the placing of wheat upon the free list did not result in increasing the price of wheat to the Canadian farmer, it had the effect of immediately increasing the price of flour to the Canadian consumer. Immediately after it became known that wheat had been placed on the free list, flour took a jump of 30 cents, 50 cents and, in a few days, 75 cents a barrel. We can only argue from the observations made by the Solicitor General that at a time when the price of wheat was low, when the farmers might reasonably accept a higher price to compensate them for their labours in respect of wheat-growing and when the price of flour was so moderate that the consumer could afford to pay a little more for his flour without feeling the burden of it, the present Government refused to put wheat upon the free list. But when abnormal conditions were brought about; when the placing of wheat upon the free list could not result in increasing the price to the farmer and would inevitably result in increasing the price of flour to the consumer, that was the time that the Government selected to place wheat upon the free list. The Finance Minister stated in the course of his speech that no industry in Canada has had greater profits since the outbreak of war than the milling industry; yet when the policy of free wheat was accepted by the Conservative party, the price of wheat for the farmer did not increase, but the price of flour to the consumer did increase enormously. So that the consumer of Canada, after waiting for five years for the deliberate action of this Government to place wheat on the free list, is paying more for his flour than he ever did, and the farmer gets nothing in respect of the increased price of wheat.

Mr. LALOR: Does the hon. gentleman assume that that is the result of free flour?

Mr. KYTE: It is not necessarily a result of free flour; it is the result of free wheat under the present conditions. It gave the speculator an opportunity again to boost the price of flour upon the pretext that because wheat was placed on the free list it was necessary to increase the price of flour. The Solicitor General has met that by saying that the putting of wheat on the free list has not increased the price to the farmer so that there is no justification for increasing the price of flour to the consumer.

The Minister of Finance endeavoured to convince this House that the placing of wheat upon the free list by Order in Council at this time could have had no relation to political conditions in Canada. The last time a change in the tariff was made by this Government under Order in Council was in the year 1912, upon the eve of an election, in the province of Saskatchewan. It was the intention of the Government without previous intimation to reduce the price of cement, and an Order in Council was passed by this Government cutting the cement duty in two. That action synchronized with the holding of a provincial election in the province of Saskatchewan. If, therefore, at a time like this we on this side of the House find the Government by Order in Council again making appeals to the farmers of Western Canada in respect to the wheat, the hon. Finance Minister should not be angry with us if we associate his conduct in this respect with the election to be held in the province of Saskatchewan in the course of a few weeks.

The Finance Minister has taken great credit to himself for the many good things which he has brought about on behalf of the farmer. I do not think it is the desire of any person on this side of the House to rob the Finance Minister of any credit or glory to which he is justly and properly entitled in respect of the effect of the policies of his department upon any of the interests of this country. He said among other things that in the interests of the farmers he had put through an amendment to the Banking Act which enabled the farmer to hypothecate his stock for the purpose of securing loans. That was a condition which reflected not so much upon the fairness of the Finance Minister as upon the failure of the present Government to perpetuate the condition of affairs that existed when they came into office. It is true that the predecessor of my hon. friend, during the fifteen years that he was Minister of Finance, did not amend the Banking Act for the purpose of enabling the farmers to hypothecate their stock, because money being plentiful and farming operations profitable, it was not necessary in those days for the farmers to hypothecate their stock in order to raise money. But with the coming of the Conservative party into power a changed condition of affairs was brought about and it was necessary for the Finance Minister to give authority to the farmers to hypothecate their stock in order to obtain the money necessary for their daily needs.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KYTE (resuming): Mr. Speaker, before the House rose at six o'clock I pointed out that the only result of placing wheat upon the free list on the 16th of April last was to increase the price of flour to the consumer, a price that had already reached such a height as to make it in many instances impossible for the working people throughout Canada to obtain for themselves and their families the quantity of flour necessary for their support and sustenance. On the Montreal market, on the 17th day of April the price of flour had advanced 30 cents a barrel which meant a total advance of $1.40 in a week. Manitoba brands jumped 40 cents a barrel and Ontario brands jumped 60 cents a barrel by the 18th day of April. The cause of this rise in the price of flour is not the scarcity of wheat in Canada, because the market reports of that date informed the public that there was in Canada a surplus of 81,500,000 bushels of wheat. The export trade had ceased owing to the German submarines, and notwithstanding the fact that we had this large surplus of wheat in Canada, and notwithstanding the fact that the amount of the duty on wheat had been taken off by the Order in Council of the 16th of April, the price of flour continues to rise. The Financial Post, on the 17th of April had this to say:

> Flour advanced twice during the week, a total increase of seventy cents a barrel, a record for flour, which brought the price up to $10.70. The highest figure for flour prior to this was $10.50 in November last. The export flour business fom Canada is practically at a standstill. The Ogilvie Flour Milling Company informs the Financial Post that space is not available for ordinary commercial business overseas. The high cost of living is a regrettable economic fact, over which the packers and canners and other distributors of foodstuffs have no control. The enormous and eager demand for our products has brought about the situation. The remedy, as far as the Canadian consumer is concerned, is to reduce his demands.

During all this time, no effort was made on the part of the Department of Labour, that had particular charge of the question of prices under the proceedings which it had originated some months ago, to regulate the price of flour and other foodstuffs in Canada. The Minister of Finance stated this afternoon that the milling industry in Canada had made larger profits since the war began than any other industry. His statement is borne out by an announcement in regard to the Ogilvie Milling Company which was published in the month of October last, and which reads:

> A bonus of 4 per cent. for the year ended August 31st last was declared by the directors of the Ogilvie Flour Mills Co., Limited, on its $2,500,000 common stock, at a meeting held here yesterday afternoon. The bonus will be paid on October 1st along with the regular quarterly dividend of 2 per cent., making a total distribution out of the year's profits of 12 per cent.
> The bonus declared yesterday is the first extra distribution to be made by the Ogilvie Company since the stock was listed on the Montreal Exchange in 1908, although bonus payments have been popular with other milling concerns when an exceptionally good run of business has been struck. When the stock was listed the common shares were returning 7 per cent.; the rate was advanced to 8 per cent. in 1910 and has been held steady at that level through good times and bad.
>
> A year ago, when exceptional profits from wheat brought the earnings up to the phenomenally high level of 95 per cent. on the common,—

That is apparently an error.

> —the directors held to their conservative course, and shareholders received the usual 8 per cent and nothing more. Investment values added to by this conservation of resources have naturally been potent in increasing the earning power of the stock. The status of the company, with a large supply of liquid capital at its disposal, has changed from that of a borrower to a lender.
> At yesterday's meeting the directors took the view that the results of another year's business having been extremely satisfactory, there was no reason why an extra distribution of profits should be withheld any longer.

So you will see, Sir, that the enormous prices that have been charged for foodstuffs are not due to the economic conditions brought about by the war, but rather to the advantage that has been taken of the war by the milling industry of this country to boost the prices at a time when the boosting of such prices might possibly be attributed to war conditions. I say again that the Department of Labour should have taken this condition of affairs into account and taken steps similar to those taken by other countries to prevent the undue enhancing of the prices of foodstuffs.

The Budget proposals brought down by the Minister of Finance do not indicate either courage or originality. It is the fourth Budget that has been presented to the House by the hon. gentleman since the war began. In the first session after the commencement of the conflict, the tariff was increased on certain lines, largely having reference to articles of household consumption, and again in the session 1915, another increase in the tariff was proposed by the Government and carried through this House. Last year, war taxes were levied upon the profits of certain manufacturers under conditions which have yielded to this Government the sum of $12,500,000. The Minister of Finance this afternoon took great credit to himself for adopting a system of taxation upon war profits; but the total amount of revenue obtained by the Government from this source, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, is $12,500,000, whereas the increased revenue obtained by the Government by reason of the increased tariffs which were placed upon foodstuffs amounts to something in the neighbourhood of $60,000,000. So, while the manufacturing interests, those who are engaged in the manufacture of war materials, and whose business has improved by reason of war conditions and the increased price of monufacturers generally, have contributed to the revenue only $12,500,000, the consumers of Canada have contributed vastly more than that; and as a consequence we have the conditions that now exist in Canada in respect to the increased cost of living. It would appear that the monied interests in this country are still paramount. We know that in 1911 the issue in Canada between the two parties was whether there should be a Government in power whose policy was to reduce the tariff and thereby reduce the cost of living, or whether there should be a Government in power backed up by the interests that found it to their advantage to oppose the reciprocity pact and thereby maintain a continuation of high tariffs in Canada. The gentle manner in which the Minister of Finance has touched the manufacturing interests by war taxation goes to show that those interests are still in control of this Government, and that the welfare of the consuming population of Canada is a secondary consideration. During the last three or four years there has been an enormous increase in the acquisition of wealth by the manufacturing interests of Canada. No such corresponding advantage has accrued to our consuming masses or to the working men who have to depend on their day's pay for the support of their families. I have here a statement taken from a financial newspaper of the earnings of certain corporations in Canada during the last year which shows that the Dominion Bridge Company declared a dividend for the year of 16 per cent; Price Brothers, Limited, declared a dividend of 16.1 per cent, and in regard to the Dominion Textile Company, the Financial Post states that it hears that a bonus is on the cards for the shareholders of that company which is known to have had a successful year, the sales having reached the sum of $13,000,000. It says that the preferred stock will pay a dividend of 7 per cent and the common a dividend of 6 per cent. The profits of the Canadian Locomotive Company for the current year amount to $700,000, being 35 per cent on common stock of $2,000,000, after paying $15,000 for preferred dividends.

Stanfield's Limited, after paying bond interest, sinking funds and contingencies, showed a profit of $109,688.83, equalling 14½ per cent upon the preferred and capital stock of $750,000.

The net earnings of the St. Maurice Paper Company were $363,909 in 1915, and $2,832,-277 in 1916. The balance, after interest and depreciation were deducted, amounted to $1,582,792, equalling 15·8 per cent on the $10,000,000 stock outstanding.

The Union Bank Paper Company, which owns 75 per cent of the stock of the St. Maurice Company, had interest charges of but $187,000 per annum, and the depreciation charge of about $1,061,000 last year was exceedingly liberal. The Financial Post says that it is safe to assume that at least another 5 per cent or 6 per cent of actual stock profits is concealed in the 1916 depreciation charges.

The figures for Ames, Holden & McCready for the ten months of the fiscal year which will close on April 30, shows a very large increase in turnover over the previous year, and the profits will also show a very satisfactory gain.

Steel and Radiation Company: In 1914 their business amounted to $774,231.36, and profits $13,797.02; in 1915, business $342,-344:81, and profits, $123,086.20, and in 1916, business $457,389.87, and profits, $303,601.-33. This discloses the extraordinary circumstance that notwithstanding their business in 1914 was almost double their business in 1916, in the former year their profits were only $13,797.02 as compared with $303,-601.33 in 1916. Last year the Dominion Textile Company earned profits of $1,481,-195, equalling 12·5 per cent on the common stock. The Consolidated Rubber Company had net sales in 1915 amounting to $7,522,-147; in 1916, $12,094,695. Their profits in 1915 amounted to $534,978, and in 1916 to $905,205, or 22 per cent upon the common stock of $4,125,000. The Ogilvie Milling Company declared a dividend of 8 per cent on $2,500,000 common stock, and a second bonus of 4 per cent, making a total profit divided among the shareholders of 16 per cent. It is stated that the actual earnings of the Company amounted to over 25 per cent.

The Gould Manufacturing Company had profits in 1915 of $99,069, and in 1916 of $229,447, equalling 24 per cent upon the common stock of $750,000. The Canadian Fairbanks-Morse declared dividends amounting to 39.97 per cent, upon a common stock of $1,480,600. The Dominion Steel Foundry paid 60 per cent in dividends during 1916. The Brandram-Henderson annual statement indicates a large increase in profits during the year. The surplus available after paying bond interest and preferred dividends and making liberal allowance for contingencies amounts to 13·8 per cent of the common stock outstanding, while the total surplus now amounts to about 36 per cent.

The Belding-Paul-Corticelli Company, after allowing for preferred dividends for the year, it is understood can show a surplus equal to 10 per cent on the common stock. This will be equal to 15 per cent on the preferred, compared with 7·1 per cent in 1915 and 4·9 per cent in 1914.

I quote these figures to show that, notwithstanding the war conditions from which every person in this country is supposed to be suffering, one element in Canada is certainly not suffering by reason of those conditions, for these manufacturing concerns are declaring dividends to their shareholders very much greater than any they ever declared in times of peace.

Mr. STANFIELD: Not all of them.

Mr. KYTE: With regard to the Bank of Nova Scotia, its net earnings for the year amounted to 19.2 per cent of the capital. The National Trust Company in 1916 had net profits of $236,254, equal to 15.7 per cent on the capital; 10 per cent was paid to shareholders and the balance carried forward.

With respect to the proposal brought down by the Department of Labour some few months ago on the subject of the cost of living, we have before us the Order in Council which was made public by the department, and on the strength of which the Minister of Labour claims credit for having done something calculated to reduce very materially the cost of foodstuffs to consumers. I will read a few sections from the Order in Council, showing the procedure to be followed. Section 3 says:

(1) No person shall accumulate or shall withhold from sale any necessary of life beyond an amount thereof reasonably required for the use or consumption of his household or for the ordinary purposes of his business.

(4) The Minister of Labour may, by notice in writing under his hand or that of his deputy, require any person who operates, controls or manages any cold storage plant, packing house, cannery, factory, mine, warehouse, or other premises in which or in any part of which any necessary of life is prepared, manufactured, produced or held by such person for himself or for another, or who in any manner deals in any necessary of life, to make and render unto such minister precisely as required by him, a written return.

And the Order in Council states the particulars to be given in the return. Section 5 says:

Whenever the council or any municipality shall declare by way of resolution that in its opinion excessive prices are being demanded within the limits of such municipality for any necessary of life, such council may, by notice in writing under the hand of its clerk or other authorized officer, require any person dealing within the municipality in such necessary of life, and locally situate therein, to make and render unto such Council within a time set in such notice, and such person shall make and render unto such council, precisely as required by it, a written return under oath or affirmation.

And the Order in Council states the details, and then goes on:

If, after the receipt of any such return, such council shall consider that any circumstances justify reference of the return and a statement of the conditions to the Minister of Labour for further investigation at his hands, or if no return, or what the council shall consider an untrue or misleading return, is made, such council may, by way of resolution in writing expressing the facts and the council's conclusion therefrom report to such minister.

Section 6 says:

(1) If, after the receipt by the Minister of Labour of any return made to him or to any municipality in purported compliance with these regulations, such minister shall consider that any circumstances so justify, or if, after a return under these regulations has been required, none is made or none is made within the time set in the notice requiring such return or within such further time as the Minister of Labour may upon special application to him allow, the said minister shall have power to investigate the business and to examine the premises, books, papers and records of the person making or failing to make such return, as the case may be, and, for those purposes such minister may appoint an Examiner or Examiners and may authorize in writing any examiner so appointed to enter and examine the premises, books, records and papers of such person, and to take evidence under oath or affirmation of any person who such examiner may believe has knowledge relating to such matters as ought to have been included within a proper return according to circumstances.

7. Whenever, in the opinion of the Minister of Labour, after an investigation and examination held in pursuance of the powers conferred by these regulations, an offence against any of these regulations is disclosed, said minister shall remit to the Attorney General of any province within which such offence shall have been committed, for such action as such Attorney General may be pleased to institute because of the conditions appearing, certified copies of (a) any return or returns and resolutions of any municipality which may have been made, rendered or passed pursuant to these regulations and are in the possession of the minister and relevant to such offence, and of (b) the evidence taken on any such investigation or examination and the report of the examiner.

8. (1) No prosecution for a contravention or non-observance of any provision of these regulations shall be commenced without the written leave of the Attorney General for the province in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, expressing whether such prosecution shall be by way of indictment or under Part XV of the Criminal Code.

If ever there was a gold brick handed out to the people of this country in respect to the investigation of prices and regulation of the cost of living it is to be found in this Order in Council. Its effect is to provide that responsibility for action shall be transferred from the Government to the municipality, and from the municipality to the Attorneys General of the several provinces. There was a case in the city of Montreal where they attempted to define the procedure laid down in the Order in Council, but it was found absolutely unworkable. I have here a statement made by the legal adviser of the city of Montreal, to the effect that the charging of high prices for commodities is not an offence under the terms of the Order in Council, and that the element of conspiracy must exist. This is given as the contention of the city law department in regard to the communication from the Minister of Labour:—

To speak only of the present case, it is established that certain coal merchants have made, all overhead and other expenses deducted, a net profit of $6 per ton. These facts have been disclosed to the Minister of Labour. He alone has the power to make further inquiry in order to ascertain if this coal was carried in excess of the reasonable quantity required for the business of each trader, or whether such increase would be different if such information was asked by an officer of the Department of Labour.

Here we have an instance of the practical working out of the Order in Council passed at the instance of the Minister of Labour with regard to matters in which that Order purported to give jurisdiction. But it appears that it is absolutely impossible for anything to be done under this Order in Council in the way of regulating the cost of living. Having issued the Order in Council, the minister feels that his duty is accomplished, and, notwithstanding that the prices of commodities which constitute the necessaries of life are going up by leaps and bounds without any valid reason, nothing is done to relieve the situation.

Mr. CROTHERS: Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to read the whole of that opinion?

[Mr. Kyte.]

Mr. KYTE: I have read all of it that is relevant to this subject. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), if he desires, can read the rest at his leisure.

Mr. CROTHERS: But it is only fair to read it all.

Mr. KYTE: I do not wish to cumber Hansard with it. There is one point that has engaged the attention of the newspaper people of this country, and that is the price of newsprint paper. For a year or more complaint has been made that the manufacturers of newsprint have been boosting prices far beyond what is called for by the conditions. They called the attention of the Minister of Finance to the matter some time ago, with the result that action has been taken. We on this side have contended that the Government ought to have adopted the policy applied by the Australian Government of fixing the prices of commodities which form the necessaries of life. Objection is raised that it would dislocate the course of business, and result in bringing about hardships instead of being advantageous to the public. With regard to the price of newsprint, the Financial Post of 17th April last states:—

The Financial Post understands that Sir Thomas White holds the belief that paper costs have advanced out of all proportion and is determined to enforce his views.

It is understood that any action taken would be along the lines of regulating the flow of exports by the placing of embargoes thus automatically reducing prices.

But, instead of doing that, the Government adopted the procedure with regard to newsprint that we asked them to adopt with regard to food products. It is stated that an Order in Council gave authority to an officer of the Government to take possession of newsprint paper manufactured in this country fixing the selling price. As an agreement had been made between the manufacturers of newsprint and the Canadian publishers, fixing the price at $2.50 the order was not gazetted. This was the order which resulted in fixing the price of newsprint in Canada. But that order was not enforced, because the manufacturers climbed down and fixed prices satisfactory to the newspaper proprietors. The Grain Growers of the West are organized, and they were able to press their views upon the Minister of Finance, with the result that a few days ago wheat and wheat products were placed on the free list. The newspapers are an influential body of great public influence, and the Government was forced to take action in order that the grievances they complained of might be relieved. But the poor consumer, the workingman, must worry along as best he can, with the cost of living increasing and his income not increasing in proportion.

Let us see what has been done in Australia with regard to the fixing of prices and regulating the cost of living. I have here the statute dealing with that subject. After providing for the appointment of a board, the statute enacts as follows:

6. (1) The Board and each Commissioner shall, in relation to any matter as to which it or he has power to furnish a report or make a recommendation under these regulations, have power to—

(a) summon witnesses;
(b) take evidence on oath;
(c) require the production of documents, books and papers; and
(d) enter upon any premises and inspect any documents, books and papers or any stock of foodstuffs and necessary commodities, or authorize any member of the Board or any other person to enter upon any premises and inspect any such documents, books and papers or any stocks of foodstuffs and necessary commodities.

Subsection 3 provides:

(3) If any member of the Board or any Commissioner or any other person authorized by the Board or by any Commissioner discloses, except in the course of his duty, or except to the Board ,or to the Commissioner as the case may be, any information obtained by him while upon any such premises, he shall be guilty of an offence.

Subsequent sections are as follows:

13. (1) The minister may from time to time, on the recommendation of the Board or a Commissioner—

(a) determine the maximum prices which may be charged for foodstuffs and necessary commodities sold, and the maximum rates which may be charged for services the performance of which is commenced, in any proclaimed area;
(b) determine the conditions of the sale of foodstuffs and necessary commodities sold therein and of the performance of services the performance of which is commenced therein.

(2) Any such determination shall be published in the Gazette, and shall from the date specified in the Gazette have the force of law.

14. Notwithstanding anything contained in the last two preceding regulations the Governor General may, without any recommendation of the Board or a Commissioner—

(a) declare any area to be a proclaimed area for the purposes of these regulations;
(b) fix the price of foodstuffs and necessary commodities sold and the rate for services the performance of which is commenced, in any proclaimed area;
(c) declare that as regards any proclaimed area, any price fixed by or under these regulations shall, after a date specified by him, cease to be the maximum price at which foodstuffs and necessary commodities may be sold or offered for sale, and any rates fixed under these regulations shall, after a date specified by him, cease to be the maximum rates which may be charged for services the performance of which is commenced, in that area.

Another section of the Act provides that any violation of the recommendations made by the commission shall constitute an offence and shall be punishable accordingly. Here is a Government that apparently is not afraid to take the full responsibility of dealing with this subject. The question of the cost of living was not any more pressing in Australia than it is in Canada but in Australia there is a Government that is in office for the purpose of governing in the interest of the whole community and not in the interest of a special class. I shall, before I am through, be able to show this House that the results of the statute passed in Australia has been to reduce the cost of living enormously as compared with the cost of living in the Dominion of Canada. The particulars, relative to the fixing of wholesale and retail prices of foodstuffs and necessary commodities and services in Australia, which appeared in Weekly Bulletin, No. 660, have caused a number of inquiries from Canada requesting more detailed information concerning the administration of the regulations and the results achieved.

Action in regard to the fixing of prices of foodstuffs and necessary commodities was taken by the Commonwealth Government under the War Precautions Act (1914-16). Regulations, known as the War Precautions (Prices) Regulations, were issued in July, 1916, to supersede price fixing measures which had been put into operation by some of the state governments since the beginning of the war.

A commissioner has been appointed at the capital of each Australian state to administer the regulations and a Federal commissioner co-ordinates the work and is directly in touch with the minister in control of this section of commonwealth activity. The staff in each state consists of a commissioner, an inquiry officer and two clerical assistants. It is provided that a commissioner in any state may recommend that a certain article of food or any other goods be declared a foodstuff or necessary commodity under the prices regulations. On such item being approved it is proclaimed in the Commonwealth Gazette and inquiries are then undertaken by the commissioner in the state specially concerned, or in all states if the item is one affecting the interests of the whole Commonwealth.

The commissioner takes evidence on oath. In the case of an article manufactured in the Commonwealth he would obtain evidence as to the cost of the raw material, the average cost of distributing, existing wages awards, freight, and all the factors which govern the actual cost of production and distribution. The commissioner then recommends a price, wholesale and retail, at which such article is to be sold in the metropolitan area of the state, and for all other places the cost is the price fixed for the metropolitan area plus necessary costs of transportation.

The procedure is practically the same in regard to goods which are imported to the Commonwealth. The importer is expected to produce his original invoices and to satisfy the commissioner as to all the factors governing the price of the article.

The principle has been laid down that existing channels of distribution, commissions or allowances for same, are to be recognized so long as such charges are not unreasonable.

Prices, obviously, may fluctuate from month to month, on investigation being made by the commissioners as to the necessity for alterations. It is hardly necessary to emphasize that the price determination arrived at is the maximum legal charge on the article specified, but this does not prevent the article being sold at a lower wholesale and retail price. The foodstuffs and commodities upon which determinations have already been made (in some of the states) are:

Arrowroot, barley, bran, bread, butter, bacon, biscuits, cheese, cocoa, cornsacks, flour, groats, hams, infants' and invalids' foods, jam, milk both fresh and condensed, meats, oatmeal, flaked oats, rolled oats, quaker oats, pollard, plum puddings, preserved pineapples, rice, tin plates and soaps.

An investigation is now proceeding with the object of fixation of prices on boots and shoes, and the procedure was outlined by the Victorian commissioner. Three sets of samples of footwear were obtained, one from retailers and one purchased by the departmental expert. Representatives of the three interests will decide upon the standard types. Manufacturing costs and selling prices of such types will be investigated and, after every incidental charge associated with making and selling has been considered, the result aimed at is an equitable price to manufacturers, retailers and the public. It is the desire of the commissioners to allow the manufacturers to have the same rate of profit upon their goods that they had previous to the war, but they are not permitted to charge in excess of that. It is claimed by the federal commissioner that large savings have been effected without subjecting the trading community to any material sacrifice but at the same time permitting them to receive profits in the same ratio as those they received prior to the war

I submit that this is a practical way of dealing with this question. While the other elements of the community are making sacrifices during the war and sending their sons to do battle for the Empire, they are protected from further sacrifices by the Government refusing to permit the exactions of manufacturers in the form of an increase in the cost of commodities which they have to sell. Under no circumstances are they permitted to have a larger profit than they had previous to the outbreak of the war. The result of the application of this is very interesting in regard to the price of flour. A considerable saving has been effected by the reduction of flour prices. Portion of this is absorbed in the reduction in the price of bread, but not wholly. For instance, the price of bread has only been fixed for definite centres. A considerable area is outside the range of the proclamations, the country being sparsely populated and no reliable evidence being forthcoming upon which to base prices. This is shown particularly in Western Australia. In that state the local consumption of flour is 30,000 tons per annum. The result of the Commonwealth proclamations reduced the average price of flour in that state by £75,000 or by £2 10/- per ton. Prices have been also fixed for retail parcels of flour, 50s, 25s, and single pounds. In many cases this amounts to a reduction in price of upwards of 1/- on 25's and up to 3/- on 50's. It is however, not possible to make any approximately accurate calculation in regard to these parcels. It is not, says the Commissioner, an over estimate to place the savings to the people on the fixation by the Commonwealth of prices of mill products and bread at upwards of three quarters of a million pounds per annum. That is to say, the action of the Australian Government in fixing the price of flour alone has resulted in the saving of $3,750,000 per annum to the consumers in that country. I have the market quotations of certain commodities showing the prices charged in 1911 and 1917 and the House will see the startling increases that have taken place with respect to these com-

Pork, barrels	$21.50	$48.00
Beef, "	16.50	34.00
Lard, per lb.	.12½	.28½

Sugar, per bbl.	4.85	8.75
Flour, "	6.50	12.50
Tea, per lb.	.25	.39

Corn Meal, per bag	1.50	3.50
Rolled Oats, per bbl.	5.25	9.00
Baking Soda, per keg	2.20	3.50
Washing Soda, "	1.40	2.80
Soap, (Surprise) per box	4.15	5.00
Biscuits, per lb.	.07	.11½
Butter, "	.27	.43
Eggs, per doz.	.21	.35
Bran, per bag	1.35	2.50
Middlings, "	1.50	2.75
Oats, per bush.	.55	1.00
Beans, "	2.25	7.50
Barley, Pot, per bag..(3c. lb.)	2.80	4.50

Bacon, per lb.	.18	.28
Ham, "	.17	.30
Rice, "	.04	.05½
Onions, "	.03½	.12

It does appear to me that this list provides a splendid field for the operations of the Minister of Labour if he had any real, actual desire to take steps to prevent such enormous increases in the cost of commodities. It cannot be argued that the high prices are due to war conditions, because the figures I quoted to the House a few moments ago showing the earnings of concerns manufacturing some of these products prove that their profits have increased enormously over their profits in other years.

I will take now the prices of certain staple commodities in Australia and compare them with the prices in Canada as of date the 15th of February, 1917.

Article.	In Australia.	In Canada.
Bran (per ton).	$21.84	$35.00
Bread (per loaf) 1½ lbs.	.05	.09
Butter	.36	.40 to .46
Bacon	.27 to .33	.32 to .33

It was stated in a former debate in this House that the cost of living had increased in Australia as much as in Canada, or at all events that the rate of increase in Australia since the war was quite equal to the rate of increase in Canada. I have here, from the official figures supplied by the Commissioner in Australia, a statement to the effect that the cost of living increased, from 1914 to February 1917, 9·4 per cent in Australia while in Canada it increased 44·2 per cent. According to the Labour Gazette, the figures are somewhat different. I have here a copy of the last issue of the Labour Gazette which contains an index of a number of prices in Canada, the United States and certain other countries. The increased cost in Canada for 20 foods between July, 1914 and March, 1917 amounted to 44·2 per cent. That is compared with the cost of 46 foods in Australia which show an increase of 25 per cent. I submit that this comparison is not accurate and is not reliable. It would be fair to compare the increased cost of 29 foods in Canada with the increased cost of the same 29 foods in Australia. That has not been done, and the Labour Gazette have offset the index cost of 46 foods in Australia against 29 foods in Canada, and even that only brings up the increased cost in Australia to 25 per cent compared with 44·2 per cent in Canada.

The figures I have given showing the increase in Australia of 9.4 per cent are absolutely correct, and are taken from a statement forwarded to me from Australia. According to the Labour Gazette, the percentage of increase is 44.2 per cent in Canada, in Australia 25 per cent, in New Zealand 27 per cent, and in the United States 25 per cent. We hear a good deal said here of the enormous increase in the cost of living in the United States in the last few years, but according to the figures in the Labour Gazette, the increased cost in the United States is only 25 per cent compared with 44.2 per cent in Canada.

I will now take certain companies for the purpose of ascertaining how the new war tax is going to affect the manufacturing interests in Canada, and in what proportion we are receiving revenue from that source compared with the revenue obtained by the Commonwealth of Australia. During last year the profits of Stanfields, Limited, which is a very important manufacturing concern in Nova Scotia, which has done a great deal of business with the Militia Department in supplying underwear to the overseas troops, amounted in 1916 to $109,688, equal to 14½ per cent on the capital. Under the old war tax, last year the Government got $14,297 from Stanfields, Limited. The earnings of that company being less than 15 per cent, it is not affected by the new war tax, so that during 1917 the Government will receive from Stanfields, Limited, only $14,297, being the same as the amount received last year. But after deducting this $14,297 by way of war tax, I notice that the stockholders were still able to receive $95,391, equivalent to 12.7 per cent on the capital stock of the company.

The Consolidated Rubber Company's profits amounted to 22 per cent or $907,500. Under the old war tax the Government took $154,687, leaving to the company $752,813, or 18 per cent upon the whole capital stock of the company. Under the new war tax the Government takes $247,500, leaving to the company $660,000, or an amount equal to 16 per cent upon the total capital stock of the company. Thus while the Consolidated Rubber Company and Stanfields Limited were content with a very much smaller dividend before the war, after paying the war tax imposed on them by the Finance Minister they will have left in their treasury a revenue from their investment far in excess of any they had received in any year previous to the war.

I take now the Dominion Canners Limited. In 1916 the net income of that company was $556,777. In 1915 there appears to have been a deficit of $294,439. In 1914 the net income was $215,123. In 1913 the net income was $380,517. So that during this past year of the war, the Dominion Canners have earned as a net income, over $200,000 more than they received in 1913 and far more than they earned in 1914 and 1915. A statement issued by the company informs the public that the earnings amounted to 24.31 per cent upon the preferred stock of the company and 14·20 per cent upon the common stock. Taking it upon the basis of 24·31 per cent profit, the war tax for 1915 amounted to $99,125 and the company retained $457,652, equal to 20 per cent upon the stock of the company. The new war tax will amount to $177,120, leaving to the company $379,656, or equal to 17 per cent profit upon the total capital stock of the company. Under the old war tax the Government took 17·8 per cent of the profits, and under the new war tax the Government taxes 32 per cent of the profits, leaving to the company profits amounting to 82·2 per cent in one case and 68 per cent in the other.

Let us see how the products of the Dominion Canners have behaved in the matter of price to the consumers in Canada. I find in a statement that came from the Labour Department that the price of tomatoes per tin—

[Mr. Kyte.]

Mr. LALOR: What were the profits of the company in 1915?

Mr. KYTE: There was a deficit in 1915 of $294,439. In January, 1915, the price of tomatoes, per can, size 2½, was 10 cents; in April, 1917, 20 cents. The price of peas in January, 1915, per tin, size 2, was 10 cents; in April, 1917, 15 cents. Corn, per tin, was 10 cents in 1915 and is 15 cents in 1917. These were the retail prices. I now quote the wholesale prices: Tomatoes, in 1915, $1, in 1917 $1.85 to $2.15; peas, in January, 1915, 95 cents, and in April, 1917, from $1.25 to $1.50.

Mr. LALOR: When you say that the price of tomatoes was $2.15, do you mean that the Dominion Canners Company received $2.15 a dozen for tomatoes?

Mr. KYTE: These are the wholesale prices.

Mr. LALOR: Are they the prices at which the wholesale trade sold to the retailer?

Mr. KYTE: Certainly.

Mr. LALOR: Then you are not insinuating that these are the prices which the Dominion Canners Company received?

Mr. KYTE: The wholesale dealers got a little profit, but not as much as the Dominion Canners Company received. The wholesale dealers would not get 24 per cent profit upon their transactions, I am quite sure, as the shareholders of the Dominion Canners Company did.

Mr. LALOR: If the hon. gentleman thinks that the Dominion Canners Company is making money very fast, I may tell him that he can buy preferred stock at 75 or less and common stock at 20. He might find that, according to his ideas, a good investment.

Mr. KYTE: Very good, considering the fact that they are paying a 24 per cent dividend.

Mr. LALOR: They are not paying any dividend at all, either on preferred or on common stock, and they have not been able to do so for a long time.

Mr. KYTE: The statement to the public indicates that the earnings were 24·31 on the preferred stock of the company.

Mr. LALOR: I am telling you that they did not pay any dividend.

Mr. KYTE: I have quoted from the statement of the company issued to the public—perhaps for the purpose of selling stock,

I am not sure. The wholesale price of corn in January, 1915, was 95 cents, and in April, 1917, $1.75; strawberries,, 1915, $2.17½; 1917, $2.50; raspberries, January, 1915, $1.97½; April, 1917, $2.75. So you see, Mr. Speaker, how this works out. The manufacturing concerns are earning more than they ever earned before, with the result that the price to the wholesaler is greater than ever in the history of the country, and the price to the retailer is greater than ever in the history of the country, and the price to the consumer is so great that he must deny himself in many instances the luxury of eating the products of the Dominion Canners Company.

Mr. LALOR: Has the hon. gentleman any idea of what the price of tin-plate is to-day as compared with two years ago?

Mr. KYTE: I do not know; it does not affect the question.

Mr. LALOR: It affects the price a great deal.

Mr. KYTE: If the Dominion Canners Company were paying such enormously high prices for their supplies, how did they come to pay a dividend of 24 per cent?

Mr. LALOR: I rise to say that that is absolutely false. There is not a word of truth in that statement.

Mr. KYTE: Well then, the Dominion Canners Company is sending out a statement, for the purpose of influencing the stock upon the market, which is absolutely untrue.

Mr. LALOR: That is not true. No statement was ever issued by the Dominion Canners Company, saying that they were paying 22 or 24 per cent profit. It would be a good deal better if the hon. gentleman would find out the facts before he made his statement.

Mr. KYTE: The point in dispute between my hon. friend and myself is as to whether the dividend was earned or paid. I do not care whether it was paid or not; the statement says that the indicated earnings on preferred stock in 1916 was 24.31 per cent. Let us see how our friends would fare if they were doing business in Australia. If Stanfields Limited were doing business in Australia during last year, instead of contributing $14,297 to the public treasury, they would have contributed 50 per cent of their total earnings, or $54,844. If they were doing business in Australia in 1917, instead of contributing $14,297, as they will to this Government, they would contribute to the Government of Australia the sum of $82,266. If the Consolidated Rubber Company were doing business in Australia, they would have contributed in 1916 to the treasury of Australia $453,750, compared with $154,687, which they paid here. If they were doing business in 1917 they would contribute to the treasury of Australia the sum of $680,625, instead of $247,500 that they are now paying. If the Dominion Canners Company Limited were doing business in Australia they would have contributed in the year 1916 $278,425, instead of $99,125 as they did, and if they were doing business in Australia they would tribute $417,637 to the treasury of Australia in 1917 instead of $177,120 which they will pay here.

The hon. Minister of Finance takes glory to himself for the amount of taxation that he has levied upon the manufacturers of Canada. It would be well for him to look at what the Finance Minister of Australia is doing. The new war taxation brought down by the Finance Minister a few days ago is a very complicated statement indeed. It is impossible for an ordinary man to figure out how much any company in Canada is liable to contribute, because the minister has graduated the percentages so that earnings up to a certain amount will pay 10 per cent up to a larger amount 25 per cent, above that 60 per cent, and so on to 75 per cent. That sounds very big, but when you come to figure out what it amounts to—I had this done by the Finance Department—you see how far short it falls, so far as contributions to the treasury are concerned, of the amount contributed in Australia. In that country the Government takes 50 per cent of the profits of every company during the first year and 75 per cent of the profits during the second year. There they have a government that watches the interests of the consumers. The prices of all the necessaries of life are fixed, with the result that the increase in the cost of living in Australia has only amounted to 9.4 per cent. In addition to that, the Government takes the profits of the manufacturers, so that they do not get any benefit or advantage out of the war that is not shared by the other people in that dominion. The consequence is that instead of a trifle of $12,500,000 being collected by the war tax upon manufactures, an enormous revenue is being collected from that source.

The Minister of Finance, as I stated in the early part of my address, did not show very much courage or originality in respect of his taxation proposals. We have in Canada a tariff that has increased enormously the cost of everything to the consumer. Apart from the tariff existing before these war measures were brought down, there was an increase of 7½ per cent, not only upon goods that were previously dutiable, but upon all free goods as well. The result has been to increase enormously the cost of living, whereas the Government have allowed the manufacturers to slip by with a very small proportion of taxation, considering the enormous profits that they are making. If the Finance Minister had adopted the principle of taxation in force in Australia and had exacted fifty per cent of the profits during the first year and 75 per cent during the second year, he would be able to put every article of consumption upon the free list and would have a larger income than he has at this time. If we are to have a happy and contented people; if we are to live under conditions that will enable us to bear the burdens of the war, the Government will have to get back to sound finance and economics. They must remove the duties upon the necessaries of life, as was done not only in France and Italy, but in Germany as well, and regulate the cost as is done in Australia. The consequence is that although these nations are very much nearer to the centre of war and suffer more grievously, under war conditions, than we do, they are not suffering in the matter of taxation nearly as much as we are.

9 p.m.

Mr. LALOR: The Government have just removed the duty upon flour. Perhaps you have not noticed that.

Mr. KYTE: I notice it was removed at a time when such removal could not be of any advantage to the consumer. The Government took very good care not to remove the duty at a time when its removal might have been an advantage, when the price of flour was low and the consumer could afford to pay a little more for a barrel of flour without complaint, and they waited until the conditions were such that the removal of the duty could not benefit the farmer or the consumer but would benefit the speculator.

Mr. LALOR: The speculator has raised the price of flour.

Mr. KYTE: The speculator has raised the price of flour, and the Minister of Labour, instead of dealing with the matter himself, has passed the puck on to the city councils and the town councils throughout the Dominion of Canada, and feels that he has discharged his duty by doing so.

It is not only in the matter of foodstuffs that we are suffering; we are suffering in the increased cost of boots and shoes, clothing, rubbers, fishing supplies. Stanfields, Limited, for instance, are reaping the benefit of the enormous protection that it is receiving. The price of underclothing has been increased enormously to the consumers in this country, and, notwithstanding the payment of the war tax, the shareholders of Stanfields, Limited, are making more money now than they ever before made in their lives. We have in this country a condition of affairs approximating the conditions that exist in countries that are actually at war. Although we are a producing, a farming country, although the opportunities for transporting our produce to the other side to remedy the conditions of scarcity in Britain are unavailable to us and we have millions of bushels of wheat in this country, we are suffering the same exactions and privations that we would suffer if we were actually in a state of war. The Government felt that the only means of meeting the difficulties of raising revenue was by applying the system of taxation. It is extraordinary how our friends in the Conservative party, while they always preach that we should give and should make sacrifices, in the operations of Government and in the carrying on of their trade policy, take very good care that no sacrifices shall be made by their friends the manufacturers, who support them so loyally in this House and in the country.

Another source of complaint in respect of the administration of the affairs of Canada is the enormous expenditure of money which is being carried on at a time when war economy ought to be practised, while war economy is being preached by the Minister of Finance and by his colleagues in the Government. It is just about a year ago that we had in this House a discussion about a matter which indicated the wasteful methods in force in respect of the expenditure of money for the carrying on of this war. It is about a year ago, I think, that the question of the fuse contracts was discussed in this House and was referred to a Royal Commission. I am not going to discuss the findings of that commission, but it was found that every allegation made regarding the extravagant prices which were paid to friends of the Government was absolutely proved from start to finish, the result being that millions of dollars were lost to the taxpayers of this country. Allison, Yoakum, Lignanti are three names that were familiar to us in Canada a year ago; not only were their names familiar, but their persons and physiognomies were familiar to the residents of the city of Ottawa. We do not see J. Wesley Allison around here as we did in those days nor do we see Yoakum and Lignanti anv more. What an autocry was raised against Liberals in this House because they dared to make allegations which resulted in the findings of the Royal Commission! My poor, humble self was singled out as a person who ought not to be at large and who should suffer dire penalties. Poor, old somnolent toryism! It forgets that the battle for free speech had been fought in Great Britain three hundred years ago and the victory won at the cost of a King's head. I am sure that my friends opposite regret very much that conditions exist in this country that permit free speech and free discussion. I state emphatically that the Opposition sitting in this House would not be discharging its full duty if it did not bring to the attention of the Government and of the country the shortcomings and maladministration of this Government in respect of war measures and war expenditures. What is the remedy for the condition of affairs that exists at the present time?

We have had some discussion in regard to changes and amendments to the tariff in order to meet the present conditions in Canada. For my part, our friends in the West cannot go too far in the matter of demanding reduced taxation and lower tariffs in this country for me to follow them. Every statement and every principle that have been enunciated on this side of the House with regard to tariff and the desirability of reducing tariff and reducing the cost of living will receive hearty and enthusiastic support from me. At the present time we have sources of revenue that are quite available to the Minister of Finance and quite adequate to all the demands notwithstanding that the demands are very great. As I pointed out a moment ago, if the minister only had the courage to adopt the system of taxing companies that exists in Australia, he could put all the foodstuffs and the necessaries of life upon the free list and still have more than enough revenue to meet all the actual requirements of the present time. After the war, there will be great burdens to bear, and great courage required on the part of the Minister of Finance of the day. There is one field of taxation which has not been touched yet, and which the Minister of Finance seems to be afraid to touch. I refer to the taxation of income. By reason of the war we shall have in Canada a large number of millionaires who have become millionaires on account of the opportunity given them of making enormous exactions, not only through manufacture of war material, but through the manufacture of the necessaries of life. These manufacturers would never have received their millions out of the taxpayers, had it not been for the unfair conditions that have prevailed during the carrying on of the war. There is no more promising field of taxation to meet the requirements that will have to be met after the war than to make these gentlemen contribute of the millions that they have been able to acquire, while the common people of this country have been driven to the last extreme to meet the requirements existing in their households from day to day, and while by far the largest proportion of them have to mourn the loss of brave sons who have fallen in the field of battle.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, the Budget speech of the Minister of Finance contained two outstanding statements, one being that the debt of this country, which before the war was $336,000,000, had increased now to $900,000,000, and that before the end of the fiscal year it would be $1,200,000,000. For making identically the same statement, or perhaps even a more moderate statement, to their electors, some of my friends on this side of the House have been accused of disloyalty.

Another outstanding statement in the Budget speech of the Minister of Finance was that no tariff changes were proposed this year. Previous speakers have congratulated the Finance Minister upon the brevity of his Budget speech. Apparently, he has gone from one extreme to the other. Six years ago he was talking too much of a sort on the tariff question, but to-day he avoids the tariff as he would a pestilence. Less than a year ago, only six months ago, in fact, when the western farmer was still marketing his crops, our Conservative friends were still strong in the faith that it would be of no benefit to the farmer to have the United States market open for his wheat. It would ruin the Canadian milling industry, they said, and would be very injurious to the dairying interests in Canada.

I wonder what accounts for this sudden conversion? Is it a case of eleventh hour repentance, or have they caught the contagion of repentance which has afflicted their Nationalist friends in the province of Quebec? My good friend and former fellow-citizen, the Minister of Inland Revenue, openly confessed his sins to the Conservatives at Montreal a short time ago, saying that six years ago, when he was but a mere lad of thirty, he had done wrong in opposing the Laurier naval policy and any other policy looking to the support of the Mother Country in the matter of naval defence. The Minister of Inland Revenue made his confession to a party of friends around the banqueting table, but the Minister of Finance, having in mind previous wobblings and promised changes in the tariff on the eve of by-elections in the West, burns his bridges behind him and three days before Parliament meets rushes through an Order in Council placing wheat, flour and semolina upon the free list. By this Act the Government admit not only that they were wrong six years ago, but wrong, also, upon three occasions during the last six years, one of those occasions being no later than last session. They have admitted their judgment upon the question of free wheat to be defective. What will the country think of their business ability when after studying the question for six years they accept, without consulting Ottawa, a tariff proposition made in Washington, and one that in my judgment is not so good as the tariff proposals of 1911? It is said that free wheat was the arch of the reciprocity proposals. That was the opinion of western Canada, where everybody talks wheat. It was also contended in western Canada that free barley, free oats and free flax was a good thing for the western farmer, because they give him a revenue while he is breaking or cleaning his land. We in the East favoured reciprocity because it opened up a better market for our dairy products. Reciprocity, as hon. gentlemen will remember, placed butter and cheese upon the free list. No tax was imposed upon these products on their way from the producer to the breakfast table of the consumer. So we in the East looked favourably upon reciprocity, because it offered these advantages to our dairy farmers.

Let us consider for a moment the question of wheat. The tariff arrangement of 1911, negotiated by the Hon. William Fielding, whose every tariff Act for 15 years tended towards stability, would have given to the western farmer everything he asked for. The Minister of Finance acknowledged this afternoon that since 1879 Canada has been looking for a reciprocity arrangement with the United States, and I repeat that the tariff arrangement of 1911 would have given to the farmers of this country the market they had been looking for, without in any way interfering with our manufacturing industries. It would also have given greater encouragement to the milling industry. Under that arrangement the Canadian miller would have been able to buy his wheat either in Canada or the United States. If there were a short crop in Canada the fields of Kansas were open to him, and he could get the wheat ground en route to the sea, thus giving a plentiful supply of bran, shorts and mill feed to our Canadian dairymen. But our Conservative friends opposed those proposals at that time, and their arguments—but they had no arguments. They appealed to race and religion, loyalty and patriotism, and listening to those appeals, the people of Canada lost a bargain that would have given this country wider markets; the West would have got the market she asked, for and eastern Canada a steadier and healthier and better market for her products. That tariff arrangement would have removed the tax on the breakfast table of every man who has a family to feed.

I would like to prove to the Minister of Finance that the bargain he has accepted to-day is not as good as the bargain of 1911. The Liberals were defeated upon the arrangement of 1911, and as a result the Conservative-Nationalist party came into power and formed a Government. In 1913 the United States revised their tariff, and with due regard to the action of the Canadian people, or rather the Conservative element of the Canadian people, they placed a duty of ten cents a bushel on wheat, inserting a clause in the tariff, however, whereby any country opening its markets to the flour, wheat and semolina of the United States would have reciprocal advantages in the United States markets. They also placed cream and milk on the free list, but a prohibitory tax was imposed on butter and cheese. For six years our Conservative friends have been insistent that it was of no advantage to the Canadian farmer to ship his wheat to the United States market. During those six years the price of wheat was neither high nor low:

it was a reasonable price, but the Canadian farmer looking to the markets of Minneapolis always thought he could get a higher price for his wheat in the United States. Indeed, the Minister of Finance admitted this afternoon that wheat was ten cents a bushel higher in the United States market than in the Canadian market. And after having for over six years deprived the western producer of the market he was looking for, and at a time when wheat was $2 a bushel, or double its former price, and when the western farmer had parted with the bulk of his crop, and when it was in the hands of the elevator and the speculator, the Government hastened by Order in Council to take off the duty, and by that means open the United States markets to our wheat. And remember, the western farmer was looking for a market not only for his wheat, but also for his barley, his flax and his oats. Our Conservative friends take an infant conceived in Washington and throw that to the western farmers, thinking that he will forget the demand he has been making for six years for a larger and wider market for his product.

The Finance Minister dwelt strongly on the point that he would make no tariff modifications this year. I would like to prove to him that if he is to save the milling industry in this country, if he is to place it in a position to compete in normal times with the mills of the United States, and also if he is to save the dairy industry of this country from ruin, he will be compelled to change his mind and make further modifications. In the change of tariff hurried through by Order in Council, the Finance Minister pays no attention whatever to bran and shorts coming into this country. Bran and shorts go into the United States free, but farmers in this country who wish to import bran and shorts must pay a tariff of twenty-five per cent—seventeen and one-half per cent the regular duty and seven and one-half per cent war tax. What would be the result of this? We have a statement of the millers of this country, in a letter published in the Montreal Gazette of 25th December, 1913, to the effect that the reciprocity proposition was far better for the millers than the proposal under the Underwood tariff. And why was that proposition better? Because the millers of the United States are able to buy their bags cheaper and to build their mills at less cost than similar mills can be built for in Canada. Seventy-five thousand dollars will go further in the building of a mill in the United States than $100,000 will go in Canada. The United States miller can buy cotton bags at a rate equal to eight and a half cents a barrel cheaper than they can be bought on the Canadian market. I would ask the Finance Minister how long he thinks the Canadian miller can compete under such conditions?

Hon. gentlemen opposite are strong for protection for our manufacturing industries. It was one of their complaints in 1911—that the reciprocity agreement would injure our industries. But they themselves have created conditions under which every barrel of flour which comes into Canada from the United States brings in three yards of cotton free. That was avoided in 1911. Why? Because there was a protection of 50 cents a barrel on flour—and $2.50 on bran and shorts. I have here the printed statement sent out by the Dominion Millers Association of Toronto, of which Mr. C. B. Watts is the secretary. It was sent out at the time reciprocity was under consideration. It gave the result of an interview with Hon. Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance. Remember, that the millers at that time were not opposed to reciprocity, but wanted a wider extension. Opposition to the reciprocity agreement on the part of the millers was a second thought, after Mr. Fielding had refused to allow the millers to retain their 50 cents a barrel protection on flour and ship the bran and shorts free to the United States, which was the request of the deputation of millers that waited upon him. They urged that arrangements be made for free entry of brans and shorts into the United States. Mr. Fielding asked them if they would be willing to have bran and shorts come into Canada from the United States free, and they said they would. He then asked them if they would be willing to have flour come in free and their answer was in the negative. Mr. Fielding decided, and I think rightly, that in consideration of the protection of fifty cents a barrel on flour it was reasonable that the Canadian millers should sell their bran and shorts to Canadian dairymen at $2.50 cheaper than the price at which they exported it. To-day we have another proposition before us. Wheat is free in both countries, and so are flour and semolina. I repeat that every barrel of flour coming into Canada from the United States brings in three yards of cotton free in the shape of the bag, and that the Canadian miller is up against it in this competition, because the Canadian Government demands a tariff of 27½ per cent on all the empty bags brought in. But what is the condition with regard to bran? The Finance Minister lays great stress upon the fact that our wheat crop was pooled with our Ally, the United States, and that we must do all we can to provide bread at reasonable prices. But man cannot live by bread alone—he must have butter on his bread. And how is this Government going to help the Canadian dairymen to produce more butter and more cheese and to answer the demands of the cities for cheaper milk and cream, when it places a tax of 25 per cent on bran and sorts coming into Canada? Let me show the Minister of Finance how that works out. The Order in Council enacting free wheat was passed on the 16th April. On the 14th April the price of bran in Buffalo was $43.50 a ton; in Toronto, $38 to $40, and in Montreal the same. After this Order in Council has been in force for fourteen days, the price of bran had advanced for the Canadian dairyman to $43 to $45 a ton in Toronto, and the same in Montreal; but in Buffalo the price remains about the same as it was on April 14 (indeed a little less), prices being quoted at from $43.75 to $43.25, with $42.25 for May delivery. Thus there is no advance in the price of bran in the United States, but an advance of $5 a ton in Canada. How does the Finance Minister think the Canadian farmer is going to answer the appeal for more butter and cheese, and cheaper milk and cream, under these conditions? But the position is even worse than that. We read in the trade journals of Montreal that last week hundreds of carloads of bran were sold for immediate or future shipment to the United States. It will not be long until there is more and cheaper bran in the United States than in Canada. You cannot blame the miller if he ships his bran to the highest market, but if the Canadian farmer wishes to import bran from the United States he is met by a tariff created by this Government. Bran at Buffalo worth $43.25 per ton is subjected to a duty of $10.80 a ton coming into Canada. That is equal to $216, per car load. But supposing that bran dropped to $30 per ton, as bran is likely to come down as the grass gets better, the duty will be $7.50 per ton coming into Canada, or, in other words, the Government will be collecting from the farmer on every carload of bran that he brings into this country $150. Supposing bran again drops to $20 per ton the duty will be $5 per ton or $100 per car load. In other words, for every car load of bran, made from Canadian wheat milled in the United States, that the Canadian farmer brings into Canada, the Government demands one of his best cows.

My hon. friend from Brockville (Mr. Webster) this afternoon pointed out that the price of live stock was almost double what it was five years ago. He gave as the reason that the farmers could not raise live stock profitably if they shipped their milk and cream. I would like to show my hon. friends how they are responsible for this condition. Had we accepted the reciprocity proposal we would have had a market for our butter and cheese in the United States. But we turned that down. The United States revised their tariff and placed milk and cream on the free list. The immediate result of that change was that, from all the eastern townships and from parts of Ontario where they could ship, carloads of milk and cream were going into the United States. Where they could not ship the milk and cream they shipped the cow. Canada lost not only the milk and cream, the butter and cheese, but the profit on the cow, and the labour that might have been utilized on Canadian farms and in Canadian factories manufacturing Canadian cream into butter and cheese to be exported as butter and cheese. The result of this condition is set forth in a bulletin prepared by Mr. Grisdale of the Experimental Farm. Hon. gentlemen can find it in sessional papers No. 16, of the year 1917. In 1913, the year the United States revised their tariff, Mr. Grisdale says that there were 2,188,824 milk cows in eastern Canada. In 1915, after two years of this policy, under which our milk and cream were going to the United States, and under which butter and cheese were prohibited, the milk cows of eastern Canada had decreased in number by 113,074. But it was worse with young cattle. Mr. Grisdale says that in eastern Canada, in 1913, there were 2,479,406 cattle other than milk cows. Two years later the number had decreased by 603,902. That is a condition that has been brought about by changes in the United States tariff. I would plead with the Minister of Finance; just now we have a demand from the housewives of Canada for the admission of oleomargarine, for anything at all to get cheaper fat stuffs for the bread of the children. We have a demand from the cities for cheaper milk and butter. The farmer is blamed for advancing prices. The Finance Minister answers that demand by compelling the Canadian farmer to pay in his own market $5 more for a ton and $100 more for a carload of bran than he was paying fourteen days ago. He has placed the further restriction upon the Canadian farmer that if he imports bran from the United States under the present conditions he is met at the custom house with a price of $216 per car load. The Minister of Finance boasted this afternoon—and I am just as proud as he is that I am a farmer's boy. He was proud to have been on the farm. I know that the Minister of Finance knows something about farming, probably more than our western farmers do. Farming in the West, after all, is not a very strenuous occupation. The man puts in his crop and waits for it to ripen, then he harvests it, markets it, and he is through. But, in eastern Canada, where men milk and provide milk, cream, butter and cheese for the cities, farming is altogether another proposition. Where a man on the farm has to rise on a cold winter morning and go out to the stable with a coal oil lantern it is a slavish job all the way through, and under these circumstances how can the Minister of Finance expect that the farmers are to increase their herds of milk cattle when the Government creates conditions that make it more expensive for them to produce? I hope the minister will change his mind, and that before we get through with the session he will introduce such legislation as will enable our Canadian farmers to get their bran and shorts without being compelled to go to the custom house and pay an increased tax.

This is a time when we all admit that we have made mistakes. The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) openly acknowledges that he made a mistake in 1911. The Minister of Finance himself has acknowledged that he made a mistake in opposing tariff concessions in 1911. He has made that acknowledgment by an Order in Council. Statesmen from overseas are in Washington in order that by consultation and advice our new Allies may avoid the mistakes made by us in earlier days. Our own veteran statesmen, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) is at Washington and the newspapers tell us that the Minister of Finance and my hon. friend and former fellow-citizen the Minister of Inland Revenue are also to go to Washington. Why not take advantage of the occasion to say to our neighbours that in 1911 we were wrong when we declined to accept their fair trade with them? Let us have a fair trade that will be satisfactory to the East and the West. Will the Minister of Finance rise to the occa- them? Let us have a fair trade that will be conditions which will satisfy the East and the West and prepare the road for a growth and extension which we all hope for Canada, or will the Minister of Finance leave that to his successors? That is a question I am not able to answer.

If I were looking to my own interest and that alone, I would not object too strongly to this protection on bran and shorts. But I am not elected to this Parliament of Canada to look after my own business. I am elected to look after the dairymen of the constituency which I represent, and I beg to submit an amendment to bring the matter fairly before the House. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Kay (Missisquoi) as an amendment to the amendment:

That to ensure a plentiful supply of bran, shorts, and middlings for the farmers to produce milk, cream, butter and cheese, and for the raising and fattening of livestock, this House is of the opinion that wheat, bran, shorts, and middlings should, without delay, be placed, on the free list.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This amendment is out of order because only one amendment can be moved to the motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ROBB: Then I give notice that when the amendment of my hon. friend for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) is disposed of I shall propose this amendment.

Mr. JAMES MORRIS (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, in rising to ask the attention of the House for a few minutes I certainly do not intend to delay the House at any great length. I have not been in the habit of taking up much of the attention of this House while I have been a member, and I suppose that it is but right that I should occupy one of the back benches. But, Mr. Speaker, representing as I do an agricultural district, I feel that it is my duty to extend to our Minister of Finance the congratulations of the agriculturists of my county, not only those of my county but the agriculturists and, in fact, the whole people of Canada, on the manner in which he has handled the financial affairs of this country. Without going back to the Budgets of the past, let us take simply the one that is before the House to-day.

But before going any further, I feel that I should reply to one statement that the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) made in his opening remarks, when he referred to the men on this side of the House as allies of the Nationalist party. I would ask him to look to his friend the member for Laprairie-Napierville (Mr. Lanctot) if he wants to know what a Nationalist is.

The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have accused us of an alliance with the Nationalist party. They accuse these men here of being Nationalists. They deny them the right of reformation. But let him look to his friends on the other side of the House for the last two years who have been preaching the doctrines of the Nationalist party, and no man knows it better than my hon. friend the member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb). He has seen the evidence of it right in the village of St. Remi where the hon. member for Laprairie-Napierville had as his principal orators Armand Lavergne and Tancrede Marsil. Let him look into the history of the Nationalists of this country, let him look into the history of the men who have been preaching treason, nothing short of treason, gentlemen, and he sits there, the man who had two of those men as his chief speakers. Then they accuse the Conservative party of connection with the Nationalists. Shame, I say, on hon. gentlemen opposite. If anything, let us be honest. If we are wrong we will admit it. There are men sitting on the Conservative side who have admitted that they did entertain principles favourable or in keeping with the Nationalist principles. They have seen the folly of their ways and have reformed and to-day they are accused by men on the opposite side of the House because they did reform. I would ask hon. gentlemen if Jesus Christ accused St. Paul for reforming? St. Paul was a persecutor of Christ at one time. Did you or any man ever hear of Christ accusing St. Paul for having reformed? Oh, woe unto ye scribes and hypocrites.

I had no intention of launching into a discussion of that sort when I rose to speak. I rose in the first place to congratulate our Minister of Finance, not only the Minister of Finance but the whole Government, on what they have accomplished within the last five years. I think that I have the people of Canada back of me when I make the statement that without going back to former Budgets, the Budget that is to-day under discussion has the approbation of ninety per cent of the honest people of Canada, regardless of the criticism that you hear from the opposite side of the House; for we know, and we can fully realize by the nature of the criticism that has come from the opposite side of the House, that the hon. gentlemen opposite are not sincere and consequently are not honest in their criticism. We can have no better illustration of it than in regard to the matter of free wheat. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been clamouring for that for a number of years.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Hear, hear.

Mr. MORRIS: Now they have got it, and yet the criticism of the Government to-day is stronger than ever it was before, which leads me to believe that for political purposes hon. gentlemen opposite would deprive their people of what they have been clamouring for for a number of years. We can only judge of that by the statements they have made in the House. I feel justified in saying that the great majority of the people of Canada to-day are satisfied and are offering their congratulations to our Minister of Finance on the manner in which he has handled the financial affairs of Canada. I have no intention of going into details of our national finances. That has already ben done so thoroughly, and the situation has been so well elucidated by the minister himself and by the Solicitor General, that it would be folly on my part to attempt to delve into it. Besides that the financial situation to-day has developed into such tremendous proportions that I am free to admit that it is baffling to the ordinary mind. But we feel to-day that in the man who has charge of the finances of this country we have a master of finance. Future history will record him as such. Not only can I say this of our Minister of Finance, but if I had time I might go over all of the departments and point with pride to their administration.

I will simply give the house a few impressions. Next to the work that has been accomplished in connection with the finances of Canada is that which has been accomplished by the ex-Minister of Militia. I feel satisfied, Sir, that when the history of this country shall be written, the name of Sir Sam Hughes will go down to posterity as one of the greatest men of Canada, notwithstanding the vile attacks that have been made by some hon. gentlemen opposite upon his character. They did not dare to come out openly with any statement, but by certain charges that were made or insinuated, they attempted to cast slurs on his name. But the attempt was an absolute failure, and the verdict of the people to-day is that the charges which were made in this House last winter were without foundation and were brought forward purely for political purposes.

Mr. TURRIFF: Why did the Government kick him out, then?

Mr. MORRIS: The Government are not kicking. They are going to make hon. gentlemen opposite kick before they get through with them. As the representative of an agricultural district, I should not fail to make mention of the Department of Agriculture. I feel sure that I shall be backed by 90 per cent of the people whom I represent when I say that the present Government has done more for agriculture than ever has been done in our district in the past, particularly in connection with the live stock industry. I shall not attempt to go into the details of the work of the Department of Agriculture, which is better known perhaps, to other members of the House than it is to me. One branch that I wish especially to call attention to is the Live Stock Branch, particularly the distribution of male animals, which had its origin in the mind of our late friend, John Bright, who was the head of that branch of the department. En passant, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it would be out of place if I were to say a word with regard to the death of our friend John Bright, who, I feel, is lamented by agriculturists from one end of the land to the other. He has, perhaps, done more for that particular branch of the department than any other man living. There originated in the mind of John Bright things that never were done in Canada before. He was attentive to his duty, courteous to any one who met him and ready to give good advice and counsel to any one who went to see him. I feel that Canada, and particularly the Department of Agriculture, has met with a great loss in the death of John Bright.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear.

Mr. MORRIS: We have heard a great deal about free wheat. I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) criticise that measure. Like many of his friends in the past, he has agitated in favour of free wheat. In rejecting that measure the Government did perfectly right, and under former conditions I am pleased to say that this measure is not a change of policy; it is simply an emergency measure consistent with the trade policy always followed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear.

Mr. MORRIS: It was done to meet the extraordinary conditions that have been brought about by the submarine warfare. I am glad that we have a Government that is large enough and broad enough in mind to meet situations of that kind. I would myself prefer that this be not a permanent policy, because I do not believe that free wheat would eventually be a benefit to the farmers of the West. Moreover, in legislating here we must have regard to the farmers of the East. The member for Huntingdon knows as well as I do that the stock men of the East are dependent, in a large measure, on the by-products of wheat. If we send our wheat to the United States we shall be deprived of that by-product, and, as a matter of fact, do injury to the stock men of the East by granting free wheat to the farmers of the West.

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speeches delivered by the hon. gentlemen opposite. I have no doubt that had these same gentlemen gone before the country when the agitation for the Transcontinental railway was in progress they would not have dared to make the statements that they have made in the House to-day. The principal argument made at that time was the necessity of transportation for the great products of our western country—the transportation of our manufactured products from the East, and of the products of the great prairies from the West. That was a reasonable argument, and the people accepted it, the Transcontinental railway was built upon that ground. These same gentlemen now tell us that we should deprive this road of the benefit which would accrue to it through the transportation of the products of the West, by diverting those products to the south. I have been a Protectionist all my life, and my belief in the principle of protectionism is stronger to-day than ever it was. Before hon. gentlemen opposite took office in 1896, the great dividing line between the two parties was protection or free trade. Hon. gentlemen opposite advocated free trade, although possibly they were not all out-and-out free traders. Just as soon, however, as they came into power, they swallowed with one great gulp all their free trade talk and they simply had to come down from their perch and accept the Conservative policy of protection. That fact is well known to the people of Canada, regardless of what hon. gentlemen opposite may say. If one talks with the thinking men of this country, one will soon realize that. There are a few things that come home forcibly to the ordinary man, and I will cite only two of the reasons why I am in favour of protection. In the first place, it cannot be denied that this country of ours has prospered greatly under a protective policy; secondly, we have only to look to the Republic to the south of us to see that it has grown to be a great nation under one of the highest protective tariffs in existence. These are evidences that cannot be denied, I care not what arguments may be brought forward. They are facts going down in history and they cannot be gainsaid. It is said that Great Britain has prospered under a policy of free trade, but conditions there are absolutely different to-day from what they were when Great Britain was in the process of establishing her manufacturing industries. We are told that during the Spanish war the workmen of Great Britain learned from the people of Spain the methods of manufacturing fine fabrics, and that when the Spanish war was over, they came home and put into operation what they had learned in Spain. Great Britain thus grew with practically no opposition until it became the greatest manufacturing nation in the world. When my hon. friends opposite seek to cast reflections upon the manufacturers, they are making a great mistake. We require the agriculturists, but we also require the manufacturers to consume what the farmer produces, and we have that illustration in Great Britain which has become, if not the greatest, one of the greatest nations that the world has ever known, and that result has come about principally through her vast manufacturing industries. Circumstances change, however, and Great Britain now realizes that she has made a mistake in recent years in not putting on a protective tariff. We can see now that Germany had made inroads into the trade of Great Britain and of all her overseas Dominions. Right in our own country we have seen the inroads that the Germans had made in selling to us products that we could manufacture ourselves, and that I think we shall manufacture in the future. That goes to show that a protective policy is the only proper policy for a young country such as Canada.

Perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite as well as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House feel that I am in rather a happy frame of mind, and I may say that I am in so far as this Government is concerned, because as a supporter of this Government I do not think that we have anything to fear in appealing to the country. Although no man in this House or in the Dominion would regret more than I would a general election at the present time when our country is at death's grip with an enemy, yet I feel satisfied that with the record that this Government has at its back, we can go to the country with confidence. I would feel sorry for a man who endeavours to force an election on this country at the present time because I know that that is contrary to the wishes of the people of Canada regardless of their politics. Some of the most staunch Liberals in my constituency are absolutely opposed to an election at this time. The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) notwithstanding the efforts he has been making during the past year when he has absolutely violated the truce, knows that the people of his own constituency do not approve him; he knows that the Liberal catechism of his own county, the Huntingdon Gleaner, condemns the action that he has taken during the last two years. Later on, Sir, I may have occasion to refer to those matters, but for the present nous avons fini.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I do not purpose answering the charge of dishonesty. We on this side of the House occasionally have charges of disloyalty and of want of patriotism hurled at us, and my hon. friend (Mr. Morris) in the desire to make a few more charges against us, charges us with being untruthful, insincere, etc. We are quite willing to let those charges go for what they are worth. I would like, however, while the Minister of Finance is in his seat, to refer to one remark of my hon. friend. I was unfortunately absent when the minister was speaking this afternoon, but I understand that he said that the Order in Council providing for free wheat would not be repealed except by the authority of this House, while the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Morris) says that it is merely a temporary war measure and not a policy at all. I must say that the remarks of the Solicitor General are open to the same construction as the remarks of the last speaker. If I am correctly informed, the remarks of the Minister of Finance, however, are not on the same line. I am advised that he said this was a permanent policy until repealed by the House. I will leave the last speaker and the Solicitor General and the Minister of Finance to settle these things amongst themselves. We can take whatever meaning we like out of the speeches, and I suppose that was their intention. If we want to believe it is a permanent policy, we can believe it; if we want to believe it is a temporary policy, we can believe that, and so on. No doubt these opinions are given out to satisfy different sections of public opinion.

A short time ago I read an address delivered by the Minister of Finance at St. James Methodist Church, Montreal. He disclaimed any intention of preaching a sermon, but I think myself it was rather a good sermon that he delivered on that occasion. His subject was, Self Denial and Self Sacrifice; a very good subject to preach on whether in a church or in this House, and it struck me it would not be a bad text for the minister to dilate upon before his special friends, the highly-protected interests of Canada; I think an address of that kind is very much needed in that quarter. The Minister of Finance, it seems to me, might equally well have called his subject "Efficiency." Among other things he said at that meeting:

> Increased production is necessary, increased agricultural production especially. Every acre, every plot of land in the Empire, should be made to produce this year to the utmost of the human energy available for the purpose.

Further on he says:

> It is the bounden duty of every citizen to multiply his efforts to greatly increase production.

The minister is right. Increased production of foodstuffs for the Allies is sorely needed, and Mr. Balfour seems to have impressed this need upon the people of the United States. But in order to secure this increased production there must be increased efforts and increased efficiency. There are difficulties, however, in the way of increased production in this country. Speaking of the particular part of the country with which I am best acquainted, we have many difficulties to contend with. We have had two bad threshing seasons followed by two late springs, which have greatly curtailed spring and fall ploughing, and necesarily curtailed also the production of food stuffs. These difficulties, unfortunately, have at the same time increased the danger of a luxurious growth of the farmer's great enemy, the weed crop. Those however are not the only difficulties with which the food producers of our country have to contend. Some difficulties cannot be avoided, but others can. One of the great difficulties with which the farmer has to contend is the increased price he has to pay for his implements, caused by the high protective tariff imposed by this Government. In my part of the country the threshing season is very short, lasting only a few weeks. We are obliged to thresh out of the stook, because it is impossible to ge the labour to stack. The result is that any man who has very much of a crop is obliged to have a threshing outfit of his own, not the very largest obtainable, but one that will cost him about $2,500. The most up-to-date outfits cost from $5,000 to $6,000, but the ordinary farmer would get one for his own use costing about $2,500. The duty the dealer would pay on that machine would amount to about $500. The dealer would undoubtedly charge the farmer something additional on the duty he was obliged to pay, let us say ten per cent on the $500; that would be $50, making $550 duty which the farmer would have to pay. Anyone who was asked to pay a direct tax of $550 for some article needed in his business would think it a tremendous charge, but it is only one of the many indirect taxes that we have to pay on account of our protective policy. If the threshing machine that was bought by the farmer was manufactured in the United States $500 of the amount paid by him would go into the treasury of this country; we are not grumbling about that. If the machine is bought from a Canadian manufacturer, the price would be just the same, if not a little more. But if the machine is bought from a Canadian manufacturer no part of the $500 duty that the farmer would otherwise pay would go into the treasury of this country; it would all go into the pocket of the Canadian manufacturer. Now, I find that in the last year for which we have official figures for the manufactures of Canada, we manufactured four times as much as we imported. If that is true with regard to threshing machines, in order for the treasury of this country to collect $500 duty we should have to pay duty on five machines, one imported and four manufactured. I ask you if that is good business. It is an indirect tax it is true, but we have to pay it just the same as if it were a direct tax. The same remark applies to seed drills and a great many other farm implements. Self-sacrifice is needed not only on the part of the farmers, but on the part of the manufacturers as well. Our farmers were criticised for refusing an offer to sell their wheat to the Allies at a price less than one half the market price, and were even looked upon as disloyal by some. But we have got accustomed to this cry of disloyalty and want of patriotism. Only a few days ago an hon. gentleman on this side of the House who has a son at the front, and was anxious to see that he was not exposed to unnecessary temptation from the wet canteen, was told that he was unpatriotic for bringing up the subject in the House. Now, I think it would be a great deal better if we cut out these charges of disloyalty and want of patriotism. Many of us have sons at the front and may hear of their death at any moment, and if ever there was a time when this cry should not be raised, surely it is now. I would not like to charge any man with disloyalty, not even those political colonels who strut around our country in the King's uniform, drawing big pay, and who have been on a free trip across the Atlantic to England or France, but who, the moment they smelt gunpowder, turned tail and skipped back home, leaving their men to go to the front without them. I would not charge even these men with disloyalty, though it would be far more reasonable to do so than to make the same charge against our farmers. Sacrifice is needed not only from our farmers, but on the part of our manufacturers as well. There have been cases of self-sacrifice on the part of manufacturers in Canada, but these have been isolated cases, and we want it to be a general thing. The duties on the farmer's tools of trade, if I may call them so, should be absolutely taken off, and the customs duties reduced on other things required by the consumers of this country. Efficiency is needed by the farmer. But efficiency is needed also in all walks of life, and in no place more than in the Department of Finance, but I am afraid there are not many places where it is less shown.

We have heard references to after-the-war conditions, and, though I have little hope of seeing the war end as quickly as some people have, it is worth our while to consider the probable state of affairs after the war. There are troubles we shall have to bear, which will only begin after the war is over. In the first short session after the beginning of the war, we voted $50,000,000 for war expenses. A few months later we voted $100,000,000. In the session following we voted $250,000,000, and this session we have voted $500,000,000—ten times the amount of our first vote; and not a single vote of those I have mentioned has been less than double that which preceded it. I think the man would be rash who should say that we were not almost sure to have another vote in this House, with a strong probability that it will be double the last. I trust that will be the last we shall have, but of course we cannot be sure. All this means that we shall have an extra indebtedness caused by the war of from $1,500,000,000 to $2,000,000,000. We shall also have a yearly pension list of $30,000,000 to $50,000,000. The man who thinks we are not liable to such an amount must be very sanguine as to the early end of the war. That means that we shall have to raise in the neighbourhood of $150,000,000 a year on account of the war alone, besides all that we must raise for other purposes. We hear the boast made that last year we had some $60,000,000 to the good, notwithstanding the fact that we paid $25,000,000 in interest on war indebtedness and pensions—$85,000,000 In all. But we must remember that in these years of war we are sure to be in a very much better position to pay large sums than we are likely to be afterwards. It has been admitted over and over again in this debate, that conditions are abnormal, that revenue and exports are abnormally large. I do not know what our exports of war material are, but I find that for the year 1916 our exports of cartridges alone amounted to about $225,000,000. It is plain that the only reason why our revenue exceeds our expenditure this year is to be found in these conditions, otherwise, we should be far behind, we should not have one cent of surplus to pay towards our indebtedness or pensions or interest on war debts.

The question of income tax has been discussed occasionally in this House. The Minister of Finance objects strongly to an income tax on account of the cost of collection, but I do not think he will deny that the cost of collecting an income tax is trifling compared with the direct and indirect cost of collecting customs taxes. The last year for which we have official figures of the manufactures of Canada is 1910. I find that during that year we manufactured goods to the value, approximately, of $1,166,000,000. Of these, we exported $144,000,000, leaving $1,022,000,000 of home manufactured goods to be consumed in Canada. Our imports of manufactured goods for the same year were nearly $255,000,000. I think we are safe in saying that, generally speaking, the same price is paid for home manufactured goods as for the imported goods. We paid an average duty on imported manufactured goods of about thirty per cent, as nearly as I can gather.

We have listened to the arguments of the Solicitor General on free wheat, and I think those arguments work in very well here. He told us that now that the duty is eliminated, the prices in the importing market are what they were before, less the duty. That is the actual result he finds in the case of wheat. But the same would be the result in the case of imports of manufactured goods. If the Solicitor General is right in his contention, then, if we throw off the duty from $255,000,000 of imported manufactured goods, we decrease the price not only of those goods but of the home manufactured goods as well to the former level in the importing country less the duty. That is the Solicitor General's own argument in the case of wheat, and if it is a good argument it must apply to manufactured goods as well. We pay $30 of duty on every $100 worth of goods we import. Then we pay about $3 more as a profit for the importer who pays the duty, making $33 on every $100 worth of goods. We consume of home manufactured goods about four times as much as we import, which would represent higher prices equal to $132 for each $100 worth of imported goods. Adding this to the $33, you have $165 which we pay out in order that the revenue may receive $30. Is that efficiency? I submit it is not; it is the most wasteful way we could adopt for the collecting of revenues. Yet we follow this method at a time when it is most important that our methods should be efficient, and that for every dollar we pay in taxes as much as possible should go into the public treasury. People are beginning to recognize the iniquity of operation of the tariff, and the Toronto News, the chief journalistic spokesman in Canada, I suppose, of the manufacturers, as the hon. Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) and the hon. member for Montreal, St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) are the chief spokesmen for protected interests in this House, has the following in its issue of 24th April, 1917:

Manufacturers and the Future.

If the Daily News may speak a word in season we would advise the Association to take every feasible means of justifying fiscal protection as essential to Canadian industries, to the employees of these industries and to the country as a whole. For the most part the manufacturers have a good case and they should place it before the people in effective form. A tariff ferment is working. The Western farmers want lower duties, but on the other hand the war has brought a strong hope of inter-Imperial and even inter-Ally trade arrangements supported by preferential tariffs. The Dominion could not prosper industrially without fiscal protection, and this is why the people support it. The system could never be maintained in the interests of the manufacturers alone, but as the manufacturers control the enterprises and business fostered by the tariff they should take the lead in making its advantages understood by the people.

The manufactures of Canada have never been slow in trying to educate the people upon the effects of protection. However, I think the News feels that they must be a little smarter about it, that there is danger ahead, and that a tariff ferment is working. If the newspaper means that the people are thinking along tariff lines and are beginning to realize the iniquity of the tariff, it is quite right. I do not say that the customs tariff must at once be completely abolished, but I say that a manufacturing industry which requires 30 per cent protection in this or any other country is not suited to the country and it is not in the interest of the country that it should be carried on. An industry that cannot thrive on a 10 or 15 per cent tariff is not suited to the country and should not be continued. I believe that if we would make 15 per cent our maximum tariff rate we would have just as much manufacturing in Canada as we have now, Canada would be more prosperous and the wages paid would be better because we would only carry on manufacturing industries that are suited to the country. The people are thinking along tariff lines to-day. The sentiments expressed so forcibly here from time to time by my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) are just the very sentiments that are filling the minds of the people from the Atlantic to the Pacific, not only the people on the western prairies, but the people of the Maritime Provinces, Quebec and even a very large part of Ontario, protectionist as it is. It is a matter that is receiving a great deal of attention on the part of the people and they are realizing the iniquity of the tariff.

I have been told by a prominent manufacturer in Canada that on some lines of manufacture where the duty is highest the manufacturers are making no money and that they must have more protection to succeed. What does that mean? It means that while in some cases we pay $130 or $140 for goods that we could buy but for the tariff for $100, we are paying that $30 or $40 into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturers for the purpose of making millionaires while in other cases we are throwing the money away. If it is doing no good at all we might as well throw it into the fire if my information is right. What is the use of paying these tremendous duties if they are doing no good? I would say at once, abolish these duties and let the manufacturers who are engaged in these lines of manufacture go at some work that is suited to the country. The Solicitor General told us something in regard to the western free trade sentiments, and I believe he understands the subject. Some people suggest as a solution for this trouble the establishment of large manufacturing industries in the West. I think that probably the Solicitor General knows the difficulties in the way and that this is not a solution of the question. In conversation once with a prominent Conservative protectionist, he advanced the theory to me that the proper way to do was to establish a tariff between the East and the West so that we could develop manufacturing industries in the West. If we established a tariff against the East we might have protection of the West against the East. If it is correct to say that manufacturing industries are essential to the East surely it is just as correct to say that they are essential to the West, with the tremendous capabilities of that country. We have a country which is capable of sustaining ten times the present population of Canada and we are told that in order to sustain a big population we must have manufacturing industries. I think my Conservative protectionist friend was not so very far astray if his views were right. But they are not correct. I told him that he was following the protectionist argument to its legitimate conclusion, but that I had no use for his proposal.

Mr. BLAIN: How does my hon. friend explain that Winnipeg is the third largest manufacturing city in Canada?

Mr. THOMSON: I do not propose to enter into an argument with regard to Winnipeg, because Winnipeg is not a typical city of the West. It has water powers which the rest of the country has not. The Solicitor General can answer that question better than I can. I am speaking for the large plain district west of Winnipeg. If my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) will come with me to southern Saskatchewan I can take him for days and weeks during the winter time and he cannot find a water power that will run a coffee mill. I think if he talked a little while to the Solicitor General he could put him right on that, and I think the Solicitor General would not for a moment advance that plan of solving the question. In Saskatchewan I have ripened tomatoes very successfully and I know that some people have ripened apples there. Our British Columbia friends tell us that in order to prevent the prairie farmers from eating American apples they must have a considerable amount of protection. We have as good a right to forbid our farmers eating British Columbia apples as the British Columbia men have to prevent us eating American apples. It would take far more protection to shut out British Columbia and American apple growers in favour of the Saskatchewan apple growers than it takes to shut out American apples from the prairies. But the theory is the same. If it is right in one case it is right in the other. Surely we have a right to our own market if we can grow enough tomatoes to supply the demand in Saskatchewan. But, probably our consumers would have to pay more for tomatoes and probably the men who grew tomatoes would do better if they were to go into some other line. Their case seems to me to be the same as that of the manufacturers who are not making any money. But then think of the home market right at our door, instead of going a thousand miles across plains, over mountains and through tunnels to get to that home market. If the argument is good in one case it is good in another. That is the sort of argument we continually hear in favour of protection, this blessed old home market out of which we can make so much money and out of which we never make anything. I do not believe in the theory that any one part of Canada should have protection against another. I do not believe in the theory that we should have this exorbitant protection in favour of any one class of people in Canada as against another. I believe we should produce things suitable to our own soil and climate and that we should buy other articles from those who are in a better position to produce them than we are. I believe different soils, different climates, different conditions and even different temperaments were given us for a great and wise purpose and I am sufficiently old fashioned in my belief to be satisfied that it is poor business kicking against the goads or against the Creator's plans.

In the year 1910, we manufactured goods for home consumption to the value of $1,022,000,000; and they say that we paid duty on the whole of this amount, either into the treasury of the country or into the pockets of some one else, or else we threw it away in cases where the manufacturer was not making any money. We are told that this creates a wonderful home market for us. What about that home market? I find that to produce not only that $1,022,000,000 but the whole $1,166,000,000, wages and salaries are paid to the amount of $241,000,000, less than 24 per cent of the cost of the manufactured goods. We are paying 25 per cent and 30 per cent on that in order to encourage the home manufacturer and to get the home market. That is, we pay $250,000,000 or $300,000,000 in order to get the home market of people who earn $240,000,000. Then where is the money going to come from? We will have to get more in actual profits than they actually earn in order to be even with the game. That is an exact fact. That was proved conclusively by the Solicitor General in his free wheat argument, proved to the hilt. I believe that if we abolished our protection on a great many things and materially reduced it on other things we would still employ as many labourers as we do now, and would pay as good wages. President Wilson made a careful examination of the wages paid in highly protected manufacutring industries and in those not so highly protected. He satisfied himself that in the lines where they had very little protection they paid higher wages than in those that were highly protected. I think there is no question about that. I once took occasion to look into that myself. I thought that I would get what information I could as to the wages paid in Great Britain, in France and in Germany. As those three countries were naturally in pretty much the same position, the rate of wages, other circumstances being equal, would be about equal. I found that in free trade Great Britain the rate of wages was over 26 per cent higher than in either France or Germany. I found that in those two protectionist countries the rate of wages was practically the same, while in Great Britain it was 26 per cent higher. That bears out the contention of President Wilson that it is in the unprotected manufactures that the best wages are paid. That is quite natural because they are engaged in lines which are natural to the country. The others are not, and therefore are not able to pay such good wages.

The Solicitor General is rather troubled about the slowness of these British statesmen, who do not seem to be bright enough to know when to adopt protection or anything else. He is worried about the adverse balance of trade against them. On page 889 of Hansard, he enters into quite a wail with regard to the unfortunate position of those people in Great Britain. He laments that the balance of trade is against them, that they do not know enough to put on a protective duty, and adds:

> That is the position she is in whereas, on the other hand, it is unfortunately true that her rivals in this struggle have enormous balances of trade in their favour and have, within their own borders, every great industry brought to its highest point of perfection. That is one of the great elemental truths that has enabled Germany to maintain the struggle to this day.

Either the Solicitor General is astray in his statement, or the bluebooks which his Government publishes are seriously astray. I find, in the last Trade and Commerce reports which are available, that Germany during the five years immediately preceding the war, imported during every year much more than she exported. I find that for those five years her imports exceeded her exports by 7,400,000,000 marks, about $1,800,000,000, or $360,000,000, a year on an average. That is protectionist Germany which my hon. friend wants to hold up as an example of a country having a trade balance in its favour.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is that not entirely attributable to the fact that Germany was storing up immense stores with a view of bringing on this war?

Mr. THOMSON: I am not so thoroughly posted in the German policy as to be able to tell my hon. friend just how that was. I find however, that the same thing holds good in every place I have looked for the figures for the exports of Germany at any time for the last twenty years.

Mr. WRIGHT: They have been working for the war that long.

Mr. THOMSON: I am not dealing with the question of why it should be; I am merely meeting the statement of the Solicitor General, who said that the opposite was true, whereas the Government bluebook says that this is the truth.

Mr. WRIGHT: So it would be under normal conditions.

Mr. THOMSON: The Solicitor General says it is under present conditions. The same thing is true, although not to the same extent, of Austria and Bulgaria. I have not been able to find the figures of these years for Turkey. Possibly my hon. friend may find some consolation in Turkey; if so, he will be welcome to it. I may tell my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. Wright) that, according to the Government bluebooks, the most progressive countries in Europe have all a balance of trade against them, and had a balance of trade against them before the war.

Mr. WRIGHT: Name them.

Mr. THOMSON: I shall do so: Great Britain, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Italy—

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon. gentleman proved a moment ago to his own satisfaction that Germany was importing a great deal more for war purposes.

Mr. THOMSON: I did not say anything about war purposes. I said that Germany was importing more, and, therefore, according to my hon. friend's way of putting it, the balance of trade was against her. Is that right?

Mr. WRIGHT: Naturally would be if she imported a large quantity for war purposes.

Mr. THOMSON: I was endeavouring to give a list of the most progressive countries in Europe which had a balance of trade against them. They are, Great Britain, Germany, France, Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Switzerland. Those are some of them, the best countries in Europe. What are the countries that have a balance of trade in their favour? Russia —not any too progressive generally—Mexico, Spain, Serbia, and, I think, Roumania. I am not saying that we should not have a balance of trade in our favour, but the balance of trade is usually against a new country like this, which is in process of development. It is not a bad thing to buy more than you are selling, provided you are putting your purchases to good use. Even in business the balance of trade is often against one, and it is not always a bad thing. The balance of trade would be against us this year if it were not for the abnormal conditions which exist. As one gentleman has put it, the Kaiser must receive the whole of the credit for the balance of trade being in our favour, and if it is as good a thing as some people say it is, we ought to fall down and worship the Kaiser at once.

The Solicitor General said that Great Britain from 1914 to 1916 had increased her exports only to the amount of 25 per cent. I would have been very glad if Great Britain had been allowed to increase her exports to us to the amount of 25 per cent, but on account of the beautiful little 5 per cent penalty which my hon. friend and his colleagues inflicted on Great Britain at the time of her need, her exports to us at that time decreased from $132,000,000 to about $77,000,000. That is the way my hon. friend and his colleagues treated Great Britain in a time when she needed help.

As I understand the Solicitor General, he says that there is no benefit in free wheat except as regards the lower grades. He refuses to have a statute passed which would have the same effect as the Order in Council, but which would be of a permanent character; at least it would not have the limitations and qualifications which the Order in Council has. In order to prove that we could secure no benefit from the sale in the United States of the higher grades of wheat, my hon. friend depends entirely upon only one day's quotations of the market prices. In the beginning of his speech he remarked, truthfully, I think:

> There is no lesson to be learned, even though the result is truly told and not falsified, by taking individual patches and comparing one year with another. A great historian has said that by taking mere fragments of history you can learn nothing at all, or any lesson you like, but that if you take history as a whole you get great and salutory lessons, valuable for all time. It is the same with the history of our finance.

It was the same also with regard to the history of free wheat—though perhaps the Solicitor General would not agree with me on that point. My hon. friend has quoted the authority of a great historian that you cannot learn anything by taking only patches and shreds into consideration; yet he has taken up one little shred and has tried to prove everything by it.

Referring to the manner in which the market is fixed in Winnipeg, he says:

> Our market is across the water at Liverpool, and as a consequence the price of wheat in this country is fixed by the Liverpool market, less the freight and less one cent a bushel which the grain dealer retains for his profit; I believe that is the rate obtaining with every dealer in grain. The management of the Liverpool Exchange have advised me that the prices fixed for grain have been arrived at by that process, and by that only; and that has always been the case.

My hon. friend gives the quotations which were made on a certain day in Winnipeg, when there were fluctuations of 11½ cents. But the Liverpool Exchange is closed before ours opens, on account of the difference in time; the English grain dealer is through with his day's work before our men start. When the Winnipeg Grain Exchange opens, they have quotations from Liverpool, and these quotations remain the same during the whole day. This being the case, how does the hon. gentleman account for the fluctuations?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated was that the Liverpool prices were cabled to the Winnipeg Exchange and the Winnipeg prices were fixed on that cable in the way that I set forth. Necessarily there are fluctuations on the grain exchange, but the price that is cabled and given out by the grain exchange or the Grain Dealers Association, as it is called, is the price that rules throughout the day at the different buying points in the West. If my hon. friend will write Dr. McGill, secretary of the Grain Exchange, who gave me the information, he will be told exactly the same thing.

Mr. THOMSON: I do not question what my hon. friend says now, but I question what he said the other day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I said the other day.

Mr. THOMSON: I read what you said the other day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read it again.

Mr. THOMSON: I read it exactly as it appears in Hansard; I did not put in one word that the hon. gentleman did not say.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps you did not read it all.

Mr. THOMSON: I did read it all, so far as was necessary to my argument. If there were fluctuations of 11½ cents, that shows that there are bids which are not placed on the Liverpool markets and that the rule which my hon. friend has laid down is not good. This is an erratic world, and I think one of the most erratic things in it is the grain market. It is difficult to say how the grain market will go.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman still say that there is not a balance of trade in favour of Germany?

Mr. THOMSON: According to the Government blue-books there is a balance of trade against them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You quoted what it was, not what it is.

Mr. THOMSON: I do not know what Germany is doing now; I suppose she is doing what the British fleet lets her do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The relative proportions of Germany's export trade as compared with that of the British Empire have for years been increasing in Germany's favour. Whereas in 1900 for every £100 worth of German goods exported, there was exported in 1913, £229 worth, Great Britain, for every £100 worth exported in 1900, there was exported in 1913 only £180 worth.

Mr. THOMSON: I object to my hon. friend's making a speech in the middle of my remarks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend challenged me a moment ago; perhaps he will let me answer him now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. THOMSON: I think that my hon. friend is rather infringing on his privileges; he is making another speech. I quoted the remarks of my hon. friend, word for word, I showed that he was absolutely wrong, and he dares not deny it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to deny it now, but you will not let me. I want to show you where you are wrong.

Mr. THOMSON: I will read my hon. friend's words again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman will not let me deny it.

Mr. THOMSON: I will let you deny it, but I do not want you to make a speech. This is the second time that the hon. gentleman has attempted to make a speech in the middle of my remarks, and I do not propose to allow it. The hon. gentleman said, in speaking of the balance of trade:

> It is unfortunately true that her rivals in this struggle have enormous balances of trade in their favour, and have, within their own borders—

And so on. Now what balance of trade Germany has in her favour since the war began I do not think my hon. friend knows; I do not, because we cannot know exactly what is going on in that country, as Germany is not giving out any such information. I have quoted up to the time of the war, and in all these years the balance of trade was against Germany.

Mr. MEIGHEN: She was gaining very rapidly.

Mr. THOMSON: It is true that in the last years she had not been gaining very rapidly. For one year before the war she had made a big jump. I have looked up the figures for the last ten or fifteen years, and I have found that the average is about the same as it was during those five years, a little less, I think, so that she has not been gaining. She may have gained in one year, but you cannot prove things by one quotation. One swallow does not make a summer, although, if my hon. friend so desired, he could prove to his own satisfaction that one swallow made half a dozen summers.

I was dealing with the question of free wheat and of my hon. friend's proof of the statement that we were getting no benefit on the higher grades of wheat. He claims to prove that by the conditions of the market for one day. I have read a great many opinions of experts in the grain trade, hundreds of which opinions are quoted in the newspapers, and I do not remember seeing a single one that claimed for a moment that the market quotations of the day cited by my hon. friend prove anything, although he says that they prove everything; that they settle the whole question. I submit it does not; the mere fact that there were certain spreads on one day proves nothing. I might just as well claim that because the prices are to-day from 40 to 50 cents a bushel higher than they were at the time the Order in Council was passed, therefore the prices have advanced on account of wheat being put on the free list. The experts do not contend for a moment that the quotations of that day prove anything. Mr. James Carruthers, in the Financial Post of the 28th of April, speaking of free wheat, says:

> I believe it will prove a great benefit to our farmers. Free wheat will contribute to the prosperity of the western farmer, and consequently to his contentment.

I fancy, if I am not mistaken, that Mr. Carruthers was an expert in grain matters when my hon. friend was running around in pantaloons, although my hon. friend thinks that he knows more than Mr. Carruthers about this subject. I quote from the Nor-West Farmer of the 20th of April:

> Regarding the permanent benefits of the removal of the duty on wheat, only time can actually determine.

My hon. friend, however, thinks he can determine it from one day's quotations.

> It will mean much to the western farmers; it will give them this great southern market at their very door, which will be utilized whenever it is advantageous to do so. This will be a permanent advantage.

My hon. friend says it is at present advantageous for him to have free wheat on account of the low grades of wheat, and I grant he is right; but it is advantageous for him to have it at all times, because of the fact that our highest grade of wheat, which is better than anything the American farmer produces, is wanted at all times by the Minneapolis miller for mixing purposes, and he is always willing to pay a little extra price for it, so if we always have that market we shall always get that benefit. I do not purpose saying anything further about this Order in Council or Statute. I tried to secure a little information from my hon. friend when he was speaking, when he claimed that the Order in Council was in exactly the same position as a statute. I asked him if the Order in Council could not be repealed at any momnt by another Order in Council, and he admitted that it could. I am not sure whether he meant by the further answer that he made, to leave the impression that if a statute were passed, it could also be repealed by an Order in Council. My hon. friend may be a little rash sometimes and so may his Government, but they would hardly be so rash as to repeal, by an Order in Council, an Act passed by this House shortly before. I am not, however, going to enter into a discussion as to whether or not an Act of Parliament passed in this way could be repealed by an Order in Council.

Mr. McKENZIE: It certainly could not be repealed unless the statute itself provided for that being done.

Mr. THOMSON: I am not going to enter into a discussion of the effect of this Order in Council when the war is ended. Personally, I believe my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is right so far as I have been able to follow his argument. I am very glad that the Government have gone so far as they have in the matter of free wheat, although I am very sorry for the way in which we were given free wheat, and I am very sorry that they should have waited until a moment when the placing of wheat on the free list would do the least good, although I am not saying this in a complaining way. Some statements have been made in this House as to the proportion of wheat still in the farmers' hands at the time the Order in Council was passed. The proportion of wheat was very small; but the proportion of low grade wheat is very much smaller, for this reason. The parts of the country in which there were the poorer grades had very light crops, and consequently the farmers did not take long to thresh the grain, and as they needed the money, they marketed those low grades quickly. I believe, therefore, the greater proportion of that grain was marketed and that a very small proportion of it is left in the farmers' hands. The great benefit from free wheat has gone, for this year at least, to the speculator and the miller, and hardly any of it to the farmer. Although I know a few farmers in my constituency who are still holding wheat, I do not know of one who is holding the low grade of wheat.

Mr. LALOR: I think the Government crop reports would lead one to suppose there is quite a large amount of wheat still in the farmers' hands. I am not saying this as a matter of criticism, but just as a matter of information. Does my hon. friend think that statement is not correct?

Mr. THOMSON: From what I know, there is a very small proportion of wheat in the farmers' hands now. Although the bulk may be considerable, it is a very small proportion of the crop. It must be remembered that the official reports to which my hon. friend refers were made some time ago, and that the wheat is continually and rapidly going out of the farmers' hands, because in the latter part of the winter most of the grain is rushed off. The farmers must market it before the sleighing is over, because after that they have no opportunity until after the seeding is done, and then they are busy ploughing. It is a rash thing for a farmer to hold grain over unless he has an elevator. Some of them are holding grain in elevators, but that is a very small proportion of the crop, and so far as the low grades of wheat are concerned, there is practically none now in the farmers' hands, so that whatever benefit is derived must be derived entirely by the speculators and practically none by the farmers. I think the Solicitor General will bear me out in that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not yet.

Mr. THOMSON: I tried to draw out the Minister of Finance this evening, but evidently he does not want to be drawn. We have heard, however, what the Solicitor General has to say; it was pretty carefully worded, and it might mean almost anything or nothing. We have also heard what the hon. member for Chateauguay (Mr. Morris) has to say. He was very outspoken; I am afraid he blurted the truth right out. He accused us of being untruthful. I could not accuse him of that, because I think he told us the plain truth. This is purely an emergency measure, and the moment it suits the Government they will rescind it.

If the free wheat policy is to be of benefit only in the case of lower grades of wheat, what will happen if we have a good crop this year? Last year our crop was very poor on account of the rust, but this year we may have a good one, plump grain, I hope, like we had in 1915. What would happen in that case? If the Government are thoroughly sincere, and I would not like to accuse them of being insincere, why then at the beginning of next season they will rescind the order; they must, if their reasoning is sound.

Mr. LALOR: You have the positive statement of the Minister of Finance that he will not do that.

Mr. THOMSON: I was not in the House when the Minister of Finance made that positive statement, and I have tried to draw him out this evening but he will not be drawn. There have been so many interpretations of that positive statement of his, that I do not know what it means. I am told that it was merely a statement that the Order in Council would not be rescinded except on authority from this House.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will read Hansard to-morrow, he will see that he has not correctly quoted me.

Mr. THOMSON: In the meantime, we have the positive statement of hon. gentlemen opposite that it is an emergency measure, and we have the rather roundabout statement of the Solicitor General from which the only reasonable inference is that the Order in Council will be repealed when it is no longer required, and it will be no longer required if we have no low grade wheat this year. I hope we will have none, but I do not want to see this Order repealed.

On motion of Mr. Boulay, the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Wednesday, May 2, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND EX-MINISTER OF MILITIA.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.) moved:

For a copy of the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence which led to the latter's resignation or dismissal from the Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) that as a matter of courtesy to the Prime Minister he might allow this motion to stand until his return. The correspondence asked for is that which has passed between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence. I submit that there might be considerable of the correspondence of a confidential character, and it is only proper that the Prime Minister should himself have an opportunity of pronouncing upon this motion, as he is the only member of the Government who could authorize the bringing down of the correspondence in question. I submit to the House that it is due to the Prime Minister that my hon. friend should allow his motion to stand until the Prime Minister returns.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: I have no objection to that suggestion, but I might remark that on the 7th of February, the day of the adjournment, the Prime Minister stated that it would be brought down.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not at all question what my hon. friend has said, but, as a matter of fact, this information could not be brought down until the Prime Minister returns. I would not like to see that order passed without giving him an opportunity to speak upon the motion if he should so desire.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES: The matter can stand until the Prime Minister comes back.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

PHYSICAL WELFARE OF THE CANADIAN PEOPLE.

DOMINION DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH SUGGESTED.

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the efficiency of the nation depends largely on the physical condition of the people, and in order that the latter may be conserved in the largest possible measure, there should be organized a separate department of the Government having supervision over all matters relating to the physical welfare of the Dominion.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in commencing my remarks I desire to offer an explanation which will make clear the intention of the resolution now before the House. It is well known that under the British North America Act the provinces have jurisdiction over:

The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums and charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospitals.

The House is also aware that since Confederation the provinces have undertaken many lines of public health work which they continue to carry on with much benefit to their people. The intention of the resolution is in no way to interfere with the rights and functions of the provinces, and for this reason it would have been better had the last clause of the resolution read:

There should be organized a separate department of the Government having supervision over all matters relating to the physical welfare of the people of the Dominion so far as they come within the Federal jurisdiction.

It is perhaps no exaggeration to say that at no period of our history has the prevention of disease and the physical welfare of our people occupied so large a place in the thoughts of every intelligent community as obtains at the present day. This has been accentuated by the present war in Europe. Prior to the outbreak of war there was much evidence of the progress of sanitary science and of the satisfactory results therefrom. We had seen typhus fever, cholera, and other less acute diseases practically exterminated in civilized nations. We had seen the rate of mortality from typhoid, smallpox, scarlet fever and others vastly decreased. We had seen the rate of mortality in England and Wales reduced from 21.4 per 1,000 to 14.6 per 1,000 in the last fifty years, thus saving the lives of 345,000 people each year.

But the war has furnished some remarkable examples of the value of sanitation and medical science. Instead of thousands of our brave soldiers dying from typhoid, as occurred in all previous wars, and tens of thousands being affiicted and rendered useless by the same disease, we find that by the efforts of medical science typhoid in the army has been practically exterminated so much so that in the year 1915 in the great British army, including the forces from the overseas dominions, only some 46 cases of typhoid occurred. Let this House imagine, if they can, the increased efficiency of the Army on this account. Dr. W. Osler's opinion is that if inoculation against typhoid in the armies were universal it would increase the efficiency of the forces by one-third. Not only typhoid but cholera and tetanus, the greatest enemies of the British soldier in all previous wars, are beaten for all time to come. Not only this, but the death rate from sickness in the millions fighting under the Union Jack, has been less than the rate of mortality among men of military age remaining at home. When a man joins the army he is taught how to live. His food and general life is regulated to produce vigorous manhood and these described conditions are the result. The war has taught us this lesson, that a nation fights upon its health. The fit man has not only to protect himself and his family but also to protect the unfit man and his family who are unable to protect themselves. War has shown what can be done when qualified men are given power and resources with which to cope with disease. We all deplore the immense loss of life in war but if we are willing to utilize the lessons taught by the war we can in future save many more lives each year than are now being lost in the European conflict.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we can conquer disease in war, surely we can overcome it in time of peace. We have seen something of what science has wrought in the war spheres but lest Parliament may conclude that it is only in war time that problems arise affecting the health of our people, let me assure this House that the health problems of times of peace while possibly not so acute are of still greater importance to the future welfare of the nation. Canada is on the threshold of nationhood. We have the experience and the errors of the European nations and the United States to guide us and we should profit therefrom.

There are two great avenues through which our population increases, viz., immigration and natural increase.

How can our Government help the efficiency of the nation through immigration? First, by encouraging physically and mentally fit people to settle in our land, and secondly by refusing admission to our country of those who are physically and mentally unfit to become productive citizens. The need of attention to the latter problem is evidenced by the following facts: The number of feeble minded in Canada is constantly increasing. There are to-day in Ontario 7,700 feeble minded and probably at least 20,000 in the whole Dominion. This does not include the insane, idiots, epileptics, etc. From a population of 20,000 the number of this class will rapidly increase, for these people multiply rapidly, and 80 per cent of the offspring of such parents will be feeble minded. The only effective way to check the increase from this source is to segregate them, and it is estimated that if this plan were put into operation now by the year 1950 this country would be free from this menace.

The Government may constitutionally be relieved from responsibility for the care of our feeble minded population, but they cannot refuse to accept responsibility for the admission through our immigration ports of such people. It is beyond dispute that our system of examination of immigrants is too lax. During the year 1914-15 there were deported from Canada, on account of imbecility, insanity, and mental defect, 154 persons. All of these must have been admitted within three years previous, and under a strict supervision of cases nearly all of these could have been excluded. Six hundred and six were deported during the three years 1913-14-15, and even this figure does not indicate, with any accuracy, the number of such cases admitted to the country.

Since the Public Health Service of the United States has taken over the work of examining immigrants at the New York port of entry the methods have been greatly improved, and in consequence there are 75 per cent more rejections than formerly. Officials who have charge of the medical examination of these immigrants estimate, from their experience, that four out of every one thousand who apply for admission to that country are mentally defective.

If the examinations at the Canadian ports of entry were equally thorough, and they ought to be, many feeble minded who are now admitted and later deported or become a charge and menace in the country, would be rejected. As evidence of this let me quote the results of a test made in 1914 by Dr. Pagé, our very excellent and efficient superintendent of immigration at the port of Quebec. In July and August of that year he secured the services of Miss Mateer, a specialist from the School of Feeble Minded at Vineland, New Jersey, to assist in examining immigrants for mental defect at the port of Quebec. In those two months 14,700 were examined, and of these 2 in 1,000 on an average were found to be mental defects. If that proportion held good throughout all our immigrants there were, during 1914-15 and the two preceding years, nearly 2,000 mental defectives who sought admission into Canada, while at least two-thirds of them were admitted. If the proportion found at New York held good at our ports there must have been admitted to Canada in these three years at least 3,000 mental defectives—an appalling number.

We are to-day paying the cost of this lax system. A few statistics will illustrate this. In 1914 there were admitted to the Ontario hospitals for the insane 1,451 patients, and of these 545, or 37½ per cent were born outside of Canada. Undoubtedly a large percentage of these could have been excluded by a rigid inspection by trained experts, and by investigation of their family history in the lands whence they came. Out of 2,438 patients admitted to the Orillia asylum for feeble minded since it was opened 424 were born outside of Canada. There were admitted to the hospital for epileptics at Woodstock, Ont., during the nine years of its existence, 435 patients, of whom 80 were born outside of Canada. As each of these patients costs on an average $300 per year, it can be seen it is costing the province of Ontario an enormous sum each year to care for the mental defectives who are admitted to Canada and who could be kept out of the country by more careful inspection by qualified inspectors. But the cost does not end there. Each succeeding generation swells the number, for at least 80 per cent of their offspring will also be feeble minded. And these are among the material we are expected to change into patriotic citizens.

From the ranks of this class, too, are recruited many of our criminals. Dr. Goddard, of Vineland, says:—

> There is no such thing as hereditary criminals, it is hereditary feeble-mindedness that accounts for the conditions. Criminals are not born, they are made, and probably fifty per cent of all criminals are mentally defective.

So intimately associated is the problem of mental deficiency with crime, poverty, disease, immorality and other social evils that health authorities, educational authorities and the courts are deeply interested in a satisfactory solution.

The greater number of our immigrants are from Great Britain and the United States. In the former country it is estimated that there are at least 300,000 feeble minded, and in the latter country half a million. We see, then, how easy it is to have large numbers of feeble minded seeking admission among our new immigrants.

But the meance through our immigration is not confined to feeble mindedness. This applies also to the tubercular. In 1914, out of 746 inmates of a number of Canadian tuberculosis sanitaria, 93 in all, or 12 per cent of the total, had been in Canada less than three years. In the Winnipeg sanitarium, of 174 inmates 24 were admitted during the first year in the country and 20 in the second year. In all, 52 had been in Canada less than three years. In the Lac Tranquil sanitarium, Kamloops, B.C., of 400 admissions 8½ per cent had been in Canada less than one year.

When we consider that only 25 per cent of our tuberculosis cases are in sanitaria we can estimate the enormous number of such cases that are finding a refuge in Canada, and so increasing the burdens of the Canadian taxpayers and menacing the health and efficiency of the people. And in this young country, where we are now laying the foundations for a future mighty nation, we allow this condition to develop. We prohibit child labour, or place restrictions upon it in the interests of the race, and very properly so; but I wish to say, in all sincerity, that the wrong done even unborn children and the Canadian people generally by parents, defective or diseased, whom the state permits to marry and multiply, is a vastly greater danger to the state than child labour.

Let me speak now of communicable diseases. The suppression of these diseases should be made a state problem, because they attack the citizenship of our country. We are ready, prompt and effective in resisting the foe from without, but, I fear, indifferent and negligent in our resistance to the greater foes within. Someone has said that these diseases are the children of a nation's ignorance and neglect. Protection against communicable disease is as important as protection against larceny or incendiarism, assault, or even murder.

It is estimated that there are in Canada every year at least 50,000 deaths which could be prevented. These deaths are caused by polluted water, impure and adulterated food and drugs, epidemics, various preventable diseases such as tuberculosis, typhoid, etc., unclean cities, and bad sanitation in our homes. Fifty thousand people dying each year whose lives could be saved —and this Parliament gives scarcely a thought to it. If 50,000 people, half the population of Ottawa, were destroyed, say, in one day by some terrible calamity, would we not take notice of it! There are in Canada 500,000 cases of preventable disease every year. If we should read in the press to-morrow morning that the whole population of Montreal was stricken with some disease, would we not wake up and take action? Yes, 50,000 of our people are needlessly dying every year. 500,000 are suffering from illness which can be prevented, and $100,000,000 or more is being lost every year—and still we give no heed.

This leads me to speak of the vast economic loss to the workingmen of the country through sickness, and again I am compelled to use statistics from the United States, because we have none dealing with the matter in Canada. The report of the Committee on Industrial Relations appointed by Congress made a very searching investigation of this subject and said that each of the thirty million workmen of the United States were losing on an average nine days work each year from sickness. This meant to them a total loss of $680,000,000 annually. From sicknes unemployment results, and from this follow further distress, destitution and disease. All charitable organizations testify that a very much larger percentage of the cases that apply for asistance are driven to them by sickness than by unemployment. The economic evils of sickness are recognized so generally that numerous remedies have been advocated. The one most generally adopted is that of social or health insurance. Most European countries have adopted this policy of alleviating the distress resulting from sickness. The last to do so was Great Britain, when in 1911 Lloyd George's scheme was put in force. The United States is at present devoting much thought to this matter, and it is probable that within a few years that country, too, will have some such system. Canada, sooner or later, will have to grapple with the conditions produced by sickness among her people. But there is for this young country a better way than the method forced on the older nations by their past neglect. We are to-day in a position to prevent the conditions which have demanded relief in the older countries. These remedies are merely palliative. Conditions are permitted to develop which demand a remedy. Better far for Parliament to prevent such conditions than to play at effecting cures after they have been allowed to become established. So we ought to do in Canada.

Society is demanding each year greater skill and greater efficiency of its members, a requirement that calls for a greater investment in the training of the individual and a condition that makes the economic loss due to preventable diseases most appalling. The great economic loss due to the deaths of individuals before they have become an earning power, and of persons dying during the most productive period of life is relatively small as compared with the enormous loss caused by illness, with its consequent loss of time of the wage earner, the inefficiency of the worker, the expenditure for medicine and attention and the absence or decrease of productiveness on the part of other individuals who must spend a part of or their entire time in caring for the sick. It is obvious that this large loss of life and health constitutes a serious curtailment of the productive efficiency of the nation, and that a heavy economic burden results from the support of invalids, defectives, and those deprived of their bread winners.

The United States National Conservation Commission have also looked into this matter, and the substance of their report is this: 42 per cent of all deaths are unnecessary; over 630,000 lives could be saved annually in the United States by applying existing and known methods of life-saving. This would add at least fifteen years to the average duration of human life.

Perhaps, however, the one most appalling feature of the whole subject is the vast national loss resulting from infant mortality. The Canadian people are waking up to the fact that there is an enormous waste in infant life. The war is teaching us the value of babies. We may be asked how can these helpless, expensive little creatures be of value in this war time? It is because they are our future men and women, and saving the babies is providing the nation with its future man power. There are dying in Canada every year about 30,000 children under one year of age, 15,000 of these lives could be saved. These would be Canadian born citizens ready to take their places in the ranks of Canadian citizenship. We spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in inducing people from all parts of the world to come to Canada, many of whom never become Canadian citizens and never get into close touch with Canadian life or Canadian institutions; yet by our indifference and neglect we lose every year 15,000 possible future citizens, the progeny of our own people—and still we are told that Government has no responsibility in the matter. It may appear absurd to speak of the conservation of human life at a time when almost the entire world is engaged in a struggle which daily demands the sacrifice of thousands of lives, but even in the midst of this cruel slaughter, where a terrible drain of life is necessary, if Canada and the British Empire are to live, it surely becomes increasingly urgent on this Parliament to offset this terrible loss by minimizing the unnecessary sacrifice of child life. The baby is worth saving and worth being surrounded by healthful conditions, so that when manhood or womanhood is reached we may have a healthy citizen. In Britain the army doctors have rejected a million men for physical unfitness. In Canada, while I have not the figures, I have no doubt that the proportion is equally large. Surely this is a national loss which calls for intervention. Our citizens and soldiers are grown up babies, and we cannot have the grown up man without first having the baby. Had the conservation and preservation of human life in Canada received during the last fifty years the same attention that the health of the horse, the cow, the hog has received, Canada would to-day have been able to put in the field an army of 600,000 men as easily as she has raised her present 400,000.

I have endeavoured to show the House some of the problems—national problems—which Canada must sooner or later face with all seriousness. We have the problem of the physically and mentally defective immigrant becoming a menace and a burden to the nation. We have the prevalence of communicable diseases with all their evils, bringing death to thousands, lessening the efficiency of other thousands, and impoverishing tens of thousands of our citizens, most of which diseases are preventable. And then we have the problem of infant mortality. Surely these problems are worthy the attention of this Parliament.

With all the changes and advances and improvements in departmental administration during the past quarter century, the administration of health matters remains unchanged, and this notwithstanding the fact that probably nothing has so much required improved and modern methods of administration. To quote again the great Disraeli, "The care of the public health is the first duty of a statesman." Disraeli knew nothing of the conditions in Canada but I wish to quote the opinions of men who do know the conditions. At the meeting of the Civic Improvement League of Canada, held on January 20, 1916, the following resolution was passed:

> That the league petition the Dominion Government to establish a Federal Department of Public Health, in order that all matters of health and disease under Federal, provincial and municipal jurisdiction, the compilation of health literature, the direction of research work, and the preparation of statistical records may be systematized, co-ordinated and unified for the sake of greater economy, progress and efficiency.

At every congress of the Canadian Public Health Association since its organization in 1911 the following resolution was passed:

> That in the opinion of this association it is a matter of great importance that the Dominion Government do take steps to create a Department of Public Health, in order that all Federal branches dealing with health work may be co-ordinated under one administration.

The Canadian Public Health Association embraces in its membership representatives from all the provinces. In it are found most of the men who have given public health close and continuous study for many years—the men who are actively interested in public health—and this resolution is the result of their opinions. At the inaugural meeting of the Canadian Public Health Association, held in Montreal on the 13th of December, 1911, His Royal Highness, the Duke of Connaught spoke as follows:

> Of the many subjects which are awaiting solution in Canada, none is so important to my mind as that of the health of its inhabitants, both adult and infant. It is a subject which affects every one of us individually, and we owe it to ourselves and to the rising generation to see that conditions are improved, so far as lies within our power. Public health is a question which arises above all politics and it is the duty of the whole nation to join in promoting the objects of the association which is now gathered here.

The present unbusinesslike, necessarily inefficient and expensive system, when we estimate it by results achieved, is indefensible, and is, in my opinion, a reproach to the administrative methods of this and previous Governments. A Department of Public Health, as proposed, would co-ordinate the various Federal activities that we have already and put them together under one intelligent management. This is the businesslike plan; it is the economical method, and of greater importance than either, it is the only plan which can give efficiency.

Practically every continental European country has a National Health Service. The United States in 1912, notwithstanding the previous existence of State Health Boards, established a Federal Public Health Service, and already it has proven its value, and lastly, at the present moment, we have the example of Great Britain where the question is now under consideration. The recent report of the Local Government Board, of which Lord Rhondda is the president, recommends the establishment of a Ministry of Health in the British Government, and there is every reason to believe the recommendation will be adopted. A Ministry of Health is urged as a war measure, first and foremost, the central fact of the situation being that if the nation is to survive it must look to its health and the health of its children. The press of Great Britain generally commends the proposition. The London Daily News in an editorial of April 2 last said:

> It is an interesting and in its way a hopeful fact, that both Lord Rhondda and the very strong Unionist Social Reform Committee,—which includes such men as Lord Henry Bentinck, Mr. Leslie Scott, and Major Waldorf Astor—should have apparently arrived at the same conclusion in studying from different angles the important subject of national health.

On certain points there is a general agreement. No one will deny, for instance, that the present state of things cannot be suffered to continue. The most elementary consideration of economy and efficiency make it essential that the hopeless administrative chaos which the committee hold up to just ridicule in their report should be brought to an end as speedily as possible. But apart from this, no one now questions that the problems of national health are in every sense matters of life and death for the nation. We cannot afford to suffer conditions to continue under which the President of the Local Government Board can express his considered conviction that a thousand infant lives 'are needlessly lost' every week; and that this is only one side of a very many sided problem.

And on the same day The Times editorially said:

It is scarcely disputed that during recent years our health services have tended to outgrow their strictly departmental character. They have progressed in efficiency and in importance, but their growing importance has only served to reveal the isolation in which each of them stood. Powerful instruments of good in themselves, they often failed in the larger sense because they lacked a common purpose and a common direction. Machinery was multiplied without a corresponding gain in achievement; there was waste of men and material; there was overlapping. To careful students of these circumstances it appeared inevitable that sooner or later the streams must unite, and now events have lifted the question above the level of more intelligent anticipation. A national need has arisen which makes it imperative that union should take place forthwith. Our losses in the field can only be made good by preventing needless losses at home.

For these reasons we welcome the proposals which have been made by the President of the Local Government Board. Lord Rhondda signalized his entry to office by declaring that 1,000 infant lives could be saved every week. He has now indicated in what manner he believes this vital economy can be secured. He proposes the formation of a Ministry of Health, in which various departments supervising medical matters shall be concentrated.

We recognize the fact that our ministers are burdened with work at the present time, but under the crushing load of duties daily imposed upon them they have a thought for the future of our land and of the problems which the future—the near future—must grapple with. The care of health of the nation may not be urged upon them so insistently as some other matters; but I am sure their expressed appreciation of the needs, and their sympathy with any efforts to correct the conditions calling for remedy will lead them to give the matter sympathetic and, I hope, favourable consideration. The minister who gives Canada an efficient Health Department confers upon the future citizens of our country and upon the nation as a whole a boon that will loom large in the minds of future generations. But it may be asked what can a Federal Department of Public Health do? Let me summarize:

1. It could have supervision of the examination of immigrants as to their mental and physical condition, with a view to excluding large numbers of mental and physical defectives now admitted.

2. It could have supervision of quarantine at our ports and the prevention of the importation of communicable disease.

3. It could have the care of marine hospitals.

4. It could collect vital statistics—we have in Canada no complete statistics of births, marriages and deaths for the whole Dominion.

5. It could have supervision of foods and drugs, as they affect the health of the people.

6. It could collect information of the prevalence and geographic distribution of disease and other pertinent sanitary information.

7. It could investigate causes of disease.

8. It could co-operate with and render assistance to provincial health authorities.

9. It could distribute information and literature regarding the prevalence, distribution, causation and prevention of disease.

10. It could establish a great national hygienic laboratory. This could be operated in connection with the work of the Research Commission for the appointment of which the Government deserves much credit.

I trust that this matter which I have endeavoured to bring before the House at this time will receive the consideration, not only of the Government, but of all the members.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL: Does the hon. member intend to ask that any of the powers now held by the provinces in this matter should remain with the provinces or that they should be brought under the control of the Dominion by an amendment to the British North America Act?

Mr. STEELE: There should be no interference whatever with the work now being carried on by the provinces; but there are other lines in which, with a federal health service, the health work of the nation could be co-ordinated in such a way that there would be no interferences with the provinces; there would be no overlapping; there would be much greater economy of service and much greater efficiency. There are, of course, many matters which the provinces have not power to deal with, as the British North America Act places the great bulk of health work under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

4. p.m.

Mr. EUGENE PAQUET (L'Islet) (translation): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the House, I shall speak a few words to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele). What is the aim of the resolution?

That, in the opinion of this House, the efficiency of the nation depends largely on the physical condition of the people, and in order that the latter may be conserved in the largest possible measure, there should be organized a separate department of the Government having supervision over all matters relating to the physical welfare of the Dominion.

In this morning's issue of the Ottawa Citizen, the hon. member for South Perth is reported as seeking to secure the organization of a department of public health, in order to promote the teachings of one particular school. The hon. member has already made it clear to the House that the resolution is no way concerned with the teaching of medical science or the doctrines of any particular school.

The hon. member for South Perth is entitled to the congratulations and thanks of the House. His disquisition is admirable, bearing as it does on a subject which is of interest to the whole Canadian people. It is universally acknowledged that a nation's strength and vigour depends to a great extent on the physical condition of its constituent elements. The great strides made in medical science since the wonderful discoveries of Pasteur, Koch and Lister have saved countless human lives. The results attained in scientific research and modern sanitation account for the preservation of hundreds of thousands of soldiers' lives. The health and strength of the Canadian nation largely depend on the moral, physical and mental qualities of the people and of the foreign element which is bound to come to our shores. Our first care should be to eliminate from among the British and American immigrants, who seek admission, the mentally defective. In Great Britain and the United States it is claimed that 600,000 persons suffer from mental diseases in one form or another. Immigrants should be subjected to a rigid inspection as to their mental condition by experts in disease of the brain. At a special clinic in a Toronto hospital, it was found, as stated by the hon. member, that a large number of the weak-minded were foreigners. It behooves us then to require a more rigid examination of immigrants, so that any who later might become a menace to the vigour of the race may be refused admittance.

There is nothing in the constitution to prevent the establishment by the Federal Government of a department of public health. Since Confederation, the Federal Governments have dealt with many matters concerning public health, but the enactments of provincial legislatures in that sphere must be kept in mind. In Canada the importance of sanitation is being recognized more and more. In the province of Quebec, to speak only of my province, there is a Board of Public Health which has to deal with the problems of hygiene and to cope with epidemics. Its sphere of utility is being extended every day. In the same province there are health officers who look after hygienic conditions. Last winter, Laval University at Quebec gave lectures on public sanitation, the graduates at the end of the course being awarded a degree in hygienic science. Some of the graduates secure positions as sanitary inspectors.

I feel that the best means of developing the physical welfare of our people is by the establishment of a federal department of public health. But before working out the details of the scheme, representatives of the Provincial and Federal Governments should hold a conference to decide on a course of action that would avoid all possible encroachment on provincial jurisdiction. Once a mutual understanding is reached, the proposed department could easily be set in operation. Public health work is extending its usefulness every day, and I have no doubt that such a department in the Federal Administration would soon prove its necessity. At the present time matters concerning the public health are divided among various departments, with no attempt at co-ordinate action, such as could be secured if they were all united under one responsible head.

I wish to call the especial attention of the Government and of the Minister of Inland Revenue to the Act concerning patent medicines. That subject is one for a public health department to consider. I have closely examined the Act and read important articles dealing with the enactment. As a result of a careful study, I should ask the Government and the House to repeal or amend the law so as to afford a greater measure of protection to the public. It has been said by a physician: Public health is indeed endangered, because everything, in so far as it is concerned, is done in the dark. It offers a fertile field for the operation of quackery. No doubt as to that.

I wish to congratulate heartily Dr. L. F. Dubé, of Notre-Dame-du-Lac, county of Temiscouata, province of Quebec, on the lecture he delivered in the month of September, 1916, before the Commission of Sanitary Services. Whoever reads this dissertation cannot but urge an immediate revision of the law concerning patent medicines. With the leave of the House, I shall read the following extract from his lecture:

"When a department or a federal board of public health is established at Ottawa, it is to be expected that it will be entrusted with the supervision, inspection and control of all matters coming under the Act, as well as with the enforcement of the law, and control over the sale and manufacture of patent medicines. The work should be carried on under medical officers or health specialists duly authorized."

Medical associations have insisted on the repeal of the present Act, and I cannot urge too strongly the necessity for new legislation. In every department of the service there are at present to be found branches having to do with matters connected with public health, and which should properly be entrusted to one department. The result would be unity of purpose and action, which are indispensable if it is desired to reap all the fruits of modern scientific achievements.

Before resuming my seat, I wish to say a last word of commendation of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele), for having called the attention of the House and of the Government to such an important subject as that of public health.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): My hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Steele) had a resolution of somewhat similar character last year, and, in presenting it, he brought forward a great deal of valuable data on the subject of control of the health of the nation and of the jurisdiction in these matters of the provinces and of the Dominion. The hon. gentlemen then made a number of valuable suggestions, which entitled him to the thanks of the House. He has brought the question forward in a somewhat different form this year, though covering very much the same ground. I do not wish to say much upon the subject, because, though I am partially responsible for the administration of certain legislation regarding public health, I have not the advantage possessed by my hon. friend of being a physician, and so I would rather touch on one or two points raised by the resolution itself than attempt to deal with the address in which he presented it. The question has been raised by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) as to whether there was in this resolution any intention to interfere with the control of health matters by the provinces. As is well known, the question of jurisdiction is a little involved in this, as in some other matters. Take education, for instance. It is clearly laid down by the British North America Act that the Federal Government has absolutely nothing to do with education, which is left entirely to the jurisdiction of the province. In other subjects, such as agriculture, the provinces and the Dominion have concurrent jurisdiction, the only stipulation being that where provincial legislation is repugnant to that passed by the Dominion Parliament the Dominion legislation governs. But when we come to legislation on health, as I understand the Constitution, it is specifically provided that the provinces have a limited jurisdiction, they being confined wholly to control of hospitals and eleemosynary institutions. It is left to be inferred that the Federal power can deal with all other health matters. At the same time, we know that by custom there has grown up in Canada a practice by which the provincial governments carry on the major part of the work in connection with public health, while at the same time the Dominion Government has taken some things in connection with health under its entire jurisdiction. Let me refer, first, to my own department. To that department has been assigned the duty of guarding the health of the people from all contagious diseases of a grave character brought here by immigrants from other lands. We have quarantine stations, as is well known, in Quebec, Halifax, British Columbia, and elsewhere. Again, the Dominion Government has always had entire control over everything concerning leprosy, and we are carrying on this work at a station in New Brunswick and at another and smaller one in British Columbia. These matters the provinces have not touched at all. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) has referred to the work of the Immigration Branch of the Department of the Interior, and he has suggested that in many respects it might be made stronger and more efficient than at present. Of course, the hon. gentleman will admit that a great deal of excellent work has been done, though, of course, it is true that the efficiency of the department might be strengthened. The Immigration Branch of the Department of the Interior looks after minor diseases, such as some of those to which the hon. member referred, and its officers are supposed to prevent the entry into Canada of those whose mental or physical health makes them undesirable immigrants. The Department of the Interior also has entire charge of the health of Indians, and it appoints doctors to carry out its obligations in that respect. The Marine and Fisheries Department exercises more or less control in connection with the health of sailors and, I think, one or two other matters.

But I would point out that no specific authority has been assigned to the provinces with regard to health matters. By long custom a practice has grown up, and it has been embodied in legislation, under which the provinces exercise control over public health and under which they have empowered municipalities to deal with those matters to a considerable extent. So, legislative and administrative work in connection with health is very wide and is largely out of the control of the Dominion Government. In the United States also, the division of jurisdiction has been somewhat vague. My hon. friend (Mr. Steele) is better informed on the subject than I, but as I understand it the question of quarantine in the United States was for many years little dealt with, if at all, by the Federal Government. In Boston, and I think also in New York, quarantine has been carried on by the municipal authorities, and in other cases by state authorities, and it is only within the last two or three years that the Federal Government has taken the whole control. In the United States they have not a department of Public Health, but they have what is called a Public Health Service which is under the jurisdiction of or is practically a bureau of the Department of the Treasury.

I quite agree with my hon. friend in saying that if the change he proposes were brought about it would not necessarily involve direct interference with the work of the provinces so as to invite any hostile or critical attitude on their part. Necessarily there would be a very thorough investigation and conference with the provincial authorities in order to co-ordinate the work and avoid duplication as far as possible. The effort would be more in the way of co-operation and co-ordination than in the way of an attempt to take from any other body that which it might think it ought to control. I do not anticipate any great difficulty in arranging these matters when they come to be dealt with. I think my hon. friend is on sound ground when he emphasizes, among other things, the tremendous necessity in this country, as in other countries, of dealing more with prevention rather than neglecting it, and then spending great energy and large sums of money in efforts to cure disease after it has declared itself. We should go to the root of the matter and try to establish such conditions that diseases of the lamentable kind that exist here and elsewhere may not get a footing through lack of energy in improving conditions. I was particularly impressed with what the hon. member said with regard to the feeble-minded and the regrettable state of things in this country, as well as in most countries, in this respect. I am quite sure that united and energetic action in dealing with the situation would result in incalculable good to the people. I am also thoroughly in accord with him when he states that the proper direction of the energies of governmental authorities and individuals to this health question is a matter of enormous importance not only from the point of view of the abolition of poverty and crime, which necessarily must follow widespread conditions of disease, but also from the consideration of its direct effect on the economic efficiency of our nation. I am perfectly convinced that a vast amount of waste and inefficiency which are to be found in our own country, as in other countries, is due to the neglect by the state of some of the matters that have been referred to by my hon. friend. If I understood my hon. friend aright, he seemed to take the ground—perhaps I misunderstood him—that we had not made any progress, that we were at a standstill, which was a matter of regret. I presume he meant that in so far as federal control of health matters goes we had not advanced our position very much. He would not, I am sure, mean to convey to this House the idea that in Canada there has been no progress made with regard to general health matters, because there has been a lot of earnest attention paid to the subject by municipalities, by provincial authorities, and, to some extent, by the Dominion authorities. I think it will not be disputed that some real progress has been made.

The resolution which my hon. friend has brought before the House is of a little more comprehensive character than was the resolution introduced last year, because in its concluding sentence it calls for the supervision by this department of public health of all matters relating to the physical welfare of the community. I think I understood him in his opening remarks to say that he did not intend it in that way, because I do not imagine for a moment that the resolution was intended to imply an absolute control by the federal department over all health matters. At the same time, taking the resolution as it is worded, it would be questionable whether this Government could even under any conditions attempt the absolute supervision over all questions of that kind because it might somewhat interfere with the rights of the provinces.

It has been suggested that there is a danger in creating a department of public health because it would tend towards the establishment of a close medical organization, of one particular system of medical education, and of certain schools of thought in medical matters which would interfere with the freedom of those who do not perhaps hold the same views. I do not think, as far as I was able to gather, that my hon. friend had anything of that sort in his mind; nor if a department of public health were established do I imagine that any such tyranny—that is the word that has been used by the hypercritics—would follow. I gather that what my hon. friend aims at is the co-ordinating of the activities in the country in regard to health matters in such a way that there would be greater unity of action and purpose and that the Dominion might give more energy and devote more attention to such matters as medical research and all questions affecting not only natural health but health as it relates to international matters, and also that it would prosecute somewhat more vigorously that very important phase of the question regarding sanitation as applied to health matters. In these objects, the House, I am sure, and certainly the Government, cannot but sympathize. Last year when my hon. friend brought this resolution to the attention of the House, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), in my absence through illness, spoke on the resolution and pointed out that it had already had the consideration of the Government, but that there were so many problems and so much pressing work engaging the time and attention of the ministers, that a matter of this sort, which although it might seem simple, required the most careful consideration and which must be the subject of conferences with the provincial authorities before it was put into effect, would have to be left for a later time. Reasons of that kind which were advanced last year, I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate, are equally strong now when the war is in a more acute and terrible phase than it was before, and when the pressure on ministers and departments is certainly not less but, if anything, a great deal more. I am not prepared to dispute the soundness of the position which my hon. friend has taken up. I personally sympathise with what he is aiming at. While I do not think it is desirable or possible to go into a matter of this kind satisfactorily at the present time, I am frank enough to say that I have such sympathy with it that I believe the time is not far distant when it will have to be taken up and dealt with and when it is it will be a step in the right direction. Further than that I do not wish to detain the House except to say that my hon. friend deserves the thanks of the House for bringing this subject to its attention, and after all it is of a great deal more importance than many of the subjects which we consume time in debating.

Mr. F. L. SCHAFFNER (Souris): I think this House is indebted to the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Steele) for presenting to it a question of such great importance. I doubt very much if any hon. gentleman could present this resolution more ably than has my hon. friend. It is a question that needs a great deal more consideration, and with your permission, Sir, I wish to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

UNCLAIMED BANK BALANCES.

PROPOSAL TO DEVOTE THEM TO PATRIOTIC FUND.

Mr. D. C. ROSS (West Middlesex) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is advisable that unclaimed balances at present in the Chartered Banks of Canada should be transferred to the Treasurer of the Patriotic Fund to be used for the usual patriotic purposes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting this resolution to the consideration of the House it is not my intention to go into any long argument in regard to the matter. I think the facts are pretty clear and I would just make a few observations in regard to what I am asking for in this resolution. In the first place I wish to be entirely frank with the House and to say that after considerable research I have been unable to find any precedent for what I am asking in the resolution. In going through the law of the United States I find no enactment on unclaimed balances. I find that in the states of Connecticut, Idaho, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Mexico, and New York there are enactments on the statute books which provide for unclaimed balances inasmuch as advertisement is required of the names of those who are entitled to the money where money is concerned but there is no final disposition of the money.

The law in all these states simply provides that the Government shall, in a public way, make these deposits known by advertisements published in the papers in metropolitan centres, or in Government blue-books, or in reports submitted to the Legislature after deposits have been in the banks for a certain length of time and no transaction has taken place in regard to them. I find that under the law of France no final disposition is made of unclaimed balances. In Great Britain, no ultimate disposition is made of these balances, although the matter has been brought up several times. The only precedent I am able to cite in regard to these balances is the law of the Commonwealth of Australia. According to the law of Australia of 1911 there is this statutory provision.

