House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, January 18, 1917.

This being the day on which Parliament is convoked by proclamation of the Governor General for the despatch of business, and the members of the House being assembled:

Thomas B. Flint, M.A., D.C.L., the Clerk of the House, read to the House a letter from the Governor General's Secretary, informing him that the Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber on Thursday, the 18th of January, at 3 p.m., to open the session.

A message was delivered by Lieut.-Col. Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor-General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor-General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but to-morrow, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of his calling this Parliament.

And the House being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCIES.

The Clerk of the House, standing on the lower step below the Speaker's chair, said: I have the honour to inform the House that, during the recess, notifications have been received of the following vacancies having occurred in the representation, viz.:—

Of the Electoral District of Antigonish, by the resignation of William Chisholm, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Yarmouth, by the decease of Bowman Brown Law, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Montmagny, by the resignation of David Ovide L'Espérance, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Nicolet, by the resignation of Paul Emile Lamarche, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Regina, by the resignation of William Melville Martin, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Brome, by the decease of George Harold Baker, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Stanstead, by the decease of Charles Henry Lovell, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Toronto East, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown by the Hon. Albert Edward Kemp.

Of the Electoral District of London, by the decease of William Gray, Esq.

Of the Electoral District of Quebec County, by the decease of the Hon. Thomas Chase Casgrain.

Of the Electoral District of Dorchester, consequent upon the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown by the Hon. Albert Sévigny.

NEW MEMBER.

The Clerk said: I have also the honour to inform the House that, during the recess, I have received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of:

Hon. Albert Edward Kemp for the Electoral District of Toronto East.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Dr. Flint, it has become necessary for this House to elect a new Speaker.

The speakership is an office which, as we are all aware, is invested with great importance and distinction in this country as in other countries. The duties of a Speaker and the importance of the office which he fills have been noted by all constitutional writers. He is called upon to discharge functions of the highest order, and the conduct of the business of the House depends upon the ability, the impartiality, the firmness, the courtesy and the tact with which those duties are discharged. There is a member of this House, Mr. Edgar N. Rhodes, member for Cumberland, who, although a comparatively young man, has spent nearly nine years in the service of his country in Parliament; and who, in the discharge of his duties as Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker, has, in my judgment, given evidence of the qualities to which I have alluded. Last year when I had the honour of proposing that he should be Chairman of Committees, very warm tributes were paid to him by many members of the House, and I am confident that his record in the discharge of the duties of that office was such as to show that those tributes were properly rendered. We have rules, written and unwritten, which govern the conduct of business in this House and govern also the conduct and demeanour of its members; and I would say that in this House, as in all deliberative assemblies, there is one unwritten rule which is not less important than any of those promulgated in written form; and it is this: that all the written rules of the House must be administered with fairness, with impartiality, with firmness and with tact.

I have no doubt whatever that Mr. Rhodes will discharge the duties of this office in accordance with the best traditions of the past and in accordance also with the principles to which I have alluded, principles which I am sure will be accepted by all the members of this House as proper and appropriate.

I therefore have very great pleasure in proposing, seconded by Mr. Rogers, that Mr. Edgar N. Rhodes, member of this House for the electoral district of Cumberland, be Speaker of this House.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Quebec East): Dr. Flint, on behalf of the members of this House who sit on this side, I have to declare that we will accept the nominee of the Government for the high position of Speaker of this House with very great pleasure. Indeed I am happy on this first day of this session to be able to join with my right hon. friend in the first motion he makes. I wish it could be so all through the session—a wish which perhaps may not be fulfilled in its entirety; but if all the motions which are to be made by my right hon. friend in this House are of the character of this one, we shall have an easy and pleasant session indeed. Mr. Rhodes has already given evidence in the capacity of Chairman of Committees that he is highly endowed for the position of the first officer of this House in character, education and judicial temperament. In fact, having been a colleague of Mr. Rhodes now for some nine years, and, if I may say so, having been a friend of his during that time, I know of no blemish in him except that he is a Tory. But it is not given to everybody to be a Grit—it is a special dispensation of Providence. At all events, even if Mr. Rhodes is a Tory at the present time, I have no doubt at all that when he ascends the steps which will lead him to that chair, he will leave his Toryism behind him, and that he will be a true, an honest, an impartial presiding officer of this House, and will administer the rules of this House, as has been said by my right hon. friend, with absolute impartiality and fairness; that he will be the arbiter between the two sides of this House, and that he will maintain the traditions of the high office to which he has been called. For my part, I offer him my congratulations upon his unanimous election to the speakership of this House.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Dr. Flint, I am very much obliged to my right hon. friend for the handsome way in which he has welcomed the first measure which I have had to propose at this session, and while, as he observes, I cannot anticipate that everything I shall propose during the session will meet with his approval, I can assure him that everything which I shall propose will be equally meritorious.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is boasting.

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Edgar N. Rhodes, Esquire, member for the electoral division of Cumberland, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Honourable Mr. Rhodes was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's Chair by Rt. Hon. Sir Robert Borden and Hon. Robert Rogers.

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT said: I beg to tender to this House my sincere and hearty thanks for the high honour it has conferred upon me by electing me as its Speaker. It shall be my pleasure, as well as my duty, to endeavour to deserve that high honour by dealing with all questions which come before me in my official character with firmness and with impartiality. I am fully sensible of my unfitness for the position. but I rely confidently upon the co-operation of hon. members on both sides of this House to assist me in maintaining and in preserving our rights and privileges, and in preserving the freedom and dignity of debate according to ancient usage.

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY SERJEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Serjeant-at-arms has appointed Louis Charles Panet, Esquire, with my approval, to be his deputy.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns to-day, it is proper that we should give expression to our sympathy in respect to the loss which this House has sustained in the death of four of its members, who have passed away since the last session. They are, as hon. members know, the Hon. Thomas Chase Casgrain, Postmaster General; Lieut.-Col. George Harold Baker, member for Brome; Mr. William Gray, member for London; and Mr. Charles H. Lovell, member for Stanstead. Mr. Casgrain, who was not only a colleague, but a warm personal friend of mine, had a distinguished record in the public life of this country. He entered the Provincial political arena in Quebec in 1886, and, I believe, continued in that arena until he was elected to this Parliament in 1896, the year in which I entered public life. It was then that I first became acquainted with him, and I had the privilege of enjoying his intimate friendship ever afterwards. He filled several very important and distinguished positions in public life, among others those of Attorney General of his native province, Battonier-General of the province of Quebec, Chairman of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission, and Postmaster General of Canada, a position which he filled for more than two years. The very great ability of Mr. Casgrain, whether at the bar or in public life, was universally admitted; and his high character, his fine spirit, his splendid enthusiasm for everything that interested him, and his charming personality were such as to endear him very closesly indeed to those who had the privilege of knowing him intimately and who were associated with him in political affairs. He also, I believe, endeared himseslf to those who, although opposed to him in public life, had the privilege of knowing him intimately. He had not been in robust health for nearly a year before his death. Last spring his condition became worse, and he was obliged to take a long rest from his public duties; indeed, he was not sure whether the condition of his health might not then bring about his enforced retirement from public life. However, he came back from England with renewed strength, and took up with his accustomed devotion and energy the work of his department. The last occasion on which I had the privilege of speaking to him was in the city of Quebec, where we both addressed the same public meeting. I was shocked at his apparent illness at that time, and strongly urged him to take a rest, a long respite from work. He promised to do so, and I next heard from him shortly after my return from the West when on Christmas day, although then very ill, he sent me a message of greeting and remembrance. I mourn his loss as that of a very dear friend and I am sure that all the members of this House will join in conveying their deep sympathy to his widow and the members of his family.

I did not know Mr. Lovell so well. He had not been in Parliament very long. I knew better his father who preceded him in public life. He was, I believe, a man well informed in public affairs, and although he did not often address the House, I realize that he commanded the complete confidence of those who entrusted him with their mandate in this Parliament. To his family as well, I am sure we will all join in the expression of our sympathy.

I had known Mr. William Gray, of London, for a long time before he entered public life. He had been intimately associated for many years with the political affairs of the constituency which he afterwards represented. He was a man of great energy, who took a keen interest in public affairs; a strong partisan, but a man of warm and generous instincts. I deplore the loss which the House has sustained in his death, and his family and children will also receive our deep sympathy.

I had known Lieutenant-Colonel George Harold Baker for some years before he entered this Parliament. He is the first member of the Parliament of Canada who has made the supreme sacrifice for the cause of liberty and justice, the cause for which this Empire is fighting in this war. He came of a family that had great traditions in public life. His grandfather was in the Legislature of the province of Quebec as far back as 1834. His father had a service of no less than twenty-five years in this Parliament, and, I believe, of nine years in the Legislature of the province of Quebec. Lieutenant-Colonel Baker came into this Parliament in 1911. His voice was not very often heard here, but, knowing him well, I had the warmest appreciation, not only of his character and ability, but of the great promise which he gave of usefulness in the future public life of this country. I do not think it is too much to say that there is no place in the public life of Canada to which, if he had been spared to serve his country in this Parliament, George Harold Baker might not have aspired. I remember very well, when he spoke to me about his offer of military service, the over-mastering sense of duty to his country which he evinced. I remember well my conviction that it was not possible for me to interpose any objection in the face of such a sense of duty as that which possessed him. He took up his work in a characteristic way. He knew the necessity of absolute thoroughness of training, and he searched not only Canada, but the other side of the Atlantic, and even India, to have associated with him a man who could undertake duties for which he believed himself not adapted by previous training and experience. He went to the front. I remember that shortly before he left I had the privilege of making him acquainted with a very distinguished American gentleman who was on a visit to Ottawa at that time. This gentleman, after conversing with Lieutenant-Colonel Baker for a short time, said to me, " If your Canadian officers and men are of the type of that man I do not wonder at the splendid record that they have made at the front." We know of the splendid spirit and magnificent courage and patriotism that have animated, and still animate, the men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force; but I venture to think that no finer spirit, no truer patriot, no man of more brilliant promise, ever left the shores of Canada to make the supreme sacrifice beyond the seas than George Harold Baker. Somewhere in France is his grave. I believe that in the House, as in the country, all who knew him mourn his loss. I feel that in him the country has lost a man of the highest possible promise in public life, and personally I know that I have lost not only a loyal follower, who was most truly an encouragement and a support to me on many difficult occasions, but one of the most valued intimate friends I have ever known since I entered public life.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree with every word which has been spoken by my right hon friend with respect to the four colleagues whose loss we mourn. My right hon. friend has spoken fittingly of them, especially of his colleague the late lamented Postmaster-General. Mr. Casgrain was not long enough in this present Parliament to give to it his full measure of strength. His health was not good, and it was noticeable to all who had known him formerly, and especially during last session, that perhaps we might anticipate what has occurred. Everything that my right hon. friend has said of Mr. Casgrain is perfectly true. He was, as those who knew him in a former Parliament know, a very able member; and those who knew him before he came to Parliament know that he was not only a very able man, but just as courageous as he was able, and as fair in debate and in political combat as he was courageous. I have known him personally since he was a law student. I met him when he had been called to the bar, and afterwards, when he had entered politics. It was my lot to meet him upon many platforms and in very hot contests, at a time when the political atmosphere was rather charged with electricity, and I am proud to remember at this date, now that he is no more, that not a single offensive word ever passed between us; nor did I ever hear such a word used by him. I may say further that, though we were opposed on almost every question, there was always between us what I will not call an intimate, but a very strong friendship.

With regard to the late Mr. Lovell and the late Mr. Gray, one sitting on one side of the House and one on the other, both seemed to me to be of very much the same character; men unobstrusive in this House, but endowed both with a very high sense of honour and strong common sense, and upon whose judgment the leader of the party could always depend for solid advice.

As to Lt.-Col. Baker, it was not my privilege to meet him except on the floor of this House, but it was my privilege to meet his father, whom I knew very intimately in the province of Quebec, and in this House especially. The father of our late lamented friend was, like Mr. Casgrain, a man of absolute integrity, sincerity and courage, and if his son was endowed in any way like his father, I am not at all surprised that he took the part he did in the tremendous struggle in which we are now engaged. Of a man of his character, though we may lament his death, I am sure that we may say he has met the death which he would have wished above all others. We extend our deepest sympathy to the families of our four deceased colleagues.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate myself with the tributes which have been so eloquently paid by my right hon. friends to the memory of our comrades who have passed away, and particularly I desire to refer to my personal friend and deskmate, the late Hon. T. Chase Casgrain, Postmaster-General. I had the advantage of his acquaintance over many years. Originally I knew him when I was engaged in business in the city of Montreal. He was at that time one of the most eminent counsel of that great metropolis. On many occasions I had the privilege and advantage of his advice on matters of financial and commercial importance. Later I had the honour to be associated with him as member of the Government. I desire to bear testimony to the fine integrity of his character, to the exquisite urbanity of his disposition, and to the genial qualities of head and heart which endeared him to all, and made him so charming a comrade and friend. I wish to speak particularly of his unremitting devotion to the duties of his office, duties greatly increased by the exigencies of this unprecedented time through which we are passing. The late Postmaster-General had a very high sense of duty. He was unsparing of himself to the work of his department, and I am convinced that it was his unflagging devotion to the duties of his office which impaired and undermined his constitution, and thus laid him open to the insidious disease which carried him off. I desire to express my personal sorrow and my sympathy with his widow and the members of his family, and the sense which I entertain of the loss to the people of Canada through his untimely death.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARYSHIPS.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I desire to lay on the table of the House an Order in Council passed on the 15th of July last, providing for the office of Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, and an Order in Council of 21st October, appointing to that office Mr. Hugh Clark, member of the House of Commons for the Electoral District of North Bruce. Also an Order in Council of 13th July last, providing for the office of Parliamentary Secretary to the Department of Militia and Defence, and an Order in Council of 19th of July last, appointing to that office Mr. Fleming B. McCurdy, member of the House of Commons for the Electoral District of Shelburne and Queens.

MINISTER OF THE OVERSEAS FORCES.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I also lay on the Table of the House an Order in Council approved on October 28, 1916, providing for the office of Minister of the Overseas Forces of Canada, and an Order in Council, approved on October 31, 1916, appointing to that office the Hon. Sir George Halsey Perley.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE CORRESPONDENCE.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden for the adjournment of the House:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is it the intention of the Government to lay on the table at as early a moment as possible the correspondence with regard to the proposed Imperial Conference?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes. I do not know of any reason at the moment why it should not be laid on the table of the House. I think it has practically all been made public so far. There has been no very extended correspondence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: At all events you will bring down whatever there is?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Whatever there is we shall bring down. I hope to lay it on the table of the House to-morrow.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.45 p.m.

Friday, January 19, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary announcing that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate Chamber at 3 p.m. on this day for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion Parliament.

A message was delivered by Lieut.-Col. Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

Then the Hon. Edgar N. Rhodes, Speaker-elect, said:

May it please Your Excellency.

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the Commons then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open Parliament by a Speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber:

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill No. 1, respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—Hon. J. D. Hazen.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Hon. J. D. Hazen moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House under Rule 10; said committee to be composed of Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Messrs. Reid, Pugsley, Stanfield and Pardee, and that that portion of Rule No. 10 limiting the number of members of the said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Joint report of the Librarians of Parliament.—Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Speaker.]

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that, when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I desire on this occasion to express my respectful appreciation of the honour conferred on me by the King in appointing me to the distinguished office of Governor General.

I esteem it a high privilege to become closely identified with Canada at the time when she is taking so splendid a part in the world-wide struggle, and I look forward to her ability and capacity to exercise an ever-increasing influence in bringing the war to a victorious conclusion.

When peace is again happily restored I am confident that the vast resources of the Dominion will continue to be developed for the lasting benefit of the Empire and in the best interests of liberty and humanity.

Although nearly two and a half years have elapsed since the outbreak of war yet that period has not been more than sufficient for the enormous preparation necessary to enable our Empire to throw its full strength into the struggle.

The events that have transpired since prorogation give convincing testimony of the efficiency of the measures thus taken and bear splendid tribute to the valour and heroism of His Majesty's forces in every theatre of war.

With preparation already so ample and still increasing we may confidently anticipate that the not distant future will bring such success to the allied arms as will assure the full maintenance of the purposes and ideals for which we have engaged in this war.

The Canadian forces dispatched overseas during 1916 numbered more than 165,000 and the aggregate of enlistments in Canada since the outbreak of war is nearly 400,000. In attack as well as in defence the valour, endurance and resourcefulness of the Canadian troops have been conspicuous on every occasion when they have met the enemy, and they have splendidly upheld the highest traditions of their country.

Equally notable and impressive has been the fine spirit of loyalty displayed by the people of this Dominion who have freely dedicated their energies and their material resources to the common defence of our Empire.

Steps have been taken by my advisers for better organization of National Service, and attention has been given to the more thorough utilization of our natural resources. Measures have also been taken in co-operation with the Government of the United Kingdom to facilitate the increased production of munitions in Canada.

The Government of the United Kingdom have invited the First Ministers of the Dominions to attend a series of special and continuous meetings of the War Cabinet (of which for this purpose they will be members) to consider urgent questions affecting the prosecution of the war the possible conditions on which the Allied Nations could assent to its termination, and the problems which would then immediately arise. This invitation has been accepted on behalf of Canada.

The Fiftieth Anniversary of the foundation of this Dominion draws near and brings with it the inspiring memory of all that has been accomplished during the half century in the upbuilding of a united and powerful nation. My advisers believe that, notwithstanding the continuance of the war, there should be an appropriate commemoration of an event so notable in the history of Canada.

The life of the present Parliament will expire in October next, and under existing legislation a dissolution and election would be necessary in the early future. My advisers, however, are of opinion that the wishes of the Canadian people and the urgent requirements of the war would be best met by avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time.

That purpose can only be effected through the medium of legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. A resolution authorizing and requesting the enactment of such legislation as will further extend the life of this Parliament will be presented to you.

Although in some parts of the Dominion weather conditions affected adversely the excellent prospects of an unusually large harvest, yet taking the country as a whole, the labours of our husbandmen have been abundantly rewarded.

The commercial, industrial and financial stability of the country has been well maintained during the past year. There is every reason to believe that the Dominion will be in a position to meet satisfactorily the readjustment of conditions which must ensue upon the termination of the war.

Important measures designed to aid in meeting these new conditions have been in preparation and some of them will be submitted for your consideration.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the last and the estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted to you without delay, and you will be asked to make the necessary financial provision for the effective conduct of the war.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The lofty patriotism, the fine courage, and the inflexible purpose which have animated all His Majesty's Dominions in upholding our great cause are in nowise abated. In common with the rest of the Empire the people of this Dominion are firmly resolved that in this war which has entailed so much sacrifice and which we have undertaken for the highest ideals of humanity and civilization our efforts shall be continued and strengthened until they are crowned with an abiding peace.

I commend to your attentive consideration all measures submitted to you for that great purpose, and I pray that the Divine blessing may attend your deliberations.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Hazen, it was ordered that the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills until disposed of.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Hon. Albert Edward Kemp, member-elect for the electoral district of East Toronto, by Hon. Sir Thomas White and Hon. J. D. Reid.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Hazen, the House adjourned at 3.45 p.m until Monday next.

Monday, January 22, 1917.

The House met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE—CORRESPONDENCE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I lay on the table a copy of the correspondence relating to the Imperial War Conference of 1917. I had intended that this should be laid on the table of the House on Friday, but finding that that had not been done, I directed that a copy be sent to my right honourable friend who leads the Opposition, and I think he received it.

ROSS RIFLE—CORRESPONDENCE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I lay on the table a copy of the correspondence relating to the withdrawal of the Ross rifle from the Canadian army corps. It ought to be explained that the asterisks to be found in the correspondence represents matter which, for military reasons, and at the express request of the War Office, has been omitted.

Mr. OLIVER: Is this the report of Sir Douglas Haig that was spoken of at the end of last session of Parliament?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not recall that any report from Sir Douglas Haig was referred to, but all the papers that can be brought down are here. There is a report by Sir Douglas Haig among the papers that are now submitted. I am not sure, however, that it ante dates the end of last session.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does my right hon. friend not recall that at the end of last session he informed the House that a very full investigation and report would be made by Sir Douglas Haig as to the working of the Ross rifle?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not recall that; I was merely explaining to my hon.

friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) that there is a report by Field Marshal Sir Douglas Haig upon the matter among the papers that have been brought down. I am not sure, however, that it ante dates the end of last session.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of the Department of Naval Service for the year ended 31st March, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Hazen.

The Forty-ninth Annual Report of the Fisheries Branch of the Naval Service for the year ended 31st March, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Hazen.

Report of the Department of Labour for the year ended 31st March, 1916.—Hon Mr. Crothers.

Ninth Report of the Registrar of Boards of Conciliation and Investigation of the proceedings under "The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, 1907," for the year ended March 31, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Crothers.

Annual Report of the Department of the Interior for the year ended March 31, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Roche.

Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs for the year ended March 31, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Roche.

LIMITATION OF RACING MEETS.

Mr. WILCOX moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Criminal Code.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Explain.

Mr. WILCOX: The object of this Bill is to add a provision to sub-section 2 of Section 235 of the Criminal Code, enacted by Chapter 19 of the Statutes passed in 1910, and assented to on 1st April, 1912. This legislation was intended to deal effectively with the limitation of race meets throughout Canada. The racing men have evaded its spirit by adding different units, thereby obtaining an unlimited number of racing days. The object sought by Parliament after a full investigation, that the limitation should be fourteen days, has thus not been carried out. The amendment will provide that in any town, city, or county where more than one race track exists the total number of days available for racing on all the tracks shall not exceed the number prescribed by this Act for one race course or race track. With this explanation I would like the House to assent to the first reading, and I shall endeavour to explain the Bill at greater length when we reach the second reading.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

NATIONAL SERVICE COMMISSION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I ask the Government if they will bring down the Order in Council creating the National Service Commission, which is mentioned in the speech from the Throne, and the appointments made in connection with that Commission.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly.

MARITIME EXPRESS SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would invite the attention of the Minister of Railways to a report which appears in the St. John Telegraph of the 20th inst. with reference to the proposed withdrawal of the trains between St. John and Moncton, which make direct connection with the Maritime Express. I may say to my hon. friend that there is no direct connection between St. John and the Ocean Limited, and there has not been for a number of years, the result being that passengers from St. John to Montreal, and also from points between St. John and Moncton to Montreal, have been obliged to wait at Moncton to connect with the Ocean Limited. The same condition has applied to passengers travelling by the Ocean Limited to St. John. But there has always been, as my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows, a direct connection with the Maritime Express. It is now proposed to take off the train between St. John and Moncton, which makes that direct connection with the Maritime Express. The consequence will be that passengers from St. John and intermediate points who desire to take the Maritime Express will be obliged to wait several hours at Moncton, as shall also the passengers by the Maritime Express who desire to make direct connection with St. John and intermediate points. In my judgment it would be a very great mistake to discontinue that connection. The result will be to place St. John, even more than it has been for some years past, in the position of a city on a branch of the Intercolonial railway. It will cause very great inconvenience and the most intense dissatisfaction, and I am greatly surprised that Mr. Gutelius, the general manager of Government railways, should have come to the conclusion to discontinue this service. I sincerely trust that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, will have the matter looked into immediately and give orders to countermand the determination at which Mr. Gutelius appears to have arrived. Mr. Gutelius was interviewed upon the subject by the reporter of the Telegraph, and he admitted that this was the conclusion which had been arrived at. I would also like my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) to look into the matter and give to the Minister of Railways and Canals the information which I know he can give, and which, I am sure, will satisfy the minister that it is not desirable to take this very backward step as far as it concerns connection between St. John and important points on the north shore of the province, as well as points in the province of Quebec. It will prove of very great inconvenience to the people of St. John and also the people on the north shore of the province.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals): I will be very glad to look into the matter and report to my hon. friend.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. GORDON CROOKS WILSON (Wentworth) rose to move that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament. He said:

Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the address to be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, allow me to thank the Government for the honour conferred upon me. I would have preferred to have listened to some more worthy and capable member, more competent than I am to deal with the subject, at such an important time in our country's and Empire's history, but I accept the honour, not as a personal one, but rather one for the constituency which I have the honour to represent. I, therefore, ask the indulgence of the House while I make a few brief remarks.

Allow me to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, upon your elevation to the office of first Commoner. Your fitness for the position has been voiced by both the distinguished leaders in this House.

I believe that I am voicing the unanimous sentiment of this Parliament when I express deep regret at the departure from our country of Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and the Princess Patricia. During the most critical period in the history of our country it was fortunate that we had in our councils His Royal Highness, with his experience, mature judgment and splendid patriotism. We welcome, however, to our country the head of one of the most historic houses in Britain, and believe that in His Excellency the Duke of Devonshire we have a worthy successor to our late Governor General. In this connection it is interesting to know that when this Dominion was in the making, about 1865, his father, Lord Edward Cavendish, was for some time a resident of Canada as an officer in the Rifle Brigade, then a part of the British garrison in Canada, and stationed in Hamilton, a part of which city I represent here.

To the Duchess of Devonshire, we bid an especial welcome. She is no stranger to Canada, and we feel that her residence in this country, during the period when her father, that veteran statesman, Lord Lansdowne, represented the Crown here, has made a bond of union with us that her present residence will enhance.

The third year of the world's greatest war, and we hope the last, finds Canada's participation of such magnitude and importance as to call forth the admiration of our allies and neutral nations, and even astonishes us, who at the outbreak of hostilities, never dreamed that we possessed the military and financial resources that we have put into the combat. If any member of this parliament had at that momentous session of August, 1914, expressed the opinion that we would, during the war, enlist an army of 400,000 men, transport 300,000 to Europe, place and maintain in the fighting line four divisions, finance from our own resources the enormous expenditure for the maintenance of this army, create credits for the British Government of $250,000,000, manufacture for the allies a billion dollars of war supplies, he would have been designated a dreamer, or even a stronger term would have been used. But Canada has done this and more. Under the leadership of the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), the Canadian people have played, and will continue to play, an effective and glorious part in the great fight against militarism and for the preservation and consolidation of the Empire. Let me take this opportunity to pay tribute to the valour of our Canadian troops. They have proven their worth in the desperate fighting on the West Front and shown themselves worthy to fight alongside the veterans of France and England. They have met the much vaunted Prussian Guard and at Ypres, Festubert, St. Eloi, Zillebeke and the Somme, have shown their superiority.

When I heard, Sir, the eloquent tribute of the Prime Minister to the late Colonel Harry Baker, I thought it should not rest there, but that this House should recognize, in a fitting memorial, the fact that he was the first member of the House of Commons, to make the supreme sacrifice in this great struggle.

Coming from the part of Canada that I do, I think I am justified in speaking of the courage and sacrifice of our troops, There are ten military districts in Canada and the one from which I come has furnished nearly twenty-five per cent of the enlistments. From my own constituency of Wentworth over 3,000 men have joined the colours and nearly as many more have volunteered but failed to pass the rigid examination. We have paid the price in the loss of scores of our best and bravest, but our people are undaunted and are giving, and will continue to give, in men and money to the utmost of our resources. In my constituency, the county insures the life of every soldier from our county funds, we give four thousand dollars a month from the same source to the patriotic funds and the voluntary contributions exceed even this amount. In addition large sums have been subscribed to the Belgian Relief, the Red Cross Society and Sailors Aid. In a three days' campaign held last week for the city of Hamilton and Wentworth Patriotic Fund the sum of $500,000 was aimed at and about $700,000 raised. The chairman of this Fund received a cheque for $5,000 from a Cleveland firm, accompanied by these words: "We feel sure that most Americans realize that Britain and her Allies are fighting the battle of civilization and it is as much our cause as any one's" —a practical and true expression of the American people.

I cannot let this opportunity pass without paying tribute to the splendid spirit of Canadian womanhood. No greater courage has been shown by our troops in France, than has been shown by their mothers, wives and sisters at home—working, waiting, praying. Their's is the hardest part.

[Mr. G. C. Wilson.]

With us they are all at work—in the patriotic societies, in munition plants, in caring for the wounded and invalided who have returned. Canada's part in the war has been great and glorious, and no factor contributed more to this result than the courageous women of our country.

This country must deal justly and generously with the men, and the dependents of the men, who have fought our fight in this great war. The revised scale of pensions made by a joint committee last session has, I believe, been generally found satisfactory. In the treatment and care of returned soldiers great advances have been made, and the experience gained in the early stages of the war has been utilized to the best advantage. It is a great problem, the care and rehabilitation of those who have suffered. They must be dealt with generously, and fitted for a return to civil life, educated and instructed for suitable occupations. I understand the Government has prepared a land settlement policy that will give occupation to those who wish to engage in agricultural pursuits, and that they have consulted with the provincial governments to this end. But placing the returned soldier on the land is not alone sufficient. He must be protected and encouraged until his success is assured. These men who have served the Empire have given years of their lives, have sacrificed positions and business, have made such an abrupt break in their usual vocations that they must start life over again. They and the dependents of those who have fallen are the wards of the nation, and as the nation deals with them, so in a great measure, will a strong and enduring patriotic spirit be maintained in this country. Where education to fit men for new occupations is necessary, it must be given to them. There must not now, nor in the years to come, be permitted any case of a man who served and suffered, or the dependent of one who made the supreme sacrifice, being pointed out as an object of charity. This country must keep faith with its defenders.

Speaking for my own district, I can say that we welcomed the steps taken by the Government to secure a national stock-taking of the man power and natural resources of the country. From the splendid reception accorded the Prime Minister in his long tour across the continent advocating this proposal, I feel convinced that all Canada welcomed such an innovation. That it is necessary is evidenced by the action of the Prime Minister, who, even with the great and pressing problems he must deal with daily, considered it imperative that he should give his earnest advocacy to the scheme. Three weeks after Canada had announced the appointment of a Director of National Service, came a similar announcement from Great Britain. War has taught us many lessons, and none more forcibly than the necessity of the mobilization and direction of the man power of the Empire. It was the present Prime Minister of Great Britain who a few weeks after the outbreak of the war gave the slogan, 'Business as usual." No longer do we hear that cry. The whole business of the Empire now is the winning of the war. England has felt the necessity of the proper direction of her man power to achieve results. Equal to four divisions of the army have been brought back to England from France, because they could serve the great cause at home, better than in the trenches. Men necessary to the production of munitions, equipment, and all that makes for the success of the army, must be kept at the occupations where they can serve best. A national inventory is necessary. In the ultimate analysis, the utilization of the knowledge, skill and science of each individual Canadian, in the avenue of effort for which he is best fitted by training and experience, and the co-ordination of these efforts of our people is the best way to obtain results. The Government is making an inventory of the man power of the Dominion. It is also making an inventory of our natural resources, and to that end they have appointed Professor MacCallum of Toronto University, and associated with him, some of our greatest scientists, to formulate plans how these can best be used for the benefit of the State. We have in Ontario an example of the benefit to the State and to the individual of intelligent development of our resources. Compare the Western Ontario of fifteen years ago with the same district to-day; the wonderful advancement in the industrial and agricultural development can be attributed in a great measure to the intelligent development of our water-powers and the distribution of electric energy. What position would the manufacturers of Ontario be in to-day were it not for the " white coal " of Niagara? In the district from which I come there is to-day a most serious shortage of coal. Some misconceptions may have arisen as to the object of the national inventories of man power and natural resources, but such is always the case with any innovation. I feel confident, however, that time will justify the wisdom of these policies by the good results that will accrue to the state and to the individual.

I desire to touch briefly on the financial stability of Canada, and here allow me to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his great success in financing this war. That it has been a pleasant surprise as well as a source of pride to all true Canadians, goes without saying. The confidence of the Finance Minister in the Canadian people has been more than reciprocated by the strong approval of the course he has pursued, as expressed in their over-subscribing to the war loans. The war has taught us our financial strength. It would have been a bold man who in 1914 would have prophesied that we would place enormous federal loans in Canada. Previous to the courageous policy of the Finance Minister we looked entirely to London for our financial requirements. Now we meet them at home, and in addition, create enormous credits for the purchase of supplies in Canada by the Imperial Government. To maintain this position we must practice thrift and economy so earnestly advocated by the Finance Minister. Extravagant and unnecessary expenditure will deprive Canada and the Empire of the most potent weapon in winning the war. Canadians are prosperous, and the result of that prosperity should be placed at the service of the State. A great Canadian financier has aptly described the situation and its demands on the state and citizen, in these words:

> Thrift for the individual is excellent, but just now, that is of minor importance. Thrift for the sake of Canada, thrift for the sake of the Empire, thrift to win the war, should be our cry. We shall not fail for men, difficult as enlistment may be. We shall not fail because of inability to make or procure war supplies. If we fail, it will be because we have wasted on unnecessary things the money that would have won the war. The man or woman who works hard at making shells may take much comfort in helping to win the war, but the man or woman who, in addition, saves a part of the present high wages due to the war and buys a war security, or helps a bank to do so, has helped twice, and the second kind of help is the most vital. The manufacturers of the United States will make war supplies for money. We are doing better only if we supply them on credit.

Nearly fifty years ago the first parliament of the Dominion assembled. In it were the statesmen who had brought under one government, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. These men, Macdonald, Brown, Cartier, Tupper and others whose loyalty, determination, and courage laid the foundation of the present great Dominion, have been justified in their work by the growth, solidity and importance of this country. Confederation saw four provinces, with little common interest except loyalty to the Crown, brought into union; a half century has passed and the Canada of 1867 is now a mighty empire, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, one-half of North America, comprising all the British possessions on this continent except Newfoundland. And, Sir, I know I voice the desire of all, when I express the hope that that ancient colony, from union of fighting forces with us in the Empire's cause, will seriously consider complete union in government and thus make British North America one dominion. I believe even in this time of stress the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation should not be allowed to pass without some fitting commemoration of the event. The fathers of Confederation laid the foundation of a vaster country than they believed possible at the time. Then Canada was a colony of Great Britian; to-day she is a partner in world affairs, whether of peace or of war.

A little over fifty years ago representatives from the four provinces met in London to consummate Confederation. Then there were doubts as to the stability of the proposed union; even as to the worth of overseas Dominions to the Empire. What a change in fifty years. Within a few weeks there will be another conference in London, when representatives from the overseas dominions will sit in the councils of the Empire determining the best policy to pursue to win victory in the great world's war, and with that victory, the preservation and strengthening of the bonds of Empire. What imperial or colonial statesmen in 1867 would have even dreamed that within such a brief period the overseas dominions would have won a partnership in the great British Empire? I know that the Prime Minister can assure the representatives of the motherland and of the overseas dominions that Canada is prepared to assume the responsibility of Empire for the future, in the same or even to a greater degree than she has done during the past three years.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to quote the message of the respected leader of the Opposition as given to the public in the recent issue of the official publication of his party and reprinted in the Toronto Globe of Friday last. The right hon. gentleman says:

> Let us here and now sink passions, prejudices, vain and idle recriminations. Let us, when criticism is needed, criticise without bitterness, only by appeals to reason, and above all, let us bend all our energies toward making Canada an effective factor in the struggle.

Those, Sir, are the sentiments that have actuated the people of my constituency since the outbreak of the war, or they could not have given as freely of their manhood and wealth as they have. They have sunk party passions and prejudices; they have not indulged in vain and idle recriminations; they have had but one object—the winning of the war. And, Sir, the places where the people have been guided by these sentiments can easily be ascertained by an examination of the recruiting returns and the contributions to the various patriotic funds.

In conclusion, let me express my firm belief in the success of the allied cause. That success is assured; its early realization is dependent upon ourselves and the citizens of the allied countries. To make 1917 the year of decisive victory we must give freely of our resources, and co-ordinate our efforts to secure the best results. I can but speak of my own district, but in that part of Canada every one is working in harmony and has but one object—the victory that means a lasting peace. Anything that would tend to divert attention or divide efforts to secure this object would not meet the wishes of my constituents. We are united in this object; we will fight our private battles when we have won the victory for which we all are now striving. We are fighting for national existence; we are fighting against German aggression and militarism; we are fighting in the interests of humanity and civilization; we are fighting for a just cause; we are fighting for a lasting and abiding peace and until, in the Providence of God, we have secured the same, Nelson's historic message should be our's, namely, "England expects every man will do his duty.

Mr. J. A. DESCARRIES (Jacques-Cartier) (translation): Mr. Speaker, I beg to second the motion of my honourable colleague, the member for Wentworth (Mr. G. C. Wilson) who has moved that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to the speech delivered by His Excellency to a joint meeting of the members of the Senate and the House of Commons at the opening of this Parliament.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member on the splendid address to which we have just listened. He has shown himself equal to the task imposed on him both by the importance of the questions with which he had to deal and the solemnity of the occasion on which he addressed the House.

I must, therefore, Mr. Speaker, ask your indulgence and that of the hon. members for my audacity in rising in my turn to speak before this awesome assembly, having as an audience the men in Canada who are best gifted with eloquence and its most distinguished citizens. Mr. Speaker, I cannot enter into an explanation of the reasons for my approval of the sentiments expressed in the speech from the Throne without first of all referring to the heavy toll taken by the grim reaper from our midst since last session. Naturally I recall the memory of the late Postmaster General, the hon. Thomas Chase Casgrain. Alas, who could have foreseen when we parted last spring that such a polished gentleman, a politician of great renown, a famous lawyer, a truly patriotic Canadian, a citizen all devoted to his country and the Empire, would depart so soon, stricken down suddenly in his full vigour and the full maturity of his intellect. Let us bow reverently to the decrees of Providence and find in his life an encouragement ever to tread the path of honour and cultivate a love for all good and noble causes.

Mr. Speaker, the Reaper has snatched other victims from our ranks. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Baker) is not in his seat. He has fallen on the field of honour, felled by his country's enemies. I miss also the faces of our distinguished colleagues, the member for London (Mr. Gray) and the member for Stanstead (Mr. Lovell). These also has death mowed down. For the memory of each of our lamented friends let us give a kind thought, while we also offer to their disconsolate relatives our most heartfelt sympathies.

Mr. Speaker, after mourning over our cherished departed let us turn our thoughts to the living present. I learned with much pleasure that by the unanimous voice of your colleagues you had been appointed to the first Commoner of the land. The distinction is of the highest, but it is well deserved indeed. Your parliamentary record, your gentlemanly bearing, the high standard of your life, your profound knowledge of constitutional law, of which we have had frequent instances during your career as a member of this House and as deputy Speaker, left no alternative to your fellow-members but to appoint you to the presidential chair. Allow me to congratulate you most heartily and to offer my very best wishes that success may crown your tenure. I am convinced that by your impartial control of debates, your term of office will not only prove honourable but also useful to this House and to the country at large.

Congratulations and wishes are also due your hon. predecessor, the new Minister of Inland Revenue, the ex-member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny); but his duties keep him at present out of the House. I look forward to another occasion to express to him my congratulations and wish to him, a brilliant career in the Government, a career replete with honour to himself and fruitful of good results for his country and particularly for the province of Quebec of which he becomes officially a representative in the Cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, His Royal Highness, the Duke of Connaught, left Canada after his governorship had expired with the regard and regrets of the whole Canadian people. He won the admiration of all by remaining a truly constitutional representative of the Crown, a statesman imbued with the true spirit of royalty and fully comprehending the ideals of the Canadian subjects of His Majesty. And all regret his departure, because during his stay in this country, he won not only our respect, but also our affection and our devotion, which take their source in our steadfast loyalty to the great Empire, which he represented in our midst.

True we have lost an illustrious Governor, but it has been our good fortune to see vice-royalty entrusted to a noble lord, who will not hesitate to follow in the footsteps of his distinguished predecessor. His Excellency the Duke of Devonshire has already won the confidence of the people of this country. I feel convinced that under his wise and enlightened administration, Canada will continue its onward march towards its glorious destiny.

Mr. Speaker, the Address delivered by His Excellency gives some indication of the Government's policy. According to our political constitution, His Excellency's advisers are responsible for every one of his official pronouncements. The speech is therefore expressive of the policy of the Government of which the right hon. Sir R. L. Borden is the head.

Are the suggestions therein contained wise and desirable? Is the legislation proposed such as to meet the issues with which Canada is confronted today? Has the public treasury been entrusted to faithful trustees? Has Canada done its duty in the frightful war in which it has to participate? Has sufficient attention been given to the aftermath of the struggle, so that the country's onward march may not be checked? Is Canada prosperous? Is the Government striving to improve existing conditions? Are means being taken to alleviate the burdens which the nation has to bear in the present extraordinary circumstances? To all those questions I answer unhesitatingly in the affirmative. When, Mr. Speaker, were there to be found in this country a Prime Minister and a government which had to face the tremendous difficulties which the present Government has to solve? For two years past Europe has been devastated by the most terrible war which is recorded in history. An emperor, reigning over a domineering people, has risen in his pride, dragging after him other potentates. Without reason, through sheer spirit of conquest, moved by an unbridled ambition, he threw his horses against Belgium and France, hoping to make an easy prey of those two countries. God was watching over the Franks. From all sides the nations of the the Old World rushed on to the battlefield. Russia, Italy, Japan, Portugal, Montenegro, Serbia, Rumania took up arms and went to meet the invaders.

Well, Mr. Speaker, could the great Empire of which we are part and parcel, could the British Empire whose glorious flag has been unfurled on every sea and every continent, remain neutral in the struggle for the freedom of the world? Casting aside forever old rivalries centuries old which had prevented her from extending to France the hand of friendship, Great Britain took sides with her southern neighbours. Her soldiers went over to France, and shed their blood alongside the French soldiers and from their united sacrifice has sprung victories which have startled the world and repelled the invader.

England's navy has patrolled the seas, cleared of German ships the highways of trade and bottled the Hun vessels in the Kiel canal. At an enormous cost, England has put under arms an army of 5,000,000 men. To her dominions beyond the seas she appealed for assistance. Canada has nobly answered the call. Our country has equipped nearly four hundred thousand men, three hundred thousand of whom are already overseas or on the battlefields of Europe. The Old World stands amazed at the valiance of our troops. The echoes of Ypres, Saint-Julien, Festubert, Langemark, Saint-Eloi, la Somme, Courcelette, Salonica, the Dardanelles are resounding with their glorious deeds. Our boys, our sons, our brothers, some of our colleagues, have proven to the world that on the shores of the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes, on our western prairies and in the country of Evangeline, on the borders of the southern republic and amidst the Arctic floes, there lives a young people who remembers the valorous exploits of Wolfe and Montcalm, who has treasured the ideals of its forebears, whose soul has been moulded after that of the great nations from which it sprung, and who makes it its duty to do its share in the frightful war which, for the safety of the world and the preservation of the freedom of nations, must have no other issue but victory accomplished by our motherlands, France and England, with the help of their powerful Allies.

The Government which had to face such tremendous issues and responsibilities, has done its duty nobly and firmly; such has been its grasp of the situation, that political parties disappeared and Parliament, without a dissentient voice, voted with enthusiasm and loyalty to the Empire the necessary moneys to send our volunteers to the front, and the hundred millions of dollars necessary for their maintenance and equipment.

I therefore wonder, Mr. Speaker, at the discordant echoes which are to be heard to-day in Dorchester, from Liberal quarters, on the eve of the election which is made necessary on account of the death of the late lamented Postmaster General. Doubtless we shall hear from the right hon. leader of the Opposition and his party that they disavow the conspiracy of the young politician whose conduct on this occasion is prejudicial to Canada's determination to put forth every possible effort to win the war, when victory requires the whole energy of the country.

Mr. Speaker, the imperious needs of the struggle have suggested to certain individuals and to certain newspapers the possibility of the Government establishing obligatory military service. Should I say that the right hon. Prime Minister and many of his colleagues have refused to consider the suggestion and have stated that the Government had given the subject no thought. I believe, in any case, Mr. Speaker, and I think I am voicing the opinion of the majority of the hon. members in stating that the constitution of the country forbids sending our soldiers to fight outside of Canada, without special legislation being enacted in this House and that no such legislation altering the very basis of our constitution would be enacted without its being first submitted to the people of Canada. No, Mr. Speaker, there can be no question of conscription. Obligatory enlistment is not needed. The people of Canada have given noble proof of their loyalty. Freely and voluntarily, four hundred thousand men have already answered the call. If they are required, one hundred thousand more will follow of their own free will. And thus the Prime Minister will have given to the Empire and the allied nations a royal and magnificent contribution to restore the peace of the world, which, let us hope, Providence will soon grant to Europe.

Mr. Speaker, it does happen that the very best intentions are misconstrued. The Government, as is referred to in the speech from the Throne, has undertaken to organize the national service with a vigour to put to better use our natural resources. In many quarters, this scheme has been misinterpreted, connecting the proposal with the bugbear of conscription, they concluded that the Government's purpose was to bring about conscription either military or industrial. The Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, members of this House, bishops, provincial ministers have raised their voices, they have explained the scheme, and stated that national service had nothing to do with military conscription; that it meant only the organization of labour in all its spheres. Always people will be found who will not harken to logic, or, I dare say, Mr. Speaker, who try to find in this proposal a pretext to turn the people against the Government and make petty political capital, as is being done in Dorchester, out of a project which, if carried out, will have an immense influence on the future progress and prosperity of Canada; not launching it on the war-path, but along the highroad of commercial, agricultural and industrial development and all the other fields of national energy.

Mr. Speaker, it is stated in the Address of His Excellency that the prime ministers of the Dominions have been invited to take part in the conferences to be held in England for the purpose of discussing matters connected with the war. The Dominions are honoured thereby. But the honour has been well deserved, if one takes into account their unflinching loyalty and the sacrifices they have made in men and money. The ties that bind us to the mother country have been cemented by the blood of our boys. In the future, our voice will be heard in the Parliament of Nations for the maintenance of peace, because we have paid our full share of human lives to obtain the supreme result.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, that in those conferences our position in the Empire after the war is over will be discussed. The subject is full of anxiety and serious speculation for any Canadian who loves his country and who sees those weighty problems already looming up. I feel convinced that the right hon. Prime Minister who presides over Canada's welfare with such tact and firmness, with love for his country and loyalty to the British Empire will approach these great questions with all the prudence that characterizes all his public acts and that he will not allow any change in our status in the Empire without the consent of the people of Canada.

His Excellency reminds us that the life of the present Parliament will expire next October. In that case, general elections are in order within a short time. How then could the Prime Minister leave the management of the country's business to go to England to take part in the war conference? Is it reasonable that he should be forced to throw the country into an electoral turmoil while war is raging and his whole attention should be devoted to one single aim, so to say: ultimate victory.

There is to be no election in England during the war. Even the ministers recently chosen have been relieved of the obligation of returning before the people to have the selection ratified. I am not surprised then, Sir, of the announcement made by the Government that a resolution will be submitted for authority to ask the Parliament of the United Kingdom to pass an Act for the continuance in office of this Parliament. Moreover, it is but a further extension of the delay we requested last session. No possible change could justify our throwing the country into the confusion of a general election in which political passions play such an important part and which might divert the minds of the people from the great end it is serving by helping the Empire. I am therefore convinced that this resolution will be unanimously passed by the House; it is of public urgency and necessary for the safety of Canada and of the Empire.

With His Excellency, we must, Sir, thank Providence for the abundant crop with which Canada has been favoured last season. Our agricultural population has been richly rewarded by its labours. Our generous soil has nothing to refuse to the industrious and intelligent husbandman. Our rural population is happy. They have abundant means as the result of their labours, and our public institutions protect their rights and liberties. Doubtless, as everywhere else, difficulties may arise from time to time. But with good will, public spirit and patriotism, peace must finally reign supreme where intolerance and nefarious ambition sought their ends.

His Excellency told us, Sir, that the financial, commercial and industrial conditions of Canada were of the best. Who could have thought, in fact, that in the very midst of the war, we could show a surplus of about $80,000,000? This has never been seen before, in full time of peace and prosperity.

Our trade has expanded in an extraordinary way. Our industrial development has attained undreamt of proportions. All the statistics will doubtless be submitted to us in the course of the debate on the Address.

Have we not there, Sir, an evident proof of the progressive administration of the country's affairs by the present Government. I well know that the political tactics of the opponents of the Government lead them to spread all kinds of accusations among the public. But is there a single one of such charges which has been connected with a member of the Cabinet? Inquiries have been held both by committees appointed in this House or chosen from the judiciary. The Government came out unscathed. I ask you, Sir, and I ask every thinking man free from party bonds, can the political history of Canada show us that at any time, whether in peace or war, there has been an Administration more economical, more energetic, more prosperous and in better accord with the aspirations of the electors and of the people of Canada.

We shall, therefore, Sir, vote the various estimates for the next fiscal year, knowing well that they will be wisely applied by the Government to promote the welfare and prosperity of the country.

His Excellency has reminded us of the approaching date of the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of our Canadian Confederation, and tells us that notwithstanding the continuance of the war, there should be an appropriate commemoration of an event so notable in our history.

This cannot but be most agreeable to this House and to the people of Canada. Who could remain indifferent to the splendid showing of our country to-day? Fifty years ago, four provinces sparsely peopled and of meagre resources existed without any common bond in the vast territory of British North America. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Upper and Lower Canada joined together on the 1st of July, 1867 and formed the Canadian Confederation.

Our country to-day comprises nine provinces extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the forty-fifth degree of latitude to the North Pole. This immense territory is peopled by over 8,000,000 inhabitants, and could give life and happiness to a population of 100,000,000 souls.

With what great enthusiasm shall public gratitude proclaim the hallowed names of the fathers of confederation: of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George Etienne Cartier, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, Sir Leonard Tilley, Hon. Darcy McGee and of numerous others who are not so highly renowned, but whose deeds and works history will report.

I am then assured that this hon. House will welcome any measure proposed for the worthy celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation. Our nation shall offer to the world the spectacle of a united people commemorating the glorious episodes of its history. No race rivalry will cloud the beautiful sky of our land. All Canadians, whether English or French blood flows in their veins, will then clasp hands in friendship, with the resolution to live in peace and harmony forever, in this country of Canada.

Our land is so vast and its soil so fruitful, its sun so warm and its resources so abundant that the sons of its first settlers, English and French, may live together without jealousy and antagonism, but with sentiments of sincere fraternity, each offering homage to the Almighty according to his creed and in the language of his ancestors.

The speech from the Throne, Sir, concludes by alluding to the fine courage and the inflexible purpose which have animated all His Majesty's Dominions in upholding the great cause for which we are fighting with the rest of the Empire.

This proves that the Government is ready to do its duty to the very end. The nation has supported the Administration and shall continue to support it without hesitation.