(1) All moneys to the credit of a depositor's savings bank account (not being a deposit on behalf of a minor) which has not been operated upon, either by addition or withdrawal, for a period of seven years and upwards, shall be carried to an account to be called the depositors' unclaimed fund, and shall cease to bear interest.

(2) The Governor may, on proof to his satisfaction that any person is entitled to any money which has been carried to the credit of the depositors' unclaimed fund, direct payment thereof to him, and his receipt shall be a good discharge to the bank.

(3) A list of the amounts carried to the depositors' unclaimed fund and not claimed shall be published annually in the Gazette.

(4) All moneys in respect of which a claim is not established within ten years after having been included in any published list shall cease to be claimable, and shall become the absolute property of the bank, but the Governor may, with the consent of the treasurer, allow any claim after that period has expired, if he is satisfied that special reasons exist for the allowance of the claim.

This is the only provision I have been able to find which ultimately disposes of unclaimed balances, and according to the law of Australia as I have read it here an unclaimed balance at a certain stage becomes the absolute property of the bank.

For my own part I could not go that far. My resolution does not go that far. I would not wish in any case to go to that length because I think the bank has no title to this money, particularly in this country where the chartered banks enjoy greater privileges and pay less for them than in any other country. However, I am not making this motion out of anything in the way of ill feeling to the banks, because I have none; I am making it from purely patriotic motives. At this time in the history of this Empire we are not following precedents. I cannot say that we are really making precedents, because the times are too exceptional. But, I think that on both sides of the House we are trying to legislate according to the special circumstances that we find surrounding us, in the best interests of the country and of the Empire; and I think this resolution, if adopted by the Government, will help in that great purpose for which we are all striving at the present time; will aid in the alleviation of the sufferings of our soldiers, and will help ultimately to win the war.

Most hon. gentlemen, I think, are acquainted with the existing law in Canada. It is contained in sections 114 and 115 of the Banking Act of 1913. I shall not read the sections, but, briefly, they provide that after a period of five years has elapsed and no transaction has taken place or no interest has been paid on a balance in the bank, a report is made of that balance to the Government and that balance is published in the official reports of this Government. That balance is not taken by the Government except in one case: If a bank goes into liquidation or becomes insolvent and there is money in the hands of the liquidator which is unclaimed, either dividends or deposits, that is paid to the Finance Minister and remains the property of the Government until some claim is made for it, and if a claim is established the amount is paid to the person establishing such claim. Apart from that, there is no payment of unclaimed balances in the way of dividends or drafts that have not been cashed, or certified cheques unpaid. By the law of 1913 a further amendment was made which renders it impossible for me to say exactly that the returns which we have furnished to us at the present time exactly show the amounts of unclaimed balances, because by that amendment it is stated that any sum under five dollars that has been unclaimed for five years will not now be printed in the Government return. So that I cannot say that the figures I give and that I find in the reports of the Government are absolutely correct. I am not going into the old law in regard to unclaimed balances. As far as the Parliament of Canada is concerned, the law as it at present stands is practically the same as when it was first introduced in 1890. But I am going to deal with it just as it stands at the present time.

There has been one precedent in this House which would jusify this resolution. When the Banking Act was being considered in 1913 by a special committee appointed for that purpose, the hon. member for South Ontario introduced an amendment providing that all unclaimed balances would be turned over to the Finance Minister. That motion was put in the committee and it was defeated by a vote of fifteen to ten; so that I have this justification in the records of this House, that on that committee of twenty-five members, ten men at that time were in favour of turning the unclaimed balances in the banks over to the Government of this country. That is practically my motion to-day, except that I wish to have the money used for a specific purpose.

There are only three factors in the resolution: In the first place, there is the question of the banks. Probably before I deal with that I should consider the amounts of these balances. According to the latest returns available to me, I find in the statement furnished to this House, of unclaimed balances in chartered banks in 1915, that there were in the banks of this country unclaimed balances of deposits amounting to $916,535.74 and of unpaid certified cheques, drafts or bills of exchange, $171,224, making a total of $1,087,759. I find also, on going back to the records of 1903 and taking the same items, that there were in the chartered banks of this country $517,272, so that in those twelve years these unclaimed balances had increased by $580,000. This question may be considered from three sides, and in the first place, from the standpoint of the banks. Are the banks going to be hurt by the Government implementing this resolution? The money is not theirs. According to these returns they have had the use of $500,000, half a million dollars of the people of Canada, for twelve years, for which they have not paid a cent. They should be very thankful, I think, for that privilege, and they should be willing at this time to give this money for a patriotic purpose. In the second place, the withdrawal of this money will not, because the amount is so infinitesimal, be detrimental to the banks concerned. I find on looking at this return that in 1915 the unclaimed balances—I am considering only deposits now, because the same argument applies to these as applies to other unclaimed balances—in the various banks were, in round figures, as follows: Bank of Montreal, $111,000; Quebec Bank, $15,000; Bank of Nova Scotia, $37,000; Bank of British North America, $73,000; Bank of Toronto, $4,000; Molsons Bank, $17,000; Banque Nationale, $19,000; Merchants Bank of Canada, $37,000; Banque Provinciale du Canada, $7,000; Union Bank of Canada, $89,000; Canadian Bank of Commerce, $103,000; Montreal City and District Savings Bank, $128,000. I shall not read the whole list, but it will be observed that the three largest amounts are $111,000, Bank of Montreal; $103,000, Canadian Bank of Commerce, and $128,000, Montreal City and District Savings Bank. My argument is this: having regard to the large capitalization of these banks and the immense amount of their deposits, the payment by them to the secretary of the Patriotic Fund through the Finance Minister of the small amount of money suggested would not prejudice their business in any way. The deposits in the banks to-day amount to the enormous sum of $1,500,000,000, in round figures, having increased during the last three or four years to the extent of nearly half a billion dollars. At the present time, therefore, through the thrift and industry of the people, the Canadian banks are in a stronger position, so far as deposits are concerned, than they ever have been. Moreover, I do not think they need this money—and this has been shown by recent financial operations. The Minister of Finance, with great foresight and great success, put on the market a patriotic loan only a short time ago. To this loan the banks subscribed an amount in the neighbourhood of $50,000,000—I have not the exact figures, but they are familiar to the minister. This shows that the banks were not very hard up. If they could for patriotic reasons give to the Minister of Finance $50,000,000 on account of that war loan, surely they can allow $1,000,000 to go out of their coffers for the purposes mentioned in this resolution. I say, then, that the banks cannot complain if they be asked to do this. The money is not their own; they do not need it and the amount is so infinitesimal that it cannot possibly injure their financial operations.

If this resolution is accepted, the bill to be founded upon it will contain many details which could not possibly be set forth in the resolution. But if I had stated it to be my object to confiscate these unclaimed balances, what would that mean to the depositors? The amount of unclaimed deposits in the Bank of Montreal is $111,000, and in that amount 1,900 people are interested. Only three people are interested in deposits exceeding $3,000 and only fifteen other than the three are interested in amounts exceeding $1,000. The average deposit of the 1,900 people is $59, but if you subtract the larger deposits of the eighteen people mentioned, the average amount is only $40. The same conditions obtain in the Bank of Commerce; there are only eighteen depositors of unclaimed balances amounting to more than $1,000. So that even if it were my intention to confiscate this money, the amount taken from each depositor would be very small indeed.

In the third place, what are going to be the needs of the Patriotic Fund? No one will take exception to the great work that has been done in connection with the Patriotic Fund; no greater work has been done in any country. If I have the figures correctly, there has been collected through the voluntary offerings of the people of Canada about $21,000,000, for the purpose of assisting the widows and dependents of the soldiers who have gone across the seas to fight the battles of Canada and of the world. I do not think that the people of any country have responded more liberally to these appeals than have the Canadian people. The people of Britain salute them for the generosity with which they have responded to every patriotic appeal that has been made. But there has been this criticism—and I think it is a fair criticism—that the Patriotic Fund has been raised by voluntary subscription and that at each successive appeal the same men have almost invariably subscribed. It has been suggested that when we send our soldiers across the water to fight our battles, the country should take care of their dependents by general taxation—and there seems to be some weight and some justice in that criticism. But there will come a time in the history of this war when we shall have 350,000 or 400,000 men on the other side of the water. When the war is won, the patriotic fervor which moved the people to subscribe to the Patriotic Fund will not be as warm as it formerly was, and the people will not give so freely. There will be a certain amount of stagnation in trade; there will be a period of hard times and the need for some increase in the Patriotic Fund will be greater than it ever was. I submit that this $1,000,000 will be the splendid nucleus of a fund to provide for that day, which will surely come, when the people will not be as able or as willing to respond to appeals made on behalf of the Patriotic Fund as they have been in the past. On that account, if on no other, I think this resolution is justified.

There is just one more consideration, and that is the depositor. I am not asking the Government to take this money from the depositor. I am not asking them to do what has been done in Australia; I do not think that would be just and right. Since my entrance into this House I have been a constant champion of the depositor, and am to-day. I think that the depositor in the Canadian banks does not get his rights and does not get ample protection. He does not get his rights in the matter of security; he does not get a sufficiently high rate of interest. There are many things that could be done for the depositor in the Canadian banks, and which will be done some day, I hope, in the near future. If this resolution is accepted by the Government and this money paid through the Finance Minister to the secretary of the Patriotic Fund, it will be my suggestion to the Minister of Finance that in case valid claims are made in the future upon the Government of Canada and those claims are established by proper evidence, these depositors do not have their money taken from them, but that this rich Dominion is generous and just enough to see that these depositors are paid the money that they have deposited in the banks of this country. That is all I will say in regard to the resolution, and I hope I shall receive a sympathetic and generous response from the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I accept, without reserve, the statement of my hon. friend as to the motives which have actuated him in bringing this resolution to the attention of the House. I think, however, that his patriotic feelings and sympathies have got the better of his judgment, because what he proposes here is really an unwise course, and one calculated, if adopted, to affect our credit as a nation in which property rights are observed. My hon. friend has not carefully drafted his resolution. Just let us see what he asks this House to do. He asks the House to confiscate the unclaimed balances at present in the chartered banks of Canada and transfer them to the treasurer of the Patriotic Fund. My hon. friend does not state in this resolution whether the rights of the depositors against the banks are extinguished or not; he does not state whether the banks are to continue to be liable to the depositors whose deposits are to be transferred to the Canadian Patriotic Fund, or whether the banks are to be indemnified by the Government. I submit, with confidence, that, on these grounds alone, this resolution could not be adopted by this House.

Let us consider what these unclaimed balances are. The chartered banks of Canada receive deposits in the ordinary course of their business. Some of the balances in connection with these deposits remain unclaimed for a certain time and are then designated " unclaimed balances." At least I assume, that is what my hon. friend has in mind, because his resolution is so worded that it would really apply to all balances on deposit to-day with the chartered banks of Canada and unclaimed at this moment; but I assume that what my hon. friend means is unclaimed balances in the technical sense of the word, and I do not desire to take an objection on the score that my hon. friend refers to all balances, because I am aware that he does not. The legal position to-day is that the chartered banks of Canada owe those depositors the several amounts of money—comparatively small in most cases—to which my hon. friend has referred. Those balances are unclaimed, but they are not unclaimable. The bank is responsible to pay those balances when they are asked for by the parties entitled to them. My hon. friend proposes to confiscate the deposits. In one portion of his speech I understood him to say that, as the amounts were small, there was no valid objection to the Government transferring them to the Canadian Patriotic Fund. That would indicate to me that what my hon. friend has in mind is that those depositors would lose their rights against the banks. If they lost their rights against the banks, what you have done is this: You have made each one of those depositors, who may apply for and claim his balance at any time, an involuntary contributor to the Canadian Patriotic Fund. The very essence and genius of the Canadian Patriotic Fund is that it is constituted by voluntary contributions from the people of Canada. Yet my hon. friend proposes—if I understood him aright, and I am sure I did—to make all those depositors who have unclaimed balances in Canadian chartered banks, lose those unclaimed balances to the Canadian Patriotic Fund. I would submit that that is pure confiscation, absolutely unwarranted, and I am quite certain that the Canadian Patriotic Fund would not desire that those depositors should be made, against their will and without their knowledge, to give to the Canadian Patriotic Fund their unclaimed balances, which they may claim and have the right to claim at any time. My hon. friend would have been more fair if he had said that in his view the banks would remain liable to the depositors and, if necessary be indemnified by the Government but it is entirely unnecessary to take that course. If the Canadian Patriotic Fund at any time is in such need that public assistance is required, application will no doubt be made to the Government. It seems to me that it would be very much better that the Government should itself afford assistance, if assistance were indispensably necessary, and if it were no longer possible to maintain this fund by voluntary subscription, rather than that by legislative action of this Parliament we should confiscate moneys which belong to hundreds or thousands of individuals throughout this country and transfer these moneys to the Canadian Patriotic Fund.

It is a fact that those deposits in most cases are not called for and are not likely to be called for; but if any legislation is necessary in connection with this matter, it should not be of the character which my hon. friend has put forward, but upon a revision of the Bank Act—and the matter was under consideration at the last revision—the question might be brought up as to whether the banks should continue beyond a certain time to hold unclaimed balances, as to whether they should not pay the amount into the Consolidated Revenue Fund to be available for the purposes of the Government, on the condition that the Government would indemnify the banks against any claims which might be made by the owners of the balances against the banks. That has been put forward on more than one occasion when the Bank Act has been under consideration, and that question would seem to me to be a proper subject for the consideration of Parliament. I know that opinions differ as to it, and I am not expressing my own view. The course which my hon. friend asks the House to pursue, namely, to confiscate the unclaimed balances of those depositors without providing any means whereby they are to be indemnified—because the resolution does not anywhere refer to indemnification—appears to me to be legislation that would be regarded by the public, certainly by the financial world, as entirely unwarranted. It is therefore clear, at least it is quite clear to me, that the House could not pass the resolution in its present form.

Mr. ROSS: I am quite willing to accept the suggestion the minister made just now. It was my intention to have such a provision inserted.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not made a suggestion. I am pointing out that the resolution in its present form could not be accepted by the House. Let us now consider whether the House should determine to take these balances and transfer them to the Canadian Patriotic Fund, the banks remaining liable without indemnification or with indemnification. I think it would be most unfair to enact legislation under which these balances would be transferred to the Canadian Patriotic Fund or any other fund, the banks remaining liable to the parties to whom they are legally bound to pay these amounts upon demand; that would be manifestly unfair and unjust to the banks. What is the alternative? That we should transfer these unpaid balances to the Canadian Patriotic Fund, and that the Government should indemnify the owners of these unpaid balances, the banks being relieved of their obligations. Now, that to me seems in no wise different from the Government assuming a liability towards the Canadian Patriotic Fund. In case of need, I am sure the Government would assist the Canadian Patriotic Fund, but I do not see the necessity for this roundabout course.

My hon. friend has pointed out that while these unpaid balances amount to a considerable sum in the aggregate, it is only a comparatively small amount so far as each bank is concerned. I agree with my hon. friend in that, but I do submit that the principle of taking these amounts from the banks, who are legally bound to pay them, or from the depositors who have them lawfully on deposit, is unsound and should not be indorsed by this House.

My hon. friend has referred to the position of the Canadian chartered banks, and he is quite correct in saying that they are in a strong position. I do not put forward my argument on the condition of the banks, but on the ground that it is not proper legislation to confiscate money; I think that is the position that any Minister of Finance would be bound to take. My hon. friend has drawn attention to the fact that he has been unable to find any precedent except in the case of Australia, and that does not surprise me, as the course which he suggests is not one that would generally commend itself to legislators, especially under the British system. I did not catch what my hon. friend said in respect to unpaid balances in Australia, but it is my own view—and I am putting it forward only as my own view—that the only suggestion with regard to unpaid balances which would meet with the consideration of a legislative body is not that those balances should be transferred to any one or more funds, no matter how worthy they may be, but if there is to be a transfer it should be to the consolidated fund of the Government, the Government undertaking to indemnify the banks against any liability, and to make good to depositors these unclaimed balances should demand be made for them. Now, in my opinion, the time when a question of that kind should be considered is upon a revision of the Bank Act. I do not wish to be understood as in any way reflecting upon the propriety of my hon. friend bringing this matter up, because I know that he is actuated by the best of motives, but I do submit that even in so worthy a cause it is not wise to take a step which would seem to reflect upon the stability of bank deposits. I may say to my hon. friend that upon one or two occasions in the past when this matter was being discussed in the other House, I received inquiries from depositors, and it has been brought to my attention that a good deal of anxiety was manifested, because the general public do not understand these proposals as we understand them in this House. In addition to the arguments which I have advanced, it is, in my opinion, unwise to unsettle public opinion, especially at a time like this, in regard to so important a matter as deposits in our chartered banks. I am glad this matter has been brought up, because it has given me an opportunity of presenting my views, and, such as they are, I submit them to the consideration of the House.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): It is not very often that the Minister of Finance is so technical as he has been this afternoon on the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Ross). The minister discussed the resolution as though it were a Bill presented to this House, when he must have known it was only a resolution affirming a principle. Why, it is not once in a hundred times that a resolution like this goes into details. The hon. member for Middlesex distinctly stated that he did not ask the House to confiscate this money, because when you confiscate money or property you are taking away something which belongs to other people, and appropriating it for the benefit of the state or some other institution. The hon. member for Middlesex distinctly stated that if this resolution were adopted by the House and a Bill founded upon it there ought to be a provision that if any bona fide claimants came forward and demanded their deposits from the banks the Government should step forward and make good the amount; in other words, the Government should gamble to that extent.

There is about $1,000,000 of unpaid balances in the different chartered banks of this country. I understand that an unclaimed balance must remain five years on the books of a bank before it is transferred to the "unclaimed balances" column. We know that the banks keep a record of interest bearing deposits, and another list of non-interest bearing deposits; the banks, recognizing the fact that some people do not claim their deposits, either through death or going away, and sometimes because the deposit is only a small amount, have made a practice of transferring unpaid balances after a period of five years, and there is now about $1,000,000 of these balances in our banks. My hon. friend from Middlesex now raises the question whether this amount should be considered as the property of the banks, or whether in these times of stress it should not be handed over to the Canadian Patriotic Fund. That is what my hon. friend asks for; he is not asking for anybody's property to be confiscated, because he expressly suggested that if any claimant came forward afterwards and established his claim the Government should make good the amount.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance seemed to have great objections to confiscating property. But there have been many instances in the last two or three years where my hon. friend did not hesitate to confiscate other people's property. Only two or three months ago the Government confiscated the Ross rifle factory at Quebec without giving the owner five minutes' notice. They wanted the factory, and simply went in and took it. Nobody is finding much fault with them for that; they were only doing what they had a perfect right to do, but it was confiscating the property, nevertheless.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Why does the hon. gentleman say that we confiscated the Ross rifle factory? I understand that we expropriated it.

Mr. CARVELL: We will discuss that at a later stage. I happened to be in Quebec as visitor when the event took place, and, perhaps, I know a little more about it than other hon. gentlemen in the House. However, we shall have an opportunity of discussing that at a later date. The Minister of Finance thinks that the transfer of these balances to the Patriotic Fund would be a forced contribution, whereas, he said, contributions to the Patriotic Fund were entirely voluntary. In many parts of Canada to-day that is not the case. When the Patriotic Fund was organized, it was on a voluntary basis but in many municipalities it was soon found that one class of the public were contributing largely and another class contributing nothing. In New Brunswick, and also, I think, in many other parts of Canada, the method has been adopted of assessing for the Patriotic Fund. And in New Brunswick in this way we have raised half a million dollars. We go beyond the ordinary assessment. An unfortunate policy has crept into our municipal affairs in New Brunswick, and I presume in many other parts of Canada, of exempting certain properties from taxation. But so far as the Patriotic Fund is concerned these institutions and corporations are assessed. I cannot see any force in the objection raised by the minister because of the phraseology of the resolution. If this Parliament wishes to adopt the policy of taking these unclaimed balances out of the hands of the bank and giving them to the Patriotic Fund, the only question, it seems to me, is whether Parliament is willing to assume the responsibility of making good these balances to the extent that they may be afterwards properly claimed by the proper persons. I should like to see the money handed to the Patriotic Fund rather than left in the hands of the banks. Nearly ninety per cent of the amounts will inevitably remain unclaimed, and so the liability which the country would assume would be very light. I have no quarrel with the chartered banks; they are doing a good work and are in splendid financial condition. But I am sure the shareholders of these banks do not need this million dollars to help them to pay dividends, and I do not think it will be any harm to pay the money over to the Patriotic Fund, the country undertaking to refund any sums that may be claimed by bona fide owners. I am strongly in favour of the principle of the resolution and intend to vote for it.

Sir HERBERT AMES (Montreal, St. Antoine): I have no hesitation whatever in giving to the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) the fullest possible credit for bringing in this resolution, for Middlesex is a county that has been from the beginning of the war one of the most patriotic and generous in its gifts to the Patriotic Fund. At one time Middlesex led all the other counties of Ontario in the size of its contributions to the fund. So I know that this resolution arises from the best motives and is presented to the House with the highest purpose. But it has been the glory of the Patriotic Fund from the beginning that it represented the giving of those who could not fight, and the slogan of the Patriotic Fund throughout Canada has been: "Fight or pay." The man who shoulders his rifle and goes to the firing line is released from financial payment to the Fund, and rightly so; but the man who remains and goes on with his work as usual, who enjoys the privilege of staying at home, is asked to make sacrifices which, while they may not be commensurate, will represent something similar to those made by the man who is giving his body and his life for our defence. To many people this is the only outlet they have. The man who is over age, the man who is tied up by business, the man whose home ties are such that he cannot leave, naturally welcomes the opportunity for self-sacrifice, and the Patriotic Fund has been welcomed by thousands and tens of thousands of our people because by contributing to it they are able to feel that they too are fighting the Huns. So, almost universally, the contributions have been voluntary. In the first year of the war eighty-five per cent of the contributions were not only voluntary but, so far as we were concerned, unsolicited. But it became necessary as the burden increased to distribute it. We found that the rural parts of the country were not giving as much as the cities. By experiment we found that the people there were as ready and as willing to give as were the urban dwellers, but the difficulty lay, we were told, in making collections. When you have a scattered rural community, to secure a committee and have it solicit and collect contributions is a physical impossibility. Consequently, from the farmers came the request that they might use the machinery they had, the machinery of the county and township councils, through which the money might be raised in rural districts It was found that, generally speaking, the farm a man occupies represents his power of earning, and so his relative power of giving. So we established the rule that where a municipal council unanimously made a grant, to be assessed upon the taxpayers, we would accept that. If there was a division of opinion, some members of the council wishing to give a larger amount and some a smaller amount, we said: Give us the smaller amount, but make it unanimous, because we wish to maintain the principle of voluntary giving So, while, to a certain extent the principle of taxation to help the Patriotic Fund has been introduced, it has been mainly as a matter of financing to facilitate the collection of moneys that people were glad to give. I think there are few instances on record in which money has been given to the Patriotic Fund through taxation in which the giving has not been by unanimous vote of the legislative body that had the right to give it. We have found, that, where grants were made by municipal councils with a certain timidity in the early part of the war, when we have gone back they have almost invariably increased the grants, showing, that they had taken the matter up with their constituents, and had found that more generous giving would meet with approval. So, I think that, from our Patriotic Fund point of view, there would be a certain taint if money were taken, you may say by force, from a class of people already generously doing their share. The bankers have been very generous in support of the Patriotic Fund. At the outset the Bank of Montreal gave $100,000 payable in two equal annual instalments. Another great bank has been equally generous. From the rapid calculation I have made since this discussion began, I think I am safe in saying that the bankers have given annually $350,000 to the Patriotic Fund, and that if the war lasts three or four years they will have given voluntarily the full million dollars represented by these unclaimed balances. So, speaking for the Patriotic Fund, while we have the highest appreciation of the act of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) and know it comes from the generous impulse of himself and those whom he represents, a generosity which they have again and again shown by their sympathetic attitude towards the Patriotic Fund, I do not think the motion should be passed if it has in view that the Patriotic Fund is to be the destination of the money. It is an evidence of the generosity of the people of Canada that though the Patriotic Fund is being drawn on for nearly a million dollars a month, and though we are taking care of between 50,000 and 60,000 families, so far each month has shown an amount coming in as large as that going out, and a little larger. The pledges given for 1917, all of which will be available, I am confident—because the amount of uncollectable pledges in the Patriotic Fund has been remarkably small—are large enough to carry the fund through the present year. We hope to maintain, if we can, the feeling that the Patriotic Fund is money coming from the heart, money that expresses a sincere desire to make sacrifices, money given by people who want to do their bit; and we would like to have the Fund as free as possible from any feeling that it is made up of moneys taken by compulsion.

Mr. CARVELL: Does the hon. gentleman include the half million dollars which is being raised by the province of New Brunswick by direct taxation as being tainted by not being voluntary? I would like an answer to that question because I think it is very important.

Sir HERBERT AMES: I may say that we regard the money that New Brunswick is paying as being practically a voluntary contribution because it was voted by the Legislature of New Brunswick unanimously if I remember rightly; because it was taken up by both parties and because, although the Government of New Brunswick has changed and although a different party is in power to-day, they are paying the money just the same as they did before and there is not the slightest question of repudiation. I think it would be doing an injustice to the people of New Brunswick as a whole to say that money was being taken from them to aid the Patriotic Fund, that they would not have given voluntarily, if that method had been adopted instead.

Mr. CARVELL: Are you willing to accept it?

Sir HERBERT AMES: Under these circumstances, yes.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker I am greatly in favour of this resolution. I am not alarmed about the view that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) takes that this is in the nature of a confiscation. The banks accept as a right what is given to them by the Parliament of Canada; they have a right to use these funds through the Bank Act. That right was given to them by this Parliament and I maintain that we have a right to say later whether such funds can be taken away from them and used for some other purpose.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not question the right of Parliament.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I believe the money is, or will be, needed for the Patriotic Fund. I have been active on behalf of the Patriotic Fund from the first, and I have found that the people who are giving year after year are the same people. If an increased allotment is made to a district these same people are giving an increased amount each year. We find hundreds and hundreds of shirkers throughout the whole of Canada, not only in my own province, but everywhere, men of wealth, who are not giving a cent to the Patriotic Fund, the Red Cross, or any other organization. We have reached a stage where I believe we will have to resort to some other means, if the war continues, to raise a patriotic fund. I would like to see some means of reaching the people who are shirking. It is all right to get at the wealth of the country by the method of taxation adopted by the Minister of Finance but there are lots of people we are not getting at in that way who are making money out of the war and who are not contributing anything. As to the banks being generous, the banks have lots of money at the present time, any amount of it and they have a perfect right to be generous. They have great powers and great privileges given to them by this Parliament and they should give generously; more so perhaps than any other institution in the country. In my judgment, the banks have no right to these unclaimed balances. They would not suffer if they lost them. The president of the Patriotic Fund does not seem to think that the fund is in need of the money but there are other patriotic causes that are in need of money, such as the Belgian Relief Fund, and if the Patriotic Fund does not want it why not offer it to the Belgian Relief Fund? These organizations are in need, the banks are not in need and if we decide to take this money away from them we have a perfect right to do so. I sometimes think that in this country we do not realize that we are participating in a world war and that we can establish precedents and can do things that were never heard of before. I presume it is possible under the War Measures Act to do a great many things that were never done before. It would be possible to take fifty per cent of the wealth of Canada if we wanted to use it to help the country at this time. There is nothing unusual in demanding at this particular time that this money should be used by the country for patriotic purposes and to help in carrying on the war. I am in hearty sympathy with the resolution moved by my hon. friend from Middlesex.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I do not see how it would be possible for this House to accept the resolution as it is worded without doing a very great injustice to many people. The resolution asks the House to agree to turn over any unclaimed balances at present in the chartered banks to the Patriotic Fund. All that hon. gentlemen have said in regard to the worthiness of the Patriotic Fund I heartily endorse but it does seem to me to be a very drastic proposal that we should take any unclaimed balances, no matter how long they had remained in the bank unclaimed, and turn these balances over to the Patriotic Fund. That, I believe to be a too drastic measure. But I do entirely agree with some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Buchanan). I do not see why the banks should have this money. It seems to me that we should decide on a certain length of time that these unclaimed balances would remain in the banks and that on the expiry of that time these unclaimed balances would revert to the Dominion of Canada to be applied to the consolidated fund, the Government of Canada guaranteeing to indemnify the banks against any claims which subsequently might be put up. Why should this money stay in the banks, and why should they have the use of it for ten, twenty or fifty years? It is not theirs any more than it is ours. It is not theirs as much as it is ours; I mean the people of Canada. I can see no reason why that money should remain there, and I repeat that these balances should be taken charge of by the Dominion Government, the Government guaranteeing the banks that they would indemnify them should any persons, in the years to come, make good their claims to these balances, and that under these circumstances they would hand the money back to the banks. But to leave them in the banks for an indefinite period I think is decidedly unfair, and I see no reason why it should be done.

Mr. S. F. GLASS (East Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with the views expressed by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). They are exactly in line with the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). As representing one part of the county of Middlesex, I appreciate the tribute which has been paid by my hon. friend from Montreal (Sir Herbert Ames) to the patriotism of the people of that county. Referring to the matter of making a distinction between funds voluntarily subcribed and those produced by taxation for the patriotic fund, I think that our experience amongst our rural municipalities has been very similar to that in the province of New Brunswick as referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Carvell). It is not convenient or easy to collect these amounts by subscription in the rural districts, and therefore the rural districts have resorted to a method of taxation. It is not money taken from the people unwillingly, because the people are glad to have an opportunity by this method of equitably and patriotically contributing to this fund. Referring to the use of moneys left in chartered banks, it seems manifestly unfair that the banks should be allowed the use of this money for an indefinite period simply because the money has not been claimed.

I do not know whether I fully understand the Banking Act, but from the remarks made to-day I take it to mean that when a bank balance becomes an unclaimed balance, that is after it has been on deposit without claim for five years, it ceases to bear interest. If that be so, it is manifestly unjust that the banks should be allowed to continue the use of this money. The proposal made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and the suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) along the same lines would seem to overcome that unfairness of the banks taking interest which properly belonged to depositors; and if the money were transferred in that way to the consolidated fund of Canada and the Government thus guaranteed depositors who in the future would present claims, the Government would have the use of the money. In the larger number of cases, in reference to the great proportion of this fund, no doubt claims will never be made. But at the same time, if they ever should be made, the money turned over to the consolidated fund of Canada would be ample security for all depositors, so that no matter what turned up in the future the depositor who had in good faith left his money in the care and protection of a bank would have security for the amount, whatever it might be, even with accumulated interest.

Mr. ROSS: I must thank the hon. member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) for, I will not say his flattering reference, as it is only the truth, to the contributions made by my county to the patriotic fund. Those conributions have been most generous, and they will continue to be so. I do not think the Minister of Finance has really been quite fair in his argument here to-day. His whole argument from beginning to end and repeated time and time again, was that I was advocating confiscation which, of course, I am not. No one in this House knows better than the Minister of Finance that it is impossible, or almost impossible, and that it is not the practice, to include in any resolution all the details of any measure. I have not done so in this resolution, but I have tried to point out as clearly as I could that my intention was that this money should be paid to the Patriotic Fund through the Minister of Finance, and that the Government in the end would become responsible for any claims made by depositors. As several hon. gentlemen have said, and as I believe, the claims that will be made to the Government in regard to these unclaimed balances will practically be nil, they will not be one per cent. So that the burden that would be taken on itself by the Government would practically amount to nothing. The Minister of Finance dwelt upon there being no precedent. I frankly admitted that there was no precedent apart from the precedent in Australia, where they not only went further than I ever dreamed of going, because in the legislation in Australia, they did actually confiscate the unclaimed balances and said they would be the property of the bank. Reference has been made by the hon. member for St. Antoine division (Sir Herbert Ames) and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) to the generosity of the banks. I admit that the banks have been, I shall not say generous, but probably fair. And why should they not be? Every member of this House knows that the banks of this country enjoy privileges which are enjoyed by the banks in no other country in the world. As pointed out by the member for South Ontario, in the committee that revised the Bank Act in 1913, the banks of the United States pay into the treasury of that country $3,700,000 for the privilege of issuing circulation, whereas the banks of this country do not pay one cent for that great privilege. So I think the chartered banks of Canada could well afford to be not only fair, but very generous and even over generous in their givings to the patriotic funds.

There is another thing that probably the Finance Minister did not catch in my remarks and what was said by the hon. member for St. Antoine division bears out my idea. The hon. member for St. Antoine said that so far as the patriotic fund was concerned they had sufficient to run them through 1917.

Sir HERBERT AMES: With what is pledged.

Mr. ROSS: And I believe it will be paid. But this demand for patriotic money is not going to end in 1917. No one in this House knows that better than the hon. member for St. Antoine Division. I have heard it alleged in this House that there will be two years after the war before the troops will come back to Canada. Their dependents will have to be taken care of during that time as fully and generously as in the past, and I repeat that I do not think the people will be as much up on the bit to contribute to the Patriotic Fund when the war is over as they are at present. That is all the more reason why this resolution, modified as has been suggested by the Minister of Finance, should be passed. I cannot see any chance of the credit of this country being injured by the payment by the banks to the consolidated revenue fund of the small sum of $1,000,000. I do not think that the financiers of the world are ignorant enough of the stability and strength of our banks to be influenced by the passing of this resolution or of legislation founded upon it. Our banks are in too strong a position at the present time for that. And, moreover, I am not setting up this resolution as a precedent to be followed in the future. As the Finance Minister stated in this house on another occasion, this war made a revolution of everything, the world is upside down, and things that might not be done in times of peace are justifiable in times of war. I think in all fairness that this is one of the things that should be done during these times.

Resolution negatived on division.

REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION PRESENTED.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): I have an important report which I overlooked to lay upon the Table at three o'clock and which, with the consent of the House—and I have consulted my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—I desire now to lay on the Table. It is a report of the Royal Commission appointed to investigate the transportation and railway problems of Canada. I hope I may have the consent of the House to lay this report upon the Table.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order to bring in this report at this stage, but with the unanimous consent of the House I think there would be no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM: All right. May I ask if this report will be printed forthwith?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will be good enough to consent, I shall be pleased to move, with your consent, Mr. Speaker:—

That the report of the Royal Commission appointed to consider the general problem of transportation in Canada, now laid upon the Table, be printed forthwith, and that Rule 74 be suspended for that purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is my duty to point out that this motion can be passed only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Motion agreed to.

SUBSTITUTE FOR THE ROSS RIFLE.

On the motion of Hon. CHARLES MURPHY:—

That, having regard to the fact that the failure of the Ross Rifle as an active service weapon was known to the Government in the early stages of the war, and that notwithstanding such knowledge the Government has continued to equip Canadian soldiers with the said rifle, this House is of opinion that the Government is deserving of censure for its conduct in the premises as well as for its prolonged delay in providing an efficient substitute for the Ross rifle.

Mr. MURPHY: I desire to state, for the information of the House, that I have arranged with the Acting Prime Minister that this motion stand until after the return of the Prime Minister.

Motion stands.

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT IN RUSSIA.

On the motion of Mr. ROBERT BICKERDIKE:—

That, in the opinion of this House, this Parliament having learned with pleasure the fact that the Russian Government had abolished capital punishment, the following official message be sent to the Prime Minister of Russia, at Petrograd, tendering our hearty congratulations both as to the abolishing of capital punishment and their determination to free Russia from all German influences.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Clerk of the House draws my attention to the fact that in his judgment this resolution is not one which can properly be submitted to the House. In view of his having brought the matter to my attention, I deem it of sufficient importance to ask that the motion stand so that I may look carefully into the authorities with a view of making sure of my ground. In the meantime, therefore, I would ask that the motion stand.

Motion stands.

PROPOSED ENLISTMENT OF PRISONERS.

Mr. ROBERT BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St. Lawrence) moved:—

That, in the opinion of this House, and with a view to increasing the volunteer service and the prosecution of the war, the Government should permit all prisoners in the jails, prisons and penitentiaries in the Dominion of Canada to enlist for active overseas service, thus enabling them to wipe out the stain of imprisonment and to fill up the depleted ranks of our boys in the trenches.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that we have a great many prisoners in the penitentiaries, jails and prisons of Canada who should be given an opportunity to wipe out the stain of the disgrace of their being prisoners. It is a well known fact that voluntary recruiting for overseas service is pretty well exhausted, and that it is to-day costing Canada $2,000 for each man who volunteers for overseas service. I find no fault with that; I think the men are worth the money. I do feel, however, that these prisoners, instead of being shut up in iron cages or kept at breaking limestone day in and day out should be given the opportunity to volunteer for service at the front. Some one has said: what would we do if these men deserted and ran away into the German lines? Well, I do not know that we would suffer very much in losing that kind of men.

I know of no other place in the world that has not instituted some prison reform different from what we have in Canada. The Government deals with this matter in a blundering, unscientific way, the basis of which is the stupid and savage idea of revenge—the idea that crime is to be restrained, if not prevented, by examples of punishment. Those who have made this problem a study very generally agree that punishment not only does not prevent or lessen crime, but tends, rather, to propagate it. This is so well understood to-day that the death penalty is no longer made a public exhibition because of its demoralizing effects. The harsh, cruel and revengeful manner with which our prisoners are treated will never in a slightest degree tend to reform them.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I regret that I heard only a small portion of the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bickerdike) in support of his motion. I notice that his proposal is:

> That, in the opinion of this House, and with a view to increasing the volunteer service and the prosecution of the war, the Government should permit all prisoners in the jails, prisons and penitentiaries in the Dominion of Canada to enlist for active overseas service, thus enabling them to wipe out the stain of imprisonment and to fill up the depleted ranks of our boys in the trenches.

I confess that on a reading of the motion it seems hardly necessary that I should go into any very elaborate explanations of the reasons why I feel that the House should not accept it. So far in this war we have proceeded—we are proceeding, and we have it in contemplation to proceed—to recruit our ranks by a voluntary system. The hon. gentleman himself recognizes this, because the purpose of his motion is to increase the voluntary service by a system of voluntary enlistment. In response to the appeals made, the very flower of the youth of Canada have flocked to our banners and filled our regiments. The proposal of the hon. gentleman is that the Government of Canada should proceed indiscriminately to empty the penitentaries and the prisons of Canada to turn the present inmates of those institutions into the ranks of our regiments. From the point of view of the soldier who has responded to the call of his country, and in the interest of those of our young men who have so readily and so willingly made the great sacrifice imposed upon them, I cannot recognize that it would be desirable that we should proceed to call upon our young men to receive into their ranks, as their daily associates, all of the occupants of our penitentiaries and prisons without distinction and without discrimination. It must strike everybody at first glance that there are certain classes of criminals who undoubtedly would exercise a corrupting influence among those surrounding them. I do not purpose going into details as to the nature of the offences to which I am now referring, but we all know that there are amongst the occupants of the penitentiaries and prisons, men who are there for offences which indicate the most degraded character, and still the hon. gentleman would include them with all the others and ask us to open the doors of the jails and the penitentiaries in order that those men might be let loose to associate, on a footing of equality, with the young men of the class to which I have already referred. So far as that class of prisoners is concerned, it seems to me that the proposition is manifestly unacceptable, and clearly calls for no answer other than a negative one.

In addition to that, there is the fact that crime in varying degrees calls for punishment, and I for one cannot agree to treat the enlistment in our army and the taking part in the defence of our country and of the great cause for which our boys are fighting, as a method of punishment to be handed out to criminals. For that reason again, I think the motion of the hon. gentleman is most highly objectionable and one that it is impossible to entertain. I do not desire to suggest that amongst all the inmates of the penitentiaries or the prisons there may not be individuals who might possibly be released for the purpose of allowing them to enlist, but what is proposed here is a general jail and penitentiary delivery absolutely without discrimination. That, I for one will not consent to. There have been instances in which the exercise of clemency with a view to enlistment has been recommended, and where that recommendation has been acted upon. There will, no doubt, in the future be similar instances and wherever the circumstances of a case, in the judgment of those charged with advising the Crown with regard to the release of prisoners and with regard to the exercise of clemency, justify such a course, we shall be glad in the future, as we have been in the past, to consider as a factor in ordering the release of a prisoner the readiness and the willingness of the individual asking for it, to redeem himself by offering his services to his country. Further than that, I feel convinced that we would not be justified in going. I feel absolutely convinced that the public opinion of the country would not uphold an action such as the hon. gentleman asks for; I feel the public would not uphold it in the interest of our soldiers themselves; or in the interest of the self respect of Canada and of Canadians. As I said, I have not had the advantage of hearing all that the hon. gentleman said in support of his motion. All that I did hear was a very general and very vigorous affirmation that our method of treating criminals was cruel—I have forgotten what the other adjectives applied to it were, but they were adjectives of a similar kind. Of course, if the hon. gentleman considers confinement in a penitentiary a degree of punishment that amounts to cruelty, I must, on behalf of our system, plead guilty to the imputation of cruelty. If, however, the hon. gentleman means to say that there is in the administration of any of those institutions any undue infliction of cruelty, I venture to suggest that he should be ready with evidence to establish an accusation of that kind before he comes to throw it into this House and to cast it out to the public as an imputation upon all of the officers charged with the care, the supervision and the control of our punitive institutions. If the general statement is intended as any charge or accusation against those officers, I am in no position to meet any such vague assertion as that; but I may assure the hon. gentleman that those of us who are charged with the supervision of those institutions, in so far as they are under the control of this Government, are certainly not aware of any such state of affairs, and that we are careful in our endeavours to keep ourselves informed as to what goes on in those institutions.

I do not think, as I said at the outset, that it is necessary for me to proceed, at any length or with any greater elaboration, to offer reasons why this motion should not be accepted. I think I may safely leave it in the judgment of this House, with the assurance that the House will be prepared to act upon the request which I make to it to reject the motion at the present time.

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, whilst I would agree in the main with everything he said, were perhaps more sweeping than they ought to be. I may say to my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) that it would seem to me that his motion is certainly broader than he should have made it. There is a certain class of criminals who cannot be allowed to enlist and to be brought into the company of men of the character of those who have enlisted already and who are doing such splendid work; but my hon. friend (Mr. Doherty) will agree with me, I am sure, that there are, not in the penitentiaries but in the jails, many men, young men especially, who have been guilty more of indiscretions than of real offences, and that to those men the option might well be given of enlisting. Of course, they cannot be compelled and they should not be compelled to enlist, and I agree with what has been said by my hon. friend on that point. As to those who are confined in our penitentiaries, I am not sure but a similar discrimination might be made on behalf of a good many of them. My hon. friend said a moment ago that their crime must be punished, and I agree with him on that point, but there are degrees of punishment.

Years ago we introduced the system of ticket-of-leave, which I think has worked admirably. Under this system, men who have been found guilty of serious offences but who are not criminal by nature, who have been driven to crime, perhaps, by their environment or associates, and who have some redeeming qualities, are given their freedom before their sentence expires, and I am sure it must be the same to-day as it was under the previous Government, that many and many of the men so released turn out to be very good citizens. Ticket-of-leave, of course, is granted only upon certain conditions which ordinarily would not be deviated from, but I think the Minister of Justice might well consider the advisability of giving this class of offenders the opportunity of leading a better life by serving in the forces, and certainly they could not do better than to offer their services to their country. If my hon. friend will not accept the present motion, he might at least take the matter into consideration with a view to arriving at some method which would be in the best interests of all concerned.

Mr. Turriff rose to speak.

At six o'clock the House took recess

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member now purpose to reply, closing the debate?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I will reply now, if I am permitted, hoping that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), who rose at six o'clock to speak on this motion, may be allowed to speak if he comes into the chamber later.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think that would be quite in order. I delayed the resuming of the debate for some minutes, thinking that the hon. member for Assiniboia, who had caught my eye before six o'clock, might be in his seat.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the course suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Bickerdike) can be permitted, I do not think there would be any objection so far as we are concerned.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the unanimous consent of the House is given, I do not offer any objection. In that case, the hon member (Mr. Bickerdike) would have the right to reply now, but that would preclude any other hon. member replying to the hon. member for Assiniboia should he wish to speak. With that understanding, there is no objection to the hon. member (Mr. Bickerdike) proceeding with his reply.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) I think, is not quite so conversant with the facts as some of us on this side are. Unfortunately, or fortunately, the hon. gentleman has no sons, grandsons, or nephews, in France. That is not his fault; I am not blaming him. But I speak feelingly on this question, as I have a son, two grandsons and seven nephews at the front—that is, I had seven nephews at the front, but two have been killed and two badly wounded. I do not think that anyone who has those near and dear to him at the front would object if some of the prisoners were in the fight and helping to save the lives of our boys. No such person would raise the question whether those men had been in prison or not. Of course, it is a disgrace to be in prison. But there are many in prison who perhaps should not be there. And I am quite safe in saying that there are a good many who are not in prison who should be there. A good many young men are in prison for the first time, some of them for comparatively slight offences. I think these men might be given an opportunity to wipe out the stain of their imprisonment, and at the same time fight for the honour of Canada. I do not think the mothers of the boys in the trenches would find much fault if a regiment or two of our prisoners were helping to save the lives of their sons over there. They would not think much about the dignity of Canada if their boys' lives were being saved. I knew that the Minister of Justice would have an excuse—he always has when I have a resolution to propose. I did not know just what the excuse would be in this case, but I know it now—the dignity of the country, and the wish to punish these fellows. I admit that they deserve punishment. But there is such a thing as being too revengeful, and, while I do not wish to be personal with the hon. gentleman, whom I have known since he was a boy, I will say that I have known very few of his countrymen, the Irish, but have good hearts and have no wish to punish everybody, including the poor criminal—to shut him up in an iron cage, to throw him into a stone-walled yard and make him break stones all his life. The hon. gentleman states that there is no justification for what I said with regard to the management of the penitentiaries. What I said was not nearly so strong as the reports of his own Royal Commission. I believe he has modified conditions to a certain extent, but not sufficiently even yet. I hope the hon. gentleman will accept the resolution, with modifications if he likes. For, of course, I do not say that every prisoner should be allowed to leave the penitentiary and enlist; I speak only of the better class of prisoners, the boys who are in gaol for the first time, and, it may be, for comparatively trifling offences. I have in mind the case of a man whom I know, who is in penitentiary for two years. He got drunk and stole a horse and buggy, and was condemned. But that man is no criminal; I would not be ashamed to have him fighting side by side with my own son. I do not know that there is anything more I can say. I do not seem to be able to touch the minister's heart. I have been trying it for four years, but unsuccessfully. I pleaded with him, whether he accept the resolution or not, to do all he can in the way of helping to save our boys at the front.

Motion negatived.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—PROPOSED PLEBISCITE.

Mr. ROBERT BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St. Lawrence) moved:—

That, in the opinion of this House, in consideration of the fact that the Russian Government has just recently abolished capital punishment, and that the population of this Dominion of Canada are at the present time much exercised as to the advisability of discontinuing the extreme penalty of death in Canada, at its next general election, the voters of Canada be afforded an opportunity by means of a plebiscite of declaring for or against such continuance of capital punishment in this Dominion.

He said: It is a well known fact that Russia has recently abolished capital punishment. I think this action was taken about the last week of February. Capital punishment has been abolished by many others of the Allies of Great Britain. I have no doubt—and possibly the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) will agree with me this time—that there has been a considerable agitation, during the last three or four months at least, on the question whether the people of this country should have an opportunity to declare whether or not they are still in favour of capital punishment. I think that in every province except Ontario and Quebec the people have virtually come out in favour of abolishing the death penalty.

I would like to place on record for the benefit of the House of Commons and of the country in general the final disposition of the twenty murderers who were condemned to death in 1916. Let me take off my hat to New Brunswick as she was the only province that did not have a murder committed in the year 1916; I suppose, largely due to the close proximity of the State of Maine. My information is to the effect that a large majority of the inhabitants of that enlightened province are in favour of prison reform and opposed to capital punishment. Prince Edward Island had one murder committed, the criminal being sentenced to death but as the people of Prince Edward Island are in favour of prison reform and opposed to capital punishment strong recommendations were made in this case against the execution of the sentence and it was commuted to life imprisonment which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice will remember.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are not so hard hearted as you say.

Mr BICKERDIKE: Well, I am not through with you yet. Ontario, unfortunately, looms up worse than any other province. They had four murders in Ontario, and as Ontario up to the present time happens to be in favour of capital punishment and against prison reform, all four prisoners were sent into eternity, three of them by the scaffold and one of his own accord, he having committed suicide. As there is now an agitation going on in different parts of the country for the purpose of abolishing legalized murder, I have hopes for that province in the future. We only had one murder in the province of Quebec, at St. Johns, and it being a very brutal case and the population not being quite clear yet on the question of capital punishment, the man was hanged. The Yukon had one murder and the murderer got the extreme penalty. I have no information as to how the inhabitants of the Yukon regard the death penalty. British Columbia, although a mining country, had only two murders; one sentence was executed and the other commuted to imprisonment. As far as I can learn the people of British Columbia are now in favour of the life sentence in preference to the death sentence and they are very strongly in favour of prison reform. Saskatchewan had two murders; one of the sentences was commuted and the other executed. My information is that a large portion of the population of Saskatchewan still hold out for capital punishment but there is a strong agitation for abolition and prison reform. Alberta was not quite so fortunate; they had three cases of murder. Two of the sentences were commuted and one of the criminals paid the extreme penalty. The people of Alberta are strongly in favour of prison reform and of abolishing the death penalty as members from that province will ascertain at the next general election because when they go back they will be asked whether they are in favour of capital punishment, whether they are baby killers, or whether they intend to vote and work in favour of prison reform.

Mr. BRADBURY: It all depends on what you call a baby. A person 17 years old is not a baby.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) would like to out-Herod Herod himself; he had better just wait. Manitoba also had three murder cases. One of the sentences was commuted and two were executed. Manitoba, I am pleased to say, is seriously contemplating requesting the Government to abolish capital punishment and is also in favour of prison reform. Nova Scotia was not so fortunate. It had three murder cases and the murderers were all condemned to death by the courts, but as the people of Nova Scotia are largely in favour of prison reform and the abolition of capital punishment, strong representations, were made for mercy and the three sentences were commuted to life imprisonment. When the news was received by the population of Nova Scotia that they had succeeded in saving the lives of these three prodigals and that their souls were not sent into eternity, a sigh of relief went up, and I hope and believe that many of the people of that province before retiring that evening went down on their knees and thanked God that these prodigals were sent to the penitentiary instead of into eternity. Any member of this House would be a bold man who would stand up in his place and declare that the province of Nova Scotia had suffered for that clemency and mercy or that society had been prejudiced in any way by sending these three men to the penitentiary instead of sending them into eternity. I hope the Minister of Justice will agree to this resolution at least.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bickerdike) expresses the hope that I may agree with him on this motion, I may say that one of my fondest hopes is that the day will some time arrive when I shall find myself in agreement with the hon. gentleman on some proposal that he may make. He says that he has been four years trying to persuade me that the law of this country providing capital punishment for the gravest offence should be altered and he describes my position as being one of hard heartedness. I do not know but that perhaps I might claim that my action was due to just level headedness. However that may be, I do not purpose to enter upon any argument on the general question of the desirability of the abolition of capital punishment and my hon. friend has not done so in supporting his motion. His proposal is that the question should be submitted to a plebiscite at the next general election. As a general proposition, it does not seem to me desirable that we should depart from what is after all our system of parliamentary government and say, without some very exceptional reason, that we should submit to the people directly the exercise of the legislative power which constitutionally is properly exercised by their representatives in Parliament. I confess that I am not in a position to know what the gentleman's sources of information are as to the prevailing public opinion in the different provinces as to the desirability of abolishing capital punishment. But, I may say for myself, that I have not had occasion to see any evidence that the public of Canada generally were so keenly alive to the necessity of any change in the existing system of punishment as to make of this question of capital punishment a subject which should be treated as exceptional and withdrawn from the control of Parliament to be committed directly to the decision of the people. I do have in my official capacity certain opportunities of appreciating what are the matters in regard to which the people of Canada feel that there is need for modification in our criminal law. I am in receipt of numerous communications making representations in regard to one disposition or another in the criminal law and suggesting, and in many instances even pressing for, modifications of the dispositions there referred to. If my memory is correct, and I think it is, I have not had anything approaching widespread representations that there exists a conviction on the part of the people of Canada, or a desire on their part, that the law as it now stands on that subject should be modified. Indeed it would be difficult for me to mention any particular representation made to me upon that subject. Under those circumstances I certainly cannot share the view of the hon. gentleman that there is any such general unrest among the public upon that question as to make it incumbent upon us or to make it desirable that we should take this extraordinary method of dealing with this particular subject for legislation, of calling upon the people themselves to deal with it direct. For this reason I regret that once more I find myself in the unfortunate position of not being able to agree with the hon. member and to accept his proposition.

Motion negatived.

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT —WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

On motion of Mr. Bickerdike:

That, in the opinion of this House, the best interests of this young nation would be conserved by amending the Criminal Code so as to abolish the death penalty in Canada, in so far at least, as it applies to women and children.

Mr. SPEAKER: This resolution bears such a striking similarity to a subject which has already been discussed in this House this year and disposed of that I have grave doubt as to whether, under our rules, it is competent for the hon. member to propose it. Inasmuch as I am seriously in doubt, I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow this motion to stand until a later date in order that I may have full opportunity to consult the authorities upon it. But as at present advised I do not see that I could permit the hon. gentleman to proceed.

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT —THE SPAIN CASE.

Mr. BICKERDIKE moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, as there now lies within this Dominion a young lad of sixteen years under the condemnation of death whose father is at the present moment fighting with his regiment in the British Army in France in defence of the Empire, it is the sense of this Parliament that the infliction of the death penalty is contrary to the dictates of civilization and Christianity, and we hereby protest against the proposed hanging of this young boy of the tender age of sixteen years, which we consider would be a blot on the fair name of Canada and an everlasting disgrace to this young nation.

He said: Does my hon. friend the Minister of Justice agree to this resolution?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am afraid not.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Then I should like to make a few remarks with regard to it. It is really my opinion that the best interest of this young nation would be served by amending the criminal code as here suggested, more especially as this little boy in Manitoba has been sentenced to death, the sentence to be carried out on the 15th of May. I think my friend will agree that he has been approached on that question. I think that there is a petition, I do not know whether it has yet reached the minister, with 15,000 or 20,000 names attached to it. The minister shakes his head. He will admit that he has been approached on this question through numbers of telegrams?

Mr. DOHERTY: There have been representations made, but there is no such a petition as that.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: While the House is not unanimous in respect to the abolition of the death penalty in its entirety at the present time, I do hope that the members will see their way clear to vote this resolution unanimously, so that we may be able to prove to the world that there are no baby killer members of this House, or at least very few.

[The Speaker.]

In an ever increasing number the different states of the Union in the neighbouring republic have abolished capital punishment. It is, in Canada, strongly argued that an individual indicted for a capital offence is tried by jury and has all the advantages of criminal procedure to make out his case. On the face of it this is true; but in the last analysis the person's life depends upon the good judgment, or the bad judgment, as the case may be, of one man only, the Minister of Justice. If the prisoner is too poor to secure witnesses, or too much of a stranger to have testifying friends, he is found guilty; but if he has the means to pay lawyers, or has friends to do so for him, he can have his case appealed to the Governor General in Council. That means simply to the Minister of Justice for the time being. It is on the recommendation of that same minister that the commutation or the allowing of the law to take its course depends. Scores of men have been hanged because they either had no means to push their cases to this last point, or else they were strangers in the land and had no friends to interest themselves for them. Herein lies a grave danger—a danger that would be obviated were there no capital punishment, but merely perpetual imprisonment. It is needless to dwell further on this phase of the issue.

It is in the interest of justice, in the interest of legal certainty, in the interest of the stranger, the poor man, the friendless one, the workman, the individual whose lines are not cast in the higher strata of our social life; in the interest of humanity and of civilization, that this remaining blot be removed from the face of our otherwise matchless system of law and government. Instead of being a step backwards it becomes a giant stride ahead in the direction of the higher civilization and a broader christianity. When this terrible war will have ended and peace will again spread her wings over our fair Dominion, we want to be more in accord with the teachings of the Prince of Peace on earth.

Let those who care to look into the problem deeper visit the Côte de Neiges Cemetery at Montreal. It was afterwards discovered that a mistake had been made and that they should not have been hanged. A similar mistake was made in Toronto when Lount and Matthews were hanged. There is no question about the fact that they were rebels, but they were misled. If all the rebels in Canada were hanged, we would not have as large a population as we have to-day. The lives of these young men should have been spared; the Minister of Justice and the member for Rouville will not dare controvert that. The lives of the 18 or 19 men who were hanged in 1838 should have been spared, and if I had been alive I would have done all I could to save them. Were their lives worth saving? I submit that they were, and I stand or fall by that assertion.

I may not win in this fight, but I shall at least be consoled with the thought that the blood of these poor unfortunate women and children would not be on my hands if it were in my power to stop it. It seems a pity to me that presumably good men construe the Scriptures in such a way as to come to the conclusion that the state is justified in taking human life. The horribleness of the thing itself is enough to condemn it, regardless of the doctrine of the law of mercy and love as taught by the Master. Now I come to the boy to whose case reference has been made. Some one said that he was an Italian, and the member for Selkirk claims that all these murders are committed by English boys. The right hon. leader of the Opposition says that many of them are committed by Italians. Well, if I were to judge by this young man's name, he is neither Italian nor English. His name is Patrick Spain; most people would think that he was Irish. However, it makes no difference whether he is black or white, orange or green; let us remember that he is some mother's boy. This young lad when 14 years of age became a bugler in the army. When his comrades in the trenches come back, if they ever do, they will ask the Minister of Justice: what has become of our little bugler comrade? It is no use saying that you are not the bugler's keeper or your brother's keeper. That reply was unsatisfactory 6,000 years ago, and it will not suit when the boys come back from the front.

The question as to whether the world is growing better or worse has nothing to do with the awfulness of hanging a woman or child. The child is some mother's boy. He has sinned, that is true; yet to hang him is only doing the worst thing the State can do to him. The crime cannot be undone by taking the offender's life; nothing that society can do can heal the wounds of the injured one. Where, then, is the common sense in making other wounds, in bringing double disgrace on the parents, brothers and sisters of the offender? Any man who reads the New Testament knows that it says: "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty in all." How such a man can feel that he is justified in sitting in judgment and casting the first stone, is beyond my understanding. "There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and destroy; who art thou that judgest another?" Surely we are too enlightened to feel, as did the Pharisee of old: "God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men." Does not the Scripture say: "Let not him which eateth not, judge him that eateth." "Love worketh not ill to his neighbour; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us." "He that loveth not his brother whom he has seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?"

If I am wrong in my fight to save this boy, then it is wrong to be merciful. If my fight to save the criminal's life is wrong, then the law of love is wrong.

There is another reason, almost fundamental, why society should not execute its fallen members, and that reason is a sociological one. Experience shows that in the great majority of cases men who commit crimes either are born criminals or have lived under such conditions that their environment promoted criminal instincts and even criminal traits. Had organized government done its duty towards such persons they would never have been criminals. Investigation shows that the majority of the inmates of the penitentiaries are illiterate. Many of them have no moral or religious training, and, of course, none of them are criminals from choice. They are "weak vessels," depraved degenerates, and, in many instances, monomaniacs. Yet we cry: "Hang them; hanging is too good for them!"

It is estimated by sociologists who have scientifically studied the question that 90 per cent of crimes committed would have been prevented had care, prudence and charity been exercised by the state and municipal governments. For example, the four gunmen of New York city sentenced to be hanged were victims of environment. They had been agents for gambling houses and houses of ill-fame, and divided their spoils with the officers of the law elected by the people of a great city. In that manner the agents of society educated them in crime, and yet the state says they must forfeit their blood to the state that trained them in vice. They were trained in the under-world from infancy to commit crimes, till they became callous and did not scruple in taking life.

No state has the right to kill men when it contributes to their downfall. It owes them the duty to educate them and to throw nothing but moral influences around them, and when it fails to do this organized society is at fault. You may ask: What will we do with them? Why, do your duty towards them, by placing them in a prison, reformatory in its character; teach them morality, and, if necessary, give them mental training, and allow them the right to expiate their crimes and prepare for the hereafter. Make men out of them, and give them in most instances, if not in all, the hope that they will be rewarded if they will reform and become worthy of again taking their places among their fellowmen. This young boy, Patrick Spain, went through the battle of Mons and was blown up by a German shell—a very severe case of shell shock. He was sent to a hospital, and as soon as he was able to be removed was moved to England. After spending considerable time in a hospital there, he was sent out to this country by some society, as they thought his nerves would have a better chance of being cured out in the prairies than in the city of London. It appears that this poor boy was brought up in the slums, knew nothing of education, moral or religious training. He was just a poor little waif. He claims that he was sent into the house to clean his master's gun, and in doing so the gun accidentally went off and killed his employer's wife. His employer, having heard the shot, rushed towards the house with a gun in his hand. The boy claims that he did not know what he was doing at the time, that his nerves were so unstrung from the accident and from seeing the husband rush towards him with the gun in his hand that he turned around and shot the husband. The whole thing was a matter of circumstantial evidence. The boy was only 16; surely we are not going to start hanging children in Canada. It is a long time since we have hanged a child and I hope that we shall not commence again in 1917. I have no doubt that few of the members of this House understand the nature of shell shock and the results which it causes. I do, a little. A grandson of mine was blown up by a shell at the battle of the Somme which took place several months ago, and he has been in an English hospital ever since and has not yet quite recovered. I am not sure but the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) met him; I think he did. My grandson's nerves are in a very shattered condition, and I question very much if he will ever be the same man again; and if this boy's nerves were in the same condition as my grandson's are in at the present time, he can hardly be accounted responsible for anything he did. It may be that the boy has killed or murdered. If my information is correct, he was tried, not for murdering the woman but for murdering the husband, but he was condemned to death for murdering the woman.

Mr. DOHERTY: The last portion of my hon. friend's statement is not correct.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: That is the information I have from the boy's lawyers: that he was tried for the murder of the man and confessed to the murder of the man, but he was sentenced to death for the murder of the woman, for which offence he was not tried. That is the justice that is so properly distributed in Canada. I have letters from the boy's lawyers stating that that is a fact. If my hon. friend doubts my statement, I will show him the letters.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not doubt any statement that the hon. gentleman makes of his own knowledge.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I hope Canada will not only save the boy but save our young nation from the everlasting disgrace of having hanged a child. I ask: Would society be any better protected now by sending this poor little boy into eternity than it would by sending him into a reformatory? Is there in this House to-day any man who will say he wants to hang a little boy of sixteen years of age? I do not think even the member for that constituency will say so. The hon. member was a little short the other evening and felt, like the Minister of Justice, that nothing but vengeance and justice would suit in this country, but on further consideration he did not, I think, feel quite so vengeful. This boy's father is still in the British Army fighting side by side with our young men at the front. The boy's sister is in a lunatic asylum in Ireland. My hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) shakes his head; but I am informed by the boy's lawyers, who, I understand, are a reputable firm, that such is the case. The family is an Irish one. The boy's father joined the British army and was sent over to England. The family moved to London and the little boy was brought up in the worst slums in that great city. What could one expect? He went to the front as a bugler and his father is still in the army fighting for us. The poor little fellow sixteen years of age is now a stranger in this country, and we say: Hang him. God forbid that this young nation will be so disgraced as to hang that boy. When this boy's comrades return from the front, they will ask the Minister of Justice: Where is our little comrade? I do not think they will be pleased when they find that their little bugler has been hanged. I am not speaking about law; I know very little about law, and what I do know has been very expensive.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAHAM: The House seems to be unanimous on that point.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: For the benefit of our warrior bold from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), I would like to read this editorial from the Peterborough Evening Review:

> The right of one man to take the life of another in order to preserve his own has always been recognized in human enactments and set forth in Divine law. The fact must be established that the man so acting in his own behalf had every reason to believe that his life was in danger before he resorted to extreme measures to protect it.

I am reading this for the benefit of my good friend who was very much taken with the question of self-defence:

> This principle or legal maxim is one of the stock arguments of those who favor the retention of capital punishment. Society must be protected from the murderer, and to save its own existence must put all such out of the way. Surely society or the state is not threatened by the acts of a single individual, and is able to protect itself by adopting measures less harsh.
>
> A grown man attacked by a boy armed with a snowball or a bean-shooter may be annoyed, but it can hardly be claimed that his life is actually in danger. No matter what the inclination may be to play the role of Cain, adequate provocation is lacking. The boy can be suppressed and disposed of, made to see the error of his ways, reformed completely, perhaps, by some method short of shedding his blood. If his victim did take his life, the law would hardly uphold his procedure.
>
> The illustration cited above represents, too, the individual homicide and the State. The latter is too big and powerful to set up the plea that it is in any real danger by reason of the acts of one lone offender. It is necessary as well as advisable for the State to protect itself, but surely this can be done without resorting to extreme measures. What right has the State, whose authority is delegated to it by the individual, to take human life, any more than the latter has to avenge himself of his adversaries in the same way? There is certainly no warrant for such a line of conduct found in the teachings of the Nazarene, upon Whose precepts all human legislation is supposed to be based.
>
> A boy of sixteen, brought up in the slums of London, neglected, and surrounded with every form of vice, until he no doubt came to regard viciousness as the normal condition of humanity, was transplanted to new surroundings in Manitoba. The shifting of the scene was not sufficient to effect a change in a nature calloused by a youth spent in such environments as he had known. He committed a double murder under circumstances that at once stamped him as a moral and mental degenerate.
>
> The boy is to be hanged, despite his years. Society takes the cheapest method of getting him out of the way. The powerful State confesses itself unable to handle a boy of sixteen short of breaking his neck. A grown man who acted as the State does in this case would not only be laughed at but held to strict accountability.
> One of the objections to capital punishment is that it tends to breed in the community a class of individuals only a shade less reprehensible than the murderer himself. The marvel is not so much that the State, cold-blooded as it is, should decide to hang this boy, but that it should be able to find a man willing for a trifling monetary consideration to place the noose around the neck of the youth and spring the trap under his feet.

That is an editorial from, I think, the principal newspaper in my hon. friend's riding. If that boy's sister is in a lunatic asylum; if that boy was brought up in the slums of London with such an environment—if that is all true, is there a man in this House who would hang that child? I do not plead his innocence because he confesses frankly that he killed his boss. But surely no man will say that this was a cause of premeditated murder. It was committed on the spur of the moment, and many of the best lawyers think that it should have been a case of manslaughter and not of murder.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice): I do not purpose for a moment to enter into any discussion of the hon. gentleman's motion. I think the House will realize how improper and impossible it would be for a member of this Government, which has imposed upon it the duty of advising His Excellency in the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown to grant leniency, to express any opinion on the matter in this Parliament. But realizing the very strong feeling of the hon. gentleman upon this subject, and not wishing to prevent his having the opportunity of making such plea as his heart might inspire on behalf of this young man, I did not when he moved this motion take exception on the ground of its being out of order, nor do I now desire to make absolute affirmation upon that subject. But I do feel very strongly that I should submit to your judgment, Sir, the question of whether this motion is in order. I should like to point out that the exercise of clemency is the prerogative of the Crown, that His Excellency the Governor General exercises that prerogative under the powers conferred upon him by his commission. Under that commission he is required to act in capital cases upon the advice of his council, and in other cases upon the advice of one of his ministers, usually the Minister of Justice. Parliament does not appear to me to have any role to play in the matter, and from the practical point of view I think we can all realize what an unfortunate thing it would be if council, called upon to advise the Governor General say in this particular case, should find itself face to face with a vote of Parliament that this young man ought to be hanged; because if there may be a vote that he should not hang, there may equally be a vote that he should. In what position to act impartially, to weigh the circumstances pro and con with the knowledge derived from a careful study of the entire evidence in the case, would the members of the council be, if in advance they had the expression of the opinion of this Parliament (to which after all they are responsible), that the young man ought to hang? I think it is only necessary to point out that practical inconvenience, to strengthen the position that such a motion as is now made, inviting in advance of any action on the part of the Crown, an expression of opinion by Parliament as to what that action should be, is clearly out of order. I do not propose to go into the citation of authorities, because I did not come here prepared for that purpose, but the question is very fully discussed in Todd's Parliamentary Practice, and I think there is no conclusion that can be reached other than that this motion seeking to seize Parliament of this question at this stage is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Inasmuch as the hon. member for St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) is an old and highly respected member of this House, and realizing how very deeply he feels upon this subject, I felt some hesitancy in ruling his motion out of order forthwith, and I left it to the judgment of the House for some hon. member to rise to a point of order as to whether his motion could properly be put. Since the point of order has been raised by the Minister of Justice, I have no hesitation in saying that in my judgment the resolution is out of order, not only on the ground suggested by the hon. Minister of Justice, but also for the reason that it deals with the question of capital punishment, which is the subject of another debate pending before the House, as will be seen by turning to the Orders of the Day, item No. 2 on Public Bills and Orders, "Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Bickerdike for the second reading of Bill No. 3, an Act to amend the Criminal Code and to abolish capital punishment."

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I be allowed to say a word?

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot permit debate, but if the hon. member for South Renfrew wishes to say a word and has the unanimous consent of the House I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM: We all sympathize with the hon. member for St. Lawrence. His heart is in this subject and he misses no opportunity of bringing it before the public, and I agree with his views in the main. But I see the point taken by the Minister of Justice quite readily. It would be impossible to submit cases of this kind for the approval or disapproval of Parliament. Just imagine the situation in which we might be placed! It would rather prejudice the object my hon. friend has in view, and might prejudice it very seriously. All we could do at this time would be to change the statute, if Parliament saw fit. Having said that, I think the Minister of Justice could not have said more or less than he did on the subject. He is the responsible minister who makes the report to Council, and Council acquiesces in the report or disapproves of it, and it is their recommendation that becomes the recommendation of the Governor in Council, and not that of the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice being called upon to make a recommendation to Council, and Council being called upon to decide on his recommendation, they could not possibly express any opinion to Parliament at this stage. I might say that as an individual I should be glad to sign a petition and urge the Minister of Justice to be lenient in this case, but as a member of Parliament I would not care to be called upon to vote on this matter, as I think we have no right to do so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am in the same position as my hon. friend from South Renfrew

(Mr. Graham), and I wish to say just a word or two.

Mr. SPEAKER: I trust this debate will not be continued by members rising and craving the indulgence of the House to speak. I would rather the hon. member for Rouville did not insist upon discussing the subject.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Let me just say one word. I quite agree with you, Sir, but in my opinion the Minister of Justice should have raised his point of order at the beginning of the debate. I think, according to the rules of the House, he had no right to raise his point of order and call for a ruling in the middle of the debate. However, Sir, I always submit respectfully to your ruling.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough) moved:—

A return giving a list of all appointments made by the present Administration prior to the date of this order under the provisions of Section 21 of the Civil Service Act, 1908, giving the names in full, former Post Office addresses, occupations, ages, present employment, department in which employed, salaries at time of appointment, present yearly salaries and the respective dates of the Orders in Council by which they were appointed.

He said: There is reason to suspect that section 21 of the Civil Service Act has been used for purposes that were not intended at the time the Act was passed. The Civil Service Act, which was passed in 1908, was an attempt to supersede the old practice of appointing favourites to positions in the Civil Service; it was an honest attempt, I believe, to introduce a system of appointment by merit after competitive examination. It was found necessary, however, to make provision for exceptional cases in which it might be found inadvisable to demand that the candidate for appointment submit to examination. It was pointed out at the time that occasionally the Government might wish to appoint an eminent engineer or some other officer who would refuse to accept appointment if it were made conditional that he should undergo an examination. Consequently this section was put in the Act, giving the Government power with the consent of the Commission to override in a sense, by Order in Council, the Civil Service Commission. When a man of such character as I have referred to is required for the Civil Service, the Government may appoint him by Order in Council, as I understand it. I asked the question a few days ago how many appointments had been made by the present Administration under this section and the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) informed me that the number was 174. I submit that there is reason to think that there have not been 174 appointments of genuine experts to the Civil Service since 1911, and I am much inclined to suspect that many of these appointments were of men who were too old to be appointed under the Act, or were not well enough posted to pass the ordinary examination. Of course, I am not sure as to that, but the number of appointments strikes me as very large, and I think no hon. member will be of opinion that so many genuine appointments have been made under Section 21 within the last five years. However, I will reserve my criticisms until the report comes down. I would make special request of the Secretary of State not to delay the bringing down of the return. I find that there is a disposition this session to delay the production of papers. In my own experience and that of other hon. members, when a single question is asked the answer to which requires only a little work on the part of a clerk, the question is turned into an order for returns, pigeonholed and apparently forgotten, and it may be six months before the return is ready. I hope that will not be the case with this motion, as it is very important that we should stand by the intention of the Civil Service Act, and if there is an abuse in regard to section 21 the public and the House should know it. I submit that it would be right for the Secretary of State to make a special case of this motion and to speed the production of the papers as much as possible.

Hon. J. D. REID: I think it was when my Estimates were before the Committee of Supply a few evenings ago, that the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) mentioned the appointments made under section 21 of the Civil Service Act. So far as I am able to learn there has been no violation of section 21, as suggested by the hon. member. I think he was under the impression that if a department wished to appoint an official and evade the Civil Service Act, the appointment could be made by Order in Council, and that 174 appointments had thus been made in violation of section 21.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under section 21, not in violation of it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I said that I thought the number large, and was afraid it might indicate an unfair use of the powers of the Government.

Mr. REID: I promised the hon. gentleman that I would bring this before each member of the Government, so that, as the Estimates of each department were taken up, the minister in charge might be ready to give a list of the names of those appointed under this section and to explain those appointments. The Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Prof. Shortt, evidently read Hansard the day after the debate to which I have referred, and he wrote me a letter which I would have been glad to read to the hon. member, but, unfortunately, I have not it with me. That letter will show the hon. member that he is mistaken as to appointments having been made otherwise than in accordance with the Act, or by abuse of the Act. I wrote to Prof. Shortt immediately on receiving his letter and asked if he could give me a list of the appointments made under section 21. I thought it probable that he could give that list readily, because in the case of appointments under this section the certificate of the Civil Service Commission is necessary, and none of these 174 appointments had been made without such certificate. I am satisfied that when I get that statement from Prof. Shortt the hon. gentleman will find that these appointments have been mainly of architects or other specialists, whose appointments were necessarily made under this section. I am sure the Secretary of State will have the return prepared as soon as possible.

Mr. MARCIL: I hope it is clear that appointments to the House of Commons and Senate are included under the motion, as I know that appointments to the Translating Staff of the House have been made under section 21.

Mr. REID: I will draw that to the attention of whatever minister has charge of the Estimates for Legislation, in order that he may be prepared to give information on this subject.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The appointments to the House of Commons are included under the motion, as it calls for "a list of all Appointments" made in the manner referred to.

LOSS OF GOVERNMENT DREDGE CAPE BRETON.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, approval should be given to any measure proposed by the Government towards meeting the claims of the wives, families and dependents, of the men who lost their lives in the disaster to the Government Dredge Cape Breton, off Shad Rock, Guysborough County, Nova Scotia, in the month of January last.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution has reference to a very distressing disaster that occurred on the coast of Guysborough in January last. The Cape Breton was being towed from Lunenburg to Sydney. It was at a season of the year when, owing to the condition of the weather, the towing of such a helpless ship as this was extremely difficult. The result of this disaster was the loss of the lives of the members of the crew. Several of them belonged to the county I represent in this House; others were natives of other parts of the province of Nova Scotia. Those belonging to my county left wives and helpless families. Without desiring to introduce a harsh note into this discussion, I may say that the conditions under which the disaster took place imply that the Government is subject to more responsibility in regard to it than perhaps it otherwise would be. The moving of this dredge from Lunenburg to Sydney at that time was a proceeding that, with all deference to those who were responsible for it, should not have been undertaken. It has not been disclosed to my knowledge what urgent necessity there was for towing the dredge at that season of the year. It has been suggested that it was necessary to transport the Cape Breton on to Sydney for the purpose of having some repairs made to its machinery. I cannot understand why it was necessary to take the Cape Breton to Sydney at that season of the year. The repairs necessary to be made to the machinery, I am informed, could as well have been made in the town of Lunenburg, where there is a foundry and machine shop quite capable of supplying such machinery and repairs as were necessary. But, if the work could not have been done in Lunenburg it could have been done in the city of Halifax or in the town of Dartmouth. Another circumstance that contributed, I think, to the disaster, or, at all events, which reduced the possibility of the escape of those who were on the dredge, was that the life-saving station at Whitehead was at that time out of commission. For some years a very efficient life-saving station had been maintained at that point, which is a place very much exposed to the storms of the Atlantic, particularly during the winter season. For some reason of which I am not cognizant, the department of this Government having control over life-saving stations disbanded the life-saving crew, the boats were unfit to render service, and as a consequence of this, when the accident occurred to the Cape Breton, there was no life-saving apparatus available to assist in the rescue of these poor, unfortunate men. On account of these two circumstances, I suggest that the responsibility of the Government to make adequate allowance for the dependents of those who were lost in that disaster is greater than it would be under ordinary circumstances. In any condition the loss of the wage-earner is a very serious blow and entails very great privations in most cases upon those who are dependent upon him. At a time like this when the cost of living is so high and when it is very difficult for those who are capable and competent to earn their daily bread for themselves and their families to earn a sufficient amount for that purpose, what shall we say of the poor, unfortunate widow and helpless children who are faced with the necessity of earning for themselves a sufficient income to provide for the necessaries of life? What ever would have been the intention of the Government under ordinary conditions, I think the particular circumstances surrounding this disaster call for special treatment on the part of the Government. Some questions were asked in this House by my hon. friend representing the county of Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) as to what were the intentions of the Government in respect to this matter. The hon. acting Minister of Public Works (Mr. Reid) was good enough to reply that the matter was receiving the attention of the Government. I move this resolution for the purpose of impressing on the hon. acting Minister of Public Works and the other members of the Government that this case is one not requiring ordinary treatment and I would express the hope that when this question comes before them for their consideration they will deal with it in the broadest and most generous way that they possibly can. I shall not press consideration of it further upon the Government than to urge upon them that they will place a just measure of compensation and assistance, in the way of a gratuity, in the hands of those who are dependent upon themselves for their livelihood on account of the accident to which I have referred.

Hon. J. D. REID: In the absence of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) I may say a few words in reference to this motion. When an accident of this kind occurs and loss of life results, it is a very serious matter. We all deplore an accident of this kind. I remember reading about the accident and I was very sorry to hear of the loss of life. Why the dredge was being moved at that particular time I am not able to say. The officials of the department of Public Works, as far as I can tell, are all competent and careful men and men of good judgment. They may have erred in this case in ordering the dredge to Sydney although I do not believe that they did. The storm arose, the dredge was caught outside and the accident occurred. This matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of Public Works some time ago by members from Nova Scotia, and I understand that he has the matter of the treatment of the families of those who lost their lives on that occasion under consideration. I am sure that when the supplementary Estimates are taken up these cases will be dealt with. The hon. member of course knows that when accidents have occurred in the past in any of the departments such as Public Works and Railways and Canals in which accidents are likely to happen, the department in every case has dealt with them in the supplementary Estimates for that particular year. The hon. Minister of Public Works will before the end of the session have his supplementary Estimates prepared. I shall again bring this case to his attention. I would ask the hon. member not to press his motion further, and to allow the matter to be dealt with as I have indicated.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I think it would be proper for the minister to give the House the results of the investigations made in connection with this disaster. As the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) says, it was a very distressing case in which a number of men lost their lives, and the friends and relatives of the men who lost their lives are of the opinion that there was great carelessness somewhere. My information is that the hawser to which this dredge was attached parted. The dredge was being towed by a tug. It had no propelling machinery or steering gear of its own. A gale was blowing on to the shore and a wild and rocky shore it is, and as there was no boat and no way of doing anything to rescue the men, once the hawser parted and the dredge was at the mercy of the sea the men had no chance at all. It is also to be remembered that the lifeboat was not available. There is a life station at Whitehead. The lifeboat crew at Whitehead had done splendid work for many years. They had on various occasions rescued men from perishing, and under the management of the department at the present time this lifeboat appears to have been out of commission. That, along with the fact that the dredge was moved so carelessly from one place to the other, that the hawser could not have been as strong as it ought to have been and that there was no spare hawser, in fact, that, insufficient precautions were taken to ensure the safety of those on board the dredge, would seem to call for special consideration of this case by the Government. I do not think that this is a case for a small amount such as we generally see given as a consolation allowance in cases of this kind. I think this is a case where the Government ought to carefully investigate all the circumstances, and if they find there has been carelessness on the part of the officials connected with the lifeboat or in the removal of the dredge from one place to the other, they should pay special damages to the dependents of the men who lost their lives in the service of the Government.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): One can hardly say anything on this motion without repeating practically the words used by the two hon. gentlemen who have already spoken. But I would like to emphasize just in a word what they have already said. I trust that when the Government come to deal with this matter they will make a very generous allowance to the dependents of those who lost their lives in this regrettable disaster. However, that is not the phase of the matter which appeals to me most strongly at the moment. I am inclined to the belief that there was gross carelessness in directing that this dredge and two scows should be towed from Lunenburg to Sydney in the month of January. I cannot make myself believe that there is anybody in the Department of Public Works so incompetent as to direct that it should be done. I think if the truth were known it would be found that the dredge was ordered to be removed from the port where she was lying to the port of Sydney for purposes other than practical ones. It is a most absurd error of judgment for any person to direct that that dredge and two scows be towed in the month of January several hundred miles from the port of Lunenburg to Sydney. One could hardly imagine a more hazardous task than the towing of a dredge and scows, particularly in the month of January. There was no reason why the scow should have been ordered to Sydney. She could not possibly have done any work there. It has been stated in the press in Nova Scotia that the dredge was ordered to Sydney for the purpose of repairs. That cannot be a good and sufficient answer. The dredge could have been repaired in the port of Lunenburg as well as in any other port in the world. The ports of Halifax and Liverpool were also available; in fact, it could have been repaired in any creek or cove in the province of Nova Scotia, because a dry dock or marine railway is not necessary for repairing a dredge. She might have been towed on the shore and repaired there, as is frequently done. I think that the whole incident is most reprehensible, indeed, and it is regrettable that we do not know all of the facts. It could not be possible that the dredge was intended to perform any public work for several months after that date in the island of Cape Breton, and the reason that is sometimes urged, that she was going to Sydney for repairs, is absolutely untenable. I think that while the matter is up it will not be amiss to emphasize the point made by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) in respect to the non-repair of the life saving station at Whitehead. I am informed, as was the member for Guysborough, that this life saving station had been out of repair for several weeks, and that the department were advised some five or six weeks before this disaster which we are discussing had taken place, of the condition of the life saving station. I understand it was reported to the Naval Department that the cribwork of the life saving station was out of repair, and that it took the officers of this department several weeks to find out that this cribwork was really a part of the life saving station and not a bed or crib wherein the men who manned the lifeboats usually sleep. In other words, they mistook cribwork at the life saving station for a bed in which the men engaged in the life saving work usually slept at night. If this is correct it is a most lamentable condition of ignorance, which possibly contributed to the regrettable loss of life on the occasion of the loss of the dredge. I have very much pleasure in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for Richmond, and I regret that the House is not more fully apprised of all the facts in connection with the matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister did not say whether we would be favoured with the papers.

Mr. REID: I shall be very glad to lay upon the table of the House anything in connection with this investigation.

Motion withdrawn.

ALLEGED MISUSE OF MAILS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. TURRIFF: On Monday last I drew the attention of the House to a system of collecting money that was being carried on in Canada for the purpose of buying morphine to allay the sufferings of wounded in the hospitals of the Allies, and I expressed the opinion that either the Government was very much to blame for not supplying the necessary funds, or the collecting agency, which was in the city of New York, was a fake. Since then I have received considerable information on the subject, and I am glad to be able to inform the House that, so far as I can judge, the Government has not been to blame; neither was this a fake in any sense of the word. The facts of the matter, shortly, are as follows: Several months ago, when there was a great shortage of anæethetics in Serbia, three young nurses in New York, thought it would be a good thing to collect money in the United States to be devoted to the purchase of anæsthetics. They went to Miss Whitman, superintendent of nurses in a prominent hospital in New York, and asked her to act as treasurer. She refused to do so, but in spite of her refusal these young ladies started a chain of letters and Miss Whitman was soon deluged with correspondence and with money. She immediately drew the attention of the board of directors of the hospital to the fact, who notified the post offices and police authorities of New York. The police authorities made a thorough investigation and found that everything was being done in an absolutely straightforward and honest manner. But the hospital authorities were very much annoyed about it. They notified some of the papers in New York, among them the New York Times, and every possible effort was made to stop this chain of letters and to stop the money from coming in. In spite of their efforts, however, over $25,000 has come in to Miss Whitman. In order that everything should be done in order, the hospital authorities had a committee of prominent New York men appointed to look after the expenditure of this money. I understand that some small amounts of it have been expended for soldiers' comforts here in Canada and that they are going to use the money for the benefit of the soldiers. When I got this information I felt that I had done an injustice to Miss Whitman in stating that in my judgment the whole thing was a fake—because I could not believe that the Government had been remiss in that part of its duty. Miss Whitman is a Canadian.

Mr. GRAHAM: An unwilling philanthropist.

Mr. TURRIFF: She comes from the vicinity of Montreal, and is well connected in that city. Everything that was done in this connection was done with the view of aiding the Allies and in assisting the suffering soldiers. I make this explanation, as I do not wish that anything that I said should be a reflection on Miss Whitman, who has not been to blame in any respect. Everything has been straightforward and satisfactory, but the movement was a mistaken one, and once started was very difficult to check. As a matter of fact it has not yet stopped; no doubt a great deal more money will come in before it can be stopped, in spite of all the publicity that there has been in connection with the matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be glad to draw the statement of my hon. friend to the attention of the Minister of Militia who, I believe, has been looking into this matter since my hon. friend brought it to the attention of the House the other day. One advantage at least will result from what my hon friend has done, because, by reason of what he has said as to the success of the chain, I think I will start one myself for the Government.

SCARCITY OF SALT FOR CURING PURPOSES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SINCLAIR: I should like to direct the attention of the acting Prime Minister to a matter which is of special importance on the coast of the Maritime provinces, that is, the scarcity of salt for the curing of fish. My hon. friend is aware that tonnage is now very scarce and as salt is a bulky material, compared with its value, it is difficult to procure tonnage to deliver it on the coast where it is needed to prepare for the season's fishing. There is great scarcity of salt, and great danger that it will not be available to the fishermen. I have had letters and telegrams from different points on the coast stating that there is little or no salt at Halifax, which was the place whence it was generally furnished, and that there is a prospect that it will be very scarce and that that scarcity will interfere with the fishing industry during the present season. My hon. friend is no doubt aware that the fishermen, like the farmers, are being urged to increase production, and it is of the utmost importance that they should do so. The fishing on the coast of Europe has practically ceased. Prior to the war, at least 3,000 steam trawlers were carrying on fishing in the North Sea and in the adjoining waters, supplying most of Europe with fresh and salt fish. The war has changed all that, nearly all those trawlers being engaged as mine-sweepers or as boats for the purpose of hunting the submarine, and little or no fishing is being carried on at the present time in Europe. It is therefore of the utmost importance that everything should be done to aid the Canadian fishermen, as they are at present supplying food to our soldiers at the front, large quantities of fresh fish having gone forward from Canada to France within the last number of months for that purpose. I do not know what steps the Prime Minister should take in the matter, but I have no doubt there are a good many transport ships coming across from the other side at the present time practically empty. Of course the ships are all loaded going east, but many of them come back in ballast, and there ought to be an opportunity of getting some of this salt taken over, possibly in some of the ships that are commandeered by the Government. It is at all events worth while for my hon. friend to look into the matter, in order to see if anything can be done to relieve the situation, which, I believe, is very urgent, and likely to become more urgent if some steps are not taken.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be very glad to draw the matter referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) to the attention of the Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries and to the notice of the officers of the department concerned, and see if anything can be done to relieve the situation my hon. friend speaks of.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

LIMITATION OF RACING MEETS.

On the Order:

House in Committee on Bill No. 2, an Act to amend the Criminal Code.—Mr. Wilcox.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY: When the Bill passed its second reading there was an understanding that it should be referred to a special committee, and I expected to be able to move this evening that certain members be appointed to act on that committee. This afternoon the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) asked me to allow the matter to stand until he was prepared to submit the names of members of the Opposition. I would, therefore, ask that the matter stand.

Order stands.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. R. Bickerdike (Montreal, St. Lawrence) for the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code and to abolish capital punishment, resumed from April 19.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Blain): I may say that the hon. member is closing the debate.

Mr. R. BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St. Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, in closing the debate, I will naturally be very brief, but as some very distinguished statesmen have taken exception to my Bill, I will take the opportunity of replying briefly to them. They all undertook to oppose my suggested amendment to the Criminal Code for the purpose of abolishing the death penalty and substituting life imprisonment for the different crimes contained in our statute books, for which the extreme penalty of death is prescribed. In doing so I would call the attention of the leader of the Opposition to some of his remarks as reported in Hansard, to which remarks I desire to take exception. Before doing so, however, I would like to say a few words in reply to the Solicitor General. I want to make it very plain that my view is that capital punishment should not be abolished if hanging protects society. I take that ground at once. The first object that this Parliament should have is to protect society, and if it is necessary to hang our poor prodigals for the purpose of protecting society, then let us hang them. On the other hand, if we can protect society equally well, or better, by life imprisonment, then let us have life imprisonment, but by all means let our first consideration be the protection of society. The Solicitor General took very strong grounds on that question the other evening.

Capital punishment is discriminatory. Because of its severity it is almost never inflicted upon a person of wealth or influence, and in general we hang only such as belong to the abjectly miserable portion of humanity. The long and short of the matter is that the death penalty is too severe to be inflicted upon the rich or the strong. It is one of the cruel inventions of caste—it is a class penalty, just as some of the laws governing it have been class laws. A penalty so severe as not to be enforceable has a basic objection; it produces unrest to have a constant miscarriage of justice. A wealthy malefactor, an influential murderer, a powerful assassin cannot go free, in a community where paupers and friendless foreigners are hanged, without the people acquiring a contempt for the laws.

There is, regrettably, a disposition on the part of some of our most worthy citizens (yes, Christians) to bring passages of Scripture to the support of capital punishment. We have heard unto the point of weariness the quotation of the Old Testament of " an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." We do not hear so frequently, however, of Christ's own allusion to the Old Testament in the following words " Ye have heard it said in olden times, ' An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth,' but I say unto you, love your enemies and pray for them that despitefully use you." If any one, however adept in placing construction on the English language, is able, in the light of these words, to attribute even tacit support of the death penalty to the Saviour of mankind he will exceed all bounds of mental agility within my comprehension. Again, we hear from those who would quote the Word in justification of legalized murder, the citing of that part of the sixth verse of the ninth chapter of Genesis, which reads as follows, " Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed."

Some of our best people try to be governed exclusively by what the Old Testament says. I revere and respect their opinions, but I must confess that I always prefer to have same endorsed by the New Testament. Now, it is within the memory of many that a large number of Christians in the Southern States quoted the Old Testament in support of slavery. I also remember in my younger days Brigham Young quoting freely from the Old Testament in support of polygamy, but as neither slavery nor polygamy could be endorsed by the New Testament, they had to go, and for just the same reason will capital punishment have to go. I think that the environment in which we are living has a great influence on the community. Take, for example, was it not strange that Nero, " the monster of cruelty," should say during the first few years of his reign, when death warrants were presented him to sign, that he regretted that he had ever learned to write, so averse was he to shedding human blood. Later, when he became brutalized, he could sign them without pain, and put his own mother to death without remorse.

Now, Sir, the purest Being, the greatest Teacher, the holiest Judge who ever presided over the destinies of man, never wrote a sentence preserved in history excepting one when meditating upon capital punishment. He wrote with his finger in the sand and then immediately said, as if an interpretation of what he wrote: "Let him who is without sin cast the first stone." The old law read: "Let her be stoned to death." As all men are sinners, this harsh and cruel law of death, written in the Old Testament, was reconstructed and repealed by the Saviour of man, and savage justice was tempered with the saving influence of the Master's mercy.

The next in order to attack the Bill was the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I am pleased to see the Government and the right hon. leader of the Opposition getting so close together. The Government has given the right hon. leader of the Opposition free wheat, and the leader of the Opposition, not to be outdone in politeness, has given the Government free hanging.

Mr. DOHERTY: I wonder who gets the best of it?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: I have no doubt that in time, especially when the Hon. Sir Robert Rogers returns, who I have no doubt will be a knight by then, they will make a very happy family. I am pleased to see these indications of a rapprochement, a symptom of what might lead up to a coalition Government until after the war—something that all of us in this country who have boys in the trenches are hoping for—and if it should be that sacrificing my interests would act as a stepping stone to this much desired object I submit respectfully that I am willing to be sacrificed.

When we were democratic to the hilt we would not have invoked custom for the purpose of continuing any great national crime such as legalized murder by the State, sending the soul of our poor prodigals into eternity, when society can be just as well protected by sending them to the penitentiary. The right hon. leader of the Opposition made a reference to President Fallières, who was really the greatest President the French Republic ever enjoyed, and probably purified France more than any other public man in the republic, not even excepting President MacMahon.

Mr. DOHERTY: He was Irish.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: You cannot always tell by the name. The leader of the Opposition claims that Patrick Spain was an Italian. President Fallières says:

> Among the unpleasant duties of the President of France is that of signing all death warrants issued in the Republic.

That is well. He says, however, that there should be a slight change in the arrangement, as follows:

> The Judge who sentences the man to die should also act as his executioner.

If the Minister of Justice and the leader of the Opposition had to do the hanging, I think they would send the men to the penitentiaries instead.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have too many jobs already.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: President Fallières claims that if this were the case it would do away with all legalized homicide. He further says:

> I will not ask any man to do that which I myself am unwilling to do. I will do no murder, even for the State.

President Fallières therefore commuted all death penalties to life imprisonment. Where there was a reasonable doubt about a man's guilt he pardoned him. He also says:

> France must learn to take care of her criminals without killing them. It is a poor use to make of a man to take his life. It is an acknowledgment of our inefficiency. Then, a life sentence should hold out to a man the promise that a number of years of good behaviour and useful work will make him free. Penology must be made a science to the end that when we imprison a man we do it for his own good, with the intention of turning out a better man than we took in. Just as long as the State sets an example of killing its enemies, they must expect that individuals will occasionally kill theirs.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition says:

> Whether or not the penalty of death is a deterrent is a much mooted question. Education has more to do with the prevention of crime than even the deterrent effect of the punishment, and in this country it can happily be said that cases of murder are very few, in fact, amongst the native population; they are becoming less and less frequent.

With that statement I quite agree. The right hon. leader of the Opposition goes on:

> All the cases which have taken place recently have been amongst a class of foreigners who come from a country in which the crime of murder is a daily custom. Without being invidious, I believe that many crimes of that nature have been committed by Italians who came from the South of Italy, where it is the pernicious habit of every man to carry a stiletto.

With this latter statement I can hardly agree. The only execution in the province of Quebec during 1916 was that of Paul dit Lepine Renaud, and judging by the name, he could have hardly been an Italian. The name of the young lad lying under sentence of death in Winnipeg is Patrick Spain; that does not sound like an Italian either. So I think the contention of the right hon. leader of the Opposition that all the murders in Canada are committed by men who come from the south of Italy is wrong. I have no doubt the right hon. gentleman is aware that Italy abolished capital punishment years ago. Further on he said:

> What is the most effective law? Shall we continue the law which we have had on the Statute Book ever since the country has been a country, and which is still a law among the most civilized nations of the earth? Or shall we be carried away by a feeling of humanity which is most commendable and most honourable?

Now, Sir, I think I have proved to the right hon. gentleman that it is not the foreign element in Canada who are committing all the murders. With regard to the claim that capital punishment is right because it has been on the statute book ever since this country has been a country, and because it is still the law among the most civilized nations of the earth. I remember well the time when the right hon. gentleman refused to follow custom, and claimed that this young nation was now grown up and should make the laws that were considered most necessary for our Dominion. Custom never did make right. With regard to his claim that this is still the law among the most civilized nations of the earth, I must also join issue with him. He claims that it is the most civilized nations of the world that retain capital punishment. On the contrary, the nations that have abolished capital punishment are not the heathen or uncivilized nations, but just the reverse. According to the right hon. leader of the Opposition China is one of the most civilized nations of the world. China, Turkey, Japan, Germany and Austria-Hungary all have capital punishment. The other three nations that retain capital punishment are England, France and Spain. I am prepared to say that these are civilized nations, but they are the only civilized nations that retain capital punishment. Now, I desire to place opposite to these the names of the anti-hanging countries—I suppose, the right hon. gentleman would call them "the uncivilized nations." They are: Russia—surely, not an uncivilized country—Italy, Holland, Belgium, Norway, Portugal, Haiti, Switzerland and the United States (in part). I cannot understand the statement made by the right hon. gentleman. He quotes the "civilized nations" as the excuse for retaining capital punishment, and the greatest nation that retains it is China. If he holds China to be one of the civilized Christian nations of the world, of course he is quite entitled to his opinion.

I hold that the death penalty is the most atrocious form of bookkeeping in existence. The only way we can balance a debit is by a credit; you can only balance a negative by a positive; the only way to balance evil is by good. It is a most ridiculous thing to have a death entered on one side of the ledger, and then expect to balance it by turning to the other side and writing down another death. That is the style of bookkeeping of the Minister of Justice, so far as this branch of his business is concerned. I would like to see capital punishment abolished for the sake of the innocent men who have been executed, and there have been a number of them. I wish to quote from a letter written by the man who, I suppose, is the greatest authority on prison reform on this side of the water, if not in the world—Thomas Mott Osborne, of Sing Sing fame. He says:

> As warden of Sing Sing I executed forty men, and I am convinced that four of them were innocent. One was a boy of 20 years of age, and I knew he was innocent of the crime for which he was condemned, because I know who committed the crime. But the ethics of the underworld are that one must never 'squeal on a pal.' This boy lied, evaded, faced his trial, was condemned, and afterwards went to his death, just because he would not 'squeal on a pal.' Was not that boy worth saving?

Is there any man in this House who will say that it was not worth while to try to save such a boy? Innocent of the crime, he would not go back on his pal, but kept his course even though it led to the electric chair. I say to the Minister of Justice that if boys of that kind are not worth saving, then life is not worth living.

Now I desire to say a few words in answer to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). Hon. members will recollect that he quoted the Old Testament very freely. But the Old Testament is a record of the Jewish race, and it is difficult to see how it can be made the standard for Christians, especially when the Master enjoins His followers to forsake the old commands and gave them the new ones instead. He did not preach revenge but exhorted His followers to love their enemies. It must be recalled that the ancient prophets also looked to the time when swords would be beaten into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks.

The great promised Messiah was to be a Prince of Peace; not one who took life but one who reformed it. There are very few students of the New Testament who attempt the tremendous task of defending capital punishment on its authority, for its teaching is mercy, long suffering, kindness, forgiveness, and these are not compatible with breaking a man's neck. The Master, as we are told in the 12th chapter of John, commutes the sentence of stoning to death, which the Jewish law imposed upon the adulterous woman, to the sentence "go and sin no more," bidding her accuser who was without sin to cast the first stone.

Life sentence is practical. I am not asking for a substitute for capital punishment which has not been tried. The states and nations that have actually substituted life imprisonment for capital punishment bear the testimony that it works well. Governor Washburn, of Wisconsin, said in 1873:

> It is twenty years since we have abolished capital punishment and no state can show greater freedom from homicidal crimes.... With a population embracing almost every nationality, statistics show that crime instead of increasing with the growth, has actually diminished.

Senator Jessup, of Iowa, says:

> Murder in the first degree has not increased but has for four years decreased,

And he gives figures to prove the truth of his assertion, and adds the significant expression—"there is more lynch law where the scaffold is retained."

Under life sentences juries convict and that speedily. The Chief Justice of Rhode Island says:

> My observation fully justifies me in saying that conviction is far more certain now in proper cases than when the death penalty was in vogue.

Chief Justice Denman says:

> Extreme severity has operated more as a preventitive to prosecutions than a preventitive to crime.

Judges often find their juries returning and asking, "Can we find a verdict of manslaughter"? and when the judges say, "No you cannot," they return with a verdict, "Not guilty."

Capital Punishment Is Not Effective.—Capital punishment is no punishment to the criminal, it is a greater punishment to the innocent members of his family. It is no punishment to break a man's neck. Juries hesitate to convict when they know a man is going to be hanged, and as a consequence only one in seventy-three murderers brought to trial in United States is convicted on first degree murder.

Capital punishment does not deter from crime. It is a fact which can be demonstrated by statistics that where capital punishment flourishes murder likewise flourishes. Crime was on the increase in England until the two hundred odd capital offenses were reduced to two, and the same promptness in convictions in England without the death penalty would prove more efficacious in preserving law and order.

Men who witness and who read of capital punishment become vindictive. The chaplain of Newgate prison says that he "never knew a condemned criminal that had not been at an execution." (Westminster Review, '81: 162). Rev. J. Roberts of Bristol says that out of 180 persons whom he visited after the sentence of death, 164 had attended a public hanging. Those who see the brutality of the death chamber are only made more brutal. Capital punishment often leads to such public sympathy that the hands of justice are thwarted.

Capital punishment is not moral.—The state sets a wrong example to its citizens by punishing its offenders with death. Capital punishment diminishes the sacredness with which we should regard life. It destroys the moral sense of the public. It arouses the worst passions in man. During public executions in England, the gallows were scenes of wild debauch, the public eating, drinking, cheering and railing at the victim. Suicides or deaths of an exciting nature are likely to be followed by others of like nature

There are many who question the right of one man to take another man's life except in self-defense when other means of defense fail. Wendel Phillips says:

> The theory of government, as is universally held, is that a government is a social compact, a voluntary association of individuals, therefor, as an individual has no right to take his own life, he cannot confer on the government the right to take it.

Capital punishment is not justice, for often it endangers the lives of the wrong persons. Many of our criminals are murderers by circumstances; men of wealth are rarely hanged, and often innocent people have been unjustly deprived of their life.

The judgments of judges and juries are not always infallible. The great Lafayette said:

> I shall personally demand the abolishment of punishment by death until I have the infallibility of human judgment demonstrated to me.

There are a few who defend capital punishment from the authority of the Old Testament, but it must be remembered that the Lord set a mark on Cain, the first murderer, and let him go. Moses taught a life for a life.

I must say a few words in reply to my hon. friend from Montcalm (Mr. Lafortune). I do not wish to be rude to him but he is certainly one of the greatest and most successful Crown prosecutors in the province of Quebec if not in the Dominion of Canada. But his trade has diminished considerably as we only had one case of murder in Quebec in 1916 and that was out of his jurisdiction. I would advise him, if we keep on diminishing our murders in Quebec, to make a contract for so much a year instead of so much a head. I was going to say in reply to the hon. member that in comparatively recent years there have been striking instances of the fallibility of the most carefully constituted tribunals. My hon. friend claimed that justice was all right in the province of Quebec especially and all over Canada. He said that if a poor man was accused of a serious crime the court appointed a solicitor to defend him and that he had fair play in every instance. Now, I shall just give you a few instances in which men have been hanged when they were not guilty of the crimes for which they were hanged. In 1865, for instance, an Italian named Pelizzioni was tried before Baron Martin for the murder of a fellow countryman in an affray at Saffron Hill. After an elaborate trial he was found guilty and sentenced to death. In passing sentence, the judge took occasion to make the following remarks which should be remembered when the acumen begotten of "sound legal training" and long experience is relied on as a safeguard against error:

> In my judgment, it is utterly impossible for the jury to have come to any other conclusion. The evidence was about the clearest and most direct that, after a long course of experience in the administration of criminal justice, I have ever known. I am as satisfied as I can be of anything that Gregorio did not inflict this wound and that you were the person who did.

The trial was over. The Home Secretary would most certainly, after the judge's expression of opinion, never have interfered. The date of the execution was fixed. Yet the unhappy prisoner was guiltless of the crime, and it was only through the exertion of a private individual that an innocent man was saved from the gallows. A fellow countryman of his, Mr. Negretti, succeeded in persuading the real culprit—the Gregorio so expressly exculpated by the judge—to come forward and acknowledge the crime. He was subsequently tried for manslaughter and convicted, while Pellizioni received a free pardon.

Again, in 1877, two men named Jackson and Greenwood were tried at the Liverpool Assizes for a serious offense. They were found guilty. The judge expressed approval of the verdict and sentenced them to ten years' penal servitude. Subsequently fresh facts came to light and the men received a free pardon.

Once more, in 1879, Hebron was tried for the murder of a policeman. He was found guilty and sentenced to death. An agitation for a reprieve immediately followed. The sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life. Three years after, the notorious Peace, just before his execution for the murder of Mr. Diason, confessed that he had committed the murder for which Hebron had been sentenced.

Mr. Charles Burleigh Galbraith, writing for Friend's Intelligencer for October 6, says: "Juries and Judges are still fallible."

Maud Ballington Booth, writing under date of September, 1908, gives details of two interesting cases:

> A man was sentenced to life imprisonment and served sixteen and a half years. Most of the evidence had been purely circumstantial and he was convicted mainly on the testimony of one witness. He was saved from the gallows only by the earnest efforts of those who had known of his previous good character. Last winter the woman who had been the main witness against him came to what she believed was her death-bed, and, sending for a priest, confessed that she had committed perjury. The matter was brought to the attention of the Governor, and the man at once liberated. He still lives. The State took sixteen years of his liberty, but did not shed his innocent blood. At present I know a man——who has served nine years and is still in prison, where he has been visited by the boy whom he was supposed to have murdered.

—continues Mrs. Booth,

> The fact that, in our day, justice may thus miscarry, must give men constant pause before they seek remedial vengeance in the death penalty.

Mr. Buttrom, present Attorney General for the Second Judicial District of Tennessee, in talking to me recently, said:

> I am against capital punishment because men are too liable to err. Before I was elected Attorney General, a white man was convicted in my county of murder in the first degree. He pleaded accidental killing. He was a poor fellow, and the court had appointed a lawyer to defend him. I thought at the time the verdict was rendered that the jury had erred. The people were bitter against him and had threatened to lynch him. Some of the jury wanted to hang him outright, but they finally reported mitigating circumstances as a part of their verdict and the judge sentenced the prisoner to life imprisonment. From later developments it became evident that the man was innocent, and for that reason Governor Hooper pardoned him recently.

Capital punishment is a relic of the days when men were forced to tread red-hot ploughshares to prove their innocence. I do not believe in taking a man's life for having committed a crime. That is a barbarous custom, a relic of ancient days. We must be progressive, and more humane toward our fellow-mortals. It seems to me that in a Christian land, with all our boasted Christianity, we should practice such, and abolish this terrible method of punishment. Capital punishment does not prevent crime. We make use of it, yet murders are continually committed. Why not try the other method? When a man's life is taken at the end of a rope, his usefulness is done for. He is of no value to the State, or to society. Why not try my plan? For a good many years we have been trying the plan of the Minister of Justice; that is hang them up. Why not try the other plan for a little while? Why not try it for a year as an experiment? Would Canada suffer if you tried it for a year? Stop hanging for one year and if you stop hanging you will stop most of the murders. I do not know whether the present Parliament will abolish capital punishment; I am afraid not. I hope that if this one fails some future Parliament will do it and it will do it for two very good reasons; first, that it is not necessary as a preventive of murder and, second, because it is an unholy and barbarous crime in itself. Man has no right to take what he has not given —man has no right to say to this man, "Thou shalt die," when God himself has ordained, "Thou shalt not kill." When the Christ of Galilee came to earth it was to preach the kingdom of God upon earth—and it was his wish that man should not slay his fellow-man.

The most powerful case cited by Mr. McConnico was the Durand case, in California. I am not sure whether I have mentioned this Durand case on previous occasions to the Minister of Justice. It was a case in which a young man was hanged for the murder of a young woman. They were both members of a Methodist church, both teachers in the same Sunday school, both singers in the same choir. One day the young lady disappeared. Suspicion immediately fell on the young man. He was arrested, tried and sentenced to death. He delivered a little, short speech—I remember the case well—just before he was sent into eternity. He said to the people there: I am not guilty of this crime; I am going to be hanged for a crime that I did not commit; and I say it before God and man. He lifted his eyes to heaven, and asked the Lord to forgive those who had sworn him to death. Sir, less than twelve months after that young man was sentenced to eternity, the minister of that congregation took sick and confessed that he was the man who had killed that girl. Well, the young man had gone into eternity. Now, I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Minister of Justice, if life imprisonment will serve society just as well, if life imprisonment will protect society as well as the death penalty, then why not let us make the experiment?

I must say a few words in reply to my good friend the member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury). I accused him this afternoon of being one who out-Heroded Herod. But I take that back; I should not have said that. I want to say to him, however, that the state does not kill people merely because they are worthless, and to be rid of them. Insane asylums are built at great expense for the incurable, upon whom relatives cannot bear to look, who personally might be better off dead. The state tenderly cares for all such cases. This is done because the example of kindness and humanity to the unfortunate is of an inestimable benefit to society. It is not possible to imagine the effect society would feel if we were to destroy all imbeciles and the incurably insane. What a horrible example would be set for the people of the state to follow. No calculation could be made of the injury to the morals of the state by countenancing such conduct. One of the greatest advantages to the state from the preservation and tender care and treatment of the hopeless insane is this example of humane treatment and of tender consideration of a human life, however useless and pitiable it may seem. Our citizens are taught to be kind and gentle to the unfortunate by this example of the state. May I ask the people of Canada if they believe any boy—any mother's son, black or white, however depraved—should be hanged, killed just to get rid of him? Can we afford to do it?

Chief Baron Kelly says that from 1802 to 1840 he traced twenty-two men who were wrongly convicted of murder in England, seven of whom were hanged. Mackintosh says that in the same country, taking a long period of time, one innocent man is hanged in every three years.

It may be safely asserted that the thousands who were put to death, at the stake and otherwise, for witchcraft, were not guilty of the crime with which they were charged. Again, there is no way of ascertaining to a certainty the guilt of any one charged with murder. Felonious intent is the essence of crime. The jury must determine, then, in each instance the state of mind of the accused. In many cases this is a difficult task, and in not a few the verdict is a mere guess. A confession of guilt, if voluntary, would seem to be a strong evidence, but by way of illustrating a general rule, it will be remembered that a number of men confessed to the murder of Nathan in New York city, all of whom were innocent. In some cases of acknowledged murder the supposed victim has turned out to be still alive, and in at least one instance interrupted the trial.

Whatever may be the testimony of a witness, it cannot be certain to a demonstration, in most cases, that he is not committing perjury, or is not mistaken.

Of course I am aware that many will disagree with me, for I have never been able to get everybody to see my way and be right in their view, but I am sure that, as men grow more civilized, capital punishment grows less popular, and wholesale murder, in the shape of war, is regarded as the last resort by the civilized nations of the earth, and the time will come when human life will be rightly valued and war shall be no more. If this is not to be the case, Christianity will have proved a failure, to become an effete religion, cast by intelligent humanity upon the religious scrap pile of the ages.

Is it not time to put aside the unwarranted penalty of capital punishment and adopt the more humane and effective punishment by life imprisonment, put beyond the reach of one-man pardon? The capital punishment experiment has proved a failure, so far as its being a remedy for crime is concerned.

No matter how great any man's respect for the Old Testament may be, the most that he can say for the ceremonial and criminal law of the Hebrews is that it was adapted to men in a very crude condition, who were making their first advances in the rudiments of moral and religious truths; that it taught them only as much as they were prepared to receive, with a promise of something better to come after. The clergy admit that the ceremonial law of the Jews is no longer binding. They insist that God's covenant with Noah, in which occurs the verse, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed," is binding for all time and upon all nations. They do not understand that it is repealed, both in the language and the spirit of the New Testament. If they believe as firmly as they pretend that killing the murderer is pleasing to God and a duty sacredly enjoined upon man, they should act as executioners: they certainly should not hesitate to pull the string or cut the rope that sends the soul of a murderer to the answering bar of God.

One word in conclusion, in reply to my good friend, our warrior bold from Peterborough. He does not attempt to out-Nero Nero himself, but he comes a very fair second. Nero killed both his wife and his mother, while our friend would be quite satisfied with hanging his wife—if he had one. It might be well for the marriageable ladies of Peterborough to sit up and take notice. He says positively that if he had a wife he would have no objection whatever to hanging her.

Society has erected the gallows at the end of the lane, instead of the cross, the guide post and direction board at the beginning.

There is a wonderful growth of interest in the question of capital punishment. Students of criminology everywhere are discussing this theme. There are four hundred reform societies in the world pleading, as I do now, to spare human life whenever it is possible. A rising tide of humanitarianism is sweeping all the barbarities of the past before it, and as this matter is to be put before the voters of Canada, it is vitally important that we consider it at this time. In the hope that further study of the matter will be stimulated, I am presenting what is merely an outline of this great problem, and giving a few of the reasons why capital punishment should be abolished in Canada.

The abolition of capital punishment is the inevitable trend of history. While capital punishment may have been necessary in early history, there being no adequate prisons to hold extreme offenders of the common law, states and commonwealths are now rapidly abolishing it. During the last one hundred years there has been a wonderful decrease in the number of crimes punishable by death, because the death penalty was found to be ineffectual in preventing crime. A century ago England imposed the death penalty for two hundred and some odd transgressions of the civil law, but these have been reduced to two—murder and treason. Lord Eldon and Lord Ellenborough predicted chaos if men should not be hanged for petty larceny.

Holland abolished capital punishment in 1870. The statistics show nineteen murders from 1861 to 1870, while from 1870 to 1879 there were only seventeen murders, with an increase of population.

Finland has had no executions since 1824. A judge of the Court of Appeals writes: "The security of persons or property has not been in the least diminished by the abolition of capital punishment."

Switzerland abolished capital punishment in 1874. Later three cantons voted to sustain the death penalty in their jurisdiction. The remaining nineteen still thrive without the death penalty, and murder has not increased.

Other countries and states which have abolished the death penalty are Portugal, Holland, Italy, Norway, Rumania, Tuscany, Costa Rica, Brazil, Ecuador, Guatemala and Venezuela. Denmark has had no hanging since 1890. Belgium none since 1863. Russia has recently abolished it entirely, and in none of these countries has crime increased.

If the Master had not given His thought on this Law of Moses, as found in the sermon on the mount; if he had not set up a standard immeasurably higher, then we might pretend that this Law of Moses for the punishment of murder was a statement for all generations and all forms of civilization. But His teaching is actually as much or more in advance of Moses' Law as that was in advance of the ideas and practices of men when it was given. This Law of Moses is all there is in the Bible which can be pleaded as an exception to the commandment. "Thou shalt not kill." Jesus did enforce this law against killing, but he did not, directly or indirectly, recognize any exception to it. "Thou shalt not kill is more a command than God's covenant with Noah. It is binding on nations as well as on individuals—on the Government and on the Minister of Justice—for there are no exceptions. What right have we to make any?

Thirdly, some accept every expression as they do Chicago canned and labelled goods. They swallow, and think no more.

Fourthly, it is argued that the brutality of crime justifies capital punishment. Yes, some crimes are brutal beyond conception, beyond the reach of the ordinary mind. But to balance brutality against brutality and play the part of the savage is unworthy of a great and humane people.

> Cease not from striving, till our law
> Is clear from bloody stain,
> And reformation, not revenge,
> In principle sustain.

I plead once more with the Government to give me a committee. You give a committee on horse racing; you give a committee on gambling; I ask for a committee to look into a question of life and death. What harm would result from our getting all the information available on this question?

I wish to say a word in deference to the Solicitor General, who treated this matter in a very gentlemanly way. I claimed that he had said that capital punishment had been abolished in some countries and subsequently reinstated. I took exception with the Solicitor General on that point, and it was largely on that ground that the debate was adjourned. I understood him to say that Germany and Austria-Hungary had abolished capital punishment and reinstated it. I have no knowledge of that, but I think that was an error. One thing is certain: Austria-Hungary and Germany are to-day practising it very freely, and I should be sorry if this country were asked to follow the example set by them. I endeavoured to get cables through to those countries in order to prove my assertion, but it was impossible; the censor would not let them through. I did telegraph to Mr. Thomas Mott Osborne, asking him to give me the names of the states in the Union that had abolished capital punishment, and I received the following reply:—

> Capital punishment abolished in following states: Kansas, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, North Dakota, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Tennessee, Washington, Wisconsin, to which Missouri has just been added. Maine forty years ago restored death penalty for six years but convictions for murder diminished so seriously it was again abolished. No other state has returned.

I mention that because the Solicitor General was very courteous in the matter. Neither of us knew whether he was right or wrong—and I am not any surer now, because I was not able to get the cables to the other side.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 44 to incorporate Alliance Nationale.—Mr. Achim.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916, Part VI.—Sir Thomas White.

INSURANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 45, to amend the Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this Bill is almost in the same terms as that introduced by the late Mr. Lancaster a few years ago and in view of the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has a notice on the paper for the introduction of a Bill to amend the Insurance Act, I would ask that this also be allowed to go to the same committee and perhaps the two could be taken up together. This amendment which I ask leave to introduce has reference to companies upon the backs of whose certificates were endorsed certain terms as to the payment, and the rate of payment, of the premiums. It is alleged that one company, which I need not name, have, by arbitrary action, gone outside of the terms and conditions which they have at times made with insurers and it is to place these persons who have been insured in a fair position that this amendment is introduced. The discussion of this matter will be of considerable length and I would ask that it be postponed until the bill is before the committee.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE (Montreal, St. James) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 46, to amend the Bank Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to detain the House just now with any lengthy explanation of the question which underlies the principle of the Bill I desire to introduce, in amendment to the Bank Act. An opportunity for the discussion of this question will occur later on. I may say that this is a most important question to the public at large and I believe there are hundreds of thousands of people in Canada who will be grateful for such legislation. The purport of the measure is to have the rate of interest fixed by statute on saving bank deposits at not less than four per cent. The amendment would read as follows:

Section 92 of the Bank Act, chapter 9 of the Statutes of 1913 is amended by striking out the word "whatever" in the first line of said section and inserting in lieu thereof "not less than four per cent".

My intention is to have an understanding with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) on the subject of this Bill before its second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES.

Mr. DEVLIN:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to propose any legislation at the present session looking towards an increase in the salaries of the civil service, either by way of additional salary or bonus?

2. Has it been brought to the notice of the Government or any member thereof, either officially or otherwise, that the civil service of the United States have had an increase granted them of 10 per cent to all employees receiving $1,800 per annum, or less, and 5 per cent to all receiveing over this amount?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. It is the intention to introduce legislation relating to the salaries of certain of the lower grades of the Inside Civil Service. With respect to the Outside Service, the action which may be taken by the Government will be indicated in the Supplementary Estimates.

ARMAND LAVERGNE.

Mr. PARDEE:

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. Figures up to date are not available, but the total is small.

2. In time of peace, much more in time of war, it is necessary to maintain armed forces within the borders of a country for the maintenace of law and order, and to meet emergencies, the exact nature of which it may not be possible to foresee. In Canada, since August, 1914, this function has been discharged by the considerable bodies of the C.E.F. which have been undergoing training. But with the opening of the great offensive in France has come a change of policy, and it is desirable to be able to send reinforcements overseas as quickly as possible. The presence in Canada of the C.D.F. would enable the military authorities to follow this course, if events should render it desirable. Moreover, it is hoped that many men who enlist in the C.D.F. will later volunteer for service in the C.E.F.

3. It is regarded as inexpedient in the public interest to submit an estimate.

INSPECTOR OF MILITARY BUILDINGS.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Is there a position known as Inspector of Military Buildings?

Sir EDWARD KEMP:

1. No.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

CANADIAN NAVAL AEROPLANE SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. D. REID: The hon. member for Pictou on the 27th April asked me to bring down papers with reference to the work of the naval aeroplane service of the country. The answer furnished to me by the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service is this:

The naval officers state that there are no papers or correspondence in the department with reference to a naval aeroplane service in Canada which could be brought down at the present time, and I concur in the opinion.

THE HIGH PRICE OF FLOUR.

MOTION TO ADJOURN THE HOUSE TO DISCUSS QUESTION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the necessity of taking action to prevent further undue advances in the price of flour in Canada, and to reduce the same to an amount representing the price of wheat received by the farmer, plus the cost of milling and distribution, but eliminating the increase due to stock exchange manipulation.

And leave having been granted,

Mr. KYTE: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the householders of the city of Ottawa on picking up the morning paper this morning were very much disturbed by the information which it contained to the effect that the price of flour, already far too high, had increased $1.20 in the last twenty-four hours. In the market reports of the Ottawa Citizen this morning I find:

Chicago, May 2.—Reports that the German Chancellor had postponed a speech in which he was expected to outline new peace terms, brought about a sensational advance to-day in the wheat market here. After a jump that in some cases amounted to 17 cents, the market closed unsettled at net gains of 4¾ to 12 cents, with May at $2.69.

Winnipeg, May 2.—Once again all records of a wild market have been broken. May wheat advanced 26½c to 31½c from the opening price and fluctuated 33½c during the session, finally closing at the high point of the day, $2.80½. This is the highest closing yet recorded. Bids were made at $2.82 last Saturday before censorship was established and prices dropped.

With regard to the price of flour, I find that in Montreal yesterday it is stated that in sympathy with a record advance for wheat in one day of 33½ cents per bushel, the tone of the flour market was strong and prices for spring wheat grades were marked up $1.20 per barrel, but the trade was quiet.

The Citizen says:

Flour climbed to its highest pinnacle in Ottawa last night, millers marking up the price $1.20 a barrel, making it now $14.50 for first patents.

This sensational rise followed the frenzy in the wheat markets yesterday when wheat closed at $2.69½ a bushel in Chicago, for May delivery, and at $2.80½ in Winnipeg. The steep climbs in the price of wheat are made more remarkable as at both exchanges the openings yesterday morning were comparatively low. The jump at Chicago represents an increase on the day of 14½ cents, while on Winnipeg 'change the day's gain is 30½ cents.

That is to say that the manipulations in the stock market in Winnipeg resulted in increasing the price of wheat by 30½ cents, whereas in the city of Chicago it resulted in an increase of 14½ cents only. The report goes on:

Prices of flour and wheat are now at record "wild" prices. Never in the history of Canada has flour reached such a price. Millers have given up guessing or speculating as to what the next exchange in price will be. Sensation follows sensation. Few looked for a climb of $1.20 a barrel for flour after the drop of 60 cents Tuesday.

"It is all because Von Bethmann-Hollweg didn't make his new peace proposals in the Reichstag yesterday," said a miller last night. "Wheat was still declining when the market opened, and then came the news that the Hun Chancellor's peace speech had been indefinitely postponed. That was the signal for a wild rise in wheat, and we base the price of flour on the current price of wheat. It is impossible to forecast what will happen next. On the first genuine sign of peace from Germany, wheat will come tumbling down and that will mean a corresponding fall in flour.

"Some of the millers," he added, "have provided for all wants during the summer by buying ahead from regular customers to be delivered in the next two or three months. Contrary to expectations, the demand for flour, despite the fantastic prices we are asking, is great, although not so much so as if the price was lower. It is also a fact that there has been the least sign of panic among the public, people accepting the present situation with calmness if not actual indifference."

The increase yesterday in the price of wheat to the amount of $1.20 a barrel was not due to a proportionate increase in the amount of wheat available for the manufacture of flour. You will observe from the stock market notice which I read that this flour has been manufactured from stock which the millers have had for many months, and it is said that they have a sufficient amount of wheat on hand to provide all the flour they will require during the next three or four months. The condition is not brought about, therefore, by excessive demands on the part of the farmers, or, as respects the actual cost of milling their products, by excessive demands on the part of the millers. It was due entirely to the fact that Bethmann-Hollweg did not make his peace speech in the Reichstag yesterday. If the duty is taken off wheat the price of flour to the consumer is immediately increased. If the duty is not taken off wheat still the price of flour to the consumer is increased. If there is a rumour of peace it increases the cost of flour to the consumer, and if there is no rumour of peace the same result obtains. Whatever happens from day to day is taken advantage of by the speculator and by the stock exchange manipulator for the purpose of increasing the price of flour. For several months the condition of affairs with respect to the price of that commodity has been exceedingly alarming. We may discuss in a general way the rise in the price of the other commodities which constitute the daily food of our people, but it cannot be denied that the price of flour is the standard of the cost of living. Every person is a consumer of flour; no matter what the conditions or vocations of our people may be, they must buy flour. The farmer in the province of Nova Scotia who produces potatoes and turnips and dairy products is not a grower of wheat. The farmers in the Maritime Provinces are not usually growers of wheat. When any of our people go to the market for the purpose of purchasing supplies they purchase whatever flour they may need. If a farmer goes to town to purchase a barrel of flour and finds that the price of flour has gone up 50 cents a barrel he naturally concludes that in order to meet that increased price he must add to the price of his potatoes. It is the same with regard to every other commodity that the common people have to sell. Whenever there is an increase in the price of flour there must be a corresponding increase in the price of the other food necessities that are grown in the Maritime Provinces. Nothing that happened yesterday in the city of Winnipeg or anywhere else in Canada justified the increase of $1.20 a barrel in the price of flour except the manipulation of the stock exchange, whose members were betting as to whether or not Von Bethmann-Hollweg would make a peace speech yesterday. Unfortunately, those who bet that he was not going to make the peace speech won, and the consumers of Canada are the poorer to the extent of $1.20 on each barrel of flour that they buy.

I can scarcely imagine that the Government is indifferent to this condition of affairs. Appeals have been made to the Minister of Labour from all over Canada to take action with respect to this very much discussed and very distressing question. But apparently the Minister of Labour does not keep awake long enough to see the wistful faces of the wives and families of the consumers, and he sleeps too soundly to hear their clamours. But in Parliament the people's representatives must speak out again and again until their voices shall be heard. This report from the Ottawa Citizen significantly asserts that there has been no panic among the people; that they are simply determined to meet the conditions, such as they are. That speaks very well for the fortitude and philosophy of the consumers of Canada. They simply draw their belts tighter, set their teeth a little harder, knowing that no relief will come under the present circumstances. They must grin and bear the adversity under which they are suffering until they obtain relief at the ballot box. The Finance Minister intimated on Tuesday last that he is not willing that there shall be a general election in Canada. If he is not willing, then I suggest that he had better take prompt and effective steps to remedy the disadvantages resulting to the consumers of our country by reason of the increased cost of living. I am not, however, going to deal with any other aspect of the question to-day except the subject of flour.

There is apparently no limit to the operations of the manipulators of the stock exchange. Some few months ago, when the price of flour went up to $9.50 a barrel, everybody felt that the worst had come, that under no possible circumstances could it go any higher. Even two weeks ago, when it was learned that there were in the elevators and in the hands of the millers of Canada 81,500,000 bushels of wheat, and that owing to the submarine menace, not one bushel was being exported from Canada to Great Britain, the consumers felt that at all events they would be relieved from any further exactions in the way of increases in the price of flour. But the manipulators knew better than the consumers. All they have to do is to start a wild rumour as to peace or no peace and the result is always the same. The price of flour having risen from $9.60 a few months ago to $11, and from $11 to $13, and from $13 to $14.50, what guarantee have we that we shall not within the next few months be consuming flour costing us $20 a barrel? In fact it has been stated by dealers that it is quite within the realm of possibility that within the next few weeks flour will be selling in Canada at $20 a barrel. This, I say, at a time when the elevators in Canada are stocked with wheat and when we are shipping no wheat whatever to Great Britain.

We are willing to make great sacrifices for the purpose of assisting the Allies, and more particularly of assisting that Ally of which we form a part. When the cry went out from Great Britain that wheat was becoming scarce and that it was likely that the people of Great Britain would be put upon ration allowance, we were all willing that our wheat should go to England to assist in feeding the people there. If our wheat had gone to Great Britain we should probably have been philosophic and patriotic enough to be willing to pay more for our flour, having regard to the purpose for which our wheat was being shipped out of the country. But no such thing has happened. Within the last four, five or six weeks, probably not a bushel of wheat has been shipped out of Canada; nevertheless, we are not relieved. The situation is growing worse and unless drastic measures are taken we shall find ourselves, although we are 3,000 miles from the firing line, suffering all the discomforts and privations that those countries actually within the theatre of war are suffering.

Some few months ago an issue arose in Canada among the publishers as to the unduly enhanced price of newsprint. The demands of the newsdealers were communicated to the Minister of Finance and, to remedy their grievance, he took the proper and, perhaps, the only course that could be taken under the circumstances. He passed an Order in Council authorizing him to take possession of all the newsprint paper in Canada and to fix the price of that commodity to the newspaper publishers. The moment the newsprint manufacturers saw that the Government meant business, they agreed to fix for newsprint a reasonable price which the newspaper publishers accepted, and thus the difficulty was removed. As that has been possible with regard to newsprint, I cannot, for the life of me, understand why the same thing cannot be done with regard to the price of flour.

The Minister of Finance might very properly ask me what remedy I propose. The remedy I propose is a very simple and effective one, and one not without precedent. My proposition is that under the special circumstances existing to-day, and under the assurances that we have that this stock manipulation will continue until the price of flour soars even far beyond its present high altitude, the Government are justified in commandeering all the wheat in Canada that is not actually in the hands of the farmers at present, and having commandeered the wheat, they should ask the millers upon what terms they will mill that wheat and place it on the market. If the millers are not fair and reasonable in their demands, if they will not agree to mill and distribute that wheat at a reasonable price, then it is the duty of the Government to take possession of the flour mills, have that wheat milled into flour and distribute the flour to the consumers throughout the Dominion. I do not think that is an unfair or unreasonable suggestion for the Government to accept. Apparently the Minister of Labour has been wrestling with the problem for the last six or seven months, but no results have accrued from his labours, he having so far found no solution for the difficulty. I would therefore suggest that he cease playing with the question and hand it over to the Minister of Finance. The Government have all the powers necessary to enable them to deal with this matter; and while the course I suggest is a drastic one, it is not any too drastic to deal with the conditions as they are to-day. We have no guarantee that the limit to the price of flour to the consumers in Canada has by any means been reached. The commandeering of wheat will solve the question for the consumers, and it will be a guarantee, at all events, that there is standing between the Canadian consumer and the stock speculator, some person having the authority to deal effectually with the situation.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: If the statement is correct that 47,000,000 bushels of wheat are at the present time held by the farmers of the Northwest, would my hon. friend also commandeer that, and if so, at what price?

Mr. KYTE: I would commandeer it from any person who entertains the same lack of consideration for the Canadian consumer that the stock speculators do. The farmers are the growers of wheat; the stock manipulators are not the growers of wheat, but the latter are exacting this undue profit from and they are imposing this undue privation upon the people of Canada simply and solely to enrich themselves. If the Government will commandeer this wheat and will ask the millers upon what terms they will mill and distribute it, and if a satisfactory agreement is not made with the millers, then the Government have the power to take over the mills, mill the wheat themselves and distribute the flour to the consumers in Canada. That is being done in Great Britain. The Government of Great Britain have taken over the mills, in that way guaranteeing to the British consumers that they will have their flour at the lowest possible price consistent with the conditions existing at the present time. Perhaps I may not have succeeded in impressing upon the Minister of Finance the real gravity of the situation as it exists throughout the Dominion and more particularly as it exists in that part of Canada with which I am most familiar, namely, the Maritime Provinces. I cannot imagine that the Minister of Finance will continue indifferent to the existing situation and I implore him to take immediate and effective steps, not only to prevent any further increase in the price of flour, but to restore the price of flour to that which will be reasonable, having regard to the price which the farmers have received for their wheat. My motion sets forth the necessity of taking action to prevent the undue advance in the price of flour, and the desirability of taking action to prevent further undue advances in the price of flour in Canada and to reduce the same to the amount representing the price of wheat received by the farmers, plus the cost of milling and distributing, but eliminating the increase due to stock exchange manipulation.

I do not think there is any hon. gentleman within the hearing of my voice who will state that that is an unfair or unreasonable demand. All I ask at the present time is that the element of speculation, for which no return is being given, should be eliminated from the price; that the consumer in Canada should be obliged to pay for his flour only that amount which represents the cost of the wheat to the farmer plus the cost of milling and distribution, but no excess profits to any person who contributes nothing to the production of the wheat or flour supply of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the officers of the Statistics Branch of my department have been, from day to day, following very closely the fluctuating prices of wheat and flour and an investigation has been in process in that branch for several weeks past. I noticed the item in the Morning Citizen referred to by my hon. friend (Mr. Kyte) and I may say that I immediately gave instructions to a commissioner in my department who is a very capable man to go at once to Montreal, and he is on his way there now, to look especially into the matter to which my hon. friend refers, viz., the sudden rise in the price of wheat and flour.

Mr. CARVELL: Did your officer find that flour was going up?

Mr. CROTHERS: That is really a very clever question.

Mr. CARVELL: He has been a long time finding it out.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. O'Connor, the gentleman to whom I refer, is on his way to Montreal to see what can be done to remedy the evils which my hon. friend has brought to the attention of the House. I might draw the attention of the House to a movement that we find on the other side of the House, and which is not new. One day hon. members opposite start a movement for the purpose of influencing the farmer to believe that they are very anxious that everything he has to sell will be sold at the very highest possible price, and the next day, they get on foot a movement with a view to influencing the consumer to believe that they are very anxious that he will get flour and bread and every other article of food at a very low price while they are at the same time pursuing an agitation to ensure for the farmer a higher price.

I will first give some figures touching the price of flour at Toronto and other centres.

Hon. gentlemen will see from these figures what a comparatively small quantity of wheat has been exported from Russia since the war. Here are some figures on the world's wheat production in 1913 and 1914. The total production for North America in 1913, which includes the United States, Canada and Mexico, was 1,005,497,000 bushels, and in 1914 1,060,297,000 bushels. The total production for South America in 1913 was 131,490,000 bushels, and in 1914 192,470,000. Without giving the details for each country, I might say that Europe's total production in 1913 was 2,126,370,000 bushels, and in 1914 1,660,173,000; total production in Asia in 1913, 541,024,000 bushels, and in 1914 526,281,000; Africa, 83,190,000 bushels in 1913, and in 1914 57,437,000; Australasia, in 1913, 119,303,000 bushels, and in 1914 30,408,000. The grand total of the world's wheat production in 1913 amounted to 4,006,874,000 bushels, and in 1914 to 3,527,066,000 bushels, which represents a falling off of about 500,000,000 bushels in one year.