Is it to be wondered that prior to the war opinions differed on that point? But to-day, with the terrifying sight of nation rushing against nation in appalling battles that ruin the countries, decimate their manhood, and even reduce their population to serfdom; when military despotism aims at enslaving the liberty of nations; who dare remain indifferent and refuse to answer the call of our mother-countries for assistance? Before taking up arms in self-defence shall we then wait until we are in the fetters of the foe? To run to the aid of the Empire and France, must we wait until the power of those great countries has been shaken in its very foundations? No, Mr. Speaker, Canada stands unflinching in its determination. Victory alone will put a stop to our endeavours. His Majesty's loyal Opposition deserve our thanks for the support they have given in the past to all our war legislation. Following the example of His Excellency, who concluded his address by praying that the Divine blessing may attend our deliberations, allow me, Mr. Speaker, as I chose, to invoke the God of Hosts, the Divine Protector of Canada, France and the British Empire to bestow on our arms the strength that ensures victory, on Canada the blessing of prosperity and on the Canadian people continued happiness.

Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in seconding the motion of the honourable member for Wentworth, who moved that an address be adopted expressing to His Excellency the Governor General the thanks of this House for his Address at the opening of this session.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, in the two addresses to which it has been our privilege as well as our pleasure to listen, there was very little to which exception might be taken; and, if there were anything from which I might be tempted to differ, it is not my intention on this occasion to enter into controversy upon it. Occasions of controversy will arise in due course, when the measures of the Government come up for discussion. There was much, very much, in these addresses on which the House will be happy to express commendation and present its congratulations to the two hon. members. Particularly timely and well-conceived were the remarks of my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. G. C. Wilson) upon the departure of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught. If the hon. gentleman will permit me to say so, I very much admire the tenor of his speech on that point; what he said on the subject could not have been better said.

It has often been remarked, but not too often, that Canada has been particularly fortunate in the character of those who have been selected to be the representatives of the royal authority. They have all been men of great eminence, whether eminence by character or eminence by ability, and most of them have been eminent for both ability and character. It is due to those who have occupied that high office to say when they had fulfilled their term and the time came for them to sever their connection with us, they carried with them the gratitude, the esteem, the respect of all classes of the community. But, Sir, I think I am within the mark when I say that no Governor General who ever left our shores was followed with so much of the blessings and the affection of the people of Canada as was His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught. Undoubtedly, the peculiar enthusiasm with which His Royal Highness was received by us when he came to preside over the destinies of Canada was due to the fact that he belonged to the royal family. But if he left the shores of Canada with a more than usual share of the gratitude and respect of the Canadian people, his connection with the royal family was not the only cause—the main cause was his own personal qualities; his devotion to duty; his high sense of honour; his simple, affable manners; and, if I may say so,—and I think I may say so rightly —his straightforward, democratic ways.

And if the whole truth is to be told, I believe everybody will agree with me that in the impression which he made in Canada he himself was not the sole factor; a great deal was due also to his gracious consort, a lady who, in her high station, gave, during the time she was with us, an example of those domestic virtues ever dear to the British heart. There had been a rumour prevalent for a long time that when the invitation from high quarters came to His Royal Highness to become Governor General of Canada he hesitated, as his personal interest would have kept him in England, and it was understood that he had accepted the office for a period of not more than two years. I do not know to what extent that rumour may be well founded, but it seems to have had some foundation, because, as will be remembered, announcement was made in the session of 1914 that His Royal Highness was to close his connection with the governorship of Canada during that year. On the day of prorogation in the Month of May, 1914, the two Houses of Parliament presented an address of appreciation for his eminent services during his stay amongst us, and on that occasion he bade an official farewell to the people of Canada. But before the date set for his departure war broke out, and then, it is understood, at the request of high authorities, he consented to remain for the duration of the war. When the usual term of five years had expired, for reasons unknown to me, and as to which I have no opinion to offer, it was thought preferable to follow the usual course and to appoint a successor to His Royal Highness. "The King is dead, long live the King!" Such was the form by which, under the old French monarchy, announcement was made to the people of the close of one reign and the beginning of another. In these words we might well express our welcome to the Duke of Devonshire. Following the long line of precedent, the British authorities have sought a Governor General of Canada from the most illustrious families of the realm. The Duke of Devonshire has the honour of being the bearer of a name made famous by a long line of statesmen, who, for centuries, and especially in the time of the Stuarts, have been prominently connected with the events which have brought England to the proud position she occupies to-day. The family to which he belongs has in all generations displayed those qualities of firmness, moderation and courage, qualities which certainly afford a splendid augury for the welfare of the Canadian people. It was not our fortune to be acquainted with His Excellency the Duke of Devonshire otherwise than by reputation. We knew of his family, but we did not know him. We are more fortunate in the case of Her Excellency the Duchess of Devonshire. We had known her when she was a young girl in the house of her father, when he occupied Rideau Hall as Governor General of Canada. Again she takes up her residence in Rideau Hall, but now as the lady of the manor, and she can feel assured that to her we offer a double welcome for the sake of auld lang syne.

It is the misfortune of the Duke of Devonshire, our new Governor General, and it is our misfortune that on the occasion when he first opened the session of the Canadian Parliament we should still live under the shadow of the terrible struggle which has been going on now for thirty months, and which is still extending the circle of its baneful activities. It would be beneath our own dignity, it would be unworthy of the place we wish to occupy in this war, if we were to close our eyes to the stern realities, if we were to view the situation in any other than its true light, or to indulge hopes which events might not justify. We must confess that the expectations which the splendid opening of the campaign of 1916 had caused were not realized—because the campaign of 1916 did open most splendidly. It opened with the roar of the guns at Verdun, where the Crown Prince of Germany, day after day, week after week, and month after month was launching the flower of the German army against that noble fortress. After six months of this terrible battering he had to abandon the contest and withdraw into his own lines, having left on the hills of Verdun no less than 500,000 men. These figures are appalling in their immensity, but, appalling as they are, there is every reason to believe that by actual computation they would be found to be well within the reality. Then followed the offensive on the river Somme, when the Allied nations of England and France made a dash upon the German trenches and swept the enemy back several miles, with immense losses to the Germans in men and material. On the eastern front the campaign opened by an attempt of the Austrians to invade Italy. That attempt was easily repulsed. The Austrians were thrown back across the mountains into Austria, and the Russians in Asia Minor and in the Balkans carried on successful operations almost in the heart of that country. And then came the entrance of Rumania into the contest, an event that had long been looked for. We had hoped that it would come, and when it came we were inclined to look upon it as portending the beginning of the end. But, alas, our expectations in that respect have been sadly disappointed. After a few months fighting Rumania has been invaded and its capital taken; it has met the same fate as that of Belgium and Poland. I should add that, on the part of the Allies, the only decisive battle during the campaign of 1916 was the resistance at Verdun, which caused to the enemy a loss of something like 500,000 men and gave them no compensating advantage. On the other side, it must be admitted that the overrunning of Rumania by the German armies gave them a new prestige, and we know that prestige in war always counts. But, Sir, though this is the case, is there any reason to be discouraged? Is there any reason why we should not hope? On the contrary, it seems to me that there are circumstances which may lead us confidently to expect that at the end of this year, 1917, we shall see the beginning of the great victory for which we have been fighting during the last thirty months. What are the reasons for this hope? Sir, there are not a few evidences that the vital forces of the enemy are commencing to give way. Though at this moment, the beginning of the year 1917, Germany is still in possession of Belgium and a sixth part of France, of Serbia, and a large part of Rumania, evidences are percolating through the severe German censorship that Germany is being invaded by two foes more formidable and more dangerous even than soldiers and guns: these foes are famine and exhaustion. The attempt, made only some weeks ago, by the German Government to enter into peace negotiations goes far to justify this expectation. The language of the German Chancellor when he made these overtures of peace was not the same language that we heard in 1914. Arrogant it was, but not the same kind of arrogance that characterized his tone in 1914. To-day we do not hear that the Germans are fighting to dominate the world. To-day their appeal to the people of Germany is that they are fighting for their fatherland; that they are fighting to maintain their existence as a country. Far different language this from that which we heard only thirty months ago. It is evident, however, from the tone of the German Chancellor's overtures, that he still poses as a conqueror. Sir, it is not usual for the victor to be the one to offer peace or to talk peace. Instances, however, have occurred where he who claimed to be the victor saw approaching a new danger perhaps more formidable than the one which he had just overcome. Napoleon is the most striking example of them all. In 1812 Napoleon had invaded Russia. He had carried everything before him. He had reached Moscow, the old capital, the holy city of all the Russias, and from the Kremlin, the palace of the old Czars, he offered a peace to his opponent. What was it that prompted Napoleon, himself an insatiable conqueror, to adopt that course? Was it magnanimity? Was it a sudden horror of shedding blood? No; we know that nothing of that kind ever interfered with Napoleon's plans. The reason was that he saw fast approaching another enemy far more formidable to him than those whom he had just overcome, and that enemy was the Russian winter. The Emperor of Russia refused all overtures. Events proved that Napoleon had been right in his fear, because the Russian winter did what Russian armies had failed to do—indeed, could not have done. The Russian winter simply annihilated the army of Napoleon. Though he continued the great struggle, he never recovered from that blow, which was his first step towards St. Helena.

There is a similarity between the position of Napoleon in 1812 and that of Germany in 1917, in that another enemy has to be faced whose presence has not been anticipated. Last year, speaking upon this subject, I ventured to say that in my humble judgment the only complete victory which had been won up to that time had been won by the British Navy. After the passing of a year I think I can repeat that the only complete victory which is being won in this war is the victory which is being achieved by the British Navy.

When I said so last year, I did not refer to the engagements which had taken place from time to time, and in which the British navy had participated so successfully. Neither do I refer this year to the battle of Jutland when the German navy dared to come out from cover, soon again to seek cover in order to avoid the victorious pounding of the fleet of Sir David Beatty. No, what I refer to is the unseen, silent, relentless pressure of the British navy upon the trade and commerce and resources of the enemy. I refer to the silent pressure of the British navy, whose powerful grip is slowly, surely, effectively strangling the vitality of the enemy; and there is every reason to believe that with further efforts on our part, whatever may be its success on land, undoubtedly the German nation must come to her knees because of that silent, unseen pressure of the British navy.

The speech from the Throne refers to the offers of peace on the part of the German Government. The Allies have met the offer in the only way it could be met. They have refused to go into conference until they know the terms upon which Germany would negotiate. They went further: They even placed upon the table the terms upon which they are ready to have peace, and by their answer they have shown that they are ready this day, any day, to negotiate for peace, which shall not be simply a truce to be broken again at the option, will, caprice, or ambition of any party, but a peace which shall be founded upon the rights of mankind, upon freedom and justice, and which shall lift humanity and civilization to a still higher level than before the war.

His Excellency in his speech states:

The Canadian forces dispatched overseas during 1916 numbered more than 165,000 and the aggregate of enlistments in Canada since the outbreak of war is nearly 400,000.

Then His Excellency says:

In attack as well as in defence the valour, endurance and resourcefulness of the Canadian troops have been conspicuous on every occasion when they have met the enemy, and they have splendidly upheld the highest traditions of their country.

Every word of this is true, and it is very well said. Sir, it is not a vain boast for us to say that the conduct of our young volunteers upon the battlefield has been a cause not only of wonder, but even of surprise. It is a fact well known in history, known by all the experience of wars, that the first shock of battle is always a severe ordeal for young recruits. Old generals, experienced officers, will not place upon young recruits the same reliance that they place upon veterans; but our young Canadian soldiers have shown from the first that they can fight like veterans. Every one knew that they would do well, nobody expected that they would do so well as they did from the very first. They behaved like veteran soldiers who had known nothing else but the life of a soldier, and, as was referred to a moment ago by my honourable friend in moving the address, they have on more than one occasion done things which must fill the hearts of the Canadian people with pride. In some battles they saved the day by their valour; and it is beyond doubt that at St. Julien it was they who barred the way of the Germans who were at the time not far distant from Calais.

Such has been the conduct of our soldiers, but here the question arises: The soldiers have done everything that could be done; they have done as much as we could expect from them. Have the Government, in a like way, risen to the opportunity and to the occasion? Have they accomplished what they should have accomplished? Have they fulfilled the whole duty which we had a right to expect from them? Sir, the answer to this question is found in the correspondence which was exchanged between my right honourable friend, the Prime Minister, and my honourable friend (Sir Sam Hughes) the late Minister of Militia. Whatever may be said to the contrary, I speak without any passion. If it is said that I am a partisan, I do not deny the impeachment. If anybody will castigate me for that or blame me for that, let him cast the first stone. But, Sir partisans as we are, I believe that we are all disposed at this time, under the tremendous responsibility which weighs upon all of us, to be fair, and to give justice to whomsoever justice is due. At all events, that is my intention, and I shall leave myself to the judgment of the House as to whether I prove true to that intention.

In the correspondence that has been exchanged the evidence is irresistible, the evidence is abundant, the evidence is positive and incontrovertible that in the council of the Government there was no unity of thought or of action, but there was jarring and friction from the first to the last moment. The cause of the difference, as exposed in the correspondence between the two ministers, was the control of the Canadian troops when they had reached England. The question was, whether those troops, when they had reached England, should continue to be under the control of the Canadian Government represented by the Minister of Militia, or whether they should be under the control of the British War Office. In other words, the question was whether the control of our troops in England should continue to be Canadian control, or whether it was to be British control. I am sorry to say that upon this question there was not that immediate decision which should have taken place; and this is the first reproach which I have to convey to the Government, that on that occasion, instead of being firm and decisive right away and making a decision either one way or the other, the thing was allowed to drag and drag and become confused until the resignation of the Minister of Militia. As to whether it should have been Canadian control as desired by the late Minister of Militia, or whether it should have been British control as desired by others in the Cabinet, I am not here to pass judgment.

I will leave that aside altogether. There may have been and probably there were strong reasons, for one view or the other, but what I assert, and upon this I place myself within the judgment of the House, and of the Canadian people, is that there should have been a decision at once. It should have been a decision for Canadian control, or for British control but there should have been no hesitation upon it. Hesitation is always fatal but hesitation is never so fatal as in war. In the correspondence which I shall refer to in a few moments I shall give chapter and verse. But I wish to point out that the former Minister of Militia asserted that during the first year he was not in control, that he was hampered and then he says that having submitted for the first year under protest, after great effort, he succeeded in obtaining some control and that then he enacted several important reforms. At all events, the whole matter is very much confused. So confused is it that even on the day which preceded the day of my hon. friend's resignation, there was a controversy upon this point between him and the Prime Minister. The ex-Minister of Militia will pardon me if I say that he does not mince matters as to what he has to say. In a letter which he addressed to the Prime Minister on the first of November last he referred to this complaint again and there he stated that in his administration he had been hampered—hampered by some of his colleagues, and hampered by commissions. My hon. friend on this point as to commissions speaks in no unqualified language. This is what he says, addressing himself to the Prime Minister:

> Permit me to draw your attention to nearly every Commission which has been formed. They look beautiful on paper, but few, if any of them have been anything like perfect in practice. The Hospitals Commission, the Pensions Board and the National Service Commission all seemed lovely when sent out, but every one concerned with them knows of the absurdity therein contained.

That is a judgment in regard to which I think many in this House will not be disposed to differ from my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia, but let that pass. On this occasion he refers again to the fact that he had not control in Great Britain and the Prime Minister has answered him already when he has said:

> So far as I am aware you exercised the same control and direction over the forces in Great Britain during the first year as subsequently.

Then comes the rejoinder of the ex-Minister and it is a rejoinder in which we recognize our friend of old. This is what he writes to the Prime Minister:

> Sir Robert, no one knows better than you that this statement is incorrect. This last year, with the full concurrence of the War Office, our management and direction have been given every consideration, and by their request.

There is between the Prime Minister and his colleague an absolute diversity as to the facts. Which is in the right, and which is in the wrong with regard to them, it is not for me to say, but I repeat that this is a further evidence that during those two years there was constant jarring and friction and no unity of thought or action. The Minister of Militia was at that time engaged in a close controversy with the Prime Minister and he was threatened with dismissal. But he made a further complaint; he made, then and there, the complaint that he had been hampered in his administration not only by commissions, but even by his colleagues, and he framed his complaint in these terms:

> Further, had I ventured to conduct this force on the basis of formal Orders in Council, the first division would not have left Valcartier yet, and you know yourself how, by technicalities, the second division was held up for four months through little petty haggling on the question of motor trucks.

That is pretty direct and pretty positive but it is immediately followed by another letter of the 9th November which contains another and a still more positive statement:

> Moreover—

He says, again addressing himself to the Prime Minister:

> —it is difficult for me to recall where you have actively supported me in the passage of any Order in Council concerning the upbuilding of the militia when opposed by two members of the Cabinet usually antagonistic to anything proposed by me. As you are aware, it took up four months in the midst of this great war to fight through the principles of purchasing, for the second division, trucks at the lowest wholesale prices instead of allowing large commissions to local agents who would have nothing whatever to do with securing the order.

Now, Sir, that is a pretty serious charge. Here is a charge made by the ex-Minister of Militia that for four months he was prevented from sending the second division by the interference of some of his colleagues who were fighting over the principle of purchasing at the lowest prices. I recall very well that the atmosphere at one time was highly charged, that there were charges and counter-charges. I have no opinion to offer, I have no right to express an opinion, but we have the evidence of the ex-minister who says that he was hampered for four months at a time when minutes were as precious as hours and weeks and months. He says that he was prevented from sending the troops of which we were in such need on the battle field. I have only to remark that I have not found in the whole of the correspondence any denial of that statement made by the ex-Minister of Militia.

Now, I come to the main subject. I said a moment ago that the cause of contention between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Militia and his colleagues was the question of the control of the Canadian forces in Great Britain. It is due to the ex-Minister of Militia to say that he stated forcibly his views and his complaints upon this matter. On the 18th October last the Prime Minister sent to the ex-Minister of Militia a letter enclosing a draft order in council for the reorganization of the Department of Militia and Defence and the control of the forces in Great Britain. The draft order in council is not included in the correspondence but it is manifest from the context that it was an order which was passed at a subsequent period to create a second portfolio of militia in Great Britain and to have two Ministers of Militia, one residing in Canada and one residing in Great Britain. The ex-minister went at length into the whole subject and took occasion to put his case quite fully before the Prime Minister. I call the special attention of the House to the reasons which he gave for claiming the control of the forces in Great Britain. This is what he says:

From the outset I strongly objected to the fact that practically the entire management of our force, our supplies, our equipment, our transport, etc., had been taken completely out of our hands, and was controlled by the British authorities, we, notwithstanding, paying the bill.

In October, 1914, in conversation on the subject with the late Earl Kitchener, he pointed out that the Canadian High Commissioner had intimated to him that it was the desire of the Canadian Government that these troops should be regarded as purely British, and that Canada should have nothing to say in their management while in England or at the front. I drew his attention to Section 177 of the Army Act, and to the spirit and principles of the Constitution, but he again intimated that he understood it was the desire of the Canadian Government that the troops were to be handed over to them absolutely as "British Regulars." To this I objected, and pointed out that I fully believed that our force, under officers of our own selection should, at the front, be under the command of the British Commander-in-Chief, yet the appointment of officers at the front, and the control of everything in connection with the force while in Britain, should be entirely with Canada; but I further stated that I felt in such a great struggle where each was actuated by proper motives, there should be no need of friction.

He goes on:

I do not know whether the Canadian High Commissioner had the authority of the Canadian Government or not; but a day or two later that gentleman, of his own initiative, strongly spoke to me and briefly said: "You do not pretend surely to have anything to do with the Canadian soldiers in Britain." I suggested that he might be well advised to study not alone the Canadian Military Law, but the British Army Act, as well as comprehend the spirit of the Constitution. I felt then, as I feel today, and as I am pleased to say the entire British Government and War Office officers also realize to-day that our officers and men being in the pay of Canada, Canada should absolutely control them in Canada and in Britain, excepting in so far as securing camping grounds is concerned; and at the front for everything excepting the command and general administration under the command.

He goes on to say:

I had to accept, under protest, for the first year, this management of the Force in Britain. The anomaly of such a state of things is apparent. The Canadian soldier in the trenches must voice his complaint, if any, through the Parliament of Canada and the Minister of Militia and Defence must accept responsibility. How could the Canadian soldier obtain redress through the British House of Commons? Kipling's lines hold good:

'Daughter in her Mother's house,
Mistress in her own.'

As well as another standard maxim, 'Taxation implies representation and brings responsibility.'

Sir, let me call the attention of the House to this very remarkable letter. The ex-Minister of Militia says to the Prime Minister that when he went to England for the purpose of looking after the Canadian soldiers, he was told by Lord Kitchener that it was understood that he was not to look after the troops but that they should be handed over and treated like British regulars. He was told also by the High Commissioner that he could not presume to have any control over Canadian troops while they were in England. Is that parliamentary government? Is that constitutional administration? Here is a minister of the Crown told by one of his colleagues in England that he has no authority when he wants to exercise such authority. What does it mean? It means, as I said a moment ago, that there was no unity of purpose, no unity of thought, no unity of action and, when there is no unity, is it possible to expect efficiency? That is the complaint which I have to make. My right hon. friend, in one of his letters to the Minister of Militia, states that at a time when all the energies of the Prime Minister should have been absorbed in the war, they were employed in smoothing out these petty quarrels. Here are his words:

My time and energies, although urgently needed for much more important duties, have been very frequently employed in removing difficulties thus unnecessarily created.

Sir, I can believe that. The Prime Minister had an enormous load upon his shoulders; immense responsibilities to tax his time and energies to the utmost. And if his time and energy had to be devoted to these petty quarrels, whose fault was it but that of my right hon. friend himself? If he had exercised his proper authority, these petty squabbles would have been avoided, and he would have been free to devote his time and energies to the war.

But there is much more to come. The Minister of Militia and Defence proceeds to give the reason why he insists upon having control. The reason he gives is simply this: that he could administer things better than they were administered in England, and he gives a specific example. Sir, everybody within the sound of my voice is aware that persistent rumours have been coming from England, by everyone who has come back from there during the last two years, that the equipment which the Canadian troops took with them to England, and which was purchased in Canada, had to be scrapped as soon as our troops reached England, and cast aside as of no value whatever. You, Sir, have heard that charge. Everyone has heard it. Well, Sir, it was an extraordinary condition of things if it was true. Here we are in the midst of a great war, incurring an enormous expenditure. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in his zeal has very properly constituted himself a Peter the Hermit of a Holy Crusade, not only against extravagance, but even against unnecessary expenditure. He has advocated retrenchment on every possible occasion, and he did right; he only did his duty. But while he was preaching economy we have the evidence here, in a letter which I shall quote, that equipment amounting to millions of dollars was cast aside in England as of no value whatever, and all that money was lost. Am I exaggerating? Am I stating a thing which I cannot justify by actual evidence?

5 p.m. I quote from this same letter of the Minister of Militia to the Prime Minister, in reference to the control of the forces, dated the 23rd of October. The Minister of Militia says:

> I spoke to you at the time about the rejection of all our stores and supplies of every description, and proved to you that the excuses—

Mark the word.

> —of the British officers were totally without foundation. You have my memorandum at the time, proving the utter falsity of their bogus excuses regarding our wagons.

Here is the evidence that the Minister of Militia told the Prime Minister what was being done with our equipment and supplies in England. As soon as they reached there, they were scrapped, thrown on the ash heap, and the Minister of Militia says this was done by British officers without any cause whatever. The Minister of Militia in using that language took a very great responsibility upon himself. It is no light charge to make against the British officers that they scrapped all those supplies without any cause whatever. The fact, however, remains that for ten months those supplies continued to be cast aside without the matter being rectified. One of two things is true: either those goods were scrapped or cast aside for cause, or they were cast aside without cause. If they were cast aside for cause, the reflection is upon the Minister of Militia, that he supplied the Canadian troops with unserviceable articles of inferior and unsound quality. If, on the other hand, the Minister of Militia was right, and the British officers were wrong, it is for him to show what the truth was. To-day, however, without knowing whether my hon. friend is right, or whether the British officers were right, the fact remains that for ten months the Minister of Militia continued to send overseas contingent after contingent, division after division, armed and equipped in Canada at great cost, and that as soon as those troops arrived in England, all that equipment was cast aside. For ten months in Canada we continued equipping, and in England the British authorities continued scrapping. This is the condition which we have before us today.

The Minister of Militia stated to the Prime Minister in the same letter that the Pay and Medical services were chaotic, and he added, after Canada had obtained control:

> We have reorganized and reformed the Pay and Medical services in Britain and to-day have placed the Force there on a good basis.

As to the Pay service I have nothing to say, as I have found no particulars in the correspondence in regard to it. As to the Medical Service, I have found nothing more than I have stated, namely, that it was deficient, but we have a good deal of information in the public press upon this subject. I think, however, that my hon. friend was well advised and made an excellent move when he secured for the Medical service of the Canadian troops in England the services of Dr. Bruce of Toronto. Dr. Bruce is one of the eminent men of his profession in Canada; his name carries weight wherever it is mentioned; he is known to be a man pre-eminent amongst the most eminent in surgery. In Toronto, moreover, he has the reputation of being a man of the highest character and integrity, and the very soul of honour. It is known that Dr. Bruce has made a report in which he has absolutely justified the charges made by the Minister of Militia; but it is known also that when the Minister of Militia ceased to be in office, a commission was appointed which controverted and denied everything that was affirmed in the report made by Dr. Bruce. Wherever Dr. Bruce had approved, the commission blamed, and wherever he had blamed the commission approved. We have not those reports; we should have them, and I hope we shall have them during the present session. In their absence it is not for me to pronounce either in favour of Dr. Bruce or in favour of the commission; but as far as my personal sentiment on the matter is concerned, I must say that, without further evidence, any information which is presented to me signed by Dr. Bruce will bear the character of truth, from the very fact that it bears the signature of Dr. Bruce.

After reviewing the evidence, not with any malice or passion, I am justified in concluding, as I stated at the beginning, that the Canadian Government have shown themselves throughout lax in the administration of affairs. They have allowed confusion to percolate all through the service, and it is obvious that without any cohesion and sound direction, and without unity of purpose and unity of action, it is impossible to expect anything like efficiency in the service.

The speech from the Throne refers to three things which I will briefly mention. First of all, it refers to the National Service. On this point I am disposed to take some issue with my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Wilson), but I will not discuss the matter to-day. It would not be right, nor would it be doing justice, to undertake to discuss the National Service Commission until we have before us the Order in Council which has created it and the proceedings which have followed its creation. When these are brought down it will be useful to take up the subject.

The speech from the Throne mentions only two measures which are to be brought to our attention during the present session. One is the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation; the other is the extension of the term of this Parliament. I will not say anything about these matters to-day. When matters of policy are mentioned in the speech from the Throne, it is always better to wait to discuss them when they are brought down. All I can say is that when they are brought down we shall discuss them, as we have done in the past, with absolute impartiality, looking only to the merits of the case.

The third subject which is mentioned is the Imperial Conference, to which the Prime Minister has been invited. At the opening of the House to-day my right hon. friend, the Prime Minister, stated that it was his intention to lay the papers on the table on Friday, but something intervened to prevent that being done. He also stated that he sent me the papers on Saturday, and I owe him the courtesy to say that I received them. There is nothing new in them except the answer made by the Government of Canada to the invitation. Although the invitation was published about a month ago, it may be well to recall it to the attention of the House. It is contained in the following despatch of the Colonial Secretary to His Excellency the Governor General:—

> I wish to explain that what is contemplated by His Majesty's Government is not a session of the ordinary Imperial Conference, but a special War Conference of the Empire. His Majesty's Government therefore invite your Prime Minister to attend a series of special and continuous meetings of the War Cabinet in order to consider urgent questions affecting prosecution of the war, the possible conditions on which in agreement with our Allies we could assent to its termination, and the problems which will then immediately arise.
> Your Prime Minister for the purpose of these meetings would be a member of the War Cabinet.
> In view of the extreme urgency of the subjects of discussion, as well as of their supreme importance, it is hoped that your Prime Minister may find it possible, in spite of serious inconvenience involved, to attend at an early date—not later than the end of February. While the presence of your Prime Minister himself is earnestly desired by His Majesty's Government, they hope that if he sees insuperable difficulties, he will carefully consider the question of nominating a substitute, as they would regard it as a serious misfortune if any Dominions were left unrepresented.

As to the character of the conference, the outline seems to be rather hazy, but I offer no comment upon that. I may, however, in passing, offer an observation upon the statement here made:

> Your Prime Minister . . . . would be a member of the War Cabinet.

There may be a constitutional question as to how the Prime Minister of Canada, who, though a member of the Privy Council, is not a member of the British Parliament, either of the House of Lords or of the House of Commons, can be a member of the War Cabinet. I do not speak of that in any other way than to call the attention of my right hon. friend to it. I doubt not that when he is in England the matter will be carefully considered. The answer sent by the Governor General is in these words:

Paraphrase of a telegram from His Excellency the Governor General to the Colonial Secretary.

Ottawa, Ontario, January 5th, 1917.

My Prime Minister and his colleagues have taken into earnest consideration the very important announcement set forth in your telegram of 25th December which has since been made public. He and his colleagues concur in the view that it is his duty to attend this Conference without regard to any difficulties here which his absence may occasion With that view Parliament has been summoned for the 18th instant in order that business may be facilitated and advanced as much as possible before his departure. He would greatly appreciate information of a more definite character as to the questions to be considered, especially those touching the prosecution of the war and conditions of peace so far as they have been considered. He would also be grateful for earliest possible information as to latest date to which he may delay his departure for England and as to probable length of proposed series of meetings if that has been considered.

Devonshire.

That ends the correspondence. The desire of my right hon. friend to have some information as to the nature of the conference apparently has not yet been gratified.

The answer given by the Government was the only answer that could be given to such an invitation. The conference being called under such circumstances as those of to-day, and the prime ministers of the several dominions being invited, it follows as a matter of course that the answer sent from Canada must be an affirmative answer. We on this side of the House realize this as to hon. gentlemen opposite. We realize, also, that with the great burden of labour that has been thrown upon the Prime Minister by the war he cannot get away without serious inconvenience to himself, to his colleagues in the Government, and to Parliament. But all these considerations must be set aside, and the only one considered must be that which I have stated. We on this side of the House have every desire, so far as in our power lies, to facilitate the Prime Minister in the trip which he has to undertake. This is the twenty-second day of January. The conference is to meet at the end of February. If my right hon. friend is to leave in time that he may not be overburdened in Canada or overburdened after he has arrived in England, he must take his departure from Canada at an early day in the month of February. We, therefore, are prepared to say at once to the Government that if they will postpone all other measures of public consideration, we are ready immediately to vote the necessary war credits that may be demanded, and also to grant a vote on account of the ordinary expenditures of the country for the time during which my right hon. friend will be absent from Canada, and to adjourn the House whenever it is convenient over any time that may be necessary to give him ample latitude for his business. I conclude by saying that, though we may differ on many things, upon this thing at all events we shall endeavour to meet the views of our friends on the other side, and to offer every possible facility for the carrying on of the Government of His Majesty the King.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): I desire to join my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address upon the very admirable speeches which they have made in the discharge of the duty devolving upon them to-day. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. G. C. Wilson) has referred to the departure of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, and it is my desire to associate myself with all that was said by him and by my right hon. friend with respect to the service which His Royal Highness gave to this country and to the Empire as Governor General of Canada. I have said more than once that the life of His Royal Highness has been distinguished by the characteristic of devotion to duty. It is perfectly true that when he assumed the duties of Governor General it was not contemplated that he should remain here for more than two years. A resolution of both Houses of Parliament was adopted expressing the appreciation of Parliament and the country of the services which he had given up to that time. But before the time arrived which had been set for his departure war broke out, and, though there were domestic circumstances which made it extremely difficult for him to prolong his stay in Canada, he did remain until he had served the full term of five years. I desire to express my very great appreciation of his counsel, and of his consideration in every way toward myself and toward the members of the Government, during the period of his service, appreciation also of the keen interest which he took in the welfare of this country, and especially of the services which he was enabled to give to Canada by virtue of his great military knowledge and experience. I associate myself also most heartily with what my right hon. friend has said with regard to the Duchess of Connaught. In every way both she and the Princess Patricia aided and encouraged patriotic work during the progress of the war; and I am sure that their Royal Highnesses left Canada, bearing with them the esteem, the admiration, and the respect of the Canadian people. I do not doubt that their memories of their sojourn in Canada will be agreeable as ours are of their stay amongst us in the service of King and Empire.

His Excellency the Governor General, the Duke of Devonshire, comes of a family invested with great traditions in the service of the Empire, a family that has had a most distinguished record in public affairs for more than two centuries. There have been many men of great ability and distinction who have served as Governor General in this country, but no Governor General has come as an inheritor of finer traditions of public service or with a more comprehensive grasp of public questions, as they touch not only this country and the United Kingdom, but the whole Empire, than the Duke of Devonshire. He has already given earnest of the keen interest which he will take in all that concerns this country, its resources, future prosperity and development and its relation to the greater whole of which it forms a part. As my right hon. friend has said, the Duchess of Devonshire is the daughter of one who may be justly regarded as among the "Elder Statesmen" of the empire, one who served for a full term as Governor General of Canada; and it has been an especial pleasure, I know, to the people of Canada to welcome her once more to this country, in which, indeed, she has shown an intense and abiding interest ever since the early days when she was resident at Rideau Hall.

My hon. friend the member for Wentworth (Mr. G. C. Wilson) spoke in very eloquent terms of the services which the womanhood of Canada have given to this country since the war broke out. I join most heartily in that tribute which he has so deservedly paid. We know what a wonderful spirit the womanhood of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, have shown in this war. They have not been backward; they have been to the front in all patriotic work. More than that, they have shown a magnificent and indomitable spirit in yielding to the service of the country those who are nearest and dearest to them, and in bearing with fortitude and resignation the sad news which has only too often come of the loss of those who are near and dear.

I should like to express here my deep sympathy with my fellow-members in this House who since prorogation have had tidings of loss and sorrow to them and their families. One consolation there is to them, as to all those who have suffered such bereavement, that these young men have fallen doing their full duty to Canada and to the Empire, and that their memory will never be forgotten by Canadians of to-day and of the years to come.

My. hon. friend the member from Wentworth spoke also of the ancient colony of Newfoundland, so near to us and so closely associated with us by ties of kinship, of common interest and of common allegiance. It is a colony which has done its part splendidly in this war, because there have been no finer or braver men at the front than those of the Newfoundland contingent. The hon. gentleman has expressed a hope that at some later date it may be possible to embrace within the union of this Confederation that ancient colony. It would be inappropriate for me to express any opinion or make any suggestion on that subject beyond this: that the initiative in such a matter, it seems to me, would properly lie with Newfoundland herself. If advances should be made by this Dominion in that regard, they might be misunderstood; but it is not inappropriate for me to say that I am voicing the opinion of the Canadian Parliament and people in assuring Newfoundland that if she desires to take the initiative and to come with any proposal, we should in this Parliament and in this country cordially welcome the advance and give to the proposal our most careful and attentive consideration.

My hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. J. A. Descarries) whose speech was very eloquent indeed, referred to the splendid efforts which Great Britain has made in this war, and especially to the work of the navy. I wish to associate myself with what he has so finely and so worthily said in that regard. It is difficult for us in this House to realize the immensity of the ocean and the tremendous task which has confronted the British navy from first to last. Now and then a raider has got through; now and then submarines have carried on their barbarous warfare, not only against ships of the Allied nations, but against ships of neutral nations as well. But when we take everything into consideration the highest possible tribute must be paid to Sir John Jellicoe, Sir David Beatty, and the admirals, officers and men of the British navy for all the splendid work that they have accomplished under almost insuperable difficulties ever since this war broke out. The mere guarding of the North Sea itself, the awful vigil in winter as in summer, under all weather conditions, in mist and ice and snow, with hidden danger at hand all the time—the hidden danger of the submarine—that task of itself was one that might daunt all but the bravest hearts. In addition to that, they have had the task of keeping the whole ocean free, so that to all intents and purposes the pathways of the ocean have been almost as safe to us as in time of peace—a wonderful tribute to the power of the British navy, and to the valor, heroism and endurance of the officers and men who man it.

The same may be said, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the work which Britain has done in organizing her army. You know what the condition was at first: ability to send overseas 80,000 or 120,000 or 160,000 men to fight the battles of the Empire upon the continent of Europe if occasion should arise. I desire to pause here to pay just tribute to the memory of that man who organized the army which will yet win victory for Britain and for the allied nations: I mean Lord Kitchener. We deplore his death, which was a great loss not only to his mother country but to all the Allied nations and to the world. He did a great work. To his standing as a great soldier, as the virtual head of the British army at the time; to his military ability, to his indomitable will, which had been tested on so many occasions, the people of the united Kingdom and of the whole Empire looked in the day of trial, and they did not look in vain. To enlist, to train, to discipline, to arm, to equip that vast army was a task which none of us here could adequately comprehend. He had done a great work when his untimely death occurred, and he would, I believe, have done a still greater work if he had been spared to the Empire.

The work which the British army has accomplished in this war has been referred to by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. While it is well for us to remember the valour and heroism of our own men, and the resourcefulness which they have shown at every time of testing or of trial, let us not forget what those splendid men from the United Kingdom have done on the soil of France and Belgium; and let us not forget the tremendous losses which the population of the United Kingdom has suffered in this war during the past three years, and suffered without repining, suffered without for one moment relaxing the indomitable will and the firm resolve with which they entered the war, and which I am sure will be maintained until the end.

My right honourable friend has spoken of some matters to which I will allude in a moment; but the first to which naturally I should direct my attention is the progress of the war during the past year. I am not quite prepared to view the progress of the war during the past twelve months so unfavourably as my right honourable friend would suggest. If we compare the end of 1916 with the end of 1915, I think we shall find that very considerable progress has been made by the allied nations, and that the successes of Germany have, perhaps, been more spectacular than real. I remember that at the end of 1915 we had abandoned Gallipoli, and Serbia had been crushed; the outlook was not very good at that time. There has been since a spectacular German success in Rumania, and they are entitled to whatever consolation they may find in that; I think there is good reason for believing that it may be found more spectacular than real. My right hon. friend has referred to the German defeat at Verdun. It can be classed as nothing else—a continuous, persistent effort for five months, with an enormous sacrifice of men, ending in absolute defeat after the magnificent armies of France had won back in three or four days all that the Germans had gained during five months, and won it back at a cost of probably one-twentieth of what the Germans had expended in winning it in the first instance. That was followed by the magnificent Russian success, which involved the capture of no less than 500,000 prisoners from the enemy, and probably a total loss of one and a half million men. Since then we know that the British and French have demonstrated in the battle of the Somme their ability to break the German line when it becomes worth while to do so. From what we have learned from the press—I speak from no official information on the subject—there can be no doubt that if two more weeks of fine weather had been vouchsafed last autumn to Sir Douglas Haig, the results of the fighting on the Somme would have been very much greater than they proved to be.

But, it seems to me, there is something more than that to encourage us. Let me pause, however, to say that, while I speak with no official information on this subject, I am only giving my own impression to the House as it is derived from the public press. Military experts of neutral nations hold the view very strongly that, at the end of 1916, Germany was not only relatively worse off than she was twelve months before, but actually worse off, so far as the man power of the contending nations is concerned. An apparently very capable man—I do not know his name—who is spoken of as a great military expert, has reviewed the situation very carefully and thoroughly, in an article which I recently read. He gives as the net result of the fighting during the past year an advantage to the Allies of no less than 700,000 men in estimating the casualties on the one side and the other. Remember that the man power of the allied nations is vastly greater than that of the nations with which we are contending. An actual advantage of 700,000 men, means a relative advantage very much greater. It happened that weather conditions on the Somme were not favourable at the end of the year. It happened that in the battle of Jutland two more hours of daylight were needed. If these two more hours of daylight had been vouchsafed to Jellicoe and Beatty, can any one doubt that the German navy would have been crushed? Can any of us doubt that if two or three more weeks of good weather had been given to General Sir Douglas Haig and to the French generals, much greater results than those obtained would have been recorded?

In speaking of the effort of the allied nations, I desire also to add my tribute to the successes which have been won by Italy. I have already spoken of Russia. They are all putting forth great efforts, and it becomes us, as part of an empire which is involved in this struggle, to do our part. And so it is proper for me to review, as I will review in a moment, what we have done in this country since the outbreak of war. My right honourable friend in a very eloquent letter which he recently adressed to the press, through a publication which he controls, used this language.

> Reviewing all that has been accomplished during the last thirty months, it is no vain national boast that the Canadian people have far exceeded the expectations laid down at the outset.

I think that is a very fair estimate of the situation, and I am thankful that my right hon. friend takes so reasonable a view. We have accomplished a great task in this country, and I give my hon. friend, the late Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) all possible credit for his work. He did a great work in assembling on Valcartier Plains and dispatching overseas about 33,000 men within the first six weeks of the war. We thought, and rightly thought, that this was a great thing for a country like ours, quite unprepared for war on a great scale. To-day the casualties in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces number over 70,000, or more than double the number of men that were then gathered together to fight the battles of the Empire. What are our enlistments to-day, and how many men have the citizens of Canada supplied for the purpose of aiding the allied armies to achieve the victory for which we all hope? The enlistments in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces up till to-day number 392,647. Besides that, we have called out of the Active Militia 9,052 men who are now serving under arms, and we have a permanent Force in Canada numbering 2,470 men, making a total of 404,169. In addition to that, we have enlisted from the citizens of Canada in the Canadian naval service 3,310 men, making a total of 407,479. We have done more than that; we have provided for the British Naval Service 1,600 men, we have provided for the Imperial Mechanical Transport 1,200 men and for munition works in Great Britain at least 3,000 men. One thousand six hundred went over through the co-operation of the Department of Labour with Mr. Barnes, now a member of the British Government, and other gentlemen who visited Canada about eighteen months ago. If you add these three items together you have 5,800, which, being added to the previous total, makes 413,279.

But that does not tell the whole tale of what the manhood of Canada has furnished in this war. I applied to the Department of Militia and Defence for a statement of the number of British reservists in Canada who joined the British colours at the commencement of the war. The number given by the Department of Militia and Defence is 2,750, but I am told by those who ought to be in a position to know that this is very much less than the actual number. I am told that very many more than 2,750 British reservists in this country joined the British forces at the commencement of the war, but I take the figure as it has been given to me. I made application to the Department of the Naval Service for the number of British naval reservists who returned to serve in the Navy, and the figure given is about 1,000. For the purpose of getting the best information on the subject, I have asked the consuls as to natives of allied countries who were subject to military service and who have left Canada to join the colours of their respective countries. The numbers that have been given to me are as follows:

French Reservists	5,000
Russian "	7,500
Italian "	5,000

If you add these to the total whch I have already given, it will be found that out of the manhood of Canada not less than 434,529 men have joined the Canadian colours, the British colours, or the colours of the Allied nations.

Now, some information is due to the House in regard to the Overseas Forces and how they are disposed of. The Canadian forces which have been actually sent overseas up to the 31st December number 280,562. We have sent also, as mentioned, to the British Islands 1,600 for the Naval Service, 1,200 for the Mechanical Transport, 3,000 for munition works, British Army and Naval reservists, 3,750, and Allied reservists, 17,500, making a total of 307,612 who have actually gone overseas. If you add to that the number of men who have enlisted in the Canadian Naval Service and who are not within this country at the present time, but who are serving in the navy, the number being 3,310, you have 310,922 as the number of men who have actually left this country to do service in one way or another for our cause. At present there are training in Canada 48,312 men. There are on guard duty 9,052 men, and there are of the Permanent Force 2,470, making a total of 59,834 men in Canada.

It may also be of interest to the House to know something as to the casualties, the number of which I have already given. The statement is as follows:

Killed in action	10,854
Died of wounds	4,010
Died of sickness	494
Presumed dead	1,108
Wounded	48,454
Missing	2,970
Prisoners of war	2,373

Now, a word as to those who are actually at the front, or who have been at the front since the commencement of the war. There are now at the front, in France and the Mediterranean, about 110,000 men, nearly all of whom are in France and Belgium. There are at present under orders to proceed to France nearly 10,000 men.

Then there are other items which to some extent are explanatory of the discrepancy between the number of men enlisted and the number of men who are at the front. There are in England, in Forestry and Railway construction battalions and reinforcements, 3,998 men, and in the Pay and Records offices 2,752. In miscellaneous services, such as Headquarters Staff, veterinary, postal services, etc., there are engaged 1,947 men; medical, ordnance stores and Army Service Corps, 8,686. These items make up total of 17,383. Casualties who are at present unfit to rejoin number 39,559. The total number who have seen service in France or in the Near East is a little over 175,000 men. This information, I give as I have gathered it from the various departments of the Government here, and also through communication with the Minister of the Overseas Military Forces.

The Forces which we despatched overseas in 1916 comprised more than 165,000 men. Comparisons are not always useful, but that force, despatched in that one year, numbered seven times the British force under Wellington at Waterloo. We have sent overseas a force greater by 120,000 than the largest British expeditionary force proposed by the War Office before war actually broke out; that is, the force we have sent overseas is 120,000 greater than the force which the War Office thought itself capable of sending across the Channel for service on the Continent in case a war should break out in which Britain must take part. Our enlisted force is about double the British military establishment before the war, and it is greater than the British force that was engaged in the South African war.

I dwelt a moment ago on the tremendous organization necessary in Great Britain for her very large forces, and the effort was equally great for us, perhaps greater, because we had not the military organization Great Britain possessed, nor had we in the same proportion men available for training purposes. The enlistment, the training, the disciplining, the clothing, and equipping of our forces have entailed enormous labours on those responsible. The provision of arms and ammunition, the creation of lines of communication units and ammunition and supply columns, transport, commissariat, medical service, hospitals of all kinds, the enlargement to an unprecedented degree of the Pay and Records Office—all this entailed great organization. We must also take into account the enormous area over which this enlistment has taken place, and the enormous distance over which our troops have to be transported. Those enlisted in Canada have to be sent across the ocean to France, Belgium, Greece, Egypt, or wherever they may be engaged, and the transportation across the Atlantic has of itself been a tremendous task The Canadian forces of more than 400,000 men are scattered to-day over half this continent, and in Great Britain, France, Belgium, Greece and Egypt.

The reorganization of the Quartermaster's Department, provision of field ambulances, dressing stations, stationary hospitals, base hospitals, and the organization of the commissariat on an unprecedented scale, all this involved unceasing attention and effort.

I might give illustrations which indicate what has been done in other directions. Thirteen field ambulances and seven general hospitals are now on the Continent of Europe, and nine stationary hospitals with the Canadian forces overseas, besides sanitary sections, and depots for medical supplies and laboratories. Then we have had to undertake, and lately on an increasing scale, the care of men returned from Great Britain who were wounded in the tremendous fighting on the Somme. As every one knows, the casualties on our side in that battle were enormous, and the casualties in the enemy ranks were still greater, as with good reason it is believed. It has been found necessary to bring back to Canada as many of our men as possible in order that they may have active treatment in our own hospitals. The hospitals in Great Britain are cleared to that extent. I have asked the Military Hospitals Commission for some information on this subject, which I shall communicate to the House as the magnitude of this work is not generally understood in this country. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) referred to the Military Hospitals Commission in the correspondence, and my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) alluded to it also, as a commission which had been a failure, and had not accomplished much. As a matter of fact, the Military Hospitals Commission was constituted by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence himself. It was not through the initiative of any other member of the Government that that Commission was constituted in the first instance, and I cannot understand why my hon. friend should have alluded to it in that way.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not aware that I have ever said the Commission was a failure. What I stated was that the constitution of the Commission could be greatly improved, and I think the Prime Minister will agree with me that it should be.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps I may have misunderstood my hon. friend's allusion in the correspondence. I am glad he thinks the commission is doing a great work. I entirely agree with him in that. There are four classes of patients dealt with by the commission in hospitals and convalescent homes in various parts of the country; (1) treatment of active cases; (2) convalescents; (3) men suffering from tuberculosis; (4) special purposes, such as shell-shock, rheumatism, etc. The commission has under operation or under construction for the above purposes the following institutions: Number of hospitals or homes for class (1) 16, with accommodation available now or in the near future for 2,600 men; for class (2) 27 institutions, with accommodation now or in the near future for 4,700; for class (3), 18 institutions, with accommodation now or in the near future for 900; for class (4), 4 institutions, with accommodation now or in the near future for 200. The numbers which I have given correspond to the classes I mentioned a moment ago. The number of men who have passed through the hands of the commission to date is approximately 9,500. There are now 2,211 patients in the various institutions, and 1,004 out-patients receiving medical attention in connection with these institutions. The commission has established at Toronto an artificial limb factory, and all men returning from the front requiring artificial limbs are now sent direct to this institution.

A large number of buildings have been placed freely at the disposal of the commission by their owners. In other cases a rental has been asked covering only their interest charges. Owing to the recent fighting on the Somme the commission has been obliged to arrange for a considerable increase in the hospital accommodation in Canada. This has entailed also certain capital outlays. Had this not been undertaken it would have been necessary to build further hospitals in England. The commission now has in sight sufficient accommodation for all who are likely to be sent to Canada for some time to come.

The commission is also engaged in providing vocational training and instruction in the convalescent hospitals, and special training for men whose disabilities prevent their return to their previous occupations. Such subjects as freehand and mechanical drawing, market gardening, automobile engineering, typewriting, accountancy, poultry and bee farming are taught.

In conjunction with the Department of Militia and Defence the commission is administering a command known as the Military Hospitals Commission Command, into which are drafted all returned invalids, and men in Canada who require convalescent treatment.

Each province has established a commission for the purpose of assisting men at their discharge to obtain employment. The Military Hospitals Commission co-operates with the provinces in this respect in the furnishing of information, and acts as a general clearing house.

The work of the commission is only in its infancy, but the way in which the problem has been handled augurs well for the future.

I desire to pay my tribute to the provincial governments which have co-operated with us in the most cordial spirit and have aided in every way within their power in carrying on the work.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was speaking of the great organization necessary in connection with so large a force as that which Canada is maintaining in this war. I omitted a reference to the Canadian Dental Service which, as I am informed by the officers of the Department of Militia and Defence, has made it possible for about fifty thousand Canadians to pass the examination and to enter military service who otherwise might have been unable—probably would have been unable—to do so. Canada was one of the first countries in the world to establish this service, and the results which have been obtained are eminently satisfactory in every way.

If I may be permitted to allude to some other departments of the Government upon which unusual burdens have been cast in this war, I would mention the Naval Service. The coast defence of this country has been largely under the control of that department. It is perfectly true that in the early months of the war, when we consulted the British Government, we were asked to concentrate our efforts upon military organization and to leave the question of naval defence to the Admiralty. Nevertheless, it has been necessary to establish patrols, and a number of patrol boats have been secured by the department; I should not be surprised if such efforts must engage their attention still more in the future. That department has had charge of the closing and guarding of our harbours and of the censorship of wireless stations. Upon that department also has devolved the duty of establishing and maintaining naval bases upon a war footing on both coasts, which bases have been utilized not only for the ships of the British Navy but for the ships of allied navies as well. The training of the officers and men who have enlisted has also been a matter of serious import for the Minister and officers of that department. They have kept in constant touch with the Admiralty in these matters. Further, the Minister of Naval Service has been chairman of the sub-committee of Council which has had charge of arrangements respecting the Admiralty transport. I shall speak of that more later on, as in that connection highly important duties have been imposed upon the Minister of the Naval Service.

It would be undesirable for me to omit allusion to the fact that the production of munitions in this war is quite as important as the enlistment of men. I have said before, and now repeat, that this is a war in which applied science and applied mechanics play a part as important as the armies themselves. It has been recently stated by the chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, and I have no doubt that the statement is correct, that Canada is to-day producing more munitions of war than any country produced before the war, with the single exception of Germany. To give an idea of the magnitude that these operations have assumed, I am informed by the chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board that the workmen and inspectors engaged in these operations at the present time number more than 304,000; that there are 630 factories, chemical plants and loading stations which are producing or otherwise dealing with munitions; and that the orders, including the expenditure for an aeroplane factory which is in progress, and including also the anticipated orders for aeroplanes, exceed $700,000,000. It is a very gratifying thing to the people of this country, and I know to the gentlemen of this House, to know that $250,000,000 has been provided in Canada for the purpose of enabling this work to be done. Of this sum, $100,000,000 has been provided by the banks of Canada. I desire to pay a tribute of appreciation to the banks for their splendid co-operation in making that provision, and in other matters connected with the carrying on of the war. The balance, $150,000,000 has been provided by the Government of Canada, and it is anticipated that arrangements can be made which will enable the Government of Canada to provide further large sums for this purpose in the future. If we are to have munitions produced on a great scale in Canada, we must make some provision ourselves to assist the British Government in financing those arrangements. There has been the most hearty co-operation between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United Kingdom for this purpose, and that co--operation will continue to the end.

The production of copper, zinc and lead has been encouraged through the production of munitions, and important tonnage has been created. All the cartridge cases and fuses are being manufactured in Canada today, I understand. One verv gratifying feature, which gave me some surprise considering the enormous extent of the orders, is that ninety per cent of the steel necessary for this purpose in the year 1917 will be produed in Canada. That is a great tribute to the management of the steel industries of Canada, because it is obvious to all the members of this House that the requirements of steel for the production of so enormous a quantity of munitions must be very great indeed and far beyond what would have been possible in this country under ordinary conditions.

The production of gun cotton and of the necessary acids for the manufacture of nitrocellulose powder, acetone, and many other important articles requisite for munitions, including tri-nitro-toluol, has been firmly established. I could speak at great length on what has been accomplished in the production of munitions in this country, but the subject has been very fully dealt with by the chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board in recent utterances.

Another very important matter which the department of the Government have dealt with is the execution of vast orders from the British and Allied Governments, and from the Governments of New Zealand and South Africa. I have not an exact statement of the amount to which those orders have run; certainly it is not less that $150,000,000, and probably well up to $200,000,000. The departments which have been charged with the execution of these orders are the Department of Militia and Defence, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture. Remember, Mr. Speaker, if you please, that the execution of even a million dollar order, involving contracts with, perhaps, 40, 50 or 100 people all over this country, and involving also inspection of articles produced and arangements for their transportation—all this imposes an enormous amount of administrative and executive work upon any department of the Government that undertakes it. Consider also the enormous variety of articles which have been purchased in this way: army blankets, artillery harness, gun carriages, limbers, railway cars, saddlery, knitted goods, wheat, flour, oats, hay, and supplies of all kinds. When hon. gentlemen realize that those orders run into $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 and that they involve a very large organization, constant supervision and frequent negotiations with the governments for whom the various departments are acting, they will understand that all this has entailed an enormous amount of labour and responsibility upon the departments that have been actively concerned.

I should allude also to the work of the War Purchasing Commission. It was established, as hon. gentlemen know, in May, 1915, for the purpose of purchasing in the most effective way and with the least opportunity for waste or maladministration all supplies required by any department of the Government in connection with or for the purpose of the war. Nearly every department of the Government has purchased supplies in that way: the Department of Militia and Defence and the Department of Naval Service are naturally the two principal departments—but the Department of Justice in connection with internment operations, and other departments of the Government from time to time apply to the commission as they may require articles which are properly chargeable against the war appropriation. The War Purchasing Commission makes these purchases by tender and contract, unless in exceptional cases, for reasons stated in writing. Some time ago its purchases had aggregated more than $80,000,000. I do not know what they would amount to at the present time—considerably in excess of that figure. A great organization has been created and the business has, as I believe, been conducted with very great efficiency. The grateful thanks of this country are due to the three gentlemen who, without any remuneration and purely as a duty of public service, have devoted their time and their energies for almost two years, to carrying on the work of that commission.

Another subject has engaged the attention of the Government. Two years ago we took up with the Admiralty the very important question of transportation. We all remember how great the difficulties were at the time. It seemed to me that the best course would be to despatch a gentleman of great experience in these matters to Great Britain and endeavour to have him come to arrangements with the Admiralty by which the problem of transportation might be dealt with in a systematic and effective way. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, a corporation which has rendered great service to the Government of the United Kingdom as well as to this Government in matters connected with the war, freely and voluntarily placed at the disposal of the Government the services of Mr. A. H. Harris. Without effective organization of some kind, matters were bound to get into the most extreme confusion. There was the question of transporting supplies and munitions for the British Government, as well as for the Allied Governments, and connected with all this was the question of transporting the general products of the country which were to find a market on the other side of the ocean. The organization was begun in a very small way—I think with ten or twelve ships in the first instance. That was two years ago; the organization now includes seventy-five ocean steamers under the able and efficient direction of Mr. A. H. Harris as Canadian director of overseas transports. The organization handles 2,250,000 tons per year and the traffic is constantly increasing. The organization is carried on under a committee of the Privy Council over which the Minister of Naval Service presides.

I know that hon. gentlemen of this House will realize that very unusual responsibilities and burdens have been imposed upon the Minister of Finance and his officers during this war. He will no doubt, at a later date, speak more fully on that subject than it would be possible for me to do to-night. For two years he has maintained the finances of Canada without resorting to the British market, which has thus been left free to sustain the burdens imposed by the enormous British war expenditure and the requirements of the Allies. I do not believe that any one of us would have believed two and a half years ago that it would be possible for Canada to accomplish the task which has been accomplished under the direction of the Minister of Finance in that respect. The two loans placed in Canada have attained an unprecedented success, the one for $50,000,000 bringing out $110,000,000, and the further loan of $100,000,000 being more than doubly subscribed. Not only has the minister been enabled to leave the British market free for the enormous requirements of the British and the Allied Governments, but he has out of the loans which he has effected in Canada put no less than $150,000,000 at the disposal of the British Government for the purpose of paying for the munitions produced in this country. As I have said, that effort will be continued by him in the future.

Hon. gentlemen of the House will remember that at the commencement of this war we were faced with very grave conditions indeed in Canada.

I do not think that those of my colleagues who were in Ottawa on the first, second and third days of August, 1914, will ever forget the tremendous importance of the problems with which we were faced and the very great responsibilities which we had to assume at that time.

The people of Canada were beginning to think of drawing their money out of the banks in gold. We were threatened with a condition that might have produced a panic which would have paralysed the energies of Canada in this war. Without any legal power, without any legal sanction to do it, we were obliged to take measures which were afterwards ratified by Parliament. We were obliged to prevent the exportation and hoarding of gold. We were obliged to make bank notes good legal tender. We were obliged to provide that Dominion notes need not be redeemed in gold. These measures were accepted unhesitatingly by the country. No one except those who underwent the responsibilities of that time can properly estimate what might have been the loss to this country if those measures had not been taken.

Then we were faced almost immediately afterwards with another very serious problem. I would like the House and the country to realize for a moment what the conditions were at that time. The revenues of this country had shrunk—I do not know by what percentage—but they had shrunk enormously immediately after the outbreak of the war. Trade was almost paralysed; importation almost stopped, and exportation as well, and in the midst of that we found ourselves confronted with a very serious condition in a very large district in western Canada, in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, a district much larger than some of the other provinces of Canada. There was this condition confronting us: the revenues of the country, as my honourable friend the Minister of Finance graphically described them, were shot to pieces on the one hand, and on the other hand there was the need for some assistance to the people in that drought-stricken district. We had the alternative, to display a lack of courage and to say that, confronted by a war such as was upon us, with shrunken revenues, it would be impossible for the Government to do anything, or, to attack the problem in a courageous way and do what we could to relieve the situation. We determined to relieve the situation and we spent $12,000,000 in providing supplies for the people, fodder for their cattle, and seed grain. I believe that seven and a half million dollars' worth of seed grain went into that district in the following spring. It required some courage to do that, and I venture to say that this expenditure of $12,000,000 so made by the Government has brought in at least $100,000,000 of wealth and has maintained a happy, prosperous, confident population in a district which otherwise would have been partially depopulated; and I believe that practically every dollar of that money will be paid back. It was not handed out as a gift; it was handed out as a loan by this parliament. Gentlemen from the West who are not affiliated with the party to which I belong have concurred with me that probably one hundred million dollars' worth of production had resulted from the action of the Government on that occasion. I am not speaking of this in any boastful way; we did it because it was our duty to do it, and if we had lacked the courage to undertake it at that time we would not have been fit for the positions we hold. I have spoken of its direct benefit to the country, and indirectly it has been of enormous advantage, because of the splendid production in that very district not only last year, but this year as well. Confidence has been re-established. Conditions such as occurred in 1914 are of very infrequent occurrence, and the people of that district may continue in their work of progress and development without undue apprehension.

There is another consideration which I would like to impress upon the House and the country. The commercial and financial stability of Canada during the past two years have been maintained to an extent which was not anticipated by the most optimistic among us two and a half years ago. That has been largely due to two considerations: first, to the abundant crops of the first year, and the high prices obtained therefor, and the still higher prices realized for the less abundant crop of the past year. It is due also to the vast orders for munitions and supplies of various kinds which have come to Canada as a land of great production, and of great possibilities. Without wearying the House with figures, let me allude to the conditions which we find at the close of 1916. The total trade of the country for the twelve months ending 31st December, 1916,—I am including coin and bullion—was as follows: imports, $766,733,991; exports, $1,091,706,403, or a total trade for Canada of $1,850,440,394. I do not wish to be understood as attaching too much importance to these figures. I realize, of course, that a considerable proportion of this amount is due to the higher prices which have been obtained. I realize that a considerable amount of it is due to the production of munitions of war which we cannot expect to continue after the war is over. But even with all these qualifications, it is a remarkable result. I remember when I had been in this House for, I think, four years, in 1900 or 1901, the late Sir Richard Cartwright spoke proudly of the fact that the total trade of this country was approaching the four hundred million mark. I remember precisely his expression —the four hundred million mark. The total trade of this country to-day is approaching the two thousand million mark, and it is very likely that by the 31st of March next it will reach that figure, because I observe that during the first nine months of the present fiscal year, that is the nine months beginning on the 1st day of April and ending on the 31st December last, the total trade of Canada was $1,464,503,766, embracing: imports, $602,873,953, and exports $861,629,813. It is a gratifying feature that the exports of Canada have shown a very large increase over the imports.

For the twelve months ended December 31, 1916, the excess of exports over imports was about $325,000,000, and for the nine months of that period ending December 31, 1916, it was $259,000,000. It will be observed, and it is worthy of note, that the exportation of Canadian products during the first nine months of the present fiscal year exceeded by $300,000,000 the total trade of this country ten years ago. That is a remarkable fact. It indicates that under war conditions the stability and production of the country have been maintained. It is a tribute to the productive power of this country, the industry, activity and enterprise of the people and their ability to take advantage of their opportunities for production.

Now, there are some other departments of the Government that have had unusual duties to perform as well. The Minister of Justice has taken charge of the internment of alien enemies, and he has established camps in various parts of the country. He and the officers of his department have been charged with enforcing the regulations respecting the possession of arms by persons of enemy nationality who are resident in Canada. At the internment camps, which have been established in different parts of the country, work has been provided and from time to time, as labour conditions seemed to render it necessary, aliens, whose character and conduct had been unexceptionable, and who were of good will, have been permitted to engage in the ordinary activities of the country and to earn their own livelihood. In connection with that, I should observe that two camps which I had the opportunity of seeing during my recent tour in aid of National Service, one situated in the northern part of the province of Quebec and the other in the northern part of the province of Ontario, are, as I understand, to be utilized as experimental and demonstration farms, and that the district where they are situate is of a character to indicate that settlement on a considerable scale may be expected there when once it has been shown, as it will be shown by these demonstration farms, that the opportunities for profitable agriculture are very advantageous.

The Royal Northwest Mounted Police have had very important, and somewhat unusual, duties to perform in connection with the war. I do not think too much credit can be given for the good work which that force has done. They have had to use tact and firmness, and the results in certain communities in western Canada, where one might expect some unrest, have been on the whole all that could be expected or even desired.

The Department of Customs has been charged with the recommendation and enforcement of regulations respecting the exportation of articles useful in connection with the war. An enormous amount of responsibility has been imposed on the Government, and chiefly upon the Minister of Customs and his officials, in this respect. There is scarcely a day, and certainly not a week, in which some subject in this connection has not to be taken up. The object, of course, is to restrict to allied countries the exportation of articles which may be of use to the enemy in connection with the war, and to restrict as much as possible the exportation of these articles under any conditions in which they might become of use to the enemy. In the same way questions have sometimes come up with respect to the importation of articles which were of enemy origin in the first instance, but which are absolutely necessary for the maintenance of some Canadian industry essential to the war. All these questions have had to be carefully considered. We have had to take a great many of them up with the British Government, and in all cases the course which we have taken has been in full co-operation with, and has received the approval of, the British Government.

The withdrawal of a very large number of men from industrial activities has sometimes created difficult conditions in regard to labour, its employment and remuneration. I think a very just tribute should be paid to the labour men of Canada in connection with their attitude in such matters. There has been very little industrial disturbance considering the amount which has taken place in some other countries. The Minister of Labour has had unusually severe responsibilities imposed upon him. The Minister of Public Works has ably co-operated on many occasions with the Minister of Labour and has fully shared these responsibilities. The Minister of Labour has also been charged with duties under the provisions of the law which forbid combination to raise prices and the hoarding of commodities for the like purpose. As far as I understand the situation, these two elements are the only ones which the Government can effectually deal with, as conditions created by the war cannot, of course, be controlled by any governmental action.

Then, in common with all the railway systems of the country, the Canadian Government Railways have had to undertake the vastly increased business created by war conditions. They have transported 300,000 soldiers in Canada since the war broke out, and they have done that without any accident.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Far more than that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend the late Minister of Militia and Defence thinks that the estimate that I have given of the number of soldiers transported is too low. I have taken this from some source—I cannot quite remember what. Hospital trains have been established on the Intercolonial Railway for wounded soldiers in connection with the Military Hospitals Commission. The Canadian Government railways have carried more than 250,000 tons of munitions and war stores to St. John and Halifax, and the equipment at St. John and Halifax has been very greatly improved to render possible the handling of the increased monthly tonnage. They have undertaken during the winter months to carry 60,000 tons a month to one port and 20,000 to the other.

Mr. COCHRANE: A hundred thousand.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The tonnage which they have undertaken to transport to the ports of Halifax and St. John during the winter is 100,000 tons per month. It has been necessary to make extensions in the yards and various other improvements at the terminals and at other points and the three new berths at Halifax have been assigned to Canadian overseas transport and will be fully occupied.

Now, I could speak of the work which has been performed, and is being performed, by every department of the Government. I should not omit to mention that which has been undertaken by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has made successful efforts for the use of articles for which there was no ready market. He has undertaken a work of research preparatory to the conditions which will confront us when the war is concluded. He has sent officers specially trained for the purpose into some countries where we might expect to find wider markets in the future, and he has occupied himself generally in the task of inducing the producers of Canada to take into account the conditions which will confront this country when peace shall have been concluded.

I would like to impress upon hon. gentlemen in this House the importance of our realizing those conditions. I shall not speak fully upon this subject to-night. It is possible that some opportunity may come later on when it will be proper to give it more consideration. We shall have to consider the demobilization of 400,000 or 500,000 men and their absorption into the national activities of this country. Do hon. gentlemen realize what the task of demobilizing such a force will mean? Do they realize what a task it will be to transport these men across the Atlantic? If we bring them across the Atlantic at the rate of a thousand a day, if a steamer sails every day, accommodating a thousand of these men, it will take more than a year to bring them back to Canada. Further than that, it would be a very difficult task to absorb them into their former activities in this country if we attempted it at a much greater rate than that.

Then there is the importance of considering the very large number of men at present engaged in the production of munitions in Canada. As I have already said, they number more than 300,000 men. We have the further problem before us of such immigration as may come to this country from Great Britain when the war is ended. It has been the experience, I believe, after former wars, that men have a tendency to go to a new country with the idea of having a different life, a newer life, an outdoor life and so it may be after this war. No one can predict with certainty; but we may have considerable immigration from the British Isles. Undoubtedly the British Government will desire to retain its people in the United Kingdom, and will make every reasonable provision and offer every reasonable inducement to that end. We must not attempt unduly to interfere with such a policy. But the British Government have another policy, which will commend itself to us; and it is this: if there is to be emigration from the British Islands, it should be the duty of the Government of the Mother Country and of the Governments of the overseas dominions to co-operate, so that this emigration may be to a country under our Flag, to one of the overseas dominions of the Empire. We have offered to co-operate, and we shall co-operate, with the British Government for that purpose. We shall also co-operate, and we have offered to co-operate, with the provincial governments of Canada for that purpose. There was a recent conference between the Federal Government and the provincial governments at which these matters were under consideration. The most important purpose that we can have before us with regard to British immigrants as well as our own soldiers returning from the front is that as many as possible of them should settle on the land. It will be the duty of the Dominion Government and of the provincial governments— and I know that they realize this duty—to offer such assistance and such inducements as will make the settlement of these men upon the land a success. That is one of the subjects which I hope to have an opportunity of discussing when I visit Great Britain this winter. I know that any measures which may be taken by the Federal Government for that purpose will have the hearty co-operation, as to purpose at least, of all hon. gentlemen in this House. We may differ as to details and as to methods, but I know there is no one on either side of the House who would not heartily join with the Government in any well devised effort to accomplish such a result.

I shall come in a moment to some of the more direct observations of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, but before doing so, I shall say a word with reference to the paragraph in His Excellency's speech respecting the extension of the Parliamentary term during the period of the war. I do not purpose to argue that question to-night; it would be undesirable that I should do so after what has fallen from my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I simply desire to put my view in a very few words. I stated the reasons for the proposal last year, and as far as my comprehension goes, the reasons which I then advanced are equally cogent to-day. I stated to the House at that time the view which had been taken by the press of the country, the view which had been expressed by certain hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, the view which had been expressed in very cogent terms indeed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, when he emphasized the very great undesirability of having an election during the progress of the war. He went so far, if I remember his language correctly, as to say that while he did not have the greatest possible confidence in the Government of the day he never intended to open the portals of office with a bloody key. Well, the casualties and the perils to-day are not such as to make that observation any less cogent now than it was then. I should like to express one thought I did not express last year, and have hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House take it into account, and it is this: I was at the front in the summer of 1915. Before a general election can take place we shall have perhaps 200,000 or 250,000 or 300,000 men in France. I know something of the conditions at the front, and I venture to put this thought before the House and the country: the men at the front will be not only practically, but actually, disfranchised if an election does take place in this country while they are in the trenches. That is my conviction. I say they would be actually disfranchised because, although I render every tribute to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the committee which had in hand the preparation of the Soldiers Voting Act of 1915, I am not disposed to think that the arrangements made in that Act or in any other act that could be devised are such as to enable those men to vote, or at least any considerable number of them. You cannot predict what conditions may exist. Suppose an election came on in this country when the fiercest drive of the war was taking place. Do you imagine that the paymasters of those regiments and their commanding officers could busy themselves with handing out ballots to men whose souls were engrossed and whose lives were at stake in the enterprise in which they were engaged? There is something more than that. These men at the front have it not in their disposition—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I say that those men at the front have it not in their heart or their soul to consider matters of party controversy under the conditions with which they are there confronted. I believe those men would want to put aside any one who came to talk to them about political issues or partisan controversy, under conditions of life or of death, of victory or of defeat such as confront them in the trenches or while making a drive to bring this war to an end. Further than that, there may be perhaps a hundred thousand men not in France. You might be able to have some of those men vote for Government or for Opposition, not for a candidate, as provided in the Act alluded to; but do you imagine that those men who are putting their lives to the supreme test in going overseas to fight for their country, will be greatly interested in political issues, or that they will desire to hear political speeches, or that they will welcome the distribution of partisan literature? I am not saying whether or not these considerations should determine the issue, but I do say that they are considerations that must be taken into account by every member of this parliament when upon him the responsibility falls as to whether or not there shall be a general election during this war, and I leave it at that.

My right hon. friend has not spoken of the proposal that we should celebrate in Canada the anniversary of a half century of Confederation. I do not propose, nor do I think any member of this House would propose that there should be any spectacular celebration or any considerable expenditure of public money. The celebration should be a grave and serious one, having regard to the great trial through which Canada and the Empire is passing; but it seems to me that it is too notable an event to be permitted to pass without adequate commemoration. When we think of all that has been accomplished in this country in the past fifty years, we have reason to be proud, and to be grateful, and to be humble as well: proud of what has been accomplished; grateful for the magnificent heritage with which Providence has endowed us, and humble because of the very great responsibility that the vastness of that heritage and our duty towards it bestow upon us. And so we should approach the celebration of this anniversary in a reverent spirit. The four scattered, disconnected, disunited provinces have become a mighty nation which has thrown into this war a spirit and an effort that have invested Canada with a new dignity before the world. The fiftieth anniversary of our national life will arrive while we are passing through events, the greatness of which surpasses the most vivid imagination. Those events have already profoundly influenced the spirit of our people. They are continuing so to influence it. We begin to realize, perhaps as never before, that, notwithstanding all our resources, notwithstanding all our material development, notwithstanding all our production and all our wealth, we may be weighed in the balance and found wanting if the character and ideals of the people are not maintained. So I say, it is with a grave and reverent, but with a firm and steadfast spirit that Canada should approach the celebration of her fiftieth anniversary.

I come now in the way of criticism to some of the observations in which my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has indulged this afternoon. He is sure the soldiers have done well; he is not so sure the Government has done well. I understand he expressed himself elsewhere in even stronger terms than that, because I think that, at least at one meeting in which he was assisting in proposals for recruiting, he began his observations by emphasizing his lack of confidence in the Government. I do not think that is a very inspiring topic to enlarge upon at a recruiting meeting, nor do I think a recruiting meeting would be inspired by emphasizing the fact that Great Britain had not come to the aid of France in 1870. We all, however, have our ideas on such matters, and the course taken by my right hon. friend in that regard seemed to commend itself to him. He doubts whether the Government has done well, and he observes that the answer is to be found in certain correspondence that has been made public. He declares that there has been lack of unity and continual jarring and disputing, and he arrives at the conclusion that the interest of the country and the prosecution of the war have suffered materially through that fact. My right hon. friend has had some experience and he can speak with authority on the subject, because we recollect that one of the most prominent colleagues in his own cabinet used to declare publicly, speaking of himself and his colleagues, that they fought like blazes. My right hon. friend is not unaware of the fact that in any cabinet, however constituted, there may be differences of opinion, and that there must be differences of temperament. He seems to find a considerable amount of fault with myself as head of the Government, because he arrives at the conclusion that I have not enough firmness or enough decision. In the course of my public life I have seen some instances which might prevent my right hon. friend from putting his head in the air and talking in that somewhat boastful way, because he evidently intended to institute a comparison between the weakness and lack of decision in the present head of the Government and the firmness and decision which prevailed while he was at the head of the Government. In 1902 I observed in the House of Commons a spectacle which I never saw before, nor do I think that any one else ever saw the like; and that was when his most important colleague in the Government arose in his place in Parliament and openly flouted him to his face, taunting him with his failure to implement his pledges with regard to free trade. The colleague to whom I allude was Sir Richard Cartwright, and if any one doubts it, let him turn to the Hansard of 1902 and observe the statement which Sir Richard Cartwright made on that occasion. My right hon. friend speaks of firmness and decision and the lack of it at present. I did not observe that there was any great firmness or decision on the part of my right hon. friend when it became a question as to what Canada should do to aid the Empire in the South African war. The first pronouncement of my right hon. friend was that not a man nor a gun should go.

An hon. MEMBER: And not a dollar spent.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Practically that. I will not say that is the language, but it was an announcement to the country which produced such an outburst that my right hon. friend, notwithstanding his firmness and decision, came to the conclusion that men should go, and men did go to the extent in two years of about five thousand, the British Government being called upon to undertake their maintenance and support after they left the shores of Canada. That did not end the matter. There were two factions, and the other faction becoming restless under those conditions, my right hon. friend was obliged, in order to placate it, to pass an order in council that this should not be construed as a precedent that Canada was to take any part in the future wars of the Empire. And having said that no men should go, and then afterwards having consented that some men should go provided that Great Britain undertook to maintain them after they left our shores, and thereafter having declared by order in council that this should not be regarded as a precedent, my right hon. friend seems to think that on that occasion he gave an illustration of what firmness and decision should be.

When this war broke out, and before my colleagues had assembled in Ottawa, I took upon myself the responsibility of saying to the British Government that Canada would stand in this war to the end with the British Empire. That was my decision then; and I was ready to stand or fall by it, I am ready to stand or fall by it to-day.

I do not want to waste very much time over the question of who has the most firmness or the most decision, but I am perfectly willing to compare records with my right hon. friend in that regard. The order in council was passed, as I have said, that it should not be a precedent. Well, I am bound to say, it was not a precedent for me. I took the ground that Canada would not only throw herself into this struggle to the full extent of her energies in support of the Empire and of all that the Empire means to the world, but that we should maintain our men at the front and thus bear our share—that Canada would keep up her own expeditionary force. My hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) was good enough to pay his respects to me also on this subject and to allude to the head of the Government as a very weak and undecided person; and to explain that if the leader of the Opposition had been in my place he would have called up the Minister of Militia and Defence on the telephone and dismissed him.

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Well, something very much of that kind.

Mr. GRAHAM: I said he would have called the Minister of Militia and Defence to the office, and if he could not give a reasonable explanation, would have dismissed him.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend (Mr. Graham) must realize that the leader of his Government may perhaps have treated him in one way while he treated more important colleagues in another way. He did not deal with Sir Richard Cartwright, nor Sir Oliver Mowat, nor Sir Henri Joly, nor the Hon. W. S. Fielding, in that way. If my hon. friend is speaking from experience, none of us has reason to doubt his word. "No unity of thought or action" says the right hon. gentleman. I do not think there has been less unity of thought or action in this Administration than there was in that over which my right hon. friend presided. I want to tell him that so far as I am concerned, I have been loyal to every one of my colleagues, and every one of my colleagues, so far as I know and as I most thoroughly and sincerely believe, has been loyal to me. So far as the late Minister of Militia and Defence is concerned, I gave him my loyal support, I gave him, I believe, as free a hand in connection with the conduct of the war as any other minister ever had or as any could desire. I supported him in every possible way. And if he is under an impression to the contrary, he is under a wrong impression.

The criticism to which the leader of the Opposition addressed himself was that there was no immediate decision as to Canadian or British Control. Control of what? Our men at the front are under a British officer, Sir Douglas Haig. They are immediately under Sir Julian Byng. So far as control and direction of them as a military body is concerned, they must, of course, be under the same control and direction as the rest of the British forces. So far as promotions and appointments at the front are concerned, these should necessarily come with the sanction, approval, and recommendation of the higher officers in command. It would be a dangerous and unfortunate course for this Government to undertake by interference in such matters to hamper or impede military operations.

Mr. MACDONALD: What about our forces while in Great Britain?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As I understand it, the control there has been maintained in Canada. The difficulty of the late Minister of Militia and Defence, so far as I remember, was owing to an order in council, which, it appeared, had not been brought to his attention and by which the Canadian officer commanding in England had greater powers than the Minister of Militia and Defence thought reasonable. When he brought the subject to the attention of Council, an order in council was passed amending it, and the order in council so passed remained in force up to the time he went out of office.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And also in France. Under the order in council that was rescinded, the officer commanding in France, General Alderson, had absolute authority.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not propose to enter into a discussion as to whether he was right or wrong. There was an order in council to which the late Minister of Militia and Defence took exception, thinking that he should have more control, and it was amended upon his initiative and recommendation so as to give him increased control over appointments both in Great Britain and in France.

Now, I desire to say a word as to equipment. In the early months of the war, a difficulty naturally arose because the transport and equipment were not of precisely the same type as those in Great Britain as I understand it—and, of course, I speak without the intimate knowledge of such matters possessed by the officers of the department, and, doubtless, by my hon. friend, the late Minister of Militia and Defence. It is important for an army at the front to have a uniform standard of equipment, transport, and everything else. Otherwise, it is necessary to have supplies of the different types of transport and equipment in the ordnance stores behind the front, and this is a hindrance to military operations. I believe that some equipment supplied was left when the first Canadian contingent departed for France. I have spoken of that in this House before. I discussed the matter with General Carson when I was in England last year. He told me that the equipment was left because it was not of the same type as the British equipment and they did not desire to have two types. He took what seemed a proper and reasonable course. He called a board, on which both Canada and Great Britain were represented, for the purpose of inquiring whether this equipment had been left because it was not a good equipment or because it was not uniform with the other. He told me that the board declared that it was good equipment. And it was taken over and used in the British Islands, and Canada received full credit for the value of it. It is most desirable, if the troops from Canada and from the rest of the Empire are to fight side by side, that all equipment and transport should be standardized, for it is obvious that otherwise operations cannot be carried on so effectively. It might have been better if that matter had been taken into consideration before the war. It was not taken into consideration under the administration of my right hon. friend. I am not saying that by way of reproach, because I suppose no one could have anticipated war upon so tremendous a scale in which Canada would be called upon to take so great a part.

I believe that not only with respect to equipment but with respect to arms, guns and ammunition as well as the Mother Country and the great dominions of the Empire ought to confer and co-operate and select uniform types, and that these types ought to be produced not only in the United Kingdom but in every one of the great dominions of the Empire. I hope also that a rifle to be called the Imperial service rifle may be adopted by the Mother Country and each of the great dominions after necessary expert examination and after consultation between the military authorities of Great Britain and the overseas dominions, so that in the future, in case the need for participation in war should arise, we should not have occasion to discuss differences in arms, transport, equipment or any other matter.

My right hon. friend read some portions of this correspondence; I shall not allude to that very much further. He referred to some remarks with regard to the Military Hospitals Commission, the Pensions Commission and the National Service Commission which had been made by my hon. friend the late Minister of Militia and Defence. So far as the Military Hospitals Commission is concerned, I do not think there is any absurdity connected with that. As I have already pointed out, it was established upon the initiative of the ex-minister himself. If there is any absurdity connected with the Pensions Commission, it is an absurdity that must be visited upon the whole House of Commons, because that Pensions Commission was appointed upon the report of a committee of this House, unanimously affirmed by the vote of this House. As to the National Service Commission, at the time the observations were made it had not really gone into operation at all. My right hon. friend states that he desires to discuss that commission on some other occasion. I shall be very happy to have him do so and to go into the matter fully then.

With respect to the alleged interference of the Canadian High Commissioner in military affairs, I am not aware of any such interference. I have telegraphed him from time to time asking him to get into communication with the War Office in respect of matters that required the co-operation of the two governments, and whenever I have asked him to do this he has done it. Outside of that, I am not aware that he has personally interfered at all. So far as Lord Kitchener's opinion is concerned, I note what my hon. friend read from the correspondence, but certainly I can say that in my interview with Lord Kitchener in 1915 he never expressed any such opinion to me.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The date to which reference was made was in October, 1914, when Lord Kitchener expressed himself as of the opinion that these troops were British regulars. Will the First Minister not say that I informed him immediately on my return to Canada on that subject?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have no recollection of it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Of my telling the right hon. gentleman what Lord Kitchener and the High Commissioner—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really have no recollection of it. I do not say it did not occur; I really have no recollection of it. I am only saying that in his consultation with me Lord Kitchener did not express any such opinion, nor did I find on the part of the War Office or on the part of any of the officials over there any desire to override Canada or Canadian interests. I can say that most sincerely; I have never discovered on the part of the British Government, the British War Office or any of the officials with whom I came in touch over there a disposition to override or to disregard Canadian interests.

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I ask another question?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Certainly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the First Minister a recollection of an objection being made to Colonel Steele, now General Steele, commanding the Second Division?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have a recollection of a question being raised as to whether his years were not so advanced that he could not stand the work at the front, and I have a recollection also that my hon. friend concurred in that view.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the right hon. First Minister wants me to give an explanation, I can do it, but not now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will have to make, of course, any explanation he may see fit. I certainly understood him at the time to concur in that view.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The correspondence will show it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know what the correspondence shows; I have not looked at it. It is certainly my recollection that my hon. friend concurred in that view. Every one realizes the great ability and the splendid record of General Steele as a soldier. The only question raised to me from first to last, so far as I remember, was as to whether his years were not so advanced that it would be putting too much upon him to entrust him with the command which has been alluded to.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Perhaps it would be just as well if I should set it right now. At the time Colonel Steele was selected to command the Second Division positive objection were made to him that he was unfit—whether it was the question of his age or not. After he had a severe fall from his horse and had one shoulder broken, and after another injury at Shorncliffe, when the question of going over with the division was up, that was the time I agreed that General Steele was not physically fitted to go. Up to that time I had maintained that he was qualified to go.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not charge my mind with these details. The distinct impression I had was that when the time came to appoint an officer in command of that division my hon. friend the late Minister of Militia and Defence concurred in the view that it would not be prudent or fair to General Steele to ask him to accept that command.

With regard to British officers scrapping equipment merely for the reason that it was Canadian, not British, I am not disposed to think that anything of the kind could have taken place. I believe that if any of our equipment was put to one side it was for the reason that uniformity in equipment was necessary at the front. If any incidents of a contrary nature ever occurred I cannot recall them at the moment. So far as I am concerned, there has not been in the past, nor will there be in the future any failure to uphold Canadian interests in every respect in connection with this war. On the other hand, I do not propose, I have not proposed in the past, and I do not propose in the future to set up my judgment or the judgment of this Government against the opinion of military experts who may say that it is necessary that the type of equipment, of transport, or of anything else necessary in this war ought to be uniform and that the war cannot be carried on effectively unless it is uniform. If the military authorities, men of experience and good judgment in that regard, reach that conclusion, certainly I do not purpose setting up my judgment against it. Subject to that, I am sure that the members of this House and the people of this country may be satisfied that all Canadian interests in this war will be thoroughly upheld by those who are responsible for the administration of affairs to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am very much interested, apart from the question of difference between the late hon. Minister of Militia and the right hon. gentleman, in knowing exactly, in the interests of the men overseas, who are the controlling forces to-day with regard to promotions, appointments and other matters affecting the men overseas in Great Britain before they go across to France.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as I understand, the recommendations would come in the ordinary way from the commanding officers, and the overseas minister would recommend them to the Governor in Council, and they would be gazetted accordingly.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then Sir George Perley has control?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He would receive the recommendation of his officers, and make his recommendations to the Governor in Council; that is as I understand it.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. MACDONALD: Then the Canadian Minister of Militia has nothing to do with it; it is directed entirely by Sir George Perley?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would be dealt with by Sir George Perley because the forces over there are under his direction, and he has the same duties in regard to them as the Minister of Militia has in regard to the forces in Canada. There is, of course, wherever necessary, consultation and co-operation.

My right hon. friend has spoken of the war conference, and he has suggested a possible constitutional difficulty. I am bound to say that I do not know precisely what that can be. The War Cabinet, I suppose, could call to their conference any member of the Privy Council. The British Cabinet has called members of the Privy Council who are not members of the Government to their deliberations. I believe there was a precedent for that many years ago. There was a precedent for it in 1915. There was a precedent for it in 1916. I attended a meeting of the British Cabinet in 1915. Mr. Hughes of Australia attended several meetings, I believe, in 1916, and the fact that the present British Cabinet is a small Cabinet, a so-called War Cabinet, does not in any way raise a constitutional difficulty. My right hon. friend has alluded to the wide scope of the conference, to the wide scope of the subjects which are to be discussed at the conference; and certainly they have an exceedingly wide scope. It is for that reason that I sent the telegram which my right hon. friend has read. The subjects to be discussed are: first, urgent questions relating to the prosecution of the war; second, the conditions upon which the allied governments may assent to its termination; and thirdly, the problems which will then immediately arise. There really seems to be little left out of it; the prosecution of the war, the terms upon which peace may be made, and the problems that will then immediately arise. Because the scope was so comprehensive I asked for more information. It has not yet arrived. If it should be of a character that may properly be laid on the table of the House, I shall have no hesitation whatever in acquainting the House with its purport.

My right honourable friend has alluded to the arrangements that may be made in connection with my visit. It is difficult to say at the moment just what the best arrangement might be. On the one hand, I should not desire, if it could be avoided, to put the members of this House to the inconvenience of a summer session. On the other hand, I thoroughly appreciate the spirit which my right. hon. friend has shown in making the suggestion which he has been good enough to lay before me, and I thank him very sincerely for it. I think it is a very considerate proposal on his part, and he may be sure that I shall take it into account, and consult with him respecting it. It seems to me that there can be no reasonable objection to it, but, on the spur of the moment, I cannot speak very definitely in that regard, and I should require to consult my colleagues with reference to it. It is perhaps desirable during an important session such as this, when measures of a very grave nature are to be proposed, that the Prime Minister of the country should be present while these matters are under discussion. Without desiring to attach any undue importance to my presence here, I believe that honourable gentlemen will see some force in the suggestion which my right hon. friend has made. On the other hand, I do not see that it would be at all proper for me to refuse the call to attend this conference. How useful it may be, remains to be determined in the future; but the call having come, I feel that one in my position must obey it without a moment's hesitation, putting aside all other considerations. And so it may be that the members of this House will have to be put to some inconvenience. I am sure that, if that inconvenience should arise, they will not take it into great account, considering the hardships, the sacrifices that are being made by hundreds of thousands of our own countrymen in the effort to win this war.

With respect to the questions that are to be discussed, it is apparent to my right honourable friend, as it must be to all the members of this House, that I cannot give much information as to the determinations which may be reached. With regard to the prosecution of the war, I can give the conference this firm assurance: that the people of this country are united in their determination to throw all their efforts into the war, and to bring it to that conclusion which alone can bring about a lasting peace.

As to the conditions of peace, the second subject mentioned, my right hon. friend has expressed his opinion with regard to their general character. I am satisfied, and I think the people of this country will be satisfied, to abide by the conclusion which has already been announced by the British Government, that peace will only be granted upon the condition of reparation for the past and guarantees for the future. It is quite impossible for those responsible for this war to make reparation in the highest or fullest sense. Of course, they cannot make reparation to the allied nations, nor indeed to their own people, for all the lives that have been lost, for all the blood that has been shed in their attempt to dominate the world. More than that, I do not suppose that it would be possible for the resources even of the great German nation to make reparation for all the material injury that has been caused in this war. I do not believe that that would be possible; but certain reparation must come. It must come to those people in Belgium who have seen their whole country desolated and devastated. It must come to those people in Belgium who by the hundred thousand have been dragged from their homes into practical slavery under conditions that have shocked the conscience of the whole world and are arousing the most intense feeling among neutral nations to-day. They must make reparation to Serbia. They must make reparation to those countries that they have devastated and desolated, and so far as may be possible—I do not say how far this may be possible—they ought to make reparation for the material losses suffered by those countries whose territory has not been invaded.

First there must be reparation for the past and then guarantees for the future. I absolutely agree with what my right hon. friend said this afternoon, and what I, myself have said more than once, that all the sacrifices that we have made, all the blood that has been shed, all the treasure that has been poured out, would not only be in vain but would be absolutely worse than useless, if we did not bring about a peace with such guarantees as will ensure the world against any such aggression in the future. I say more than that. I say that not only the allied nations but all the neutral nations of the world are profoundly and deeply interested in the conclusion of a peace such as that. You cannot carry on a war under modern conditions which does not touch the whole world. Modern means of communication have brought the whole world together and no nation, no continent, can in future be a hermit. A great world devastating war like this is bound to affect profoundly not only the countries that are engaged in it but neutral nations as well. Therefore, it is to the absolute interest of all the neutral nations of the world that, we do not consent to a truce but consent only to a peace which shall be lasting and permanent and which shall be safeguarded by effective guarantees.

That is the only kind of peace that will be of use to the world, to civilization, to humanity. I have spoken of the interests of the allied nations, I have spoken of the interests of the neutral nations, I will go farther than that, and say that no peace would be of any advantage to Germany herself unless it was a peace of that character and secured by such guarantees. In the interest of the whole world, it is essential that this peace shall be upon an absolutely permanent foundation and that an assurance shall be given not only to the allied nations but to all neutral nations, to humanity and to civilization itself that such attempts at aggression and world domination shall not be renewed in the future. If I go from you with any mandate, I believe I go from you with that mandate to the British Islands and to the allied nations.

We heard only the other day of a suggestion by Germany that there should be a round table conference at the Hague to bring the war to a conclusion, without any proposals as to terms to be discussed, without any proposition whatever except that there should be a conference. Sir Edward Grey pleaded, almost begged for a conference before this war broke out. What was the answer? You know the answer that was given by the German Emperor. The like answer that was given by the Austrian government. No discussion, said the spokesman of the Austrian Government to the British Ambassador at Vienna, could be accepted on the basis of the Serbian note, a note which had humiliated Serbia to a greater extent than any civilized, self-respecting nation had ever been humiliated before, a note which involved the acceptance of terms of a most astonishing character. What was the answer?

> No discussion could be accepted on the basis of the Serbian note; war would be declared to-day; and that the well-known pacific character of the Emperor, as well as his own—

That is the Speaker himself, the man who was uttering these words—

> —might be accepted as a guarantee that the war was just and inevitable.

It is these men who suggest to-day that there should be a round table conference. The time for such a conference was before the war, which they forced upon the world after a quarter of a century of preparation.

I spoke this afternoon of the fortunes of war during the past year. One point which I forgot to mention is probably influencing Germany and Austria more profoundly in their desire for peace than any other. Apart from all matters touching the organization and numbers of armies, the Germans realize that the industrial resources which Great Britain has thrown into this war have produced already, and will increasingly produce in the future, such a superiority in artillery and in all modern devices necessary to carry on this war that their day has passed by. They realize more fully than ever that when they failed to win this war in the first six months all chances of winning it passed forever from them. It is for the same reason that the allied nations have entered the new year with renewed confidence and strengthened determination. When the war broke out the enemy nations confronted us with marked superiority in the forces which they could throw immediately into the struggle, with more effective and speedy methods of mobilization, with an overwhelming preponderance in guns, rifles, equipment and munitions of war and in all the mechanical devices without which no army can fight on equal terms under modern conditions. Looking back for two years, it is a matter of profound astonishment that the Germans did not succeed in what they intended to accomplish and had so carefully planned. The British army, relatively insignificant in numbers, but magnificent in discipline and pluck and in efficiency, which went to France in August, 1914, was one of the chief factors in defeating the German purpose. In all the annals of that army there is no more glorious page than that which describes the achievements of the First British Expeditionary Force. The German onrush was stayed and was converted into retreat. Since then the line has been extended in the western theatre from the North Sea to Switzerland and the opposing forces have been closely locked in a struggle which has not yet terminated; but the superiority of the Germans in men, in equipment, in munitions of war, has passed away. We are at least on equal terms to-day, and every moment of the future will bring to us increasing superiority. German shells ten to one against us in 1915. British shells ten to one against the Germans in the Somme advance. And it was in that advance that the Canadians proved themselves so splendidly effective in the offensive. Facing overwhelming superiority in men and in artillery, against the most horrible and unexpected methods of warfare they had held their own in the defensive, whether at Ypres in the spring and summer of 1915, or in the Ypres salient during the early summer of 1916. Their attack was as sudden and smashing as their defence had been stubborn and inflexible.

The first trench raid was organized by Canadians—a British Columbia regiment. The first daylight trench raid was also organized by Canadians—an Ontario regiment. The officers who organized and carried out this raid were sent by the British Commander-in-Chief to explain and illustrate to the officers in the British army the preparation which had been made and the methods by which the raids had been carried out. In that connection I might read for the information of the House, a telegram which came in this evening from the Canadian War Records office and which is the latest news from the front.

It is dated London, Jan. 22, and is as follows:

To Militia, Ottawa.

The following communique is from Canadian war records office, London. The past week has been one of normal trench warfare. Normal trench warfare of to-day, however, is very different to the normal trench warfare of a year ago. Everywhere the ascendency of our troops over the enemy is most marked. The evidence of prisoners is the most eloquent testimony to the ascendency of our patrols, while bombardments of the enemy's lines which a year ago would have merited a detailed description as important operations are to-day affairs of almost daily occurrence. This continual activity of our artillery and infantry has undoubtedly weakened the morale of the enemy, and is paving the way for victories to come. A great feature in the life of the men at the front is the training which they carry out when in reserve. There is a vigor and purpose about this training which is quite remarkable. Men who have faced the enemy in battle appear to realize what training will mean to them, and by this training, the purpose of which is constantly in the minds of all, the sure seeds of victory are being sown.

Mr. Speaker, the story of our achievement in this war is not less glorious than that of the men from the British Isles, and the other Dominions. Thus it will be to the end. Canada has sent of her best and of her bravest to uphold a cause which appealed most impressively to the soul of her people. It is literally and absolutely true that the fight for this Dominion, for all the traditions, ideals and institutions which are the heritage of its people is being fought beyond the seas, on the plains of France and Belgium. If that battle is lost our future is lost. If it ends even in a truce or a draw, on what can we count or rely for future security? Would Canada be anything more than a pawn in the hands of a combination of enemy nations that had successfully withstood Great Britain, France and Russia? But that battle will not be lost. In the first year the Allies held the enemy, and could do no more. Opportunity for victory passed from the Germans in the first six months of the war. The second year was for the Allies almost wholly a year of preparation. The third year, upon which we have now entered, will be the year of action, of victory and of peace. Then Canada with loftier ideals, more inspiring memories and more glorious traditions will take up her peaceful task anew, upbuilding the splendid structure of her national life upon the eternal foundation of her devotion and sacrifice.

On motion of Mr. E. M. Macdonald, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 9.49 p.m.

Tuesday, January 23, 1917.

The House met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That the name of the Hon. P. E. Blondin be added to the standing committee appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House under Rule 10.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General approving minute of Council appointing the Hon. William James Roche, Minister of the Interior and Superintendent General of Indian Affairs; the Hon. John Dowsley Reid, Minister of Customs; the Hon. Albert E. Kemp, Minister of Militia and Defence, and the Hon. Pierre Edouard Blondin, Postmaster General, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as a Commission under the provisions of the Eleventh Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, intituled, "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Copies of Orders in Council relating to National Service.—Sir Robert Borden.

Eleventh Report of the Board of Railway Commissioners.—Hon. Mr. Cochrane.

Report of War Purchasing Commission.—Hon. Mr. Kemp.

Shipping List for Canada for the year ended December 31, 1915; also Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for fiscal year 1915-16.—Hon. Mr. Hazen.

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT BILL.

Bill No. 3 to amend the Criminal Code and to abolish Capital Punishment.—Mr. Bickerdike.—Read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT—RE-MARRIAGE OF DIVORCED PERSONS.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John, N.B.): moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. WILCOX: Explain.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This Bill is the same as that introduced at the last session by Mr. Martin of Regina. It stood for the second reading, and I, and I think Mr. Martin as well, had conversations with the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the Hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) in reference to it being considered by a committee to which it was proposed there would be submitted certain other amendments to the Criminal Code.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What is the nature of the Bill?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It adds to the provisions of the Criminal Code, section 307, in reference to criminal prosecutions for bigamy and other similar offences. Section 307 of the Act is rather peculiar in some respects and quite deficient in its provision to prevent cases of injustice arising. Sub-section 3 provides:

> No one commits bigamy by going through a form of marriage if he or she has been divorced from the bond of first marriage.

The courts of this country have held that that means a divorce obtained in Canada, and that it would not apply to the case of a divorce obtained in a foreign country.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In Canada alone or within the Empire?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not sure as to that. The decisions, I think, are limited to countries which are foreign to the Empire. I do not know about divorces obtained in countries forming part of the Empire, but not in Canada. Paragraph 4 provides:

> No person shall be liable to be convicted of bigamy in respect of having gone through a form of marriage in a place not in Canada, unless such person, being a British subject resident in Canada, leaves Canada with intent to go through such form of marriage.

Under the law as it now is, if a divorce were obtained in a foreign country and a marriage were to take place in that country the party would not be liable for bigamy unless he or she actually went there with the intention of getting married. My hon. friend will see what opportunities for evasion that would present. The Bill which I propose provides for the case of a bona fide divorce obtained from a court having competent jurisdiction and obtained by a party who has become, although previously a resident of Canada, a bona fide resident of such foreign country, residence to be continued at least for a period of one year before divorce proceedings have been instituted. Then there must be notice given to the husband or wife, as the case may be. The divorce must be obtained on a full statement of facts and the marriage must not take place until the expiration of two years from the time of obtaining the divorce. In cases of that kind the Bill provides that there shall be no criminal proceedings instituted by reason of the subsequent marriage. I think it is desirable that proper safeguards should be thrown around cases of this nature in order to prevent scandals which sometimes arise, but instances have come to my knowledge, and they had also come to the knowledge of the then hon. member for Regina, where, when divorces have been obtained bona fide by residents of a foreign country and the parties deciding to return to Canada, criminal proceedings might have been taken both for bigamy and for adultery. When the Bill has passed its second reading it might be referred to a special committee, who might consider it in reference to the whole of the law bearing on the subject.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is it merely residence that my hon. friend contemplates, or actual domicile?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Bona fide residence for a period of two years. It might be made to cover only the case of domicile if it be thought desirable.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE.