In conclusion, this matter will be specially looked into at once by the commissioner, Mr. O'Connor, and the Government will take whatever steps are thought advisable.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I had intended making a few remarks on the high cost of living before the Budget debate closed, but I will take this opportunity and say what I have to say now. The motion of my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) is, to my mind, a very important one, and I think the Government should take immediate steps to tackle this question. It is all very well for the Minister of Labour to tell us that his officers have been following the price of flour in this country for the last three or four years. So have the consumers, and the officers of the Government have done nothing so far as I can see to remedy the evil. But the time will come, I hope, in the not far distant future, when the consumers of this country will be in a position to remedy this evil. In my humble opinion, the efforts of the Government to reduce the high cost of living in this country are a mere farce. Several years ago the Department of Labour appointed a commission to investigate the high cost of living, and, after inquiring into conditions for a year or two, the commission presented a very voluminous report. The only actual bit of information I could find in that report, and I perused it carefully, was that the price of commodities in this country was generally regulated by the demand for them. During the two years this commission was making its inquiries the price of commodities in this country was rising higher and higher. I do not remember this commission ever telling the Government or the people of this country how they were going to reduce the cost of living. Since then commission after commission has been appointed by the Department of Labour to investigate the cause of the increase in the price of the necessaries of life throughout the Dominion. The trouble is, Mr. Speaker, that these commissions, which the people of this country have to pay for, are doing no good. They gather a lot of information which is never acted upon. What will be the result of the visit of the officers of the Department of Labour to Montreal to-day, for example? Will the Department of Labour take some action that will result in the people being able to get flour for less than the present prices? Or will they simply send in reports and allow prices to continue to soar?

Mr. KYTE: What can they learn in Montreal more than in Ottawa?

Mr. CARROLL: I do not see what information they can get in Montreal more than is contained in the Citizen newspaper. I know very well the gentleman whom the Department of Labour has called upon to investigate these matters, Mr. O'Connor. He is a fine man, and a good, sound lawyer. But what has his investigation amounted to? The consumers are not interested in a commission's findings, that in which they are interested is the abnormal increase in the prices of commodities. The Minister of Labour has had an Order in Council passed. I will not deal with that now, as I shall have something to say about it on the Budget. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) has suggested that we keep away from the Minister of Labour, as that hon. gentleman does not want to do anything, and look to the Minister of Finance. I am very much afraid that the Minister of Finance will come to conclusions in this matter that are not very favourable to the interests of the consumers. At Aldershot, to which my mail was sent, I received, among other things, a pamphlet sent out, I presume, by the Minister of Finance. It was a résumé of an address he delivered before some church organization, I think in Montreal. In that address the minister had something to say about the high cost of living. His advice to the people, as I recall it, was that they should tighten their belts. I suppose that that means that when the children get hungry and go to their father asking him to buy them food, it will be his duty to tell them to take the advice of the Minister of Finance. I sent the pamphlet back to my wife and told her to read it carefully, and then if the children got very hungry to get a stronger type of belt, and, if necessary, call in the neighbours to help in pulling those belts tight enough. Unless the Minister of Finance has changed his opinion, I am afraid the hon. member for Richmond will find but little solace in anything that hon. gentleman has to tell him on the subject. But if the hon. minister does anything to keep prices from soaring, he will have my thanks, and, I am sure, the thanks of every other consumer. We talk of "consumers" and "producers," but what is the dividing line? In some parts of the country immense quantities of wheat are grown, but in the Maritime Provinces, as pointed out by the hon. member for Richmond, we do not grow wheat. This, however, is not a case of juggling with names. It is not even a question of the farmers. Take the figures given by the Minister of Labour, showing the prices of wheat and flour, and see how they compare. In 1913, flour was $4.80 a barrel, and wheat was 94 cents a bushel. In July, 1914, flour was $5 a barrel and wheat 90 cents a bushel. In 1915 the price of flour was $6.50 a barrel, and that of wheat $1.29 a bushel. In 1917 flour had risen to $9 a barrel, and wheat was $1.13. In February, 1917, flour was selling at $9 a barrel, and wheat at $1.78.

Mr. EDWARDS: I ask the hon. gentleman's permission to put a question: Would he favour commandeering wheat at present prices?

4 p.m.

Mr. CARROLL: I would be in favour of commandeering wheat that is being held, first, by the farmers, without any real good reason—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CARROLL: My friends on the other side laugh. And I would be in favour of commandeering the enormous quantities of wheat in the grain elevators, which must be held, I think, for the purpose of securing a largely increased price. The millers of this country have sufficient wheat, bought months ago—

Mr. EDWARDS: I am afraid I did not make my question clear to the hon. member. I asked, would he be in favour of commandeering wheat at present prices?

Mr. CARROLL: I do not see why I should. Let me make a distinction. The present price of wheat to the farmers is not the price of wheat that is obtained on the grain exchange in Winnipeg and Chicago.

Mr. EDWARDS: But would the hon. gentleman commandeer wheat at the price to the farmer of the West now?

Mr. CARROLL: I understand the Government have tried that, but—

Mr. EDWARDS: How many bushels of wheat does it take to make a barrel of flour?

Mr. CARROLL: If the hon. gentleman will follow up the figures, given by the Minister of Labour—and I presume he is fairly good at calculations of that kind—he will see that the rise in the price of flour is altogether out of proportion to the rise in the price of wheat.

Mr. EDWARDS: How many bushels of wheat does it take to make a barrel of flour?

Mr. CARROLL: I am not a miller—

Mr. EDWARDS: I can tell the hon. gentleman. It takes five bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour; and on that basis—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: I asked, and thought I had obtained, the permission of the hon. member (Mr. Carroll) to ask a question. I did not ask the permission of the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte).

Mr. CARROLL: I understand that the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) asked a question and that the question was answered. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman asking a question, for that courtesy is always granted. But I understood him to go on and to give some information which I am glad to have, and for which I thank him. It does not matter, however, for the purposes of my argument, how many bushels of wheat it takes to make a barrel of flour. The point is that the rise in the price of flour has been out of all proportion to the rise in the price of wheat.

[Mr. Carroll.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CARROLL: Well, figure it out. In 1915, flour was $6.50 a barrel and wheat $1.29 a bushel. In February last, the price of flour was $9 a barrel, and the price of wheat $1.78 a bushel. But at the present time, the price of flour is not $9, but $14.50.

Mr. BURNHAM: And wheat over $2.80.

Mr. CARROLL: Let hon. gentlemen take time to make a comparison of the figures and they will see that the rise in the price of wheat does not justify the rise in the price of flour.

Mr. CROTHERS: I want to call my hon. friend's attention to the price of wheat and flour. The price of wheat yesterday was $2.82¼ a bushel which will account for the higher price of flour. I think my hon. friend was a little in error in regard to the price of wheat and the price of flour because he quoted the price of wheat in 1913 at 94 cents and of flour at $4.80.

Mr. CARROLL: Those are the figures I got.

Mr. CROTHERS: Then, in February of this year he quoted flour at $9—of course it has risen a good deal since then—and of wheat at $1.78. If he follows out these different percentages he will see that there is about the same relative difference between the price of wheat and the price of flour. He is quite wrong in giving the price of wheat to-day at $1.78.

Mr. CARROLL: I did not give the price of wheat to-day as $1.78, but I gave that as the price on the 4th February, 1917.

Mr. CROTHERS: But did not the hon. gentleman give the price of flour at $14.50?

Mr. CARROLL: No, $9.

Mr. DEVLIN: Are these last figures which have been quoted by the minister obtainable?

Mr. CROTHERS: That is the price yesterday. I have nothing later.

Mr. DEVLIN: Then why did the hon. minister send Mr. O'Connor to Montreal?

Mr. CROTHERS: He will get some information in Montreal that he is not in a position to get here.

Mr. DEVLIN: What information?

Mr. CROTHERS: I cannot tell you what information he is going to get.

Mr. CARROLL: In case Mr. O'Connor does not return from Montreal, I can give the minister some information. Wheat in Winnipeg tops the $3 mark. That is the latest information. It jumped 18 points in less than half an hour this afternoon.

Mr. LALOR: Can the hon. gentleman tell us the price in Chicago to-day? We have free wheat now.

Mr. CARROLL: I am not interested in the price at Chicago. What I am interested in is the price at which the consumers of this country are paying for flour. The hon. gentleman can follow out that proportion. But the strong point after all is that the millers of this country are not paying $2.80, neither are they paying $3, neither are they paying $1.80 for the wheat out of which they are making the flour for which they are charging the consumers $14.50 per barrel. The great bulk of the flour that they are selling to the people at $14.50 a barrel is flour ground from wheat bought in February or last fall at $1.13, $1.59 and $1.78 a bushel. They have in their possession at the present time sufficient wheat, according to their own statistics, to keep them going for the next three or four months. Yet, they are charging the people $14.50 a barrel for flour when the wheat out of which that flour was made cost them fifty per cent less than wheat is costing to-day. The Minister of Finance admitted the other day that the millers had been making more money than any other class of manufacturers. If they have been doing that, is it just and fair that they should be allowed to continue to do so in view of the fact that they are not paying this high price for wheat? Is it fair that they should be allowed to raise the price of flour to the people of this country to a point which will make it almost impossible for the great majority to have flour in their possession at all? Of course, it is most humiliating that we should have had from the Minister of Labour a statement of the large amounts of wheat produced in Russia. He tells us, of course, that the figures from Russia are very interesting. That is something that will be most consoling to the housewives throughout Canada when they complain to their husbands that flour is $14.50 a barrel and that there is a possibility of it going to $20. Somebody will say to them: The Minister of Labour says that the figures with reference to wheat from Russia are very interesting, you must look at the long strings of figures which the Minister of Labour brought down to show that you are not in need of wheat and flour at all and that it is all right to pay $14.50 a barrel for your flour, although labouring men are only making $1.25 or $2 per day. If the labouring classes of this country were getting sufficient pay to enable them to buy these commodities at the present high rates, my voice would not be heard in Parliament to protest against the prevailing prices. But, they are not. There is only one class of labourers who are getting wages somewhat proportionate to what they are paying for the necessaries of life, and those are the people who are working in the munition factories. They are getting good wages.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if the coal miners are not getting largely increased remuneration?

Mr. CARROLL: I am very well versed in what the coal miners are getting. The coal miners got an increase of ten per cent last year, but when it is remembered that many of these men previous to that were earning only $1.75, some $2 and, of course, some $6 and $7 per day, which is all right for those who are getting their coal out by quantity, you will see what a magnificent addition that ten per cent makes to their wages.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is my hon. friend aware that in Halifax to-day bunker coal is sold to supply vessels at $12 per ton which is an extraordinary price?

Mr. CARROLL: I am aware of no such fact. The Minister of Labour is only paying $4.20 and we had a most vehement protest from the Premier of this country less than two months ago that they had offered the Dominion Coal Company and other coal corporations $10 per ton for coal.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I suppose my hon. friend is aware that the cost to the consumer of Nova Scotia's coal has almost doubled since last year?

Mr. CARROLL: I am aware of no such thing.

Mr. DAVIDSON: I am.

Mr. CARROLL: Well, I am not. I am sorry if my hon. friend is being imposed upon by some coal dealer in Nova Scotia because the coal dealers are not getting those prices. The coal companies have not doubled up, have not increased their prices by fifty per cent or forty per cent or twenty-five per cent. If my hon. friend will take the trouble to compare the prices that the Department of Railways and Canals are paying for their coal at the present time with the prices which they paid last year, and the year before, he will see that the amounts I stated are perfectly correct.

I have taken up more time on this subject than I had intended but it is a most serious question. It is a question which should demand the immediate attention of the Ministry of this country. There may be difficulties, there may be troubles, in the way, but we are living in troublesome times. The problem may need an extraordinary remedy but we are living in extraordinary times. I have to plead not only for the general consumer in this country but for the wives and children of the men who have gone to the front. Many of these men were getting very good wages before leaving their homes to fight for King and country. They are getting to-day, I need not tell this House, $1.10 per day, their wives are getting $20 per month separation allowance, if they are privates, and most of them are privates, and they may also be getting a little from the Patriotic Fund which is a God-send in itself. But, at the same time, if for no other reason than the fact that we have thousands and hundreds of thousands of men at the front who have left families, large in number and small in stature, and who are receiving not fifty per cent of the wages that they get in times of peace, this Government should be loyal to these men and see to it that their wives and children should not be left to starve on the mere pittance they are getting and that the millers of this country should not be permitted to impose on them to the extent of a 100 per cent advance in a few months in the price of flour.

Of those who went to the front from the town of Glace Bay, from which I come, I am sorry to say there are 176 on the death roll. That is a large number for a comparatively small town. There are 176 graves on the fields of France of men who enlisted from my town, and a great proportion of these were married men. I know to my sorrow that these women have had a hard time to struggle on, and they will have an equally hard time under the present pension system, which, after all, is fairly good as compared with other pension systems. But I think that the Government of this country should take some steps to see that these people at least, who are all consumers and dependents on this Government, are not further imposed upon by the manipulators, the contractors, and especially the millers of this country, who I think have imposed upon the public at least in their present exorbitant advance in the price of flour.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe): It is rather pitiful to think that the hon. member for South Cape Breton having escaped the dangers of the battalion to which he belonged, which has gone to the front to face bullets, is now face to face with poverty or rather starvation almost, if we are to judge by what he has said.

Mr. CARROLL: Did I understand the hon. member to say that I was face to face with poverty?

Mr. CARVELL: He said that you had escaped the bullets and are now face to face with poverty.

Mr. CARROLL: I did not escape them. I was right in the trenches my friend. I did not attempt to escape them—and I did not go there as a colonel either.

Mr. CARVELL: Take that back, take it back.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I have nothing to take back.

Mr. CARVELL: You ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I congratulate him, if he was at the front and escaped.

Mr. CARVELL: Why don't you take it back like a man?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Of all the gentlemen in the House—

Mr. CARROLL: Perhaps if you have a doubt about it the secretary of the Militia Department will be able to tell you.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: —an hon. gentleman who for years and years strutted around the country in all the feathers of an artillery major or something else, but who when the war broke out is found safely here and not at the front—the last gentleman who should speak on military affairs is the hon. member for Carleton. He is at home where he is safe, while the fighting members of his brigade are at the front.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it is only fair to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) to say that he offered his services to this country, and that the former Minister of Militia declined to accept them.

Mr. CARVELL: I did not intend to bring this matter up, but that offer was put in writing. It is in the hands of the department to-day. It is all marked private but one letter. The very moment that the department or the ex-Minister of Militia will remove the seal of confidence from that, I will be only too happy to give it to the public.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The country has had the proud satisfaction of seeing thousands of brave men from Vancouver to Sydney go to the front who have never written to the Minister of Militia asking if they could go. They went, and that is all they required, and that is all the country required them to do. There was no time on their part to sit down and write confidential letters. They saw their duty and went to it like men, but this gentleman who indulges in letter writing, he is still here and refuses to go.

Mr. CARVELL: My letters are not confidential; the Minister of Militia's are. I will read mine any time I get permission from the Minister of Militia to read his. You had better take back what you said, but if you want to get into a fight of this kind you will get all you want. I have the file upstairs in my desk now.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I do not propose to have any words with the hon. gentleman.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CARVELL: You can have all you want with the member for Carleton at any time you want it, and I want you to take back the nasty insinuation you have made. It is the mark of a coward, nothing else.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I want to remind the House that the question before it is the high price of flour.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: If the honourable and irritable member for Carleton will refrain, I will proceed with my remarks on flour.

Mr. CARVELL: Be gentleman enough to take back your nasty insinuation.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I cannot imagine that I could say anything nasty about that gentleman. He requires something much worse than nasty. The hon. member for Sydney (Mr. Carroll) was a proper party to rise and address the House, as also was the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), for this reason, that I assume they both stand in the same position; they have no farmers in their constituencies who grow grain, and consequently they will not jar with any farmers in their localities or constituencies. The debate is about on the same line as the reciprocity campaign of 1911. Everybody knows what happened in the city of Toronto. There was the Toronto Star newspaper store vending all kinds of product brought from the United States, endeavouring to demonstrate to the people that the stuff imported from the United States could be sold cheaper in Toronto than if it was produced in Ontario. Then, on the side lines, were to be found men like my friend from Oxford trying to demonstrate to the people in Ontario that reciprocity would enhance the prices for the Canadian farmer and the Ontario farmer. Brought face to face, what was the result? In the great province of Ontario, where the right hon. gentleman had sometimes almost broken even, the Liberal party returned only some dozen members from that whole province. They know it. And it was by reason of the fact that they endeavoured to carry on a campaign of humbug and cant and hypocrisy in the province of Ontario. So to-day they stand in that position in this debate. What does the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) say when I ask him if they are prepared to take the 47,000,000 bushels of grain that is held by the farmers of the West and commandeer that, what does he say? There is not a gentleman on the other side of the House who says they will do that to-day Will the member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) go into the barns of the farmers of his county, or any other man who comes from the province of Ontario, and commandeer the grain that is held by the farmers in Ontario? Certainly not; they will not do it. Why? Because the farmer in Ontario and in the rest of this Dominion is having a chance to-day; that is the reason. Compare the price of all kinds of produce with the price of flour. The farmer of Ontario who feeds corn has to pay what price? According to the Toronto figures, American corn is $1.50 a bushel. Is it not time that the farmers should have a chance and an innings while these high prices rule? Take the price of oats. Oats are proportionately higher than wheat; they are 85 cents a bushel. The hon. member comes from the riding of Sydney. He will not say that he is prepared to commandeer the steel down in that country, which to-day is sold at a price 300 per cent higher than it was in 1914. The hon. gentleman would not dare to open his mouth on that question. The farmer is to-day being taxed abnormally for all his implements. Why? On account of the enhanced price of steel.

Mr. CARROLL: I accept that challenge. If the price of ordinary steel is enhanced by the Dominion Iron and Steel Company to the extent of 300 per cent, I will certainly say to the Government: take it and give it to the people of this country, who require it for purposes of war.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: After the applause has subsided, we will recall what the hon. gentleman said. He referred to the price of "ordinary steel," and he would be all the afternoon heckling as to what the price of ordinary steel was. He may be referring to some particular class of steel, but it is a fact that the price of ordinary steel has not increased 300 per cent. Everybody knows that when the war commenced shell steel was selling at about $30 a ton, and it is now $90 a ton.

Mr. KYTE: Is it not a fact that the Munitions Board fixed the price of steel which is used in the manufacture of shells?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I am not aware whether or not that is a fact; therefore I cannot answer the question.

Mr. KYTE: That is a fact. What are you complaining about?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The hon gentleman says that there should be no complaint if the farmer has to pay an enhanced price for his machinery.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. gentleman cannot complain, because the Munitions Board, which represents his own Government, fixed the price.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I hope that the whole of the Opposition will not become irritable; they should try to calm themselves a little bit. The price of flour to-day depends on one point, and that is the world's visible supply. The price may be influenced to a certain extent by speculation, but what can the Government do as to that? The grain exchange at Winnipeg, the only large one in Canada, has been closed. Every farmer in this Dominion is a grain speculator. I know farmers in my county who are holding wheat for the increased price that they think will accrue to them; yet hon. gentlemen endeavour to make the people believe that by a stroke of the pen they could decrease the price of flour. They say that they would do it by fixing the price of wheat and that they would commandeer every bushel of wheat in Canada. I challenge the hon. gentleman to make a straight motion that the Government should at this time commandeer all the wheat in Canada. If the hon. gentleman should do this, you would not fail to observe the celerity with which hon. gentlemen from the province of Ontario on the opposite side of the House move out of the Chamber.

The hon. member for Richmond made one wild statement. He said that all the flour that is to-day being sold at these enhanced prices was manufactured last February. He does not know a thing about it. The mills have all been running ever since, and they have been paying their price for the wheat.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member not know that a miller in Montreal made a statement to the press—to a representative of the Citizen, I think—that the millers had enough wheat to keep their mills going for three months, and that this wheat was bought several months ago?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I suppose that some millers bought in a prospective way, but the millers in Ontario have been buying only in car lots, from one day to another. What would the hon. gentleman do with the grain in the elevators which is not owned by the millers? There are gentlemen in the city of Toronto and in every city who from time to time have millions of bushels of grain in these grain elevators. Would hon. gentlemen commandeer that grain? Not at all. Hon. gentlemen will not dare, before this debate closes, to make a motion that the Government commandeer all the wheat in the country. They want this buncombe to go to the country so that the impression will be created that they are the friends of the people.

The hon. gentleman says that the price of coal has not apparently increased in his riding. Well, that is his assertion, but I have the statement of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that while coal was selling about three years ago at $2.75 a ton, to-day the people of the Maritime Provinces are being held up for $8 and $9 a ton.

Mr. CARROLL: Your first statement is absolutely wrong.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Can hon. gentlemen tell me what the railway companies are paying per ton for coal?

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD: The Minister of Railways has offered $4.25 a ton this year for coal for the Intercolonial railway. and has closed a contract with several companies at that price. If my hon. friend had been here last week he would have heard the Minister of Railways speak in regard to this question. The minister took the position that $4.25 was the ruling price.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman says that the price is now $4.25; formerly it was $2.75.

Mr. MACDONALD: The price last winter was $3.50.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: But in 1914 it was $2.75. The hon. member for Pictou did not tell the whole story. The companies did not sell at $4.25.

Mr. McKENZIE: The difficulty—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am delighted to get such a reception from hon. gentlemen opposite. I was going to say to the hon. gentleman that the difficulty about the price of coal is not so much the price of the article as it is the cost of transportation.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: While hon. gentlemen opposite may not agree with gentlemen on this side as to prices, I can tell the House that in the province of Ontario we know what soft coal is selling at to-day. The price is governed by the enhanced prices in Nova Scotia. Soft coal is 200 per cent more expensive in Ontario than it was in 1914.

Mr. KYTE: As a matter of fact, is it not United States soft coal that is consumed in Ontario?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Yes. I am informed that the Minister of Railways, in his statement the other night, said that while the offer of $4.25, or whatever the amount may have been, was actually made, the companies were utterly unable to deliver the coal, and the contract has fallen through. They were perfectly safe in making the offer, because they knew that they could not deliver.

Mr. MACDONALD: You had better get some more information on that point.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: The House and the country are waiting to see what hon. gentlemen opposite are going to do; whether they are going to make this a matter of discussion or a matter of action. The hon. gentleman this afternoon had a splendid opportunity to move that every bushel of wheat in Canada should be commandeered at a certain price by the Government. If hon. gentlemen are prepared to vote for a motion of that kind, I am prepared to vote against it. But hon. gentlemen are simply indulging in buncombe, as usual, and do not intend taking any action this afternoon.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate to-day, and I should not have done so had it not been for the very unfair method followed by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett) in his remarks concerning myself. There was a time when I should not have expected very much better than this from the member for East Simcoe, but I must say that during the last five or six years he has given considerable evidence of being a gentleman. I am surprised, therefore, at his conduct this afternoon.

It is a fact that I belonged to the Militia of Canada for a number of years down to about seven or eight years before war broke out in 1914. I belonged to the Field Artillery. The time came when I must either take command of my battery or retire, and as I was too busy to take command of the battery, I retired. The facts will be found in the Militia List, and there is no question as to them. At the time of the declaration of war I was 52 years of age, and I was too old to enlist as a private, so I went to the Minister of Militia and offered my services, if they were of any use to him, as an officer, and asked for the right to raise a battery of field artillery. This occurred during the month of August, 1914, about three weeks after the declaration of war. Nothing further came of the matter until the latter part of April, 1915, when the minister started a correspondence with me which was carried on for some time, all the documents except one being marked "confidential." I got a little suspicious that I was not being treated by the minister as though he wanted my services, and therefore I wrote him on the 4th of September, 1915, a letter which is not marked "confidential," which must be in the public files of the Militia Department and which I propose now reading to the House, and when I have done so, I have no further comment to make upon it. The remainder of the file is marked "confidential"; it is in the hands of either the present Minister of Militia or the ex-Minister of Militia, and as they are both alive and on the earth, they can produce the remainder of the correspondence. I have here all the original letters received by me from the minister and copies of the letters written by me to him. This letter was written on the 4th day of September, 1915, being the day when the ex-Minister of Militia returned from his trip to England during that summer:

Woodstock, N.B.,
September 4, 1915.

Major-General Sir Sam Hughes,
Ottawa.

My dear Sir Sam:

I wrote you last re my request to be allowed to recruit a battery of Field Artillery on July 2, and on July 8 received an acknowledgment from Col. Winter, stating that "inquiries were being made regarding my appointment, and as soon as a reply was received, I would be communicated with." I have heard nothing from that date, and nearly two months have now gone by. If anything is to be done, there is no time to lose, especially as I would not want to raise a battery to remain in Canada during the coming winter. If you think well of my proposition, and as I read the times, the Empire needs all the help possible, I trust you will set the machinery in motion at once, and if nothing comes of it, then please let me know and I will know what to do.

Believe me, sincerely yours,
(Sgd.) F. B. Carvell.

The reply to that, also marked "confidential," was received by me on the 10th day of November, 1915, or two months and one week after my letter was written. While I cannot give the contents of the answer, it is needless to say it was not an acceptance of my proposition or I would not be here to-day, because, without casting any reflection upon any other member of this House, I may say that when I made a proposition to raise a battery of Field Artillery I intended to raise it not to leave it in England but to stay with it to the end, and that end probably meant forever so far as I was concerned. I have nothing more to say, but that I am rather sorry that my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett), who has been in this House with me for many years, thought it was his business to refer to a personal matter of this kind; but as he has done so, I believe I am justified in giving this much information to the House.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Had the hon. gentleman kept his seat and not interfered with me I would have let him alone. He will never interfere with me without having me touch him up.

Mr. CARVELL: The law presumes that every man is a gentleman, and there is no presumption that I know of that justifies any man ceasing to be a gentleman, and no provocation ought to be sufficient to any man to make him cease to be a gentleman. All this correspondence is in the hands of my hon. friends opposite and they have the opportunity of giving it to the public at any time they so desire.

While I am on my feet I wish to say a word with reference to the motion of my hon. friend. I do not know why the hon. member for East Simcoe and the Minister of Labour should see such wonderful difficulty in trying to reduce, to a certain extent, the cost of living to the people of this country. We have had all sorts of bugaboos thrown broadcast to the country as to the difficulties, and member after member on the other side has asked members on this side: Would you be willing to commandeer the wheat in the farmers' granaries? Would you be willing to commandeer steel down in Sydney? I want to give an answer in language so explicit that there can be no doubt of my position in the matter. I represent a farming constituency that produces more potatoes than any other constituency in Canada, and what is true of wheat is true of potatoes, because potatoes to-day are just as unreasonable in price as is wheat. Not only would I be willing to see the Government commandeer wheat and potatoes, but I think it is their duty to do so.

Mr. DAVIDSON: At what price would you commandeer potatoes?

Mr. DAVIDSON: How much?

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend from Annapolis thinks that he can draw me away from this question he has got a pretty hard task on his hands. I had some potatoes, and when the price reached $1.75 a bag I sold them, because I was ashamed to keep them any longer, and I think I got more than they were worth, and if my neighbours got that much they did pretty well, too. It is not, however, a question what price I would say. I say, under war conditions, with prices soaring, with many people finding it almost impossible to make a living, it is not a question of how much the farmers could get, or would get; it is a question of the duty of the Government to take these matters up and grapple with them as men would do, from the standpoint of fair prices and fair profits. The British Government did not hesitate to grapple with these questions. Within the last five months we have seen in the Old Country newspapers such statements as: You shall not sell such and such a commodity at more than a certain price. This Government, only two months ago, took that attitude in regard to newsprint; they said to the newsprint manufacturers: You shall not charge beyond a certain price and the newsprint manufacturers submitted. The whole difference is this. The newsprint is sold entirely to the newspapers publishers of Canada, and the newspapers of Canada were in a position so to bombard the Minister of Finance that he was compelled to comply with their request, and when sufficient pressure was put upon him he had no hesitation; there were no lions in the path; there were no constitutional difficulties; he had the War Measures Act and under it he said to the newsprint manufacturers: You must sell this paper at a certain price, or I will make you. Those gentlemen at once complied with the request and are selling the paper to-day at that price. I believe this matter of the price of foodstuffs comes within the Department of Labour, but I have grave doubts of his settling it. At all events, the Government as a whole might say to those in Canada who have wheat or potatoes in store—I do not care whether they are producers or middlemen—you must sell them at a fair price. Down in the Maritime Provinces we are paying forty to forty-five cents a pound for bacon. Why cannot the Government say to the men who have thousands of pounds of bacon stored away in the storage houses: You must sell that bacon at a fair price. Why cannot they say to the men who have meats and food products of all kinds stored away, and who have been gambling with the necessities of the people in order to make exorbitant profits, "You must sell these articles at a fixed price." The thing is all very simple. A great many things have been done in this old world within the last few years that people said could not be done before, and perhaps a great many things which would not have been thought justifiable before. But to-day this old world is at war, and thousands of people in Canada are barely able to keep body and soul together. There are women and children in this country who have not tasted meat for a fortnight, and that is true of all our cities and towns. They have not the means with which to buy meat or potatoes. In view of these conditions, why should not the Government interfere? If the Government have not the nerve to interfere, why do they not make way for men who would?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Where are they?

Mr. CARVELL: The people will show you where they are. There are a great many people in Canada, both inside and outside of Parliament, that could show this Government what they would do, and it will not be very long probably, before they will have an opportunity. I am not here to prescribe a remedy; we are discussing principles. My hon. friend from Simcoe challenges some one on this side of the House to draw up a Bill. But we are not drawing up Bills to-day; we are simply asking the Government to adopt certain measures. We are saying that the time has arrived when it is the duty of the Government to see that the common people of this country get the necessities of life at a reasonable price. There need be no trouble about providing machinery, as ample power is given under the War Measures Act to do all that is necessary. The Government can take over the Ross Rifle factory, they can fix the price of paper, and put wheat on the free list. There is nothing they cannot do, and they can just as easily regulate the price of commodities. It is not merely within the power of the Government to do this, but I maintain that it is their bounden duty at once to take steps to reduce the terribly high cost of living under which the people of this country are groaning to-day.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but the subject under consideration is an exceedingly important one, and it seems to me just as well that the opportunity has been afforded of discussing here to-day not only the high price of flour, but the high cost of living generally. We are living in most serious times, the most serious in our history, and I believe in the history of the world. I do not suppose that at any time in human history has there been so much dislocation of commerce as at present. There has never been a time of such profound change; never a time in which there has been so much human suffering in the world and so much anxiety, or when public opinion was so sensitive, and subjected to such severe strain as to-day. This is a time when governments charged with the responsibility of carrying on the affairs of a country are the subject of much criticism. It is proper that governments should be subjected to fair criticism, but I believe it to be the duty of the opposition in any House such as this, to approach a question such as is now under consideration, judicially, fairly, and in a statesmanlike manner, and not with the object of making political capital out of it at a time like this. I propose, therefore, to discuss this question somewhat at length, as it is a question that should be discussed, and discussed fairly. If the Government is at fault with regard to the high cost of living, I want to know it, and in what respect, and if it can be shown that we are at fault we shall endeavour to the best of our ability to rectify what may be wrong. We are not seeking and never have sought to evade responsibility for our conduct of the war, and so far as our conduct of these affairs in every respect is concerned, I say there is absolutely no room whatever for national self-depreciation.

With these preliminary remarks, I address myself to the subject which has been drawn to the attention of the House by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), namely, the rising price of flour. The Minister of Labour has stated that the rise of $1.20 per barrel yesterday attracted his attention, as it did the attention of every one in this House, and he has taken the steps which it devolved upon him to take, of setting immediately upon foot an inquiry to ascertain the reason for that rise, and whether it was justified.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why did he not start the inquiry long ago?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will tell my hon. friend before I get through what has caused the increase in the price of flour. The hon. member for Richmond, the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), and the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell), have not approached this subject with the desire of ascertaining and laying before this country the reasons for the increase in the price of flour, but have rather sought to create the impression that the Government had control of the price of commodities in this country—

Mr. CARVELL: Could not control them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE—and was at fault for not having reduced the cost of living. In addressing myself to the subject I intend to inquire first, what is the cause of the high cost of living, and what is it that determines prices? When we have elucidated that, we can deal with the question under consideration, and ascertain whether or not any blame or censure properly attaches to this Government. The only suggestion put forward of a practical nature by the hon. member for Richmond was this, and it is not often that we get a suggestion from him that even savours of the practical; he is strong on criticism, but not strong on constructive suggestion.

Mr. KYTE: He gets a royal commission once in a while, though.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: And he fails on that.

Mr. KYTE: And the Finance Minister is short of a colleague as a result of it.

Mr. CARVELL: We will discuss that with you some day.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that the Minister of Finance has the floor, and except with his permission no hon. member should interrupt him.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member for Richmond put forward the suggestion, and I submit it to the common sense of this House—I put it on no different ground from that—that there are 90,000,000 bushels of wheat in Canada, that we should commandeer that wheat, pay the price, take possession of the mills, mill the wheat and distribute it to the public, thereby reducing the price of flour. I think, myself, that there are 100,000,000 bushels of wheat in this country. Let us see where the suggestion of my hon. friend leads. He lightly puts forward the suggestion that we should purchase 100,000,000 bushels of wheat at $3 a bushel.

Mr. KYTE: I did not say that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Does my hon. friend say $2.50 a bushel?

Mr. KYTE: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: $1.75?

Mr. KYTE: I said nothing of the kind.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Would my hon. friend force the farmers of this country to sell their wheat, which has been quoted at from $2.75 to $3 a bushel, at $1.50 a bushel?

Mr. KYTE: What did the Minister of Trade and Commerce offer when he proposed to commandeer the wheat a year ago last fall?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will ask my hon. friend—no, I will not ask him, because I never get a direct reply. My hon. friend dare not suggest that we pay the farmers $1.50 or $2 per bushel for wheat that is quoted at $2.75 or $3 a bushel. Let us see where his suggestion leads. He would commandeer all the wheat in Canada. He puts forward that suggestion right manfully. Now, to buy 100,000,000 bushels at $3 a bushel we should have to raise $300,000,000; at $2.50 a bushel we should have to raise $250,000,000, and at $2 a bushel we should have to raise $200,000,000. The hon. gentleman talks as if all you had to do was to touch a button to raise $200,000,000 or $250,000,000 or $300,000,000, and buy all the wheat in Canada. But let us suppose it done. Where are we when we have done that? The hon. gentleman did not pause to inquire how many bushels of wheat make a barrel of flour. Well, it takes a little less than four and a half bushels. He would commandeer wheat at $2.80 or $3 a bushel. Four and a half times $3 would be $13.50; so that the wheat alone would cost as much as the flour costs to-day. That is the beautiful suggestion he puts forward for the serious consideration of this House. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more on that head; the members of this House are too intelligent—when they get away from politics—not to know that flour has gone up in price because wheat has gone up in price. And why have the prices of wheat and of every other commodity in Canada gone up—yes, every other commodity in the world? I propose to tell the House why, in my opinion, prices have gone up. Unless we take account of what has happened in the world, we shall not be able to discuss this question intelligently.

The world to-day is at war. Twenty-five millions of men are under arms, taken from industries of all kinds and now devoting their energies to mutual slaughter. The first effect of that is to cause a shortage of labour, and the effect of that in turn is an increase in wages—an increase not only in those countries that are at war but in every country. This results in an increase in the price of every commodity which is produced by labour, that is, every commodity in the world, including, of course, agricultural products. More than that, the cost of capital—interest—has gone up. And interest is a factor in price. Interest has gone up because the great governments of the world are pouring out floods of securities in order to raise money to carry on the war. They have taken possession of the market. In Great Britain industrial concerns are not allowed, except under special circumstances, to raise money by the sale of securities. Securities that used to be sold on a two and a half per cent basis are now sold on a five, six and seven per cent basis, and in the case of some foreign governments, their securities are sold on the basis of eight and nine per cent. This is another cause of increase in the cost of production. Again, the withdrawal of these millions of men from the fields prevents cultivation of the soil from being carried on upon anything like the scale on which it was carried on before the war. Not only is cultivation not so extensive, but it is not so efficient as it was. And a great deal of territory formerly under cultivation is ravaged by war and is not under cultivation to-day. All this affects supply—and demand and supply regulate prices. Another important feature in relation to supply is the shortage of tonnage. The world's transportation system is dislocated. The whole food supply of Australia is shut up by reason of the submarine menace and the shortage of shipping. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) had the temerity to criticise the Minister of Labour because prices were lower in Australia than in Canada. What is the reason for that difference? Australia is four times as far from Great Britain as Canada is, and freights and insurance are greatly increased. Then there is the shortage of tonnage. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Webster), who made one of the best speeches I ever heard in this House, pointed out that New Zealand had 400,000 boxes of cheese, and, as I recollect it, 3,500,000 carcases of mutton for which she could not get transportation. What must be the effect upon local prices? Of course, local prices must be lower than in England, or Canada, or the United States.

Now, there is one point I wish to make, and to make it clearly. You cannot compare this country with England. This is an exporting country, like the United States. We raise wheat and other farm products for export. My hon. friend points out what they have done in England, in taking possession of supplies. But England is in an entirely different position from ourselves, for it is an importing country.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about the United States?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no time to stop now, but I will come to that a little later.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why not—

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Will the hon. member be patient? He is the most impatient member in the House, in many ways.

Mr. MACDONALD: But I notice the hon. minister does not answer my question.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is because the hon. member asks questions that should not be answered.

Mr. MACDONALD: Leaving aside personalities, will the hon. minister allow me a question? Will he distinguish between the United States and Canada, and tell us whether, in the United States, they have passed legislation giving their government power which this Government has not taken?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that. I usually finish up a question before I get through, I believe, and I will try to do that on this occasion. I have shown that the food supply of the world has been greatly diminished by reason of conditions arising out of the war. I failed to mention that the supplies of Russian wheat have not reached their usual market by reason of the closing of the Dardanelles. So much, for the side of supply.

Now, what about demand? While supply has fallen off, demand has increased. Why? One reason is that the armies in this war are better fed than armies ever were before in the history of the world. There are thousands, if not millions, of men, especially in the continental armies, who are better fed to-day than they have ever been fed in their lives before—many of those that were engaged in industrial life are very much better fed. Consequently, the demand for food for these armies is very great. In addition, the high wages paid to workers in munitions and other industries mean that the people have money to spend. Besides that, there is less unemployment in the world than ever before in the lifetime of any man in this House. And the people, having good wages, spend more for food than they did before. The hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell) talks of the "misery" in this country at the present time. There never was a time in our history when there was less unemployment and less distress than there is at this moment. I give my word that since this war broke out—or, at least since a few months after its outbreak, because there was a complete dislocation of business in the early days of the war—it has never been suggested to me in my public position that there was any real distress.

Mr. CARVELL: The hon. minister ought to go to some of our towns and cities and learn the conditions of some of the people—

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The hon. member (Mr. Carvell) poses here as the tribune of the common people. I have as much sympathy with the common people as he has—I ought to, because I am one of them myself. They are the best people in the world, and that is the reason why the Lord made so many of them. As I was saying: there is greater demand from the armies and greater demand from the European centres of population where the people are earning higher wages than before. This is another reason besides the shortage of supply, why the cost of commodities has risen. It is a world condition. Now, I am not speaking about combines. If there are combines and monopolies to enhance prices, that is an entirely different matter, and is to be considered by itself; I am speaking of the ordinary conditions under which the farmers of this country work.

Prices are determined by the laws of supply and demand, by world laws which it is within the power of no Government to wholly control. Great Britain herself tried to do it in regard to sugar at the outbreak of the war and signally failed. The British Government's effort to deal with the sugar question was a failure. The hon. member for Richmond says that it is due to wheat manipulation. There is an element of truth in that but it is not nearly so great as my hon. friend suggests. Another hon. gentleman—I think my hon. friend from Carleton or some other hon. gentleman opposite said: Never mind Chicago; do not bother about Chicago.

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I accept the disclaimer of my hon. friend from Carleton. But how can you absolutely ignore market conditions for wheat in Chicago and Minneapolis when you are dealing with the prices in Canada? There is an approximation between the prices at Winnipeg and Chicago. It is true, there may be a corner or something of that kind at one place or the other but the condition created in that way is only temporary. Suppose you undertook to fix the price in Canada? Suppose you said that you would not allow a higher price in Canada than $1.50 a bushel at a time when you are appealing to the western farmer to raise more grain? Here is a point I desire to make: Things tend in this world to cure themselves. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who is one of the best economists in this House, would, I think, agree with me in saying that if you have a high price for anything the tendency is for industry and capital to flow into that particular industry and to remedy the situation. If farming is profitable, farming will be prosecuted. My own opinion is that the prevailing high prices are more than likely to be ameliorated by the farmer feeling that he is getting a fair price for his labour than they would be if we were to step in and say: No, you must take an artificial price. Suppose you fixed a price for wheat in this country lower than it is in the United States, would the farmer in the West sow his grain this spring for the harvest next fall? Would he not rather say: I will go to some place where I can get the world price for my wheat? Would he not say: I will go across the line and engage in farming.

I am indicating some of the difficulties in dealing with this question. It seems to be a very simple question for hon. gentlemen opposite. Do hon. gentlemen opposite say: Take away from the farmer the world price, cut it in half? The farmer might very well say: Why should I be put in such a position of disadvantage in an exporting country? I doubt very much if hon. gentlemen opposite would suggest that the farmer should be deprived of the fair world's price for his product. The hon. member from Brockville (Mr. Webster) showed the House conclusively the other night that the cost to the farmer for labour and for the commodities which he uses has greatly increased. We cannot therefore say to the farmer: You must take the price that you get in ordinary and normal times, notwithstanding the fact that your cost has increased. I do not believe there is an hon. gentleman opposite who would dare get up and say that to the farming community and I think it would be a most unwise course for the Government to pursue.

Mr. TURRIFF: If that is the case, will the minister explain why this Government, within the last five or six weeks, tried to buy the whole of the western crop at $1.30 a bushel at Fort William when it was quoted 30 cents higher at Chicago?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is wrong in his facts; this Government did not attempt to buy the wheat crop of this country at all. More than that my hon. friend from Assiniboia knows this just as well as I do. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) passed on an offer from the Imperial Government, not from this Government, in respect to the western wheat crop. It has been stated that the Government might reduce the high cost of living by some action it might take. It is very easy for hon. gentlemen to get up and say: Reduce the cost of living. Where are you going to start? You start with the farmer and the farmer will say to you: I work long and I work hard, I rise early and I retire late, my costs have gone up all along the line, I am not in any combine, I want my fair price and I submit that my profits are not abnormal. That is what the farmer says.

Mr. CARVELL: Do you think that the farmer who is selling potatoes at $8 a barrel or $4 a bag is getting a fair price?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not know what kind of farmers my hon. friend has in his district, but I have no doubt there are a lot of honest men there. I will say that I have never known the farmers of this or any other community to obtain profits to which they thought they were not reasonably entitled because I know how hard they work. I have worked on a farm and I have worked in an office. I have heard people talk about the heavy responsibility that men have in offices but I take notice that an hon. gentleman like my hon. friend from Carleton, and myself, and the rest of us, would very much rather have the responsibility, with six hours a day in an office, than get up at five o'clock in the morning and finish at eight o'clock with the very slender profits derived by the farmer. It is all right enough for hon. gentlemen opposite to attack the farmers but while I am just as much interested as any body in reducing the high cost of living I maintain that the farmers of this country are entitled to a fair deal.

My hon. friend asked: What about the millers? And he spoke about the large profits of the millers. I would like to point out to my hon. friend that the Government have not been unmindful of its duties regarding the millers. Of all the profits that the millers make, and they have been pretty large in the last two or three years, the Government steps in and takes a large portion by virtue of the business profits war tax. I will point to another thing, and I do so because after all we should deal with these matters fairly and try to reach a sound conclusion. The profits of a particular industry may be large, but they may bear a very small relationship to, indeed, they may be only a fraction of one per cent of, the volume of business transacted. I should not be at all surprised if all the profits derived by the millers of this country would be a very small percentage indeed of the increase of the price which has taken place in regard to flour. If I were arguing this with the idea only of political expediency, it is possible that I would not say this, but I think it is desirable that in this House we should ascertain the truth. What is the fact? If my hon. friend would distribute all the profits made by the milling companies in Canada over the cost of living in Canada, they would represent an exceedingly small percentage indeed. I am not in sympathy with these large profits at all. I like to see men make fair profits, but it must be borne in mind that traders, keen traders, capable men, even under world conditions, that are not subject to control by combines, make large profits.

As long as there are no combines, as long as there is no monopoly, as a general thing you do more harm than good when you interfere. But what a Government could do and what this Government has done is to say to people who make enormous profits in war time: Gentlemen, we are going to take away from you a very substantial portion of those excess profits for the prosecution of the war. Hon. gentlemen have charged the Government with not reducing the cost of living. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), I know, has used his best endeavours in this most difficult matter. We have accomplished something. It is not possible for any Government to accomplish very much with respect to the reduction of the cost of living. At all events, I have never seen a practical suggestion put forward, apart from that one question: Is there a monopoly, is there a trust, is there a combine? If you have a monopoly, a combine, a trust, then something can be done by a Government in order to take away the undue advantage which a trust or combine or monopoly possesses. But, generally speaking, outside of that, the laws of supply and demand govern. Let us see what the situation is in regard to the United States, a question raised by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). What is our position? Here we have a boundary line of 3,600 miles from east to west, with their products flowing over to us and ours flowing over to them. Can you fix the price of wheat in Canada without the price being fixed in the United States also? Does my hon. friend think that if you fixed the price of wheat at Winnipeg at $1.25 a bushel it would at once affect Chicago to the same extent? It would mean that the business of Canada would be done in Chicago.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the hon. minister aware that a Bill has been introduced in the Congress of the United States providing for the fixing of minimum and maximum prices of all food products? There is no reason why this Government, under its War Measures Act, could not do that, and why Sir George Foster should not arrange about this question while he is in Washington.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I would like to give my hon. friend the advice which I think Sarey Gamp gave. She said: Do not proticipate. She meant, do not anticipate. My hon. friend has referred, as if he had a monopoly of the knowledge, to the fact that some legislation is being proposed in the United States to fix maximum and minimum prices. We read the newspapers on this side, just as my hon. friend does. The legislation, I believe, has been introduced. My hon. friend may be surprised to learn that one of the subjects being discussed at the conference at Washington by Sir George Foster, whom he criticises, is this very question.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then he is doing something, although you said he could not do anything.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD: He asked me a question.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With the exportable surplus of food products in this country to-day being bought practically by the British Commission, for Great Britain and the Allies, it is almost impossible, if not impossible, to deal with a situation on one side of the line unless it is dealt with also on the other side of the line.

Mr. CARVELL: That is coming pretty near to trucking and trading.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend seems to be sore on that point. He does not—

Mr. CARVELL: I admire the volte-face of my hon. friends on that subject.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must say that it does not make for decorum of debate when hon. members insist on interrupting from their seats. If they wish to ask questions, they should at least rise.

Mr. CARVELL: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: So that the question of the fixation of prices for food products in this country must depend to some extent at least, and I think to a considerable extent, upon common action being taken on both sides of the line. Upon the question whether that will be advisable or not, I pronounce no opinion, for this reason, that it is so full of difficulty; but I do know this, that it is one of the questions at present under consideration at Washington in a conference in which Canada is represented in the person of the Right Hon. Sir George Foster.

There is another matter. It is an extraordinary thing to have a debate on a subject like this taking place without hearing diatribes against the tariff. Strangely enough we have not heard anything from the other side about the tariff. The price of flour has been going up. But we took all the duty off flour, not only with regard to the United States. Flour comes into Canada free from all over the world. We made it free to Australia, free to Great Britain, free to any country in the world, as well as to the United States. And yet the price of flour has been going up.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This is politics.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No, it is not politics. I will tell you what was politics, the suggestion that this Government is blamable for the manipulation by speculators on the Chicago and the Winnipeg exchanges was politics; and if it was not politics, I will tell you what else it was not, it was not sense. I would like to make one more observation about the Winnipeg situation. The committee of the Winnipeg Exchange took steps a short time ago to prevent the speculation to which my hon friend refers; I tell him now that so far as Winnipeg is concerned, I have reason to believe that these price fluctuations are not due to manipulation in the sense he puts forward to-day. I will tell him to what they are due, because some of us go into these questions more deeply than the hon. member for Richmond. The principal buying in Winnipeg and even on the other side of the line is on behalf of the British Commission, and what I think is that the export buying of these contract grades has about exhausted the available amount, and the result is that others who have contracted for wheat are working on a much narrower margin than before. And I will tell my hon. friend another thing, that if we commandeered all the wheat in this country, most of the wheat we would commandeer in the West would be wheat that is owned by the British Government and bought by the British Government for the purposes of the people of Great Britain. That is the wheat he wants us to take away from them.

My hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) does not realize, when he approaches a world question like this, that it cannot be dealt with so flippantly as to say: Why does not the Government reduce the price from $3 to $1.25? That is the unfair feature of charges brought by hon. gentlemen opposite against this Government, especially in a time like this. We all realize that this is a serious question, the question of the high price of flour, the high cost of living generally. We all realize that, but the world is out of joint. The world is upside down. And the unfairness of it is aggravated by the fact that, the country being at war, the public mind is under a great strain and speeches such as we have heard, unless the facts are presented at the same time, are apt to disturb the public mind and to create a most erroneous, a most unfair impression as to the Government and its powers over the price of commodities.

It was only for the purpose of clearing up the situation and indicating the conditions which underlie world prices, that I have risen to my feet. In a way, I am glad that it has come up, not only because we are able to meet the charges of the members for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) and Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Carvell) but also in order that this discussion may to some extent inform the people as to the conditions which have brought about these high prices, from which we all suffer, but over which even governments have comparatively limited powers of control.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) was more interested in making a defence of the Government against real and imaginary criticisms than he was to deal with the critical situation now confronting the people of Canada and, indeed, most of the countries of the world. I am sure that the House is grateful to the member for Richmond (Mr. G. W. Kyte) for having introduced by his resolution a subject which, as the Minister of Finance says, is exceedingly grave. Hon. gentlemen in this House should be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity—indeed, should be glad that the hon. member for Richmond has presented the opportunity to them,—of discussing a problem which is serious, which is world-wide, and which will be a grave question for several years to come.

The Minister of Finance complains that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have interjected a political tinge into the debate. I deny that most emphatically. I heard the remarks of the hon. member for Richmond, the member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) and the member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) and I am within the judgment of the House when I say that every fact presented by these hon. gentlemen was relevant to the resolution. Who interjected politics into this debate? Did not hon. gentlemen on the other side interject small politics, personalities and irrelevant issues into the discussion of a matter that is of paramount importance to the people whom we represent?

I agree with the Minister of Finance when he says that this is a very serious question and that we should discuss it in a serious way, in the hope that some light may be thrown upon the problem and that some advantage may accrue as a result of our deliberations. What I complain of respecting the Government and hon. gentlemen opposite is that while they admit the existence of the problem, they do not give evidence of any effort to procure a solution. The Minister of Labour read us a great array of figures which were known, in a general way, to every member of this House and to everybody in the country. The figures may be interesting, but only in an academic sense, whereas the cost of the necessaries of life is a practical question. The Minister of Labour produced figures showing that the world's production of wheat was much less than that of one or two year's ago. Well, that was a mathematical proof of one of the causes of the problem confronting the country. He ended his speech, however, without proffering any suggestion or telling us what his department was doing in the premises. In fact, he displayed no interest whatever in that question. He informed us that an officer of his department was sent to Montreal this afternoon. What has that to do with the question? Of what possible interest can the departure of that official from this city be to this House? It would be just as interesting had he informed us of his having dispatched that officer of his department on an aeroplane flight three or four miles above this city. This is the theatre of action for the Department of Labour; here is where the minister and his officers should work. The dispatch of his official to Montreal, while stated in very serious fashion by the minister, cannot but be regarded as a deliberate evasion of a serious question.

I should like to emphasize what the Minister of Finance said this afternoon, that a very serious problem confronts us. If the Government would sincerely view it in that aspect, they would endeavour to do something to meet the situation. It may be difficult to secure from people generally the interest which this subject justifies, because we are blinded by an artificial prosperity, and our perspective is out of focus. Nevertheless, the problem before us, while recognized as acute at the present time, is well known to be a problem which will stay with us for many years. As the Minister of Finance has properly remarked, the labour of 25,000,000 people has been transferred from productive spheres into war fields. That condition necessarily involves a dislocation of the economics of the world, and imposes serious responsibilities upon us charged with the administration of public affairs.

In some countries the seriousness of prevailing conditions is realized. In England the seriousness of the situation in Great Britain was recently impressed upon the public by Lord Davenport, who, I think, is Controller of Foodstuffs. They are even contemplating the destruction of dogs and the rationing of horses; the 24th day of this month is being set aside for the making of a nation-wide appeal against waste. These things all indicate serious thought on the part of the people in that country. So important do they regard the shortage of wheat and the high price of flour that they are seriously considering the abandonment of meatless days, which are causing a greater strain to be made upon the bread supply. Take the United States; are they not exhibiting a more intelligent and active interest in this question than we are, although, perhaps, there is less reason for their doing so than we of Canada? An investigation is now being conducted before the United States Trade Commission, assisted by the Department of Agriculture. Forty states of the American Union are represented in that convention. They recognize the seriousness of conditions there; there has been a failure of the winter wheat crop.

There has also been a failure of the winter crop in Canada. The weather prevailing in the past few days is regarded as a very serious matter by wheat growers in this country, and if the unfavourable weather conditions of the past week continue, the result may be very serious. These unfavourable weather conditions seem to be recognized more keenly and acutely in all other parts of the world than they are in Canada. The question of the shortage of flour and the high price of bread is very serious; it is a more serious one for the industrial classes than for the well-to-do classes, who can substitute other foodstuffs for bread, but bread is the staple foodstuff of the industrial classes and it is necessary that they have sufficient bread to maintain industrial efficiency. The high price of foodstuffs affects the whole social and economic fabric of this and all countries. It aggravates social unrest; it intensifies the labour difficulties of the country. The Minister of Finance asks what can be done; he proclaims to us that the Government are willing to do anything if the way is pointed out to them. Many things might be done and should have been done long ago, aye, even years ago. Desperate diseases require desperate remedies. We all know, as does the Minister of Finance, the general conditions that in normal times affect the prices of all commodities. There are the causes of demand and supply, transportation, waste, extravagance, the cost of high living and other things. These are well known to the world. There is available to every one who chooses to read it a wealth of literature which will give him in all amplitude the general reasons and causes for high prices of foodstuffs in normal times. But we are not living in normal times, and in order to meet the conditions, measures, which in ordinary times might be considered quite radical, must be taken. That is the only way in which we can meet the situation with success. Everything that is uneconomical and unlawful should be prevented by law, and we should not hesitate to take action. Anything that tends to the withdrawal of products from the markets of the country is in some degree preventable. There is nothing wrong in our endeavouring to control by license or by some other method every one who is engaged in the manufacture, transportation, sales, storage or distribution of food. This cannot be done effectually by any one formula, but there is surely some remedy available to the Government if they chose to study the situation carefully and were fully seized of the seriousness of it, and if they really desired to ameliorate conditions. Under certain circumstances the Government would be fully justified by the people of this country in fixing prices; there would be no objection to the Government taking absolutely under their control the flour mills of this country. What possible objection could there be to that in all the circumstances prevailing to-day? Would there be any objection to the Government taking control in certain localities of our railway systems, so as to effect a more direct and effective control over transportation and rates? There is no limit to what the Government might not attempt to do if it were fully seized of the seriousness of conditions. I have followed very carefully what the Government have done during the past two or three years with respect to these matters, and I say emphatically, seriously and honestly that there has not come to my notice any single effort in this direction on their part, which I consider indicates a lively and intelligent interest therein. I do not think the Department of Agriculture has been alive to the situation in this country since the beginning of the war; it has carried on no propaganda throughout the Dominion in regard to the matter of production. We have had the Minister of Finance and a few other hon. members during Parliament intermittently stating: We want production and more production, but that does not mean anything; that does not produce results. We can produce results by propaganda, but it must be properly organized; it must be energetically and intelligently carried on, not spasmodically and in restricted localities, it must be nation-wide and carried on persistently, and systematically from one end of the country to the other. No man will say in this House that the efforts made by the Department of Labour in this connection have been intelligent or serious. I do not like to say of any public administrator that his work lacks sincerity, but one is compelled to use that expression in regard to the work of the Department of Labour in respect to this matter. The Minister of Finance gave to the House this afternoon the general and fundamental reasons for the high price of commodities, and in a general way he was correct. But why did he not tell that to the Minister of Labour a year or more ago? Why did he go to the expense of appointing commissions which never investigate and which never will report—and it is just as well they do not report, as their reports at this late date would be absolutely useless, because conditions change so rapidly these days that one can hardly predicate upon existing facts an opinion to-day that would be worth anything to-morrow. The Department of Labour should be active—and the country expects it to be active—upon this question. The Minister of Finance complains that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) charged the Government with stock manipulations in the wheat market. I deny that. I think that was rather an unjust, an incorrect imputation against the hon. member, and I certainly did not understand him to say that to-day.

Mr. KYTE: Had I known that the Minister of Finance had intimated that I made any such statement, I should have denied it on the spot. I did not understand him to impute that to me.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What is the statement that the hon. member for Halifax has made? Let me answer it in anticipation by saying that if he gathered the impression that I said that the hon. member for Richmond had charged us with manipulations of the stock market, he is quite in error, but he did charge us with being responsible for permitting them to continue—which is a very different thing.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I accept the explanation of the Minister of Finance. Nevertheless, he did seek in some form or another to leave the impression on this House that for political purposes, and he emphasized "political purposes," the hon. member for Richmond in speaking to his resolution, connected the Administration with wheat market speculations. The Minister of Finance says it is unfair to charge the Government with the high prices prevailing to-day. That is a fair statement for him to make, and in a sense it was absolutely unnecessary for him to make it, for we do not think the Government are absolutely blamable for the high prices prevailing throughout Canada to-day. But we do say that in many cases the high prices are preventable, and might be modified. We do not ascribe to hon. gentlemen opposite divine powers. We recognize that their limitations are very, very great indeed; but great as they are, we say that if they would only display a more active interest in these matters, they could not help bringing about an improvement in the conditions which we are discussing and which bear so heavily on the great mass of our people to-day. It is true that there is prosperity in this Dominion, but it is largely an artificial prosperity, and there are thousands of people to-day in this country who are living either just on or below the poverty line. They are earning large wages, it is true, but the purchasing power of that wage is much below the purchasing power of their wage some few years ago, when it was considerably lower. We are not as prosperous as would appear on the surface, and the Government should not let themselves be lulled to sleep by the fact that wages are high. They should not fail to recognize that the question involved in the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Richmond this afternoon is a very serious one, and deserving of their most serious consideration and drastic action. If it should mean fixing minimum and maximum prices, let us have it. If it means the taking over of the flour mills of this country, let that be done. If it means a more direct and effective control of the transportation agencies in this country, I say let that be done. If it means the closing of the wheat exchanges of this country, let that be done, although to my mind that might be a very doubtful procedure.

I should also like to enquire why the Government was not in consultation long ago with the Government of the United States on this question. It is all very well for the Minister of Finance to say that at this moment the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in consultation with the British and French Commissions and with the Government of the United States. I venture to say that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would not be in the United States at all if he were not there on the invitation of the British Commission. Instead, he would be wasting his time, as he has been doing for the last two or three years on some abstract questions from which the people of this country can expect nothing in the way of results. If the United States and Canada could but act together they would exert a tremendous influence in settling this problem in some degree, not only on this continent, but throughout the whole world. Though the Minister of Trade and Commerce is at Washington, his time no doubt is taken up with many other questions. This problem alone is big enough for any one man, or for many men, to study, and I think it should be taken up as a special and distinct question with the United States, and a joint commission be appointed by the two countries to study and deal with the whole problem.

I shall not detain the House any longer. I think hon. gentlemen should be grateful to the hon. member for Richmond for having introduced this subject. It is one, I think, we should have discussed in this House long before now. If it might appear that we upon this side of the House are discussing this matter in rather a censorious spirit we may be forgiven because we think that that is the only method by which we can urge this Government to action. We would like hon. gentlemen opposite to participate in this debate, giving friendly advice to the Government and exhorting them to the accomplishment of the results which hon. gentlemen opposite, I am sure, feel this country desires to see attained.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. B. McCOIG (West Kent): No resolution could be more timely or opportune than the one we are now discussing, for the high cost of living is the burning question now before the people. Of course, there are many to whom that question is comparatively unimportant, because their incomes are sufficient to enable them easily to provide for their wants, but to the average mechanic and labouring man it becomes a very serious and pressing problem, especially in view of the possibility of even the higher prices in the future. But I believe that this problem is one that the Government can deal with. The workers who are called upon to increase production are responding nobly. When at home at last week-end, I found that a number of men had taken up the question of cultivating garden plots in the city of Chatham. But one of these gentlemen, who, by the way, works at his regular occupation from seven in the morning until six at night, brought to my attention one serious handicap under which those engaged in these operations must work. If they send to the United States for seeds, as many of them do, believing that they can get a better class of seeds for their purpose, they have to pay specially high duties. On seeds in packages weighing over one pound each the preferential tariff is five per cent, and the general tariff ten per cent. But when the packages weigh less than one pound each, the duty from the United States is 25 per cent, with the addition of 7½ per cent war tax, making 32½ per cent altogether. Most of these people order less than one pound of any one kind of seed, and so they have to pay this higher duty. In order to be sure of the matter I took it up with the Commissioner of Customs, and he gave me these figures. These people naturally ask how it comes that, with everybody urging them to increase production, they should be put under this handicap when they seek to comply with the demand..

The high cost of foodstuffs is particularly the problem of the labouring man, and we hear it on every side from men of this class that the Government is not in sympathy with them. We hear it said that the Government is made up largely of millionaires who do not feel the pressure of the present high prices. It is said also that the Minister of Labour (Hon. Mr. Crothers) is a man not in sympathy with the workers. He may be a gentleman, so far as that is concerned, but he is a professional man, they say, and never did a day's work in his life, and knows nothing of the needs of the labouring man. I have heard that said by many labouring men. It is a point which any future Government in this country will be called upon to consider. Whoever may be at the head of that Government, it will be necessary to have a practical man as Minister of Labour, because the labouring men are going to have something to say about that matter. But we leave that to the electors for the time coming.

Many believe that the prices of foodstuffs are unduly raised through the action of cold storage concerns. When a fire took place in one of these establishments in Lindsay, it was shown that there were thousands of dozens of eggs stored there, as well as other foodstuffs. These were not put on the market, but were held for high prices and exorbitant profits. That is something that, it seems to me, the Government could regulate. Of course, no person will dispute the advantage of the cold storage system; but, on the other hand, nobody will say that that system should be made the means of holding foodstuffs back from the people for unduly high prices. It is a subject of general complaint that the prices of bacons and hams are exorbitant. But it will be remembered that while there was a large crop of producing hogs last year, there was a great shortage of feed. The result was that the farmers had to take almost any prices they could get for stock which, if it were in existence now, would help to keep down prices. This is a case where the Minister of Agriculture was sleeping on his job. In the part of Ontario in which I live, this problem of shortage of feed for hogs was a very serious one, but the minister never once visited that section that he might find out how the people were placed. Government reports inform us that fifteen per cent of the grain crop of the West was practically unfit for market as grain. But, though we needed it so badly for feed, we could not get it, and so, as I have said, had to dispose of hogs at far less than their real value. And the same was true, to a large extent, of cattle. In the county of Kent dozens and hundreds of cattle were sold at low prices because the farmer could not get feed for them if he wished to hold them over. Had the Minister of Agriculture taken his duties seriously, and had he kept in touch with the wants of the producers, he could have taken steps which would have resulted in a vastly better situation for the consumer to-day. The Minister of Agriculture has not visited that part of the province of Ontario west of Toronto except on one occasion, and that was to address a political meeting. The Department of Agriculture should be largely non-political, and the head of it should keep in touch with the affairs of the country. But how can he do this unless he keeps going around among the people? Let me give one instance of how this shortage in feed worked out. One farmer in the township of Dover sold a part of his farm and gave the money to one son to move west, while the other son stayed on the home farm. The brother who remained at home wanted feed for his animals. The brother who had gone west had the material to spare. But when the westerner tried to ship the material there was an embargo that would prevent it coming east of Fort William. So the man in Kent county had to sell his stock at sacrifice prices. I believe that the Government should have seen to it that such an embargo was not placed on feed coming east of Fort William, considering how much it was in the interest of the country that that material should be transported to where it was so much needed. We are told that there was no rolling stock to be had, but I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that at the very time when we were told they could not get cars to bring in feed for the stock in Ontario, the automobile concerns were getting trains of cars in which to ship their output. Automobiles, a mere luxury, could be shipped, but necessaries could not.

The Minister of Finance has stated that we on this side are obstructive, that we are merely critical. I myself proposed that the duty on tractors should be removed, but that motion was voted down by the Government. The hon. minister cannot pretend that that would not have been an assistance to greater production in Canada.

We have the Provincial Government using them and we have enterprising farmers doing the same thing for the purpose of working more land and producing better crops. When we have a matter which is really vital, which is important, which is in the interest of greater production, and when we have a proposal of that kind made from this side of the House and every man on this side of the House votes for it, we have the Minister of Finance, who leads the Government, standing up and calling on every man at his side to vote it down. The same thing applies to the removal of the duty on seed beans with regard to which we expect an answer from the Minister of Finance in the near future. Petitions signed by nearly every member of the council of Kent, signed by the warden and leading farmers throughout the county, have been sent to the Minister of Finance. Every section of that part of the country is anxious for it. The farmers are stalled. The unfavourable condition of the weather at the present time means that whoever puts in a crop will have to put it in later in the season than usual and that it will have to be either beans or corn because it will be too late for the farmer to put in oats and barley. It will not be surprising if we find that the same fate meets the resolution embodying that request. Yet we have the statement of the minister to-day that we are not trying to give the Government assistance by suggesting something which might be practical and in the best interests of the country.

I am glad to be able to say a few words on behalf of the resolution which has been introduced by my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Kyte) because I feel satisfied it is not any too soon that a resolution of this kind should be introduced or that some steps should be taken to assist the consumers if at all possible by the Government to at least get food supplies at prices in keeping with the wages that labouring men are able to earn in the factory.

Mr. COCKSHUTT rose to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, I would remind the House that this motion is under Rule 39 and that the authorities are very explicit that the discussion on such a motion shall be confined strictly to the subject, which is introduced into the House without notice. While it is in the nature of a substantive motion and is subject to the rule governing such, the authorities are very clear that the rule should be applied with the utmost strictness and that argument should be confined closely to the question before the House, which in this instance is:

As to the necessity of taking action to prevent further undue advance in the prices of flour in Canada and to reduce the same to an amount representing the prices of wheat received by the farmer plus the cost of milling and distribution but eliminating the increase due to stock exchange manipulation.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): I am not quite sure, Mr. Speaker, whether the fact that I have risen in order to say a few words on this question is the occasion of your caution. I generally try to stick fairly closely to the text I undertake to speak upon, but I feel that it is a little unfortunate to be confined simply to the question of flour when every hon. gentleman who has spoken has covered a rather wide field. However, I have a very few remarks to make and I shall endeavour as far as possible to stick to the subject at issue. As far back as March 1, 1915, I introduced to this House the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this House, the circumstances arising out of the present war are such as to justify the Government of Canada in exercising supreme control over the quantity and destiny of our food exports, thereby regulating the prices at which bread, meat and other food products shall be sold for home consumption, while at the same time directing that our surplus food exports should only reach British or friendly countries.