CORRECTION OF STATEMENT IN TORONTO GLOBE.

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. WILCOX: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I see that I am reported in the Toronto Globe of yesterday as having made a statement which is inaccurate. The Globe states:—

> Mr. Wilcox's Information is Not All Reliable.
> If Mr. Wilcox is correctly quoted in the Ottawa despatches as to the conditions surrounding racing in his constituency of South Essex and elsewhere, he has got much of his information from very unreliable sources, and the following statement, ascribed to him, is full of inaccuracies: "The tracks at Windsor are operated by the American Turf Association. They operate in Mexico, just over the boundary line, about a mile from El Paso, and also in Florida in winter time."

I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I never said in this House or out of it that the tracks in my constituency were operated by the American Turf Association. What I did say is that they are predominated by American influence. I want to say further that I do not want to assume the responsibility of correcting all the inaccuracies that may appear in the columns of the Toronto Globe, but it affords me unbounded pleasure to correct this one.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. G. C. Wilson (Wentworth) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Monday, January 22.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate you, Sir, upon your selection to fill the very high and distinguished office of first Commoner of Canada. Coming as you do from the same province as I do and representing a constituency in close proximity to my own; enjoying as I have all my life the privilege of your acquaintance, I beg to say that I have every confidence that you will maintain the high traditions which have characterized the public men who in the past have shed lustre on this office, and that we look to you to act with distinction and fairness. I desire also to express my satisfaction and pleasure with the high character of the addresses which have been delivered by the hon. mover (Mr. G. C. Wilson) and seconder (Mr. Descarries) of the Address.

The Speech from the Throne does not contain very many subjects which can be said to be matters of controversial discussion. I am glad to know that the Government have recalled the fact that we are nearing the conclusion of fifty years of our national life, and that on the first of July of this present year Canada will be, or should be, celebrating her golden jubilee. Personally, not knowing the proposals which the Government intend to submit to the House in regard to what I assume will be a matter of the special marking of the day, I am unable to say whether these will be approved or not.

Believing as I do, that the event is one which though we are in the midst of war should be commemorated by our people, believing that there is no land like our land, and that it is our duty as representatives of a free people to see that the administration of affairs in this country is fair to the boys who are fighting for us, but also to prepare a condition of affairs in this land that will be worthy of them when they come home again, I think, Sir, that the event should be marked in some special way throughout every portion of this wide Dominion.

We are told that a conference has been proposed between the War Council at the seat of Empire and the premiers of the overseas dominions. I am sure the country will approve of the attitude adopted by the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) yesterday, when he expressed the readiness of all who sit on this side of the House to facilitate in every possible way the attendance of the representative of Canada at that conference. It must be noted that some criticism has been made in Great Britain of the fact that although a change of Government took place there only two months ago with the object of a more vigorous prosecution of the war, and the narrowing down of its control to one or two people, it is now suggested that the Premiers of the overseas dominions be added to that council, that they may assist in considering the great problem of how the war is to be won. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman who will speak for Canada will be able to give any assistance in bringing about that great consummation which we all hope for. I do not know whether this country gives him any mandate so far as this conference is concerned, other than to say to the Mother Country that Canada stands behind her until victory is won. But as regards questions other than those immediately concerned with the winning of the war, it would seem to me as a Canadian that Canada will await with interest the deliberations of that conference, reserving to itself as a people and to this Parliament as a Parliament the right of determining what is in her own best interests as one of the self-governing dominions of this Empire.

Over and above every consideration which might appeal to this Parliament at this time is the question of the war. For thirty long months the sad hearts of the people of this country have watched its weary progress. We had yesterday from the two leaders in this House a resumé of the events of the past year, and I am sure, after the figures given by the Prime Minister, that over 310,000 of our sons are now overseas, over 400,000 of our men enlisted, and over 700,000 of our people engaged either in fighting or in work pertaining to the war, we must all realize that there is not a hamlet in this broad land but what is seriously thinking of the terrible consequences of this fateful and world-wide contest. So that the administration of this Government in regard to matters pertaining to the war must be our first interest. If they have failed to do that which they ought to have done, or have done those things which they ought not to have done, the people of this country will expect their representatives in Parliament, without any limitations or reserve whatever, boldly to arraign at the bar of public opinion the conduct of this Government, in order to see whether the right has been done. It must be remembered that this Government is practically the only one among the free peoples of the Empire that maintains during the war a purely partisan attitude in regard to the conduct of its affairs. We have witnessed the changes that have taken place in the Mother Country, where at the mere solicitation of the men who were in control two changes of administration have already taken place, with the object of securing greater efficiency; and we have witnessed the changes that have taken place in other parts of the Empire. I should like to call your attention, Sir, to a statement showing Australia's position, and how that country does business in regard to the war. To quote:

> The essentials of the Australian system are: (1). The War Minister is a political administrator and does not attempt to be an active military officer.

I might remark in passing that there exists on the statute book a provision that there shall be a certain military officer in supreme command of the forces of this Dominion. We have heard of General Hutton, of General Lake and of General Mackenzie, all very distinguished Imperial officers, but who in this country has heard of their successor in this war? There is a general named General Gwatkin, who fills that position to-day. But has the Government given to general Gwatkin, as the Australian Government has given to their chief military officer, exclusive control of the Army? In Australia control is left entirely to a military man, and I think it might be well, having regard to conditions in Australia, for this Government to consider whether or not they have an efficient military head of the forces of this Dominion; and if they have not one, they had better get one immediately, and place in his hands exclusive control of our military affairs. The Australian system provides:

> Political patronage is avoided, and politics are shut out of the army.

My right hon. friend might take a leaf out of Premier Hughes' book—I do not mean Sir Sam Hughes' book—and follow the practice they have in Australia of keeping politics out of the Army. The statement continues:

> Australians are not afraid to give individuals considerable powers in administrative work, such as purchasing supplies. Good men are picked for their posts, are made responsible and are judged by what they do. The knife falls quickly on the incompetent or unreliable.

That is a brief statement of how the Australian Commonwealth is dealing with the war, which I offer for the illumination and consideration of my right hon. friend and his colleagues. But my right hon. friend, disregarding all these considerations and the example of other countries, has from the beginning of the war assumed that because he happened to be in power when the war began, and because an extension of the parliamentary term was given for war purposes, he has been given the absolute right to proceed along the old lines of partisanship and patronage which have always characterized his administration. That, it seems to me, is not right; for in this country there has been no monopoly of patriotism in this fight. The boys have gone forth from the homes of men of all political views in this country, without any regard whatever to political affiliations, eager to play their part in the interest of their native land in this great battle of democracy against autocracy. We on this side of the House and the people whom we represent in this country have proved our loyalty by more than word of mouth. Sitting not far away from me are three men, the hon. member for Edmonton (Hon. Frank Oliver), the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Cruise), and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), the fathers of three sturdy lads who went out from their western homes to do battle and, if necessary, to die for the triumph of the eternal right. These boys have solved the great mystery. Beneath the blood-stained soil of France their bones are lying and they are at rest, careless alike of the sunshine or of the storm; of the summer days, or of the wild shrill noise of the shrapnel on winter nights. Around me are twenty-six or more men whose boys to-day are either on the battle-line or on their way there. When I say to you, Sir, that, from the farm, the workshop, the office and the cottage throughout all the land the men we represent here have given of their best for this cause, one does not need to apologize in this free Parliament for anything one may say as to the rights of these boys, as to the way in which they are treated, or as to the administration of this Parliament in regard to them. We are here to ask that the greatest intelligence, the keenest attention, the strictest integrity and the highest ideals should characterize the administration of the affairs of this country at this time. Any departure from that high ideal deserves and must receive from us and from this free people the severest condemnation. In order to effect the winning of this war, the marshalling of our resources in men and supplies and the elimination of graft, patronage, and favouritism are the very least that we, on this side of the House, have a right to ask from this Government which has administered matters in this partisan fashion.

During the last thirty months the members of this Government have been very sensitive to criticism. Although they have conducted everything from a party standpoint, they seem to regard any kind of criticism that comes from those who are interested in the successful solution of the great question of the war as a species of lèse majesté. The offender must be arraigned, attached and impeached, the moment he makes any suggestion as to improvement in the administration. I commend to my right hon. friend some criticism which has been made of the English Government in this regard which is so applicable to the conduct of this Government that it will bear repetition in this House, and I am sure the hon. gentlemen will agree with me that it is peculiarly applicable to the gentlemen who at present sit on the treasury benches. A writer in Blackwood's Magazine says:

> Indeed, it is not only in the field of foreign affairs that our present Government shows its incapacity. Whatever it attempts it bungles miserably. If it be true to any one principle, that principle is hostility to Great Britain and British interests. With a false magnanimity our ministers are ready to abandon the fruits of victory to anybody whose lips ask to taste them. They affect a loftiness of spirit which is more nearly allied to laziness than to humanity. They seem, indeed, to suffer, one and all, from an atrophy of purpose, an inability to make up their mind, which are doubtless the proper result of a political training. It may be that the conflicting members of the Cabinet reduce it always by their differences of opinion to an inactive condition of stable equilibrium.

That phrase in which atrophy of purpose is said to exist in the British Government is especially applicable to honourable gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches. There are conflicting opinions amongst the members of the Cabinet. The ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) has told us of two members of the Cabinet who were continually opposing him. The Prime Minister rather avoided coming to close quarters with the ex-Minister of Militia; he rather avoided and side-stepped an encounter and he intimated that he did not care to discuss these serious questions, although charges of the greatest magnitude, involving the lives of our soldiers, the care of the wounded, and the possible loss to this country of millions of dollars had been made by the ex-Minister of Militia. The writer in Blackwood's goes on to say:

> That is to find the kindest explanation for their many futilities. The more probable cause of their failure to govern the country, or to conduct the war with spirit, is a feeling of security. Whatever happens, it sems to them that their offices are safe. They believe that they are the best suited to carry on the war. Why, then, should they bestir themselves? They are indispensable, in their own eyes, and irreplacable, and must on no account be disturbed in the enjoyment of what they believe to be their divine rights.

I am not quite sure that there are not sitting on the treasury benches at this moment certain hon. gentlemen who are actuated by those feelings which the writer of Blackwood's describes, namely, that they are perfectly satisfied that they have a divine right to govern this country, and Sir, because they so believe, we have the incapacity which has characterized the administration of this war from its beginning. In times of peace mistakes may be made which can be readily remedied, but in times of war mistakes cannot be made without their leading to results which are irreparable, and which may mean not only the loss of thousands of dollars to the country, but the loss of hundreds of noble lives that might have been spared.

Last night, the Prime Minister in dealing with questions which arose in this debate seemed to assume to himself very great credit on account of the increase of trade that had come to Canada. My right hon. friend was very profuse in his compliments to his Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). Whether the Minister of Finance should be placated or not is a matter which the right hon. gentleman knows far better than I do, but the marked distinction between his reference to his colleague the Minister of Finance and his reference to his colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), of whom the best that he could say was that in the administration of the war he was occasionally assisting the Minister of Labour in doing some things, attracted the attention of the House, and I am quite sure will attract the attention of the country. My right hon. friend chose to assume that the fact that there had been an increase of trade during the past year was something for which the Minister of Finance should be given credit. The Minister of Finance, I think the House will agree with me, had very little to do with it; but if he did have anything to do with it, what a sad reflection he must have. It is only five years ago that we were told we would have no truck nor trade with the Yankees; that it would be a horrible crime, a sin against our loyalty to the Empire, if we bought and sold anything more in the United States than we were then doing. Where does the great increase of trade come from of which my right hon. friend spoke so enthusiastically last night? In 1911 our total trade with the United States was only $378,000,000, but in the past year it amounted to $800,000,000. In other words, if it was disloyal to truck and trade with the Yankees to the extent of $378,000,000 in 1911, what must be the extent of the perfidy of the Minister of Finance, so far as loyalty is concerned, when he permits and enthuses over a trade of $800,000,000?

I think my right hon. friend, on reflection, will agree with me that the Minister of Finance was simply a fly on the wheel in regard to this. I notice that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance occasionally causes pronunciamentos to be given to the country through the Conservative press stating that although our industries were paralysed before the war commenced, he was entitled to some credit because the country has been able to carry on. I am sure every one, on reflection, will see the ridiculous nature of the pretext which the Prime Minister put forth last night.

My right hon. friend had something to say, also, on the question of the extension of the term of Parliament—while deprecating an anticipatory discussion of that question. I agree that this House should postpone consideration of that important question until the Government submits its resolution relating to it. Yet I may be permitted to remark that the right hon. gentleman was not very happy in the reference he made in that connection to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who leads the Opposition. He referred to the fact that my right hon. leader had said, in 1914, that he would at that time refrain from attempting to open the portals of office with a bloody key. But the leader of the Government himself has, on three or four occasions, tried to open the door of an extended term of office with a bloody key. He has actually inserted that key in the lock on at least two occasions, but has felt obliged to withdraw it. Every hon. gentleman knows that we met in the war session of 1914 without any reservation whatever; that Parliament gave this Government almost plenary powers in regard to the war by enacting the provisions of the War Measures Act, and gave them from the treasury of the Canadian people ad libitum. Yet, we had hardly reached our homes after that session, the first contingent of our overseas forces had hardly reached England, when the leader of the Government and his colleagues considered the question of having an election at that time. It is well understood that certain members of the Government at that time opposed going to the country on the ground that the confidence extended to the Government by the splendid action of the Liberal party in connection with the war should not be abused. And what about the session of 1915? The right hon. leader of the Government experienced a change of heart on the question of soldiers' votes. Had he heard from any of the boys in the trenches that they would vote against this Government if they were given the chance? If he did not hear of that there are thousands of people in this country who did. This change of heart on his part is rather suspicious. He caused the press of this country to attack my right hon. leader because that right hon. gentleman ventured to suggest at that time that there might be some difficulty about taking the votes of the soldiers. He caused his own organ in the city of Halifax to charge my leader with disloyalty because he ventured to question—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That statement is untrue, whether in regard to the newspaper in Halifax or any other.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then who directed it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I say the statement is untrue.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then, who directed Senator Dennis to do it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I say the hon. gentleman has no warrant for making such a statement. I never influenced any portion of the press of Canada at any time to make an attack upon any public man.

Mr. MACDONALD: Then the right hon. gentleman should have asked Senator Dennis to withdraw the article. This is the party organ in the right hon. gentleman's own constituency, and the editor, if he did not make this attack at the direction of the right hon. gentleman—and, of course, I am bound to accept my right hon. friend's statement—at least felt that it would not displease the right hon. gentleman if it were made. And in this matter of the soldiers' votes, the right hon. gentleman had the ballots printed and sent out in charge of Mr. Daly, now Secretary of the Pensions Board. We can still hear the echo of the words of his colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), who declared that the people of Canada were calling in thunder tones for an election to be brought on at once, and we all remember that the Minister of Public Works delivered a speech in Montreal in which he gave notice to the whole country that an election was to take place. But the right hon. gentleman will have no difficulty in remembering that immediately there came by telegraph from all parts of the country protests sent by boards of trade, Conservative organizations and other bodies, against the holding of an election. And so, though he had almost inserted this bloody key in the lock, the key fell from his nerveless hand and he retired to the country for several weeks to rest after the effort he had made in preparation. So I say the right hon. gentleman was not at all happy in his anticipatory references to a discussion which, no doubt, will take place later on.

The Prime Minister referred to the attitude assumed by the Liberal party in connection with the Boer War. Does he forget that his great predecessor in the leadership of the Conservative party and the premiership of this country, Sir John Macdonald, had always taken the position that there should be no interference by Canada in the foreign wars of the Empire? Had he forgotten that other great leaders had gone on record in the same sense? And does he not remember the famous pamphlet No. 6 circulated in the province of Quebec on behalf of his party, in which it was stated that my right hon. leader was too English for them because he wanted Canada to intervene in such wars? He forgets that the leader of the Liberal party, when in attendance in Great Britain at the jubliee of Queen Victoria, of happy memory, pledged Canada to give aid and assistance to the Empire in case of need, and supplemented it by giving the first aid Canada ever gave to the Empire by sending our men to the war in South Africa. Future history, I venture to say, will accord with contemporary history which shows that such a reference as that which the leader of the Government has made might well have been spared. I cannot understand what object he could have had in making such a reference. I recall to-day the situation of the leaders of the Liberal party from the province of Quebec in regard to assistance given to the Empire. I think of my dear friend and colleague, Dr. Beland, incarcerated for weary months in a German prison; there is my friend, Mr. Lemieux, with his boy a volunteer; Sir Lomer Gouin in the same position; and my right hon. friend and leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with the last scion of his race, his nephew, an enlisted volunteer, but discharged on account of illness. When I think of these things I cannot but feel that this reference made by my right hon. friend, the leader of the Government, might well have been spared.

I think the duty is imperatively laid upon us, when we think of the boys who have gone out and have died for the cause as well as of those who are going out, to consider questions affecting this war with the greatest possible care. We are told that recruiting in this country has stopped. I think I can give the leader of the Government some reasons why it has stopped. In the first place, thirty months have gone by. The right hon. leader of the Government said yesterday that the men who are working in the munition factories are giving services as important to the Empire as are those men who went out to fight. He might have said in addition that the men who work in the coal mines do the same thing, because, in eastern Canada at least, wherever you have munition works you must have coal in order that they may operate. Then what about the men who work in the lumber woods? Their product is material which is as essential in connection with warfare as are the shells themselves. They are necessary for trench work. The highest prices that have ever been paid in the history of the lumber trade in eastern Canada are being paid to-day; if you take the men from the lumber woods you impair production and you are unable to get the necessary supplies. The miners of iron, copper, nickle, zinc, gold and silver are rendering potent aid. How could you have the transportation of the country's products if the importance of the work of the railway men was not considered? What about the farmers of this country? My hon. friend the Minister of Finance two years ago urged production and more production. How was Canada to help production if the men who lived on the farms were not to work and till the soil? Long ago the men who worked in the coal mines of Great Britain were exempted from military service; coal miners were called back from the front to work in mines and munition factories. Moreover, men who worked on the farms in Great Britain were exempted from military service. Hon. gentlemen will recall what they read in the papers only two days ago concerning the protests made on behalf of these men against the provision for their exemption being taken from the Enlistment Act, the protest being made solely in the interests of production. What has my right hon. friend done? Why did he not provide long ago that the men who worked in munition factories should be given certificates that they were working for the Empire and were exempt from military service, and that the men who worked in all these other avenues of employment were in the same position? My right hon. friend has gone on without any system, without any organization; and the trades of this country have become demoralized as a result of his inability to deal with this question. Take, for instance, the coal mines of my own county. The coal miners are naturally among the most adventurous of all our people, being accustomed to face danger almost every day of their employment, and they have gone to fight in great numbers. The munition factories there are unable to work on account of shortage of coal; the people who live in the country are unable to get necessary fuel on account of my right hon. friend's having no system in regard to this matter.

Over and above that, the patronage system, unlike the case of Australia, has been rampant throughout this land. This patronage system prevails in respect of appointments, preferments and promotions in the militia. I make the charge right here in the presence of the Prime Minister that in the province of Nova Scotia—it is his own province—the system of patronage was handled directly in regard to these matters. If a few soldiers were billeted anywhere in the country, no man could sell them tea, sugar or meat unless his right to sell was passed upon by the local patronage committee. The same thing applies with regard to clothing, supplies and medical examinations. Only six weeks ago a further appeal for men was made in my constituency by a recruiting officer. He published a list of the only medical men who could examine recruits; all were Conservatives with the exception of one, and there did not happen to be a Tory doctor where that one lived. My right hon. friend must know this. Let us not forget that the democracy of Canada, the plain people of this country—our young men more particularly—are intelligent. There is no use in crying peace, peace, if there is no peace. When you appeal to them from the standpoint of the highest ideals that were ever submitted for the consideration of anyone in this world to go out and fight for the Empire and freedom, and when you find that the local Conservative committee runs this whole business, where do your ideals go? That is the story of my right hon. friend's administration in regard to this matter.

Take another matter. I speak particularly of my own province; other hon. gentlemen will speak of conditions elsewhere. My right hon. friend has heard of the 85th Battalion; he is the hon. colonel of it. My right hon. friend's distinguished relative, Colonel Borden, is the colonel of the 85th; he is not, I believe, of the same political faith as my right hon. friend. We in Nova Scotia all know of the wonderful appeal that Colonel Borden made in the winter months of last year, when he carried the slogan among the highlanders of Nova Scotia as it was carried in the old Jacobite days. The men rallied to the standard; in one brigade, four battalions, over 4,500 men came together, because they were asked to follow men who would lead them to the fight, men who were known to them, who were qualified to lead them, in whom they had confidence and of whom they could be proud. They went; two brothers here from one family; two chums there from adjoining farms on the countryside, who believed they were not going to be separated; they wanted to go out and win together. They went to Aldershot last year and trained there from May until October. My right hon. friend visited them; his Minister of Militia visited them. The Minister of Militia gave his knightly word that every one of those boys could rely upon their going to the front together; that their brigade was not to be broken up; that Colonel Borden was to be made Brigadier-General. When they sailed away on the 13th of October there was no question whatever about this. I had the pleasure of standing on the platform with the distinguished president of Pine Hill College, of the city of Halifax, Rev. Clarence McKinnon, who is known to my right hon. friend and who was one of the chaplains of this regiment. This gentleman with all the prestige of his position behind him, appealed to the mothers and fathers of the country to let their boys go so that they could be in this regiment with their chums; so that they could fight and win together. He gave them his positive assurance of this, relying, he said, upon the guarantees which had been given by the Government. There were ideals for you; there was spirit for you; there was sentiment for you. They called the boy from the cottage, from the hillside, from the valley; he came and what happened? Under the inscrutable condition of military affairs existing on the other side —I asked the right hon. gentleman last night who really was in charge of these matters; I do not think anybody did know after reading Sir Sam Hughes' letter— about a month after their arrival over there some one came from somewhere, and said: Take 800 men out of the brigade, march them over to France; pay no attention to anything. And from all four regiments they were taken; brothers were separated; chums from boyhood were torn apart. The fathers and mothers of these boys who were separated came to the offices of the men in Nova Scotia who had asked them to go, and asked how this could be.. " Can you have any confidence," they say, " in anything that the Government does? My boy might die and his brother would not be there; it was because they would be together that I let them go." Is it any wonder that recruiting does not go on under such methods? Now the brigade is broken up and nobody knows exactly where its members are. We would like to have an official statement upon this matter. Look at the Irish Rangers of Montreal. In the raising of that regiment there were appeals to the heroic race, the sons of old Ireland and the grandsons of old Ireland over here in this land were called on to rally together and to send to the front a distinctively Irish regiment. I see by to-day's Montreal Gazette that Colonel Trihey makes the statement that if that regiment is going to be broken up he will not return to the front. Why are these things done? Do you mean to tell me it is any answer to say, as the Conservative organs say, that there are not so many chances of the boys getting killed if they are separated as if they are all together? That is what the Halifax Herald, my right hon. friend's organ, says; that is the excuse advanced for this breach of faith. What use is there in saying to the men of Nova Scotia that you are going to do anything about this war in the face of an absolute, unquestionable failure to keep one's word? These are the conditions. Is it any wonder that we point out these things under my right hon. friend's administration and ask the Government to consider what they mean? But, Sir, we have in addition to that a colleague of my right hon. friend, the man whom he last night complimented for his handling of affairs in Valcartier, over his own signature in the public press making nineteen distinct charges in regard to the administration and interference with administration by this Government during this war. There is no precedent in the whole parliamentary history of the British nation for the publication of any such correspondence as that which took place between my right hon. friend and his late Minister of Militia. On one occasion Disraeli wrote a letter to Lord Chelmsford about whose position as a possible leader in the House of Lords as Lord Chancellor he was believed to have some doubt; but the letter written by Disraeli was on a change of administration, on his assumption of the premiership. Other than that instance, there is no parallel in the whole history of the British Empire for a Minister of the Crown, retiring under the circumstances under which Sir Sam Hughes retired, leaving nineteen distinct charges of maladministration against the Government of which he was a member. My right hon. friend did not attempt or pretend to answer Sir Sam Hughes last night.

Then where does my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) stand on the question of conscription? I recall that my right hon. friend, in the debate on the Address last year, stated that he had said at the beginning of the war that he was opposed to conscription, and that he repeated that remark with emphasis. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) told us that he had gone to Chicago at the Christmas season and had met some immigration agents there, and he gave us the letter which he wrote in regard to the question of conscription at the time. We have had an agitation in this country on that question. The country looks for leadership from my right hon. friend. If this Administration is going to do anything in the war, if it is going to assume the responsibility of dealing with these questions, we have a right to ask: has my right hon. friend changed his mind or has he not? Why have all this discussion upon this question? Why have all this unsettling of the public mind? Either my right hon. friend stands where he did last year or he does not.

Then take this matter of Dr. Bruce's report. Is there anything—and on this I appeal from the House to the country—is there anything which, in this war time, could bring sadder hearts to the homes of the mothers of the boys who have gone forth to fight than the thought that, having escaped the terrors of war and having been brought to England, they are there to be immured in hospitals and under conditions such as are described in the report of Dr. Bruce? If the statements contained in the report of Dr. Bruce are true—and they have been given publication in the press of this country, although I find on coming to Parliament that I am unable to get, from the Militia Department, on inquiry, a copy of that report for perusal—if there is talk about boys not recruiting, how can the Prime Minister expect them to go out and take the risks of all these conditions? And we are told that Dr. Baptie, whoever he is, and some other men, whoever they are, have examined into these affairs and have made a report, reporting this and that about Dr Carleton Jones and some other men, all of which is very interesting, but not instructive. And when you add to that the various cables that have been printed as coming from Sir George Perley, from which you find that the man who made this report condemnatory of these hospitals is promoted to the posiiton of consulting surgeon to the British army in France, I want to know whether Dr. Bruce's report is true or not. This House wants to know, this country wants to know.

I want to submit to my right hon. friend that this question of Dr. Bruce's report, this question of Dr. Baptie's examination of that report, is of such a serious nature that the whole matter should be submitted to a committee of this House for investigation in order to ascertain what the real conditions are. I know that there are a great many people in this country who talk beautifully about this war—men who have neither chick nor child to go and do not expect to have any—yet they will talk to you in the most learned and beautiful way about how the war should be run. But I talk for the fathers and mothers of the 300,000 boys who have gone, and I want to know whether they are going to be treated that way over in England. Glib words and honeyed talk about winning the war is not going to satisfy this country—either our boys are going to be looked after or they are not, and we expect them to be looked after.

I have referred to the charges made by Lieut.-General Sir Sam Hughes. My right hon. friend dismissed him, to use the short term, from the position of Minister of Militia. He did it in a letter in which he gave two reasons: First, he said because Sir Sam Hughes administered his department as if it were a separate government. The other reason was because Sir Sam told the Premier that he knew that a certain statement which he had made was incorrect, when he said that he had had the same control over affairs in Great Britain in 1914 as in 1916. My right hon. friend gave those two reasons as the grounds for dismissing Sir Sam Hughes. The country have a right to know something about this. Sir Sam Hughes was a conspicuous figure in the administration of this war. My right hon. friend's friends put him forward as a man of great achievements, as a man of whom the country ought to be proud, and my right hon. friend suddenly, not because of anything that Sir Sam Hughes had done in the way of administration, not because there was any reference to any statement that had been made in regard to Sir Sam Hughes being this or that, but simply and solely because, as a matter of departmental arrangement, he had administered his department as if it were a separate government he dismissed Sir Sam Hughes. We have a right to know why he did this. General Sir Sam Hughes, according to the correspondence, denies this charge. He says he was never asked to send in orders in council except in regard to one particular thing, that was secret service, and he says the Prime Minister came and asked him to be careful to send these orders in council in because, as the Prime Minister said, the Department of Railways, the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works were going on spending money without getting any orders in council. That is the answer Sir Sam makes to my right hon. friend. Where was the Finance Minister at that time? Where was this watchdog of the treasury, when, according to his own colleague, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Railways and the Postmaster General—and, according to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Militia himself—were spending money when there should have been orders in council authorizing such expenditure?

The Minister of Finance must have known that. It is generally conceded in the country that the Minister of Finance was one of the chief objectors to the former Minister of Militia. Evidently it was for that reason, and if so, why did he not stop it if it was going on? Why did he permit departments to spend money without an order in council? Why did he permit other departments to do it after it began in one of them? The Minister of Finance did nothing at all until the Prime Minister had to dismiss Sir Sam Hughes because he would not ask for an order in council. Was that the reason my right hon. friend dismissed Sir Sam Hughes, or was it because of an act of maladministration? I think he should tell the House and the country. My right hon. friend studiously avoided any reference to that last night. There was a phrase of his that I see in Hansard which rather indicated on his part a disposition not to engage in any discussion with Sir Sam Hughes. "I do not propose," he says, "to enter into a discussion as to whether he was right or wrong," referring to a little dispute that occurred between himself and the ex-Minister of Militia in reference to what was being done in France. Does my right hon. friend belong to that class of people who think that they have a divine right to rule? And if a minister chooses to make charges of a very grave character, as Sir Sam Hughes did, does he refuse to discuss them? This is the man whom he, himself, has put forward since 1911 as the beau ideal of what a minister of militia ought to be. Then, he takes a whim and turns him out. My right hon. friend, from his standpoint of divine right and with that germanic tendency that seems to have got into his system, comes and tells the people that he does not propose to discuss this question. We must find out something in regard to this matter. My right hon. friend showered all the honours upon this colleague of his, permitted him to be a Lieutenant General, he was created a K.C.B., and then my right hon. friend dismisses him because he does not get an order in council when he wants him to. That is a very flimsy reason. Why does he not dismiss the Minister of Public Works for the same reason? Why does he not dismiss the Minister of Railways and Canals? The Minister of Railways is very strong on this patronage question.

I notice that my genial friend from Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) is not here but I want to say this for the hon. member for Colchester, that the Minister of Railways and Canals has been getting a tremendous lot of kudos for this supposed high and noble stand which he has been taking on the question of patronage on the Intercolonial railway. I desire to put the House and the country right on this question. There is not a man employed as a brakeman, or a wiper in the shed, or a lamplighter, or a section man, or in any other capacity on the Intercolonial railway unless he has a letter from the man who has the patronage, either a Conservative member or a Conservative candidate. The real issue between the hon. member for Colchester—though I think he has not perhaps conceived this method of putting it—and the Minister of Railways and Canals is as to whether there are not men in the Maritime Provinces who have grown up on the Intercolonial—whether it is these men that the hon. member for Colchester recognizes or not—whether there are not men on the whole Intercolonial Railway from Montreal to Sydney who are competent to be in charge of the terminals in the city of Halifax. That is the question. The Minister of Railways and Canals chose, at the suggestion of Mr. Gutelius, to think differently. Mr. Gutelius was a foreign citizen until after he had given his report on the Transcontinental railway and until after my hon. friend from Carleton, New Brunswick, (Mr. Carvell) had put the question in the House to find out whether Mr. Gutelius had ever been naturalized or not. Not until that day had this gentleman been naturalized and now this gentleman comes, and, because he happens to have some friends in other parts of Canada, takes a man down and puts him in charge of the terminals of the railway and says to the railway men of the Maritime Provinces: It is true that you produce premiers occasionally—they have all gone to the Conservative party by accident—it is true you produce men prominent in every walk of life, but you cannot produce any man from the Intercolonial railway who is good enough to look after the terminals at the city of Halifax. My right hon. friend allows the Minister of Railways and Canals to do that and he allows him to go on and spend money without orders in council. He does not ask him for his reasons. Why does he not? The right hon. gentleman would not tell us last night.

Is there any one of his colleagues who would tell us why the Minister of Militia was singled out for this offence—a very grave one—and why it was that the Minister of Finance did not protest against the Minister of Railways spending money without orders in council and against the Minister of Public Works spending money without orders in council; when he protested against Sir Sam Hughes doing it? These are questions upon which the country has a right to get some information.

The difficulty between Sir Sam Hughes and this Government rests upon the very vital question as to who is in control, and who ought to be in control, of the Canadian Forces in Great Britain. That is the question at issue and Sir Sam Hughes made certain charges in regard to it. The first charge which he makes is this: My right hon. friend chose to say that the conditions over there were bad. In October of last year he made up his mind that there should be two changes and he proposed to make these changes and to put Sir George Perley in charge. He wrote the then Minister of Militia a letter to that effect. The then Minister of Militia in replying to that letter makes the first charge in regard to that memorandum as follows:

I entirely agree that the one object to be accomplished is the winning of the war; but I must submit that the proposed order in council of September 22nd ult., with its accompanying regulations, will, to my mind, cripple, impede and again reduce the force overseas, to the chaotic condition to which it had fallen at the end of the first nine months of the war under a system practically what you now propose establishing.

Sir Sam Hughes had been my right hon. friend's constitutional adviser in regard to military matters for five years. My right hon. friend is not a military man and Sir George Perley is not a military man. I think he ought to have told Sir George Perley that as High Commissioner he should not take anything more upon his shoulders than he had. That is the opinion of everybody that I have seen who has been in England. But my right hon. friend cannot get away from this distinct charge of Sir Sam Hughes that by making this change he was inaugurating a system which would cripple, impede and reduce the Canadian Forces to a chaotic condition. That is what he charges and under those circumstances is it any wonder that the Nova Scotia Highland Brigade was broken up, is it any wonder that the Irish Rangers were broken up? What else would you expect? There was nobody to control or protect it. What has the Premier, what has the successor of the Minister of Militia, to say to the charge that the Canadian Forces in England were in a chaotic condition? That is what this responsible minister, the fidus Achates of my right hon. friend for five long years, tells this country?

What else does he say?

From the outset I strongly objected to the fact that practically the entire management of our force, our supplies, our equipment, our transport, etc., had been taken completely out of our hands, and was controlled by the British authorities, we, notwithstanding, paying the bill.

Is that the condition of affairs to-day in Great Britain? Only yesterday in the Montreal Gazette, a paper friendly to my right hon. friend, the following letter was reproduced from the London Times:

London, Jan. 20.—The following letter signed "Civilian" appears in The Times:

The First Canadian Division sailed for France in February, 1915, and has therefore been in the front line two years. It contained Canadian Militia officers serving as brigadier-generals who have exhbited courage, skill and judgment in a marked degree, particularly in that capacity for measuring the unknown, which is the quality of the true soldier. Yet, however rapidly the ladder of promotion has been climbed in the Imperial army, not a single one of these brigadiers has received more than one step in rank as reward for two years of hard, distinguished service.

Let us look at the other side of the picture. There has been from the start in the Canadian corps a sprinkling of Imperial officers, whose services have been of the utmost value, but the moment a vacancy has occurred in any of the high positions they occupied, another regular officer has been appointed to fill the place. The Canadian militia officer feels this state of affairs is both a bar to his career and a reflection upon his capacity. After two years of war, in succession to his previous service, he must either be fit to hold these posts or be by nature incapable. At the same time it appears to him that to belong to a Canadian corps is a final disqualification for that rapid promotion which he sees falling to contemporaries in the Imperial army. "So far shalt thou go and no farther" seems to him written over the portals of war for all who do not possess the cachet of the staff college. Is there not a good deal of justice in this complaint?

My right hon. friend cannot ignore a statement such as that which is directly corroborative of the charge made by General Sir Sam Hughes. That statement appearing as it did in the London Times and being considered of sufficient importance to be reproduced in the Montreal Gazette, indicates a serious condition of affairs. The Minister of Militia says further:

I do not know whether the Canadian High Commissioner had the authority of the Canadian Government or not; but a day or two later that gentleman, of his own initiative, strongly spoke to me and briefly said: "You do not pretend surely to have anything to do with the Canadian soldiers in Britain." I suggested that he might be well advised to study not alone the Canadian Military Law, but the British Army Act, as well as comprehend the spirit of the Constitution. I felt then, as I feel today. and as I am pleased to say the entire British Government and War Office officers also realize to-day that our officers and men being in the pay of Canada, Canada should absolutely control them in Canada and in Britain, excepting in so far as securing camping grounds is concerned; and at the front for everything excepting the command and general administration under the command.

The charge made in "Civilian's" letter to the Times apparently shows that the state of affairs which Sir Sam Hughes said that he had remedied had been reverted to again. The ex-minister goes on:

For the first ten months our suggestions were practically ignored; our equipment, stores, supplies, armament, everything provided by us, was set aside. The pay department was found to be absolutely chaotic, the medical service, modelled on the British, lacked system, efficiency and comprehensiveness.

He goes on to say to the Prime Minister, that he had in his memorandum, "proving the utter falsity of their bogus excuses regarding our wagons."

My right hon. friend dealt with that to some degree last night, and it was the only matter with which he did deal. He spoke of a muster parade being held, and some inquiry being made into that particular matter, and that was the only point to which he referred. The Minister of Militia goes on to saw that he accepted under protest, for the first year this management of the forces in Great Britain, and further on he said, referring to the very system which my right hon. friend (Sir Robert Borden) inaugurated, and which is now in effect in Great Britain, that to adopt the Prime Minister's suggestion of a separate member of the Government to look after things in England "would bring about a return of the irregularities in management, in training and in promotions" which the Minister of Militia had been endeavouring to eliminate, and he says that it would, "as was the effect under the cancelled order in council, cause chaos in the administration and destroy the present friendly relationship between the Canadian forces at the front and in Britain on the one hand, and the British Administration on the other." I ask my right hon. friend to let the House and country know whether the chaotic condition indicated by the ex-Minister of Militia has occurred in regard to our forces in Great Britain. The minister goes on to say that by reason of certain changes he had made he had saved Canada upwards of six millions of dollars. Does my hon. friend the Minister of Finance know about that saving? How much more was lost? If Sir Sam Hughes was able to save only six million dollars, how much was lost during the ten months when demoralization existed and supplies were being scrapped, and when the Pay and Records Office was in a chaotic condition? The Minister of Finance is asking the common people of the country, the plain people of this country, to practice thrift. Will he be prepared to tell them how much money he permitted to be lost in England during those ten months of chaos? The ex-Minister of Militia goes on to say:

We have raised a force and managed it in spite of all sorts of intrigue.

Who was intriguing? Was it the colleagues of the hon. gentleman? What use is it for those gentlemen to tell the people of this country that their first duty is to win the war and then for them to go into the Cabinet Council and proceed to intrigue against their colleagues? That is the direct and positive charge which the ex-Minister of Militia makes, and it is on these matters that the country wants enlightenment. Referring to the system which the Prime Minister had inaugurated, Sir Sam Hughes says:—

This whole proposition is based on misconception of the facts, and can but have three motives to inspire it, none of which is the welfare of the officers and men, or the winning of the war.

What are those three motives? My right hon. friend knows and he won't tell us. The ex-Minister of Militia makes the positive assertion that not one of those motives has to do with the improvement of the welfare of the men or the winning of the war. What right, I ask, has this Administration at this time to be actuated by any other motives than the winning of the war, or the welfare of our men?

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) yesterday quoted the charge which has not been answered yet, that if the system which the Prime Minister insisted on putting into effect had been in effect in the early days of the war, the first division would never have left Valcartier. He pointed out that the second division was held up by haggling about motor trucks for four months. In other words, this Government, which, according to the Prime Minister, yesterday was doing such strange and wonderful things, lost four months in haggling and fighting among themselves, and delayed for that length of time the outfitting of the second division. The ex-Minister of Militia goes on in the correspondence to take issue with the Premier on the question of truthfulness, and the Prime Minister asks for his resignation.

Then the ex-Minister of Militia declares that the Prime Minister was proposing these changes on account of certain intrigues which for a long time he had had on foot with the High Commissioner. Is that true, or is it not? It may be said that there is no necessity to pay any attention to these charges, but he was a responsible minister of the Crown and my right hon. friend put him forward for five years as the beau ideal of a man who should have charge of this nation in time of war. My right hon. friend cannot ignore those charges, serious as they are. The ex-minister goes on making certain other statements which also cannot be ignored. He declares that in regard to the question of administration with reference to what has been done at Valcartier the right hon. gentleman objected to his going ahead and doing things without orders in council. Then he makes this charge:

> It is difficult for me to recall where you have actively supported me in the passage of any order in council concerning the up-building of the Militia when opposed by two Members of the Cabinet usually antagonistic to anything proposed by me. As you are aware, it took up four months in the midst of this great war to fight through the principles of purchasing, for the Second Division, trucks at the lowest wholesale prices.

The country has a right to know who were those two members of the Cabinet who continually opposed their colleague in the administration of the war. If he was unfit, why was he not removed long ago? But why should this haggling have gone on while boys were dying in the hospitals or being killed at the front? These men, eager to advance their own ambitions, to pursue their own intrigues, were engaged in fighting in the council in regard to such matters as are detailed here by their own colleague. Such is the situation. The ex-Minister of Militia, speaking of another matter, goes on to say:

> I do remember you asking me on one occasion to submit orders in council where possible before incurring large expenditures, but the reason you assigned was not protests from my colleagues over my action, but that it was to set an example so as to assist you to control others. You instanced the Post Office Department, the Railway Department and the Public Works Department where projects had been undertaken without authority by order in council, and I remember distinctly you stated that some boats had been purchased and other large expenditures incurred, without your knowing anything about it, and wthout any order in council.

Does the right hon. gentleman know that boats have been purchased involving large expenditures of money without an order in council being passed? Inta what new arena was my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) proceeding when he made purchases without orders in council? Where was my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) going to spend this money? Was it to buy cars down in the United States when he might have bought them in Canada, or was it to engage in some other enterprise recommended by his superintendent which he did not wish to submit to the scrutiny of all his colleagues? Where was the Minister of Finance? Had such a condition of affairs existed when the minds of the people were not enthralled by the war, it would have resulted in the impeachment of the four ministers who were involved. The only reason the hon. gentlemen have escaped that attention which ought to have been paid to the serious situation has been the dominating influence of the war. Is the country ever to know from the Prime Minister what was the expenditure made by the Minister of Public Works, without authority, illegally, under the law? What was the expenditure made by the Minister of Railways, without authority, illegally, under the law? Or if it was my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who bought the steamers without authority, what was the expenditure that he made? Suppose that in Great Britain to-day any one of the ministers who had served under Mr. Asquith had, two months ago in a document made public by the Prime Minister, although he need not have done so, charged that three of his colleagues had, not in expenditures for the war, but in purely departmental expenditures, transgressed and broken the law, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had permitted the public funds to be diverted illegally and contrary to the law for that purpose, what would public opinion be? That, however, is the position in which we in Canada stand as a result of the charges made by the ex-Minister of Militia.

The ex-minister goes on to charge the Prime Minister with grave errors and with misrepresentations of facts. Surely the good old days of courtesy between public men are gone. Here is a deliberate cold-blooded charge on the part of a colleague against his former Premier of misrepresentation of facts and of grave errors in regard to statements made. I think hereafter hon. gentlemen who do not see eye to eye with the Prime Minister may be pardoned if they question the authenticity of statements made by him, when his colleague, his faithful friend, pillories him before the whole country with the charge of misrepresentation of fact and deliberate errors in regard to statements made.

The ex-Minister of Militia wants to know how the Minister of Finance got loans without coming to Council in regard to them. He makes the statements that the Minister of Finance proceeds to deal with the credit of the country, and to make the loans, without coming to Council. It is a serious matter indeed that we have a government in power which so absolutely disregards the law that, instead of the ex-Minister of Militia being the only one who undertakes to run a separate government, each minister who is strong enough to carry out his own whims does the same thing. And the Minister of Finance seems to have been guilty with the rest.

Then this former colleague of the Prime Minister goes on to say:

> I have known and experienced, for a long time, the meddling and intrigue which has been going on. More than a year ago, I understand, you had it in contemplation to get Sir George Perley in control in England.

He goes on to quote from a letter of the Prime Minister in regard to a cablegram which he sent on July 31, and says:

> It is my belief that had you been actuated by the best interests of the force instead of favoritism that cablegram would not have been despatched.

Then, here is the situation: The former Minister of Militia charges his Prime Minister with being actuated by favoritism in regard to military matters instead of by considerations of the true interest of the force. Either there is some basis for that charge or there is not. And this country wants to know. Is it to be expected that the country, in the face of these charges, will have confidence in this Government and in its management of the war? Is it to be expected that the people will send their sons to the war under these conditions? Consider what the former Minister of Militia said in Toronto:

> Saddles were pulled out of the mud, harness scraped up and article after article, and department after department gone through, and to-day Canadian stuff is used at the front by Canadians, and by British in some parts, and is regarded as better than their own.

In other words, supplies and equipment, for which the hard-earned money of the Canadian people had been spent, were thrown into the mud and the ex-Minister of Militia had to get them out. And he charges that the Prime Minister proposed to bring back the same state of things in this regard that had existed before. The ex-Minister of Militia said further:

> The Canadian soldiers were allowed to come under the knife of first-year medical men in charge of some of the hospitals in England, while qualified doctors from the Dominion were available but not used.

Now, is it a fact that these boys, over whose going we have been so enthusiastic, and whose splendid spirit we have commended because they went out to fight for the right, when they are wounded in battle and sent back to England are not attended by qualified surgeons from the Dominion, but are dealt by first-year medical students? Does the Prime Minister think he can ignore such a charge as that? Do hon. gentlemen who support the Prime Minister think they can ignore it? Let me tell them that the fathers and mothers of the boys, and the boys themselves, will hold them responsible if these statements are true, and the day of reckoning will come sooner or later. We simply call the attention of Parliament to these facts and ask for an investigation. No answer has been given to the charges. The Prime Minister, in his correspondence with the former Minister of Militia, does not answer them in any way—does not pretend to. In his speech last night he took the course I have intimated. There was a side issue in connection with General Alderson and General Steele which could not be held to be so serious or important as are these charges, especially those in regard to medical matters. This House expects, this country expects, that an investigation will be held in order that the facts may be made known. I speak with no feeling other than this—I want to know whether or not these boys of ours are being looked after? If they are being looked after, then this country can rest with an easy mind on that point; if they are not being looked after, then I beseech the Government, no matter what individuals may stand in the way, no matter what political considerations may intervene, to so deal with this question that the fathers and mothers of our boys may know that when those boys go across the ocean they will be as safe, so far as the Administration is concerned, as they would be in our own country. The facts must be made known, and when made known they can be dealt with.

Mr. BURNHAM: Has the hon. gentleman endeavoured to find out from the officers or men of the Canadian troops in England whether they were or were not satisfied with the treatment they received in hospitals or elsewhere? I can assure him, from meeting hundreds and hundreds, that there never was a complaint—nothing but the greatest possible gratitude.

Mr. MACDONALD: All I have to say is that my hon. friend (Mr. Burnham) should wrestle out that problem with Dr. Bruce and the ex-Minister of Militia. The hon. gentleman may know more about the matter than Dr. Bruce and Sir Sam Hughes, but he can hardly expect us, he can hardly expect the friends of the boys who have gone across the water, to disregard the position taken by a surgeon of the standing of Dr. Bruce or the statements made by the former Minister of Militia, and to accept the hon. gentleman's own ipse dixit as settling the whole problem.

I pass to another question. I notice that the Minister of Finance is going to make an appeal to the people of this country to practice thrift. I have looked at the expenditures made under this Administration this year and last year. We all know that last winter we voted a tremendous sum of money for the use of the great spending departments, Railways and Canals and Public Works—where they spend money without orders in council—and we know that that money was voted on the distinct assurance that only those expenditures should be made which were absolutely and essentially necessary. Later in the session I shall give to the House instances where this assurance has been absolutely disregarded so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, in the Department of Public Works, for one. I find that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in his controllable expenditure down to December 31, 1915, spent $7,127,000 more than he did last year. It is true that there was a decrease of approximately $7,000,000 in the capital expenditure, but under ordinary expenditure my hon. friend spent $7,000,000 more. My hon. friend has spoken of the policy of thrift, which I conceive to be absolutely necessary. Apart from political considerations, we must recognize that as citizens of this country we are, to a certain extent, living financially in a fool's paradise. Tremendous expenditures have been made in this war for munitions and supplies; an enormous amount of money has come into Canada, and our people have been spending money without regard to the consequences. It is absolutely proper that the true financial situation of the country should be placed before the people. When the war is won the responsibilities occasioned by the tremendous debt of the country, the pensions system and other permanent obligations will necessitate the greatest possible economy in private and public life, particularly having regard to the fact that the expenditures which are now being made in Canada shall have come to an end.

My right hon. friend will recall that last winter I pleaded with the House that the extra money being received by the Post Office Department through the sale of war tax stamps should not be spent in unnecessary mail routes, particularly in eastern Canada. There was no necessity for the duplication of routes, and while the extension of rural mail delivery is a splendid and desirable thing under normal conditions, can it be said that in order to give mail facilities to any portion of the community you should spend twice as much this year as you did last? Can it be said that the system should be duplicated all over the country and that enormous increases should be made in the staff of clerks employed in Montreal, Quebec and other offices, resulting in the total absorption in one year of all the money that was collected by way of taxation through the war tax stamps? I know that in my province this duplication of mail routes has been going on wherever political necessity seemed to justify it. Provincial elections were held there during the last year; mail routes were promised and put into effect, and the extra money was spent. The Minister of Finance must not expect the plain people to respond to his appeal for economy and thrift if they see that the Government is disregarding war conditions and spending money liberally without any regard to the economy that ought to be displayed and which must be displayed in this country by the very necessities of the case, no matter what party is in power. We shall await the explanation of the Minister of Finance in this respect. I regret that he was not here earlier to-day, when I said that I thought he had no right to take the credit which was given him by the Prime Minister for the increased revenue of the country.

The situation in Canada to-day from all quarters indicates a peculiar condition of affairs. There is unrest abroad. Why is it that we hear from Conservative sources the demand for a national government? How is it that the departure to England of the Minister of Finance synchronized with the resignation of the former Minister of Militia? How is it that soon after his return it was announced that a prominent public servant, well known as having been identified with the Conservative party in the past, was going to make an announcement that Canada needed a stronger hand at the head of affairs? Why is it that the Conservative press of this country, outside of the party-owned papers, are in many instances urging that as a remedy? The Minister of Finance found it necessary, notwithstanding the adulations of the Prime Minister about the party loyalty of his colleagues, to publish an announcement to the people stating that he was really loyal to the Prime Minister. My experience of life, both public and private, is that where true friendship exists it is not necessary for any man to go to the housetops and announce his loyalty and devotion to his friends. It would be of interest to know whether the Prime Minister of this country was afraid of the Minister of Finance when he beslobbered him with compliments last night, just as he is afraid of the ex-Minister of Militia. The gingerly and pacific way in which the Prime Minister avoided any combat with the ex-Minister of Militia was deliciously amusing to the House. Either that, or the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are working in common, realizing that all over this land there is a feeling that the Government is not strong enough to cope with the interests of Canada in the war. This talk does not come merely from Liberals; it comes from Conservatives all over this country, and it involves an implied condemnation of the Government. Unquestionably this will be the feeling if the Government goes along in this lackadaisical way; if it proceeds on present lines, disregarding all considerations of higher national interests, making the expenditure of every dollar in connection with the war a matter of party patronage, keeping their party hacks working from one end of the country to the other as the dispensers of money that the people of Canada have to spend in connection with the war.

It seems to me that it is time for the Canadian people as a whole to take stock of their condition. Never before in the history of this Empire or of any of its Dominions was a public document placed before the people making such serious charges as those made by Sir Sam Hughes against his colleagues in the Government. These things cannot be effaced; they are known by the people. The people to whose high ideals you appeal when you ask for recruits have read in the newspapers what the former leader in military matters has said of the Prime minister. Hon. gentlemen may have some secrets in regard to the late minister that we on this side of the House and the people of the country have not. When the boys who have gone out to fight come back they will want to see the administration of this country rid from the complaints that have been made against it. For myself, I leave the question for the consideration of the House and of the people.

I have spoken strongly on this subject, I admit; but I feel that this House and the country must realize that it is our duty in the interests of the Canada that is yet to be to do everything possible to secure the winning of the war. Sacrifice of position, sacrifice of place, must be made by us in order that this end may be attained, just as freely as we give our boys to go out and do and die. If there be any foes without or weaklings within this land who in the supposed distractions and political dissensions of our form of government believe that they have found elements upon which they can calculate that there is a doubt as to the wholeheartedness of our people in their desire to aid in winning this war, I can assure them they mistake the genius and the character of the Canadian people. And if they count on our dissensions and on the rivalries of our public life, they will count on them to their confusion.

In this hour of national menace, differing as we do and must as to means to be employed and as to weakness shown in administration, a devoted people and a united Parliament stand above all for the winning of this war.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a brief contribution to this debate, I wish to associate myself with those who have preceded me in the remarks that have been made in reference to His Royal Highness the late Governor General and also to Their Excellencies who have just come to us from the Old Land to take that high and honoured position. I also wish to join with all who have spoken in such high terms of the valour, the determination and the achievements of our troops at the front. It is a matter, I think, for pride for every true Canadian and every true Britisher, to know the splendid record made by our men at the front. I shall not therefore go into detail on that subject, but shall simply join with those who have, in eloquent terms, paid tribute to our soldiers. I think, however, that every Britisher would do well to consider this fact, that if, in August 1914, we looked upon the task which then presented itself to us as worthy of our metal, worthy to tax the brain and the brawn of this country, I think we should realize today that the task is even greater in magnitude than it seemed to us at that time, because I well remember that the vast majority of the people of Canada expected that perhaps forty, fifty or at the wildest estimate one hundred thousand men, would be all that would be needed from Canada, and that perhaps six months or a year or eighteen months would be required to settle this great question; but from the appalling figures given us by the Prime Minister last night, not only of what Canada has done, but of what the Empire at large has done, we must realize that this task is one which will demand every energy, every effort that it is possible for the people of this Dominion to put forth. Realizing that, it seems to me that it is the duty of this House to concentrate its whole energy, not upon picayune, small topics, not upon the question of whether a certain comparatively trivial matter has been well administered, whether a certain form of this or that is right, but upon the far more important question whether, in the main, the administration of affairs is right, and if the accomplishments of the Government and the troops at the front, of the Empire at large, are commensurate with the honour and the ability of the country as a whole. Some say that we have done enough. Some say that there is a limit to the demands that may be made upon Canada. I do not join in any such sentiment as that. I believe, as I think every true Canadian does, that there is no sacrifice that we should stop at in securing the successful termination of this war; and I have said on the public platform and I will say it here, that if Canada emerges from this crisis with her honour intact and her liberty and her connection with the British Empire as it was before the war, and at the same time bankrupt or losing all material wealth for the time being, she will still be the gainer in the struggle.

5 p.m.

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the address of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald). I was tempted to pass by his speech with very few references, in fact, I did not intend to say anything about it at all. He has made sweeping charges against the Administration, charges that have absolutely nothing behind them so far as his statements are concerned. I do not question the right of any hon. member of this House to make a charge against the Government, but I do hold that it is the duty of an hon. member who is prepared to make a charge against the Government to make that charge in a manner which will demand an investigation such as we had last year for instance, so that the question may be settled. Fortunately for the Government, the investigations held as the result of charges made last year left the Government in a position where its honour was not in the slightest degree sullied, and I wish to congratulate the Government on that fact, that in spite of the most bitter attacks last year, the Government can come before this House with not a single charge of those made last year proven against them. No reckless charges should be made. If there is anything wrong, or any member has reason to believe that anything is wrong, then let the hon. member who is in possession of the facts present them before the House, not in a spirit of elation at catching the Government, but in a spirit of sorrow that such a thing should be possible. But no such charge should be made unless the hon. member is willing to back it up.

The hon. member for Pictou says that if the Government has done things it should not have done, and has left undone things that it should have done, it should be brought to task before the people of Canada and on the basis of that assumption he makes a long series of statements, not charges, not bona fide charges, but a long series of statements, and I propose very briefly to deal with a few of his statements. First, let met say that I rather regret that the hon. member should call particular attention to the question of Liberal or Tory at the front. I do not look upon it in that way. We are not Liberals and we are not Tories, I hope; we are Canadians and Britishers, whether we are at the front or backing up those who are at the front. I would say to him if he were in his seat that some of the dearest friends I have fighting at the front, who have been there ever since the outbreak of war, are members of his party, and I cherish their friendship as much as I do that of my friends who sit on this side and who are members of my own party. There should be no partisanship in the question of loyalty to the Empire. I do not desire to raise it, but my hon. friend has raised it, and I think it is to be regretted that he should do so.

One of the statements made by my hon. Friend, or one of the insinuations, is that the Government is not competent and it has not administered the affairs of the country correctly and rightly; and he said and rightly said: Look at the great mother of Parliaments, look at England. There they have remodelled the Government on two or three occasions. He held that up in one part of his speech as a pattern for this Government and country. And then, forsooth, a little later on, he produced a most scandalous attack on the British Government published in Blackwood's Magazine and read that, on the one hand holding the British Government up as a pattern to this Government, so far as procedure is concerned, and on the other hand bringing forward a malicious attack, in a magazine, upon that Government and reading it here, and then laying all that was said against the British Government on the head of the Government controlling or directing the affairs of this country. I think it ill becomes any member of this House to take up newspaper or magazine attacks upon the Imperial Government and to make it a subject of debate in this House. If we want harmony, we certainly cannot have it by introducing the expressions of individuals who may have personal reasons for giving their opinions about other governments closely associated with us in this great task of carrying on and winning the war.

Then my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) proceeded with all the ingenuity and skill, of which he is so highly possessed, to stir up a little strife between the Prime Minister and one of his late colleagues. I will take second place to no one in my admiration of the ex-Minister of Militia; at the same time I think it is very small politics, and it does not contribute in the slightest degree to the successful carrying on of this war, to introduce a question of personal strife between any two members of this House whether they are in the Government or out of it. These are matters which they can very well afford to settle between themselves. In taking up an hour's time reading statements, enlarging upon them, and introducing into them matters which were not contained in them at all, my hon. friend did not contribute very much to the successful termination of the war or to helping to carry on this great struggle.

But, he says that mistakes have been made which may cost this country thousands of lives. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he associates himself in this statement, because his language very much resembles their's, with those who claim that because the Ross rifle has been used, there have been thousands of lives lost. If I remember rightly, all through the years in which he has been a member of this House, he has stood stolidly behind the Ross rifle. If the Government have been guilty of mistakes which have caused the loss of lives because of the use of the Ross rifle, then my hon. friend is equally responsible with them because he stood solidly behind the Ross rifle from first to last. He will not stand in his place to-day and condemn the Ross rifle, and he knows it. What is the use of bringing forward a statement of that kind? If the Ross rifle has proved unsuccessful or unsatisfactory in its practical use in this war, then the Government has done right in taking the advice of Sir John French, and Sir Douglas Haig and other high officers, and for the time being discarding it for active service at the front. I think that we as sensible men must recognize that in the progress of a war of this kind, when new methods are being used, when machines are being brought into use that were never thought of before, experiments, to a certain degree, must absolutely be made. I remember the case of a certain member of the Royal Flying Corps who, in defence of England against one of the early raids of the Zeppelins, indulged in an experiment which cost him his life. He charged straight at the Zeppelin with the result that his machine fell to the ground and he was killed. But, that was the forerunner of the method of attack upon the Zeppelins which deprived this Hun method of warfare of its terrors and which enabled British airmen to successfully meet and defeat the Zeppelins. Will my hon. friend say that, because a man lost his life, such an experiment is not to be made? There are thousands of Britishers ready and willing to lay down their lives in any kind of an experiment that is going to improve our chances of winning the war.

My hon. friend from Pictou proceeded to say that in 1914 and 1915 this Government had a notion of going to the country, that they had the key in the lock of the door and that they were about to appeal to the country when a cry went up from the people that we were to have no election, which cry was evidence that the people were satisfied with the way in which the affairs of the country were being administered. Yet, his whole speech to-day, if it meant anything at all, meant that there should be an election, and a change of Government. It was an arraignment of the Government from beginning to end, and yet, in another argument which happened to suit his fancy for the moment, he pointed out that the people were satisfied with the Government and did not want any change at a time, as he says, when they had a notion of appealing to the people.

Recruiting, he says, has been injuriously affected. Is it any wonder, he asks, that there has been any cessation of recruiting in Canada when hundreds of our boys are dying in the hospitals because of lack of treatment. Such a statement is absolutely unfair to the medical staff, to the nurses, to those in charge of the hospitals and to everybody who is carrying on this medical work.

Mr. MACDONALD: I never made any such statement.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend may not have used those words but he made the statement.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not at all. I ask my hon. friend to take that statement back. I decline to be under the imputation of having made any such statement.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is very clear that the statement of an hon. member as to what he said must be accepted.

Mr. STEVENS: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to say that my hon. friend criticised the Government bitterly and at great length because of the condition of the hospitals in France and England.

Mr. MACDONALD: I said that if the statements made by Dr. Bruce and by the ex-Minister of Militia were correct, a serious condition existed and an investigation should be had.

Mr. STEVENS: Then, my hon. friend does not speak from any knowledge of his own?

Mr. MACDONALD: I have spoken only as my hon. friend has done; I was not over there and did not see the hospitals. I have spoken from Dr. Bruce's report.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend said that he had never seen the report of Dr. Bruce and yet he has the audacity to say to this House that the statements made by Dr. Bruce are true as to the condition which obtains in France.

Mr. MACDONALD: What I stated to the House was that I had seen newspaper reports of Dr. Bruce's statement.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, he is getting down to newspaper reports now.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend need not be so very fly. He cannot misrepresent me because I will not permit him to and he need not try.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is very brave. On newspaper reports my hon. friend makes an attack on this Government regarding the hospitals in France and England. My answer to that is this—died of sickness up to date, 494 of the men overseas. I care not a snap of my finger what my hon. friend imagines, or what my hon. friend has read in the papers, where he gets his information; I challenge any country in the world to produce from the medical service of its army a condition equal to that. I challenge my hon. friend to produce statistics which will show such an excellent record elsewhere. As a matter of fact, the general results of the medical service of Canada and Great Britain are unsurpassed by those of any other nation engaged in this war. The mortality o[f] this House—and I speak with reverence on this subject because some of our colleagues have passed away—has been greater from sickness during the period of the war than the mortality among the Canadian troops overseas. Is that not a record worthy of commendation rather than of the vicious attacks which have fallen from the lips of my hon. friend?

Then my hon. friend asks: Is this the way in which you are going to stimulate recruiting? Will his speech stimulate recruiting? Will charges based upon unsupported statements, mere rumors, fancies gained by the hon. gentleman here and there from newspapers, that he does not and dare not quote, stimulate recruiting? If there is one thing that we in this House and in this country should be at this time it is serious and sincere in everything we state. Before making statements we should see that we have the facts behind them upon which to base sound complaints, if such complaints are to be made.

Then my hon. friend proceeded in his vociferous manner with a most violent attack on the Government for interfering with the military control. "I have heard," says he, "that a man by the name of Gwatkin"—we all know that there is a gentleman by the name of General Gwatkin—"I have heard that there is a man by the name of Gwatkin who has control of affairs." And the hon. member asked: "Will anybody dare say that he has control of affairs?" He then went on with a long tirade of abuse against the Government for not having dared, according to the hon. member, to interfere with the head of the military affairs. He passed on, perhaps thinking we would forget what he had said, and happily we do forget most of it. But a little later on the hon. gentleman who had given expression to these sentiments again attacked the Premier because he had not interfered when the 85th Regiment was broken up. Why, sir, the 85th was not the only regiment that was broken up. The same thing happened to the Irish Rangers and to the 121st Battalion, and a dozen others I could mention. Because the chief of the general staff thought it best to use these men as reinforcements for the regiments at the front, the hon. member for Pictou heaps abuse on the head of the Prime Minister for not interfering with the War Office and having these battalions handled exactly as the friends at home would like to see. I take second place to no man in my desire to see our boys from Vancouver, Pictou, Toronto, or any other centre, kept together. I remember well the 121st Battalion, which, with others, I undertook to raise. In less than five weeks we had raised the battalion to full strength. It went overseas, and we hoped the regiment would not be broken up, as all the boys came from the same locality. But I got word from some of the boys overseas that the battalion was being broken up in just the same way as my hon. friend says the 85th was broken up. But, surely, upon second thoughts, we must realize that we must bow to any decisions that are made in the interests of efficiency at the front, and I must say that I differ from my hon. friend, if I am to judge him by the sentiments he expressed this afternoon. I have confidence in Sir Douglas Haig, confidence in the War Office, in the British authorities and in the Canadian officers. I have confidence in the men who are running this war. I am not so foolish as to think they do not make mistakes, but I am confident they are doing their best to discharge the responsibilities resting upon them, and it ill becomes the hon. member for Pictou to urge the Government to interfere in these important matters overseas. I am sure he would be the first man to stand up in the House and condemn the Government for such interference. As a matter of fact, he has done it in his speech to-day. The hon. member for Pictou claims to have an honoured military record himself; so he ought to know the King's regulations and all about the proper procedure in military affairs. He knows perfectly well that the statements he made this afternoon and the charges and innuendos he heaped upon this Government were unjustified and unfair, and certainly not in the interest of recruiting in this country. He says he would like to know what the Prime Minister thinks of conscription. Why does not my hon. friend tell us what he thinks of conscription himself?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: He is waiting to see what will happen on Saturday next.

Mr. STEVENS: The Prime Minister has taken the stand before the people of this country that if it is humanly possible the troops that go overseas from Canada shall be volunteers. He has stated that he has seen no occasion for bringing in conscription so far as our present needs are concerned.

I would draw my hon. friend's attention to another effort on the part of the Government, on which he might also have given us his opinion, and that is the National Service scheme. Some of his friends are saying that National Service is but a step to conscription. I would point out to him, and others who think like him—and there are a few—that the National Service propaganda which has been endorsed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition is a propaganda by which it is expected to get the last possible effort out of the people of Canada; that is the basis of it. Let my hon. friend and his leader, and his colleagues support the National Service propaganda, and then perhaps conscription will never be necessary. I hope it never will be necessary in Canada. I hope we shall be able to fill the bill without having anything in the nature of conscription. If my hon. friend did that he would be doing a much better service to the country than by standing up here and twitting the Prime Minister. The hon. gentleman said that if the Prime Minister spoke he could still the uneasiness of the country at once. Surely my hon. friend is not going to take second place to the Prime Minister. Why does he not still the uneasiness himself by giving the country his views on conscription? The hon. gentleman then proceeded to review at very great length the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Militia. One of his chief arguments, over which he laboured very long, was this: that other ministers of the Crown had expended money without Order in Council. Now my hon. friend takes second place to no one in the House in astuteness as a parliamentarian; he claims to be a lawyer of the first rank. As such, the hon. member must know that when he and the rest of us sitting in this House vote an appropriation bill, every item of that bill is appropriated without requiring any Order in Council. He also knows, if he has given it a moment's thought—and I am afraid he has not—that the $250,000,000 voted for war purposes was voted to the Government without any particular allotment. The result is that every dollar of that $250,000,000 must be expended by Order in Council; whereas the appropriations in the estimates require no Order in Council. That is clear to those of us who are mere novices, and it certainly must be clear to my hon. friend, if he gives it a moment's thought. I question very much, indeed, his sincerity in the long and laboured argument he made in regard to the $250,000,000. I think he knows perfectly well that there was nothing in that argument at all except the desire to stir up a little internal trouble in this party and in the Government. In fact, his whole speech, except the part which he read at the end, was an endeavour to make trouble and cause ill-feeling. I do not propose to deal at any further length with his remarks. He said a great deal more, but there was very little in it.

I wish to make two suggestions to the Government, for I believe it is the duty of hon. gentlemen of this House, coming as they do from all parts of this country, over 4,000 miles in length, to make suggestions to the Government, because the Government, of course, cannot be intimately in touch with affairs in all parts of the country. I think one of the most important questions in the carrying on of the war is that of the supply of lead, zinc, copper, molybdenite, and other minerals of that kind. Those four in particular that I have mentioned are produced in large quantities in British Columbia, and I wish to draw the attention of the Government to this fact. The owners of minerals in British Columbia experience a great deal of difficulty in having their minerals smelted. There is one smelter up the coast at Anyox, belonging to the British Columbia Copper Company, I think, or to the Granby Company. That company has recently stopped accepting custom ores; that is, they do not do any smelting for outside concerns. There is also a smelter at Ladysmith, the Tyie smelter, which has been idle for a great many years; and a month or so ago they decided to again start this smelter.

But as near as I can learn from careful inquiry there is some sinister influence preventing the Tyie smelter from opening up, and also preventing the Granby smelter from taking custom ores. I want, in a very serious manner, to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that steps should immediately be taken to see that every facility for smelting ores is placed at the disposal of the mine owners of British Columbia. I am not speaking about the large mines; I am speaking about the smaller ones. There are millions of tons of copper ore blocked out, ready for taking out of the mine and for smelting if the facilities were accorded. I lay that upon the Government, and may I lay this upon the Government also? Two years ago I spoke in regard to the matter and some results have been obtained, but I am going to draw the matter to their attention again. The Government should establish adequate refining facilities for the product of the smelting of these ores. It is true that the Trail smelter has in the last two years added refining facilities, but those facilities are not sufficient and we want a refinery on the coast. One mine on the coast employing about two thousand men produces every week thousands upon thousands of tons of the richest copper ore, and all of this is shipped to Tacoma and finds a market on the other side of the line. That copper should be smelted and refined in Canada and the product shipped to the old country, where there is a great demand for it. There is no reason in the world that I can discover, after looking carefully into the matter, why that should not be done. I ask the Government to give consideration to these facts. I have here a great deal of correspondence on the subject, some of which I have received to-day, but I shall not weary the House with it.

We have recently been receiving in Canada a number of returned soldiers. I think about six hundred have returned to Vancouver alone, and corresponding numbers to other places. A great many of these boys are wounded, some of them incapacitated for life, and every effort is being made to look after them. I want to congratulate the Government on what they have done up to the present time; but as time goes on the number of returning soldiers will increase to such an extent that the task that will face us is appalling. I believe this House could well spend considerable time in studying out the problem of taking care of the soldiers returning from the front. There are many ways in which this could be done, but I have one suggestion to make to the Government at the present time, and I believe they will act upon it favourably. The British Columbia University is prepared to give free tuition and instruction to men in a thorough course of agriculture. It is absolutely useless to take men who have not been accustomed to farming and put them on the land, although we hear a great deal of putting men on the land, as if you can pick up a man like a pawn and put him on the land and expect him to make a successful farmer. For a man to make a success of farming he must have some agricultural training, and a thorough course in a university of agriculture would give him a start and also confidence in his new life. Hon. members from British Columbia know that there are millions of acres of splendid land in that province; but if we simply give a hundred or a hundred and sixty acres to a returned soldier and then trust to luck whether he makes good or not. We are not going to solve the problem of the returned soldier successfully. I make this suggestion, not in a critical spirit, that this Parliament should combine its energies in an effort to solve these after-the-war problems which are to-day commencing to face us. We are getting only a small number of returned soldiers at present, but in a very few months the number will increase and the problem will grow accordingly. The Military Hospitals Commission is doing splendid work, but I do not think it will be capable of meeting the demands that will be made upon it in a few months. I lay upon this Government and upon every member of the House the responsibility of joining together and endeavouring to solve these problems.

My remarks have been made in the latter part with the idea of bringing forward one or two suggestions which I know to be important. There are many other suggestions which may fall from the lips of other members who know local conditions better, but I believe that our efforts as Canadians and as Britishers should be combined with the one object of making Canada more efficient and more capable of carrying on this great war. I am as proud as any man of what we have accomplished, but there is a greater task before us and I hope and believe that the people of Canada, especially the members of this House, will measure up to the demands made upon them.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary for me to add my congratulations to you on your elevation to your present position. I will only say that I think the House is as fortunate as yourself.

In regard to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens), it strikes me that the Government has not been altogether fortunate in its selection of an apologist on this occasion. While my hon. friend is prepared to endorse everything that the Government has done or everything that it has left undone in connection with the war, he is not prepared to endorse what it has done or left undone in regard to the smelting and refining industry of British Columbia. The Government, which cannot be trusted in what is not as important a matter as the war—which my hon. friend cannot trust to its own guidance in this so much less important matter—he is prepared to defend with all the ability, and, if I may say, the vociferation, of which he is capable in regard to that greater matter in reference to which even he might think that the Government which he supports might sometimes or somehow or on some occasion fall short of the ideal.

My hon. friend criticises certain phases of the speech of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) on the ground that they might have an injurious effect upon recruiting; but when my hon. friend himself began to touch on the questions that are arising to-day in connection with our returned soldiers, I am not so sure that, judged by the same standard as he set up for my hon. friend from Pictou, his speech was not just as detrimental to recruiting, because the suggestion was contained in it that there is something lacking, something that needs his suggestion in this House, in regard to the betterment of the conditions of those men who have rendered service and who have suffered in the cause. Not only does he make that suggestion himself, but he calls on all the members of this House to aid him in bringing the matter to the attention of the Government and of the country to see that it is properly adjusted. I do not think that any one is entitled to criticise, nor should any one be afraid of criticism, because we in this Parliament discuss matters relating to the administration of the war.

I may be permitted, perhaps, to traverse to some degree the positions that have already been taken in this debate in regard to the war at large, and to say that, for my part, I am not able to agree with the views of the Prime Minister as to the successful progress of the war, any more than I am able to agree with his views as to the means taken to secure its successful termination. I am afraid that if, to-day, the allied arms are not in a better position than they are, it is largely because we, the people of the allied nations, have not been willing to look the facts in the face. We have tried to win the war on paper, by argument and demonstration and proof, while the war can only be won by blood and sacrifice. The more fully and the more quickly we face that condition and prepare ourselves to meet it, the sooner and the more certainly shall we win success. I do not think there can be any exaggeration of the gravity of the position as it is to-day. When I read that the beautiful parks of England are being ploughed up to raise food because of the exigencies of the war; when I hear that the people of England, of rich England, have to eat black bread because of the war; when I read that the Premier of England calls on the people of the Empire to offer sacrifice of men and means uncounted and uncountable,—I say we are not doing ourselves justice, we are not doing justice to the cause, if we do not look the facts squarely in the face and recognize that our part is to do everything we can, to do it well, and to do it now.

There seems to me to be a certain measure of confusion of mind as to the value of the respective services rendered in the war. I have read, I have heard it suggested, that the services of raising food, of making munitions, of transportation, are on an equality with the service of the men who stand in the battle line. I cannot agree with that view. Not only do I think that view mistaken, but I think it is bound to be terribly injurious to the effective prosecution of our share in the war. I do not minimize in any degree the importance of the labour of any man in any of these callings. Perhaps I shall be unable to place before this House lucidly the case, as it strikes my mind, of the difference between the man who leaves his home, his friends, his property, and his prospects—leaves everything behind—and takes upon himself the terrible hardship of the battle-front, and who risks from day to day and from moment to moment his life and limb for the cause in which he fights; I say I cannot make a comparison of equality between the services rendered by that man and those rendered by the man, let him be as able as he may, who works in a munitions plant, or on a farm, or in transportation, or in any other necessary service, for which service he is well paid, and through which he enjoys every comfort of life as though there were no war—as a matter of fact, in many cases, draws better wages and lives under conditions immeasurably better than would be the case if there were no war. I think it is a mistake to place these two classes of service on an equality. If I do not weary the House with this form of discussion, let me say it strikes me in this way. The man who is to render service in the battle line, in the first place, must be the pick of our country in the matter of physical perfection. It is not every man, indeed it is a comparatively small percentage of the men of our country, who are physically fit to take upon themselves the hardships and risks of the battle front. A man who is not fit for the battle front may well be fit for these other occupations in which he may render excellent service, necessary service. But the number of men you can put in the battle front are the pick of our manhood, and they are only a comparatively small proportion of that manhood. Therefore, the first essential is the man in the battle line, and unless we have enough of them, and unless they are of the right quality, both physically and spiritually, of what account is it that we have munition factories, or that we have farms producing food, or that we have transportation facilities? The man in the battle line is the man who wins the war, and it is with the question of putting the right kind of men into the battle line, putting them there at the right time and under proper leadership, that we have to deal. First things first; let us recognize that to get our men into the battle line is the first duty of those who have the direction of our affairs.

We must assume that that principle was recognized when, on New Year's Day, 1916, the Premier of Canada issued a call to the people of Canada for half a million men. That call was received by the people with every consideration, with the recognition of its propriety and justice, and there was not, from any part of the country, so far as I am aware, any protest or objection against that call being made. Such a call, made by the Premier of Canada and received without objection by the people of Canada, was a pledge of the honour of Canada to herself, to the Empire to which she belongs and to the Allied powers that she would make good her promise. Since that time there have been heavy enlistments of men, as the Premier said yesterday when he told us of the number of enlistments that had been made. It would be impossible to exaggerate the magnificence of the response made by our people to that call under the circumstances as they stand. We boasted that we were a peace-loving people; that for a hundred years we had been in a condition of peace. Peace was preached from our pulpits and spoken from every platform. Our whole education was an education of peacefulness; and that our men should have responded as they did to the call that was made, certainly showed in large measure a realization of the terrible character of the conflict and of the necessity of Canada's participation in it.

May I say on that point, as I wish to voice the idea that I believe to be in the minds of our people, that this war was not Britain's war or the war of the Allied powers; it was the war of humanity to preserve liberty, to preserve in this world a free civilization against the attack of military autocracy. It is in my mind, and I am sure it is in the mind of many others, that the success of the Central Powers of Europe, as allied to-day, would mean the re-establishment not only on the continent of Europe, but throughout the world, of a condition of militarist authority and of military tyranny as existed throughout the world in the dark ages when feudalism ruled. Who, I ask, would question the word of the Kaiser as the highest law if the German armies should overrun France and break the power of Britain? No other power in the world could stand against it: free civilization would cease as surely as civilization itself ceased when the Turks overran a part of Europe. We are not fighting for Britain; we are not fighting for Canada; we are fighting for liberty in the world. It is the fight of every individual who realizes that he is sacrificing himself for the liberty of the world and not for any smaller or lesser cause.

I have said that we have responded to a wonderful extent to this call for half a million men; but that call has not yet been met. The honour of our country is committed to its being met, and it is for us to consider ways and means as to how it may be met and to consider causes as to why it has not yet been met. First of all, may I suggest to the House that the figures read yesterday by the Premier are to some extent misleading. I regret to have to say that, but the statement that the enlistments amount to 390 odd thousand men does not mean that the number of effectives is 390 odd thousand men. We are not doing ourselves credit when we include enlistments of ineffectives in the number of men which has been our contribution towards winning the war. During last session the Prime Minister gave to the House and the country figures showing the number of enlistments at that date, the number of casualties and the number that was covered by the term "wastage." At that time the wastage, that is to say, the men who had joined and had been discharged as being inefficient for one reason and another, amounted, if my memory serves me correctly, to something like 20,000.

Mr. HAZEN: That would include men who were wounded. would it not?

Mr. OLIVER: No; if I remember correctly, the casualties mentioned by the Prime Minister were in the neighbourhood of 20,000 and the wastage was something like another 20,000. I questioned him as to the meaning of the word wastage, and he explained that it included discharges, rejections or desertions—losses that occurred otherwise than through casualties. If that was the fact last year, I am afraid that it is still the fact; and when we pride ourselves on having enlisted such a large number of men we are not honest with ourselves if we do not deduct the wastage and count only those enlisted who were effective. We are breaking faith; we are discrediting ourselves with the Empire and with the Allies when we claim to have given to the cause so many men when a very considerable proportion of that number were not of the class that were able to render the service that they were called upon to render. So that I am compelled to believe that we are very considerably short of the number of 390,000 effective men.

It is now more than a year since that call was issued. The events that have taken place since that time, that are taking place now and that are impending, indicate that there is need for men now as there never was before.

Not to dwell upon that point, I think it is agreed on all hands that this coming season must see the Allies on the aggressive, if ever we expect to win. We must be on the aggressive. That is a simple word, but its meaning is tremendous, because the aggressive mean losses, and losses, and more losses, and we must have the men to meet those losses or we cannot prosecute the aggressive and we do not win the war—and let us not forget that the war is not yet won. So I say that while we have surprised ourselves with what we have done, we are not yet in a position to claim that we have made good our pledges, our promises, or that we are going to take our place in the battle in the coming spring as we promised more than a year ago that we would take it—and it is possible that our failure to take it in that strength and with that vigour may possibly be enough to turn the scale against the Allies.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, shortly before six o'clock, speaking of the relations of our country to the present war, I mentioned the obligation felt by the individual to support the cause of the world's liberty. In case the suggestion may be made that if this is a battle for the world's liberty then all the countries of the world which love liberty should be engaged in that battle, I would only say that as world conditions are at present the lot happens to fall upon us. It is the Empire with which we are associated that stands as the exponent and the leader of human liberty in the world, and it is only right and reasonable that when conditions so fall that right and liberty are endangered, the Empire and all who have part in it should feel that their turn has come to vindicate and support liberty and right in the world and for the world.

The suggestion has been made that our neighbours to the south, the people of the great republic, lovers of liberty as we are, should have a part in this war, as we have, if they love liberty, as we do. I think it is only fair to say that as the lot fell 50 years ago their's was the task of maintaining human liberty, and it was not then ours. At that time that great people made many and tremendous sacrifices for the cause of human liberty while we stood by, as we had a right to stand by, and they fought their battle alone. To-day the lot has fallen on us. Let us be as good men as our neighbours and stand when it comes to us in our turn as they stood when it came to them in their turn.

I was speaking at six o'clock of the call for 500,000 men issued by the Premier a little over a year ago, and of the fact that must be faced that, however great the credit our country is entitled to for what it has done, it has still fallen short of the pledge given, of the promise made and the recognized need of the occasion. How far we are short is a question which may be in dispute. I was considering the account given by the Prime Minister yesterday of the number of enlistments. He credits Canada with enlisting 392,000 men. If we have enlisted 392,000 effectives we are entitled to credit for doing so, but if we have not, if wastage by rejections for unfitness from that number has been counted into it, and if we claim something that we have not made good, we are not doing justice to ourselves, or to our Allies, or to the cause in which we are all engaged. I do not know how much this wastage may be; I do not know how many rejections may have been made, but I am credibly informed that a short time ago Mr. Godfrey, President of the National Service League of Toronto, made the statement that the wastage up to the date at which he spoke had amounted to 60,000. If that figure is correct our effective enlistments are reduced from 392,000 to 332,000, or, say, in round numbers, to 330,000, leaving still to be made up 170,000 effective enlistments before our promises to ourselves and to our Allies have been made good.

This is a matter for very serious consideration, and in dealing with the question, while I must necessarily speak of those in authority, that is, of the Government of our country, and of their action or their inaction, I do not wish to be understood as speaking of the Government as separate from the people; but as speaking of the country, rather than of the action of the Government of the day. Because, while the Government is directly responsible for whatever is done or is not done, inasmuch as the Government is endorsed by the country, the country at large must share the responsibility, and I wish to be understood as speaking in that sense. The fact that the promise made on January 1, 1916, was not being made good became apparent about the middle of the year, and I take it that what are now called the National Service proposals was the answer of the Government to the question, what are you going to do about the failure of the country to implement the promise of 500,000 men? The Premier and the Director of National Service made a tour throughout the country some months ago, for the purpose of placing this scheme of National Service before the people, presumably with a view to working it out, with the result already suggested by me. I was somewhat surprised yesterday, when the right hon. Premier was discussing the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne, that he did not see fit even distantly to allude to the subject of National Service. It struck me that if it was desirable—and it surely was desirable—that the Premier and the Director of National Service should tour Canada for the purpose of placing the National Service proposals clearly before the people, surely here on the floor of Parliament was the place, and the debate on the Address the time, for a statement in regard to this question, explaining what it meant and what was being done under it.

May I make a personal reference in this connection? When the Premier and the Director of National Service were going through the West, I received a telegram from the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), asking me to take part in a meeting at Edmonton to be addressed by him and by the Premier. I replied that as a member of the Parliamentary Opposition, whose duty was the criticism of Government measures, I would wait to hear the proposals explained before I undertook to endorse them or explain them to other people. For that reply, which was made public, I was subjected to criticism in the columns of many newspapers supporting my friends on the other side of the House. I will say that it was by no means non-partisan criticism, but of a very directly personal character, and in most instances the criticism took the form of questioning my loyalty to King and Empire. I have only this to say in that connection. At this time, and under the circumstances in which this country finds itself, loyalty is not expressed by words: it is only expressed by service. There is a great difference between the service rendered by the individual citizen, and the service rendered by those charged with the direction of affairs of state. There is a responsibility resting upon those who are charged with the direction of affairs of state that does not rest upon the private citizen. He is responsible for his actions, but they are responsible not only for their own private actions, but for the direction of the affairs of the country. I want to say this, Mr. Speaker, that at this present time, and under these conditions, when the future of the world depends upon the success of the Allied armies, inefficiency is treason, the talk that leads to inefficiency is treason, and the Government that is in power in this or in any other of the countries that are at war to-day must stand and be judged of its loyalty by the character of the service that it gives.

The proposals for National Service have been explained on numerous occasions and at numerous times. I regret, I say, that the Premier did not take the opportunity of making an explanation here yesterday because failing such explanation, I am compelled in addressing the House to-night to give such interpretation to the terms and conditions surrounding and contained in these National Service proposals as appeals to my mind. I shall be very sorry if I am wrong, but if I am wrong, the fault is rather with those who have the direction of our affairs, and who, as yet, have failed to place before the country these proposals in a light in which they could be thoroughly understood. They have had National Service proposals and a National Service policy in Great Britain. But National Service in Great Britain means, first, military service and, secondly, industrial service. Unless National Service means first, military service and afterwards industrial service, it is not, in time of war, National Service at all. A so-called National Service which ignores the military necessities of this country at the present time is not National Service; it is not loyal service, if I may be permitted to say so; it is not service that is going to win this war.

So far as I have been able to gather from a perusal of the National Service cards that have been issued, and from statements that have been made both by the Prime Minister and by the Director of National Service, this National Service proposal is one for the conscription of labour for industrial purposes. There is no proposal contained within it, either nearly or remotely, of conscription for military purposes; no suggestion either present or future. I will admit that there is no very clear suggestion of any kind; but whatever suggestion there is relates solely to industrial purposes. This at a time when military necessity is so pressing, when the future of the world depends on military success. The Government of Canada comes forward, at a time when its promise of half a million of fighting men has failed to be fulfilled, with a proposal that it calls National Service, which does not propose, either directly or indirectly, either nearly or remotely, to add one man to the number of those fighting men. I will admit that other suggestions have been made. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) gave voice to the idea that in some way, which he did not explain, the National Service proposal meant compulsory military service. I find that that idea has been circulated through the press; it has been preached to some degree from the platform, but it has never at any time been backed up by definite authority or by definite statement. Following the tour of the Prime Minister and the Director of National Service through the country, I gather that the idea ran something like this: In the West where the response to military demands had been, we shall say, if not ample, at any rate, more full and free than anywhere else in the Dominion, where the people were rather more inspired with the idea of military service, there the idea was conveyed that National Service meant military service in some indirect way or at some future time; but when the party were in other parts of the Dominion the idea was very definitely exprcssed that it did not mean military service; that it meant on'y industrial service, and did not even mean industrial conscription but meant only voluntary industrial service.

[Mr Oliver]

At the present time a member of the Government is standing for election in a county in the province of Quebec, and the question of National Service is under discussion in the campaign. The Government is surely bound by the declarations of its minister made on such an occasion. According to constitutional practice time-honoured through many years, he appeals to the electors for re-election on certain grounds of policy, and in the discussions that have taken place he must be considered to have expressed the policy of the Government in regard to National Service; he must be considered to have pledged the Government of which he has recently become a member to their policy in regard to National Service. The Hon. Mr. Sevigny, speaking at St. Zacharie, Dorchester County, Quebec, on Friday, January 19, is reported in the Montreal Gazette as follows. He is speaking of the war:—

> It is necessary to bring victory because of civilization, justice and liberty. Put aside matters of politics, for it is a question of life and death for you and for me. You live here at St. Zacharie in peace; you enjoy much. It is your duty to produce harvests, to do all possible to have munitions and bread for our soldiers.

You will observe that the minister does not suggest to the people of St. Zacharie that it is any part of their duty to become soldiers themselves. This fight for civilization, justice and liberty, this battle of life and death for you and for me is to be fought, apparently, by somebody other than the prospective constituents of the new Minister of Inland Revenue. Their duties are the duties of peace. It is not suggested to them that they have any duties of war. But the Minister of Inland Revenue goes further:—

> In this war no one says we must go.

He makes it thoroughly binding between himself and his prospective constituents:—

> No one was forced and no one will be forced to go.

That is the statement of the Government of Canada, though the mouth of their latest-appointed minister to his electors, as to the Government's policy on national service. That policy cannot be construed to mean any accession to the military strength of ourselves or our Allies. At this time the promise made on the first of January, 1916, stands unfulfilled, it stands short of fulfilment by 170,000 men; and we have the authority of the Minister of Inland Revenue that the Government has no proposition to place before the people of this country for the fulfilment of that promise. It is not my loyalty that is in question, but the loyalty of the gentlemen who are charged with the responsibility of directing this country's affairs.

Mr. ROGERS: I trust and hope that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) wants to be fair. He heard the Prime Minister give a detailed statement of enlistments in one form or another in Canada showing a total enlistment of 434,000. I am sure he accepts the statement of the Prime Minister as being accurate, it having been prepared with the greatest possible care to present to this House and to the country. I am sorry, therefore that he should make the statement that we are still 170,000 short of the 500,000 pledged a year ago. I do not think he desires to give out information which is not in accordance with the facts, especially the facts as presented to this House by the Prime Minister.

Mr. OLIVER: I think my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) can hardly have followed my argument. Perhaps he was not in his place when I was making my statement. I did not dispute the number of enlistments, but I stated that there is a consideration in connection with these figures known as wastage, which was not taken into account in the number of enlistments given by the Prime Minister. We are not fair to ourselves or to the country when we do not take that wastage into account in estimating the number of our men. We have only the right to count our effectives. Good intentions do not count in war unless they are backed up. However good the intentions of a man may be, if they are not backed by military service they are of no use to stop the Germans. My point is that the Prime Minister should not take credit to us for having enlisted so many men but only for having enlisted so many effectives. As to that number I gave the authority of the gentleman at the head of the National Service League of Toronto for the statement that the wastage—that is, rejects—from that number of enlistments was 60,000. I have every reason to believe that that is measurably correct. I hope the hon. gentleman will not think that there is any question of veracity as between the Prime Minister and me.

Mr. ROGERS: But that would not account for anything like the difference that the hon. gentleman has given.

Mr. OLIVER: The Prime Minister has not suggested that the British reservists, the French reservists, and the reservists of other allied nations, the munition workers, and some others that he counted in his gross total, were to be included as helping to implement his promise of 500,000 men. These had nothing to do with the promise made by the Prime Minister a year ago last January.

Mr. ROGERS: The promise made had to do with the total number that should represent Canada in the conflict, and the figures given last night show that enlistments, including all classes, numbered, up to last night, 434,000.

Mr. OLIVER: If the statement made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) is warranted by the Prime Minister, I am perfectly satisfied to accept it. If the Prime Minister, in promising to the Allies 500,000 men from Canada, included or intended to include all these classes to which I have referred, I am perfectly willing to accept the statement in that sense. But that was not the understanding we had at that time; that was not the boast we made when we said we were going to recruit 500,000 men for the fighting line of the Allies. But, even if we are to count those rejected as not qualified for the service, and those who went forward because they were called by their several countries and without jurisdiction of ours, we are still short something over 50,000 men. So, there still is required some measure to implement the promise made, even if we accept the figures as referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. HAZEN: I think my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) is in error. The figures of enlistment given are of men who have enlisted, passed the medical examination, and been enrolled. I think the hon. gentleman is wrong—I say it with all respect for him—in the effect he gives to the term "wastage." That term refers to men who have gone to the front and have afterwards been incapacitated for service, and their places taken by those held in reserve. It refers to men who were fit for service and have been rendered unfit, and not merely those who were physically unfit at the time they were enlisted. The man who passes the medical examination and is accepted must be assumed to be fit; he has been accepted as a fighting man.

Mr. OLIVER: My argument does not rest on the question whether rejections were many or few. I am willing to accept the figures that are given. But I must take some figures. I quite agree with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that the figures given by the Prime Minister show the number of men who passed the medical examination and were enrolled. But of these men some have been found to be unfit before they reached the firing line. My judgment would be that we are not entitled to count these men as our contribution toward the winning of the war. No matter how good the intentions of these men may have been, they have not helped to win the war, on the contrary, they have been, in proportion to their numbers, an enormous charge upon the treasury and to that extent have prevented the winning of the war. But it is not for me to argue that point; my point is that the Government's promise—or I would rather say the country's promise—of 500,000 men has not yet been implemented and the Government has not come forward with any proposal looking either directly or indirectly to the fulfilling of that promise. Whether the number needed be many or few, that fact remains without argument, and I still maintain that the men who have not been qualified to go into the fighting line should not, in honesty and fairness, be counted by us as a contribution to the fighting forces of the Allies. Moreover, they have been a burden upon our resources instead of being a strength to our Allies.

It may be said that this inaction of the Government in regard to the fulfilment of our promise is not a serious matter. It is true that National Service cards have been sent out. There has been a great deal of discussion about them; some of them have been answered and some have not. It has been said that, in any case, no harm has been done. Unfortunately, that is not the fact; the discussion that has arisen and that has circulated, so to speak, around this National Service proposal has done a great deal of harm. Instead of the National Service proposal being a measure in aid even of industrial conscription, if you like, or compulsory industrial service, the effect of it has been to decrease in large measure the industrial power of the country Our friends, if I may be permitted to make this suggestion—I cannot come to any other conclusion—talking of compulsion in one part of the country and talking no compulsion in the other part, have unfortunately convinced the people in one part of the country that compulsion is impending, with the result that those who do not desire to submit to compulsion, either industrial or military, have, by simply exercising their powers of locomotion and stepping across the line, put themselves out of the reach of compulsion either industrial or military. I will not dwell on this subject at any great length, but it has reached such a point that the Government itself saw fit to publish in the newspapers of Canada on the opening day of Parliament a declaration to reassure the people that National Service did not mean compulsory service either for industrial or military purposes. The idea that was first given out that National Service meant fulfilling our promise of 500,000 fighting men gradually dwindled, until now it does not mean any kind of service at all; and the Prime Minister when he discusses the reply to the Address does not even allude to what at one time was considered to be a most important and vital question, and one that, to quote the ex-Minister of Militia, might fairly be considered to be his baby.

The question may reasonably be asked: we have not fulfilled our promise; what is proposed to be done about it? I am not charged with the responsibility of directing the affairs of this country, or with the responsibility of having originated this National Service proposal, which has done no good, has done so much harm, and has finally died in the hands of those who brought it forth. But I will say this: when the war begun we undertook to play our part in that war by voluntary service. My contention is that under voluntary service we have done wonders, and the greatest wonder of all is that we have done so much under the adverse conditions. Voluntary service has never had a chance in this country under the administration of our friends. For my own part I have said in this House before, and I am prepared to say it again, that in the case of such a world struggle as we are now engaged in National Service is the only logical service; National Service, I say, that will call up the manhood of the nation for military service. But it must be recognized that there are many things that are right in theory that it is not possible to put into practice. I do not challenge the Government because they have not put conscription in force, although they talked it, hinted at it, and tried to get credit for it without doing it. The fault I have to find is that, depending on voluntary service, we never gave voluntary service a fair chance. It would take too long to cover the different features of the system of enlistment that has prevailed to show in how many ways the enthusiasm of our people has been slapped in the face by the method of administration of our military affairs. We have heard to-day something of the position in which our forces find themselves in England or in France. Nothing has been said in regard to what has occurred in England or in France that compares in any degree with what has occurred right here in Canada under our own administration of our own military affairs amongst our own people. If there is any other way in which enlistment could be discouraged at the hands of our military administration, I have not yet heard of it and I am unable to conceive of it. Such enlistment as has taken place—speaking of experience within my own knowledge—has taken place because of the sense of duty that has arisen in the minds of the men who have given themselves for the service. Men have travelled hundreds of miles on foot in the country in which I live to offer themselves as soldiers of the Empire.

They have come into the city of Edmonton—this was in the early days of the war—responding to the call which was sent out, expecting that their services were needed. They have come in without money; they have been told that they were not needed; they have been unable to secure employment, and have had to accept charity, these men who had offered their lives to serve the country. Times changed, and where in those days men travelled hundreds of miles and offered themselves and were refused—and I may say were refused with insult in many cases—last winter there were established in the city of Edmonton recruiting headquarters for, I think, six separate battalions—this number of battalions to be recruited all at once in a small place. What was the result? Competition amongst the officers to secure the filling up of their contingents; men who were not physically fit were, in many cases, taken on for the purpose of filling up the ranks. Instead of the service being kept at a high level, it was allowed to deteriorate, and the difficulty of filling the regiments became greater as time went on. Not only so, but while these battalions were recruiting in Edmonton, other units from all over the Dominion of Canada were authorized to go in there and set up recruiting offices and call for men. At the present time there is a battalion recruiting in Edmonton, with headquarters some place in New Brunswick—the Macleans, I think it is. Then recently I saw that the Camerons had a recruiting office in Edmonton. While officers were authorized to recruit these six battalions in Edmonton, their efforts were made more difficult by every conceivable branch of the service being authorized to establish recruiting offices in that city. On top of that there comes the policy that these battalions, which have been gathered under the direction and control of certain officers, are to be broken up, that the recruiting of a battalion is only a matter of form; that the recruiting of the battalions is only in name, that it is only the gathering up of so many men, and when they are gathered up and taken across they cease to have any identity or any relation to the locality from which they come. Why such a policy was ever introduced it is impossible to say, but surely it would strike anyone that the idea of locality and of personal associations would be the strongest element in securing the enlistment of men who were going out to risk their lives, and whose lives would depend in large measure upon the faithfulness of the comrades who were with them—surely above everything else an effective recruiting policy would consider the idea of gathering men together from the same locality, men of mutual relationship, men who would have confidence and faith in each other under extreme circumstances. Under such circumstances, if they were serving under trusted officers we might expect to get the benefit of the idea of locality and the idea of family relationship—of every idea that produces enthusiasm and willingness to serve. Everybody knows, it is historic, that over one hundred years ago the British Government raised regiments in the highlands of Scotland, at that time none too loyal to the then reigning house. Absolutely on that idea and with that ideal, regiments were raised whose names and whose fame have come down through more than one hundred years, until to-day they are names to conjure with. Surely what was good policy in those days is good policy down to this very day, because we read in the accounts of the fighting that is going on descriptions of the work of this regiment and that regiment and the other regiment, the work of the Sussex, of the Middlesex, of the Suffolks, of the Norfolks, men whose name means something to the localities from which they came. Surely the principle that is so sound and good in the British Islands might have been found of some use in Canada. But it was not. It was not only ignored, but it seemed that the authorities absolutely went out of their way to discredit it in every form, shape and manner.

Just one word with regard to the position of the officers who have been authorized to raise battalions. It may be that some may have been authorized as officers to raise battalions who did not have military experience and whose appointment was not warranted by the circumstances. I shall say nothing of that. I assume that the man who was appointed to raise a battalion was the right man to appoint for the purpose, and the fact that he did raise the battalion is evidence that in that respect at any rate he was the right man for the purpose. I have in mind a man who has served for many years, first in the British Army, and afterwards in the Northwest Mounted Police and then in the South African war. Finally he was authorized to raise a battalion at Edmonton. On the strength of his military experience and on the strength of his personal standing, he did raise a battalion without any serious difficulty. Surely such a man with such a battalion, raised under such circumstances—surely it would be right and proper that that battalion should go to the front intact under such leadership.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman not know why battalions were broken up?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know why that one was.

Mr. BURNHAM: I can give a little information. When word would come in from the front that ten thousand or fifteen thousand or twenty thousand men were needed as reinforcements, the brigade officer would come to the battalion officer commanding and say: How many men have you? And he would say, I have two hundred and fifty. How many have you? I have two hundred and fifty. How many have you? I have five hundred. He takes the men. What would you do? Would you say because the whole battalion could not go that nobody could go at all, and that the men at the front should not be reinforced?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not a military man like my hon. friend, and I cannot give him an answer in that respect. But I think if his suggestion is well founded and that out of a whole battalion in training in England only two hundred and fifty men would be available, it is rather an unfortunate situation.

Mr. BURNHAM: Some men had joined perhaps six months before and some three. The men who had been drilling for six months might be fit, but the other might not have had training in bayonet drill or bombing. What would you do with them? Would you send them into the trenches and murder them?