It is upwards of two years since I introduced that resolution, and in January last, in further discussing the subject during the present session, I again drew attention to this proposition of mine submitted as an humble member of this House, for the regulation of prices and the control of food products.

I think the resolution brought forward by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) is a very fitting one and coming as I do from a constituency composed of 25,000 city residents and 8,000 or 10,000 residents in the country, I have to sail fairly close to the wind in order to satisfy both interests and not to offend either. However, I feel it is my duty as a public man not to be afraid to express the opinoin which I hold and have held strongly for the past two years, which is that the country being at war cannot be expected to live up to the ordinary regulations which are sufficient in times of peace. In order that I may be fully understood, I do not think I can do better than to cite from Hansard what I said on the subject two sessions ago:

I said: The resolution standing in my name is one which I deem of great importance at the present time. It has no political significance, so far as I am concerned. It has appeared to me that for some months past it was the duty of those in charge of the Government of the country to keep a very good eye upon the food supply of the Dominion of Canada, and also to assist in every way possible the Mother Country in the tremendous struggle in which she is now engaged. I am aware that the principle contained in the resolution upsets to a certain extent what has been deemed proper economic law, that is, that the law of supply and demand regulates the prices of all commodities.

At the same time this war has upset a great many business axioms, has upset the calculations of many political economists and has brought to our attention the fact that a world-wide war is not dealt with by ordinary means nor controlled by ordinary circumstances. Supply and demand as a rule is a safe criterion for the fixing of prices of commodities. As far as I have been able to judge, Canada is the only country at present at war that has not given more or less consideration to this very important question. Very early in the war the Government of the sister Dominion of Australia, that great Commonwealth, which is also a large producer of food, took possession of all supplies of wheat and arbitrarily fixed the price at $1.25 per bushel. That was done in one of the leanest years that Australia has seen in a long time. Their wheat crop was comparatively a failure. The supplies for home consumption were away below the requirements of that great country. New Zealand is in very much the same position and has been obliged to appeal to Canada for its supplies.

It is only consistent on my part that I should now again advocate the principle of the motion which I placed on the Order Paper then. The 7,000 workmen of the city of Brantford look upon this as the leading question of all the questions that are before this House or the country at the present time. We are not asking this Government, nor are we asking this House, to do anything that has not been already done by every one of the warring countries except Canada. We take up the paper to-night and in regard to the United States which has only been about a month in the war we read in the Evening Journal this despatch from New York:

United Press Despatch.

New York, May 3.—"Submarine destruction has been steadily increasing for six weeks. The situation is one of extreme gravity, make sure of that."

With this warning Herbert C. Hoover, who is to be America's food dictator, arrived to-day from Britain. He left immediately for Washington.

Declaring that deaths in the industrial districts of Belgium had been "multiplied by three" on account of submarine operations during March and April, Hoover said the U-boats were the one big menace which must be eliminated in order to win the war.

"The European food situation as well as the general food situation there requires every possible effort we can make," he said. "What Europe needs most is wheat and what it must have is wheat, but it must also have beef and pork products. As for Belgium, the relief system is struggling to its feet after having been practically knocked out by the submarines. Five of our ships have been lost since March 1."

This further statement from one of our agricultural authorities, Mr. W. J. Black, appears in the same paper:

All over Canada the situation is grave. The prospects are far from bright, and the people may as well know it now. The seeding has been lamentably delayed by the weather this spring, and in the western states even less land is ploughed than has been heretofore the case. In Saskatchewan alone there were 1,500,000 acres less land ploughed last fall than the year previous.

This was due to the fact that the harvest was taken off the fields so late there was not time to get the land ploughed before winter set in.

I think those quotations prove conclusively that we are at an acute crisis in the food situation. I have no political axe to grind and no particular desire to please either the farmer or the workingman beyond that desire which every citizen should have, to help humanity whereever he can help it. I speak on behalf of the workingmen of Canada, and especially of those who reside in my native city of Brantford, and I feel it is my duty to impress on the House the desirability of more control of food supplies. That applies not alone to flour but to all other food products. The day is near at hand when we must have a food dictator in Canada. I think we might with advantage have had one long ago. I do not mean by a food dictator a tyrant, a despot, or a czar, but one who would make kindly suggestions to the people, appeal to them in the way of humanity, and ask them if they are not willing in time of war to sacrifice a little. It is all very well for you, someone may say to me, living at a first-class hotel, to propound a proposition like this. I should be only too glad if the Government would tell the hotel keepers of this city and of all Canada that they must limit their menus to the barest fare, as they have done in Great Britain, in France and in practically all European countries. Why should we be served with twice as much on our plates as any reasonable man should eat? Often it would be much better for a man's stomach if he did not eat so much, but he must eat it all or waste it, and in my judgment the time for waste has passed. If this war continues, we shall need a food dictator or a man who will come to us with propositions with regard to flour, meat, potatoes and all those necessities of life, and tell us that we should not have more of them than is good for us, and should save all the food we can on behalf of those not so fortunately situated as we are. It may be said that the workingman has his increased wages. So he has. But I want to tell you, as one who represents a working class community, that the wages have not advanced in nearly the same proportion as have the prices of foods. That is in the knowledge of every man who gives the slightest thought to it. We know that food prices have increased enormously. Wheat, which was 80 cents to 90 cents before the war, is $3 to-day. Flour, which sold at about $3 to $3.50 per hundred weight, is now $6 or $7 per hundred pounds. And the increase does not apply to food only. Take coal, woollen goods, almost any textile goods and the same thing applies all through. And what has the workman got? He has got a very small wage increase over what he was obtaining before the war to pay for all these advances that have been placed upon the necessities of life.

May I make a few suggestions that I think, if followed up, would be of advantage. I have always appealed to the farmer in the same way as to the workingman. I am not saying anything here that I would not say before an audience of farmers or workingmen, and if I cannot be re-elected in my constituency I am quite willing to stay at home. I want to speak what I believe to be right and true and I declare that, in war times such as these, to say that the law of supply and demand must continue to regulate the prices of all articles of commerce is to my mind to beg the question. I say that it wants something more drastic and these kid gloved methods that have been in vogue for so long will not do if this war continues. I say that with regard to recruiting as well as with regard to the food supply. We want to wake up and give a lead to the people of Canada, who, I believe are ready for a lead right now. They want somebody to suggest something practical that they can do to help the situation. They are anxious to have suggestions made as to ways in which they can assist, and if they can assist by cutting down the cost of living, I am sure that they will be ready to do so. Where is there a man who, knowing the suffering that exists to-day in Belgium, in Serbia, in Poland, in almost all the countries of Europe, where is there a man who is going to spend $3 or $4 on a high-class dinner, and leave two-thirds of it on his plate, when he knows that his brethren of almost all the civilized nations of the earth are dying day by day for the necessaries of life? We say here every day, give us this day our daily bread. How many of us are thinking of the other chap who is not getting his daily bread? How many of us are ready to surrender any of the things that we have been squandering on ourselves in war times? When I read that lecture I apply it to myself as well as to anyone else. I know that I have spent money that I should not have spent. I know that I have not given as much as I should. I have tried to give and to do, but I know that I have not done half of what I should, and I know that if every member in his heart will only examine his ability to sacrifice and to do for others he will find that he, too, could do more.

We have before us to-day a proposition with regard to flour, but it applies to almost every article of food that goes on the workingman's table, and I say we have to remember those who work behind the benches as well as those who till the soil. I am not here to speak on behalf of one or the other, but to say a word for the honest working men of Canada. According to the census of 1911 there were 900,000 workers besides those on the farm who were dependent upon their daily wages for their daily bread, and while you may say that the farmer's lot is the hardest, I have tried a little of the farmer's life and a little of the workingman's, not a great deal of either, and I declare that the workingmen of the Dominion of Canada to-day put as much honest labour on their daily task as any other class of the community, and that is not said with any disrespect to anybody. They have to work winter and summer, day in and day out, from seven in the morning until six at night, with one hour off, with a taskmaster often over them to see that they are on the job, and if they are two or five minutes late they are docked for it. That is the way the workingman of this country has to put in his time; he has a watch-clock on the job and has to be there on the moment and he must not knock off a moment before the time is up.

Now, what about these workingmen? Are they exercised about the prices of food? I think they are. I say they are very much exercised about the prices of food, and I believe that in the very near future this Government, or some other Government, must take in hand the prices of foodstuffs in the Dominion of Canada. I say that believing it to be true. It has been done in all other countries, and it can, and, I think, will have to be done here if this war continues. It is a practical necessity of the situation, absolutely. We have been living in a kind of fool's paradise here, it appears to me, for quite a while. We think we are in the war, but, barring the men we have sent across and the occasional thoughts we give to the casualty lists, I fear our efforts on behalf of the war are mighty small, our self-denial mighty little, and, I think, it is time that we all realized that the sufferings of humanity are our sufferings, and that we must bear our share of this white man's burden in the way a white man should.

These prices, which can be and ultimately must be controlled, can be controlled in ten minutes under the operation of some such resolution as I have proposed. There is no doubt about that; prices have been controlled in every other country in the world, and they can be controlled here. The United States, only a month at war, is talking of controlling prices immediately; why not Canada? Great Britain has done it, Australia, and India have done it, France has done it, Germany and Austria have done it. Belgium, Poland, and Serbia, unfortunately, have not any food to control, but every other war country that professes to have a Government at the head of affairs is controlling its food to-day and securing a fair distribution of it among the people. That is one of the duties of a Government; if necessary, we should even be put on rations. Owing to the high cost of living, I think that that is a practical suggestion.

Mr. MARCIL: What about controlling exports?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: That is exactly what we have here; it is plainly set forth in the resolution. I say that the control of exports will result in the control of the price of food, immediately and absolutely—and not only food, but manufactured articles as well, if you wish. I do not want to be left out of this; let nobody make a mistake about that. I am prepared to submit to the very same regulation that I ask every citizen in Canada to submit to. I do not propose any class legislation, but I say that the control of all food exports would provide that after a certain maximum price has been reached—fix it where you will, but fix it where it is fair and just—no more goods shall go out until the price goes down. That will fix it, and fix it quickly. We may beat about the bush; we may have investigations; we may curse the middleman and every one who deals in food and every individual citizen who is not our own self; we may say that the other fellow is responsible, but when it comes to the final analysis the responsibility lies at the door of every citizen. We all have to do our share; we all have to give; we all have to practise self-denial, if need be, in order that all may live.

The workingmen have suffered much on account of the high cost of living. I do not say that there is any acute suffering at present, but they have been obliged to deny themselves many things that they would like to have upon their tables and that we, perhaps, have upon our tables. Their wages cannot pay for these luxuries that others are, perhaps, provided with. You say that the farmer will cease to produce if you begin to limit his prices. I do not think that that will happen. I am sympathetic with the farmer. In my own county I have many farmer friends of a lifetime whom I esteem as highly as I do any class in the community. I know that they are rational; I know that they are human. I know that if a woman or child knocks at the door of a farm house in the county of Brant or any other county in the province of Ontario, the farmer or the farmer's wife will say: you shall not go hungry from this door. It is the instinct of humanity to help the suffering. If in ordinary times $1.50 or $2 is a fair price for wheat; if $1.50 or $2 is a fair price for a bag of potatoes, 35 or 40 cents a fair price for a pound of butter and 25 cents for a pound of cheese, it is no hardship on this or any other Government to say that owing to the exigencies of war, those prices should not be exceeded. Britain has a food dictator. He has not gone about with a big stick, but he has made suggestions with a view to the limitation of the cost of all the necessities of life. Every hotel and restaurant in the great cities of Great Britain have a menu beyond which they cannot go. They are obliged to serve so many ounces of bread, so many ounces of meat, so much potato, and so on, and their meals are confined to two or three courses, according to the necessities of the case. We are asked to deal with a question such as this. I hear an hon. gentleman say: "How would he reduce ploughs," if I am not mistaken. I am quite ready for my hon. friend to fix ploughs at his own price. The day has gone by when I can be held up with a threat about ploughs. I have explained in this House time and again that I have had absolutely nothing to do with the manufacture or control of ploughs for twenty years and if anybody in this House thinks that he can hold me up by shaking a big stick over me and talking about ploughs, I would like him to get up and try it. I have had that shot at me from both sides of the House and I tell you that it does not count with me worth a cent. I did not think that my hon. friend should have whispered that quite so loudly. The suggestion of ploughs is supposed to answer all arguments, and it has been made to me whenever I have attempted to say anything about the necessities of life. It has nothing to do with the question so far as I am discussing it, and, besides, I am propounding nothing now, as I have already said, that I am not prepared to submit to myself. I am trying to make valuable suggestions that will help to secure the control of food prices, and I am doing it in a serious way, because I think that is absolutely necessary.

It gives me a good deal of pain to have to dissent from my fellow-members. I would not do it unless a strong sense of duty led me to the conclusion that, representing a constituency such as I do, in a time of war such as this, as a citizen of Canada I should say what I think upon this great question. The time is near at hand, if this war continues, when some such suggestions as I have made will have to be put into operation. And if they are put into operation as I have suggested them, I guarantee that they will be effectual. What every other country has done

Canada can do. We want something of the heroism in our acts at home that will, even if only in a very feeble way, compare with the acts of our heroic sons across the water. If our heroism at home was half or quarter as great as that of our dear boys over the water, we would not have to speak as we do on this occasion. We should be ready to make sacrifices; we should be ready to deny ourselves in time of war. The ordinary influences of supply and demand are set aside by the unusual conditions. In the face of a world-wide war, millions of tons of food have gone to the bottom of the seas and we shall be months or years overtaking the loss that is being occasioned by the submarines. If in the face of these conditions we continue our wasteful methods, a sudden call of halt will come to us, the food supply will be gone and we will have only ourselves to blame, simply because we have thrown away the lavish gifts of nature that are scattered broadcast over the Dominion. I trust that the resolution that my hon. friend has introduced will be the means of causing the powers that be to think seriously about the regulation and control of all food prices and of all the necessities of our daily life, and particularly of the life of the workingman. That is a practical suggestion; it is one that will come in the near future; and in all kindness, but with full sincerity, I make these suggestions from one of the back benches, and I trust that my remarks will not be thrown away but that in the early future, we shall have, if not a dictator, some one who will come out with a lead and ask the people of Canada to live and let live, to sacrifice and to give, to help those who are in need, and to try to lighten the white man's burden, as represented by the workingmen of this country, for whom I say we cannot appeal too strongly. They are worthy of the utmost sacrifice on the part of every one of us, and we should endeavour to lighten their load which, I am sure, they find very onerous at the present time. Let the heroism shown by our boys at the front be shown in some measure by those of us who remain at home, and all these questions will be duly solved.

Mr. F. N. McCREA (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I think the Government are, to a large extent, responsible for the high price of flour and the high cost of living in general. They are having a large amount of munition work done in this country and they are paying such prices to the manufacturers of munitions that the latter are making immense profits and are paying very high wages to their employees. I can understand that, at the start, it was necessary to pay extreme prices for munitions in order to get the business started, because the manufacturers were not equipped for making munitions and were unwilling to engage in a new business unless there was good remuneration in sight for them; but once the business was started and once the munition manufacturers throughout the country were clamouring for business, the Government should have adopted a little more business-like method and should have said to the manufacturers, when they wanted one or two million shells: Give us a bid; how many can you make, and at what price? Instead of doing that, the Government have fixed a price for munitions so high that the manufacturers have made huge profits and have been able to pay their employees—not all skilled labourers, but some of them men who were common day labourers—ten dollars, fifteen dollars and even more than that a day. The call to arms has come to every man in this country, the farmer as well as every one else, is supposed to send his sons to the front, and they have gone. Consequently, the farmer must have some one to cultivate his farm and I ask: Where is he to get the help to do his chores from five o'clock in the morning until nine o'clock at night at ordinary wages, if a man can make ten to fifteen dollars a day in a shell factory? Had the Government adopted more reasonable and intelligent methods of dealing with this matter, they would not to-day have to ask the munition manufacturers to cough up 75 per cent of their profits, because they would not have made those profits and it therefore would not be necessary to ask the manufacturers to give them back. Unfortunately, all of the labouring men of this country are not in the shell business. Employers engaged in ordinary lines of manufacture cannot afford to pay excessive wages to their employees, although they are probably paying wages from thirty to forty per cent higher than they were a year ago, and as the cost of living has increased more than thirty or forty per cent, the man who is working for the ordinary employer is up against a hard proposition to support his family, whereas the man who is employed on government work and is making five or six times the wages of his less fortunate brother is not to be pitied. It is the Government, however, who are responsible for the high cost of living by having this Government work done at higher wages than the ordinary business man or farmer can afford to pay. It may be late in the day to remedy this matter, but it is said: "Better late than never." I understand the Minister of Finance made the statement this afternoon that the law of supply and demand was the governing factor. I wish he had thought so when he was dealing with the newsprint proposition. He did not appear to think of the law of supply and demand then because he fixed the price of newsprint at least at one per cent per pound less than it can be made for.

The high cost of living is going to be a serious problem for the man in the ordinary walk of life or working in the ordinary factories, and the farmer also is up against a very serious proposition. The farmer is asked to produce more. Most of his sons have gone to the front and he has to go into the labour market for help and he cannot get any. The Government ought to consider this question, even at this late hour, and see that the men working on Government orders are paid about the same wages as the men working in the ordinary factories. If the Government do so, they will be going a long way towards remedying the cost of living.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the course that the debate has taken this afternoon and evening must satisfy the Government that this question is one of the greatest importance, and that it is not, as the Minister of Finance has stated, a matter of party politics. The Minister of Finance is usually fair, but I think to-day he was absolutely unfair to the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) who introduced this resolution, and to other members on this side of the House who spoke on it, when he characterized it as being largely political. I am sure nobody in the House will accuse the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) of making a political speech, and I think he has shown to the Government and to the House that it is not a matter of politics but a matter of absolute necessity that something should be done if conditions are going to continue at all reasonable in this Canada of ours. I congratulate the hon. member for Brantford on having foreseen this two years ago, long before any of us on this side of the House or on the other side of the House saw it in the same light. What is our position in this country? Canada is a food producing country, and to-day is overflowing with food. Why, then, should there be such high prices as are asked to-day? It is only a few days ago that the Minister of Agriculture told the House that we had a surplus of 1,500,000 bushels of potatoes over and above the food and seed requirements of this country. If that is the case, how comes it that the price of potatoes is $4 a bag? Who is to blame for it? My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says it is a question of supply and demand. I do not for one moment think it is the law of supply and demand that has raised prices up to their present level. I want to be absolutely fair; I do not want to blame the Government for more than they are responsible for, but it does seem to me that if the Government had used foresight or even common sense, we should not be in the position we are to-day. If it is the law of supply and demand that is forcing prices up, how is it that the price of wheat at Liverpool has not gone up $1 a bushel in the last few days? Liverpool, as we all know, sets the price of wheat for the world, but there has been no such advance there in the past few days. What I blame this Government for is that they have simply let matters drift until they have got into their present position. It is only a short time ago that wheat was at a reasonable price in this country. Within the last six weeks the Minister of Trade and Commerce had representatives of the farmers' organizations in the West come to Ottawa, and he wanted them to sell the whole western crop of No. 1 Northern delivered at Fort William at $1.20 a bushel.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who wanted to buy it?

Mr. TURRIFF: Sir George Foster.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. You have been told that several times.

Mr. TURRIFF: He was acting, as the Minister of Finance has told us this afternoon, as agent for the Imperial Government.

Mr. LALOR: Did he try to buy the wheat, or simply submit the offer of the British Government to the farmers?

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend can put it any way he likes. The fact remains that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made that offer, and spoke in a very truculent manner when the farmers would not accept it. He said they had made a great mistake and were very foolish to reject the offer. The price was $1.30 a bushel at Fort William, and that was only six weeks ago. The Minister of Finance told us this afternoon that one of the reasons for the high price of foodstuffs was that 25,000,000 men had been taken from their vocations and were now slaughtering each other. The Government knew that six weeks ago, and they also knew, as the Finance Minister told us this afternoon, that the consumption of foodstuffs in war time is greater than in times of peace. Knowing that, why did not the Government come forward with some plan like that suggested by my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), with the object of keeping the cost of living within reason, and enabling the working man to have a loaf of bread on his table for his wife and family at every meal? But the Government did nothing. The charge I make against them is that they have deliberately avoided doing anything. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance wants anything done along this line, I urge him to do it himself. I would have some hope of results if he took this question up; I think he would do something, and I would suggest that he invite the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Labour to take a holiday and take over those two departments in addition to his own. I am satisfied that if he did that, something would be done.

What has my genial and smiling friend the Minister of Labour done? For two years he has been puttering around, but he has not reduced the cost of a single article that goes on the workingman's table by five cents since the war started. This afternoon he gave us a great dose of figures about Russia and other foreign countries, but does he think that will satisfy the stomachs of the people of Canada? Only this afternoon he sent a man from his department down to Montreal to find out the price of wheat and flour there.

As I said a moment ago, the Minister of Trade and Commerce tried to buy the crop of No. 1 Northern at $1.30 delivered at Fort William. What did the representatives of the farmers say to that offer?

9 p.m. They offered to dispose of the western wheat crop of 1917 in two different ways. They said, we will agree to a minimum price of $1.50 and a maximum price of $1.90, or, if you prefer, we will agree to a flat rate of $1.70, delivered at Fort William. That price was for No. 1 Northern; it would work out to $1.55 about for the whole crop delivered at Fort William, and that would mean about $1.35 to the farmer. That was a fair proposition to make to the Government and I should like to know why it was not accepted. The Minister of Finance had then all the information he has given the House this afternoon, so why did he not come to an agreement with the farmers? If the Government did not want to buy the wheat, why did they not do as the hon. member for Brantford has suggested, appoint a dictator to regulate the price of foodstuffs in this country? It has been left in the hands of the Minister of Labour, and he has done absolutely nothing. And as long as the present occupancy of that position continues, I have a good deal of confidence in telling the leader of the House (Sir Thomas White) that nothing will be done in this matter to help out the people. You have heard what my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) said about what the ordinary workman outside of munition manufacturing is getting. I ask the members of the Government how they expect that any man earning $2 a day, or $2.50, or even $3, can feed a family of children? With flour at $13 a barrel, not only will they be denied the luxuries of life, but they will not get enough of its necessaries, and at times they will even have to go hungry. Go into the large cities to-day, and, I venture to say, you will find thousands of working people who do not know how they are to provide food for their families. And the members of the Government sit smiling here and doing absolutely nothing, except sending an official down to Montreal in a Pullman car to ask what is the price of flour and what is the price of wheat. I say that the Government is to blame, and I tell the Minister of Finance that, as the most prominent man in the Government, bar none, he is more to blame than any other. He should take this matter out of the hands of his colleagues who have had it in charge and who have done nothing. For this is a serious matter, Mr. Speaker. I hope the Minister of Finance—I think he was not in his place when I made this remark before—will not accuse us on this side of trying to play party politics with this question. He did make that accusation this afternoon, and then he himself went on to deliver a speech of the most partisan kind. I really thought that a general election was right upon us, so suddenly had he been converted to looking after the interests of the farmer. Or I thought that, at the very least, he had decided to run for an agricultural constituency. But what we want him to do is not for the farmer, but for the consumer.

The hon. minister said that some gentlemen on this side of the House had dared to suggest that the farmers' wheat ought to be commandeered. I represent a constituency that is almost altogether a wheat-growing constituency, and I say that, when the farmers offered their wheat at $1.70 for No. 1 Northern, delivered at Fort William, if the Government thought it in the interests of the consumers of Canada they should have gone ahead and commandeered that wheat. If they decide to do so, they will hear no word against it from us. The farmers are willing to be fair, they offered to sell their wheat at a fair price. I believe that if the Minister of Finance had been in charge of that question, and not the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), that he, being a good business head, would have seen the advantage of acting upon that offer, especially in view of the fact that, as he told us this afternoon, he had all the information as to the conditions that have led to the high price of flour.

I say the Government is to blame, very much to blame, for not having taken action. It has been pointed out a number of times in this debate that every country engaged in this war has taken action along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). Why, then, cannot Canada do something? The Minister of Finance told us that we had 100,000,000 bushels of wheat in Canada. Now, the people of this Dominion could not eat, between now and the threshing of the next crop, more flour than would be produced from 25,000,000 bushels of wheat—not if they sat up nights to do it. So, according to the Minister of Finance, we have 75,000,000 bushels of wheat in Canada more than we want. Yet we have wheat jumping in price twenty or thirty cents a day. Caused by the demand in Britain? No, but caused by speculation. And the Government has sat idle all these weeks and has allowed things to drift into their present condition, and now they are afraid to do anything—except to send a man to Montreal to ask the price of flour and wheat.

Mr. LALOR: The Minister of Finance said that the wheat in warehouses in Canada was largely owned by the British Government. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) must have heard him say that.

Mr. TURRIFF: What about it?

Mr. LALOR: The hon. member says that we have 75,000,000 bushels of wheat above our requirements. But the Minister of Finance told us that that was largely owned by the British Government.

Mr. TURRIFF: I imagine that my hon. friend must have an option on a good bunch of wheat, by the way he talks.

Mr. LALOR: I may tell the hon. gentleman I do not own a bushel of Canadian wheat.

Mr. TURRIFF: Then, I congratulate the hon. gentleman on having sold out his option and pocketed his profits.

Mr. LALOR: Let me tell the hon. gentleman I have not, nor have I had, a bushel of Canadian wheat.

Mr. TURRIFF: Of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. The Government reports show that, of the wheat in the West, twenty-one per cent is still in the farmers' hands. This means that 21,000,000 bushels of wheat at all events is not owned by the British Government. But even of that in warehouses, a good part is owned by millers, grain dealers and speculators. No doubt, the British Government owns a good share of wheat, too. Why could not the Government have appointed somebody to declare that the price of wheat should not be higher than a certain figure? The British Government and the French Government have taken similar action. All the governments that are at war have fixed the prices of food supplies. While we were paying 55 cents and 58 cents a pound for butter, the British Government refused to allow it to be sold at more than 50 cents a pound in that country.

What are the United States doing? They have introduced a resolution that munition manufacturers shall not be allowed to make more than 3½ per cent profit, and that the dealers in foodstuffs shall not be allowed to make more than 6 per cent profit. How does that compare with what has been going on in Canada, where they have been making, not 6 per cent, but in some cases close to 600 per cent on some of food products? Again, the Government have refused to take any measures whatsoever to protect the consumers or anybody in Canada, and they have allowed the speculators, the manipulators and middlemen to so manipulate prices that the price of food is almost out of the reach of the average working man in Canada. The Government are to blame and are greatly to blame. It is time that they were waking up, and time that they were realizing the position that the country is in. It has been stated to-day, and I want to emphasize it, that we do not know exactly where we are in this war. With German submarines sinking vessels at the rate of fifty to sixty a week, as reported, and it is very probable we are not getting the worst of the reports, the condition is most serious. I add my voice to the voice of my hon. friend from Brantford, and I call on the Government to take action at once along the line of appointing some man in charge of the food of the Dominion and see that the price is not put out of reach. It is just as likely to-day that flour could be put up another $5 a barrel, as it was two weeks ago, that it would be put up to the price it is to-day. If it has gone up $5 in the last week or two, what is to hinder them from putting it up another $5? I would be afraid to contemplate the condition of the people of Canada with flour at $20 a barrel. In a country that has much more food than it can use, with flour at $14.50 a barrel, potatoes at $4 a bag, and lots of other things not quite in proportion, but also very high, surely the Government will realize their position at last and come forward and do something in the interest of the people of Canada. If they do not—and I want to say this as moderately as I know how—take some action the people will hold the Government responsible, and absolutely responsible, not for the total advance in the prices of foodstuffs, but for not taking any action to regulate prices. There is no question at all that the great big advance that has been made in the last few days is not due to supply and demand, but is nothing more or less than speculation and allowing these manipulators of food, for their own profit, to put prices away up in order that they may make millions. Every working man will have to pay his share of the millions of profits that are being made to-day out of the huge advances in the prices of wheat and flour and other foodstuffs throughout Canada.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is with some hesitation that I rise to offer a few remarks on this motion, for the reason that I have not been able to be present during this debate, and have only had the privilege of hearing the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Turriff) and the hon. member who preceded him (Mr. McCrea). However, I feel that I can with fair safety assume that the character of the discussion, at all events the character of the attack, has been throughout much of the same nature as that to which I have just listened from the hon. member for Assiniboia. If the level of the discussion prior to that had been such as would accord with the dignity of Parliament and the seriousness of this time, I could not believe that the hon. member for Assiniboia would allow himself to descend to the plane that he occupied for so long.

Now, we are asked, in the first place, to believe that there is "something" that should have been done. I have heard that word "something" so often, in these two speeches, and indeed during many years, as the peculiar name of what ought to be done, that I have begun to long to have that "something" defined. What is this miraculous, mysterious "something" that should have been done, or ought now to be done, or has not been done, and so on? The hon. member for Assiniboia says that we have lain back and done nothing. While dealers in food supplies have made millions, while other countries have done so much, and while things were in such an excellent condition the world over, all but here, it is said we have lain back and rested on our oars. We have all listened to very considerable in the way of general criticism of that sort, but we have heard very little in the way of comparison with other countries. About the last remark the hon. gentleman made was this, and it is a remark I have heard from him times without number: These middlemen, he says, and these people of a general character that he feels safe in attacking, are making millions piled upon millions, while in other countries they will not permit such thing at all. In good old England they never permit anything like that, he says, and they have a dictator to see that nothing of that kind takes place. What are the only figures available to compare all the millions that are being permitted to be made in this country and all the millions that are permitted to be made in other countries? Fortunately, we are in a position to make a comparison, that I do not claim is final, but that at all events is useful, on this very subject. We have now information as to the excess profits war tax, which I think has been very fully collected—collected with wonderful success for the first year, much beyond in amount the expectations of hon.

gentlemen on this side of the House, and far beyond the expressed expectations of hon. gentlemen on the other side. The collections for the first year of 25 per cent of the excess profits tax over 7 per cent on corporations in Canada gave $12,500,000, and are expected to reach $15,000,000 when all are in for the first year. For the second year it is expected that they will reach $20,000,000. Let us take that first year and compare it with the amounts got by Great Britain, and we will learn a lesson that will be very useful if we just let it sink down far enough. If 25 per cent of excess profits over 7 per cent amount to $15,000,000, the whole excess over 7 per cent will reach $60,000,000. That is for this country with a population of about 8,000,000. In Great Britain they collected for the same purpose 50 per cent of the profits in excess of what was for each business the average for three years prior to the war. Now our average for three years prior to the war would be over 7 per cent. However, our total profits over 7 per cent were approximately $60,000,000.

In Great Britain they took their 50 per cent of what was over and above a higher amount than 7 per cent—namely, the average profit for three pre-war years.

In this way they collected £139,800,000, so that their total profits (excess over the average for three years before the war), would be twice that sum, or about £280,000,000. This is roughly $1,400,000,000, or 24 times the excess profits in this country. Their population is approximately five times ours. So that, man for man, in that country they had in the first year of the war excess profits in Great Britain of nearly five times the excess profits in Canada.

Before I pass to another phase of the discussion I want to make clear once more to the House—I know it long ago was clear to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) if he would do himself and the House the justice of stating it, instead of misstating it—the relations of the Government to the recent offer of the British Government to purchase the surplus export wheat of this country. The British Government have what they call a Wheat Commission, which deals through agents in this country and the United States with the necessary wheat purchases for themselves and their Allies. They are the purchasers for themselves and in the main their Allies the world over. It is they who want the wheat for this purpose, and not the Government of Canada. That Wheat Commission met the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) when he was over in London, and they made a proposition to purchase the surplus wheat of this country, as they had made similar propositions to purchase the surplus of Australia, New Zealand and the other overseas dominions. At that time the United States was not our ally, but was a neutral nation. They had already consummated their negotiations with the other dominions and they made their offer to purchase our wheat on such a footing, having regard to the ocean rates between the other dominions and Great Britain and us and Great Britain, they controlling that, to a large extent, as would make our wheat cost in Great Britain what the wheat purchased in the other dominions would cost there. However, after some discussion, Sir George Foster was able to show them that it would be fair to pay a little more for the Canadian wheat, and consequently he was able to get them to raise the offer a little; but it was their offer from the beginning, throughout and to the end. They advanced certain reasons to him why, in their judgment, keeping in mind the higher interests of this war and of this Empire and doing justice at the same time, as they felt, to the farmers of Canada, that offer should be accepted. Having arrived in Canada, Sir George Foster felt it his duty—and the Government felt he was only pursuing his duty—to lay the subject before such organized body in this country as best represented the producers. Consequently an invitation was sent to the Canadian Council of Agriculture to come to Ottawa and to discuss with the Minister of Trade and Commerce the offer that had so been made, and to ascertain whether or not they would recommend its acceptance on behalf of those whom they represented. That offer was made in that way, and the reasons adduced by the British Government through their wheat commission why in their judgment the offer should be accepted were passed on by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as it was his duty to do, to the representatives of agriculture in Canada. They refused to give an opinion. They went back and consulted their associations in a body, and then refused the offer and made a counter proposal. The counter proposal was as stated by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), and it was at once communicated to the British Wheat Commission, who did not act upon it. Now those are very plain facts. I am not bringing them forward in order to erect the Government of Canada into any great position of credit. We simply did a simple and a plain duty. But on such simple elementary facts, why does an hon. member stand in this House and seek to attack this Government alleging as he does, that we tried to persuade the farmers of Canada to sell at $1.30 and refused afterwards to pay $1.70 when, as a matter of fact, we as purchasers were never negotiating with the farmers of Canada at all? These men speaking for the producers of Canada refused the offer made by the British Wheat Commission and the British Wheat Commission has not acted upon their counter proposition. So if any attack is to be made in this House, it is to be made on the British Government and the British Wheat Commission. But I do not stand in this House and attack them, nor do I stand in this House and praise them. They know the situation better than we do and in the light as they saw it they refused, or have not so far accepted the offer. There the matter stands.

One who has listened to the hon. member for Assiniboia for eight years in this House as I have, who had listened to his diatribes against the Government for their animosity to the farming community, who had listened also to his pleas for the poor workingman to be allowed to buy his flour cheaper by the removal of duty, would not have thought that, two weeks after the duty on flour was removed, the hon. member would stand in this House and attack the Government for doing nothing to bring down the price of the breakfast of the workingman. He wants a dictator too. He wants a dictator to dictate not what the farmer should get for his wheat, but what the workingman is to pay for his flour. Could humbug go farther? I do not know whether he wants the same kind of a dictator as we heard proposed by an hon. gentleman behind me, a dictator who does not dictate. We were asked solemnly by an hon. gentleman behind me to appoint a dictator who would assume his duties and prosecute his duties by making "kindly suggestions" to the people of Canada. I want to say that we have just a little less than 7,000,000 of this kind of dictators already. We have "kindly suggestions" being made until we need an embargo on suggestions in this country. We welcome the man who will say specifically what can be done and help to do it. Suggestions, "kindly suggestions"—we have had them from the beginning of the war. Talk about giving a lead. There is not a man in this House who has not given a lead, if that is giving a lead. Most of us have spoken on platform after platform, gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as on this side; there is scarcely one who has not given that kind of a lead ever since the war began, asking that we exercise thrift, asking that we produce more, asking that we help the boys at the front and behave ourselves in Canada something in the way that they have behaved themselves on the battle fields of Flanders. That is what thousands are doing. There has been leadership in abundance of that kind. We do not want a czar, we do not want anything in the way of an imperator, according to the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt). We want a dictator who will make something in the way of suggestions as to what may be done to keep down individual expenditure in Canada, and the waste of our food and our resources. Why, everybody knows what to do to keep down waste in this country—do not waste. Everybody in the country knows that already. It may be, and I am not going to say the time has not come or is not soon coming, when we will need to go further than make "kindly suggestions." It may be that the time will come when something will be done by way of compulsion. But if we are to have compulsion, let us call it by its proper name, and not endeavour to introduce it under all these dead phrases about doing "something," and all the rest of it. There is one step beyond the suggestion step, and that is compulsion, and if any one thinks we must have compulsion let him stand up like a man and say it, and not pursue these soft glove evasions all the time.

We have been listening to-night to much in the way of encomium of the United States. Well, I am not going to offer any criticism of the United States, of what they have done or of what they have failed to do, but I do not think the time has quite come for passing encomiums on a country, or deprecations of our own country by way of comparison, merely on the basis of the introduction of a Bill into the United States House of Representatives. We, too, have had a few Bills "introduced" into this House. We had a few "resolutions" last night. For example, we had one resolution not only introduced, but actually going through—or failing to go through—with the imprimatur on it of the Liberal party in Canada, which, if it had become law, would have taken out of the pockets of people who happened to have saved money and had left it in the banks for five years, all the money that they had there, giving them not a dollar and no indemnity whatever in return. We have had all kinds of "resolutions" and "introductions," too. But it is time enough to pass encomiums and eulogies when the United States gets something done towards winning this war and towards prosecuting it the way we are prosecuting it. The other day a magazine in United States sent a message to Great Britain to Lord Northcliffe, perhaps the severest critic of British policy that has arisen since the war began, or that ever arose, and asked him if he had any suggestion to make to the United States as to how they could best address themselves to the duty of prosecuting the war. What was the suggestion that he sent? He said: "If you enter the war, you will find that waging a great war under democracy is a new and vast experiment" (If he had stood in this House of Commons and listened to this debate, he would surely have thought it was indeed a vast and perilous experiment. He said, further: "If you come in, I have one thing to say to you, and it is this: you can learn a great deal from the example of Canada." Those words are printed on the pages of Everybody's Magazine, where all the world can read them. Theodore Roosevelt wrote an article in a United States publication. He, perhaps, has been the severest critic of American policies since the war began. His name stands out in this country as unexcelled among his fellow-citizens. He said: "I am not an adherent of the principle of the voluntary system. But the voluntary system has achieved much, and Canada has shown to the world the utmost that can be done by the voluntary system." That is what the world's biggest men looking on Canada impartially from without thinks of what this country has achieved. Now if hon. gentlemen opposite want compulsion introduced in the military forces of this country or in the civil forces in the matter of food dictatorships and prices, let them say specifically that they will back up compulsion and they will gain their wishes at least much faster than they will by this infinite amount of aimless and pointless talk.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I always listen with interest to the very eloquent speeches of the Solicitor General. He has made a reputation for himself of steering away from the real subject at issue, and I can assure him that in the art of keeping away from the subject and of not touching the issue at all he never did himself better justice than he has done on this occasion. It is sad to watch the tactics of the generals of the Government and the dope which they deal out to their followers around them when a question of this kind is brought up. The first thing they do is to get their supporters good and mad against the Opposition so that they will take a plunge into anything and vote for the Government whatever the question may be. That dope has been meted out by the Solicitor General and it has been dosed all over the members on the other side by the great leader of doping, the Minister of Finance. Hon. gentlemen, I think, have been sufficiently doped and dosed by this time to accept almost anything that may be submitted to them. But the hon. generals of the Government on that side of the House must not forget that the electors of Canada, supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, the men who sent them here, are not partaking of this dope which the Solicitor General is spraying around. Sitting in their houses or going about their business, they have opportunity of deliberately considering the question from a proper point of view and outside the baneful influence of this dope that is being cast around.

I think that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. G. W. Kyte) is entitled to much credit and commendation from both sides of the House for bringing before the House the very important matter that he drew to our attention this afternoon. If the discussion had been participated in only by members on this side of the House, it might be said that the subject was a partisan one and had in it no value or virtue besides that of partisanship. But we find the Minister of Finance, who is leading the Government, the Minister of Labour and the Solicitor General, and such able and eloquent men as the member for Brantford (Mr. W. F. Cockshutt) taking part in this discussion; therefore we feel that it must be a question of grave import and should be dealt with in that spirit.

I must apologize to the Solicitor General on behalf of some of us on this side who suggested that the Government might be doing something. The member for Assiniboia (Mr. J. G. Turriff) suggested that the Government might have taken steps to procure a large quantity of wheat at a certain price subject to their control in order to meet present necessities. The hon. Solicitor General said that the Government would not do such a thing; he became indignant at the idea that the Government should be doing anything on behalf of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, and who may not have an opportunity of speaking again. I must apologize to every member of the Government for supposing for one moment that they would do anything of a practical character.

We are told that so far as the subject matter of the resolution is concerned we in Canada are in a better position than the people of other parts of the world. The hon. member for Richmond, in speaking the other night, made it plain from reliable facts and figures that cannot be controverted that the cost of living in this country has gone up 44½ per cent, while in the Commonwealth of Australia—a sister dominion inhabited largely by the same class of people, having the same kind of industries, being more like Canada than any other part of the Empire—the cost of living has increased only 9½ per cent. Does the Solicitor General think that our country compares favourably with our sister colony in the matter of the cost of living? I submit that it does not. The cost of living has been kept down to an increase of only 9½ per cent in Australia by reason of governmental action, and there is no reason why the same governmental action should not take place in Canada and produce similar results.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman not realize that Australia is not surrounded by a country with ten times its population, and that there is no method of export save by the transports provided by the British Government, whereas we are 4,000 miles along the American border, and our prices are naturally controlled by theirs?

Mr. McKENZIE: The argument of the hon. gentleman would be cogent and to the point if it were found that we had not in abundance in this country the commodity with which we are dealing, and if by reason of the exportation of that article and by reason of the large demand for it elsewhere, it had gone out of the country, but we have the articles here in superabundance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman say for example that we should put an embargo on wheat.

Mr. KYTE: The embargo is on now.

Mr. McKENZIE: I care not what the thing is called—embargo or protection or prohibition or injunction or whatever the hon. gentleman may call it—I say, we have a population to feed; we have responsibility to our country and to our people, and we should do whatever is necessary to feed them in the cheapest and best possible way. That is why I say all those prohibitions, or extraordinary remedies as we would call them in law, are necessary. Let the Government apply those extraordinary remedies. That is what we are discussing; that is what we want.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. member actually prevent wheat going out of Canada into the United States now?

Mr. McKENZIE: I would prevent flour or fish or potatoes going out of Canada if their going out was making the cost of living beyond the reach of the people of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it beyond their reach?

Mr. McKENZIE: I would say so to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You would prevent wheat going out?

Mr. McKENZIE: I would prevent anything going out if that was raising the price to the point where our own people could not make a living.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Would the hon. member prevent wheat going out of Canada if our soldiers were starving in the trenches in France?

Mr. McKENZIE: There is no need of putting an extraordinary and absurd situation. If our soldiers in France were starving, we would divide our last bite with them. I would go on one meal a day and send the other two meals to the soldiers in France; I would do anything to help them; but the situation is not pressing nor present, and we should deal with facts and circumstances and situations as they are, and not take impossible ones that are not yet in sight and ask how we should deal with those things. This Government refuses to deal with conditions that are impelling, conditions that cry for remedy, conditions that are in the acutest possible stage. Therefore what is the good of asking me to tell what should be done in an extraordinary condition which has not yet arisen? We are trying to stir the Government up to take some steps in regard to the situation as it is, and then after we get them agoing, perhaps they will do something if such an extraordinary circumstance as the hon. gentleman has mentioned should arise.

I wish, for a moment, to refer to the manner in which the motion of my hon. friend from Richmond was received by the Government. I always sympathize with a man who keeps within his limits and who does not try to fly beyond the atmosphere and heights to which God and Nature intended him to soar. I, for that reason, sympathize with my good, congenial friend the Minister of Labour when he quietly and complacently accepts the situation, knows that he did nothing and smiles when he is told of it. I am sure that he must have enjoyed and quietly laughed to himself at the comedy that he has put on this afternoon. He told us about the heaps of wheat and straw, and particularly chaff that there were in Russia. It is a great consolation to the child down in the county of Cape Breton, where I come from, who may be crying for bread, to be told that there is abundance of it in Austria, Russia and other places. What I want to deal with, what the resolution deals with and what we want to stir this Government on, is the actual question that is now before Parliament. The Minister of Labour was honest enough to say that he did nothing at all except, forsooth, to send a man down to Montreal. That mission to Montreal has about the same effect as if one's house in the city of Ottawa were burning and the fire brigade arrived on the scene and they all stood back, and when a man would ask them: Why do you not put out the fire? they said, we have sent to Montreal for a bucket; when the bucket arrives from Montreal we will try to put out your fire. The one reason is just as effective as the other. Seven million people, we are told by the Solicitor General, are deeply interested in this question of the price of flour, and yet the only step the Government can take is to send a learned gentleman of my own profession to the city of Montreal to make slight inquiries as to whether the price of flour has gone up or down. I cannot for the life of me see what possible effect that will have. I was speaking about the way in which this proposition was received, and I was delighted to find the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) speaking on this question, not as a new one, because he has given us largely the same views that he presented to this House two years ago. He cannot be accused of being favourable, from a partisan standpoint, to any ideas we put forward on this side of the House. He has spoken more strongly than anyone on this side along the line of some action being taken by the Government. I think the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. W. H. Bennett) stated that this was all political buncombe. That is strong language, and I venture to say that he will not take the responsibility of telling the hon. member for Brantford that he, as a good, strong, straightforward party man, always a party man, came into this House this evening for the purpose of embarrassing this Government and talking political buncombe. Therefore, I think we must all reach the conclusion that the language used by the hon. member for East Simcoe was ill-advised and ill-considered, and that when in the quiet of his chamber he will think over it and think of the great question that is at stake, he will revise his opinion, and that if he had to speak again he would not use that very strong language. He was, however, to some extent, justified in his attitude by the speech of the Minister of Finance, who was very irritable. I was just thinking to myself what was the most distressing circumstance that I could put him in from a physical standpoint, that would put him in the irritable position he was in, and I was thinking that if I could get a lobster dragging a Scotch thistle down his spine that would be about the sensation that would put him in the nasty position he was in. It would be well for a man in the high sphere that the minister is in not to appear as if the lobster and the Scotch thistle were going down his back when he deals with questions of this kind. When men take high and responsible positions they must know that with the position goes the responsibility of receiving criticism and sometimes criticism that will not be just. The hon. member for Richmond approached this question this afternoon in a most reasonable and rational frame of mind, and there was no justification for getting into this apparent fury into which the Minister of Finance worked himself unless it was for the sole and only purpose of spraying around this dope in order to get his men behind him into that frame of mind where their party spirit would be up and they would be determined to vote for him, regardless of every other consideration, because he represented the Government. I could understand the Government's reception of this subject to-day if it was a new question, but it is not a new thing for a Government to deal with matters of private concern in this country. It is not a new thing, for instance, for this Parliament to establish a railway commission, whose duty it is to deal with private business, to regulate prices, not the price of food, but prices of commodities in this country are nevertheless regulated to some degree by the rulings of that commission. I venture to say that every province in this Dominion has its utilities board. In the province of Nova Scotia we have one, and I think there is also one in New Brunswick, and I am pretty sure there is one in Ontario, and in the other provinces of the Dominion. There are some cities and towns in this Dominion that do not own their own water supply; in some cases it is owned by corporations, and if the water supply is not properly furnished or if too much is being charged for it, the utilities commission of the province has the right to regulate the supply and control the price of the water. In like manner the price of lighting, telephones, and other public utilities are subject by legislation to the control of independent men appointed by the Government. The principle is therefore admitted. This Government not only admits the principle, but they have acted upon it in regulating the price of news print. Having acted upon the principle, having thus put themselves in the position of dealing with cases of this kind because too high prices are said to be charged, why do they not deal with flour or wheat or any other commodity just as readily as they deal with the raw material that goes into the making of a newspaper? I submit that a newspaper, while an excellent thing to have, is a luxury to a great many people, and we can do without luxuries. We can do without newspapers, although perhaps life may be very dull without them, but it is much more important that a workingman should be able to buy butter, bread and cheese for his wife and family than that he should open up the newspaper to them. The Minister acted quite properly, I presume, in helping out the newspaper people, but he gets into a passion and says that we are unrighteously and unfairly attacking the citadel of the Government when we suggest to him that the price of flour and other foodstuffs in the country should be brought down to that level where the purchasing power of the poor man could buy them. The principle, therefore, has been adopted in local politics, and has been acted upon by this Government. For that reason the Government have no ground for looking upon this as a new thing, or for taking umbrage at myself or the hon. member for Richmond or any other member who has spoken in support of the idea presented in this motion.

The Minister of Finance pointed out to us this afternoon that we have 100,000,000 bushels of wheat in this country. If there is any country in the world where flour should be cheap, that country is Canada. Canada, the United States, the Argentine Republic and other countries producing wheat in large quantities—these are the countries in which flour should be cheap. I cannot conceive of any good reason why the Government will permit the price of flour to soar beyond what is reasonable. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) told us that a fair price to the farmer, and one that he was willing to accept, was $1.70 a bushel. This is a fair basis to start with, and if the Government can secure to the people of Canada wheat at $1.70 a bushel, what justification is there for them allowing it to go up to something like $3 a bushel as it is now. I submit to the minister and to the Government that if it is true that flour is selling in the neighbourhood of $13 a barrel here, the miner at Glace Bay or Sydney will be paying at least $16 a barrel. My hon. friend from South Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) says it was selling down there at $15 a barrel last week. Since then the price has gone up $1.20 a barrel, so the miner down there must be paying $16 or more. I should like to point out to the minister that a miner with a family of seven or eight children would consume about two barrels of flour a month. A barrel of flour does not last in a house of that size more than two weeks, perhaps not that long. I venture to say that the earnings of the miner are not more than $48 or $50 a month. When you take $32 out of that for two barrels of flour, it leaves him only $16 to pay his rent and buy coal, groceries, clothing and so forth for his family. With flour at this price he cannot live at all, and the hon. member for Richmond and all of us come here and plead in the only place where we can seek for a remedy for this condition. The Government might well find fault if we had any other way open to us of trying to cut down the price. They might well say then, "Leave us alone, we are running the war; go somewhere else for a remedy." But we have no other place to go, and that being so, we are justified in coming here to the only power that can deal with questions of this kind.

According to the Minister of Finance we have 100,000,000 bushels of wheat in this country. That means 22,222,222 barrels of flour, allowing, as the minister said, four and one-half bushels of wheat to the barrel. I presume we have in this country about 100,000,000 barrels of flour, besides the wheat that is not ground. That is an enormous quantity of flour, more than we could expect to consume in this country for some time. But supposing we had nothing in the shape of ground flour in this country to-day, this 100,000,000 bushels of wheat that the Finance Minister speaks of would mean three and one-quarter barrels of flour to every man, woman and child in this country, and we are told we must pay something like $16 a barrel for every barrel of this flour. Surely there is no necessity for one moment for us to pay such an exhorbitant price, and we come to the Minister of Finance and ask him to take this matter in hand. These speculators occupy the front seats in the commercial synagogues and temples of this country. I submit to the minister that they pollute and contaminate the blessed streams of fair and righteous merchandising, and we are now asking the Minister of Finance, the Zaccheus of the Government, to take the knotted cords in his strong right arm and drive from the temples and synagogues, as was done of old, these men who are polluting the temple and contaminating the trade of this country. He may not have any precedent in his Government for this, but if he will look to sacred history he will find the One of old took the cords and drove those rascals out of the temple that were trying to rob and destroy the people and contaminate the trade of the country. We appeal to the Minister of Finance now to do the same thing to those men who are polluting our trade, and I am sure he will have the people of Canada behind him.

Of course, it may be a new departure for the Government to do something; but I would remind the hon. minister that before they came into office the people were accustomed to a Government that did things and saw to it that the people were protected. And if those now in power wish to gain the confidence of the people in the same degree that their predecessors did, they must come down, as Zaccheus of old came down from the tree, and do something to remedy public grievances. This subject is one of such vast importance to the people that I, representing here, as I do, a large body of working men, even though I could not bring anything new to the discussion I deemed it my duty to make myself heard in support of this motion. It has been said that we are attacking the farmers, and we are told that this is the day of the farmer. We are not attacking anybody, and I submit that this is not anybody's day to make undue profits. The dire distress of the country in this awful war is not anybody's opportunity to make undue profit or charge exorbitant prices. Every one of us owes a great deal to his profession or line in life, but none of us must take advantage of present circumstances to profit unduly by what we produce. The lawyer, or the doctor, has no business to charge more because there is a war, and the farmer owes a duty to the public to which he looks for the purchase of his goods. No man should take advantage of the fact that the war is on to demand prices that he could not possibly get at other times.

I trust the Minister of Finance and his colleagues will consider this matter carefully, and above all that they will disabuse their minds of the idea that there is any politics in the motion under discussion. Speaking for myself, nothing could be further from my mind. Nor do I see how political capital could be made out of this matter. It is our simple duty to the people to make Canada a good country to live in; and if prices of foodstuffs are soaring, making it impossible for men with small wages to enjoy reasonable conditions of life, it is the duty of this Government to try to remedy that evil, and it is my duty as a member of the House to point out what seems to me the way in which the Government can be of service to the people.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The times in which we are living are such as we have never before experienced. The liberty of the nation and of the individual is at stake. We are asked by the resolution now before the House to adopt very radical measures indeed with regard to one of the staple articles of food, and we have heard a good deal of criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite of the lack of action on the part of the Government with regard to this and other questions. I know that the tendency under ordinary conditions is to seek to make as much political capital as possible out of any question that comes up in Parliament. But at such a time as this I believe anything of that nature should be foreign to our minds, but that we should look on these questions honestly, and wholly in the interest of the country and of the cause for which we are contending. The slogan for the last few months has been "greater production." We have heard from practically every urban centre in Ontario, and we might almost say throughout the whole Dominion—men and women, everybody, urging upon the farmers the need of greater production in view of the danger confronting the people of the whole world. I believe it is wise that this should be done. The danger thus far is only one that is apprehended, but it may become a very real danger indeed. But I do not believe that the present situation has come about altogether as a result of this war. I believe we were leading up to this condition for a number of years before the war. There was an exodus from the rural districts to the urban centres for many years prior to 1914. I have viewed that movement with a good deal of concern, and have satisfied myself—and have so expressed myself on many occasions within the last fifteen years —that the time would come when the folly of the course pursued would become apparent to the people. It is unfortunate that a critical period should intervene at a time when we are called upon to put forth every exertion in the struggle in which we are engaged. I view with a good deal of concern the statement in the press that flour advanced by $1.20 a barrel yesterday. The statement has been made by a number of hon. gentlemen opposite that we should commandeer the wheat in the hands of present owners. The Minister of Finance has told us that a good deal of that wheat is owned by the Government of Great Britain, and is to be made available for the men who are contending in the struggle at the front. We also know that if you wish to promote production of food you must not hamper, but must encourage those who are engaged in that work. The argument has been advanced by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that the British Government, having made an offer of $1.30 a bushel for wheat, we should have appointed a dictator and should have purchased wheat at the same price. He suggested the price fixed by the Farmers' Association of Western Canada. I do not know that there is any other profession under the sun that is more of a gamble than farming. The farmer of Western Canada have no certainty as to what the result of his harvest is going to be. Seeding has just started now in a great deal of Canada and as to what the result will be nobody can tell. It may be that a great injustice would have been done to many farmers in Canada if the price of wheat had been fixed at even $1.70 a bushel because such a price is of very little use to the farmer if he has little to sell. It is the same in many of the older sections of Canada. You find that people are continuously referring to the enormous profits that the farmers are making I know tenant farmers who have the greatest struggle of their lives to make both ends meet. High prices are absolutely useless to the farmer if he has nothing to sell and he has much to purchase. That is the very condition that is confronting a great many people to-day. To commandeer the wheat crop of Canada is a very serious matter but it has been glibly suggested by a number of speakers that it should be done with regard to wheat and a great many other commodities as well. Potatoes have been referred to as another commodity which the Government should take control of. It is a remarkable thing that this scarcity of certain products has practically taken place in almost all parts of the world at the same time. It is something unique in the experience of the world that a shortage such as we experienced last year in the potato crop should have been so general in other countries. The same thing applies to wheat. With a thousand million bushels of wheat short last year, is it any wonder that the price of wheat has risen? Yet some hon. gentleman opposite say that the law of supply and demand should have nothing to do with this. Why should it not have anything to do with it? What other law should apply but the law of supply and demand? I believe that is the law that is regulating prices to-day. I believe the prices that are being fixed in the great markets of the world are a result of this condition. I wish that the law of supply and demand was the only law in fixing all prices. One of the reasons given for the high cost of living has been the large wages paid to the workmen engaged in the manufacture of munitions. I do not think that has had so much to do with it as some other things. This is a condition that has not arisen since the war but it is one up to which we have been gradually approaching for many years past. In Ontario, during the last twenty years, 125,000 people who were producers have moved to the towns and cities or to some of the other provinces. If this condition is general throughout the country what else could you expect but a food shortage? That is the very thing that we are confronted with to-day and the fixing of prices is not going to increase the quantity of foodstuffs but production will be increased only by the people who will get out and work on the land. Then, let the law of supply and demand govern. We have reached a stage to-day where agriculture is coming into its own. its own.

We have a country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, almost 4,000 miles, in extent one of the grandest stretches of agricultural land in the world, and instead of finding about fifty per cent of the people living in cities and towns, we should find a larger proportion out cultivating these broad acres and endeavouring to do something to meet the conditions with which we are confronted to-day. It is all very well to get up here, on the very next day after this unusual increase in the cost of wheat and flour, and advance the arguments that have been advanced. It would have been much better if we had realized that we have been approaching these conditions for a number of years past. I believe one of the chief reasons for the condition that confronts us to-day is the organization that has taken place in almost all other classes except those engaged in agriculture. The labour unions, we know, have organized themselves and the pay of the wage earner has been increased. I do not say it has been unduly increased but it has been increased to such an extent that the farmer has been unable to pay the price being paid by the manufacturers; consequently the labourers have drifted into the towns and cities and that is one of the things that has brought about the present scarcity. But it does not apply to Canada only. It is general throughout the whole world. In the United States, in the early days of the war, it was necessary to pass a war tax. Conditions became as acute there as in Canada. The removal of the duty on wheat and flour by the Government a few days ago, I believe, was a wise measure. It was something I was opposed to in years gone by but under the abnormal conditions with which we are now faced I think it was a wise measure on the part of the Government. I could not help thinking, as I listened to the hon. member for Assiniboia and other members opposite who have been condemning the Government to-night, what an outcry they would have raised if the Government had not taken the action they did in regard to this question.

I do not intend to say anything more in regard to that but I do feel that we must not lose sight of the fact that the people who have been endeavouring to keep the flag flying on the farms of Canada are entitled to some consideration at this time and that the future welfare of the country is bound up in these men who have been working long hours, who have been struggling under a mighty and heavy handicap in order to keep themselves going. We have practically reached the breaking point but I do not think for one moment that it is possible for the Government nor should we expect them to rescue us from the results of our own action. It will take time and the men of this country and other countries must realize that they have to till the soil in order to get food products. You cannot live on manufactured articles but you must live as a result of the fruits of the soil. No one regrets the suffering, which undoubtedly is in existence to-day in many places as a result of the high cost of living, more than the farmers of this country. I say further that the farmers have done their best. There is no class of people in Canada, the United States, or, I believe, any other country, that have laboured more diligently and with less reward for their services than have those who have been and are engaged in agriculture.

Mr. GEORGE W. KYTE (Richmond, N.S.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the very interesting debate we have had this afternoon justifies me for making the motion which I presented at the opening this afternoon. While we have not received any assurance from the Finance Minister, who spoke more particularly on behalf of the Government, that the very fair and reasonable request which I made will be taken seriously into his consideration, we have the satisfaction of knowing that the Liberal opposition does not stand alone in the desire to improve the conditions as outlined by me in this motion. We had a very interesting and illuminating address from the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) this afternoon, and his address ought to be a complete and effective reply to the allegation made by the Finance Minister that we on this side are actuated by motives of partisanship in the resolution which is now before the House, and which has been debated. The Finance Minister endeavoured to argue that it would be quite impossible for the Government to take any such action as suggested by me, and that in face of the fact that similar action was taken on a very important commodity to which I referred in my opening observations. I have a little more fully looked into that question since I addressed the House this afternoon, and I desire to communicate that information to the House. The proposal to fix the price of news print that was made to the Minister of Finance some weeks ago was accepted by him as a fair and reasonable proposition. What did he do? Officers of his department were sent to the manufacturers of pulp, and these officers proposed to the paper manufacturers that they must dispose of their paper at a price $10 in excess of that which they received a year ago. That price was not acceptable to the manufacturers of paper, and a subsequent offer was made by the officials of the Finance Department, which was to the effect that the manufacturers of paper must accept the sum of $2.50 per hundred pounds, or $50 a ton, for 20 per cent of the produce of their mills, which was estimated to be the quantity required for consumption in Canada. As to the balance of that production, they were free to sell it in whatever market they could and at whatever price they could obtain. With regard to the question of the price of flour and wheat referred to in my resolution, my proposition is solely that we eliminate the influence of the stock speculators in increasing the price of these commodities to the consumer. The total consumption of wheat in Canada for many years has been about 50,000,000 bushels. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) that the total population of Canada could not consume more than 25,000,000 bushels before the next crop is harvested and garnered. It is not then a matter of commandeering the whole wheat product of this country, because we have in Canada, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. It resolves itself down to a question to be disposed of in a manner similar to the manner in which the Finance Minister disposed of the question of news print at the request of the newspaper publishers.

The Solicitor General asked many times: What is it that the members of the Opposition ask the Government to do? He reiterated time and again that the doing something was entirely too indefinite, and that it was up to the Opposition to make some concrete suggestion as to what ought to be done under the circumstances. He was not present during the debate when other hon. members on this side of the House addressed themselves to the subject, and so had no opportunity of knowing what suggestions came from this side of the House. For his benefit I would repeat once more what my suggestion has been. It is to take over all the wheat outside of that which is in the actual possession of the farmers at present—and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) is willing that even the wheat at present in possession of farmers should be taken over—that that wheat be controlled by the Government; that the Government should go to the millers and ask them to mill that wheat at a reasonable price and distribute it to the consumers in Canada. If the millers should be unwilling to do that, the Government should then take control of the mills, should themselves mill the wheat at a reasonable compensation to the millers, and distribute it to the consumers. That is a concrete proposition, and I think the suggestion of the Solicitor General that we have not offered any proposal looking towards the solution of the difficulty is not justified in the light of speeches from this side of the House. The Solicitor General, while sidestepping the real question under consideration, went into some figures to show that Great Britain obtained a very much larger amount of money out of its war taxes, relatively, than did the Dominion of Canada. I do not know why the Solicitor General offered that argument to the House except to show that the manufacturers in Great Britain were making very much larger profits, relatively, than the manufacturers in Canada. Of course, the Solicitor General did not point out to the House that the basis of taxation in England differs vastly from that which is applied in Canada at the present time. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, a few days ago, brought down his Budget proposals, which include taxation of war profits up to 80 per cent. The total taxation to be exacted by the Finance Minister in Canada under the new war taxes does not amount to more than 30 per cent at the very outside, so that if a larger proportion of taxation is derived from the taxation of war profits in England than in Canada it is due to the larger proportion which is exacted by the Government, and not to larger profits by the manufacturers.

Mr. LALOR: Is it not a fact that the British Government took over a certain percentage of the excess profits over and above the average profits for a certain number of years?

Mr. KYTE: The statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer two days ago was that they were taking 80 per cent of the total profits for the present year.

Mr. LALOR: I think the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. The British Government, according to the new regulation, takes 80 per cent of the excess profits over and above the average profits of a number of years.

Mr. KYTE: That is true, 80 per cent of the total profits over and above a reasonable interest upon their investment.

Mr. LALOR: No, that is not it at all, over and above the average profits they were making for a number of years.

Mr. KYTE: But not including the profits since the war broke out—over and above the average profits for a number of years previous to the outbreak of the war.

Mr. LALOR: That is absolutely correct.

Mr. KYTE: The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) would like to convey the impression that it was 80 per cent over the average profits for the last three years, which is not the case.

Mr. LALOR: I do not think the hon. gentleman wants to be unfair. I did not want to lead anyone to suppose that it was the average profits for the last three years; it was the average profits for the three years previous to the war, and over and above that a percentage was taken.

Mr. KYTE: That was my understanding, so that there is no difference of opinion between us. Now, with regard to the conditions existing in Australia. The Government of Australia exacts 50 per cent of the profits upon all manufactures during the first year and 75 per cent during the second year.

The case made out by members representing the Opposition in the House this afternoon is absolutely unanswerable. The reply of the Finance Minister is to the effect that nothing can be done; that a disruption of trade would result if any action were taken. At the same time he intimated that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in Washington for the purpose of looking into this question. He further intimated that it would be impossible for us to do anything here unless some action were taken in the United States. I read in the New York Herald to-day a statement made by Mr. John Dillon, trade expert before the Senate Committee now considering the legislation proposed to fix the price of food products in the United States. Mr. Dillon said:

> I think it is a crime that men should have produced such a large volume of wheat last year and then the speculators should have obtained such high prices. The Government should take away their stocks of foods. If I knew to-day the speculators bought wheat at $1 and were selling it at $3 I would not hesitate to recommend the Government to take over the wheat and adjudicate prices.

That is just what we desire this Government to do at the present time. In the New York Times of May 2, I find the following:

> Wholesale grocers and food dealers who submitted bids on the big navy orders of April 19 have received notice from the Navy Department that they are to fill them at once at prices to be fixed later by the President of the United States. The notice was received while the dealers were anxiously awaiting news as to whether the department had accepted their bids, based on the prevailing high market prices. The action of the Navy Department was taken under a provision of the Naval Appropriation Bill adopted last March, giving the President the power to purchase war supplies "at reasonable prices." This is the form of the notice received by New York firms:
>
> In accordance with the authority conferred on the President by the Act of Congress March 5, 1917, I am directed to place with you the attached order. You will deliver the goods specified therein as directed, and the price to be paid therefor will be determined by the President in due course.
>
> Any representations you desire to make as to the price you claim for these goods should be submitted to this office with your bill on delivery. The attached order is based on proposals submitted by you to this office on April 19. Please acknowledge the receipt and acceptance of this order under the conditions of the same.
>
> Paymaster United States Navy.

Mr. MORPHY: May I ask the hon. gentleman to repeat the items that he mentioned?

Mr. KYTE: Perhaps it is further on. (Reading):

> This is the first time local jobbers have ever been called upon to deliver goods to the Government without knowing what prices were to be paid. The general opinion was that the Government had adopted the system for the purpose of making sure that it got the goods and at the same time preventing the advance in market prices, which was made about the time the Government asked for bids on the navy orders. One jobber ventured the opinion that in the future dealers might be rather slow to submit to the Government estimates of what they could furnish if they got a certain price, to be used as a basis for virtual commandeering of supplies, but the general sentiment was willingness to trust the President to see that prices were fair.