Mr. OLIVER: I am afraid that my hon. friend and I cannot come to an understanding on this point. I do not know whether he ever heard of the definition of metaphysics. Metaphysics was defined by one Scotchman to another in this way: when you hear two men arguing together, if the one that is listening does not know what the other is talking about, and if the other does not know either, that is metaphysics. My hon. friend will forgive me if we do not pursue this discussion. I was not arguing at the moment at all on the merits of the policy; I was arguing as to the consequences to the officers who were placed in that position, who, having been authorized to raise a battalion, having raised that battalion, having taken it to England expecting to render service in the capacity in which they were authorized by this Government, find themselves with the battalion taken away from them, find themselves in Great Britain without occupation, find themselves there, discredited, with or without reason. I ask this House what is the position of other officers recruiting other regiments when this is recognized as their probable fate. I have in mind men who gave up good business in Edmonton in order to, as they believed, serve their country; who were authorized to raise battalions, did raise them, went to England, had their battalions taken away from them. These men had some ambition, I suppose, to serve their country, had some ambition possibly to do credit to their families, their relatives and their friends, but as long as they live, as long as their children live after them, they will never get over the disgrace that has been placed upon them by the action of this Government. How can they say whether the battalion was taken from them because of their inefficiency or because of other reasons? There is no way that these men can justify themselves to the people from amongst whom they come. A more unmerciful, a more outrageous, exercise of authority never was perpetrated.

How could there be success in recruiting if the men upon whom the country depended for success were dealt with in the manner in which they have been dealt with by the Administration of my hon. friend?

You wonder that there has not been more recruiting? It is a miracle that there has been as much recruiting as there has. Sentiment has a great deal to do with enlistment. Enthusiasm must be aroused or men will not make the sacrifice. It has been the policy in the conduct of this war to in every way prevent the arousing of enthusiasm. I do not speak of the action of this Government; I speak of the action of the Government across the seas, coincided in by our friends here. I speak of the censorship. If there is one thing that people are entitled to know, it is the truth. If there is one thing that people are entitled to know in regard to military operations, in regard to military sacrifices, it is the truth; and it has been the policy, since the opening of this war, on that side of the Atlantic and on this side, to use the power of government to not only conceal the truth, to not only prevent the truth from being expressed, but, worse than that; instead of the censorship being used for its legitimate purpose of preventing military information from reaching the enemy, the censorship has been used for the purpose of protecting those in authority from the consequence of their incompetence and inefficiency at the hands of an informed and outraged public. I do not hold our friends here responsible for that except that they are co-partners in an iniquity that has done more harm to the military enthusiasm of this Dominion than all other causes put together.

It is a serious matter to speak of these questions, but we are in serious circumstances and if we are to meet the conditions that still face us, we must learn from what has taken place in the past and those of us who stand on the floor of Parliament will be doing less than our duty if we do not declare in what way there have been shortcomings on our part or on the part of those who are even higher up than we are. It is our right to know the truth and not have the authority of the Government of Canada or of the Empire used to suppress the truth or to distort the truth or try to conceal the iniquitous incompetence of those in authority.

I will not weary the House by going into further reasons why voluntary enlistment has not succeeded to the extent that it was hoped it would. Enough has been said to prove that the voluntary system has not had a fair trial in this country and that if we are to implement our promise of 500,000 men we must change our methods in regard to voluntary enlistment, bring ourselves more into line with the sentiment of the people, deal honestly and fairly by the people, give everybody concerned a square deal and then we may expect, if we can ever expect, to meet the conditions that we have to face.

I said a little while ago that I did not wish to be considered as criticising the Government, simply as the Government. I speak of the Government as the directors of the affairs of the people. I consider the people of Canada as partners with the Government in so far as the administration of war affairs has gone and in so far as the Government has not been criticised for the administration of those affairs. The time has come, it seems to me, when we must criticise if we are going to improve. We must talk plainly and frankly; and the Government, being the Government, must of course take the brunt of criticism. But I do not wish to absolve the people of Canada at large, nor ourselves on this side of the House in so far as we may be responsible for conditions as they are.

The question arises, what is best to be done to bring about an improvement, and first of all, what is the reason that things are as they are? As I said, I hold the Government responsible only as I hold the people responsible. The Government has failed in many respects because the people have not been awake to the exigencies and urgencies of the case. Had the people of Canada been more alive to the conditions as they exist, had they criticised the Government more freely in time of war, there is no doubt that we should have had more efficient and more energetic action at the hands of the Government. The Government of to-day is the mind of the Parliament of to-day, and the Parliament of to-day is the mind of the people as it was over five years ago. We have a parliament elected under peace conditions, when there was no thought of war; we have in power a Government representing the mind of that Parliament, and carrying on the affairs of this country and administering its share of the war in the year 1917 on the ideas of 1911. It is not reasonable to expect that this Parliament elected as it was at that time, and this Government, representing the mind of Parliament as it was at that time, could by any possibility have the point of view of the people of this country at the present time. We have a peace Administration in office, when above everything else we ought to have a war Administration in office. We should have a Parliament elected by the people who have learned, in this last year above all others, what war means, who know the sacrifices that war calls for, and who know that those sacrifices are the only means whereby wars can be won. If we are to have an effective war administration of our affairs we must go back to the people and get their mandate as their mind is to-day. What has occurred in Great Britain has occurred in Canada. The Parliament of Great Britain, as it was, was elected under conditions of peace, and the Government of Great Britain, as it was, came to power under conditions of peace. When war broke out, that Government and that Parliament dealt with the war conditions from a peace standpoint. It is not possible to win wars by peace methods. Wars must be won by war, and the people of Great Britain have had occasion twice since the war began to take such measures as to bring those in authority more in line with the idea of winning the war by war; until in Great Britain .today, in free Britain, Britain which has laid the foundation of the world's liberty and given the example of constitutional government to the world, to-day in Great Britain, under the stress of war, we have, with the consent of the people, a dictatorship as absolute as it was in the days of Cromwell, for the purpose of winning the war, and as the only means of winning the war.

They have not appealed to the people in Great Britain. It is not for me to say whether they should or should not. But I say this: that in Canada we do not want a dictatorship. We want to continue as a free democracy, and in order to do that we must rest our Parliament upon the mandate of the people; we must bring our Parliament and our Government in line with the mind of the people of to-day. With 70,000 casualties, spread over Canada from ocean to ocean, which is a pretty thick sprinkling in the homes of our country, and with nearly 20,000 of the pick of our manhood having passed out of our lives, there is no doubt that the people of Canada to-day are not the people they were a year ago. They do not look at the war to-day as they did a year ago; they have different ideas, and it is right that they should have an expression of those ideas through a new Parliament. We do not want a dictatorship in this country, no matter how great the man may be. We want free government, and the only free government is government by the people; government by the people as expressed at the polls. I am at a loss to know for what reason the people of Canada are not considered to be the best judges of the welfare of Canada. Canada is made up of its people. It is the people of Canada who are paying for the war in money and in blood. There is no authority higher than the people to whom we can go for guidance or direction in this case. It is only reasonable, then, that, when we have come to a point where we have found ourselves unable to fulfil the promise solemnly made by us to ourselves and to our Allies as to the part that we should take in this war, we should go to the people and get their mandate as to winning the war.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton): Mr. Speaker, as I feel a little hoarse to-night, if it would be agreeable to the leader of the Government, I would like to move the adjournment of the debate, although, of course it is my duty to go on.

Hon. Mr. ROGERS: I am sure I would be very pleased to oblige my hon. friend, but it is very early, and as we adjourned last night at a very early hour, we would like to get on. If my hon. friend would go on for a while, we would consider adjournment later on.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have to address you for the first time under more or less physical disability on account of a cold, and I also regret that the leader of the House does not think it advisable to consider the physical condition in which I find myself. I will, however, deal briefly with the question which is before the House; but before entering upon any discussion of the subject more particularly before us, let me follow the precedent of the right hon. leader of the Government and the right hon. leader of the Opposition in congratulating yourself, Sir, upon the high office to which you have been elevated as the first Commoner of this great country of ours. Let me hope, Sir, in following in the path of the great and learned men who have occupied the position which you now occupy, that for the sake of our beloved province by the sea, the precedents which you establish shall do honour and justice to that fair province of which you and I and all other Nova Scotians are so justly proud. The province of Nova Scotia has given great men to the service of this nation. She has given three premiers to the Dominion of Canada and she has given great, capable, and efficient men to the heads of the various important departments of the administration of this country. But, Sir, this is the first time within my memory that the province of Nova Scotia has furnished a Speaker to this House.

It has been my good fortune to live under three sovereigns, eight prime ministers of the Dominion of Canada, and to have occupied a seat in this House under five Speakers. My experience is that Speakers are more autocratic in their ways and manners than even sovereigns or prime ministers. That is no doubt attributable to the fact that they have a more lively and clear appreciation of their own importance and responsibilities. I am sure, Sir, from the knowledge that I have of you as a young man of education and ability, that you will, although not I hope in an autocratic manner or in any domineering way, carry forward in your career as a Speaker of this House the traditions of those who have gone before. I am glad even at this late hour—I will not call it the eleventh hour of the life of this Government; I think it is nearer the twelfth hour of the life of this Government—that they are beginning to realize that we have some men of prominence in the province of Nova Scotia. So far the right hon. leader of the Government has not been willing to give us any great recognition; but now, even at this late hour, I am pleased that he is beginning to recognize that we have such men. It is not the long bow of the leader of the Government to have a high appreciation of the men we have in Nova Scotia, and indeed it is rather his weakness that he has not a proper appreciation of the men that we have in Canada, for it is not so very long ago since he put himself on record as telling us that there were a few things we could do in a quiet, domestic way, but that when it came to breaking out into new industries, such as the building of ships, and the preparing of warships and getting ourselves into a proper state of defence, it would be at least fifty years, when the present generation and the present Parliament would all be dead, before we could begin. That was rather discouraging news for the people of Nova Scotia, who have not been accustomed to that sort of thing. In Nova Scotia, we have been accustomed to very much like the idea of the Irishman who was put into competition as to how well he could take a man's measure. The Englishman had one way and the Scotchman had another, and then the Irishman said: "Why, sir, if you could show me the corner around which a man went I could take his measure and make him a suit of clothes." It has been our habit in Nova Scotia to adapt ourselves quickly to circumstances and get along with any new enterprise, and it would be almost as easy for you to keep a duck from swimming as to keep a Nova Scotian from building ships and manning them if the opportunity were at all presented.

The speech from the Throne is not very wealthy, nor very fat in materials for the purpose of discussion. There is nothing very new in it and nothing which is of any striking importance to the people of this country. There are, of course, references to the war, which is the all-absorbing topic, not only to the people of this country, but to the people of the whole Empire, and after such eloquent addresses as have been made by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), and the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), without mentioning the address of the Prime Minister himself, the question of the war, its requirements and our duty in respect to it have been very well threshed out, and there is not the same fresh flavour about discussing it now that there was at the commencement of this discussion, although the debate is not very old.

I come, Sir, from a country which has done much for the purpose of enforcing and enabling the people of this country to do themselves proud on the question of the war and the question of the defence of this country. We hear on some occasions that we are participating in this war only as a sort of side-show, and that we are not obliged to put forth very much effort in a direct way because the fighting is not so much ours as it is of the countries on the other side that are directly engaged in it. The Canadian people have not taken that view of the war. We have taken it to be our particular case and we take it to be the war of our country.

In the province of Nova Scotia from which I come, as I say we have done ourselves proud in the number of good men and true whom we have sent for service of the country. And there is no limit at which we can stop except the final one of the establishment of peace upon the ground upon which we had peace, happiness and security before the war broke out. That is the only mandate we have from the people of Nova Scotia in rendering aid either to the Government of the day or to any other Government which may have to deal with the war. I say we are proud of our soldiers and of what they have done for our country.

We are proud of those soldiers whether French Canadians, English Canadians, Irish Canadians or Scotch Canadians, who have sprung forward to fight in this common cause for our country and its destiny. We are proud in our perfect confidence that they will continue to maintain the traditions of their forefathers and will secure for us a continuation of that freedom which we enjoy.

As to what the duties of the Canadian people are in this regard, I do not think I can set them forth in any language of my own that will be half so appropriate as that used in a message addressed to the Canadian people by my beloved leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as published in the Canadian Liberal monthly of the current month. I do not propose to read the whole of that highly-valued message, but will give only that portion of it that bears particularly upon the special point I am making, the duties of the Canadian people in this war:

> Canadian fathers, mothers, and wives sacrificed their dear ones, when their dear ones donned the King's uniform; of these, many have given to the cause the last full measure of devotion and now sleep and will forever sleep in the soil of Old France. The rest of us owe it to them that we also make sacrifice, sacrifice of feelings, of prejudice, of comfort, of leisure, of gains. Such sacrifice is a better monument to the fallen and wounded than either bronze or marble, and the best monument of all is the stern determination that their lives and limbs were not given in vain.
> While we claim, and with just cause claim to have done much, our efforts pale almost to nothing when compared with the exertions the almost inconceivable exertions of Great Britain, of France, of Russia and of Italy.
>
> In those countries there has been a constant effort towards concentration in the one object of bringing the war to a triumphant conclusion. This has produced in France especially not only a growing union of all the forces of the nation, but also a union of souls. Antagonisms which before the war seemed irreconcilable have now well high disappeared, and opinions, even the most heterogeneous are now embraced in the sacred union.
>
> Let us imitate this noble example. Let us here and now sink passions, prejudices, vain and idle recriminations. Let us when criticism is needed, criticise without bitterness, only by appeals to reason, and above all let us bend all our energies towards making Canada an effective factor in the struggle.
>
> The heart of the nation must beat with one accord and one desire. Thus and thus only can Canada attain the full standard of what she owes to herself and her future and with such an inspiration, the people will rise to a consciousness of national power and national character which will be enduring and permanent for the welfare and grandeur of our Dominion.
> Whether victory and peace be near or distant, our resolve will not falter. We will continue to the end, calmly, firmly and grimly determined to do our share so that this terrible scourge of war may forever pass away from us. And there is hope—hope not founded merely on desires and aspirations but on appreciable facts—that victory will bring us measurably near to an era when war will have become so odious, that the nation which would attempt it, would have to face the majesty and combined strength of the whole civilized world.

I am glad the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition thought it proper to put his views in this shape so that the people of Canada might know clearly and distinctly where he stands on this question of what we should do for the prosecution of the war—the establishment of peace and the continued unity and strength of the great Empire to which we belong. I do not know how it strikes other hon. gentlemen, but to me it is a sad thing to see small, I might almost say contemptible, people in this country trying to make capital out of the fact that the great man who leads the Opposition happens to be of French ancestry and to speak the French language, trying to give the impression that this must make him disloyal to his King and country trying to "play politics" with this contemptible idea, even at a time when we are in the midst of this great struggle and when every man should bend his thoughts and energies to the one purpose of winning the war. But let me assure my great leader that, so far as Nova Scotia is concerned and so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, we have known him too long and too well, we have too much faith in him, for such ideas to have any hold upon us; that he stands with us as our leader our beloved leader, a leader in whom the people have always had confidence that he would be loyal and devoted in the performance of his public duties. It would be a strange thing indeed if a man did not show signs of the nationality to which he belonged. I can tell this House that while I profess to be as loyal to my King and country as a man can possibly be, I should think less of myself than I do if my heart did not respond to the memory of the hills and vales of old Scotland. No man can rise to his full manhood unless he has behind him the ideal of his nationality and of his people and of the principles for which they stand. It does not make me less a Canadian or less a Britisher if I have a lingering love and regard for the dear old hills of Scotland; nor does it make a French Canadian less a Britisher or less capable of being true to the Crown of Great Britain, and to everything that that Crown and the British flag represents, because, forsooth, he happens to speak

French, or because his ancestors were born in that great country which stands by our side to-day so loyally and so effectively in support of that which is right and true and in the service of the best interests of civilization and humanity.

I have pointed out where the people I have the honour to represent stand in connection with the war and what we purpose doing in connection with it. Criticism is not always pleasant, but, after all, is it not the duty of men who are sent here as representatives of the people to say what they think should be brought to the notice of the Government if there are defects in the administration of affairs at Ottawa. If things are not going as we think they ought to go, does it not seem reasonable that we should give our opinion in a fair and reasonable manner as to what we think ought to be done? Ancient sacred history tells us that certain men may be regarded as watchmen on the watch-towers of their country. The watchman of a constituency is the man who is sent to this House by the free people of that county to represent it. This particularly refers to members of the Opposition, who sit here as watchmen on the tower; and the pronouncement is: Woe unto the watchman if he does not prepare when danger is approaching. It is therefore our duty to point out to the Government their shortcomings and wherein they could do better. If they take our advice, well and good; if not, their blood be on their own head—the responsibility is entirely theirs.

The results that I speak of as having been brought about by our people in connection with this war have been achieved, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) practically in the teeth of the worst kind of maladministration, whether the Government of to-day and the officers who are particularly appointed by it are responsible or not. This is a country in which we have responsible government, and we hold the heads of departments responsible for these things; it is the only source which we can really get at. We have to look to them for the proper administration of affairs; if they fall short of what we expect them to do, we have to bring it to their notice, and if they do not comply with our fair and reasonable requests, we can only do like Paul of old: we shall appeal to Caesar and to Caesar we shall go. The people of this country will be the Caesar; the people of this country will judge them upon their merits. If, as I have said, we do not point out these things, the fault will be ours. We do not object to proper expenditures of money, but we must have parliamentary responsibility for these expenditures. I must point out to the parties responsible for the administration of the Militia Department that this has not been the case. We have already pointed out to you, Mr. Speaker, that in the province of Nova Scotia we had some transactions in connection with military matters in which no business ability was shown. We have in this House and in committee dealt with such an important matter as the purchase of horses in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, particularly in Nova Scotia. We have had the spectacle in the province of Nova Scotia of a man having been entrusted with the expenditure of something like $100,000 for the purchase of horses for military purposes, and it was acknowledged in this House by no less a person than the Prime Minister that nobody was responsible for this man's appointment. The Prime Minister, speaking in this House, said that he should never have been appointed; that he had not the age, experience or ability to perform the services for which he had been appointed, and that as a member of the House he should not have accepted the position. The Prime Minister did not know who appointed him; the ex-Minister of Militia, who was sitting in the House, did not know who had appointed him. Nobody knew anything about his fitness or qualifications. The question was asked: who gave him the money? If there is a place around Ottawa where a man can get $100,000 without anybody appointing him or giving him authority, I think some of us would like to know where that place is. Here was a man who got $100,000 which he checked out in Nova Scotia for such horses as you have heard about so often that it would weary you to hear anything further about them. The responsibility is brought home to the Minister of Militia of that day for the expenditure of this money, whether he wants it or not. The people of Nova Scotia and of all Canada will want to know what sort of Government we have when a man can get $100,000 to expend in this way without anybody knowing where he got it, how he got it, who gave him the authority, or, as an hon. gentleman suggests, what he did with the money. The elementary principles of business teach us that it would be a simple thing to have this man bonded for the expenditure of $100,000, and that there should be some proper record of how he got the $100,000 and of what he did with it. The only record, however, we have about it is that there was considerable activity around a glue factory for a few days somewhere in the province of Quebec and that a certain unfortunate man was read out of the House and, to some extent, out of the Tory party. That is all that the people of Nova Scotia and the people of Canada have for their $100,000. And that, sir, is a very small fraction of the mal-administration in matters of this kind connected with the war. I have simply taken this as an illustration, an incident that shows how this thing was done, and the recklessness and carelessness with which the money of the people was expended for no purpose. We hear of certain enterprises, industrial and otherwise, being conducted, not for their own intrinsic value, and not for what they are really producing, but for the purpose of playing the stock markets with their stocks and bonds. That would appear to be to some extent the scheme of the Government in connection with military matters in this country. You may well say that that is an extraordinary statement to make, that the Government was simply going in for the making of money in connection with military affairs in this country. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) read a quotation yesterday which is the basis of the statement which I now make. That is a statement made by the late Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) in the correspondence between him and the Prime Minister, in which the late minister says that on one occasion he was held up for four long months in carrying on what he had to do in connection with certain contingents, because, forsooth, certain parties wanted to make money out of the business of buying trucks, so that for these four months that contingent was held up. The language of the Minister of Militia is to be found on page 26 of the Hansard of yesterday, and is there quoted from the minister's letter, so that if it is not correctly given there has been ample opportunity of correcting it in this House, as the right hon. Prime Minister spoke after the conclusion of the speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). This is what was said by the ex-Minister of Militia, as quoted in this House yesterday:—

> It is difficult for me to recall where you have actively supported me in the passage of any Order in Council concerning the upbuilding of the militia when opposed by two Members of the Cabinet usually antagonistic to anything proposed by me. As you are aware, it took up four months in the midst of this great war to fight through the principles of purchasing, for the Second Division, trucks at the lowest wholesale prices instead of allowing large commissions to local agents who would have nothing whatever to do with securing the order.

That, sir, is the charge, that is the indictment. It is an indictment with, perhaps, only one count, but is one on which, if it were placed before the people of this country, with the evidence that supports it, only one verdict could be returned, and that verdict condemnatory of any government that would sit down wrangling and fighting for four long months over a matter of this kind. It would be bad enough to do so for one week. It would be horrifying to see this done for one day. But here, for four long months, the regiments were held up because there were two men in the Cabinet, two men leading some other factions, I suppose, who wanted to filch money out of the treasury of this country and took contemptible means of getting it, by holding up these contracts for trucks. It was nothing that the sons of Canada were being knocked down like nine pins at the front, that they were killed and torn and slaughtered, with no support to come back up behind them of their own Canadian friends. That was nothing at all. Although we had the men and the means and the ability to support them, four months had to go by while these men stood with a revolver at the head of this minister, saying: You must give us toll; we stand at the toll gate and you must give us money, otherwise your men cannot get across, we care not what may happen. That is proven to the hilt in the evidence of the minister who was in charge and who wanted to get the business put through. He does not give the names of the members of the Cabinet who did this, but it was evidently done, that is shown beyond peradventure. If I wanted to condemn this Government I should not want any stronger indictment than that they, a war government, the war being the principal thing, would delay over this matter for four months, would stand by and see their brethren shot like rabbits in the trenches in France, with no support going to them, all held back for the miserable and contemptible purpose of making a few dollars out of the trucks and wagons that would have to be taken over with this contingent.

I think I have fulfilled my contract with the leader of the House, and possibly he will allow me to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. McKenzie, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at ten o'clock p.m.

Wednesday, January 24, 1917.

The House met at Two o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

COAL SHORTAGE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MICHAEL STEELE (South Perth): I wish to inquire of the Minister of Railways regarding the coal situation throughout Ontario. Speaking more particularly for the western portion of the province, the people there are face to face with the most serious coal famine they have ever experienced. Of the factories depending upon steam power, some are already closed, and many of them will be compelled to close within a very short time. Householders, too, in both town and country are very short of the necessary fuel, and in many homes the coal bin is empty. I know that the minister has had this matter before him, because through his exertions and the efforts of the Railway Commission some relief was afforded to certain sections a few weeks ago. The situation, however, is becoming so serious again that I know the people of the provinces will be glad to be assured that every effort is being made to relieve what is a most distressing situation. I should like to inquire of the minister what prospects there are for relief in the near future.

Hon. Mr. COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): I will bring my hon. friend's remarks before the Railway Commission and ask them to proceed as they did before, and try and relieve the situation. I know from my experience with the Intercolonial that cars are exceedingly short on the American side, and the American railways are very loath to allow them to come off their lines into Canada; and of course we have no jurisdiction to compel them. If the roads can get the coal and bring it into Canada, we will see that it is delivered.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. G. C. Wilson (Wentworth) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, January 23.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton) (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, before the debate was adjourned last night I was calling the attention of the House to a portion of the very important correspondence which had taken place between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Militia, and in order that it may be plain to you, Sir, and to hon. gentlemen, I will take the liberty of again reading that short paragraph so as to connect up my remarks, with what I was saying at the hour of adjournment last night. This is a quotation from the letter of the ex-Minister of Militia to the right hon. the Prime Minister. As I stated last night, this quotation must be accepted as true because it has passed muster, in the sense of not having been replied to or contradicted by the Prime Minister during the course of the correspondence, and it has passed the further test of having been quoted by the right hon. leader of the Opposition in his speech on Monday last, which was delivered before the right hon. the Prime Minister spoke, and the Prime Minister in the course of his address did not think it proper to make any reference by way of contradiction to this paragraph from the letter of the ex-Minister of Militia. I think, therefore, I have a right to believe that this is a proper statement of the facts as they existed between the Prime Minister and his late colleague. The paragraph I shall quote is but a mere scrap of the rather extended correspondence that took place between them. But it struck me at the time I read the correspondence, and I still so regard it, as a very serious matter, a matter that should receive careful consideration by the Canadian people, and a matter which I think should be brought clearly to their notice. The paragraph reads:

> It is difficult for me to recall where you have actively supported me in the passage of any Order in Council concerning the up-building of the Militia when opposed by two members of the Cabinet usually antagonistic to anything proposed by me. As you are aware, it took up four months in the midst of this great war to fight through the principles of purchasing, for the Second Division, trucks at the lowest wholesale prices, instead of allowing large commissions to local agents who would have nothing whatever to do with securing the order.

That, Sir, is a situation which if stated by any ordinary man in this country would not be believed for a moment. If that statement appeared in any partisan newspaper in the Dominion of Canada, I venture to say that, partisan as I am, I would not believe it at all; but coming as it does from the Minister of Militia, and having, as it has, the silent endorsement of the Prime Minister, there is nothing left for me but to believe that that was really the condition of affairs that existed at the time when the equipment for the Second Division was under consideration by the Cabinet. I submit that some satisfactory explanation should come from the Prime Minister as to why he should permit any such conditions as those here indicated to exist in his Cabinet. He may have unruly members in his Cabinet, members who will not always do as he would have them do; but as to their conduct, and the way in which they administer the departments over which they preside, the Canadian people hold the Prime Minister responsible, and will call him to account for the manner in which they respectively conduct the public affairs which are committed to them.

The Minister of Militia charges two members of the Cabinet in particular with having fought more vigorously than the others against him when he was trying to get this Order in Council through. It must be clear to this House and the country that those things could not be done behind the door, as far as the Prime Minister is concerned. The meetings of Council, of course, are always under his supervision, and he presides over them. I take it for granted that that is the case, particularly when he is here and able to preside over the meetings. It is not put forward as an excuse or in extenuation of the circumstances, that he did not preside over Cabinet meetings during the four months when this particular matter was under consideration. I have therefore a right to assume that he was aware who these two ministers were who were particularly fighting this vote, and who the gentlemen in the Cabinet were who were generally obstructing the progress of the country in connection with these very important matters. One would suppose that, instead of the Minister of Militia being driven out of the Council, those two ministers, whoever they were that were trying to obstruct him and to obstruct the business of the country, would be driven out of the Cabinet and other men brought into their places who would comply with the necessities of the country and see that proper speed was provided for the grave requirements of the war. Now that the Prime Minister has thought proper to put out of the Cabinet the man who was urging for speed and who stood firmly for the principle of business along business lines, and that he has kept in his Cabinet those two men, whoever they are, who were obstructing the business and who were wanting to do business, not along business lines, but along the line of improper methods—this correspondence clearly shows that graft was intended, as the commissions, according to this letter, were to go to people who were not to raise a finger in procuring the trucks—the Prime Minister before the great jury of the people of Canada must be held responsible for the conduct of those who were opposing their colleague and obstructing the business and wanting to get this commission for men who had no right at all to receive it. It is, therefore, a matter of proper criticism, and one that should be brought to the attention of the Canadian people at a stage when we are all anxious that the best should be done in connection with the war, and that every dollar of money and every moment of time should be properly utilized so that Canada may take her proper position in regard to the war. It is, therefore, important for us to know what position the Cabinet is taking, and if we find that the Prime Minister and the other members of the Cabinet are willing to stand pat for four months on a simple question of business, what can they expect of the large masses of the people who are not so directly responsible as themselves?

I am not so sure that the true reason has been given in regard to putting the ex-Minister of Militia out of office. We had from the beginning a most extraordinary kind of Cabinet: a Tory Cabinet, a Tory Government, a highly loyal Government and a highly loyal support, bearing with it at every stage the brand of loyalty and boasting of its great loyalty; but, after all, when one comes to examine into the personnel of that Government at its inception and throughout its progress from stage to stage; when one comes to its true inwardness, one finds that its personnel is not compatible with the great protestations of loyalty made in regard to it. There were two conflicting elements in the Cabinet from the beginning. There were the superloyalists, the extraordinarily loyal, represented by the former Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) and others on the one hand, and the extreme Nationalists on the other, who fought the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden and the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the death during the last campaign, and who would have nothing to do with either of them, but who, by some wonderful light which they saw on the way to Ottawa—instead of to Damascus—underwent a marvellous change, and we had this wonderful combination forming the highly loyal Cabinet presided over by my right hon. friend. I am sorry, however, to think that they were not long together in that happy combination when the Premier found it necessary to erect stalls in the council chamber and to put the members of his Cabinet into different compartments in the hope of keeping them apart, but the partition walls were evidently broken down and he could not have peace or contentment with them at all. It is no reflection upon the Prime Minister, nor upon the Government, that it was well understood in the country that a very important loyal body in Canada was recognized in the Cabinet by the selection of Sir Sam Hughes as Minister of Militia. I have reference to the great loyal Orange body in this country. In newspaper publications it has been reported that it was because he was recognized as one of the leading men of that body that he was taken into the Cabinet as representing their wishes and will, and that the distinguished gentleman who occupied the chair which you, Sir, now occupy was taken into office and given a place of promise and high position for the same reason. You can readily understand the incompatibility of the two elements, the great Nationalist crowd represented in the Cabinet by men who would have nothing to do with, and who owed nothing to, England, who had no use for the British flag except to puncture it for the purpose of ventilation—you can readily understand what sort of a happy family they would be sitting down with my good friend the ex-Minister of Militia and incidentally with the gentleman who was at one time Speaker of this House, representing the high class of loyalty exhibited by the Orange body of this country. The Government can say what they like as to why Sir Sam Hughes was driven out of the Cabinet and why the Speaker at that time, the Hon. Mr. Sproule, now the Hon. Senator Sproule, was driven out of the Chair, but the real reason was because their views were absolutely incompatible with the contentions and spirit of the Nationalist wing, and the latter prevailed, and they ate up the others and put them out of sight. That is the true reason why Sir Sam Hughes went out of the Government and why the Hon. Mr. Sproule went out of the Chair, and it is only right that the great Orange body should understand why those plays are going on and that they should look behind the curtain and see the true reason and not be fooled by supposing that it was because the musical ear of the ex-Minister of Militia was not properly tuned and that he wrote a letter which did not quite please the highly technical ear of the Prime Minister. It was not, the Prime Minister says, because of anything that was in the letter; it was not because there was anything particularly offensive in it; but it was pitched in a tone that grated so harshly on the highly sensitive nerves of the Prime Minister that the tone could not be tolerated any longer because he had enough lack of harmony in the Cabinet without allowing a voice which grated so much upon his sensibilities to remain. The real cause was a sort of house-cleaning for the purpose of pleasing the Nationalists and driving the Orange element out of the Cabinet, so far as they could be driven out.

I hope, that having been done, there will be some harmony for a little while, and it will remain to be seen whether the further expansion and extension of Nationalism in the Government or the new addition to it will receive the approval of the country. It is not for me to say, and I am not going to say anything about it. I will say this for the late Speaker, that, as the Prime Minister felt that he had to select from among the Nationalists, he made the best selection possible.

Before leaving this correspondence and dropping the subject, I wish to point out to the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) who, I am sorry, is not in his place, that he should have had some supervision over the financing of this second contingent when they were being held here. I am not sure of the number of men in that contingent. Let us take it at 50,000. With wages and expenses, it is not at all unreasonable to say that the expense of keeping this contingent would be $3 per day per man, and it would probably be more. At that rate, this country has had to pay out $18,000,000 to keep this contingent at a standstill for four months. And for what purpose? We would like to be able to give a reason for our doings at every turn in this crisis, and the people naturally want to know why this sum of $18,000,000 was expended. The reason is that a fight was going on in the Cabinet over commissions on trucks, and until that was decided the second contin-gent of this magnificent army had to be held up. The Canadian people are expected to say to those who are responsible: Well done, good and faithful servants, continue to waste the money of the country as you have wasted it in holding over this contingent. It is well that the people should know the facts of the case, and it will be for them to pass judgment.

General Hughes was got out of the Cabinet. He was made the scapegoat. We are familiar with the ritual of the scapegoat. The sins of the people were loaded upon the goat and the goat was sent out into the wilderness. The poor goat in this case was to bear the sins of the Cabinet, so you can understand how great was his burden. No doubt he was led out by two ministers. I do not know which ministers they were, but I can imagine they may have been the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). They went into the wilderness with the goat, but apparently they did not go far enough; no doubt they had to hurry back for fear someone would get an advantage in the Cabinet while they were away. The result is that the goat is back; he appears at times in this House. One can almost hear the horrified murmurs of the Minister of Finance on seeing that goat here, "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" They did not take the goat far enough, and so the old time ritual is "busted." Moses' goats did not come back; but the Borden goat has come back, and some other scheme will have to be found to get clear of it, for it is a menace to the progress of the Government. The more they beat the goat the bigger it gets. The Prime Minister seems to realise this, for in his speech the other day he indicated a desire to gently pat the goat's head and to avoid doing anything that would stir it to anger.

Throughout the whole country—or at least, certainly, in the province of Nova Scotia—matters of recruiting, encamping, training and transportation in connection with the military are run strictly on lines of political patronage. There is only one patronage committee; the same committee which deals with railway matters, public works, and marine and fisheries, deals also with everything pertaining to the military. What, think you, Sir, of such a case as this? There is a rule, I understand, that when a man is discharged from the force for some good reason, and is called upon to hand in his uniform, he is given a suit of clothes. An officer went into a certain store with a number of men so discharged, for the purpose of getting them the clothing called for under this rule. The goods were there and were found to fit the boys. A selection was made, the goods were packed, and nothing remained but to sign the bill. The officer asked the merchant, "By the way, what are your politics"? The merchant said, "It is well known what my politics are, I am a Liberal and always have been a Liberal." Whereupon the officer remarked, "I regret it very much, but I have no authority to buy anything except in a Tory store." That actually took place in one of our leading towns of Nova Scotia, and it is only a sample of how everything else is done, which shows how far this Government and its officials will go in trying to make political capital in the province of Nova Scotia and no doubt throughout the whole country. The marvel is that the Liberal boys are going to the front in the service of their country but they do go in spite of the slaps in the face they have received from officers appointed and maintained by this Tory Government.

I say that I believe that the same thing is carried on in other provinces besides Nova Scotia. I have here a clipping taken from the Toronto Globe of a few days ago. I have not heard of any contradiction or denial of the statements it makes. I have no means of knowing whether it is true or not, but quote it for what it is worth. There are hon. gentlemen here from Toronto and its neighbourhood who will know whether it is true or not; and if true, it is a fine commentary upon the conduct of the men who are entrusted with office and responsible for the state of affairs here shown:

Soldiers, Get in Line!

Is it necessary for a returned soldier in Toronto to join a Conservative ward association before he has any chance of securing a government position? Is the spoils system still in operation? Can no Liberal who has fought for his country hope to serve it in time of peace without renouncing his political creed? These questions are forced to the front by the uncontradicted statement that Sergeant Soloman, a returned soldier wounded in France, was told by Sergeant-Major Creighton at the city hall, when he applied for a position, to "go and join the Second Ward Conservative Association and get in line for a government job." The sergeant-major says he told the returned soldier to see the Conservative Patronage Committee, not to join the association, but that is a very lame excuse.

The statement made by Soloman is all the more significant when it is remembered that the Second Ward is a part of the constituency of Hon. A. E. Kemp, Minister of Militia. Does Mr. Kemp take the view of the Government's obligations to returned soldiers taken by Sergeant-Major Creighton of the city hall staff? Does he propose to confine openings in the service of the people of Canada to soldiers who can show cards of membership in Conservative associations? Having stood in line in the trenches against the enemies of the Empire, must Liberals who desire places in the public service now stand in line behind some stay-at-home ward heeler? Mr. Kemp cannot afford to ignore the issue raised by Sergeant-Major Creighton's remark to Sergeant Soloman.

I have stated what has been and is being done in Nova Scotia before the soldiers go away, but if this clipping be true—and it bears some evidence of truth—it would appear that in Ontario the patronage system in operation is such that not only before the soldiers go, but after they have placed their lives in jeopardy for their country and have come back wounded, bruised or crippled, they must bear the badge of their only saviour and salvation, showing that they are Tories, or they cannot be recognized at all. This is a sad condition of things, and I really hope that the Prime Minister and those who have to do with matters of this kind will see that such things shall not any longer be perpetrated in this great country of ours. I said last night that I was not fond of making criticisms.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am pleased, Sir, that I receive sanction and approval of this not only from my own side of the House, but clearly from the other side as well. We appeal to hon. gentlemen on the other side in respect to these matters, because the Government will not listen to us. Hon. gentlemen, will, I suppose, listen to their own friends, and so we bring these matters to their notice. I see sitting opposite me honest business men who in every walk of life outside of politics would scorn to do anything but that which was clean cut, honest and straightforward. I am sorry, however, that the bane of politics blindfolds them; they follow their leaders recklessly and carelessly, which they will do until there comes a tumbledown and they all disappear forever from view. I see opposite me to-day a gentleman for whom this country has the greatest regard and in whom it has the greatest confidence, a gentleman who has shown some independence in public life. I refer to the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle). I was thinking about him yesterday and last night when I was reading about the hold-up for four months which cost $18,000,000 of the people's money, the reason being that some Tories were fighting and strangling each other to get pelf and graft out of the blood of the people of this country. I was thinking how he would stand before the highly-cultured people of Kingston and defend the lenten season of four months which was kept for the purpose of allowing friends of his to get a slice from these truck wagons that were being slowly produced for the purposes of the war. I remind my hon. friend of these things, so that when he has not much else to do he may carefully think over the explanation that he wlil make to his people regarding them. He has taken a firm stand on other things where the evidence was not half so clear; the evidence here is unquestioned, coming from the Cabinet itself, and I am sure that whether or not he tells us anything about it, it will not receive his sanction or approval. On one occasion the hon. gentleman did take his life in his hand; he did break away, though only for a season, I am sorry to say, from the rank and file, and kicked over the traces for a little while. He found the chafing of the traces, however, so hurtful that he was glad to get back. Having had the experience of getting his legs curled up and scratched by these traces, I am afraid that it will not be so easy to get him to kick over again. However, I remind him of this as he is a sample of the many excellent gentlemen whom I see before me who would like to cut down business of this kind, but who may be afraid to do it. I warn hon. gentlemen that the great province of Ontario is an honest province—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: —and that the Ontario farmer will not stand for this thing. It would be better for them to cast out an eye or cut off a right hand before the day of reckoning than to stay by the crowd and suffer the fate of the man who does not cast out the eye or cut off the hand. Possibly that is enough said about this correspondence; I assume that it will be dealt with by other gentlemen who know more about it than I do.

Another matter to which I wish to refer will show how the friends of the Government and the Government itself expected to use the soldiers, not only in the way of patronage, but in the elections. It was refreshing to me to hear the Prime Minister speaking in the House on the opening day of this debate with regard to the soldiers' vote. He has made a roundabout face on that question; but as he has made certain other evolutions of that kind, I assume that it is an exercise which he does not find very difficult. I shall quote what I said about this Act when it was passed in 1915 and what the Prime Minister said the other day. I am sure that if hon. gentlemen did not know the contrary they would think that the remarks were those of two men speaking on the same subject and in entire accord. What I said when this Enfranchising Bill was under discussion, as it appears on page 2273 of Hansard of 1915, volume 3, was as follows:

I do not hesitate to put myself on record here—I did not speak on the second reading of the Bill—as being opposed to the measure. I believe that it is not workable and that it will only add to the difficulties already existing at the front.

The soldiers when they go to the front take upon themselves certain responsibilities, and we repose certain trusts in them. They are to do the fighting for us, and we are to provide for them in every way that we can. Their minds are not to be bothered about political or municipal affairs; they must have a free hand to deal with the very arduous and important matters they have before them. On the other hand, the soldier has to trust to the friends whom he leaves behind and to the people of the country that in his absence political matters shall be kept on an even keel. As we trust them at the front, they have to trust us here.

Then a little further on I said:—

We are called upon to give the right to vote to men who are far away from home, who are out of touch with the issues that will be threshed out in an election, and who have no knowledge of the qualifications of the candidates. Without taking shelter behind the assertion that I am not opposed to voting by soldiers, or behind any other shelter, I say that I am absolutely opposed to this Bill.

That, Sir, was the position I took upon that Bill when it was before the House. At that time the right hon. Prime Minister took a directly contrary view, and he was backed up by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and particularly backed up by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett). We were told, myself and others on this side of the House, particularly the right hon. leader of the Opposition, that we were, of course, disloyal because we ventured to say that this Act was not workable. Here, now, after thinking over this matter for two years or more, the Prime Minister himself comes back to this House and says, on page 41 of Hansard of the 22nd of this month:—

I know something of the conditions at the front, and I venture to put this thought before the House and the country: the men at the front will be not only practically, but actually, disfranchised if an election does take place in this country while they are in the trenches. That is my conviction. I say they would be actually disfranchised because, although I render every tribute to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the committee which had in hand the preparation of the Soldiers Voting Act of 1915, I am not disposed to think that the arrangements made in that Act or in any other Act that could be devised are such as to enable those men to vote, or at least any considerable number of them. You cannot predict what conditions may exist. Supposing an election came on in this country when the fiercest drive of the war was taking place. Do you imagine that the paymasters of those regiments and their commanding officers could busy themselves with handing out ballots to men whose souls were engrossed and whose lives were at stake in the enterprise in which they were engaged? There is something more than that. These men at the front have it not in their disposition, have it not in their heart or their soul to consider matters of party controversy under the conditions with which they are there confronted.

That, Sir, is the position taken by the Prime Minister to-day. It is the position that was particularly taken by myself two years ago, and I feel very proud to find that the Prime Minister has come to my way of thinking in this matter, and that we are not to have the spectacle of an endeavour to have the soldiers cast their votes in the trenches, if an election should come on. I fear, Sir, that the change of view of the Prime Minister is not altogether attributable to his mature consideration of the views which I then advanced; I believe that his statement the other day was the expression of a conviction not of the soul and of the mind arrived at by logical sequence; that is not the reason for this change of heart. The Conservative party had an experience in the taking of soldiers' votes in the province of British Columbia last summer, and the plan did not pan out as splendidly as they expected it would. The cancer of vote-losing started in the British Columbia election and seemed likely to develop more and more, and so they feared that if they afforded an opportunity to those men in the trenches to vote the same thing that happened in British Columbia would be repeated in an even greater degree, and that the end would be worse than the beginning. I am afraid that that is the reason of the change of heart of the Prime Minister, and that is why we are not to be troubled with the vote of the soldier if an election takes place now, as was intended at the time the Act was passed.

I shall be told, I suppose, that I should not criticise this Government, and that they are doing the best they can. Well, I will admit they are doing the best they can with their present personnel. But if they are doing the best they can, I do not want any better reason for turning them out, for the best they can, is not good enough for the people of this country; and we must have men whose best is equal to the occasion, and will give this country such a government as we had under the regime of my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) during the long period when the duties of government devolved upon him.

As I have stated, their best is not good enough, and we must, therefore, hope that the day is not far distant when they will realize that themselves, and do something like their brethren did in Manitoba, when they themselves discovered that the judgment of God was upon them and they moved out, bag and baggage, without waiting for any mandate from the people. We do not expect that here, but that will be the result, and that is what is going to happen as soon as the Canadian people have an opportunity of passing judgment upon these honourable gentlemen.

I was going to say that, after all, the only thing to the credit of this Government has been the war operations. They have not shown one iota of practical or constructive statesmanship from the time they took office down to the present moment. There are many able men on the other side of the House, and if any acts of constructive statesmanship have been performed by the Government, these able men will be able to tell us what they were. We are told that the Minister of Finance is entitled to great credit because of the manner in which he financed the affairs of the country. I do not think, Sir, that anybody would have given a great deal of credit to a man who would have come after Joseph in the old days. If after Joseph had filled the barns and the treasuries with gold and silver and grain and everything that was necessary, he had gone out of business and somebody had come along who had nothing to do but to measure out lavishly what was in the treasury, in the stores, in the barns, I do not think we would give such a man a great deal of credit. That was the position of the Minister of Finance. He came in here and found that he had come after seven fat years, fifteen fat years indeed, and he found the treasury full, he found the credit of the country at the highest possible pitch. In fact he found everything at his hand, in as great abundance as the heart of man could wish for or conceive. He started out to squander at a great rate, as fast as possible, and when all of the stored treasure was gone, when he had scraped the bottom of the flour barrel, he started after the people to take from them what they had gathered up during the fifteen years of plenty whilst Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power. Does anybody say that that was a great act of statesmanship, because after squandering $40,000,000 which we left to the credit of the country he now goes after the people to take from them what they had gathered up with frugality and care under the prosperous regime of Sir Wilfrid Laurier? That, Sir, is the only thing that stands to the credit of the Minister of Finance so far as constructive statesmanship or financing is concerned.

I submit that in the section of the country from which I come we have reason to complain of the conduct and management of this Government. I submit, Sir, that if proper care had been taken, if proper economy had been practised, if the moneys that we left had not been squandered as they were, public works and development in this country would not have been abandoned to the extent that they were. I submit that the programme laid down at that time in regard to railways and other matters in the province of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec, should have been carried out, but I regret to say that everything has been dropped, and nothing has been done in that part of the country. We have not had the opportunities of developing that we should have had to put us in proper touch with the commercial growth of this country. For these opportunities we must look forward to the time when the same right hon. gentleman who was ready to give us them will again be in charge of affairs in this country. I am sorry to say that we have nothing to hope for from the present Administration along these lines, and we have reason to fear that unless there is a change soon, and a stop is put to their mal-administration, it will be many years before we get back to that equilibrium between receipts and expenditures in this country that is necessary to carry on the business of the country as it ought to be carried on.

Before sitting down, Sir, I wish to refer to a matter which particularly affects the Prime Minister himself, and which, perhaps, is not of general interest to the House. I am sorry that my county of Cape Breton has not been treated so well in connection with its representation in another place in this building as it ought to have been. I wish to point out that at Confederation the great county of Cape Breton which I in part represent, had two senators. Ever since that time it has been represented by two and sometimes three senators. I am sorry to say that the Prime Minister and the Government have thought it proper to disregard the old time practice, and to-day the island of Cape Breton is not represented in the Senate at all. The only senator for Cape Breton is not a native of the county, and is not even a native of the province of Nova Scotia. He has no interest in the province of Nova Scotia, so far as I know, except a palatial residence which he occupies once in a while in the summer time. He has no interest, so far as I know, in the development of the island of Cape Breton where you get your coal, and your steel, and where everything is big and broad and prosperous in the sphere of commercial and industrial development. I submit, Sir, that if representation in the Senate means anything at all, and it certainly means something, the great island of Cape Breton, with all its industries, should have a representative who has an interest in the county and is in direct touch with the people. I wish to protest against the course taken by the Prime Minister in connection with the recent appointments, in ignoring entirely gentlemen of ability who had claims upon the Government, and in ignoring the people of that island who have a claim to be properly represented in the Senate. We have some excellent men who have sacrificed time, money, and energy, in support of the Conservative party in the county of Cape Breton; and I am sorry that the Prime Minister and the Government have seen fit to ignore them in appointing representives of that part of the country to the great body which forms a branch of the Parliament of this country. I am deeply obliged to you, Mr. Speaker, and to honourable gentlemen, for the quiet and respectful hearing which I have received in presenting my views to the House. I have presented these views in the hope that there shall be reforms in the Government, that they will cut out patronage in handling war matters for the few short months that they may have to handle them, and that they will devote their energies to one purpose and regard us as one people, so far as these questions are concerned, so that better things may prevail during the short time that they will have anything to do with the affairs of this country.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. WILLIAM ALVES BOYS (South Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in craving the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I discuss some of the questions before it, I should like first to join with those who have preceded me in extending to you my sincere congratulations upon your elevation to the high position of Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons. It has not been my pleasure to know you so long as some of those who have already referred to the matter. I think the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) claimed the pleasure of a life-long acquaintance with you. I have been in this House now for some four years, however, and during that time I have learned something of your ability, of your earnestness, of your sense of justice and fair play; and with these qualities, I feel confident that you will discharge the important duties of your office in accordance with the highest traditions of the past.

I would like to say a word or two in regard to the most helpful and patriotic work that is being done by the ladies of Canada in this crisis of our history. Much has already been said in that regard, but in my opinion too much cannot be said. The work of the women of Canada has been an inspiration to the men of Canada. I can speak with some knowledge of the noble services rendered by the women in the part of the country from which I come. In the county of Simcoe the ladies have taken part in Red Cross work, in field comfort work, in aiding the returned soldiers; and, apart from the societies which abound throughout the county, there is work being done in an endless number of homes by the ladies who are constantly knitting socks and preparing medical supplies for the soldiers. I feel that we cannot be too grateful to the women of Canada for their self-sacrificing devotion to the furtherance of the cause of freedom and justice.

I also desire to say a word or two respecting what my own county is doing in a military sense. So far, I have not placed this on Hansard, but I think it is a contribution worthy of being recorded. The county of Simcoe is a fairly large county, and I am glad to say that the County Council at its last meeting decided to devote the sum of $120,000 to the Patriotic Fund, this being the second contribution. I say this in no boastful way, because, as I have said, it is a large county. I believe that Simcoe was the first county to organize a purely rural battalion. Just about a year ago word was sent to the Prime Minister that the 157th Regiment, composed of the sons of Simcoe, had been mobilized. To-day we have a second regiment, the 177th, with some eight hundred odd men; and it is our belief that ere two or three months go by, notwithstanding the difficulty in recruiting now, the regiment will be recruited up to strength. In addition to that, and before the decision was reached to recuit a purely rural battalion, Simcoe had sent many of her sons to the city of Toronto, where they enlisted. Many of them enlisted in the 76th Regiment and are now overseas. I think, Sir, that these facts are worthy of being stated in this Parliament.