Mr. MORPHY: The hon. gentleman read them in the first part of the quotation.

Mr. KYTE: Yes; I assume that "wholesale grocers and food dealers' would cover such products as wheat and flour. Hon. gentlemen will observe, therefore, that practical action was taken by the Government of the United States a few weeks after they declared war. Canada has been a belligerent country for three years, and up to the present time no effective action in that direction has been taken by the Government. The arraignment of the Government on account of this dilatoriness and want of activity which was presented to the House by the hon. member for Brantford this evening was well deserved and absolutely justified. The Government having heard this discussion and having received intimation from one of its followers that he is dissatisfied with their lack of action in regard to this matter, I do trust that the consumers of Canada may reasonably hope that something will be done in the near future.

Motion of Mr. Kyte to adjourn the House negatived.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE ON ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The consideration of the proposed motion of Hon. Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment of Mr. Turriff thereto, was resumed from Tuesday, May 1.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski) (translation): Mr. Speaker, from the remarks by the eloquent orators who have hereto taken part in the debate on the Budget, I took it that the main question was that of free wheat. The subect is not wanting in interest. It may be considered from two viewpoints, as to-day's discussion shows.

The enhanced price of wheat in the western provinces must necessarily produce an increase in the cost of flour, and so the people in the East must pay a much higher price for this staple commodity. Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) censuring strongly the Government. At every session he was heard in condemnation of the Government because the latter would not grant to the western provinces a greater measure of reciprocity. Yet the gentleman hails from an eastern constituency, having been born, as myself, in the county of Rimouski, where he has still important interests and many relatives.

I think he must remember—having been brought up in that section of my province—that the province of Quebec has some interests it seeks to protect, and he cannot but admit that the western part of Canada should not monopolize all our attention and efforts.

In support of my claim, I shall quote from a speech I delivered last year in this House. I shall read the English version, so as to be understood by the hon. members who do not understand French. My remarks were as follows:—

All the points of the question have been sifted again and again and all its aspects scrutinized, and from all the twaddle what stands out clear to me is that the western members are using the question as an electoral war-horse. They take it up as a good means of boosting their case and ensuring their re-election.

A while ago one of the western members attacked the Government for not giving the farmers all the help they were entitled to. Yet, if any people should grumble against want of solicitude on the part of the Government, surely not those farmers. Every time they are the victims of some slight mishap, a drought or a frost, they appeal to the Government and immediately millions of dollars are put at their disposal to enable them to tide over the crisis. Our eastern farmers have not the same recourse. If the harvest is bad, or they suffer from frost, they have to shift for themselves without any one coming to their aid. Of all farmers who have no reason to grumble, those of the prairies are first, for the Government is lavish in its favours to them.

The same orator complains that agricultural implements were not allowed to be imported free of duty from the United States, he claims the tariff in that respect is detrimental to them, and in support of his contention he maintains that the higher price paid for the same machinery in Canada than obtains across the border is disadvantageous to the farmer, that it is in fact money taken from the purse of the farmer and given to the manufacturer. So be it, but, in my opinion, when the hon. member further stated that only the manufacturers reap the benefit of the tariff, he is clearly mistaken. The workmen also find it be to their benefit. It must not be forgotten that in those manufactories are to be found workmen to whom the tariff is a benefit in the form of employment. Granted even that an article be something higher in price in Canada than it is in the United States, it seems to me that if the western people were good patriots, they would not begrudge this slight sacrifice to allow Canadian workmen to find his sustenance in this, our common country. After all we are not an agglomeration of two or three Canadas, but we form an entity destined to live as a whole in this country, and no section ought to be indifferent to the necessities of another section.

There is another subject I would call to the attention of my hon. friend from the West. We have, out of the public treasury, built for their use, at fabulous cost, three railways, designed to move their harvest and bring their produce to the Canadian harbours to be thence shipped overseas.

We are now building also, at their request, a request made to the late administration and repeatedly pressed upon the present Government,—a burdensome railway, the Hudson Bay railway, to afford them a shorter route to the European markets. I would like to know the bottom reason for those railroad constructions. Why are we wasting so much money on the Hudson Bay road—built only for the benefit of our western countrymen, since neither Ontario nor Quebec nor the Maritime provinces can utilize it; why waste so many millions for those western farmers, if those gentlemen are bent on dealing on the American market? Is that fair? Let them insist with the Government that a stop be put to that useless expenditure on the Hudson Bay railway. It might be after all to the country's advantage to abandon those undertakings and allow the western people freedom of trade with the United States. One of the previous orators stated that in the West the farmer made no money. It appears to me there is not much patriotism in coming here to make such a declaration. If in the West the farmers do not make money, why then ask so much for colonization, why all this propaganda to draw settlers to a region where results are so deceptive?

I, however, have it in my mind that the farmers of the West coin money much more freely than in the East. Had I spoken in the stead of the hon. member I should certainly not have delivered myself of such a remark, because it is not in the interest of his province. We all know that for the most part the western agriculturists are well-to-do and that many of them become rich with much less pains than our eastern farmers.

Such are the few remarks I wished to make. I make them without acrimony and in the best possible intention, so that our friends from the West may realize that they should not be parties to these unhealthy agitations, that they are not the only inhabitants of this country, but that on the contrary, they have to live in close community with the other parts of Canada, and that their first thought should be the general interests of the country, and not those of a particular section.

These remarks, which I have just quoted from my speech of last year, are very fair and very just, and I still believe that the giving of such advantages to our friends of the West is contrary to the interests of the East. We in the East are ready to support the measure that has been put into force lately by this Government in order to afford an opportunity to our western friends to sell their wheat at a high price; we are ready to make the sacrifice, but on one condition, and it is that these gentlemen immediately cease thinking that Canada exists only for themselves, and that they should remember that there are other parts of the country that want to be protected. With regard to the continual cry for free trade with the United States, while I admit that this will be a benefit for the West, at the same time it is contrary to our interest in the East, and we are solidly against it, and as a patriot I would ask my friends from the West to advise their supporters that they are not alone in this country, and that they must bear their share of the burdens of nationhood, sharing in the disadvantages as well as the advantages that may result from tariff reform. In the East we are patriots from an economic standpoint as well as from a fighting standpoint. I am sorry to see published in the western papers attacks against the East, and principally against the province of Quebec, for not doing its duty in this great war. Let me tell the House that the county of Rimouski alone has furnished no less than 800 soldiers for overseas, and the neighbouring counties of Bonaventure and Gaspe have, to a large extent, furnished their share. As the representative of the county of Rimouski, which has furnished such a large number of volunteers to our Canadian army, I say that such attacks should not be made. When, the other day, I heard the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) quote from a paper a letter from an officer who passed through the province of Quebec, charging our people with insulting the soldiers when they were passing through that province, I was really sorry to hear such an unjust accusation. I do not say that my hon. friend made that statement in order to insult us, for, perhaps, he thought that it might be true, but I may assure the House and the people of Canada that in my county and the adjoining counties of Bonaventure and Gaspe, which have furnished so many soldiers, the people are in entire sympathy with the valiant Canadians who go overseas to defend us.

Whether they come from British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, or any other province we are delighted to see the soldiers going overseas to defend our liberty and fight in the cause of humanity. If there have been any such instances as alleged, I should like to see the facts established, and the responsibility placed where it belongs. It may be that soldiers, just like private citizens, have made mistakes occasionally at some of the railway stations in Quebec, and if they insult the people they must expect to be insulted in return. I know that if the soldiers were insulted at Rivière du Loup and Mont Joli, it would be because of the behaviour of the soldiers themselves, not all of them, but a few. The people had no thought of insulting them until they were provoked. I know of one instance where soldiers have insulted women. In Campbellton, which is not in the province of Quebec, some of them took the liberty of seizing a horse and wagon, shoving the proprietor aside, and taking a ride around the town. Other soldiers burst into a liquor store in the same town, and took the whole contents. They must naturally expect to be insulted when they do things like that. But these are merely isolated cases, and bad-will must not be imputed to our people, because we are just as patriotic as any of our fellow Canadians and just as eager to win the war. I trust that steps will be taken by the Government or militia authorities to ascertain whether the allegations made by this officer are true, and if an investigation is held I am sure it will be found that his charges are baseless.

I would take this opportunity of asking the newspapers of the West to cease their attacks upon us. Soldiers from the West, who have read these articles in the western newspapers, must be prejudiced against the province of Quebec, and in passing through our province on their way overseas, they are apt to take offence at little things which otherwise would pass unnoticed. As soon as this depreciation of the province of Quebec in our western newspapers ceases, the better it will be for all the people of this country.

In listening to the speeches on the motion by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), I heard hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House one after the other criticise the Government for not doing so and so. The Government was not doing its duty in trying to meet present conditions, they said. In my opinion these charges are a disgrace to those who preferred them. When we think of the terrible crisis with which the Government is confronted, and of the courage displayed not only by the Government as a whole, but by the distinguished gentleman who presides over the Finance Department, instead of trying to deprecate him and accuse him of not doing his duty, hon. gentlemen opposite should get up and praise him for the ability he has shown in conducting the financial affairs of this country since the beginning of the war. Instead of indulging in criticism of that sort hon. gentlemen should get together and help the Government, regardless of party, to pull through the hard times with which we are confronted. One hon. gentleman opposite asks, "What has the Government done since the beginning of the war to meet the situation?" It should not be necessary to ask such a question. We had to raise, equip and send overseas in a very short time 400,000 soldiers. The money had to be raised to pay these men, and to meet our obligations in connection with the war. Besides that, the Government had to carry on the ordinary public services of this country just as in times of peace. The war made the situation confronting the Government ten times harder than anything a government in this country had ever faced before, and I think when hon. gentlemen opposite think of these things, they should compliment the Government instead of reproaching them.

As a representative of the East, I feel very keenly the hard times through which we are passing. The price of flour we should all be very glad indeed to see come down. Our labourers are confronted with a situation we have never before had in this country, and I am sure that if no other solution of the problem can be found, in order to bring down the price of flour and of meat, our farmers in the East would not grumble if the price of potatoes was cut in half and they received only $1 per bushel. I know, from having talked with several of them, that they would be glad to sell their potatoes at $1 a bushel, provided that the prices of flour and meat were reduced proportionately. I have enough confidence in the Government to believe that if this conclusion can be brought about they will take means to that end. That being so, there is no need for the opposition to criticize and to try to embarrass the situation. For my part, I think the best thing we can do is to act as patriots, to act unanimously, and, if we have suggestions, to make them to the Government, in order that we may be united in carrying on and bringing to a successful conclusion the present terrible war.

On motion of Mr. McKenzie the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Friday, May 4, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE POTATO SUPPLY.

On the Orders of the day:

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. McCrea) who had to leave the House, I beg to read a telegram which he has just received from Sherbrooke. It is as follows:

Sherbrooke, P.Q., May 3.

F. N. McCrea, M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

The provision merchants of the City of Sherbrooke, at a public meeting held on the third day of May, 1917, unanimously adopted the following resolution: Whereas, according to the Gazette, in reply to a question, the Hon. Mr. Burrell has informed the House that there is at this date a million bushels of potatoes in Canada, generally held by the farmers of Alberta, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. Whereas, by messages and letters addressed to dealers of potatoes in the Maritime Provinces, the reply is that there is no stock to offer, and in most cases there is no reply at all; furthermore, that the ruling price in Montreal being prohibitive, there are no potatoes obtainable in our section; we therefore respectfully ask our deputy, Mr. F. N. McCrea, to inquire again from the hon. minister if he maintains his figures as being correct at this moment, and, if so, to give sufficient information so that a part of that surplus may be imported to this section without further delay.

This is signed by Mr. N. Lacroix and about twenty others, grocers, I presume, of Sherbrooke. I am requested to ascertain from the Minister of Agriculture if there is any information which he can give in connection with this matter.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have very much to add to the statement I made the other afternoon, namely that on the date mentioned, the end of February, we did ascertain not only from the various ministers of agriculture but also from such trade sources and official sources as were available, the situation throughout Canada. As I mentioned the other day, the surpluses in the Maritime Provinces were as follows: In New Brunswick, 750,000 bushels was the lowest estimate and 1,250,000 the highest; in Prince Edward Island, the lowest estimate was 500,000 bushels; and in Alberta the lowest estimate of surplus was 800,000 bushels. So we estimated that there was about one and one-half million bushels of surplus, and up to the middle of April, watching the exports, there would be left probably about one million bushels surplus. We made use of every possible source of information.

In regard to the telegram which my hon. friend has read, I may repeat the action that we took: we communicated all these facts to the ministers of agriculture for the respective provinces. We also suggested that as in some of their districts there appeared to be a surplus and in others a shortage, if the provincial minister of agriculture thought there was a shortage in the whole province it would be desirable, having placed all this information at his disposal, for him and for other ministers, as far as possible, to look after the shortages and requirements in their own provinces. That, it seems to me, was the proper action to take, and short of taking very drastic action indeed, that is of embargoing or fixing a price, which would carry a great many complications with it and would raise a great many protests, I do not know that we could go any further. I will look into the matter again and corroborate the statement to date, and shall again find out what the exports have been; and if I can give further information to the House within the next day or so, I shall be glad to give it.

THE HIGH PRICE OF FLOUR.

STATEMENT BY SIR THOMAS WHITE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the House certain information which I think will be of interest in view of the discussion yesterday with reference to the recent sensational rise in the price of wheat on the Winnipeg Exchange. In confirmation of the statement which I made yesterday in my speech upon the subject, I have learned this morning, from what I regard as dependable financial and commercial sources, that the corner which has occurred on the Winnipeg wheat market has been brought about by the unusually large buying of the British Wheat Commission. That commission has been purchasing contract grades of wheat, and I understand that elevators and other vendors in the ordinary and, I believe, legitimate course of business, have been selling for May delivery, and that many of them have found themselves unable to fill their contracts with the contract grades of wheat. The result has been that the price of wheat has been driven up by the endeavours of those vendors to obtain wheat of contract grades for May delivery. It has been suggested that the British Wheat Commission should accept from these vendors, to the extent that they are unable to deliver contract grades of wheat, wheat of a lower grade to an equivalent amount, having regard to its proportionate value for milling purposes. The information which I desire to give to the House is that, understanding that that was the situation, I yesterday morning cabled Sir George Perley to take up the question with the British Wheat Commission, and I have to-day cabled him further in the matter; and if, as a result of those cables, relief is not afforded to the situation, the Government will have to consider such further action as we may deem expedient in the public interest.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is there any restriction against the mixing of wheat for the making of flour in Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. MARCIL: Has there been any large increase in the sale of wheat in the United States since the Order in Council concerning free wheat was passed?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not looked up the statistics.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has it occurred to my hon. friend that so long as it is known that the British Wheat Commission is buying there may always be expected to be a corner to hold them up, and that occasion may be taken to advise against that?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In answer to my right hon. friend, I may say that it has long been known that the British Commission are the principal buyers for export.

THE BUDGET.

DEBATE ON ANNUAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The consideration of the proposed motion of Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance) for the Committee of Ways and Means, and the amendment of Mr. Turriff thereto, was resumed from Thursday, May 3.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention to the speech delivered last night by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Boulay). As the hon. gentleman took advantage of the ease and facility with which he can change from one language to another, his speech was of a somewhat broken character, and while I could follow him fairly well when he spoke in English, I am sorry to say that he can very effectively draw a cloud between myself and his speech when he plunges into French. I have learned, however, from that speech, to know that he loves the Government in spots. A few evenings ago he took the Minister of Railways and Canals by the back of the neck, threw him out of the window and tore to tatters everything pertaining to his department. But last night I noticed that the Minister of Finance was the chiefest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely. It was further observable from his speech that while he is no doubt a very patriotic son of the province of Quebec, his Toryism is nevertheless stronger than his patriotism. He was quite willing to treat very tenderly, indeed, what was regarded as a strong affront offered to his province by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best), whom he let down very easily, with the touch of a velvet glove, saying, like one of old: Lord, forgive him, for he knew not what he did. With these observations it is not my purpose to follow any further the speech of the hon. member for Rimouski. I do congratulate him, however, upon his excellent command of the English language. We shall no longer pardon him when he insists upon putting himself forward as a man who does not understand English, because he disclosed to us yesterday the fact that he is well equipped in that respect, and that the needs of his constituency can well be set forth by him in the House through the medium of that very excellent vehicle of thought.

There are two occasions in particular upon which the representatives of the people in any House of Commons under the British flag have a wide sway in dealing with matters of a general character. One of these is in the debate on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, and the other is when the King comes before the Commons and asks for money to run the business of the country, as that is what the Budget is for. On these occasions it is particularly fitting that the voice of the people, as represented in this House, should be presented to the Government, and particularly to the minister in charge of the country's finances.

Last night the hon. member for Rimouski rather chastised gentlemen on this side, because, forsooth, we sometimes criticise the Government. In all British countries in which government of the people and for the people prevails and in which a system of government by majority is carried out, it is the function of the Opposition to criticise and to give their judgment squarely and honestly upon any question that comes up in the House. If the Opposition did not squarely and honestly voice its opinions, party government would necessarily become a failure. I submit, Sir, that it is our duty to follow that course, and, availing myself of that constitutional right, I purpose, in my own humble way, presenting some criticisms of this Government.

As has already been brought to the notice of the House, the regime of the present Administration can be divided into two parts. One of these dates from the inception of the Government in October, 1911, and continues to August 4, 1914. The other runs a somewhat double course, between the war obligations and duties of the Government, and such time as the Government have been able to devote to ordinary business. I submit that this Government have not lived up to the high standard set for them by the outgoing Government of my right hon. friend who now leads the Opposition, either in the matter of progressive measures in the interest of the people or in the matter of handling the finances which were left in their charge. They have fallen into errors which could have been avoided, and these errors, which have been going on from day to day, are going on now. The Government have not handled the war well and the finances of the country have not been husbanded in the best interests of that great undertaking upon which our country so loyally and patriotically launched. It was a grave mistake on the part of the Government, on the part of the ex-Minister of Militia and of the present Minister of Militia, to handle the money used in connection with the war on strictly party lines. The cause of the Government being everybody's cause, and the energy of everybody in the land being devoted to one great purpose, any moneys to be expended should be expended equally among all the people, and party lines should have entirely vanished. Such was not the case at any time since the war began, and such is not the case to-day. I arraign the Government before the bar of public opinion in that they have fallen short of the broad and big duty that devolved upon them in that connection. I point them to the Mother Country, from which we are proud to take our pattern in many matters, and direct the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that in that country party differences, party patronage and party advantage have been entirely dispelled; the great statesmen have joined hands in doing what was considered to be in the best interests of their great united effort. Here we do no such thing, and we have in Canada by reason of that fact great drawbacks, great heart-burnings and much dissatisfaction.

I purpose submitting to this House evidence which goes to show that there did not exist amongst the Government themselves that harmony and that unity of effort that should exist under such conditions as we have been up against since the declaration of war on the 4th day of August, 1914, and I purpose giving a few pieces of testimony from one who at least was in a position to know what was going on in the sanctum sanctorum of the Government. Whether that person whom I am going to quote is giving the facts or not it is for the Government to judge; but we on the outside have a right to suppose that when a man has been elevated to the high position of an adviser to His Majesty, a Minister of the Crown, then, and while he is dealing with matters appertaining to his high office and after he leaves that office, he is gentleman enough to tell the truth and that he would scorn to lie about anything that pertains to the discharge of his duties or to what belongs to his expression of them after he leaves office. The speech which was made on the 26th day of April last at Lindsay in this province by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) discloses a condition of things which, at least to me, appears to be deplorable, and which goes to show that the united effort of this country could not possibly be put forward under the machinery afforded to us by the Government of the day. I am not vouching for the truth of the report of that speech; it is reported in the Toronto Globe of the 30th of April, and that report is available to the whole world, and I have not had brought to my attention any contradiction of the speech made by the ex-minister on that occasion or of the charges that were laid at the door of the present Adminstration. I have read over that speech with care and have picked out of it the various charges that were made against the Government, and I purpose submitting them to the House in their order. They are grave and serious; and if they are not truthful, the ex-Minister of Militia should be called to account for publishing them to this country and giving them the authority of his prestige as a Knight, as a member of this House and as ex-Minister of Militia and Defence. I have tabulated those charges running in order from (a) to (m). They are:

(a) That more than a year ago the Government interfered to stop recruiting, particularly the Prime Minister.

(b) That there was Governmental interference in the sending of the First Contingent, the interference being by the now overseas Minister of Militia, Sir George Perley, and Sir Thomas White, Minister of Finance.

(c) That there was useless and wasteful expenditure of public moneys, because the advice of the then Minister of Militia was overruled by the Government.

(d) That the High Commissioner and the Minister of Finance have tried to create trouble for the Minister of Militia in England, and as he puts it himself, to create an unwholesome atmosphere for him in that country, and that this was going on from the very commencement of the war.

(e) That those gentlemen bribed or attempted to bribe and purchase the influence of the Canadian press, both in Canada and Great Britain, for the purpose of thwarting and defeating the plans of the Minister of Militia.

(f) That newspapers, friendly to Sir Thomas White, Minister of Finance, made vicious attacks on the Minister of Militia of that day.

(g) That an envenomed poisonous conspiracy was entered into by the members of the Government to assassinate the Prime Minister—that is, of course, politically—and as a preliminary to slay the Minister of Miliita.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I presume you still mean politically.

Mr. McKENZIE: Further:

(h) That the Prime Minister was informed that his colleagues and subordinates in the Cabinet were conspiring and thirsting for his political life.

(i) That the branch of the Finance Department which had to do with the paying of troops and other expenses in England had been rotten, that is plain Anglo-Saxon.

(j) That the medical service and organization in connection therewith was no better.

(k) That attempts were made by enemies of the minister in the Cabinet to "sweeten the press"—"Sweeten the press" are the exact words of the minister—and to influence bankers and brokers of Canada, all of which was done at the cost of the poor people of this country—meaning, of course, that the moneys of the Finance Department were used for bribery and corruption in order to render abortive the efforts of the Minister of Militia to place an efficient and effective Canadian army in the field.

(l) That the then Minister of Militia advised in 1914 that there should be a general election and was over-ruled. And this last charge is possibly the most serious of all.

(m) That the Ross Rifle was discarded by the Government and its agencies, not because there was anything wrong with the rifle but because of the malign influences of "German gold,"—thus insinuating that his colleagues and others in authority accepted bribes from the enemy.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would not that mean that the objectors to the Ross rifle had been influenced by German gold? They would be the Opposition.

Mr. McKENZIE: The ex-Minister of Militia, as any one can see by his speech, was arraigning and criticising his former colleagues in the Government; he was saying nothing about the Opposition and it was not in the power of the Opposition to discard the rifle. He was speaking about the people who discarded the rifle and who brought about the conditions which made it impossible to use that rifle further, and he said that those conditions were successful, not because there was anything the matter with the rifle, but because German gold was too influential. That is what he said, and it is for the Government and hon. gentlemen who are in touch with the ex-Minister of Militia to find out what he said. To the ordinary person who understands the English language, his words mean that somebody or a number of persons who brought about the discarding of the Ross rifle, did so, not because there was anything wrong with the rifle, but because German gold was too influential. That is the way I understand his language, and that is the way it has been expressed in the loyal city of Lindsay in the loyal province of Ontario, by a super-loyal ex-Minister of the Crown. That is an arraignment of the Government by a former colleague which we on the outside, until the contrary is shown, must accepted as being correct. If correct, it shows the condition of things in connection with handling of the war to have been absolutely deplorable. According to the minister himself, while he was doing his best to carry out his plans for putting our armies in the field, he was thwarted by a bad element, and an unwholesome atmosphere was created against him at the War Office and in official circles in England by the High Commissioner, a member of this Government. That is a sad condition of affairs, if true. It may not be true, but the minister says that it is and it is up to him and his friends to prove to this country whether it is so or not. Why even gold was used against him. The money of this country was taken to sweeten the press. The press was bribed in order to secure their influence in maligning the minister in order to defeat his purposes. No language that I can use is strong enough to characterize a condition of that kind, and I submit that for that reason I am justified in saying on this occasion to the Government and to this country that hon. gentlemen opposite have not handled the war well; nor are they entitled to any credit for their conduct of the war, nor is it in the interests of a successful prosecution of our share in the war that its conduct should be left any longer in their hands. If the people of this country or if we in this House believe that what the ex-Minister of Militia has stated here is correct, then the sooner the carrying forward of military matters in this country is put on a sounder basis, the better it will be for the country and the better for all who are deeply interested in the war.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman believe it himself? It would greatly shorten the debate if he would tell us.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not know that I am bound to follow this leading kindly light that is coming to my help, but I said at the opening of my remarks that when a man has attained to the high position of a minister of the Crown, it is incumbent on a humble man like myself to believe what he says until the contrary is proved. I therefore believe that what the minister says is true, and shall believe it until I get some satisfactory evidence to the contrary. Of course, I am open to conviction when it comes in a proper way. Irishman-like, I might ask my hon. friend for Peterborough if he believes it. I will not press him to put his reply on Hansard, if he does not wish to do so, but it is up to him either to believe it or to say that the ex-minister is not telling the truth.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. gentleman like me to give him an answer?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Speak now.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am ready.

Mr. McKENZIE: This phase of the Government's management of our war operations is thus brought strongly into the full glare of public opinion, and it is the duty of a loyal Opposition that regards itself as having some responsibility to bring these matters to the notice of the public, and then, to some extent, our duty has been performed, and the duty of those in power begins, of clearing up such charges as are laid at their doors.

Coming back to the question of patronage and of party lines being so closely drawn, I submit that abuses have taken place in this country in connection with the expenditure of the public moneys of this Dominion, some of them are in my own province, which show a gross lack of business principles and of business ideas on the part of the Government, and a most reckless expenditure of public moneys, which were worse than thrown away. A few days ago we had the opportunity of seeing a short synopsis of a very lengthy report filed by the Hon. Sir Charles Davidson in connection with an inquiry conducted by him into the sale of horses in the province of Nova Scotia. I am sorry we have not the full report, but presume the reporter who prepared this synopsis has quoted correctly. The two principal buyers, Todd Woodworth and F. B. Keever, are found guilty of being short in their accounting for public moneys which they spent in securing horses for the Militia Department. Sir Charles finds Woodworth short to the amount of $2,224, and Keever to the amount of $2,968. W. P. McKay, a buyer under Keever, is personally exonerated, and so is G. H. Oakes, but regarding the former the commissioner remarks that "as a horse buyer he does not rank high, or at all." That some very old nags were bought is fully established, including the famous steed twenty-three years old, and the one which at a sale some three years previously had been traded for two ducks and a drake. Further on the report says:

> After getting credentials from the Department, Foster proceeded to St. John, N.B.

Now we have always been told in this House that nobody knew how Foster got his appointment and how his toboggan was started, but we have here the report of Sir Charles Davidson, after hearing all the evidence, that Foster got his credentials from the department. There is no doubt any longer as to how he got started or who put him on the road. He got credentials from the department, and it would be interesting to know what the purport of those credentials was. Sir Charles reports that after getting these credentials from the department Foster proceeded to St. John, New Brunswick, where by pre-arrangement he met Gifford H. Oakes, of Kentville, N.S., secretary of the Liberal-Conservative Association of Kings County, and William P.

McKay, son of the late Senator McKay of Truro, then resident of Ottawa, and Keever. The instructions were given, blank cheque books issued, and the buying commenced. All the parties had to do with it. The parties concerned were Foster, the chief, Woodworth, Keever, McKay and Oakes. The commissioner says that Foster's instructions, which would have hampered the committal of fraud, were breached from the outset, because he did not exact the delivery of price tags precedently or even concurrently with handing out cheques for equivalent amounts. Sir Charles says:

> In fairness to Oakes, Mr. Foster himself later on acquiesced in this practice and issued cheques of like character.

That is, cheques were filled in for large amounts and handed over to Keever, Woodworth, McKay and others, without the slightest knowledge of what they were going to do with the money. There were no horses in sight and no vouchers in sight. It was simply a case of filling in cheques for any amount that Keever would say, and then going to the bank for the money and starting out to buy. Sir Charles further finds that there was > Abandonment in almost entirety of a system of individual checks to individual sellers, carried with it the pressing duty of precise bookkeeping methods; of the securement of vouchers, of accountings and balancings practically day by day; all to the end—apart from the delicate responsibility which attached to Mr. Foster by reason of his position as a member of Parliament—that a final all-sufficient statement might be rendered to the department. Unfortunately methods of performance fell far short of these requirements.

The digest of the report published in the newspaper gives the closing part of Sir Charles' report, as follows:—

> Slipshod financial methods and the disgraceful purchase in a number of cases of horses venerable as to age and decrepit as to quality, have given substantial credence to the belief that inefficiency was the rule and not the exception.

But there is an extraordinary suggestion in Sir Charles' report, which, I am sure, will be as startling to other members of the legal profession as it was to me. He finds that between Keever and Woodworth well over $5,000 was stolen—actually stolen. And he had not the means of knowing all that they stole, for he does not know how many horses they bought—they took good care from the beginning that there should be no evidence, no receipts from the men they paid, and no record of the horses they took over—and the money was dumped out regardless of even the most ordinary business principles. In some mysterious way the commissioner has found out that there were the shortages I have named. But here is the extraordinary thing. He says that, if such a thing should happen as that these men should account for this money, $300 should be allowed them for their travelling expenses. That is a new departure. Suppose that principle were carried out generally. A house-breaker starts from Ottawa and goes to Toronto for the purpose of cracking a safe. Carrying out that operation, he steals $2,000. He is caught and made to account for the money. The judge, acting under the principle laid down here, allows that burglar his travelling expenses. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) will say whether that is sound or not, nor have I the view of the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) on that subject. One thing is sure, if the Solicitor General will say that it is sound he will get a majority on that side of the House to back him up. If he introduces legislation confirming this report and so allowing travelling expenses to Messrs. Keever and Woodworth, he has only to make one of his usual insinuating speeches to call us down hard and to tell us we are bad Grits and obstructionists, and the Bill will be put through with enthusiasm. But, as I say, this is a new departure. And I need hardly tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in the fair province of Nova Scotia, where we profess to know a little about law, we have not yet heard that it is sound law to offer a premium of this kind to theft, highway robbery, and rascality. But these are the things which have been going on in this country under the eye of our big, solemn-looking, capable, watchdog of the treasury.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: I desire to be absolutely serious about this, for I represent a serious people, many of them poor working people who have no money to pay the travelling expenses of Messrs. Keever and Woodworth. They want a quid pro quo for every dollar they pay into the treasury, and I am here to see to it, so far as I can, that their money shall be used for serious and honest purposes.

Now, what are we going to do about it? The Auditor General is called from time to time to give evidence before committees of this House. The members supporting the Government seem to look upon him as a fiend incarnate. He is "Belled, booked and candle lighted" every time he appears. If he were not a Scotchman, and determined to do his duty, he would have been driven to the woods long ago. But he stands to his guns; he is doing the best he can. Yet, after all, he is rather helpless. The real power is in the hands of the Minister of Finance, and it is for him to see to it that the people's money is not stolen and squandered in this way any longer.

I began by saying that in my judgment the record of this Administration does not compare favourably with that of their predecessors. When the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who now leads the Opposition, came into power in 1896, he found the finances and the industries of this country at the lowest ebb. All hon. gentlemen opposite who have kept in touch with industrial and monetary matters know that. Even in the year when the Government that preceded his went to the country, and when they would naturally do all that was possible to make a good showing, its Minister of Finance (Sir George Foster) was obliged to admit a very heavy deficit. The credit of the country was low. It was when things were in this condition that the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took control of the country's affairs. And hon. gentlemen ought to know as well as I that it is not too much to say that on the day when he took power the sun that had risen in adversity set in prosperity. And that prosperity continued for fifteen years throughout his Administration. So great was that prosperity that the slogan of those who opposed him in the election of 1911 was "Let well enough alone." They declared that everything was lovely, magnificent, splendid; that the best of conditions prevailed; and they insisted that no chances be taken on a change.

That was the position in which the right hon. gentleman left the country and it was in striking contrast with the position in which he found it. But, comparing these records, I am bound to point out to the Government that during the regime of my right hon. friend, the immigration policy which was headed from the earliest day of that Government by the Hon. Mr. Sifton, was a great success. For the 18 long years that the Conservatives were in power, instead of a population ruling in the West we had the buffalo and Red Indian in full control. When the policy of Mr. Sifton and the Administration of my right hon. friend came in, the Indians and the buffalo were bound to give way to the tide of a strong, vigorous, and intellectual immigration. The West sprang up into the condition in which it is to-day, the little hamlet gave place to strong settlements, settlements to towns, and towns to thriving and prosperous cities. That is the record that stands to the credit of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition and who had brought such progress, advancement and prosperity to the country in the fifteen years that he was in power.

He and his Government not only developed the West but they developed the country from one end to the other. No person knows better than the Minister of Finance that the railway policy of the former Government was of the widest and strongest character, that he developed the Northwest Territories by building railways through the direct agency of the Government and by helping other railways financially and otherwise. Arrangements were made with the great system of railways controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company which were highly beneficial to the people of the West and many of the strangleholds which that great corporation had upon the people of that country were removed and a freedom was given to the people which was foreign to them up to that time. Trade and navigation had been developed by the improvement of the canals and great waterways of this country. Improvements had been made along the coast of Nova Scotia and other parts of the Dominion which have been of great assistance to trade and navigation and which are particularly important to the fishermen of this country. I submit to you, Sir, and I submit to the Government and to every leading man in this House that we have been too slow in recognizing the importance of developing our coastal harbours and providing facilities for the fishermen. I submit to you, Sir, that the fishery fields of British Columbit, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are just as important to the people of the country as are the wheat fields of Ontario and the West. While we are glad to expend money in encouraging the development of the wheat fields, we should also be equally happy, knowing that we are aiding the business of the country equally as well, when we are putting the fishermen in a position to make the most of the vocation to which they are called. I cannot say much about the coastline of British Columbia, or what the extent of the coastal fisheries of British Columbia are beyond saying that the fisheries are very extensive, but from the boundary line between Maine and Canada around New Brunswick on the Atlantic and down to pretty near Labrador, you have immense coastal fisheries on the eastern shore of this country. You all know what an excellent article of food fish is. If we have plenty of fish, potatoes and flour, there is no danger of hunger invading the home of anybody in Canada. It is therefore highly important that the fishermen should be put in the position that they can go out with their boats from sheltered harbours and that they can return to them because, if this is not done, they are handicapped and put in competition with American fishermen who come with large vessels which our men cannot afford to build, get our fish and sell them back to us again in such cities as Montreal, Winnipeg and Toronto. That is something which is happening because we have not fully appreciated the importance of the fisheries of Canada or provided facilities for our own fishermen.

It has been my effort, while supporting a Government, as well as during the days in which I have been in Opposition, to press forward as much as possible for the adoption of such a policy as will give railway facilities to every part of Canada. I have, since this Government came into power, moved a resolution in this House stating that the day had arrived when the Intercolonial railway, or its branches, should be extended to every non-railway county in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec. That resolution was accepted by the Government. It was on an occasion when the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) was leading the House —I forget where the Prime Minister was— that the resolution was accepted and it was some time in March, 1915, I think. What more could I do? I moved that resolution, it was accepted by the Government and I had reason to suppose that something would be done. But, from that day to this, nothing has been done except the purchasing of the Quebec and Saguenay railway which was not for commercial purposes but for purpose which are well known to hon. gentlemen opposite. A few months before the former Government went out of office, a railway policy was adopted for the Maritime Provinces which was on the verge of being carried out. I am sorry to say that the Prime Minister dropped every railway that was involved in this scheme except the railway in his own county. I have often, jocularly, and otherwise, thrown this up to the Prime Minister since it was done. We had a railway projected for Cape Breton, one that went to Guysborough, one to Pictou and passing through the counties of Halifax and Guysborough. All were dropped except the road that the minister himself is concerned in. He was hand in glove with myself and others in trying to get the Government committed to the building of these roads, we were all pulling on the one oar and we were glad of the assistance of the then leader of the Opposition. I do not think it was fraternizing on his part when he dropped us after he got into power, built his railway and threw us to the dogs. I do not think it was proper treatment for our former associate in arms in view of the fact that we had been fighting for his road as well as our own. I contend that all the fishing field in Nova Scotia should not only have proper harbour facilities to enable the fishermen to go and catch the fish but that they should be put in touch with some of the branch railways that would enable the people who want the fisherman's product to get it as cheaply as possible. We have all around the Cape Breton coast line the most magnificent fishing fields in the world and I submit to the leader of the Government and hon. gentlemen opposite that we are not properly equipped for the handling of this product until we have proper harbours. Proper harbours and railway facilities must be provided in order that the product when it is caught, can be speedily carried to the great centres where we find a great demand for fish.

I am discussing the question as to what was done and what was expected to be done by the former Government and I am contrasting that with the lack of doing under the present Administration. I do not expect the Government to build railways or to enter into any extravagant expenditure under present circumstances but I do suggest to the minister that there should be care taken in husbanding the money that he has collected from the people of this country. It will not do for the Government, or the minister to blame everything on the war.

It is a great convenience for the Government and for the minister particularly, whenever he is up against a snag to be able to throw out this red signal, the war. But I wish to remind him that we left him a magnificent heritage when he came into power. We left him with all bills paid, with every balance squared up, and we handed him $39,000,000 of cold cash. When the hon. Mr. Fielding went out and our good friend the Finance Minister of to-day came in, he found in the strong box of this country everything squared up and $39,000,000 of money. That, Sir, was a comfortable position for the new manager of a concern to find himself in, and that upon his own evidence in his first Budget speech, is undeniably the position in which he found himself. But what was the condition of the finances of this country before the war broke out? On the last day of July, 1914, before the war broke out, the $39,000,000 were gone; the hundreds of millions of dollars that had been collected in the years since their return to power had been expended, and a deficit stared the minister in the face of $47,000,000, of money. That is the condition that existed three or four days before the war broke out. What has been happening since I do not profess to know, because the amount of money borrowed and the way in which it has been expended are beyond any knowledge that I have of financing. All I can say is that the Government cannot justify itself before the people and has nothing to show what became of those $39,000,000 of money, and over three times that much, perhaps four times that much more, that was collected during the intervening years—and they had a deficit of $47,000,000 in July, 1914. There is no accounting for it excepting in one way: It is accounted for by having been shovelled out in bucketfulls and barrelfulls to people who had no business to get it. If the people of this country wished inquire what has become of the money, they could put the defunct Sir Richard MacBride Government on the stand. There they would find some millions of this money. Let them put the other no less defunct Conservative Government of Manitoba on the stand, and they would find where millions of this money went. Let them come down farther, and they will find $2,000,000 of this money given to the province of Ontario as a post mortem subsidy to the Temiskaming railway. That is where $2,000,000 more went. Let them go down to the Government led by one James Kidd Flemming in New Brunswick, another defunct and disgraced and kicked-out Government, and if that Government are put upon the stand it will be possible to find where some of the money went. That is what has become of the money of this country, and I believe that that was in the paying back of men who threw their bread upon the waters for the support of the Conservative party when they were in opposition in the year 1911. Those provincial Governments were in power then, they were strong concerns, they had money, they came to the assistance of the Tory party, and received a strong promise that these moneys would be returned if they were elected to power. That money was taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, fifty-fold, sixty-fold and sometimes one hundred-fold of the amounts that had been advanced. There is where the money has gone, and that money we can never get back. There is where the Administration is at fault, for not having looked after these matters in a proper way, and carried on the Government of the country in a manner absolutely independent of influences of this kind, seeing that the money of the people was properly expended and that proper value was received for any advances out of the Treasury.

I submit that the people of Canada are getting tired of this method of handling the affairs of this country, and that they are longing for the day when better methods of government will prevail, and when a better system of administration will again be in vogue in this country; and I think, Sir, that I am right in saying, on behalf at least of the Liberal party and the people of Canada, that this great Canadian democracy from the Atlantic to the Pacific, irrespective of nationality, creed or colour, are disgusted, tired and sick of the swine husks of Toryism and have fully determined to arise and go back to the father of peace, progress, plenty and prosperity, the Empire statesman and leader of the people's party, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. F. R. LALOR (Haldimand): Mr. speaker, I have had great pleasure in listening to the remarks of the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), which, I am sure, were very amusing, although, I regret to say that some of his jokes were a little bit ancient—

Mr. McKENZIE: You will give us better ones

Mr. LALOR:—and some of his references, I fear, were a little bit coa se as well. The hon. member for North Cape Breton has spoken of the high principles expected of the present Government when they were elected to office, and has spoken in a most admiring way of the high principles of the Government that he supported so long in this House. I wonder if he includes in those principles the purchase of the sawdust wharf and the building of the Disraeli wharf, and such methods of expenditure as have been exposed in this House, including the giving away of the public domain, which became a public scandal during the time his friends held office and he supported them. If the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) were in the House he could enlighten us upon that subject and tell us more than we have been able to find out even by investigation. The hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) speaks of the great prosperity that prevailed in this country during the time the Liberal party were in office. Well, they did come into office at a very fortunate time, and I think it was equally fortunate that they went out of office just about the time they did, considering that we are now engaged in a great war. The hon. gentlemen also spoke of the Intercolonial railway. Let me tell the hon. gentleman—and I do not come from the Maritime Provinces as he does, where all are so interested in the Intercolonial—but still, as a citizen of Canada I feel as all Canadians should, that the people all over Canada have an equal right and interest in the Intercolonial. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that one of the last acts of the Conservative Administration before they went out of power in 1896 was to build eleven miles of the Intercolonial, and during the time that the present Government have been in office they have, I understand, added sixty miles of rails to the Intercolonial railway, But during all the time that the Liberal party were in power and the member for North Cape Breton and other hon. gentlemen opposite from the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were supporting the then Government—only one and three-quarter miles were added to it. Hon. gentlemen are good at promises, as they always have been especially at election times; and the hon. gentleman promises that if his party is returned to power and he is elected to support it, he will try to get something done for the Intercolonial railway. Well, he has made promises along that line in the past, with the results that I have stated.

The hon. gentleman speaks of reckless expenditure, and asserts that the Liberal party left the finances of this country in a magnificent condition. I am not so sure about that, especially when I think of the Transcontinental railway—especially the eastern section—one of the most gigantic evidences that we can find of the folly and bad management of the late Administration. If the hon. gentleman were absolutely conscientious and honest in his expression of opinion, he would agree with me on that point. $258,000,000 was spent upon the Eastern section. A commission was appointed by this Government to investigate that expenditure and they found that out of that amount, $40,000,000 was stolen by contractors and friends of the then Government. The hon. gentleman supported that; and found no fault with it. I suppose he thought that was all right so long as his friends the contractors were able to get the money belonging to the people and pocket it. I say that the whole building of that road was folly. Recently a commission of railway experts inquired into the railway question in Canada and they found that a deplorable condition exists in the matter of railways. The problems of the future will be very great, indeed, as to how we shall manage these roads, or how continue to give them money as we have in the past. We remember that Mr. Blair, who was Minister of Railways, resigned when this project was contemplated, and before doing so he tried to point out to hon. gentlemen opposite the folly of taking such a course. But they would not listen to him, and although he was Minister of Railways in the Administration, he resigned from office rather than assume any responsibility for the construction of the Transcontinental railway. That is the history of the Liberal party so far as railroads are concerned; compare that with the history of the Conservative party under Sir John A. Macdonald, who built the Canadian Pacific railway. One is a monument to the bad management, the bad business judgment and the folly of our friends opposite, and the other is a magnificent monument to good business judgment and the wise expenditure of public money.

I want to compliment the Minister of Finance upon the splendid statement he has presented. It is a most inspiring message, and will, I am sure, be accepted as such by the Canadian people; also upon the successful manner in which he has handled the finances during these trying times. The people of Canada recognize his ability—and we are indeed fortunate in having such an able and competent minister at the head of affairs at this time. In looking over the financial affairs of Canada during these war times I cannot see where the Minister of Finance has made one error of judgment. No other Minister of Finance since Confederation has had such tremendous problems to deal with, and the minister has handled those problems with great credit to himself and with satisfaction, I believe, to the people. The Budget speech this year was the most concise ever delivered in Parliament, and the facts and figures leave very little room, indeed, for criticism.

The revenue for the past fiscal year was $232,000,000, an amount exceeding the revenue of any other year by $60,000,000. After paying $25,000,000 for interest and for pensions, the Government were able to apply to the credit of war expenditures no less a sum than $60,000,000. We last year saved out of revenue over expenditure $45,000,000, so that during these two years we have been able to apply upwards of $100,000,000 towards our vast war expenses. The war expenses have amounted to $700,000,000, and it is most encouraging to the people to know that the Government have been able to save $100,000,000 and to reduce that war expenditure to $600,000,000. With the continuance of prosperity and the thrift of the people, great as the financial problem is that we have to face, the people will be able to deal with it and to reduce the large expenditure which we are making in these times. No doubt we shall have to assume very heavy obligations, and the longer the war lasts the greater those obligations will be. Our interest account and pensions fund alone will be very large and the taxation for years to come cannot but be heavy, although under the management of the Minister of Finance the people have been very lightly taxed up to the present. In fact, the people, so far as taxation is concerned, hardly realize that there is a war. Taxation will naturally increase and I believe that the Finance Minister has been wise in spreading that taxation and those payments over future years so that those who follow us and the people who come into this country and settle will help to pay our heavy war debt.

In speaking of our expenditure, large as it is, and the splendid manner in which the people have assumed the responsibility of the war and have paid the taxation, I cannot help but mention the voluntary subscriptions to patriotic funds that have been made in Canada. Upwards of $60,000,000, I understand, have been voluntarily contributed by the people towards the Red Cross and Patriotic Funds and on behalf of the work of the Young Men's Christian Association work in the trenches. These are all voluntary subscriptions. It is really inspiring to think of the way people have given. In my little town of 3,000 inhabitants, in two days the voluntary subscriptions towards these funds amounted to upwards of $20,000. In my country I have a little township with a population of about 600 people, all farmers, who have subscribed $6,000 towards the Patriotic Fund. The people of Canada generally, in every city, town and village, have subscribed in the same way. I must mention the work of the Young Men's Christian Association at the front. Not long ago when I was in Chicago, I went to a good Presbyterian church, such as my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) goes to.

An hon. MEMBER: When he goes.

Mr. LALOR: And a very able minister, during the course of his sermon, explained to the congregation the splendid work the Y.M.C.A. was doing in the trenches in France. The Y.M.C.A., like the Red Cross, have done noble work during this war, and the Red Cross deserves great credit indeed. In every city, town and village throughout the Dominion, there are Red Cross societies, and the work that the women of this country have undertaken in sending to our soldiers in the trenches gifts of food, clothing, etc., to make them comfortable and to relieve their sufferings as much as possible, I am sure, deserves the thanks of the Canadian people. When one considers the splendid work that has been done by the women and the voluntary subscriptions that have been given, one must feel proud to be a Canadian. Canada has set in this war an example that is admired by the world; in fact, it has surprised even our neighbours to the south of us, who point to us with pride and hold up Canada as an example for the United States at the present time.

In the present Government we have an honest Government; I do not think a more honest Government ever held office in Canada. I believe the Government have tried by every possible means to give good value for the money expended, and to see that it is honestly expended, and although some investigations, which have been brought about by hon. gentlemen opposite, have been held in this country, they have resulted, as everyone knows, in not leaving a stain of any kind upon the Government or upon its administration. We want fair criticism; the Government expects fair criticism from hon. gentlemen opposite, but they do not expect the kind of unfair and unjust criticism that they are getting during this session of Parliament. Hon. gentlemen opposite from day to day and from week to week have indulged in criticism of the very smallest kind; petty, parish politics is the best way in which I can describe it. They have indulged in criticism that is unfair and have made statements that are absolutely misleading. I believe they have an entirely wrong conception of their duties in this House during war time. We should have no politics at all in these critical times; we should be here as one people supporting the Government and doing our very utmost to assist this Government to bring the war to a successful conclusion. Instead of that, the whole object of hon. gentlemen opposite seems to be what point they can make in order to gain a vote in the country, or in order to obtain some political advantage over the Government. I would call their attention to statements which have been made by some of the leading statesmen in the United States. Not long ago Theodore Roosevelt, ex-president of the United States, gave an interview in the papers. A committee had waited upon him and suggested to him a coalition government in the United States, and he said: "No, we do not want any coalition government in this country; we have no politics until the war is over; we are supporters of President Wilson and his Administration." That is the prevailing sentiment in the United States; the same sentiment is expressed by Mr. Hughes, the Republican candidate, and I notice that Mr. Taft has said the same thing. That is the position taken by Senator Root and by other leading politicians in the United States, who are splendid examples for hon. gentlemen opposite to follow. We are not doing our duty in this House; we are delayed here month after month listening to small politics and small political statements to catch votes in the province of Nova Scotia or in the province of New Brunswick, or in the wheat fields out in Saskatchewan, without any object or apparent responsibility as to the great troubles through which we are passing at the present time. It would be a fine thing if I could, from my seat in this House this afternoon, congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on the manly stand that they were taking in doing their best to assist the Government.

An hon. MEMBER: You would have to stretch a point to do it.

Mr. LALOR: But hon. gentlemen opposite are indulging in criticisms of a petty nature. I am surprised at the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition—and I have no hesitation in saying that I respect him very much—content to let this small crowd from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and one member from Saskatchewan, occupy the time of the House every day while their own friends and supporters sitting around them are compelled to listen to them.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the hon. gentleman undertake to lay down the principle that this Government is beyond criticism and should not be criticised?

Mr. LALOR: At the opening of my remarks I have said that the Government wants criticism, fair criticism, but not petty parish politics.

Mr. MACDONALD: In other words, my hon. friend wants mild criticism that is not going to displease him and that will not hurt the Government.

Mr. LALOR: I want in this House the kind of criticism that will help to win the war. We do not want political criticism that is meant to win votes and to make the people of this country dissatisfied.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would my hon. friend agree to the proposition that there should be a reciprocity on that basis; that the Government should set out to win the war and should give up playing politics?

Mr. LALOR: This Government are not playing politics; they are trying to win the war.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL: What does Sir Sam Hughes say?

Mr. MACDONALD: What does Sir Sam Hughes say about that and about Sir George Perley?

Mr. LALOR: We are not afraid of our record. In regard to the ex-Minister of Militia, hon. gentlemen opposite are very good friends of his now. How was it before he resigned his office? Who was it that followed the ex-Minister of Militia day and night in this House and out of it with reckless statements? Hon. gentlemen opposite are the men who did that and they know it. I think that the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence did magnificent work in this country.

The enlistment of 400,000 men, and their equipment with everything necessary, showed the energy of General Sir Sam Hughes. We have raised an army greater than the British army at the time of the South African war, and I admire the young men of Canada who have responded so nobly to the call for volunteers. I have not heard hon. gentlemen opposite have the manliness to criticise the system of voluntary enlistment in the House, but I believe they criticise it outside in some parts of the country. If they do not approve of the voluntary system, why do they not move a resolution that we should have conscription? If such a resolution were moved, I imagine there are a great many hon. gentlemen opposite who would not support it; mighty few of them would be found to support it, in my opinion. But if they believe we should have conscription, we will be very glad to have them move a resolution to that effect, and, speaking for myself, I will support it.

Mr. MARCIL: The Government is running the country. It is for them to move the resolution, and not the Opposition.

Mr. LALOR: The hon. member himself would be a first class man to move it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it not a fact that the Prime Minister of this country has declared himself since the war broke out as adverse to any such thing as conscription?

Mr. LALOR: I understand that is the case, but that was early in the war.

Mr. MACDONALD: It was last year, in this House.

Mr. LALOR: I might remind the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that their leader made the statement.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is not my hon. friend aware that the Minister of the Interior in his advertisements in the United States stated only a month ago that this Government did not consider conscription as either advisable or necessary in this country?

Mr. LALOR: I say that one of the most admirable things in the whole war has been the success of the voluntary system in Canada. Thousands of our young men have volunteered regardless of politics and regardless of religion. They have answered the call because they were Canadians, and it makes a man proud to think of it. When I told some friends of mine in the United States how our young men were enlisting in such great numbers, they had the idea that it was compulsory, and it was a great surprise to them when I said these young men were all volunteers. Only recently Colonel Roosevelt, though in favour of conscription, pointed to the success of the voluntary system of enlistment in Canada. But perhaps the time is coming when there must be a change. The cream of our young men have been obtained by the voluntary system, and we must have men to replace those who have fallen in the trenches, and it is questionable if the time is not fast approaching when there should be some other system of raising recruits in this country. I invite hon. gentlemen opposite to move a resolution along that line if they want to help win this war. They like moving resolutions, and this would be a first-class resolution for the hon. member for North Cape Breton to move.

Mr. McKENZIE: If I did move a resolution involving the expenditure of money, I presume the Speaker would rule me out of order.

Mr. LALOR: That rule does not apply to resolutions, but only to Bills.

Mr. McKENZIE: It goes further than that.

Mr. LALOR: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would tell me if he would support a resolution of that kind.

Mr. McKENZIE: I will tell the hon. member I would not.

Mr. LALOR: And there are a lot more sitting around him who would not.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am no coward, I say what I think.

Mr. LALOR: I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. gentlemen opposite are not all of the same kind. I believe there are men on the other side of the House who would support conscription. I am sure there are men over there who are sick and tired of the tirades we have in this House every day, and who have some sense of their responsibility as members of this Parliament. There is my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), who is not in the House just now. He has three sons in the trenches. I do not agree with the free trade theories he advocates in this House, because I am a moderate protectionist, but I think the hon. member for Red Deer is on the wrong side of the House. I think he would be in more congenial company sitting on this side, for more reasons than one. But one reason is that we are a moderate protectionist party on this side, and have been since the days of 1878. We have never changed our policy in that respect from that day to this. The national policy was inaugurated in 1878, when this country was full of soup kitchens under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is free wheat part of your policy?

Mr. LALOR: We have been consistent protectionists from that time down to the present. I think the hon. member for Red Deer should be sitting on this side of the House, rather than with the hon. member for Pictou and his friends, who, though they advocate free trade and a low tariff, practised protection for fifteen years.

Mr. MACDONALD: What does my hon. friend think of wheat?

Mr. LALOR: I will come to that.

Mr. MACDONALD: You will dodge it.

Mr. LALOR: These free traders and low tariff gentlemen opposite were in power fifteen years, and what did they do? They adopted the Conservative tariff that was left them by their predecessors, and they never changed it during their fifteen years of office. On the contrary, they added steel bounties and paid out millions and millions of the people's money to my hon. friend's friends in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton.

Mr. McKENZIE: That comes in well in war time, doesn't it?

Mr. LALOR: It was a steel bounty; I do not know whether there was any "steal" in it or not. As I was saying, I think the hon. member for Red Deer would be in more congenial company on this side of the House. I do not think that such addresses as the House has listened to from the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) find much sympathy among some hon. gentlemen opposite. I notice the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) taking his seat. I listened to his speech the other night with great pleasure, and I have had pleasure since in reading it in Hansard. It was a manly, straightforward, non-political speech. It is reported that the hon. gentleman is going to retire from public life.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I hope not.

Mr. LALOR: If it is true hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will regret it very much, because we have great respect for the member for Saskatoon. We also had a speech the other evening from the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), who wanted the hon. member for Pictou and his friends to declare where they stood on free trade and protection. He said that his constituency wanted to know, that the people out there were getting a little bit tired of both political parties. A free trader himself, he wanted to know where the party he had supported for fifteen years stood. Hon. gentlemen opposite should stick to their principles, or let the public know just where they stand. They should not preach free trade and a low tariff in one place and whisper to the manufacturers and protectionists in other places: Never fear, put us into power, and trust us. I often wonder what these hon. gentlemen opposite would do if they came into power. I would like the hon. member for Cape Breton North (Mr. McKenzie) to tell me that. Would they really change the tariff? I think the hon. member would be ready to assure his friends in Nova Scotia that the tariff will be maintained, while he hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) will be ready to declare that they would introduce free trade. I was speaking to a member on the other side of the House who is engaged in the manufacturing business. I said: "If your side came into power and reduced the tariff, it would be a nice thing for your business, wouldn't it?" His answer was, "Don't worry we were in power for fifteen years and did not lower the tariff, and we would not lower it if we came into power now." Preaching one thing and practising another, in an effort to deceive the people—that is the history of the Liberals. Why, that is what they are doing right now in this House. One day we have a series of speeches from the gentlemen from the manufacturing towns and cities, telling about awful poverty that they say exists in those places—women and babies starving. It is not true, for there never was greater prosperity in this country than there is to-day. The price of farm products is high, it is true. But why should they not be high? The farmers deserve some prosperity. And, let me tell you, wages are pretty good—perhaps not quite equal to the increase in the cost of food, but still they are good. Some of these hon. gentlemen talk about people starving, but there never was a time in this country when our people bought as good goods or as high-priced goods, or as many of them, as they do to-day. This is especially true of wearing apparel, and this shows that the country is prosperous. And, as I am reminded by a friend near me, the money in the savings banks is greater in amount than ever before in the history of the country.

We are told that the prices of farm products are high. They are pretty high and the farmers are pretty prosperous. But, let me tell you, they deserve a good deal of the prosperity they are getting. And don't forget that it cost a good deal more for the farmer to raise his crops now than it ever did in the past. Everything he has to buy is higher, and the wages he has to pay for help are very much more than formerly. In the province of Ontario to-day, there is an average of about one man for every hundred acres, because the young men have gone to the war. That means that the farmer and his wife and daughters are left to run the farm, and they are doing just as heroic work for the Empire as are the boys who have joined the forces, for we have come to the days when the need for food for the soldiers is fully realized.

We have a Government in power that is very kind to the farmers. We on this side are the farmers' friends, there is no question about that, for we have done more for the farmers than any other government in the history of Canada. A resolution will come before us this session to grant $10,000,000 for the building of good roads. We had a similar resolution before, and had it not been for the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite the farmers of our country would have had good roads. In my county, good roads are almost as necessary as railways, for the roads are not very good naturally. Our county has spent a lot of money on roads, assisted by the provincial Government. If the Bill that we passed in this House and sent to the Senate had been confirmed by the Senate, we would have had good roads through the county of Haldimand. We have got a majority now in the Senate—that is one good thing for this country, and we are going to pass the Bill and give the farmers $10,000,000 to build roads.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If the hon. gentleman will permit me—I made a statement that this Bill was to provide for an expenditure of $10,000,000, but I was informed officially that no such expenditure was contemplated. If I was in error, I am afraid that my hon. friend (Mr. Lalor) is equally in error.

Mr. LALOR: Certainly, the hon. gentleman is misinformed, for the Bill is to provide $10,000,000 for good roads. Of course, it is not all to be spent in one year— he did not expect that, I hope, but it is to be spread over a number of years. One of our great problems is the problem of providing employment for returned soldiers. If we spend $10,000,000 in building good roads for the farmers, that will provide something for the soldiers to do. I have great pride, as a representative of a farming constituency, in pointing to the rural mail system of this Government. The farmers to-day do not have to drive over bad roads for five or ten miles to the nearest post office to get their papers and letters, and then only get them once or twice a week; but a Government mail carrier goes to every farm house every day to deliver to the farmer his daily paper and his letters as well. I could enumerate many other things that this Government has done for the farmers. I am proud to support a government that has given more to the farmers than has ever been given in the past, and has looked to their interests better than any other government in our history. I am sure the farmers will show their gratitude for what has been done for them by supporting the government that has carefully considered their interest.

We have heard a great deal this session about the manufacturers. Hon. gentlemen opposite, for political effect, make the most vicious attacks upon the manufacturing interests of this country, and try and make the people believe that they are being robbed by extortionate high protectionist manufacturers. But I notice that some hon. gentlemen on the other side are themselves engaged in manufacturing. What do they want to do—I ask this question in all seriousness—when they make these statements? Do they propose to close the manufacturing industries of this country? Where are the returned soldiers going to get employment when they come back? In my county, and I am glad to say it is the policy of this Government, the returned soldiers get all the public offices. That is the policy we are supporting. But, they have to get employment as well in the factories and they cannot get employment if this policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is carried out because probably a good many of the factories would be put out of business.

The manufacturers, I am pleased to say, have shown a good principle during this war. They are the only class of people who are directly taxed by the Government for the war. They have been asked to hand over to this Government 25 per cent of all the profits they make over a certain amount. I am pleased to say, and I think the Minister of Finance told us, that in all Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, there has never been a grumble from a manufacturer. Although the tax amounts, in some instances, to hundreds of thousands of dollars, they have never grumbled or found fault, but have cheerfully paid over their money to the treasury of this country. Under the present taxation scheme of the Minister of Finance they will have to pay over very much more, in some cases as much as 75 per cent of their profits, and I believe they will cheerfully accept that taxation and pay whatever they are asked to pay.

Hon. gentlemen opposite advocated an income tax. I presume that income tax will fall upon large and small incomes. There is great difficulty in the administration of an income tax, as the Minister of Finance has told us. It is a very difficult matter to go to a farmer who is making a thousand or two thousand dollars a year and ask him to pay an income tax upon what he is making. I am rather inclined to believe in a tax on large incomes. That is a very small problem compared with the effort to raise revenue by means of a tax on small incomes because the people are paying taxes now indirectly if not directly.

I propose, in a moment, to refer to the attack made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) on the canning business, but in the meantime I will mention another subject. We have heard a good deal in this House about the old reciprocity agreement. Hon. gentlemen opposite regard this as a child of their own and some of them are pleased to tell us about it yet. They cannot give it up although I do not think they really love the baby very much now. The Conservative party opposed reciprocity and the people voted against it. They were opposed to the agreement that was made by Mr. Fielding and the late Mr. Paterson. What was the result? The result of the defeat of reciprocity was that the Republican party went out of office in the States, the Democratic party came in, they gave us more than they would have given us under reciprocity, and we do not have to give anything in return. More than that, we have control of our own tariff

5 p.m. and our own tariff policy. We impose duty where we want to, we take off duty if we want to, and Washington cannot interfere. I have in my hand the Payne tariff, which was in force at the time hon. gentlemen were in power, the reciprocity agreement and the present trade arrangement, which is known as the Underwood tariff. I will just mention a few items, so that hon. gentlemen opposite can understand what a good arrangement the present Government have made by getting the Underwood Bill brought into effect. Under the Payne tariff, if a farmer shipped cattle less than a year old he had to pay $2 duty. If worth not more than $14 he paid $3.75, and if worth over $14 he paid 27½ per cent.

Mr. WILCOX: Is that the reciprocity agreement?

Mr. LALOR: No, that is the Payne tariff. We were told what a great thing it would be if we had reciprocity, because the farmers could ship their cattle to the United States and not pay any duty on them at all, that they would be absolutely free. Well, they are free now under the Underwood tariff. Therefore, there was nothing to be gained by the reciprocity agreement. Horses are a little different. Horses were 25 per cent under the Payne tariff. The reciprocity agreement would have made them free, and now we are charged 10 per cent. Hogs; I remember in my own county that a very good friend, a gentleman whom I admire very much but who is not of the same party as I am myself, told the farmers what an advantage it would be to them if they could ship their hogs over to the United States. The reciprocity agreement made them free, but they are free to-day. You can go down through this whole list and find many instances of this kind. Beef and lambs were free under reciprocity; they are free under the Underwood Bill.

An hon. MEMBER: Are they being shipped in?

Mr. LALOR: I do not know whether they are being shipped in or not. Poultry; the reciprocity agreement made them free; they were taxed under the Payne tariff 5 cents a pound, and they are now 1 cent a pound. Meats fresh; under the reciprocity agreement the farmer, if he wanted to ship his fresh beef to the United States, had to pay 1¼ cents a pound, but under the present arrangement these articles are free. Bacon and hams were taxed under reciprocity; now they are free. Meats, salted, were taxed under reciprocity 1¼ cents a pound; they are now free. Wheat; you have heard about that before. Wheat used to be taxed 25 cents a bushel; the reciprocity made it free and wheat is free to-day, as you know. There has never been anything done by the Government that has hurt our friends upon the opposite side of the House so much as free wheat. I am sorry that we have not in the House now some of the representatives like the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), who talks free wheat when there is a duty upon it, and, when there is no duty upon it and it is made absolutely free, regrets that it is free. On speeches free wheat has gone into the scrap. They are now of no use to hon. gentlemen opposite. They have to get something new, and the hon. member for Assiniboia the other night tried to make out that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), on behalf of this Government, had endeavoured to persuade the farmers of the West to sell their wheat at $1.30 a bushel. There is nothing in that; it was simply the offer of the British Government that the Minister of Trade and Commerce submitted to the farmers of the West. I believe every member of this House knows it and that the hon. member for Assiniboia knows it as well. You can go down through the whole list of farm products and you will find that they are just as free as they were under reciprocity, and even some of the items that were taxed under reciprocity have been made free by the Underwood tariff.

Let me now take up the duty on flour. It was a good thing that the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) was a member of this Parliament when the Reciprocity agreement was being negotiated, because the hon. member for Huntingdon and his friends arranged that wheat should be free so that he could go over to the United States, if wheat was cheaper there than in Canada, and bring it here and grind it into flour. He also took good care that the Government then in power put a duty of fifty cents a barrel on flour. And we had a resolution the other night charging this Government with blame for the high price of flour, and finding great fault with the Minister of Labour because he did not do something to reduce the price. We were told that if the duty on flour of fifty cents a barrel were removed flour would be cheaper in this country, that the poor people of Canada would be able to buy it cheaper, the artisans, labourers, all who desired to buy flour would be much better off if they could only get free flour from the United States. Here is what the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) said:

> Yet this Government stands in the way and refuses to allow the farmers of Canada to sell their wheat in the United States. They simply refuse to come to the relief of the farmer when the farmer is not asking any favour but only saying: Give us the privilege of selling our wheat where we can sell it to the best advantage. But it is not only the farmer who grows wheat who suffers. What about that great big class of workmen, mechanics and consumers of Canada? Give us free wheat and the farmer who grows wheat will get a better price, and the man who is working for $1.50 or $2.50 a day, with a big family to feed and support, will buy his flour cheaper, so that it works both ways. I say that the workman can buy his flour cheaper.

Well, we have taken the duty off flour to help the poor man out, and there is no one finding greater fault than the right hon. gentleman and his supporters on the other side of the House. They proposed a resolution which occupied the whole time of this House yesterday. In that resolution they charged the Government with responsibility for the high price of flour, said that the Government were responsible, and wanted the Government, as I understood, to go out and buy all the wheat in this country, which is said to be 100,000,000 bushels which, at the present prices, would cost $300,000,000; then they wanted the Government to take over the flour mills of this country in order to produce flour cheaper for the consumer. Well surely you have all the advantage you could have even if such a step were taken when you have the market of the United States absolutely free. The member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) the other night compared prices in this country with the prices in Australia. Was that a fair comparison? Australia is 4,000 miles away from us. If the hon. member for Richmond had wanted to be fair in his comparison of prices he would have compared the prices of the United States and Canada. That would have been a fair comparison, because they are right beside us, and our farmers were told and always have been told that the prices in the United States for farm products were higher than here, while the consumer has been told that they were lower If the hon. member wanted to make a fair comparison, he would have compared the prices in the United States and in Canada. It is the same old thing today as it was in the time of the reciprocity campaign, an attempt to deceive the people of this country. In my county on the day of the official nomination we always have a big public meeting in order that the candidates may express their views to the electorate. I remember that at the last official nomination during the reciprocity campaign a friend of mine handed me a leading Liberal paper of Toronto. One edition of that paper was issued for the farmers to read and the other for the people in the towns and cities. One told the farmers that if they had reciprocity they would get higher prices, that everything would be worth more, butter, eggs, wheat, stocks of all kinds—everything would go up. The other edition told the people living in the cities and towns that they would buy everything cheaper. Well, it was amusing. Fortunately I got the paper, and I think it amused the people very much to hear the statements of a leading Liberal organ in Toronto. Very largely I think as a result of that nomination meeting, I got three times the majority I had ever received before. I could go over the whole list of articles dealt with in the reciprocity agreement and show that we have gained by defeating reciprocity.