I desire to join with what has been said in regard to the work of the Prime Minister and his colleagues. I do not wish to repeat all that has been said, but it does seem to me that some of us do not fully realize the burdens that these men are bearing, the great responsibilities that fall upon them, and the time they have devoted during the past thirty months to the problems of the war I am glad to say that so far the criticisms that have been made of the ministry in this debate are not very serious. Until the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) took the floor, there was not even a ripple upon the placid waters. He was the first to offer anything in the nature of vigorous criticism, but I think we may say that it was harmless. The hon. gentleman in his criticisms reminded me a little of an individual named Bowman, who represents one of the constituencies of Bruce in the local House. He recently came to West Simcoe, and he thought he had a tale to tell there of the misappropriation of funds in connection with Lewis machine guns. I am glad to say he did not make very much headway in West Simcoe. We were able to show the people of that riding that the Lewis machine guns, instead of being scrapped, as was suggested by Mr. Bowman, were doing excellent work in the trenches. We were able to place side by side with the word of Mr. Bowman the signed letters of wounded soldiers who had returned from the front, and, needless to say, the people of West Simcoe did not hesitate in choosing between the two. I think the statements and sentiments of my hon. friend from Pictou, if they were made to the electorate, would not receive very much more favour at their hands than the sentiments of Mr. Bowman received from the electorate of West Simcoe.

The hon. member also referred to patronage, as did the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). Both these gentlemen confined their remarks in that respect to the province from which they come, and as I am not in a position to know what is going on in Nova Scotia, I will leave other hon. gentlemen who may follow me to answer them. So far as my section of the country is concerned I want to say that such remarks are unwarranted, and entirely incorrect. In my own riding, patronage, so far as military matters are concerned, is absolutely unknown. My own letters are upon record in the Militia Department to show that whenever I was called upon for the names of any merchants in my town or in the surrounding country who might be in a position to furnish supplies, I gave the names of every merchant, regardless of his politics. I make that statement with regard to military matters only; I do not for a moment pretend to do any such thing in regard to other matters. But so far as military matters are concerned, I do not think there should be any patronage, and so far as the province of Ontario is concerned, I am sure there is no such system of military patronage as the hon. gentlemen have described as prevailing in Nova Scotia.

Reference has been made by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton to the Loyal Orange Order. I had no thought of introducing the record of the Loyal Orange Order into this debate, notwithstanding some very slighting references to it that have been made by Mr. Lucien Cannon in the campaign now being waged in Dorchester. I do not know whether my hon. friend from North Cape Breton intended his remarks to be scathing or not; but I want to say to him, and to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House and the country that I am an Orangeman myself. I am proud of what the Orange Order has done in connection with the present conflict. When the first Canadian contingent went overseas no less than 6,000 of the 30,000 odd were Orangemen. It is true that that society has boasted in the past of its loyalty. Perhaps it never had an opportunity of showing its loyalty in the truest sense until this war broke out, but when that opportunity came they responded in no uncertain way, and to-day out of 400,000 enlisted men who are in uniform and fighting for the cause of liberty, over 60,000 are members of the various Orange lodges throughout the Dominion of Canada. As an Orangeman I feel proud of their response in the fight for freedom and honour.

About the only matter that I particularly desire to discuss at the moment is in connection with the existing campaign in Dorchester, Quebec. It does not seem to me, Sir, that this is a time when we should waste the time of the House in labouring matters which have already been mentioned or which will be discussed later on. Speaking in the House a year ago, I expressed the view, and it is still my sincere opinion, that every member of this House could do more effective work in his own home town in connection with recruiting and patriotic and Red Cross work, than he could in prolonging these endless discussions, which I do not think are contributing very much to the cause of the Allies. I had the pleasure a few days ago of reading a despatch which appeared in the Toronto Globe in its issue of January 19, under date January 18. I think it was taken from a letter written by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, as a sort of message to the Canadian people, and I want to contrast some of the statements therein made with what is being said by his apostle in Dorchester county. In that despatch Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

The determination was general that Canada must stand behind Britain, and assist with all the strength at her command. Nor is this all. We have heard it alleged that Canada should have remained outside a conflict in which she was not immediately interested, since her territory was not actually invaded. This is the meanest and most selfish view to take of the question. . . . Yet there is every probability that we are still far from the end, and so long as more has to be done they have not done enough. Only the all-possible will suffice.

I want to give the right hon. gentleman credit for sincerity when he wrote those words. But what have we to say about Mr. Lucien Cannon, who is endorsed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition? On the very same day this despatch appeared in the Globe, under date January 18, the right hon. gentleman wrote his apostle as follows:

My dear Lucien:—

How sweetly euphonious "dear Lucien" sounds. No wonder Lucien lost his head. It does not fall to many of us to receive such an endearing epistle from one occupying so high a position in the country as that of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition.

My dear Lucien:—You have done a good act in renouncing your provincial mandate to revindicate and affirm in Dorchester the rights of outraged conscience. I trust the electors will respond to your noble appeal. I wish you all success.

Your devoted friend,

WILFRID LAURIER.

It is only fair to say that when that letter was written the right hon. leader of the Opposition had not, as I understand it, heard of the utterances of "dear Lucien" in Dorchester on the very night when this despatch was published. Let me quote one of "dear Lucien's" remarks:

Are we to ruin our country from the point of view of men, wealth and everything else for England? I say No, without hesitation. If you elect Sevigny there will be no limits to the sacrifices Canada will have to make.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition sends a message to the people of Canada, and the despatch was published in Toronto, where I might say there is not much occasion for it, for in the city of Toronto and in the province of Ontario and most of the other provinces of Canada the people have risen to the occasion, both in regard to recruits and contributions of money in connection with this war. I suppose in this message the right hon. gentleman intended to reach the province of Quebec as well. He says: "Only the all-possible will suffice." And his apostle, Lucien Cannon, who has been endorsed both by the right hon. gentleman and by Sir Lomer Gouin, his leader in the province of Quebec, utters the sentiments which I have just quoted. I wish the right hon. gentleman was now in his place. I would ask him whether or not he approves of these utterances. If he does, he will have to swallow what he said in his despatch to the Globe of January 18. Is there a man in the House of Commons to-day who has the courage, even if he has the conviction—and I do not think there is any such man—is there a man in the House who will stand up to-day and venture to utter before the people of this country the words I have just quoted of Mr. Lucien Cannon?

Mr. GAUVREAU: He never said it.

Mr. BOYS: He did say it.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You have no proof of it at all.

Mr. BOYS: Yes, I have.

Mr. GAUVREAU: You cannot give any.

Mr. BOYS: He has not denied it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I wish to remind the hon. gentlemen that there is only one method of addressing this House, and that is through the Chair.

Mr. BOYS: It is quite evident from the interruption that the hon. gentleman does not like what Mr. Cannon is reported to have said, and well may every man in this House and in Canada blush with shame that any man seeking a seat in the House of Commons should give utterance to any such sentiments. Such a man should rather be seeking an internment camp than the House of Commons. My hon. friend says that Mr. Cannon never made any such statements. Those statements appeared in the Montreal papers, and at the meeting following the St. Prosper meeting the same gentleman stated that he stood by what he had said and would repeat those statements, and he has never yet contradicted them. Why are they made? I say they are made because he believes the utterance of such sentiments is the most likely way of securing his election. It remains to be seen what will happen next Saturday. From the standpoint of the interest of the country, it would be unfortunate that any such man should be elected to the House of Commons, but from the standpoint of the Conservative party it would be the very best thing that could happen. The right hon. gentleman who started off the campaign with that endearing letter of his has not repudiated those statements. Let me read more of the noble sentiments put forth by the right hon. gentleman, as reported in the Toronto Globe:—

> Let the young and healthy enlist and those who cannot enlist will serve the country by work in the field, in the forest, in the mines, on the sea and in the shop. Every individual in the nation can work.

Noble and encouraging sentiment. As I said before, I want to give the right hon. gentleman credit for sincerity, but I must say that my views in that regard will be somewhat shaken if, before this debate is over, he does not give some intimation to the House that he disapproves of what his apostle is saying in Dorchester. Possibly my hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) will suggest that Mr. Cannon never said what I am about to quote, although it has been said three or four times. It is true that the other utterance was hushed up because it was not doing any good, even in Dorchester.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Speak to the Chair.

Mr. BOYS: This is what Mr. Lucien Cannon said:—

> My attitude to National Service is this. Laurier did not approve because he refused to join the Commission, but as a good citizen he advised the people to sign the cards. I signed my card, but I say I am opposed to conscription, whether industrial or military.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Hear, hear. Are you in favour of conscription yourself?

Mr. BOYS: I am certainly in favour of National Service.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend wants to hear from me on the subject, and I am quite prepared to let him have my opinion. As far as I am concerned, if the effort in connection with National Service fails and if it becomes necessary to fill the places of the boys who are fighting in Flanders, I am prepared, when that time comes—and it may not be far distant—to support conscription in this country. I do not know whether my hon. friend suggests that this last paragraph quoted was not uttered by the gentleman seeking election in Dorchester. What does he mean? He also stated National Service meant either nothing or conscription. If it means nothing, does he want to suggest that his right hon. leader is supporting nothing? The other alternative is: If it is not nothing, it is conscription. Does he contend that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition approves or advocates conscription?

> Let the young and healthy enlist and those who cannot enlist will serve the country by work in the field, in the forest, in the mines, on the sea and in the shops.

What does that mean? Does not that mean industrial conscription? National Service surely means serving the country in the trenches and in the various other ways that have been referred to. I say again that I do not believe there is a member in this House, either on the other side or on this side, who will venture to make the assertions that Lucien Cannon has made even in connection with National Service.

The right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition went on further and said:

> Let us here and now sink passions, prejudices, vain and idle recriminations, and above all, let us bend all our energies towards making Canada an effective factor in the struggle.

And he closes with this sentence:

> The heart of the nation must beat with one accord and one desire.

When I place his utterances beside those of his apostle Cannon, I wonder where the harmony, the one accord and the one desire are to be found. I do sincerely hope that the right hon. leader of the Opposition will, before this debate is over, at all events go this far and say that if Lucien Cannon did utter those statements and sentiments he is no party to them. If he will do that before the election next Saturday Lucien Cannon will not have an opportunity of taking a seat in this House.

If the right hon. gentleman wants to play a part, in keeping, in harmony and full accord with the despatch of the 18th of January as it appeared in the Globe, I think he should say to the Premier of this Dominion: Go overseas and take part in the Imperial Conference where you will have the right, not only to speak but to vote. Go with a mandate from the people of this country such as has already been referred to in this debate, but with no such mandate as will come from Dorchester if Lucien Cannon is elected. Let him further say: You go with the full assurance that when you return, the life of this Parliament will be extended and we will give you an opportunity of placing upon the statute-book measures that may be necessary to carry out the determinations of the Imperial Conference, and while you are doing this, I will proceed to my native province of Quebec and from one end of it to the other will, with the eloquence which I possess and which is well known to that province and to this Dominion, do all in my power to stir up that province to furnish the recruits that it is entitled to furnish and to furnish the wealth that Lucien Cannon denies. If the right hon. gentleman will do that, much as he has done in the past, he will do more than he has ever done to immortalize himself in the hearts of the people of Canada.

Is there room for the work of the right hon. gentleman in the province of Quebec? Is it unfair that these things should be referred to? Recruiting is more or less, it is true, at a standstill now in many of the provinces, and the promised 500,000 have not been secured, but not very many more are necessary. I say that if the province of Quebec will rise to the occasion and will furnish the men that she should furnish according to her population in comparison with that of the other provinces, there will be no trouble in raising the 500,000 men promised by the Premier of Canada. I am not blaming the people of the province of Quebec; I blame rather the leaders. I believe that, if men in this House of Commons, whose ability is well known, would go into that province and would do the work which they are capable of doing, regardless of whether it pleases or whether it does not, or whether it will produce good political results or not, the recruits from Quebec would rapidly increase. In military district No. 5, Quebec, the total number of recruits from the beginning of the war to the present time is 7,729.

Mr. MARCIL: That is, in one district in Quebec.

Mr. BOYS: Yes, there are two districts—Montreal or No. 4; and Quebec, or No. 5. I have given the figures for Quebec district. If the hon. gentleman wants the figures for No. 4—

Mr. MARCIL: Does the hon. gentleman mean the district of Quebec or the province of Quebec?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman is apt to give a wrong impression, as "Quebec" is the name of the province as well as of a military district.

Mr. BOYS: I think I made it plain. I have no desire to misrepresent what the province of Quebec has done; and when I have finished I do not think there will be any room for doubt as to the figures. In No. 4 district, in which is the great city of Montreal with 700,000 people, the recruits number only 34,000. This, with the number from district No. 5, which I have already given, would make a total of 41,729 for the whole province of Quebec. The district of Toronto alone produced 85,364 recruits. I say in all sincerity to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the Opposition, and to other members who come from the province of Quebec that, instead of wasting time in the House of Commons, they should return to their several constituencies and explain to their people the call to duty and the need that exists for recruits. If they do so, I believe the figures for recruiting in Quebec, in the course of a few months, will be more commensurate with the importance of that province and more in proportion to the number of men it should furnish.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with those in this debate who have congratulated the mover and seconder upon the very loyal and excellent speeches they have made. And especially I desire to congratulate you, Sir, upon your elevation to the highest official position in the land. From personal knowledge, I have no hesitation in believing that you will fill that position not only with credit to the House but with honour to yourself.

Though I follow my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) I do no intend to discuss the Dorchester election. I do not know anything about it; I have not been there, and I am sorry to say I have not any too much faith in the newspaper reports, as one side represents the case one way and the other represents it the other way —I do not blame the newspapers, but that is a habit they have. I have only to say that Mr. Cannon did contradict that portion of the report of his speech which was read by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys). I am aware of that, for I saw the contradiction in several of the newspapers. It is only fair to say that that contradiction was made. I leave the discussion of the matter to my hon. friends from Quebec, should they wish to take it up.

I have no personal feeling against Mr. Sevigny. On the contrary I rather admired the way he filled the Chair, and personally I was always very friendly to him. Therefore, I have nothing to say against him, except that we know what he said.

My hon. friend from South Simcoe says that my right hon. leader and the members from Quebec on this side of the House should go to Quebec and help recruiting. There are three or four ministers from Quebec in the Government and a number of members on that side of the House who might do the same thing. I have never seen much use in throwing these taunts across the floor of the House.

I do not propose to say very much with reference to our men who are fighting at the front. Their bravery has been spoken of by men much more capable of doing it justice than I am. As a native born Canadian, I am not surprised at the bravery of our men. It is born in us to think that we are just as good as anybody else, and sometimes a little better. It has not surprised me to learn that our people are capable of competing with the German Guard or any other German, against whom they may be pitted. We naturally congratulate them that they have proven so successful in the field of battle though they were but citizen soldiers but a few days before they were sent to the front. At the same time, I am not surprised at what has taken place, because, after all, our men are Canadians, to whichever stock they may belong. And by the way, I read in the London Times a description of the work of that French Canadian battalion that distinguished itself at the battle of Courcelette. The Times apologized for drawing comparisons, but told some wonderful tales of what these men had done in the battle. It made my blood tingle to my finger tips to read of our brave French Canadian boys in that struggle. I felt as proud as if I had been reading of English speaking Canadians. The Times declared that there were no braver men on the field, that there had been no braver men in any of the battles since the war started.

My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) said the other day that, while there was criticism from this side of the actions of the Government since the war began, it was the main result we should consider and not the details. May I say to my hon. friend that main results, both with armies and in business, are made up of details. The manager of a great business concern must take a wide view, he requires as complete a horoscope of his business as he can get. At the same time, if he did not organize and systematize details, he would come a cropper before going very far. With armies, in the same way, the details count. It was attention to details that made the German army the greatest army, until recently, in the world; that made it the terrible enemy we have had to face since this war began. While I do not believe in harsh criticism yet it is our duty to criticise and the people of the country expect us to perform that duty. Any criticism I may make of the actions of the Government, however, will be made with a view to assisting in perfecting the machine, not in destroying it; in other words, I shall try to make my criticism constructive and not destructive.

The Government generally, and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) in particular, both in the House and out of it, have preached economy since this war began. That is quite proper. But preaching economy is not enough; it is absolutely necessary to practice it in every branch of the public service, not only for the money that can be saved, but as an example to the people. The people in my section of the country are very much dissatisfied with some of the things that the Government has done. The people from one end of the country to the other have, so far as I know, responded loyally and magnificently to the calls for money, and, I think, for men. We are a population of less than 8,000,000 people, spread over a territory 3,000 miles long and 1,000 miles wide; we have the various businesses of the country to maintain, including that of agriculture. Do you not think that, after all, we have done remarkably well to recruit even 400,000 men? Then look at the tremendous calls that have been made for funds. The people have done wonderfully in their response to the various calls both in the way of taxes and in the form of voluntary contributions to patriotic and other funds.

I was going on to say that the people in the section of the country from which I come condemn very strongly the expenditure at Camp Borden. They say that the two military camps at Niagara and London were quite sufficient for the purposes of training, at least to a certain stage, 10,000 or 12,000 men. Valcartier Camp had been established at large expense, and it was absolutely unnecessary to acquire the sand waste at Borden and at great expense to fit up these lands for military purposes—for how long? Two or three months last year. We are fighting for the purpose of doing away with militarism. I may tell hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that this camp at Borden did a great deal to delay recruiting in our section of the country. No one thing that I know of did more harm to recruiting than Camp Borden, to which the men were sent absolutely against their wills. Let me remind the House that these men were citizen soldiers, who volunteered of their own free will to go and fight in the defence of the Empire, and they thought that they should be used as decently as they could be used while they were in this country. They were properly situated at the camps at London and Niagara, but they were sent to Camp Borden. The pinery and shrubbery there had been burned off not long before; the surface was full of ashes and black dust from the burnings, and if a sand storm came up while the soldiers were eating everything would be covered with dirt, so that the men could not possibly eat their food—the dust would grind in their teeth. Their beds were filled with this stuff; they could not sleep in them for dirt. The young men who volunteered to go to the front complained very bitterly about these things and their fathers, who are paying the taxes, complained even more bitterly, contending that the expenditure on that camp was not necessary. That is what they complain of, and, I think, justly. It was said that the camp was established in order that men might be drilled in large numbers. It is quite proper that they should be so drilled, but that could have been done, at least to a certain stage, at the other two camps, after which the troops could proceed to Valcartier and finish their training there before going to England.

I should like to say a word or two about the National Service cards. It was impossible to tell from the cards what object there was in issuing them. The answers that were required would not give a good business knowledge if the cards had been designed for peace purposes—that of getting men to work on the farms, for instance, or to engage in various callings at home. If the intention was to get enlistments, nothing on the card, so far as I remember, required any statement as to whether the person signing it would enlist or not. It could not be any benefit to the farmer, because the questions were not such as to obtain sufficient information. If you ask a farmer whether he is willing to take up some other occupation, he will say, if he is the owner of a farm, that he will not go to any other occupation, because he is not going to leave his farm unless he thinks it his duty to enlist. If the farmer had been asked how large his farm was and how many men were employed on it, information would have been obtained as to whether the farmer could spare men from that farm or not. Nothing of the kind, however, was done. If the man were employed on the farm as a workman, I do not know whether he would be willing to enlist or not; I am quite sure that he would be willing to change his occupation if he got more pay, but not likely at the same pay.

One thing about that campaign that struck our people very forcibly was the large advertisements that appeared in the various newspapers. I do not know whether they were published here or not, but the Toronto papers contained half-page and full-page advertisements signed by Mr. Irish, of Toronto, calling for munition workers. That campaign is said to have cost $60,000, but, no matter what it cost, it was absurd. No persons are more capable of finding men for this work than the very men who are engaged in making munitions. They do not want anybody from the outside to find men for them. They have the knowledge and the ability to get men if they require them, and that money, whatever it amounted to, was an absurd waste.

I would like to find out from the Minister of Finance how much of the material that went to England was discarded. I understand that he went over there for the purpose of looking into financial matters, and I have no doubt that he can enlighten us very materially on this subject. Men coming from there tell me that the Oliver equipments, which cost $5 each, were discarded after the men landed in England. They tell me also that many other things were discarded; that many other things, as the hon. member for Pictou said yesterday, were scrapped. I would like to know also from the Minister of Finance in what condition he found the financial affairs of the Militia Department when he was in England. The report is that the finances were in a very mixed condition; in fact that officers there ran bills that were absolutely unnecessary and charged those bills to the account of the Government. I do not know whether that is true or not, but it would be a great satisfaction to me to have the Finance Minister, who, I have no doubt, does know, tell the House just how much truth there is in this report.

In my own section of the country I am asked frequently whether the members of this House who have volunteered and who are attending the session draw both their sessional allowance and pay from the Militia Department. I am unable to answer those who ask me this, because I do not know myself, and I have told them so; but a great many people have great curiosity on that subject, and there is much rumour around the House upon it. It is only proper that these members should have an opportunity of explaining this matter so that they would not be placed in a false position. Then I think that the country should know this, because we are all called upon to pay equally for the expenses of the war; we are equally called upon for voluntary subscriptions of various kinds, and if we have anything to tax we have had our taxes enormously increased in the last few years.

Mr. NEELY: If my hon. friend will permit me, I can answer him at once, so far as I am concerned. The extension of leave which was granted to me to attend the session was accompanied by the intimation that all military pay and allowances would be stopped during the session.

Mr. BRADBURY: Hear, hear; that applies to all the rest too.

Mr. NESBITT: I am sure that is very satisfactory; that will stop any jarring on that head. I asked the question because other people asked me, and I was unable to answer them.

Now what about the expenditure for public works during the last season? We were told last year when the House met and we passed the Estimates, that the public works expenditures would be cut down. I understand that a great many public works have gone forward that were unnecessary. The Parliament buildings is a case in point. When we left last year we were told that it was not necessary to tear down the old walls, and that it would cost only about one and one-half millions to repair the buildings. On that understanding we all agreed that the work should go on. But since that time the walls have been ordered to be pulled down, and this must increase the cost of reconstruction by several millions at least. I for one think it would have been quite in order to stop the re-erection of the buildings when it was found necessary to rebuild throughout, and to have kept that work over until the conclusion of the war, when we all anticipate that there will be a great number of men looking for work and not sufficient work to keep them employed. I think that is one of the public works that the Government could quite properly have postponed without injuring anybody. We are quite comfortable in this building, so far as our meetings are concerned; and I have yet to find that the articles that were removed from the museum are suffering during our occupancy of this building. This is one way in which the Government could very well have saved money during the war, and that money could have been used to greater advantage after the conclusion of the war.

That brings me to the question of patronage that was mentioned by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) yesterday. If there could be any time when patronage or political favouritism should not have been indulged in, it was during this war. We are all equally taxed, we are all equally called upon for voluntary subscription, and we are all equally called upon to send our sons to the front or to go there ourselves. Therefore, while I have no fault to find with Government patronage to a limited extent as a rule, I have a great deal of fault to find with political favouritism during this war; I do not think it should have been indulged in. My hon. friend from Simcoe—and let me congratulate him on the splendid efforts of his county in their contributions throughout the war—says that, so far as he was personally concerned, there has been no political favouritism since the war started; and that when he was asked who should be given the privilege of furnishing supplies, he gave the names of all the merchants in the town. Now, why was he asked? That is what I should like to know. We were told that either the sitting member for the locality where troops were located, or the man who had the patronage, who was sometimes the defeated candidate, was always asked from whom the supplies should be purchased. Why? These supplies were for the soldiers. Just as many of those soldiers were Liberals as were Conservatives. Why did not the military authorities advertise in the local paper—there is always a local paper—and not leave it to the honour of men like my friend from Simcoe to say from whom the supply should be purchased? It cannot be said that all members were as straight in this matter as my hon. friend from Simcoe, by any manner of means. They did not all give all the merchants' names. There are very few places where supplies were provided by anybody but followers of the Government.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: I do not know whether the hon. member referred to me as the hon. member for Simcoe—

Mr. NESBITT: No, it was Mr. Boys.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: —because in Orillia the mayor gave the names.

Mr. NESBITT: I referred to the hon. member who spoke before me (Mr. Boys). He said, that when he was asked he gave the names of all the merchants. I think he deserves great credit for that, but at the same time I do not know why he was asked.

Another thing I should like to say to the Government—and any suggestions I make are made with a view to improvement. A great many of the young men who have enlisted complain that officers are put over their heads who should not be put over their heads, and that seniority does not count. In a great many instances they say that very young men are put over the heads of men who are much more experienced. When I say more experienced, I do not mean more experienced in war, because all the officers of this citizen soldiery of ours have had little experience in war, but are more experienced in the ways of the world, and more experienced in business. They say that this has gone so far that in some cases officers, when their commands were taken over, were immediately shifted to other commands. In one or two instances, a shift took place three or four times, but some of the men were kept here, and were not sent to the front. They were in the way of some men here who were ambitious to get to the front and who had enlisted in order to get to the front. I have no complaint to make on this head against the late Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). While he may have made mistakes, in my judgment, favouritism was not one of them. In fact it is rumoured that it was because he was not willing to display political favouritism that disputes arose between him and other members of the Government. I have been told by men who have returned from England that political favouritism under the present regime is rampant there, and that the boys are not getting a fair show. I have been told that by men who have been there to see, and I bring the matter to the attention of the Government because, if there is any truth in the statement—and there must be some, for they say that where there is smoke there is fire—steps should be taken to correct the evil. My informants are men I have known for years, men in whose word I have every faith. They told me that not only is political favouritism rampant in England at the present time, so far as our troops are concerned, but that the wastage is large, and that the expenses are out of all reason. No doubt my honourable friends on the other side of the House may not believe these statements, but they are not in a position to know.

Mr. BRADBURY: It is not so.

Mr. NESBITT: I can bring the men to my honourable friend. I believe them, and if they appeared before my honourable friend, face to face, they would tell him in his teeth that it was so.

Mr. BRADBURY: Permit me just a word. The honourable gentleman is not speaking by the book. If he knew the men who are in authority in England, he would not make that statement.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who are they?

Mr. BRADBURY: The men in authority to-day are Liberals.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who are the men in authority?

Mr. BRADBURY: General Turner was one of the strongest Liberals in Quebec.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is Sir George Perley not running affairs?

Mr. BRADBURY: Sir George Perley is the minister. If I understand the situation, and I think I do, the commanding officers make their recommendations to Sir George Perley, and I understand, and know, that, so far as the political end of the question is concerned, the Liberal gets the best of it over in England every time.

Mr. NESBITT: I have the greatest possible respect for Sir George Perley's business ability, but I think he is a very strong partisan. What I stated a moment ago came from men who have been there, and they said that it was positively a fact, otherwise I would not bring it to the attention of the Government. I do not bring it forward for the purpose of censuring the Government; I bring it to their notice so that, if the statements are true, the matter may be corrected. I repeat that I have every faith in Sir George Perley's business ability, but I do not have sufficient faith in him to think that he would not show partisanship. I do not know anything about General Turner. I never heard of him until this war started.

Mr. HAZEN: Surely my hon. friend heard of him in the South African war. He won the Victoria Cross in that war.

Mr. NESBITT: Well, I am glad of that. No doubt I did hear of him, but I have a short memory for some things. Speaking of political influence why should the chief of the general staff here not have the say as to who the officers shall be? I understand that we have a very efficient chief of the general staff here, General Gwatkin, I am told by men who ought to know that he is a most capable officer, and I do not see why he should not have some say in the selection of officers going to the front. Another thing, if they are going to break up battalions when they go to England the recruiting should not be done by battalions. It is not fair to the men who go over there as colonels and majors; it casts a slur upon them. They are left stranded in England and we are put to the expense of keeping them there. If they are discharged and sent back, a slur is put upon them. I say that it is not fair. The Government should not enlist men and appoint colonels and majors here and send them over there to be left stranded in England. It is not fair, because nine out of ten of these colonels and majors enlisted in good faith, believing that they would go to the front to fight for their country's cause, and a slur is put upon them when they are not sent to the front. I know that to be a fact also, and I do not think it is a practice that should be continued. The reason why I speak of these things is that they affect recruiting unfavourably.

My honourable friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) pointed out yesterday that some men were taken overseas through the personal influence of their officers, and I know that this happened in other cases. Again, there are complaints that officers can get furlough and are allowed to stay in this country for a long time while the privates cannot get furlough; that, if wounded, they are put into hospitals until they are comparatively sound again and then immediately sent back to the front. That is a very general complaint; I have had several letters from privates convalescing in England to that effect.

I bring these matters to the attention of the Government so that they may be looked into. If the statements are true, something should be done to correct the evil.

Let me say again that there should be no political favouritism in the matter of recruiting. The men have enlisted not because they are Conservatives or Liberals, but because they are patriotic, and I believe that recruiting will go on until we get the number required. I advised my constituents to sign the National Service cards because I believe they represented the beginning of a systematic organization. I advised them, both privately and publicly, to fill up their cards truthfully and return them to headquarters. Whether anything will come of the National Service scheme or not, I do not know. The Government have not been very explicit in stating what was intended, but it seemed to me that it would do no harm to fill up the cards as they seemed to indicate some intention to organize the manhood of the country.

I regret that these complaints should be made, but it is right that the people should know what is going on and what is to be done. The expenditure in connection with the war is certainly enormous; not that we are not willing to pay, for I do not believe that there is a man or woman in Canada who regrets the expenditure of one dollar of the money that has been contributed for war purposes as long as it is understood that the money has been properly spent.

My hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Boys) has spoken of the noble work done by the women. The women of this country have been organized from the start of the war, and in my judgment have shown a business ability that the men of this country have not shown, whether as individuals, or as comprising the Government. The women certainly have done wonderful work; they are willing to continue their good work, and no doubt they will.

But the Government of this country are called upon above all others to see that the moneys that have been taken in are properly expended. The Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has devised means for providing enormous sums of money. Now, it is just as necessary for a Minister of Finance to watch the expenditure of the money he raises, as it is to raise the money, and I am sorry to say that, in my judgment, he has not been as careful in watching the expenditure in certain directions, some of which I have mentioned this afternoon, as he has been effective in collecting the money

Let me again emphasise to my hon. friends opposite, whether they believe the things I have been telling them this afternoon or not, there are a good many people in the country who do believe them, and it has hurt recruiting very materially and is still hurting it. Nothing could have hurt recruiting more in our section of the country than the establishment of Camp Borden. It sickened all the fellows who went there, and sickened them badly. They said they were perfectly willing to stand all sorts of things in the trenches, but before getting there they did not wish to be subjected to all the discomforts they had to put up with at Camp Borden. That camp must have cost a lot of money; I do not know how much, but I suppose we shall hear later on. At all events, it must have cost an enormous sum, and I regret that it hurt recruiting in the way it did. It is up to the Government to rectify all these matters I have spoken of, if my statements are correct.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a few observations upon the speech from the Throne, which is now before the House, but before doing so I presume I may be allowed to concur in all the flattering expressions of hon. gentlemen with regard to the Speaker, to the mover and the seconder of the Address, and to our distinguished Governor General. I will not take up the time of the House elaborating in that regard.

After another year of war we find ourselves confronted with a situation, perhaps, as serious as any that has confronted this Empire in modern times. I do not desire to be either a pessimist or an optimist in the few remarks I shall make in regard to the war. I look upon the war as the supreme question that is before the country, just as it was a year ago, and the winning of the war should be the first duty of all Canadian citizens. The men who are out to win the war are the men that ought to be esteemed for their works' sake, and any Government that leaves anything undone that could be done to win the war will not commend itself to the people of Canada, or of the Empire.

In reviewing the operations of the past year we find that comparatively little progress has been made on either land or sea. That, we must confess; and where progress has been made it has been made more in the wrong direction than in the right. The losses of the various belligerents are staggering, simply astounding. I have not heard any gentleman who has spoken so far attempt to tell the House how many the total casualties have been. We have heard the Dominion casualties placed at about 70,000, but the casualties of the two great contending parties have not been mentioned so far as I know. I made a rough estimate a few weeks ago and tried to be conservative in my figures. I figured that up to that time the casualties on both sides amounted to sixteen and a half millions. That seemed an astounding number, and I was afraid I had over-estimated it. A few days later, however, General Von Hindenburg, who has been heard of considerably during the war, gave an interview to the press in which he stated that the losses to the Allies alone amounted to fifteen millions. When I saw that statement, I began to think I had been fairly conservative in putting the figure at 16,500,000. The casualties on the German side, which are all published, amounted to upwards of 4,000,000 at the beginning of the year, according to their own lists. The French casualties are not reported, and therefore we cannot very well tell what their figures are. The Russian casualties have run into several millions, probably 6,000,000 to 8,000,000; for it must be remembered that Russia is holding almost entirely alone about 1,000 miles of battle front with the assistance of only a small country, Rumania. The recent entry of Rumania into the war has not brought that advantage to the Allies that we perhaps at first expected, and I very much regret that her entry into the war should have been signalized by such severe losses as they sustained almost immediately, and which they apparently have continued to sustain up to the present time. Evidently they were not prepared for the encounter. Who was their advisor, and why they entered before they were ready, will be revealed later on, and I think it will appear as it has appeared on many other occasions, that some one has blundered.

Our hon. friends on the other side of the House, who have pointed out a good many of what they consider blunders on the part of this Government, must admit that those blunders are very small in comparison with the blunders that have been committed across the water by almost all the countries engaged in the war. But that is to be expected; it is only natural. All men are human, and all err more or less, and it is to be expected that in so great a matter as this mistakes will be made. My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) who has just spoken—and I give him credit for making a speech that was fair; he has not tried to be unfair, I am sure—has told us of a few blunders that he thinks the Government have made, and among others he mentioned Camp Borden. I do not know whether he ever visited that camp or not. I hardly think he did, or he would not have made the sweeping statements he did. Personally, I spent two days at the camp and they were two of the worst days of the summer when the temperature was between 90 and 100 in the shade, and from my experience I can tell my hon. friend that he vastly over-estimates the damage which he thinks was done to recruiting by reason of the existence of Camp Borden. As camps go, it is an excellent piece of ground, and those who put in the winter at Salisbury Plains could tell my hon. friend, if he had not heard from them already, that it would be like an oasis in the desert as compared with the mud that they endured for about six months at Salisbury Plain, and that even at the camp near Quebec, Valcartier, that he has referred to as being very adequate and efficient, the mud conditions were just as bad as were the dust conditions at Camp Borden.

We all regret that stumbling blocks have come in the way of recruiting, and it is only just that a good deal of attention should be paid to it. The matter of recruiting should cause us all a good deal of thought at the present time. The figures that were presented by my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) a few minutes ago and which I now hold in my hand, are worthy of the study of hon. gentlemen, and I can scarcely see, when we are enlisting under the voluntary system, why any member from any particular part of the Dominion should feel sensitive when the figures of his constituency or his province are mentioned, unless he himself feels guilty that he has not done what he should have done with regard to his own community and has not taken the leadership of the men in his community to enlist in this great struggle. That the figures speak for themselves is evident, and they tell this lesson, that while a voluntary system may be all right for a small war, there are a great many citizens in every country who do not realize the value of freedom, who are not prepared to make the necessary sacrifices for freedom, but who would rather stay at home and pile up wealth at their ease and let the other people do the fighting. I do not wish to speak about anything I may or may not have done in the war; I have tried to do my duty; but I am proud to say that I belong to the only division in that list, Division No. 2, of the province of Ontario, that has furnished its full quota of the 500,000 promised.

Mr. BRODER: I think No. 3 has done so, also.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Unless No. 3 has caught up very recently, No. 2 is the only one that has completed its full quota. Toronto, of course, is a big town and is capable of taking all the bouquets that may be thrown to it, but Brantford is also in No. 2 Division, and it has helped Toronto a little, and so has Hamilton, which is not a small town, and so has St. Catharines. The result is that from that district we are credited with 81,537 up to the end of the year. No. 1 Division, in which London is the centre, and No. 3 Division, of which Kingston is the centre, have both made an excellent showing, and the figures are such that they can be read with satisfaction by any member from any part of the province. The figures for the whole province are 148,914. Since the end of the year, of course, there have been further additions, and I think the total is now nearly 180,000. Six per cent of the population of 2,500,000 would make 150,000, so in the whole of Canada, if we are to raise the whole of the 500,000 promised, the proportion should be not less than six per cent. The county of Brant, from which I have the honour to come, is named after the great chief who led the forces under the British over a hundred years ago and maintained the British flag in the western part of the province of Ontario and saved a great part of Canada to the Empire at that time. The first man from the county of Brant who fell in the present war was also named Brant, and was an Indian from the Six Nation reserve, showing that there are some people in the Dominion of Canada who, although they do not have British blood in their veins, know a good Government when they see it, who know good institutions when they see them, and who are able to appreciate what British justice and British honour means, not only in this country, but wherever the British flag floats. I mention that simply as a tribute to an Indian tribe that has lived in the county for the last 100 years, forfeiting their rights in the States when they moved from the Mohawk valley. This should be mentioned in order that other citizens who have come in from other countries may realize that they have a duty and should be called upon to discharge their share the same as the aborigines of this country. We have a population of about eight millions in round figures, of which probably five million are of British stock and the rest speaking anywhere from fifty to seventy-five different languages, not including the Indian languages of the various tribes scattered throughout our North country. Therefore, we have plenty of languages that we can speak in, but very few of these people who have come into the Dominion of Canada have taken up their part as citizens of the Empire and have entered this war on the side of liberty, justice and civilization. That we regret. I do not want to be harsh in anything that I shall say. I think I may say that I have in my heart the one desire, and that is that the best shall be done that Canada can do, and that we shall sustain our part and finally win the war, but I do not think there is any use in blinking at facts, and the facts of those figures are that there are certain parts of the Dominion of Canada that, under the voluntary system, are not doing their duty. I am sorry to say that, but those of us who have made the sacrifice —and I come from a community that has done so both in men and money—and have filled up the full quota, think it is up to other parts of Canada, if recruiting is slack, to be getting busy and doing something.

I have had the privilege of being in close communication with many men from the front ever since the war began, not only members of my own family and immediate circle, but many officers who have gone from the city of Brantford and the county of Brant. I have had from them accounts of everything that is going on, but I have yet to meet the first man or to receive the first letter that has not spoken in the highest terms of commendation of our valorous ally, the French, as they are found in old France. The feeling that is in the hearts of the boys who have gone over from Canada is that, although Britain has done well and although Russia has done well, the honours of the war, so far as the Allies are concerned, must so far be yielded to the glorious land of France. Some of our boys too, very fond of our own flag, very fond of the flag that waves now, are just as ready to fight under the tri-colour of France in this war as they are under the Union Jack, and will give just as good an account of themselves. But when I say that, Sir, I want you to understand that it is the tri-colour as it is unfurled by such men as Briand, Joffre and Nivelle at the front, and not the tri-colour as it is waved by such men as Bourassa, Lavergne or Cannon. That is the tri-colour that our Canadian boys are ready to fight under; it is the tri-colour as it is waved in the land of France, the land of chivalry, the garden of romance, as we are told by the poet, which in this war has laid on the altar of her race every man, woman and child that can do a useful service.

When this war broke out I said: At last Canada will be a united country; nothing can keep Canada from doing her full duty to the Empire in this great war. Fancy my chagrin, fancy my surprise, when I read the figures that show what our neighboring province is doing in recruiting when the land from which their forefathers came is bleeding to death and is calling for help from her sons on this side of the water. Surely they have not forgotten the hole of the pit from whence they were digged. Surely, a call such as this should resound throughout the province of Quebec. I call upon the leaders of that province, while it is yet time—I only regret that I cannot speak French or I should be glad to go there and speak—to give their help that the dear old land of France may be brought from under the foot of the enemy. I think this call should come to them as strongly as it has come to the British province of Ontario or to the plains of the West. I believe it does, but that it has not been carried into that Province as it has been carried throughout Ontario. In our province, every schoolhouse, every cross-roads, every platform, every pulpit, has been made use of for recruiting meetings. In the county from which I come we have recruited almost ten per cent of the total population, and most of these men are at the front or across the water. If this were done everywhere there would be no call for more men to-day. The Prime Minister has given us the figures, and for my part, I think they are optimistic, yet they show that we are nearly 100,000 men short, and I think even that does not fully allow for wastage. So, there is still more to do. Men of Canada, everywhere, of every race and creed, let us get together to win this war. For hon. gentlemen opposite will not be in power, nor shall we be in power, if you let the Germans win the war, you can bet on that,—there will be no government of this kind in Canada in that case. The appeal comes to us now, while the war is yet in the winning, to see to it that the boys at the front are supported, and that the necessary recruits shall go across steadily and freely.

I have spoken of the valour of France. It is written on Verdun. Verdun is the proudest spot in the whole history of the Allies in this war. I do not know whether we fully realize what the French did there, but I will occupy a few moments—and I do not often trouble the House—to read something of what Verdun has meant:

> The execution of the new coup was entrusted to General Mangin in charge of four divisions respectively commanded by Generals Muteau, Guyot de Salins, Garnier du Plessis, and Passaga. The opposing German forces consisted of five divisions, the attack being timed for 10 a.m. on December 15. The French went through the Germans like butter, despite their inferior numbers, and simply shattered the enemy. They took between 11,000 and 12,000 prisoners, including nearly 300 officers, capturing several seemingly impregnable positions, of which Pepper Hill was the centre, and regaining all the ground they had lost since February 24. In addition the German killed and wounded amounted to over 30,000, no fewer than 160 guns were taken or destroyed, while the most marvellous part of this great feat of arms were the French losses, which, all told, did not exceed 1,500.

There is a piece of work, there is something to be proud of. I would like to have that story told at every cross-roads in the province of Quebec, to show that the old race from which the people of Quebec have sprung is more than a match for the Germans to-day. And are the French of this country any less able to meet the enemy in the gate than are the French of old France?

I am glad to see that my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) nods to me. I am sure he knows that the French race are as valourous as any race in the world, and as valourous as they have proven themselves on many a battlefield of the past. This quarrel is more France's quarrel than Great Britain's; France has more to lose in the war to-day than has Great Britain. Britain has been immune, not one enemy has set foot upon her soil except as a spy or a prisoner; France, at this moment, finds her most valuable territory in the hands of the enemy. Nine millions of her people have been barred from their homes and driven to find other places in which to rest their heads. Their coal and other mines, requisite for a great industrial people, are in the hands of the Germans. Is it a time yet to talk of peace? I like the style of our good old friend, Colonel Denison, in a crisis such as this. I believe he sent a cable across the Atlantic to this effect: Tell Emperor William we will not discuss peace until every soldier is withdrawn from Belgium, and France, and Serbia, and all the resources of these countries given back to those to whom they belong.

It seems a big proposition to make this war; it is going to be a bigger proposition, or at least quite as big, to make peace. When you consider the confusion into which the world has fallen, you cannot but wonder how this turmoil can be brought to an end. I believe that our Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) is going to England to attend a conference in which, possibly, peace may be discussed. Though I am not a believer in the immediate advent of peace, we cannot forget that some day the peace that we hope for will arrive. I desire to say a word on the making of peace. I was brought up in the old school; I was brought up largely on oatmeal porridge and the Scriptures and I have not forgotten some of the things that were put into me in both respects in my early days. I was taught that the man who will not work shall not eat. And recently, in discussing the position of our neighbours to the South and the stand taken by President Wilson, I thought a parallel might be made to those Scripture terms and that as we say that he who will not work shall not eat, so we might say: He who will not fight shall not say. In other words, I believe that the entry of President Wilson into the war at the present time with his pen is not opportune. That is my opinion; it may be wrong. I have some press clippings here, and I am going to read two or three of them. It appears to me that the idea that President Wilson has launched is most inopportune and most inapplicable to the situation as we find it. He told us in the document that was issued in December that he could see no difference between the aims and objects of the two sides. Well, I am rather sorry for a man who cannot see the difference, and I think that if we should point out the difference to him it would be a blessing.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is claimed in the United States that what he said was: "as claimed by their respective governments, and as announced to their own people." That is the qualification that is put upon it there.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Unless my hon. friend is an emissary from the President, I do not think I can quite accept his interpretation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I happened to be in the United States when the note was sent, and when it was quoted in the newspapers. That is the interpretation that was put upon it.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My hon. friend was probably reading it in the apology for the first remarks. It is very clear to my mind, though it may not be clear to the hon. member for St. John city, that the President sees very little difference between the aims of the respective sides. That, I think, he has made clear. He sees very little difference in the objects for which we are striving, and he thinks it is a good time now to call it off. He says that there can be no peace with victory; that neither side will get the victory. I do not want to misrepresent the President of the United States; he is very high up and I am very low down. My hon. friend thinks that I misquoted him. I am not the only one who misquoted him, or misunderstood him, if that is the case. I do not care to put very much of these clippings on Hansard, but I wish to read expression of opinions held by others with regard to the utterance of the President. The following appeared yesterday in the local press, copied from the London Globe—not the Toronto Globe:—

> Continuing, the newspaper says:
> "And then you wrote a second note, and then a third, because you were seeking the suffrage of electors in whose ears the last cries of their drowning countrymen were smothered beneath the tinkle of piling dollars."
> "You did not dare resent the piracy and murder and now, forsooth, we who have given our best and bravest by the hundred thousand and treasure by the thousand million to save the world, we must at your bidding lay down our arms and dream with you your foolish dream of peace.
> "You and the great nation whose chief magistrate you are, stirred no finger to save public law from being violated. You may say, and say truly, that the United States had not the power. How, then, can you ask us to trust our lives and liberties, the future of our race, the safety of our Empire and the destinies of all mankind to the flimsy guarantees with which you would buckler the peace of the world?
> "The men who tore up the scrap of paper; the men who laughed at your notes and sunk fresh ships while you were thinking of fresh phrases, will respect force and nothing else."
> [Mr. Cockshutt.]

That is one view of a British paper. Here is a view from the land of France:—

> A peace which has for its beginning the greatest crime in history will not be a just nor solid peace. First we wish 'sanctions and reparations'—if President Wilson accepts these indispensible guarantees, the future is easy.

This French paper thinks that we would be building a peace on the greatest crime in history. I have only one other expression of opinion here; it is that of a man who has occupied the same position as President Wilson and is, therefore, entitled to some consideration. I refer to Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, who should know something about what the attitude of a president of the United States should be. The article says::—

> The colonel bitterly announced that until an emphatic stand is taken by the American Government on the Belgian deportations any statement about our "stand for righteousness in the nebulous future is both ridiculous and insincere."
> "It is well, however, unless the words of our Government in this matter are to be accepted as the most empty of all idle and empty words, to remember two or three plain bits of homely fact.
> "The first is that it is worthless to make promises about the future unless in the present we keep those we have already made.

That is a truism.

> Unless this Government is prepared at this moment to take emphatic position as regards such a hideous outrage as the deportation of the men and women of northern France and Belgium, it is both ridiculous and insincere for us to mouth about standing for righteousness in the nebulous future.
> "Moreover, unless this Government can bring the peace of justice to Mexico it had better not talk about securing the peace of justice throughout the world.
> "As regards freedom of the seas, the most important element in it is freedom from murder, and until this Government has taken an effective stand to prevent the murder of its citizens by submarines on the high seas, it makes itself an object of derision by speaking for the freedom of the seas, Interfering with life is worse than interfering with property.

That is part of what ex-President Theodore Roosevelt has to say about it. It seems particularly unfortunate, therefore, that our esteemed fellow-citizen to the south, President Wilson, should have felt called upon to interfere in the battle that is going on among pretty nearly all the nations of Europe. One of the proverbs of Solomon comes to my mind just at the moment; it is this: "He that passeth by, and meddleth with strife belonging not to him, is like a man that taketh a dog by the ears." He will get bitten on the right and he will get bitten on the left—and behind, an hon. gentleman says.

We would have been delighted to see President Wilson and the great nation that he represents get into the water while the swimming was good. In other words, we would have been delighted to have them cast their lot with the Allied nations who are fighting for civilization, for humanity and for the right of the smaller nations of Europe to live. He had a good chance to do it. He now has a Utopian idea that he wants to introduce and that he wants incorporated in the peace which is to come. Well, although I believe that this war will terminate within the next two or three years, I believe that if we have to incorporate President Wilson's Utopian idea in the peace arrangements, we won't have peace in a hundred years. I do not believe that it will be accomplished. It is not for this world; it is for the millennium. It belongs to the next world entirely, and will never be found here. The views of President Wilson are entitled to our consideration, but, as we are reminded by Theodore Roosevelt, he has a think coming as to these guarantees he purposes giving us with regard to a future peace forevermore. I like the sound of that; it is a great and glorious phrase: glorious peace forevermore, and no more great wars.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is that the peace that passeth all understanding?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The hon. gentleman is getting up into the seventh heaven; I was dealing with the present war. I say that the peace which has been proposed is a Utopian idea that has never been yet established in the world, and I think that President Wilson will have been long forgotten before it is established. Theodore Roosevelt reminds him of one fact, in this article that I have read, when he talks about guarantees for the future. He says he is ready to join every one of the nations in a guarantee for future peace for all time. That sounds mighty big and mighty good; but unfortunately Theodore Roosevelt calls his attention to the fact that the United States is one of the signatories to the Treaty of the Hague and to the neutrality of Belgium; and if their guarantees for the future do not prove to be more valuable than their guarantees of the past, I would not advise anybody to put much faith in them.

My friend beside me (Mr. Middlebro) says that theirs is the first signature with regard to the neutrality of Belgium—the very first signature. Have they now, after two years of war, raised one single protest against anything that Germany has done either in Belgium or in northern France? Outrages that are unspeakable have been committed by the enemy, but I have yet to learn that President Wilson, from his high seat, has ever raised his voice or made one protest to Germany with regard to the outrages which have been inflicted on these people in Europe—and they guarantors of the neutrality of Belgium! They appear to think that pen and ink is all that it is necessary to use. President Wilson is evidently a thorough believer in the idea that the pen is mightier than the sword; but I think that in a war like this he will find, if he gets on the battlefields of Europe, that the sword is still supreme, and that the pen which may be very mighty in the office of the President of the United States will not cut much of a figure on the battlefield. This is a war of iron and blood; there are more men engaged in this war than have been engaged in war since the world began. Our Finance Minister made some time ago an estimate that if all the wars of all the ages were added together they would not make a war of the size of this war. I have shown you that the casualties have run up to nearly 20,000,000, and there are perhaps 20,000,000 of men in the field at present. I tell you that in my judgment all this talk about peace, and all this talk about the enemy being starved to death, is, at the present time, simply moonshine, and is calculated to stop us in the enterprise of getting our recruits in line and continuing the war. We should not pay any attention to such talk, but should prepare to go on with the work and to fill up the ranks. We are a long way from the finish yet, if we may judge from the present position, and we cannot afford to take any chances with regard to this war. All we have is at stake.