I do not intend to deal any longer with the remarks of the hon. member for Richmond, and his comparisons of prices. I want to say in all seriousness that the one thing we have to fear in this country is a shortage of food. There is no question about that. We talk about the high price of flour and the high price of wheat, but what I fear is that they are going to be very much higher than they are to-day. I think that the greatest trouble that is ahead of us in this country is a shortage of wheat and a shortage of food generally. I read to-day a dispatch which anticipates that the American Government reports which will be issued on Monday will show that 10,000,000 acres of fall wheat have been ploughed up in the United States. That is an alarming statement. The report will also say that the balance of the acreage in the United States will produce only 60 per cent of a crop. The Commissioner of Agriculture for the Dominion of Canada issued a statement yesterday that he had just received a cable from Australia, where they are harvesting their crop, stating that the Australian crop is 36,000,000 bushels short of the crop of last year; and in the same report this commissioner tells us that in the great wheat-growing province of Saskatchewan there is 1,500,000 acres less land ploughed this year than there was last year. I tell you that this is a very serious matter indeed. We talk about appointing a food dictator to tell what we should eat and what we should have on the table. I do not think such a plan would be very practicable in this country; it would be very hard to carry into effect a policy of that kind, although it may be possible to persuade the people to accept the conditions and to live as economically as they possibly can as far as food is concerned. I believe that all the food that we raise will be required by our people in Canada and by our men who are engaged in this war. It is not only the submarine menace that is so dangerous and doing such awful destruction. At the beginning of this war, a man said to me: God Almighty himself will finish this war by famine and by shortage of food. It looks very much as though his prophecy was going to be fulfilled, because we are short of wheat and short of food. I tell you that these conditions as to the wheat supply are very serious. I cannot see anything ahead but very high prices for wheat and flour as well; and if flour will stay at its present price of $14 a barrel and not go any higher, we can congratulate ourselves on the conditions that exist.

I now wish to refer to an attack that was made on an industry in which I am interested, the Dominion Canners Company. The member for Richmond (Mr. G. W. Kyte) made a general attack upon many industrial institutions in Canada, but of the industries that he mentioned there is only one in respect of which I can reply to some of the things that he said. I am not interested in the others and know nothing about them, but if his remarks as to these were no fairer than what he said about the Dominion Canners Company, of which I have been a director since its organization, then my hon. friend's whole statement was unfair and a misrepresentation. I am told that our friends opposite have recently issued some literature—I have not seen it, but I am informed as to this by a gentleman who has seen it—in which the member for East Elgin (Mr. David Marshall) and myself are painted in no very complimentary manner and referred to as having extorted money from the people. I am going to tell a few honest facts in connection with the Dominion Canners Company. It is a very large organization, with about 75 factories spread from the province of Quebec to the province of British Columbia, employing 10,000 or 12,000 people in their factories in the canning season, contracting with farmers for 10,000 or 15,000 acres of land for vegetables alone. It is a large industry of which I believe the people of Canada may feel proud, because it is the largest institution of its kind in the world. Their methods have been fair and honest and they have never extracted from the people one dollar in the way of extra prices that they were not entitled to.

The hon. gentleman tells us in his statement that the Dominion Canners Company made in the year 1916 $555,777. In that statement he was correct. The Company has a large capitalization, which, I am proud to say, represents good hard cash that has been paid into the company. Let me tell you how they made some of that money in 1916. We know something about the prices of raw material. The Dominion Canners' Company, in 1916, had on hand nearly $1,000,000 worth of tin-plate, and the large increase in the price of tin-plate was responsible for our making $500,000 of the amount mentioned by the member for Richmond. Tin-plate that we used to buy for $3.60 a box is now worth $15 a box, and the same may be said of solder, nails, boxes, labels, and everything that is used in the canning business. The turnover of the company is very large, and I think it is only fair to take the figures for more than one year. That is something that is not quite fair about the Finance Minister's taxation. While the Dominion Canners' Company made a little money in 1916, they lost very heavily in 1915. Of course, the Government got no taxes then—and they did not come to our rescue and help us out. But in 1916, when we had a little better profit, we had to shell out 25 per cent to the Finance Minister to help him out.

In the year 1915 the Dominion Canners' Company lost $407,600. The member for Richmond did mention the loss, but he did not give the figures correctly; this figure is very much larger than that given by the hon. gentleman. In that year we put up a bigger pack of canned goods than ever before, and that in face of the increased cost of labour. These conditions, and the effects of competition, reduced the price of canned goods to such an extent that we lost in one year's operations the amount that I have stated. Let us compare the two years 1915 and 1916. I think it is only fair that we should do so. The total sum made in the two years was $149,000. That is a very small profit, indeed, upon the capitalization of our company and its operations for two years. We paid no dividend on our preferred stock in 1915 or 1916, because we could not do so. As a director of that company I was very sorry, indeed, that widows and other people throughout the country who wanted to get a dividend upon their stock to live upon were not able to get it because we had lost so much money. Recently we paid a dividend of 1¼ per cent on our preferred stock; the common stock gets no dividend. You can buy Dominion Canners common stock to-day at 20 cents on the dollar, and you can buy preferred stock, with all these back dividends due upon them, at 70 or 75. Is it fair to make an attack upon a big organization which is in such a financial position as this, and which is struggling as the Dominion Canners Company has been struggling? I would tell the member for Richmond if he were here that the Dominion Canners Company in two years' operations turned out $15,000,000 worth of goods and they cleared less than one per cent on their turnover. Still hon. gentlemen opposite in their campaign literature say that the Dominion Canners Company are robbing the people and extorting money from them. That is grossly unfair, and would be unfair to any business organization like the Dominion Canners Company, who are mindful of the interests of the farmers as well as the interests of the consumers.

I will give you a little more information about the Dominion Canners Company. It is not always wise for directors to tell all they know about a company in which they are interested, but I want the public to know, and I think the other directors of the Dominion Canners Company want the public to know, all the facts in connection with these unfair and unfounded charges that have been made. In 1916 there was a failure of the vegetable crop in Canada—tomatoes, peas and corn. In selling our goods to the wholesale trade we guaranteed them a delivery of 60 per cent, because their goods are sold before the crop is sown. Every wholesale house that bought canned goods from the Dominion Canners Company was assured of a delivery of 60 per cent. But the crop was so poor that we were able to deliver only 25 per cent of our pack, at prices that were contracted before the crop was grown. I myself went to the United States to buy 100,000 cases of canned goods to help us fill our orders, but could only purchase 60,000 cases. The wholesale trade knew that we had lost a tremendous amount of money the year before and they were very generous with us; if they had not been generous, I do not know what would have happened to the Dominion Canners Company. They made a compromise with us by taking goods from us and cancelling the original contracts. The wholesale houses got a fair price for the goods last year, because conditions were such that they were entitled to it. You could not buy the goods from anybody else, and they got good profits. When the hon. member for Richmond says that the price of tomatoes was $2.15 a case, I may tell him that that was not the price that the Dominion Canners Company received.

This is the position of the wholesale trade in connection with the distribution of canned goods in Canada. The canners have always sold their goods to the wholesale trade at a profit of ten per cent; that is, the wholesale trade are allowed a profit of 10 per cent for selling the products of the Dominion Canners Company. That profit is not too large. Any business man who has ever sent out travellers to the retail trade knows that it costs about 7 per cent to sell goods, so that the wholesale trade have 3 per cent left for their profit, and to pay overhead expenses. That is the profit the wholesale trade have in the past received. I do not think that profit is excessive. The Dominion Canners Company, from its organization down to the present time has had one aim, one object in view, namely, to give the consumers the best quality of goods, and to charge them as reasonable a price as possible to cover expenses, interest on bonds and dividends on preferred stock. I regret that they have not been able to pay the latter for the last two years. The Dominion Canners Company is a large company, and I do not think any man can place any censure upon it or upon its methods of doing business, which are honest, straightforward and upright. As a member and a stockholder of that company, I am very sorry that a gentleman sitting on the opposite side of the House, not only this session, but session after session has attacked this organization for political purposes solely, to try to make a little bit of capital against some gentlemen who happen to be members of this House and supporters of the Government. That is unfair; further than that, the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) could direct his energies to a great deal better advantage in the House by trying to advise the Government as best he could, honestly, sincerely and non-politically, as to how to win this war.

And after all, there is something higher and nobler in life than mere wrangling over petty politics in this hour of our nation's sorrow, glorious though be the deeds of valour which our sons are achieving. May we not pause to think that in many a once happy home in this land there is mourning to-day. It comes close to all of us when we think of the fine young men who were our every day companions who now sleep their last sleep on the fields of France and Flanders and in Mesopotamia and in eastern Europe. Last week the news came to my own town that four splendid young fellows, well educated boys, had made the supreme sacrifice for liberty and humanity. If you go to the city of Toronto, you will see men with one arm or one leg or maimed in other ways going down the street. Such is the awful condition of things, and in addition to that there is the great problem of food that will face us in the future with the German submarines sinking our ships and sending loads of food to the bottom of the ocean. The conditions in this country to-day are alarming; they are awful, as we all know; and as regards the fighting in France, while we are pleased when we pick up the papers and read the headlines, to think that we are advancing just a little bit, yet, if we look at the papers for a week or ten days previous, we shall find that our forces are pretty nearly in the same position as they were in before. I noticed a despatch to-day stating that in the city of Berlin the Germans have turned their machine guns on their own people and shot down their own women and children, the poor women and children of Germany who are innocent in this war and who are crying for bread. Those are the methods that are used to quiet the people in Germany who are hungry. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite, like Mr. Kyte and Mr. Carvell—I am sorry to mention their names—day after day in this House, for political advantage, for party purposes, for what little impression they can make on the men in one section of the country or in another section, in the interest of the party, are occupying the time of the members of this Parliament who are sent here to devise some real remedies for the great evils and troubles that are facing us at the present time. It is lamentable, and I want now, as a humble member of this House, to appeal to the Right Hon. leader of the Opposition, for whom I have the greatest respect—and I have never any hesitation in saying that, not only to his face but wherever I am—to set an example to his followers and to tell them to stop all this thing; to say to them: When this war is over, we will fight our political battles to a finish; we will make all the political capital that we can; we will turn the Tories out of office if possible; but for the sake of our nation, for the sake of humanity, let us at the present time help to steer the Government, if we can, to win this war. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we are going to have an election. I hope not; I hope that neither of the parties of this House will assume that enormous, that grave responsibility. I am quite satisfied that the people of this country do not want politics and do not want an election at the present time. They want us to do our duty here to win this war, and they will respect the Opposition much more than they do to-day and thousands of people in this country, who have never supported the Opposition before will probably vote for them if they will do their duty and assist the Government at this time.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, it is always with a certain timidity that I arise to address this House, but my timidity to-day is all the greater owing to the admonition of my hon. friend (Mr. Lalor) that no criticism of the Government should be offered by any hon. member on this side of the House. I feel, therefore, that I should perhaps stand aside and not make the remarks that I had intended to make, more especially as I am one of the members from the Maritime Provinces who are, according to my hon. friend, always causing trouble. But fortunately, Sir, so far as you are personally concerned, it may be that your familiarity with the spectre will permit you to keep patient while I address you for a little while.

Later on in my remarks I shall deal with the many arguments presented by my hon. friend. First of all, I wish to discuss something which he has said about the Intercolonial railway and that great enterprise of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, the National Transcontinental. Only a few days ago, we discussed the question of the Intercolonial for a whole afternoon and night, and I thought my hon. friend would have had all the information he could expect from any hon. member at that time without bringing up the subject again, and displaying ignorance or forgetfulness when he spoke of the Liberal Government having added nothing to the Intercolonial Railway during the years they were in power. Does my hon. friend forget that the Drummond County Railway was taken over by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Liberal Government in 1898-99 or shortly after they came into power in 1896 and that up to that date the Intercolonial railway from Hailfax was ending in a field at Lèvis with no proper terminals, and that the Liberal Government, as soon as they took office, extended the road to the great metropolis of Canada? Has he forgotten or did he ever know that the road known as the Gibson road connecting Fredericton with Chatham and Newcastle was taken over by hon. friends when they were in power adding 125 miles to the Intercolonial? Has he forgotten or did he ever know that in 1911 when we appealed to the country, a bill was awaiting its second reading for the taking over of the International, the Caraquet, the Kent, and other small branch railways in the southern portion of the province of New Brunswick, to be added to the Intercolonial? I might be pardoned for recalling the telegram sent by the present Prime Minister at the time of the election, pledging to take over all these branches if he was put in power, and I would ask the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat to tell me how many of those railways have been taken over in the six years this Government has been in office. In that time they have taken over only one of these railways, the International. My right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has been most generous to the Government in connection with everything pertaining to the war, and in extending the term of Parliament, yet after such generous treatment as that, when any hon. gentleman on this side of the House gets up and criticises the Government, he is accused of disloyalty. I never accuse any one in Canada of disloyalty, because I believe every man in this country is actuated by a proper sentiment whether he belongs to a Liberal or Conservative family. I think to accuse a person of disloyalty is the most terrible accusation one can make.

I wish to say just a few words about the Transcontinental railway, which hon. gentlemen opposite are trying to make so much political capital out of. That road in a few years, I am sure, will prove its usefulness. It would have proved it already if it had not been for the attitude adopted by this Government when they took office. It appeared to be their deliberate object to show the people of this country that a great mistake had been made in constructing that road, and they at once set about to get public opinion on their side. Mr. Gutelius, who made the report on the Transcontinental has by his actions on the Intercolonial contradicted his own report. The report showed that he cared nothing for his reputation as an engineer. When he took charge of the Intercolonial he tried to improve the roadbed as much as possible so that trains could haul a greater number of cars between Moncton and Halifax and Sydney, and at a cheaper rate. Since the Government have taken over that portion of the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Cochrane, the Minister of Railways and Mr. Gutelius have been advertising it as the best road on the American continent. They say that the service and equipment of the trains is unsurpassed. Why do they not boost to the same extent that portion of the road between Cochrane and St. John? My right hon. friend told the country that it would not be a great many years before great industries and populous villages would be settled along that line of railway, and people would go in there by the hundreds and thousands. Why is it that they have not gone? It is simply because this Government have not afforded the facilities which it was intended to give, and which it is able to give them to-day. It is only a few nights ago that the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) threatened to tear up the rails on that portion of the Transcontinental that crosses New Brunswick. This Transcontinental road was expected to cement our provinces closer together, provinces that already were united by industrial and commercial activities, and which had heard the eloquent appeals of Haliburton, Joseph Howe, Tupper, Tilley, Mitchell, mingled with the eloquent appeals of Cartier, Macdonald, Brown, and others. All these men made eloquent appeals to the provinces that were united by the still more noble ties of brotherhood, humanity and charity. Charity, by the way, is a virtue which some hon. gentlemen opposite seem to lack when they talk of the Maritime Provinces. The Maritime Provinces have all played their part. We have given to the West the great harbours with which our shores are so generously endowed, and which are to-day so necessary if Canada is to become the great nation we expect her to be. My hon. friend said that the building of the Transcontinental from Quebec to New Brunswick was opposed by the Hon. Mr. Blair, who resigned because of the construction of that road. Very few men, permit me to say, have been closer to the heart and mind of the people of this Dominion than the late Mr. Blair, and by none is his memory more revered than by me. The Hon. Mr. Blair always treated my county of Gloucester with the greatest justice and consideration. His name is mentioned in every home in the county almost as if it were the name of a father.

I only do him justice when I say that I know that the action he took was inconsiderate and that he regretted it next day. And, perhaps, that was one of the causes that took him so quickly from us, to our great regret. This Transcontinental road across the Maritime Provinces, coming as far as Moncton and bringing down the products of the West to be shipped from the ports of St. John and Halifax, might easily have been made the bearer of a much greater traffic, had the crossing at Quebec been completed. But, through the failure to make this connection and in other ways, the Government have caused this traffic from the West to reach Toronto and Montreal, to be ultimately diverted to American harbours. Some day the Transcontinental across New Brunswick will be one of the best paying roads in Canada. When a government undertakes an enterprise of such consequence as a transcontinental railway it has not in view the returns of the very next day; it looks to the future. This patriotic plan of uniting by another road the Atlantic coast with the Pacific should have had the effect of making the portion of New Brunswick to which I have referred one of the most highly productive parts of Canada. I am surprised that my hon. friends from Ontario are not satisfied with the development which the Transcontinental has given to the trade through that province. The connection from Cochrane to North Bay by the Temiskaming & Northern Ontario railway —itself the conception of a great Liberal statesman, the late Sir George Ross—gives Ontario another means of connection with the West, and that province is thereby greatly benefited, just as central New Brunswick has benefited. The younger generation, when they make up their minds no longer to go to the United States, but to spend their energies in developing the land in which they were born, will see this middle portion of New Brunswick the scene of many thriving industries, especially the pulp and paper manufactories for which it is so well fitted. And the traffic thus developed must make the magnificent scenery of the Miramichi valley and other portions of that country famous; for, while not so inspiring as the scenery of the Rocky Mountains of British Columbia, its beauties will attract many lovers of nature, and will convince them that Providence has been generous to eastern as well as to western Canada.

On the motion of Mr. Turgeon the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

UNITED GRAIN GROWERS, LIMITED.

Further consideration of Bill No. 14 respecting the Grain Growers Grain Company, Limited, and to authorize it to change its name to "United Grain Growers, Limited."—Mr. Bradbury—in Committee.

On section 5—Power to prohibit shareholder voting by proxy:

Mr. BRADBURY: Before we go any further, an arrangement has been come to by which an amendment is to be made to that section. The discussion, the last time the Bill was before the House, was on clause 5 and that was regarding the voting to be permitted. The matter has been thoroughly explained and I am informed that my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) is perfectly satisfied with this amendment which has been placed in my hands. The amendment, which I beg leave to move, seconded by Mr. Schaffner, reads as follows:

That section 5 be amended by adding the following sub-section: "No by-law passed under the provisions of this section shall go into operation until a by-law has been passed under the next following section giving the shareholders representation at annual and other meetings by means of elected delegates as soon as the right of voting by proxy is abolished."

This, I think, clears up the difficulty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would suggest that the preceding subsection be numbered 1 and this 2.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I understand that it is not customary now to number the first subsection. The second is No. 2 but the first is not numbered 1 because it is 1.

Mr. MACLEAN: I think that has become the rule here but I do not think it is considered good drafting all the same.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am disposed to agree with my hon. friend but I know it is customary.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MOUNT ROYAL TUNNEL AND TERMINAL COMPANY.

Bill No. 37, respecting The Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, Limited.—Mr. Rainville—in committee.

Mr. MURPHY: I notice that this Bill has been amended. Would you be good enough, Mr. Chairman, to indicate what the amendment is?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is in clause 2: "Section 12 of chapter 74 of the Statutes of 1912 is hereby repealed."

Mr. MURPHY: Can any one tell us what that was?

Mr. BLAIN: This work is pretty well advanced; indeed, a train has passed through the tunnel. The Bill merely provides for an extension of time. There is no opposition from the city of Montreal or from any other source. I regret that I cannot give a proper answer to my hon. friend's question, but I may say that the matter is not contentious. There is but little change from the terms of the original Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: From the reading of the amendment by the chairman, it occurs to me that it may be a verbal change made necessary by this new Bill. Apart from that, however, I desire to point out to the committee that, as the hon. member for Peel has just said, the works referred to in this Act are rapidly approaching completion. A train went through the tunnel a week or ten days ago. The contract for the terminal on Dorchester street was let some time last fall, and the work there is fairly well advanced. The people of Montreal and vicinity are very much interested in the progress of this work; the Montreal newspapers devote a great deal of attention to it. Sir Donald Mann was recently interviewed, and stated that the trains through the tunnel would be in operation by August next, if I mistake not. I read in one of the Montreal newspapers not very long ago that financial arrangements have been made that necessitate an application of the moneys that have been secured by way of loan for the completion of this work to no other undertaking of the Canadian Northern Company. Under these circumstances it occurs to me that five years is a rather long extension to grant, and that a couple of years at the outside would be sufficient, if the work is really to be completed, and if it is as near completion as persons connected with the Canadian Northern railway and their officers represent it to be. These works have dawdled along for quite a number of years, and possibly if a shorter extension commensurate with the requirements of the company were granted they would be brought to completion much more quickly. I invite an expression of opinion from some gentleman from Montreal who is more familiar with the matter than I am.

Mr. LEMIEUX: While under ordinary circumstances the extension would appear to be rather long, I may point out that of all the enterprises of the Canadian Northern this is, perhaps, the only one which has been brought to a successful issue. Since they started the tunnelling of the mountain at Montreal they have not stopped their work, and I know that in a short time they intend to build a convenient station and terminus on Dorchester street. I think that under the circumstances the committee would do well to give them the extension for which they ask.

Mr. MURPHY: Five years is rather long.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Perhaps so, but even during this war and under the difficult conditions which every railway company has had to go through, the Canadian Northern has been doing excellent work in Montreal. On account of the fact that they have tunnelled the mountain and that they are building the station, as I am told that they have secured the necessary funds to build it, I think we should grant them that extension of time.

Mr. MURPHY: I hope my hon. friend is correct. Could my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) give us any statement as to that?

Mr. BLAIN: That matter was discussed in committee and every one present was quite satisfied with the progress of the work, as my hon. friend from Rouville has pointed out.

Mr. MURPHY: Did any representative of the Canadian Northern railway give to the committee any assurance regarding the completion of the work?

Mr. BLAIN: Yes, that was assured.

Mr. MURPHY: Who was present?

Mr. BLAIN: Mr. Ruel, and he made a statement before the committee that the work was progressing and that a train had been sent through, which would show that the rails had all been laid. The extension of time, as I understand it, is to complete the terminals. The representative of the Canadian Northern railway promised the committee that the work would go forward at once and be completed in a short time. There is something in what my hon. friend says. The time of extension seems to be rather long, particularly as the work is so well advanced, but I do not think there is any cause of complaint in that regard. The work has been pushed forward in a fairly satisfactory manner to all concerned. In answer to the question of my hon. friend in respect to the clause that was repealed, the clause to be repealed is:

> The company shall commence to construct a tunnel on the said line of railway within two years after the passing of this Act—

And so on. That is the general clause. The committee may feel quite safe as to the work being pushed forward as rapidly as possible. The question is a fair one to come up before this committee, and on that point I can assure the committee that it may be perfectly satisfied.

Mr. MURPHY: The Railway Committee acted on the assurance of Mr. Ruel, representing the Canadian Northern railway, that the work would be completed within the time given, and so agreed to the extension?

Mr. BLAIN: Yes.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Department of Labour—Industrial Investigation Act, $25,000.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour) Before taking up this item I desire to make a very brief statement concerning the expenditures of the Department of Labour, chiefly for the purpose of correcting two or three mis-statements that have been made respecting them. Some time ago the hon. member for Rouville, in criticising the expenditures of the various departments, stated that there had been an increase in the total expenditure of the Department of Labour between the years 1911 and 1915 of 50 per cent. On being challenged, he declared that he would prove his statement up to the hilt when we came to the estimates.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Did I make that statement this session or last?

Mr. CROTHERS: Last session. The Public Accounts show that for the first full year after we were in power, namely, from March 31, 1912 to March 31, 1913, the expenditure of the Department of Labour, instead of being 50 per cent more than the expenditure in the last full year of our predecessors, namely 1910-1911, was 17 per cent less, and last year, 1915-16, our expenditure was 15 per cent less than in the last full year of our predecessors. Our expenditure last year, ending on March 31, the figures for which do not appear in the Auditor-General's report, but which I have made up, was about $700 less than the year before, and 15 per cent less than the last year hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. So that instead of the expenditures of the Department of Labour having increased by 50 per cent, there was a decrease of 17 per cent the first year we were in power, and of 15 per cent in the last two years. My hon. friend from Assiniboia, discussing the same subject, though I think he must have got his information from a different source, said that the expenditures of the Department of Labour for the last four years showed an increase over the expenditure when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power of 32 per cent. The explanation I have just given in answer to the statement of my hon. friend from Rouville covers also the statement of my hon. friend from Assiniboia. If I may repeat, the decrease the first year we were in power was 17 per cent, and last year and the year before there was a decrease of about 15 per cent instead of an increase of 50 per cent or 32 per cent.

Labour — Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $25,000.

Mr. BURNHAM: Might I suggest that this sum is not nearly large enough, if it includes anything more than simple investigation or incipient preliminary inquiry. Surely, the House ought to have grasped the fact that labour is something of a more extended character than simply the pulling back and forward of interests called labour. It has too long been the fashion to suppose that the time would come when we should arrive at some settled point. That settled point never can be arrived at in labour, I submit, any more than in any other branch of economics. It is precisely like phenomena of meteorology. You never can tell where an eddy of air is going to work out at any one time. The economic equilibrium can never be attained. I would not say that it is a mathematical impossibility, but it is certainly a human impossibility; and, since there are different people in the world, different dispositions, rivalries, various elements, that go to make up all these different currents, it must follow that there can never be a precise equilibrium. The effect will always manifest itself in continual upheaval. For people to say that we have arrived at the milennium because the minimum wage of labour is so and so, is to state what may be true at this moment; but, having regard to the theory of rent, having regard to the Malthusian doctrine, having regard to the theories of John Stuart Mill, or any other elementary writer on political economy—Thorold Rogers, or anybody else you like—it will be seen at a glance that it is simply one horse pulling against another in the great economic struggle, and you never can tell which is going to be ahead; one appears to be ahead and satisfied, but in a moment it is pulled back and the other is ahead; and so this struggle goes on. To maintain the fair, impartial and true condition of the whole economic world is the duty of the legislators of the nation; that is the duty of the members of this House, and particularly of our expert, the Minister of Labour. That being the case, why cut down to a paltry sum the investigation into one of the very few great elements of the whole economic struggle? I am sure the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) will rise in his place and reassert such a simple principle as that. We are so continually doing things in what we call the law, an ad captandum way—continually plastering up one little hole, or dealing with one little difficulty, never realizing that there is an underlying principle which, if we once ascertain it, gives us the solution of the problem. We must get out of this fashion, or else cease to call ourselves cultivated and scientific. It is just as in the study of zoology, or comparative anatomy, it is a question of life, of living beings, and what is needed is an analysis of experience in order to enable us to understand the elements of the problem we have to face. We shall not reach the solution by considering separately such questions as the price of flour, or the rate of wages. That is absurd. It does not matter what these are, so long as they are in equipose.

Mr. MURPHY: Would the hon. gentleman say how much additional would establish the equilibrium he has advocated?

Mr. BURNHAM: I would reply by saying that I am criticising the disposition to pare down this item. That is all.

Mr. LUCIEN PACAUD (Megantic): I wish to avail myself of this opportunity to bring before this committee the facts disclosed to us by the documents brought down by the Minister of Labour in connection with the strike at Thetford Mines. In doing so, it is not my intention to elaborate at any great length the views I hold, nor is it my intention to indulge in any extensive criticisms which, though they may be, I am sure, quite proper, quite just, quite well-founded, would most likely fall on deaf ears so far as concerns the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers). My one object in rising is this: The miners of Thetford Mines have a just grievance against the Minister of Labour for the most extraordinary attitude which he saw fit to take at the time of our strike last year. As I share that grievance and as I am their representative, I intend to voice our grievance before this committee, and to set forth the facts which gave rise to them. At the beginning of June, 1916, a situation arising out of difficulties between the asbestos companies and the miners became most acute. There seemed at that time no ground for a compromise between the men and the companies. The Department of Labour was officially notified of this situation by a letter which I hold in my hand, written by the Secretary of the Western Federation of Miners on the 20th of June, 1916:

To the Director of Inquiries,
Department of Labour, Ottawa.

Sir,—Would you be kind enough to send me immediately a copy of the Industrial Disputes Act, with all its amendments, the by-laws passed in conformity with this law, and also the blank forms necessary to make a formal request for a board? Does Article 57 of this law require that a notice of thirty days be given by the employees to the employers who desire a raise of salary of fifty cents per day, before making their request for an inquiry?

Believe me,
Yours very truly,
L. J. L. Rousseau.

I received the first surprise of many which the perusal of the documents gave me when I ascertained that this letter was not included among these documents. I waive my right, for the present, to make any comment on this point. But I may add that there was no answer to this letter. So, on June 27—seven days later—Mr. Rousseau wrote a second letter as follows:

To the Director of Inquiries,
Department of Labour,
Ottawa.

Sir,—We have here a thousand of our members who are not satisfied with the condition of labour, and who have decided to strike if they do not get satisfaction. A request for a raise of salary has been made and the employers have decided of refusing our request. We are actually taking a vote, which will close on the 1st July, and we have reason to believe that the vast majority is in favour of a strike. We, the officers of the Federation, are endeavouring to obtain a compromise between employees and employers. The 20th instant I asked for blank forms necessary to make our request for inquiry, and you did not answer our letter. Please let me know if you still have these forms or better still, to send me them. If there are no special forms I would be very much obliged if you will inform me upon this matter.

L. J. L. Rousseau,
For the Union of Asbestos Miners
W.F.U.

I may say that this letter was also not amongst the documents laid on the table of the House.

Mr. CROTHERS: What is the date of that?

Mr. PACAUD: The 27th of June. The department replied on the 29th June, 1916. I may say immediately that I consider this letter the most important of all those written, or received, by the department in connection with this case. It was not on the file with the documents brought down. Here is the letter:

Deputy Minister of Labour, Canada.
Ottawa, 29th June, 1916.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 27th of June, and in answer I am enclosing you four copies of the forms prepared by this office for a request for a council of conciliation and enquiry. We had not noticed that your letter of the 28th of June contained such a request. I hope that the officers of the Federation will continue to do their best to settle amicably these differences, and if this cannot be done through direct negotiations, that the employees will request a council of conciliation and enquiry. There are no special by-laws on this point, but you will find in the forms which we are addressing you, the printed information touching certain details, and in following closely these institutions, the petitioners would evade all errors.

Yours very truly,
Deputy Minister of Labour.

Mr. L. J. L. Rousseau,
Thetford Mines, Que.

I will call the special attention of the minister to this part of the letter. This was a true declaration of policy on the part of the department. The minister was giving in this letter his intention, or the intention of his department, to follow the strict letter of the law as it is laid down in the Industrial Disputes Act 1907:

I hope that the officers of the Federation will continue to do their best to settle amicably their differences, and if this cannot be done through direct negotiations, that the employees will request a council of conciliation and enquiry.

I will refer to this a little later on.

Mr. MURPHY: Who signs that?

Mr. PACAUD: F. A. Acland, Deputy Minister of Labour. I have a letter dated the 30th June and addressed to Mr. Rousseau which is of secondary importance. It informs Mr. Rousseau that:

Mr. Narcisse Arcand, one of the officers of this department, has been charged to go to Thetford Mines and to give you all the assistance to settle amicably the differences arising between the employers and the employees.

Before I go any further I hope the minister will be in a position to tell us exactly what was the work that was performed by Mr. Arcand at Thetford. He was sent there by the department, but I notice in the documents brought down by the minister there is no mention of him at all. I know he was around there for a week or so, and I understand he was dismissed from the service. I do not know if it was in connection with that strike or not. Negotiations went on between the 30th June, the time of the arrival of Mr. Arcand, and the 15th July. Then a petition was sent to the department. This petition requested a board of conciliation. I notice that in this petition there are three special points. First, it was declared that the cause of the dispute was that the present wages were not in proportion to the high cost of living. The petition is in French, and it says:—

The cause and the nature of the difference is that the present wages are not in proportion to the high cost of living.

In the second place, they note that 90 per cent of the men had voted in favour of a strike, but that the officers had decided to ask for a report. In the third place, it was stated that direct negotiations were impossible in view of the fact that the employers had stated that no concessions would be made. I wish to direct attention to this point in the petition that Mr. Sharpe, manager of the Asbestos Corporation of Canada, had declared to the men that he had absolutely no concessions to make. Therefore, to return to the letter of the 29th June from the department, it was stated that if negotiations failed the men would only have to apply for a board and it would be granted. That letter was in reply to the letter of the 27th, which made reference to the possibility of a strike, and, therefore, the letter of the 29th could only have that one meaning. Therefore, on the 15th July, when the petition was sent to the department, the minister knew that direct negotiations were at an end, because, in order to have direct negotiations, there must be two parties. One of the parties having said that he was not going to make any concessions whatever, the men had an absolute reply to the letter of the 29th of June, and they sent forward their petition. That was on the 15th July. On the 24th July the department sent the following letter to Mr. Rousseau:—

Department of Labour,
Canada.

Ottawa, 24th July, 1916.

Re—law of enquiries in matters of industrial disputes of 1907, concerning the differences between the proprietor of the Asbestos Mines at Thetford Mines, Quebec, and their employees, members of the local Union, No. 143 of the Western Federation of Miners.

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge reception of a petition signed by Mr. Joseph Vallée, and by yourself, as President and Secretary of the local Union 143 of the Western Federation of Miners, requesting the establishment by the miners of a commission of conciliation and enquiry by virtue of the law of enquiries in matters of industrial disputes, 1907. The petition does not mention clearly that yourself and Mr. Vallée had informed the employees of the information given out at the time of your conference in the office of the Minister about one or two weeks ago, with the representatives of the principal Asbestos companies.

The questions which the petition claims are in dispute comprise the recognition of the Union, the check of system, etc. The opinion of the Minister is that these questions cannot be properly submitted to a commission of conciliation to be settled, and that it seems understood that the question of the recognition was not to be regarded as vital and was given up. As for the claim for a raise of wages, the conversation held in the office of the Minister established, you will remember, that a raise of salary having been given during the month of April last, and that the representatives of the company and of the employees at that meeting seemed to have come then at the conclusion that no advantage would probably result from a new agitation of this question at the present time.

The opinion of the Minister is, in the first place, that the employees of each company should be informed by Mr. Vallée or by yourself of the general nature and of the results of this discussion in question; and, in the second place, that the pending questions should be discussed with each company separately, through the medium of a committee of employees, and you will remember that the Minister obtained for the Secretary of the Union the privilege of accompanying the committee of employees and to plead their cause. In proceeding along these principles, the employees will act in accordance with the entente which have been arrived at in the office of the Minister.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,

(Sgd) F. A. ACLAND,

Deputy-Minister of Labour, and Clerk of the Commission of Conciliation and Enquiry.

Mr. L. J. L. Rousseau,
Thetford Mines, Que.

I think that before going any further it would be well to summarize the position taken by the minister. On the 27th of June, he received a letter from the men informing him that the situation at Thetford is serious, that on the 1st of July they intended to take a vote as to whether or not they would go on strike. On the 29th, the minister writes acknowledging the receipt of this letter and telling the men: We are pleased that you are trying to negotiate; continue your negotiations and if you are not successful ask for a Board of Conciliation. In the petition of the 15th of July it was clearly established and proved that direct negotiations were impossible, and the petitioners requested, not a favour, but the application of the law. The minister acknowledges the receipt of the petition on the 24th of July and then he says: But there is no more ground for a Board of conciliation; you, Mr. Vallée or Mr. Rousseau, go and see individually every miner, 2,000 of them; and after you have seen them individually and told them what happened in my office in April, that is six months before, go and see every employer and tell him what happened in our office at that time. All of this was in the letter of the 24th of July, although we do not find it in the letter of the 29th of June. This letter was answered by Mr. Rousseau in the name of the union:

Thetford Mines, 28th July, 1916.

Sir:—

In answer to your letter dated the 24th of July I wish to tell you that we do not see why our petition requesting a commission of conciliation and enquiry should contain clearly that we had previously informed our members of the information gathered at our conference at Ottawa, so that it would be accepted. As a matter of fact, we had informed our members of all the details of our interview with you. We take the permission of calling your attention on the fact that the points in dispute are: raising of salary from $2.00 to $2.50, that is to say approximately 25 per cent on the salaries as they are to-day.

During April last, it is true that there was a raise of 25 cents as an average, but taking into consideration the rising cost of living which is constant, our members have decided to claim this new raise of wages of 50 cents per day which is most reasonable and below the salaries paid in other parts of Canada.

We must consider further that our members do not work when the weather is bad, which is not the exception in our locality. You tell us in your letter that the opinion of the Minister is that the miners of each company should submit and discuss with each manager separately the questions in dispute. We differ totally with you. His opinion would perhaps be good, if we were not organized as a labour union, but as such is the case, the moment that our union by a vote taken at a meeting especially called to discuss such a demand, that decision becomes collective and applies to all the companies indiscriminately where our members are employed. If the opinion of the Minister was followed in the present case, we would have to follow it in cases where a trade union is engaged in about 500 different industries, which would be an impossibility and proves that that opinion is not conformable neither to the spirit nor to the letter of the law on industrial disputes. Nevertheless, we have fulfilled his desire through protesting on the interpretation given by the minister, and here is the result of our interviews. Mr. Hammerick, of the Jacob Asbestos, refused to grant the wish of the Minister in allowing me to accompany the delegation of miners from his mines. His answer was that his company could probably pay the salary that was requested but he did not know what to do under the circumstances. Mr. Johnson was amiable enough to meet the desire of the miners and he said in substance: that the raise of wages was favorable and agreeable to him, but that it would be necessary to come to an understanding with the other miners. Hon. J. R. Smith refused to recognize the advice of the Minister. We tried to meet Messrs Sharp & Bennett, but we were unable to do so due to their numerous occupations. A great many people are enticing our men to strike. The detectives are daily repeating to our men: Hold on, you will win out. We cannot keep our men any longer. We have had to-night a general meeting and it was unanimously resolved that the workmen considered that they should not wait any longer for a Board of Arbitration. If in the 2nd of August it is not granted, we will take a decision. We therefore renew our request for a Board of Arbitration and attract the attention on the fact that it is impossible for us to prevent our members any longer to go on strike if this Board is not nominated in the very near future, and we disclaim any responsibility for the situation which might arise as we have given evidence of patiotism in preventing up to this date a strike at the mine at Thetford Mines and that we have conformed ourselves to the laws which govern this country in making application for a Board of Arbitration.

Yours very truly,

(Signed) L. J. L. Rousseau,
Secretary, W.F.M.

Then we have Mr. Rousseau on the 29th of July again sending a telegram to the clerk of the council of conciliation and inquiry:

Thetford Mines, 29th July, 1916.

To the Clerk of the Council of Conciliation and Enquiry, Department of Labor, Ottawa, Ont.,—

Our interview with the miners of the mines has not had the success which was expected. At a meeting held the same night, we have passed a resolution to inform you that if a Board of Arbitration is not granted on the 2nd of August, we shall no longer wait. I am writing you the details.

(Signed) L. J. L. Rousseau.

The only reply that the men got to that letter was this, on the 31st July, 1916, from the Assistant Deputy Minister of Labour:

Ottawa, 31st July, 1916.

Deputy Minister of Labour,
Canada.

Sir,—I have the honor to acknowledge reception of your telegram concerning the actual differences between the employers and several of their employees at the asbestos mines of the district of Thetford Mines. We are taking measures which we hope will obviate the necessity of establishing a commission of conciliation and enquiry.

Anything but a Board of Conciliation.

In any case this department will not fail to make the greatest efforts in its power in the interest of peace and to assure the rights of the respective parties. We are waiting for the reception of the details promised in your telegram.

Yours very truly,

Assistant Deputy Minister of Labor.

Mr. L. J. L. Rousseau,
Thetford Mines.

Now we come to the culmination. The men had waited in vain. They informed the department officially on the 20th of June of their intention to take action, but the 3rd of August, 1916, arrived and nothing had been done. Then the minister received this telegram:

A general strike has been declared this morning at 7.30. The men are nearly all out of work.

L. J. L. Rousseau.

And I see on the 3rd of August a telegram to J. L. Rousseau:

Mr. Blanchet will be in Thetford Mines tomorrow to make public investigation. Have men continue work meantime.

(Sgd.) T. W. Crothers.

But the strike had already been declared. Mr. Blanchet came to Thetford. There was a very large meeting at St. Maurice, one of the sections of the town. The people had been informed that the department would send a man, but it was a great disappointment to them as everybody spoke but Mr. Blanchet, so that we did not know what mission he had. After the strike had been on for one week, on the 10th of August, 1916, the men had a letter from the minister as follows:

Ottawa, 10th of August, 1917.

Dear Mr. Rousseau,—

I was very much grieved to learn that the miners of Thetford Mines had left their work a few days ago, a fact which I cannot help but think was not at all wise, especially at a time when negotiations were going on in view of a settlement by agreement.

And this is after all the correspondence I have placed on Hansard to-night.

When the war broke out, I addressed to the employers and to the employees a special demand to evade everywhere where it would be possible all labour difficulties, and I am happy to know that that line of conduct was generally followed by the two parties.

It is of the greatest importance for the workmen that all their efforts which tend to better their condition should be such as to attract the sympathy of the public in general, for if they have not the public opinion behind them, these efforts would not be crowned with any permanent success, and especially during the war, public opinion is decidedly opposed to any cessation of work. The product of the mines at Thetford is of urgent necessity for the pursuance of the war and it is, I believe, the duty of the employees to return immediately to their work, and if it is necessary they could continue negotiations in view of bettering their condition.

I hope that you will be able to use your influence to bring about a just and reasonable settlement of the present difficulty and at all events to persuade the employees to return to work. I understand that the operators are ready to raise the wages by 25 cents per day, and I believe that if this is true it would be to the better interest of the employees to accept this offer. I fervently desire that the employees should everywhere receive fair treatment, but at the same time I am strongly of the opinion that under the circumstances the workmen of the mines at Thetford should accept this offer and return immediately to work.

With kindest regards, I remain,

Yours truly

Mr. J. L. J. Rousseau,
Thetford Mines, P.Q.

The letter was not signed, but I presume it was from the minister. It is addressed to Mr. L. J. L. Rousseau, Thetford Mines, Quebec.

The most important fact brought out by this letter is that the minister did not consider that the strike was a serious matter. He recognizes the importance of the operation of the mines, in view of the war, but he does nothing to prevent the strike. He goes back on what he said in his previous letter. He is notified on July 30 by telegram and letter that on August 2 there would be a strike unless the law were applied. Although he recognizes it as urgent in view of the war that the strike should be prevented, this is the course he took: he passed an Order in Council dated August 3, sending Mr. Blanchet to Thetford to prevent the strike—after the strike had been declared.

But the miners of Thetford Mines were not to be denied consideration. They took to heart the little reproach of the minister and they sent him the following reply:

To the Honourable T. W. Crothers, Minister of Labour,
Parliament Buildings, Ottawa.

Mr. the Minister,

We have at hand your letter of the 10th instant. In reply I wish to inform you that we have already acted in line with your wishes and that from the 10th of August last, the date on which you wrote us, the labour union of which I am the secretary had already given its assent to a resolution passed by a group of citizens of Thetford Mines, accepted at a meeting in which merchants and business men who are not workmen at the mines, but who have at heart the immediate settlement of these differences. You will see in reading a copy of this resolution, which accompanies my letter, that there is nothing excessively hard nor severe for the employers. It does not seem though that the latter have manifested any desire to accept it. The men belonging to the local catholic union have not as yet replied to the committee of citizens that they were ready to accept. We will add that as you informed us that the product of our men is of urgent necessity for the pursuance of the war, and that it was a patriotic duty for us to make certain sacrifices so as not to diminish this production. The union of which I am the secretary is right to accept an agreement still less severe for the employers and which is as follows:

1. The salary of all the workmen will be of $0.25 per day higher than it was at the month of July last.

2. This scale of wages would remain in force during one year.

I have here a letter from Mr. Deschamps, attorney-at-law of Thetford Mines, who was secretary of the meeting of citizens at Thetford Mines which had been convened by the mayor. The letter is as follows:

Thetford Mines,

August 10th, 1916.

Mr. Joseph Vallée,
President International Miners, P.Q.

Dear Sir,

At a meeting at Thetford Mines specially convened by His Honour the Mayor and held at the City Hall this day at 3.30 p.m., it was resolved unanimously to submit to the proprietors of the mines and also to the Labour Union a project of settlement which was submitted by His Honour the Mayor, of which a copy is herewith enclosed.

You will oblige me by giving me as soon as possible a reply informing me if your union accepts this project, so that I may be able to submit your reply at the next meeting.

I do not feel that it is necessary to read this agreement. It is in absolute conformity with the terms of the letter written by the minister on August 10. The men had agreed to receive 25 cents a day.

I have given all the facts in this matter. The minister had one of two courses to follow: to respect the law or to evade it. He preferred to follow the latter course and to refuse a board of arbitration requested by the men, the law being very clear on this point. As a result of this refusal on his part for reasons which I do not wish to unveil, this body of men received more unfair treatment—I myself was a witness of what happened—than was ever accorded to anybody in this country at the hands of a minister of the Crown.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, Thetford Mines is in the county that my hon. friend has the honour of representing in this House. He lives and practices law in Thetford Mines, and I am very much surprised that a lawyer should make such a deliverance as he has just made to the committee. He says that he has told us all the facts; I do not think he has. There were six separate corporations mining asbestos at Thetford Mines. There were two labour organizations there, a local one called the Catholic Association and the other the Western Federation of Miners. My hon. friend does not, perhaps, know all the facts, because three or four parties from Thetford Mines came to Ottawa on two occasions, first of their own accord, and the second time at my request. If the hon. gentleman had read the Industrial Disputes Investion Act he would not have made the speech that he has just made. Five minutes examination of that Act would have shown him that it does not lend itself to the establishment of a board of conciliation in the circumstances that existed at Thetford Mines. The first letter that he read from my deputy or myself was written at a time when we did not know anything about there being five other corporations or about the members of these labour organizations working at the six different mines. I am speaking from recollection because I have not any of the papers here. I am surprised that my hon. friend should have brought the matter up at all, it is so perfectly plain that the case was not one in which a board of conciliation could have been properly established. Two thousand five hundred men belonging to these two different organizations were working in the six mines, if I remember rightly, about 1,200 belonging to each organization. I have on many occasions pointed out that where similar circumstances existed, the Act did not permit the establishment of a board of conciliation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Why not?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am coming to that now. One very prominent case occurred at Cobalt, where the miners were members of the same organization, the Western Federation of Miners. There were forty separate and distinct mines, with forty separate and distinct corporations running them, and we were asked to appoint a board of conciliation to investigate the conditions in those forty different mines, each one of which would have been entitled to name one of the members of that board. When I pointed out the facts and stated that the Act did not lend itself to any such action and suggested that we appoint a commission to inquire into the conditions in the forty mines, our suggestion was accepted; a commission was appointed, the investigation was made, and we have had no trouble since. Another case occurred at Toronto and Hamilton, where about a year ago a large number of machinists working in about half a hundred different factories asked for a board of conciliation. Each one of the fifty odd employers would have been entitled under the Act to name a member of that board, so, of course, I pointed out at once that we could not do anything of that kind, and I appointed another commission of three men, who investigated matters in Toronto and Hamilton, and made a report. I have had to deal with cases where there were only two employers who would not agree upon a man to represent them. If the employers all agree and say: We want one board of investigation and we will agree to have one man represent us on that board, a board will be granted at once. I have had cases of that kind in the smelter mines in western Canada. On one occasion four employers there agreed upon a man who should represent them on a board of conciliation and a board was appointed. There was, however, nothing of that kind here. The mayor of Thetford Mines, the President of this Western Federation of Miners and the secretary, whose letters my hon. friend has read, came to Ottawa at my request. The facts were these. These various corporations had increased the pay of their men by twenty-five cents a day the fall before and twenty-five cents a day again in April of last year, and in June they were willing to advance the men's pay by another twenty-five cents. Even with all these increases the wages would not be very high and, of course, wages were not so high then as they are now. Shortly before that we had had in that district two Boards of Conciliation which gave unanimous findings fixing the wages at $1.75 per day instead of $2.25, the representatives of the employers on those boards respectively agreeing with the representatives of the men, that $1.75 were the wages the men should get. I pointed that out to miners' representatives when they came to Ottawa: These companies will give you an advance of 25 cents a day more, and I think you had better accept it, because I am afraid if you have a commission to inquire into the conditions, they will not give you as much as that; and I pointed out what those other two boards of conciliation had found, namely, that $1.75 were the correct wages. After their second visit, they left me thoroughly satisfied that they were going back with the intention of accepting the 25 cents advance, and that they would be satisfied with that.

Mr. VERVILLE: Where were these two boards of conciliation the minister speaks of?

Mr. CROTHERS: In Nova Scotia, and the awards were unanimous. The men were doing somewhat similar work.

Mr. DEVLIN: Did the minister advise the men of Thetford Mines that under the Act a board of conciliation could not be granted?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think I did.

Mr. DEVLIN: You did?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think I did. I am not sure; I am speaking only from memory, but I think I would have done so.

Mr. DEVLIN: That does not appear in the correspondence.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am sure, although I do not just remember the matter of telling them, but that is the first thing that would strike me in a case where there were six employers. The six men must agree on a man to represent them or we cannot grant a board of conciliation. I sent Mr. Arcand the fair-wage officer whom we had at that time for the province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, and he did not succeed in reaching an adjustment or in inducing the parties to adjust the matters in dispute, and I took the course there that I have taken in many similar cases, that is, I appointed a commissioner, in the person of Mr. Blanchet, a barrister of Ottawa, who speaks both English and French fluently. He went down there and in a few days he got a perfectly satisfactory agreement signed up by two men from each of the six mines, or twelve men in all, some of them belonging to the Catholic Association and some belonging to the Western Federation of Miners. That agreement was perfectly satisfactory to everybody, and I was gratified at and fully satisfied with the work Mr. Blanchet had done, and I am much surprised that my hon. friend, who is a lawyer and who very likely possesses a copy of the Industrial Disputes Act, did not advise these men to keep on working and tell them that Mr. Blanchet, a fair and just man, was being appointed as commissioner and that he would make an honest report, as he did.

Mr. PACAUD: Why did the minister wait until a strike was declared?

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not anticipate a strike; I supposed the men were going to carry out my advice. I paid their expenses to come to Ottawa because I thought I could talk the matter over with them better than I could discuss it by correspondence. This matter was brought up by two prominent Liberals from Montreal, more from a party standpoint than anything else, before the Trades and Labour Congress held in Toronto last fall, and the solicitor of that Congress, Mr. J. G. O'Donoghue, who has been their solicitor for a great many years and who is well known to many members of this House, when he learned of the facts, said: "The minister is quite right; he cannot grant a board of conciliation under the circumstances," and any legal gentleman reading over the statute would come to the same conclusion. At any rate, in the end we secured a settlement that was satisfactory to everybody.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Did the men get the increase of twenty-five cents a day?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes, and they went to work. I am very much afraid, to be frank with my hon. friend (Mr. Pacaud) that he did not make any effort to keep the thing quiet. I was advised at the time that he and another prominent Liberal in the town of Thetford Mines addressed a public meeting of those men and inflamed them to going on strike.

Mr. PACAUD: I deny that absolutely. I am very much pleased that the minister has mentioned the matter. I understood that the Department of Labour had sent to Thetford Mines some Austrians from the confinement camps to work for the Asbestos Corporation. Immediately before I attended the meeting, which was the only one I addressed, I went and saw the manager of the mine and asked if the men had been sent at the request of that company, and I asked the department and they said they were short of labour. They had to get detectives to protect the Austrians and see them safely home at the end of their day's work, but even then one of them got killed.

I did attend the meeting, and I am proud of it.

Mr. CROTHERS. Did you not denounce the Minister of Labour and the Government for not granting a Board?

Mr. PACAUD: I never mentioned a word about anything except the Austrians.

Mr. CROTHERS: But you denounced the Minister of Labour and the Government in connection with that?

Mr. PACAUD: Yes.

Mr. CROTHERS: And inflamed the crowd that was there?

Mr. PACAUD: I had a perfect right to attack the minister.

Mr. MACDONALD: He had a perfect right to attack the minister for sending the Austrians there.

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not know what my hon. friend means about sending them there. These men went there quite properly.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister sent them there, my hon. friend had a perfect right to attack him.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not send them there in the first place, but if I had, the hon. member would not be right in denouncing me under the circumstances. Thousands of these Austrians are interned in different parts of the country. When the war broke out, the men interned were divided into two classes. The first class consisted of those who were suspected of being enemies; these men were interned, and have never been let out so far as I know. The other class consisted of men who had been dismissed from their positions because they were of Austrian or German birth. I am not finding fault with any one for that, but these men could not get work as they were of enemy birth, and many of them came to the Registrar and asked to be sent to the internment camp, where they could get something to eat and have their families taken care of, and this class were sent to the internment camps in large numbers. Subsequently, when there was work to be done, the men of this second class were let out if they were not thought dangerous, and that has been done all over the country. I accept my hon. friend's denial, of course. He admits, however, that he was at the meeting and that he denounced the Government. I submit that I did what was perfectly right in the circumstances, and under similar circumstances I should do it again to-morrow. I have nothing to retract, and nothing to apologize for, and the solicitor of the Trades and Labour Congress approved of my action.

Mr. DEVLIN: Who paid the expenses of these Austrians to go there?

Mr. CROTHERS: The employer pays the fare in the first instance, but recoups himself out of the first money earned by the men. If they remain a reasonable length of time, however, their fares are refunded.

Mr. DEVLIN: Did these Austrians come from the Abitibi district?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think they came from the Spirit Lake district.

Mr. DEVLIN: Surely the Government did not bring men 800 to 1,000 miles to work in the Thetford Mines?

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say the Government brought them, but the employer.

Mr. DEVLIN: I know, but the original cost must have been paid by the Government.

Mr. CROTHERS: You mean the cost of sending them there?

Mr. DEVLIN: And bringing them back?

Mr. CROTHERS: No, the employer does that.

Mr. DEVLIN: I know a good deal about those Austrians.

Mr. VERVILLE: I am not a lawyer, and I am rather proud I am not in discussing a question like this, but the minister cannot claim ignorance of the law. He said a moment ago that the operators of these six mines should have got together.

Mr. CROTHERS: I did not say they should have; I said they might.

Mr. VERVILLE: The minister blames the men because they did not get the operators together.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I do not.

Mr. VERVILLE: What was the reason for refusing a board? The minister said that the men would have to get a representative for each of the companies.

Mr. CROTHERS: When I said that it would be necessary to have a representative for each of the operators, I meant that they would be given the opportunity of selecting them.

Mr. VERVILLE: Very well. The minister says that at the outset they did not know how many mines there were in Thetford. That is a poor excuse.

Mr. CROTHERS: That is what you say.

Mr. VERVILLE: Do you mean to say that the Department of Labour or the Deputy Minister does not know how many mines there are in any mining camp in Canada? It is ridiculous to say that, and I am sure the deputy minister would not say it.

Mr. CROTHERS: The number of mines is one thing, but the number of mines involved in the dispute is another, and we did not know the number of mines involved in this dispute.

Mr. VERVILLE: It is all given in the letters that have been read.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am speaking subject to correction, because I have not the correspondence here, but my recollection is that no intimation is given in the first letter of any company but one being involved.

Mr. VERVILLE: I do not want to go over the whole correspondence again. It is all given in the application.

Mr. CROTHERS: Does the application mention more than one employer?

Mr. VERVILLE: I will not detain the House by reading it all, but I will give the names of the companies that are mentioned: Asbestos Corporation, Johnson Mines, Jacob Mining Company, Limited, Bell Asbestos Mines, Limited, Martin Bennett, Limited. That is more than one company, is it not? So the minister was wrong when he said the application concerned only one company.

Mr. CROTHERS: In the letter they do not say anything about these different employers being in the dispute.

Mr. VERVILLE: In the return I received there were three important letters missing, of the following dates, the 26th, 27th and 29th of June. These letters should have been in the return, but I suppose they were omitted through a mistake. I got them elsewhere. I do not mean to say that the minister is personally responsible for that, but the letters should have been in the return. As I have already said, the application was made on the 15th July, and the minister wrote saying the men should have got together so that he could grant a board. According to my understanding of the Lemieux Act, the minister is wrong. There have been cases before this, and I will cite one. The carpenters in Montreal some few years ago asked for a board, and although it was contrary to the law to grant one, as they were not a public utility, a majority of the men asked for a board and it was granted. In this case there was a builders' exchange.

Mr. CROTHERS: It can only be done by consent of both parties. They all agreed upon one man in that case.

Mr. VERVILLE: Surely the minister could have taken similar action in this case, instead of sending Mr. Blanchet down.

Mr. CROTHERS: We sent Mr. Arcand, and he reported that they could not agree.

Mr. VERVILLE: I have here the letter to the department, signed by Mr. Frank, who has been spoken of as their representative. In it he says that he has telephoned to the deputy minister to that effect. I do not wish to go over these letters again—we have agreed not to stay too late to-night. If the representative sent by the Minister of Labour was not sufficiently authorized he should have done the same as has been done in other cases; he should have sent the deputy minister. Does the minister say that on account of the war it would have been impossible even for a competent officer to get the operators of these mines together?

Mr. CROTHERS: We are satisfied with the result.

Mr. VERVILLE: Which result?

Mr. CROTHERS: The one Mr. Blanchet got.

Mr. VERVILLE: Two dollars a day! And this to support a family of five or six children, perhaps. Why, the minister could not buy cigars for that. It is a shame when any one says that men are satisfied with such conditions. Of course, I am not the sufferer, but how can anyone claim that he is satisfied because men are getting two dollars a day? The fact remains that these men have lost three weeks, or thereabouts. They were out on strike for that length of time—from the 3rd to the 23rd August. At $12 a week this would mean $36. Does the minister mean to say that these men will be able to make up that loss? It is his fault, and he knows it. I do not accept his statement that it would have been impossible to get these operators together and to have a board appointed with a view to preventing a strike. It is true that the Trades and Labour Congress did favour the repeal of this Act. But I would be the first man to vote against that, and I have said so in the Congress.

Mr. CROTHERS: Was the hon. member (Mr. Verville) in the Congress in 1911, when they voted in favour of the repeal of the Act?

Mr. VERVILLE: I was always against the repeal of the Act, and am on record on that point in the Congress. I was man enough to tell them what I thought. The principle of the law is all right; it is the application of it that is bad. It has been poorly handled in many cases, and the hon. minister must know it. I suppose he will not express agreement with me in that. This strike ought to have been avoided, but what I wish to urge is more activity in these matters in the future. If there is the prospect of a strike anywhere the minister ought to use diligence and to appoint a board if necessary, so as to prevent the strike. The hon. minister says that this matter was brought up in Montreal by a Liberal. I am not a member of the Trades Council of Montreal, and so I cannot say whether the minister is correct in that or 10 p.m. not. But if he will tell me who was the man—

Mr. CROTHERS: The hon. gentleman was at the congress.

Mr. VERVILLE: But the minister said that it had been brought up in the Montreal Trades Council.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I said it had been brought up in the congress by a delegate from Montreal.

Mr. VERVILLE: Who was he?

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not going to tell you that. Look up the record of the congress.

Mr. VERVILLE: The minister says that the man was a Liberal; does he know that to be the case?

Mr. CROTHERS: Yes.

Mr. VERVILLE: We have some men in the labour movement who are neither Liberals nor Conservatives, and if the man referred to is the one I think of, he is one of these—a Radical. I do not accept the information given by the minister that in this case it was not possible under the law to appoint a board. Of course, I must leave the discussion of that point to the lawyers, but at present I firmly believe that it was possible. But if there is impossibility in such cases, then it is time to change the law so as to make it more effective. I am only sorry that the men are satisfied with what they have received. I would not be satisfied with it—far from it. But I am discussing this matter with a view to the future, and I urge the minister to take steps in good time to prevent strikes.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not surprised that my hon. friend (Mr. Verville) is not satisfied. Such men are never satisfied. They don't want to be satisfied; they want to have a grievance. He expresses the hope that this discussion will cause me to be more active in trying to avoid strikes. It will not have the slightest effect upon me.

Mr. VERVILLE: I did not suppose it would.

Mr. MACDONALD: Can't teach you anything.

Mr. CROTHERS: One moment, please. I have been doing my level best for five years past to prevent strikes. When I hear of trouble brewing I send an officer to try to prevent an outbreak of that trouble. And since I took charge of the department there have been fewer strikes in Canada in proportion to our population than in any other civilized country in the world. We hear a great deal about Australia where they have compulsory arbitration and all that sort of thing. Last year they had 330 strikes and lock-outs, and we had 75. They have a population of five millions and we have a population of eight millions. In the United States last year they had 3,330 strikes and lock-outs. Had they had no greater proportion than we had, they would have had only 800 or 900. While I have nothing to say against my predecessor, nor against the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), there have been fewer labour troubles in Canada within the last five years than there were ever before. I have done everything I could to prevent these troubles. In the case under discussion I thought the difficulty was settled when the men left Ottawa. So, my hon. friend from Maisonneuve need not waste time in expressing the hope that his efforts of to-night will help me in this matter. I have used diligence in these matters for the last five years, and I intend to follow the same course as long as I am in the department.

Mr. VERVILLE: The hon. member says there were fewer strikes in Canada. I believe that. But where was there any room for strikes?

Mr. CROTHERS: There were more strikes before the war than there have been since.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister need not take credit to himself for that. The simple reason is that the Canadian people were more patriotic than the people in other countries, and were therefore anxious to avoid labour troubles during the war. But the relatively small number of labour troubles shows also the advantages of the legislation which was introduced by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) by which compulsory investigation is made possible with a view to adjusting these matters.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have always recognized that, and have always expressed myself in the strongest terms in favour of this Act. My hon. friend from Rouville knows that.

Mr. MACDONALD: I represent a large labour constituency, and one plea made against me in the last campaign was that I supported this Act, known as the Lemieux Act. In all the labour centres of this country the Conservative party, to the best of their ability, urged the view that this was a nefarious Act intended to cripple the rights of labour and in a great many cases their candidates were pledged to repeal it. The minister is frank enough to say that he recognizes that this is a good Act. I think that everyone will agree that the principle of the compulsory investigation of trouble previous to a strike is a sound one. But the minister promised last year to give us some amendments of this Act and I am sorry that he has not introduced them. There is an imperfection in the Act which prevents the investigation of troubles that arise where an application is made by a body of organized labour on the one hand and employers who are made up of different companies on the other. If the Act does not permit compulsory investigation I would suggest to the minister that it would be wise on his part if he would at this session introduce a Bill by which the provisions of this Act might be made applicable to given situations of that kind. I have no doubt that in the labour difficulties that existed in the West, and which the minister was investigating during the past winter, we had a situation where on the one hand we had a number of men belonging to one particular labour union and on the other hand numerous employers belonging to different companies. There ought not to be any technical difficulty existing by which provisions of this law should be prevented from being put into force in any labour district. If that is the difficulty that the minister speaks about, I would like to ask whether he considers it the part of wisdom to introduce an amendment to deal with that and whether he will not do so.

Mr. CROTHERS: The administration of the Act by my predecessor, Mr. King, and my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), disclosed to them certain difficulties which they would like to have overcome by amendments and the administration of the Act has disclosed to me some more. I am finding no fault with the Act. Like every other Act which is new, you discover in its administration and operation that it is capable of improvement. I anticipated what my hon. friend just suggested, three years ago, and I had a new Bill throughout prepared. I think it included about twenty alterations. Under the Act as it stands now you might have a difficulty arising between employer and employees as to the meaning of an award. In one case I had to appoint a second board to determine what the first board meant. One of the amendments I proposed was that a board might be reconvened for the purpose of reconsidering and determining what the award really did mean. I talked the matter over, the war came on, it was a controversial question, I was satisfied that we would be weeks and weeks discussing the matter, and I did not bring the Bill down because the war was on. I do not propose this session to bring in any amendments. We are getting along pretty well; we would be better with these amendments but I do not feel justified in bringing in a Bill of this very controversial character at the present time. I talked it over with the representative labour men and they did not agree as to what should be done. I do not think we would agree in this House as to what should be done and I therefore do not think it would be wise to introduce the Bill this year.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister does not need to introduce a whole Bill. It is an entirely technical matter. Manifestly the intention of the Act was that there should be an investigation of these troubles. You might have a labour union on the one hand and different employers on the other and all you need to do is to amend this clause. The minister might do it under the War Measures Act if he does not want to bring down a new Bill.

Mr. CROTHERS: Nobody is suffering because it has not been changed.

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, you know what happened at Thetford.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have nothing to take back, nothing to apologise for; we would do it again to-morrow. We have the results.

Mr. PACAUD: We had a three weeks' strike.

Mr. CROTHERS: That was not my fault. I am afraid that my hon. friend had more to do with that strike than I had.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was agreed that the committee should rise at ten o'clock, and I see it is ten minutes past. My hon. friend from Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) intends to address the committee on this item and before leaving for Toronto he requested me to ask the minister to kindly bring the following information for the next sitting of the committee:

Will the minister indicate all the different strikes with dates of the reports in which the report of the board was not accepted and strikes ensued, stating in which cases the report was not accepted by the employers and by the men?

Mr. CROTHERS: Does it mention the period?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It does not mention the period but I think the statistics could be easily made up from the old reports.

Mr. CROTHERS: Does it state that it should be since the Act became law?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, I do not say since the beginning but for the last four or five years.

Mr. CROTHERS: We will be very glad to get that. It is in the 9th Report of the Registrar of Boards of Conciliation and Investigation, pp. 26-27.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I understand that my hon. friend from Saskatoon did not find that information in the report.

Mr. CROTHERS: We will see that it is provided.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. MACDONALD: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if, when we go into Supply again, he will bring down the information which he spoke of when we were in Supply on April 23. The minister spoke of having taken up with certain classes of business, prices, with a view to considering the question of the cost of living, such as coal and sugar, and that certain questions had been asked and certain answers had.

Mr. CROTHERS: The report?

Mr. MACDONALD: The information which he got from these different people. The minister will find the statement to which I refer on page 730 of Hansard.

Mr. CROTHERS: My recollection is that I mentioned at that time that reports were being prepared. Does my hon. friend want copies of the questions?

Mr. MACDONALD: I want copies of the questions and the answers.

Mr. CROTHERS: That would be a herculean task. I think my hon. friend had better make a motion in the regular way.

Mr. MACDONALD: If the minister would submit to us the original documents and allow us to inspect them, that would perhaps be all that would be necessary.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think I could do that.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When the hon. gentleman takes up his Estimates again I intend to bring up the matter of labour bureaus, in view of the evidence which has been given before the Imperial Dominions Royal Commission.

Mr. CROTHERS: Do you think that that might be discussed on these items?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It comes under the Labour Department. Under what head should I bring up this very important question?

Mr. CROTHERS: I think you made a motion last year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I made a motion, but this question is still full of life. I shall bring it before the House.

Mr. CROTHERS: I have no objection to my hon. friend discussing it when my Estimates are up again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Crothers, the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.