I have been asked many times what I thought we should do after the war. I have been asked by newspapers to give my opinion as a business man as to what I think is going to happen. In every case I have been obliged to say that in my judgment there is only one question for me to be thinking about at this time, and that is the winning of this war and the relieving of the world from the terrible load that it is carrying of the tyrant's heel that is simply pressing on the neck of every nation, big and little, that he can put his foot upon, and grinding out their life, their liberty and all that stands for right. I say there is but the one question. To talk to-day of peace and what will be done after the conclusion of the war, is simply to ignore the conditions with which we are confronted at this moment. If I may for a moment, for illustration, place myself in the position of the nation, it is as if my wife, my children, all my possessions, including the heirlooms that I have inherited from a long line of ancestors, were in my house, and my house were on fire, while I and all my friends were straining every nerve and using every means at our disposal to extinguish the fire, some foolish man from the street rushed in and said to me: I have a plan for a new house for you, what do you think of this? If I had the strength, I would chuck him out of the front door as fast as he came in—that would be his answer. We must know what we are going to have left after this war is over before we can chalk out any plans, and the winning of the war is the first necessity of the case. We will have no land to give away if we do not beat out the enemy; we will have no invitations to send overseas for people to come from here, there and everywhere, from all quarters of the earth, if we let ourselves go down under the heel of the enemy. Under that condition these would all be his possessions, and we would be taxed for generations to come to pay an enormous indemnity, which some of our enemies have already set at a figure as high as twelve to fifteen billions of dollars. We know the way the enemy have taxed Belgium and the cities of northern France, and Serbia and Rumania. Everything moveable in the way of valuables, everything in the way of art, everything that can be removed has been removed, and in addition to that immense taxes have been placed on all the towns and cities of which they have obtained possession. All that has already taken place.

Now are we going to let the enemy beat us out? Because that is what it means if we stall now, and we seem to have become somewhat stalled. I am sorry to say it, I am sorry to confess it, but recruiting is to-day almost dead. The feeling that was rampant a year ago with regard to enlisting exists no more, and we have not done our part, and we have not won the war. Great Britain is straining every nerve. There they have reconstructed two Governments already, and men, no matter how good they were, such as Asquith and Sir Edward Grey, have been put out of power. The name of Lloyd George is on the lips of every man to-day, and we hear such expressions as:

Here is a victory Government and a victory loan. We want a victory Government and a victory loan. I believe that our Government are doing everything possible, but if anything can be done to strengthen their hands, let us all do it. If anything can be given to increase their resources for carrying on the war successfully, let us all give it, let us not hang back, because there will be no place of repentance found though they seek it carefully with tears, if we are beaten out in this war. It is now or never. We have a heritage worth defending. We have a heritage to preserve for which we ought all to be ready to sacrifice everything possible. Are we going to rise to the occasion? Are we going to do what we ought to do?

I could go on, but I do not think it is wise to say more with regard to the war. I have one or two suggestions to make, although I do not know whether they are very valuable or will receive any attention. It is now eighteen months since I introduced a resolution in this House with regard to the control of food-stuffs, both as to prices for home consumption and as to export. I received a good deal of calling down from my own side with regard to this resolution, though I offered it as a business opinion. I may say that during the interval my views in that regard have not changed. I think that if the Government had taken a little of the advice which I endeavoured to offer to them at that time, but which was not accepted, it would not have been amiss. I am referring now to the control of food prices. This is carried on in almost every country that is at war. I do not know of any country except Canada that has not done something along that line; if anybody does know of such a country I should like him to mention it. Every country has been obliged to do it, and we in Canada may yet be obliged to do it. I am not sure that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) has not committed himself somewhat along that line. At any rate, a good many of the people whose interests he looks after have done so, and I have received documents from several labour organizations with whom the pinch in regard to food is a live question now. The pinch is being felt in some of our cities and towns. And this is not a question in relation to food alone. If clothing is too high I am quite prepared to have the Government take any measures they may think necessary to control prices during war time. Let me mention one item, one that appeals to the heart of every Irishman particularly, as well as to us all—potatoes. The situation in regard to potatoes seems to have become very acute not only in Canada, but throughout the world. Prices that were never before dreamed of are being obtained for potatoes in these days. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) is not here to tell us about the New Brunswick potatoes.

An hon. MEMBER: He is here.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: We have had New Brunswick potatoes in the district from which I come for the first time in our history, and I am sorry to say that the people of New Brunswick are not sending the best they have. If they are, then their best are not so good as the potatoes we can grow in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps my hon. friend is prejudiced.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I may be prejudiced, but fifteen bags of New Brunswick potatoes were got recently for a small Home of which I happen to be chairman. They looked nice and red and rosy, and appeared to be perfectly sound, but the matron telephoned me the other day that she regretted to report that about half of the potatoes were bad. I only mention potatoes as one item, but it is a big item in the workingman's daily food, and I think that if the Government could make a few suggestions to our friends who sell potatoes that two dollars, or two and a quarter dollars, or two and a half dollars per bag is too high a price, they might have some effect. I for one believe that if we were to prevent the export of potatoes the same as every other item necessary we could control the prices. We are a food exporting country, and are in exactly the opposite position from that of Great Britain, which is a food importing country. She produces very much less than she requires for the people, she grows only from thirty-five to forty per cent of her requirements, while we in Canada grow far more than we require. All we have to do to regulate prices is to prevent too much of our food going out of the country.

Mr. CARVELL: What about the home market that we heard so much about some years ago?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am finding fault because you are not supplying potatoes at a reasonable price. You are supplying them at two and a half dollars a bag from New Brunswick, and that price is too high.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend talks about the Government taking charge of potatoes and regulating the prices which the farmers would get; would he also approve of the Government taking charge of the flour mills of the country so as to regulate the price of flour?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: My idea is, as I set it forth in a resolution over eighteen months ago, that whenever any of the necessaries of life are unduly advanced in price either by speculation, or by the holding of immense quantities, the Government should say that no export should take place of any of those articles until such and such a price is reached. It has been done in Australia; it is being done there now. It has been done in India, and in Great Britain, and in other countries of Europe. There the prices of food are being controlled by government. It is a proper proposition, and the workingmen in western Ontario are very much concerned about it at present. I have had several communications in that regard. The Government may be a little hesitant; it is a drastic measure, but in war time you cannot expect everything to go on the same as in peace times. We are at war, and we must adopt war measures. If it is necessary to prevent exports, we must prevent them; if it is necessary to prevent imports, we must take the necessary action. Whatever is necessary ought to be done, because the winning of the war should be our first object. The Government have interfered a little, but only a very little, with exports. Let me give one example, the exportation of electricity. That is a matter which we would like to push a little further in our section of the country. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. G. C. Wilson) referred to that. About ten years ago I delivered a speech in this House on this very question. That was in May, 1906, I think, and you may find it by reference to Hansard. A full discussion took place with regard to the exportation of electricity from Niagara to the United States and the handling of the power from Niagara Falls. We in western Ontario have been denied the necessary power because the Americans are getting what ought to be coming to Ontario. That is not as it should be. The power is wanted in the munition factories, and in other ways. The Government have a regulation; they issue licenses from time to time, and these are regulated from the Department of Inland Revenue. They are within their rights in doing that. The Government have the power to regulate the export of electricity, and my contention is that it would be proper for them and competent for them to exercise that power in regard to other matters. I look for a very acute crisis with regard to some foods in the near future, and particularly with regard to potatoes. Where the farmers in our section of the country are going to get their seed next spring is a problem. Many farmers who had from two to three acres of potatoes in our district did not dig enough potatoes to give them the seed, owing to the conditions that prevailed. I live in a part of Canada that grows in normal times an enormous quantity of potatoes for export. Some farmers grow eight or ten acres of potatoes and make an excellent profit at seventy cents or seventy-five cents a bag. This year the price is two and a half dollars a bag, and potatoes are almost unobtainable. What is going to happen in the spring in regard to the seed, I do not know; it cannot be found. I make the suggestion to the Government that they consider the necessity of regulating the export.

We have heard a good deal about pulp and paper. I am not sure that some regulations are not already in force with regard to these articles. If not they can easily be put in force. I am merely mentioning these articles with the view of suggesting to the Government the advisability of regulating the exports.

I do not know that I need detain the House at any greater length. I may just refer to the trade returns that have already been the subject of considerable comment. I think they are perhaps the most outstanding feature of the war situation, indicating as they do the tremendous prosperity that has accompanied the war, so far as Canada is concerned. Our total trade imports and exports, is somewhere in the neighbourhood of two billion dollars for the twelve months. This is beyond the expectations of the most sanguine. Whether or not honourable gentlemen opposite are ready to give a meed of praise to the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) it appears to me that he has handled the situation very well. It seems to me that there could not have been very much wrong with the trade conditions of this country. My honourable friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) said he did not see how we could stomach the amount of trade we had had with the United States, and he accused the Conservative party of having declared during the last election that there should be no truck or trade with the United States. I think he was totally misrepresenting the situation so far as our intentions at that time were concerned. What we did say was that the trade conditions between the United States and Canada were already sufficiently good without us bargaining for and buying favours that we did not think we needed. The Yankee may be trusted to look after himself. We were doing quite enough trade with him already without giving him additional facilities. Their proposition was to buy further advantages in a market where, in my judgment, they were already doing too much business. I think we should do more business with Great Britain, Australia, and the other dominions, and our Allies, rather than with the United States. But we were going on trading with the United States and increasing our imports and exports, though, after all, a very large part of the increase in our exports has been with Great Britain herself and our Allies. We are doing an immense and very satisfactory trade with them.

In conclusion, if any of my fellow-members in the House think some of my remarks rather harsh, I hope they will take it from me that I was actuated solely by a most sincere desire that Canada, a great country in itself, should live up to what is expected of her, and that the 500,000 men that have been promised or suggested as our contribution to the war should be speedily raised, and every united effort made to win the war that is now raging in Europe.

I might say a little with regard to criticism that has been made of the way our boys are advanced at the front, or the way they are held back, but I think probably no good could be done by that. A great many of these cases have come under my attention, and I have taken many of them up, and I know they must be very bewildering to the Government. I think the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), must know that it is not possible in an army such as ours to have all the men majors and captains and colonels; we must have privates as well. That is about the situation. There are just as many good men probably in the ranks as are occupying the posts of lieutenants, majors, captains, etc. We cannot all be commanders; some of us must follow; some of us must be privates in the ranks; and that is the reason why many of the requests that have been made from time to time have not been listened to.

I think you, Mr. Speaker, for your kind hearing, and I trust the remarks I have made will be received in the spirit in which I have endeavoured to make them.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, it affords me very much pleasure to congratulate you upon the appointment to the high position which you now occupy. I have had the honour during the last four Parliaments of being a member of this hon. House, and have myself passed through the experience that you have had as Deputy Speaker, and now as Speaker. Knowing you by reputation before you entered the House, and having followed your progress since, I have not the least doubt that you will maintain the high traditions of the position to which you have been elected. I have had the pleasure in the past of visiting your constituency, one of the finest in the Maritime Provinces, and in this case the County of Cumberland is worthily represented by the first Commoner of Canada.

I do not wish to offend the feelings of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Boys), or of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt), but as the time in which I have to make my remarks is very brief, there being no evening session to-night, I shall confine myself to a calm review of the situation arising from the speech from the Throne, which deals with the war almost exclusively. In fact, the one great question at the present time is the question of the war, and all Canadians, regardless of their origin, regardless of the province in which they reside, are one in wishing that the Allies may soon win a great victory, the victory of civilization and of humanity. It so happens that both mother countries of Canada are engaged in this war. It was a fortunate thing that Providence allowed that to happen, because had it been otherwise I do not know what might have taken place in Canada. We have extremes in both elements of our population. We have in the province of Quebec men of extreme views; they have been called Nationalists in this House. On the other side, also, in Ontario and other parts of Canada, are men of extreme views. These men of extreme views have never been the main strength of Canada. Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Cartier had to contend with them in the past. These extremists will never be of much use to Canada until they modify their views. The present leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), because of his origin, because of the high position to which he was called by the generous will of the majority of the Canadian people who were not of his creed, of his nationality, or of his origin, has himself oftentimes been placed in a difficult position when he had to deal with these extremists on both sides of the fence, some from Quebec and others from Ontario and other provinces. But he always steered the middle course and naturally ran foul of the men who gave birth to the Nationalist idea in the province of Quebec. I shall not deal with the extremists from Ontario, because I should have to go too far back in history, some three hundred years, probably starting with the history in Ireland, where the movement had its inception. But in the province of Quebec the extremists are of a more recent creation, and their history can more easily be traced. It so happens that the hon. member who seconded the motion which you now have in your hand, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Descarries), who is a man very subtle and very skilled in conforming himself to most difficult situations, has, in my experience, been an Ultramontane, at other times a Nationalist, a Conservative, and now a true blue. If hon. members will read in last year's Hansard the speech of the former member for Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche), they will find something very interesting about the seconder of the motion which you now have in your hand, Mr. Speaker. But, en passant, I do not like to mention Mr. Lamarche's name without paying a tribute, if not of admiration, at least of appreciation, of the act which he has done. Mr. Lamarche was a Nationalist who remained true to his ideas. Canada, of course, is a free country. We are a part of the British Empire; we have not yet been absorbed into Hun-land or Bosche-land. Some people in this country are against the war, just as there are some against it in England. All political opinions are permissible in this country. Mr. Lamarche did not have the same views that we have, and he opposed us, and when the Conservative party came into power he remained true to what he had preached in the province of Quebec.

Some reference has been made to the Dorchester election, and I shall have an opportunity of saying a word about that later on. If the present Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny) had preached in 1911 the same gospel to the electorate of Dorchester that he preached in 1917 he would have been elected by acclamation, as was the late Postmaster General (Mr. Casgrain) in regard to whom the leader of the Liberal party implored the Liberals of Quebec not to oppose him, but to let him in by acclamation, because the late Postmaster General was a sincere, thoroughbred Tory; he stuck to his views and we respected him. But the electors of Dorchester to day are not dealing with a man of that kind, and that is the sole reason why he is being opposed.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Descarries) is the gentleman who, in the month of November, 1909, at Lachine, in his constituency, presided over the banquet which gave birth to the Nationalist party of the province of Quebec. I quote the words of the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Lamarche) at last session:—

> The Hon. Mr. Monk, the recognized leader of the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec, parted company with the Hon. Mr. Borden, the then leader of the Opposition. The reasons of the disagreement between Messrs. Monk and Borden had reference to the participation of Canada in the Imperial military preparation. The psychological moment of the severance of the partnership was on the occasion of a memorable banquet at Lachine on the 8th of November, 1900. Mostly all the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec rallied around their leader in his protest against the policy of Mr. Borden.
> Mr. Monk at that banquet delivered an address of the highest import in reply to a speech which had been made a few days before at London.
>
> Among the leading orators on that occasion, who all were of one mind with Mr. Monk, I notice the names of Senator Landry, to-day President of the Senate, Mr. Bruno Nantel, who, if I mistake not, was later on called to the Dominion Cabinet, Mr. Philemon Cousineau, the orthodox leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition in the Quebec Legislature, and Mr. Charles Beaubien, recently appointed to the Upper Chamber by the present Government.
> The banquet was presided over with much dash and dignity by one of the leading citizens of the county of Jacques Cartier, who now sits in this House as its representative, namely, Mr. J. A. Descarries.

Then he goes on to speak of the preparations for the issue of Le Devoir a month later, and proceeds to explain why Le Devoir was founded to advocate a policy of Canadian autonomy as against Imperial participation in war, and he gives the text of the resolution that was adopted in the parish of St. Eustache, in the county of Two Mountains, at which meeting Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Monk and the three present French-Canadian members of the Cabinet were present, or if not present, advocated and supported the resolution all through the province of Quebec. This resolution was the basis of the formation of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec. I have already read it once in this House, but I think it might be worth while to read it over again so as to find the cause of our trouble in the province of Quebec, if recruiting has fallen short; and I want the true Britishers in the province of Ontario to know whom to strike if there has been any shortage in recruiting in our province. The place was well chosen. St. Eustache is a historic locality in the province of Quebec. Away back in 1837 the people of Quebec, and those of Ontario to some extent, were clamouring for responsible Government. They had some déméles with the troops around Montreal, and the habitants of the county of Two Mountains, who were chased over the ice by the troops, took refuge in the old church at St. Eustache. When the British troops came up, they asked the habitants to surrender, and the local doctor, Dr. Chenier, refused to surrender and was killed. The soldiers set fire to the church, riddling it with bullets, and the ruins stand there as a historic monument to-day. The Nationalists chose the locality well to cement the union between the French Conservatives and the Nationalists, without which union this Government would never have been created. Twenty-eight Conservatives were elected in the province of Quebec, and on the 21st of September, 1911, every one of them subscribed to this policy that I am going to read to you now, and which has been the cause of so much trouble in our recruiting propaganda in the province of Quebec. It is the inculcation into the minds of the people of the province of Quebec of the proposition that outside of Canada they owe no duty to the British Crown, and that participation in British wars of any nature would be fatal to the autonomy of this country, which has caused the trouble. The resolution was drafted by Mr. Monk himself, and when Mr. Monk came to Mr. Bourassa for his approval of his resolution, Mr. Bourassa said: I will not accept it unless the policy of Borden is equally condemned. You will find in it the passage that was inserted about the nefarious policy of Borden. Bourassa consented to join because at that time the late member for Jacques Cartier, Mr. Monk, who was a respected man—a man who has the courage to resign his seat in the Cabinet on a question of principle is entitled to the respect of everyone, no matter whether one shares his views or not—was the forlorn leader of a forlorn hope in the province of Quebec. Twelve or thirteen members were lost on the back benches of this House, and the dreamy member for Jacques Cartier said that as long as Sir Wilfrid Laurier remained at the head of the Government the province of Quebec would always remain loyal to him. Bourassa was dissatisfied with the Liberal party. Why? Because it went to the support of the Empire in the South African war, because the Liberal party gave to Britain the first effective aid which was ever given to the Empire outside of this country, because it set aside the principle which Sir John A. Macdonald had laid down in the Soudan campaign and in other campaigns in which it was urged Canada should send over contingents which Sir John A. Macdonald refused. Bourassa left the Liberal party because the Liberal party had shown itself to be too loyal, and because Sir Wilfrid Laurier was too English for him and those who shared his views.

There are members in this House yet who will remember in the old House when the question of non-participation came up, that three members rose to call for a division, those members being the member for Labelle, Mr. Bourassa; the member for Charlevoi, Mr. Angers; and the member for Laprairie-Napierville, Mr. Monet. And two Tories joined to make five, in order to call for a vote of the House. That was the state of the Nationalist Party, but what was the origin? The party was originated because Laurier was held to be too Imperial and too English. It makes one's blood boil, knowing the facts as we do now, to hear misinformed men—I have no doubt they are misinformed because they would not do so deliberately—charge the Liberals of the province of Quebec with want of loyalty to the British flag and British institutions. The contrary is true. The Liberals in the province of Quebec have worked by day and by night, especially under the leadership of their present great leader, to inculcate into the minds of the people of that province that the province of Quebec forms part of the Dominion and that the Dominion is the greatest of the sister nations of the Empire. That is the gospel that the present leader of the Opposition preached in the province of Quebec and it was against that gospel that Mr. Henri Bourassa and Mr. Monk protested with all those nationalists who were elected in the province of Quebec at the last election, amongst them being the present Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny), the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) and the present Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin). They themselves will admit now that they are trying to undo the work they did then. The first thing that the Minister of Inland Revenue did when he arrived at the station at Quebec the other day was to tell his friends. You find me in a new role, in a new position; I have changed my mind; but there are other people who have changed their minds; look at Lloyd George; he has changed his mind. What instance did he give of the change of mind on the part of Lloyd George? He said: Lloyd George was against the South African war and now he is in favour of the war against the Germans. There is however, not much similarity between the two cases. The people down in Quebec now call him Lloyd George Sévigny as a kind of reminder of that statement.

When the Dorchester election came on the feeling in that constituency was very strong. The representative in the Legislature of the county of Dorchester is a young man of great talent, one who has every prospect of a great future. He is a man of high principle and comes of a good stock, being a son of Mr. Justice Cannon, one of the leading men of Quebec, known to all those who follow municipal matters as having presided over the famous Cannon investigation into affairs in Montreal. Mr. Cannon had been elected by a majority of 500 for a term of five years, four years of which had yet to run. It would have been easy for him to say: If you want to oppose the Minister of Inland Revenue, find another candidate. But he was willing to make the sacrifice. He threw up his mandate and sacrificed the four remaining years of his term in the Legislature because of the unanimous wish of the Liberals of the county of Dorchester, that he should be their candidate to oppose the election of Hon. Mr. Sevigny because of the change in the policy of that gentleman. I do not wish to pose as a prophet, but I think this House will not be much surprised should Mr. Sevigny be defeated, and if he is defeated it will be in vindication of a great principle, a principle which should be respected, not only in Canada but everywhere. That principle is that public men must be true to their declarations. If a public man makes a public declaration, that is a promise to his electors, it is an undertaking with them that in the Legislature he will advocate and maintain a certain policy. It is necessary for the proper carrying on of the public business that public men should be held to the promises thus made by them. When the ex-member for Dorchester was invited by those on the Government side of this House to take the high office of Deputy Speaker, he should have gone to his electors and said: Conditions have changed, and I want your approval of the change I am about to make. Even had he gone to his constituency when war was declared and told his people that he and his colleagues in Quebec had made a mistake in 1911 in declaring that Canada must not take part in British wars, and asked their consent and approval to a change of policy, he would have been doing what was right. But he never did anything of that kind. He accepted a policy contrary to the one for which he had declared, and now he goes to his constituency asking the people to ratify what he has done. I have no grudge against the late member for Dorchester. He discharged his duties as Speaker remarkably well and to the general satisfaction of members of the House. Personally, I have nothing whatever against him. But I am speaking of matters of political principle, and strongly hold that public men must be kept to their promises.

The province of Quebec was fooled on September 21, 1911, as no other province in Canada has ever been fooled. The difficulty in Quebec is said to be the lack of recruiting. Well, recruiting was opposed by this nationalist movement in 1910—that is the cause of the trouble. Go into the back parishes and outlying settlements of the province of Quebec, and, though these places are usually about equally divided as between the two political parties, any man is likely to meet you with the argument: This is Canada, and it is to our own country that we have a duty to fulfil. They take a limited view of their duties as British subjects. They think that duty is confined to this country. And they point to the Militia Act and declare that for fifty years back this law has provided that no citizen of Canada can be required to serve beyond the borders of this country. They say that it is only fair to presume that they were wise men who enacted that law. Messrs. Bourassa and Monk took that position and the eighteen or nineteen Nationalist members who sit in this House approved the position and declared for it in this resolution:

> We, citizens of Canada, faithful subjects of His Majesty, King George V, declare that we are prepared at the cost of our lives to defend the soil of our country and the rights of the British Crown in Canada, as our fathers did in 1776 against the English subjects of His Majesty, in 1812 against the armies of the American Republic, and as we did in 1885 against our own fellow-citizens in rebellion.
> Confiding in the grandeur and efficiency of the principles of decentralization and in the autonomy solemnly proclaimed and recognized for more than half a century by the authorities of Great Britain and of Canada, we are opposed to any new policy which would carry us into faraway wars foreign to Canada, as long, especially, as the autonomous colonies of the Empire do not share with the Mother Country on a footing of equality, the sovereign authority vested in the army and in the Imperial Navy, the treaties of peace and of alliance, foreign relations, the Government of India and of the possessions of the Crown.
>
> We believe sincerely that this policy of concentration and apparent Imperial unity, of which the new naval law is but the first instalment, will produce in the heart, even of the Empire, misunderstandings, rivalries and conflicts which will endanger the peace and the union of the various countries and the people of all races, who to-day are proud to obey the English Crown.
>
> Never having been for Great Britain or for the Empire the cause of any conflict, we believe that a policy of peace and of moral and material development is necessary in Canada for its growth and its cohesion and further for the glory and security of the Empire.
>
> Free citizens of a democratic country, we claim the right of expressing openly our opinion on this question, as well as on all others which affect the fate and the interest of Canada. We recognize to the majority of the Canadian people the right to determine upon any new policy in our relations with the other parts of the Empire, provided that they act in full knowledge of what they are doing.
>
> But we protest against all attempts to remove this grave problem from the free deliberation of the whole of the Canadian people and of each of the groups which compose it.
>
> We disavow the declaration made in Toronto in December last by Mr. Alexandre Taschereau, Provincial Minister of Public Works, who pretended falsely that the people of Quebec are ready to accept blindly any policy of naval defence of the Empire, and we blame the members of the Government and of the legislature of the province who ratified this declaration by their vote on the second of June last.
>
> We blame the Dominion ministry and the Parliamentary majority who imposed upon Canada this new naval law, launched Canada in the vortex of militarism, denounced erstwhile with so much energy by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, endangered the peace of Canada and diverted toward the construction of murderous engines and bloody war, military preparations, millions destined to the development of agriculture and of our transportation routes.
>
> We condemn equally the attitude of Mr. Borden and the members of the Opposition, who, following him, have asked for the adoption of a policy none the less nefarious.
>
> We affirm that Parliament has no right to pledge the future of Canada in a policy which has never been submitted to the people who are called upon to pay the tribute of blood and to bear the yoke of military expenditures.
> We approve without reserve, the courageous and loyal conduct of Mr. Monk and of the few members who have remained faithful to their mandate, who have pointed out the danger of this policy and claimed for the people of Canada the right to express their will before their representatives imposed upon it this heavy burden.

That was the basis of meetings held all through the province of Quebec, and upon that platform was fought the election in Drummond and Arthabaska.

That election enabled the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) and the then whip of the Conservative party to wire, in answer to inquiries as to what they thought of the fight in Drummond and Arthabaska: "Anything to beat Laurier." The campaign in Drummond and Arthabaska was organized by the present Secretary of State. If I should read Mr. Lamarche's speech it would show the House that immediately after the election in Drummond and Arthabaska an immense meeting was held in Montreal, some 8,000 people being present, to congratulate Mr. Monk and Mr. Bourassa on the great victory that had been secured in Drummond and Arthabaska. That meeting was organized and presided over by Mr. E. L. Patenaude, the present Secretary of State. The electors of Dorchester county are, after all, exercising their rights as British citizens. They have stood together like men in order to show Mr. Sévigny that they cannot be fooled, and that if he went there to fool them they would give him a lesson. Of course, our friends of the Conservative press have sent representatives down there, and these representatives have sent all kinds of reports. I myself am an old newspaper man, and I know the difficulties of reporting meetings twice a day, one of them at night, sometimes in small villages miles from a telegraph station, at places like Ste. Aurelie and St. Zacharie, and other places where difficulties of transmitting news are very great. All kinds of reports have been sent forward. Some of them may have been faithful reports: others may be subject to misrepresentation. In justice to Mr. Cannon, the standard-bearer of the Liberal party, I would like to put on Hansard the communication that he wired to the Ottawa papers, which as a declaration of principles will be subscribed to freely and voluntarily by every man in Canada who calls himself a Liberal. This declaration, as telegraphed to the Journal-Press, is as follows:

> Your report of my speech in Dorchester greatly misleading. I understand you are obeying the order of your bosses in vile attempt to divide Liberals and create ill-feeling between both races in this country, when a united effort is necessary. My programme as expounded to my electors is as follows:
> 1. I am proud to be a British subject, and wish to remain so.
>
> 2. I believe that Canada should give to the Mother Country all possible help in money and men, but most strenuously object to being robbed as we were at Valcartier and other places by Government friends. I do not think, moreover, with Lord Shaughnessy, that our country should be drained of all her manhood and resources.
>
> 3. I am opposed to conscription, especially if it should commence in Quebec, as suggested by Sir Sam Hughes when Minister of Militia. Vancouver, Winnipeg and many other cities think as I do in this respect.
>
> 4. I think the Government should ascertain the available resources of the country in men and wealth, but believe that the National Service cards were badly worded, and not the best means to attain the object in view.
>
> 5. I believe the present Federal Administration corrupt and incompetent to deal with the problems we now face, and opportunity should be given to the electors to express their views.
> 6. A change of Government here will be for the good of the country, as it has been in England, France, Russia and all other countries now fighting because, in such a crisis the Government should at all times possess the full confidence of the country.—Lucien Cannon.

That is worthy of Sir John A. Macdonald. That is a declaration of principle that a man can make without being charged with going beyond the pale of his rights as a British subject. The chances are that the new member for Dorchester will repeat his declarations in the House.

I want to impress, Mr. Speaker, on the members of this House the fact that the province of Quebec is not deserving of blame. The province of Quebec, if we consider all things, has done remarkably well. We heard the hon. member for Brantford quote figures for Ontario. Well, there are a million more people in Ontario than there are in Quebec, and that makes a great difference. Then, a large number of Americans came in from the United States and were enlisted in the province of Ontario. A large percentage of the people who were enlisted in the province of Ontario were of British birth, the sons of British soldiers and sailors, or of close British connection. They were men who, like the boys in the West, dropped everything the moment they heard the bugle call and started for the war. The conditions were familiar to them. They were going home, a place sacred in the heart of every Briton, to fight for the cause of British liberty and British freedom and to defend the old homestead and the old flag. It was natural that they should go, and it is to their glory that they went. But take the case of the French Canadian who had a large family to care for and who was going over to a country which was foreign to him in many respects—to France and to Belgium—a sacrifice on his part so great that I think he is entitled to as much credit as is the British boy—if not more—who is simply going back home.

The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) spoke about the French race not having degenerated on the battle fields of Europe. France has shown that she still remains the first nation of continental Europe: she has shown that she still has in her veins and in her very heart the force that has at all times placed her at the head of Europe. She has repelled the Hun at Verdun after a fight which is the admiration of the world and will be its admiration for all time to come. It is merely a repetition of what they did eight centuries ago at Poitiers when Charles Martel repelled the Saracens and Mohammedans who were over-running Europe. The member for Brantford says: I hope that the French people in the province of Quebec will be as good as the French are on the other side of the Atlantic. The French on the other side of the Atlantic are defending their homesteads and all that is sacred to them. Place the French of the province of Quebec in a similar position. The invader has invaded the province of Quebec on two occasions. You, Mr. Speaker, as a student of history, know that but for the activity of the French population in 1776 and in 1812 there would perhaps be no British flag to-day in North America to defend. The province of Quebec is ready and willing and prepared at any time to do its share, and it has done its share. When the Prime Minister went to Quebec to call for recruits Sir Lomer Gouin, the Premier of the province, stood by his side. Was not the venerable leader of the Opposition himself at a meeting in the city of Montreal, the first public man in Quebec to call upon his compatriots to enlist? Was not the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) one of the public men who was chiefly instrumental in organizing Major Asselin's regiment? There a mistake was made. This gallant band of French Canadians who were anxious to go to the front were sent to Bermuda, to do the work of the coloured men in that place. After having been kept there six or eight months they were finally sent over to the other side; and what happened to them when they got to the other side? The same thing that happened to our Irish friends from Montreal and our Scotch friends from Nova Scotia; they were disbanded, broken up and sent any where at all to fill up the gaps. These are mistakes that have been committed by the Militia Department and by the general organization, but there are others, so I shall not occupy my time in discussing them now.

But I want to say that the province of Quebec has done remarkably well, all things considered. Our provincial Government has given a splendid example. The Legislature of the province of Quebec voted $1,000,000 only lately to the Patriotic Fund. Last year I think it was the first province in Canada to make a grant of half a million dollars. At the very beginning of the war our hierarchy, led by the venerable Cardinal Archbishop of Quebec and every other archbishop and bishop of the province, called upon the people to come forward and enlist and defend the cause, the British cause, for if there is anybody in this country who has reason to be loyal to the British flag it is the French-Canadian. I want you and the members of this House to put this down deep in your hearts, that the last gun to be fired here in defence of the Union Jack will be fired by a French-Canadian, because for us the British flag means all that we have. To us it is our language, it is our creed, it is our standard as an element in the Canadian nationality. If we can speak in this House the beautiful language that France has spread throughout the world, the language that still remains the official language of the world, it is due to the British flag that these rights have been recognized. Those are principles for which we wish to contend and to fight. But is the Government of the day blameless if the province of Quebec has not given the number of recruits that should have been given? Did the Government of Canada, did the Prime Minister—against whom I have not a word to say personally, because I think he is a high-minded citizen who means well—did the Prime Minister of Canada not commit a fatal mistake when he took into his Cabinet an element of public men from the province of Quebec who did not represent the majority of those people? If the Prime Minister were here I would ask if the reception which was given him when he came to the Monument National in Montreal to speak in favour of National Service was not a magnificent reception? Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself would have received no better. The organizer of the National Service (Mr. R. B. Bennett) can say the same thing. But when the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) rose upon that platform to advocate, almost to adore, what he had condemned a few years before, the conscience of the young French-Canadians of Montreal practically prevented him from being heard. But what happened two or three days afterwards? The Premier of Canada went to Quebec, but he was not accompanied by the Secretary of State, nor by the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny); he took a thoroughbred Tory with him, the late Postmaster General, who we all regret is no longer with us. The people of Quebec do not object to a Conservative. The province of Quebec was Conservative for forty years, ever since we had public institutions in that province; in fact, without the support of Sir George Cartier, Sir John Macdonald could not have carried on the Government of Canada, because in those days Ontario was a Grit hive, it was largely Liberal. Sir Oliver Mowat kept power there for thirty-two or thirty-three years. Often the strength of the Liberal party in the House of Commons came from Ontario, but the members from the province of Quebec, the old bleus, who were here under the leadership of Sir George Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin, made the Conservative Government possible. Without the French Conservative support from the province of Quebec Sir John A. Macdonald would never have held power in this country as long as he did, and Sir John, in his political testament in 1891, one of the last speeches that he delivered in the old House of Commons, declared that in this country we were all upon an equal footing, that there was no conquered race here, that we all spoke the language that we were accustomed to, that French and English had the same status in this House, and that without the hearty co-operation of the French people of the province of Quebec Confederation would never have been possible. And today it stares you in the face. There is Quebec, the keystone of the arch, the connecting link between the Maritime Provinces on the East and the far West. But, if we in the province of Quebec are not to be treated as fellow countrymen, if we are to be treated as pariahs, if we are to be dubbed with all the misfortunes and all the mistakes and held responsible for all the shortcomings of the present Administration, if the whole thing is to be laid on the back of the province of Quebec, how can you expect that the province of Quebec will respond to the call which is now made to it? The province of Quebec is prepared to do its duty; but we are faced with this alternative: You have declared, and your public men, members of this Government, have declared, that the man at home, producing upon his farm, or the man in a munitions factory, working at the production of munitions, is doing as effective work for the Empire as if he were on the battlefield itself. I had the honour last year of addressing a meeting of my compatriots in the Russell theatre here, in company with the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White). I had not spoken in that theatre for eight years before, the last occasion being one when I appeared with Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Lord Grey to ask for support for the movement for the creation of the battlefields at Quebec into a national park to commemorate for all time to come the union of the French and English races in Canada. We thought then that, on the rock city of Quebec, near the spot where Wolfe had died in the arms of victory, where Montcalm had shed his last drop of blood for the flag that he had defended so long, where France closed her glorious chapter on this continent—we thought then that in that place we had cemented forever the races and had put an end to these dissensions between the French and English of this country. But apparently we had not. I heard the Minister of Finance on that occasion say that enlistment and recruiting was a matter of conscience. He said, in effect, although I do not pretend to quote his exact words: I am not here to ask you to enlist or to ask you to enroll yourself; but if you do so you will have done a noble thing, a noble deed. Here is the cause we are defending, here is the cause which we ask you to go and defend upon the other side of the ocean; but if you feel that you can be of more service at home, if there are ties that keep you here which cannot be broken, I consider that the man in the munitions factory, or the man who is producing on a farm for the supply of this country and the supply of the Allies, is doing as effective work for the Empire as if he were in the firing line.

I represent a constituency which is peopled largely by French and English. One-third of my constituents are English. Probably three hundred men from my constituency have gone, although many of them enlisted in New Brunswick regiments. These people would have been the first victims if the Huns had crossed the ocean. Entering the St. Lawrence the invaders would have fallen upon the coast of Gaspé and Bonaventure. My people knew what the war meant and what support of the Empire means. They know that we are fighting for ourselves in fighting for England.

To-day I received a resolution from the municipal Council of St. Alexis de Metapedia, which I translate as follows:

Province of Quebec,
Municipality of Metapedia,

At a special session of the municipal council of Metapedia, convened by special notice, for this fifteenth day of January, nineteen hundred and seventeen, at seven o'clock of the afternoon, and held at Mr. Ludger Galant's place:

There were present: Mr. Thomas Levesque, Mayor, and Messrs. Benoit Martin, Alexis Arsenault, Ludger Galant, Jean Martin, councillors, the whole forming a quorum under the presidency of the Mayor.

The Mayor read a letter from the Director of the National Service addressed to the Municipal Council and asking said Council to help him to promote all measures taken in the interest of the Empire, during the present war.

After deliberation, on the motion made by Mr. Alexis Arsenault, seconded by Mr. Benoit Martin, it is resolved as follows:

Whereas the parish of St-Alexis in the municipality of Metapedia is an agricultural parish;

Whereas the voluntary recruiting for military service already produces a shortage of hands for the proper development of agriculture, and besides has undoubtedly enhanced the cost of living; and whereas this council is of opinion that forced recruiting, or in other words, forced obligatory military service in Canada would hurt the development of agriculture and thereby the agricultural production asked for by the National Service;

The Municipal Council for the parish of St-Alexis of Metapedia, whilst affirming its loyalty towards our Sovereign, His Majesty King George V, manifests its formal opposition to any law of conscription for military service in Canada under any form whatever, as being detrimental to agriculture.

Whereas the municipal officers do all in their power so that the National Service cards be returned in perfect order, the secretary-treasurer of this municipality is ordered to forward a copy of this resolution to the secretary of the National Service and to our member of Parliament, the Hon. Charles Marcil.

THOMAS LEVESQUE,
Mayor.

JULES DUFOUR,
Sec.-Treas.

What are you going to do about it? Are you going to ask these men to abandon their farms? Are you going to ask the only son or the second son who remains on the farm to abandon his farm, to abandon his property and to go into Montreal or Quebec and enlist? The Government should say one thing or the other. They have decided to send 500,000 men. That is one alternative. Lord Shaughnessy said that that could not be done except by crippling the economic resources of the country. But, if you want to send your 500,000 men, do not say at the same time that there is a shortage of munitions. The chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board says that he has 600 factories at work in Canada at the present time, and calls upon the manufacturers to fulfil their contracts, as that is the most effective way of helping the Empire. What are we going to do? Are we going to drop production, or are we going to drop recruiting? In the province of Quebec there was no system of organization in regard to recruiting. Recruiting in that province was the result of the efforts of private individuals, of many public-spirited individuals in Montreal, Quebec and elsewhere, who undertook the organization of battalions. They have organized a number of battalions and sent them overseas.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the rule.

Thursday, January 25, 1917.

The House met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE.

BUSINESS OF PARLIAMENT—PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN, (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, in his speech in the debate on the Speech from the Throne, referred to the course which might be taken with regard to the business of parliament in view of the invitation which has been extended to the First Ministers of the overseas Dominions to participate in a conference which will begin in London in the early future and in which, for the purpose of that conference, the ministers alluded to will be regarded for the time being as members of the War Cabinet. Before the debate on the speech from the Throne had been initiated, the subject, of course, had received some consideration from my colleagues and myself, and I am disposed to think that the course which my right hon. friend suggests is the course which it would be proper to adopt under the circumstances, subject to one or two considerations which I shall mention. I should think that it would be proper to vote the Supplementary Estimates as they would be required before the probable date at which Parliament could resume. I think that there should be a vote on account, such as is ordinarily given, say to the 30th of June. It would seem to me appropriate, and indeed my right hon. friend suggested it, that the vote for war purposes should be passed in its entirety in order that we might ensure absolutely the participation of Canada in the war if it should continue for the full period of the next fiscal year. In addition to that, I understand from my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) that a Borrowing Bill, which I think will not be controversial, ought to be passed in order that adequate financial provision for certain necessary purposes may be made.

That is all the programme that we would propose before adjournment, with one exception which was suggested to me some time ago from different parts of the country, and as to which I wrote to the right hon. gentleman about five or six weeks ago. He will remember that in 1914 the Railway Act with its amendments was consolidated; a Bill was introduced by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), and was referred to a Committee of this House, and a Committee of the Senate was also appointed which, under arrangement, met with the Committee of this House in order that consideration might be given to that Bill by a Committee of the Senate and by a Committee of the House of Commons at the same time, acting indeed as one committee, although not formally or technically one committee. It has been suggested to the Government and especially to myself during the past autumn that, although the war is in progress and there are very important matters connected with its prosecution which continually engage the attention of the Government and of Parliament, nevertheless this Bill is of so important a character that its consideration ought not longer to be delayed, and I would therefore propose, so far as this Bill is concerned, to have it introduced, to have it read the second time without discussion, and then to have it referred to a committee constituted in the same way as the committee of three years ago. That would comprise all the programme which the Government would propose before the adjournment.

I have a further telegram with regard to the presence in London of representatives of the overseas dominions, in which some urgency is expressed as to an early date. I have not brought it down because it is otherwise not a very important communication and I am expecting another. During the course of the afternoon I will submit it to my right hon. friend and he will see precisely what the purport is. I will also take the occasion to discuss with him the probable length of adjournment, as to which perhaps I may be able to speak with more definiteness and more certainty after receiving the further communication which I am expecting.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I acquiesce entirely with the suggestions which have been made by my right hon. friend. There is nothing new in them except the subject of railway legislation. My right hon. friend has alluded to the fact that he wrote me some few weeks ago in regard to that subject, and I think I replied to his letter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, my right hon. friend expressed his entire acquiescence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The House will readily understand that the subject of railway legislation is one which is liable to open the door to many amendments and suggestions, but in these war times I suppose that everybody would agree to pass what is, as I understand it, simply a consolidation of the different Railway Acts. That would be very convenient and useful and I see no objection to introducing the Bill and disposing of it as my right hon. friend suggests.

The only other thing of importance is the passing of a vote on account for supplies, which I understood my right hon. friend to say he desires until the 30th of June.

Mr. GRAHAM: That will be 25 per cent.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is a little more than we are used to granting, but in war times we are disposed to be generous, and we will agree to it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know whether I make myself perfectly plain. I thought we might introduce the Railway Bill, pass it through the second reading without discussion, and then possibly it might be arranged between a committee of this House and a committee of the Senate that some work be done upon that during adjournment.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Whether or not that would be possible, I do not know; members are not, perhaps, very anxious to work during the period of adjournment. At all events, this House and the Senate could give to the members of the committee, whoever they may be, an opportunity to do some work in the interim. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries reminds me that it may be necessary to introduce a Bill, which, I think, will not be controversial, with regard to the Harbour Commission works that are proceeding at Quebec. If my right hon. friend should find that the proposal is controversial we shall not press it before adjournment, but if he is disposed to accept it we would have that also put through before adjournment.

Mr. MURPHY: The right hon. gentleman intimated that a borrowing Bill would be introduced. Will the provision of that Bill relate solely to borrowing for war purposes?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: General borrowing, I think.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Bill will be similar to the Bill covering $75,000,000 which was passed at the last session. It will be borrowing for the general purposes of the Dominion. I will explain the reasons for it when the Bill is under consideration.

ESTABLISHMENT OF LABOUR BUREAUS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I renew the question which I have put to the right hon. leader of the Government concerning the date upon which he will receive a certain delegation in reference to the establishment of labour bureaus?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I believe that Miss Wileman communicated with me on the subject, as well as with the Minister of Labour and with some of my colleagues. I greatly regret that it will be impossible for me to arrange my personal attendance at the proposed meeting. The great demands upon my time in view of my approaching departure prevent me from having that privilege.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Am I to understand that one of the right hon. gentleman's colleagues may receive the delegation?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did suggest that if application were made to the Minister of Labour a date would be arranged.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The reason why I appear to be a little insistent is not that I have been asked to accompany the delegation, but because it is stated in the letter which is addressed to me that some gentlemen from the western provinces have been telegraphed to and are on their way.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot add anything to what I have said. An opportunity will be given for making such representations as may be desired, and no doubt they will be communicated to me, but personally I cannot be present.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BUCHANAN: Has the Minister of Labour any further information about the coal mining situation in southern Alberta? I have a telegram stating that the miners at Lethbridge, Coalhurst, and Chinook went out last night and that they are taking a referendum next Tuesday as to whether or not they will accept the Harrison finding. It is also said that the cause of their going out was their annoyance at the Government's failure to enforce the finding of Commissioner Harrison. I would like a statement from the Minister of Labour with regard to this matter.

Mr. CROTHERS: All that I can say is that negotiations are progressing, and I confidently expect that within a few days they will reach a satisfactory conclusion.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. G. C. Wilson (Wentworth) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Wednesday, January 24.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure) (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock last night I had attempted to answer what I considered to be a reflection, unintentional, perhaps, which had been made during the afternoon by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) and the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) regarding the situation in the province of Quebec.

I am glad to congratulate the Prime Minister on the stand that he is now taking in announcing his acceptance of the proposal made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition. We are passing through difficult times, and there must be some give and take on both sides. The Liberal party gave a splendid example of that principle at the very outbreak of hostilities. In the early days of August, 1914, when most of us were basking down on the seashore at the summer resorts, taking our usual holidays, we suddenly learned with dismay that war had broken out in Europe. We were summoned to an extraordinary session. The Parliament of Canada was called upon to ratify the action which had been taken by the Prime Minister and his colleagues to throw Canada into a European war. The step was a most extraordinary one, having no precedent in our history. The Prime Minister declared in his speech that he had taken upon himself the responsibility of that action without having consulted his own colleagues, and we have it now that he did not consult the Liberal party or its leader. The representatives of the people came here in large numbers and in four or five days they passed all the necessary legislation, voted all the necessary money and gave Canada an example of union, harmony and concord which will stand to their credit in the annals of this Parliament. Since then we have tried to carry out that line of policy to the best of our ability. How easy it would have been for the distinguished leader of the Opposition to have merely laid down the constitutional rule that any important departure like this should first be submitted to the referendum of the people; that their consent should first be asked. But he overlooked that, and took the stand that he had always taken in his public life; that England's difficulty was Canada's difficulty, that England's case was our case. And we took it for granted that the people of Canada would ratify our action. I am glad to say that the people whom I represent, a mingled community, not all of the same origin or of the same stock, have all gladly ratified my action and by their enlistments in the English and Scotch as well as in the Acadian French settlements have made a record which will forever stand to their honour.

I know that the member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) is an imperialist, and I will not take very seriously a passing allusion he made in his speech, because towards the end of his address he apologized to some extent for what he had said. But he made a passing allusion, which, though not offensive, is not altogether to the credit of the Empire of which he is an apostle. The member for Brantford is an ardent imperialist, and in speaking of this war in which Canadians have taken part in such large numbers, he referred to the fact that there were so many people in this country of British stock and so many others—fifty-seven other classes. He did not refer to any other particular class at great length, but he made particular allusion to the Brantford Indians. I think that the member for Brantford makes a very grievous mistake if he considers that the glory, the strength, the power, the very foundation of the British Empire, rests merely upon the subjects of the King who are of British stock. It is the pride of England, and it is the pride especially of the British Empire, that the greatness of the Empire is to be found in its 450,000,000 subjects, of whom but 45,000,000 or less are of British stock, the remaining 400,000,000 being composed of all nationalities, of all creeds, of all languages. To say that in Canada a man must be of British stock to be a loyal supporter of the Government, to be a loyal supporter of the institutions of Canada, to be a loyal supporter of the Crown and of the flag, is to exhibit a most deplorable ignorance of our history. Canada would never have existed as it exists to-day but for the subjects of the King who speak the French language. The hon. member for Brantford knows full well that when rebellion did break out on this continent it broke out among the English-speaking subjects of His Majesty the King. The temptation for the French subjects of His Majesty the King on the banks of the St. Lawrence to have followed the new star spangled banner was great; but it stands to-day to their credit that although the English-speaking subjects of the King, of British stock, rose in rebellion against Great Britain, it was his French subjects of the province of Quebec who in 1774 saved Canada to the British Crown. The hon. member made a reflection upon the people of Quebec which I am quite sure he did not intend; and if he had intended it, I would refer him to our friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), the most outspoken member on the Government side, the man who says what he thinks, who wired, the day after Courcelette, to the hon. member for Rouville, that London was ringing with the praises of the French-Canadians. That testimonial, unsolicited, came from the hon. member for Peterborough, and it was quite true.

Leaving these things aside, I was dealing yesterday with the difficulties that we had to contend with in recruiting in Quebec, and endeavoured to show that there had been conditions in the province of Quebec which made it difficult to secure recruits in as large numbers as we should have liked. And with your permission, without showing any ill-feeling, with all due respect to the feelings of everyone here, with all due admiration for the manhood of Ontario an the West and of the maritime provinces who have gone to the front, as well as for those of the province of Quebec who have enlisted, I think it is only fair, in justice to the province of Quebec and to its citizens, that the facts should be set before this country, that they should be embalmed in the records of Hansard, so that hereafter no unfair aspersions may be cast upon the province of Quebec on the score of recruiting. I hope to be able to prove this afternoon by acknowledged facts that the wrong crew were in charge of recruiting in the province of Quebec; that those who are now the ministers of the King from the province of Quebec do not possess the confidence of the people of that province, and that they were either sincere in 1911 when they spoke against Canadian participation in the wars of the Empire, or else they are sincere now, when they are speaking in favour of such participation. Were they sincere in 1911 when they were speaking against participation in all wars of the Empire, or are they sincere now? The people of the province of Quebec were put in that dilemma. But the responsibility, if it had rested there, would have been of secondary account; we of Quebec who are familiar with the facts would have passed lightly over this thing.

But there is another responsibility that has been assumed by one of the great political parties of this country; that responsibility has been assumed by the right hon. gentleman who is now the King's chief adviser in this great Dominion, and in the interests of fair play and justice to the province, in the interests of that British justice to which we are always so proud to refer, I think the facts should be made known and should be stated, without any doubt whatever. Yesterday, in my address, I called your attention to the most extraordinary fact that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Descarries)—and I regret that at the present moment there is not a single member from the province of Quebec on the Conservative side of this House and has not been for the last three or four days, the bulk of them being down in Dorchester leading a forlorn hope—the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who seconded the motion now in your hands, was the gentleman who, in 1910, in the town of Lachine, presided over the birth of the National party. I had known the hon. member for Jacques Cartier for many years previous to that. I had known him in the provincial life of Quebec; I had known him when he was an ultramontane supporter of the Mousseau Cabinet; I also knew him when he was a supporter of the Quebec Government in the days of the Riel troubles in the west. I knew him later on when he was a strong Conservative, when the Conservatives were again in power. I knew him as a Nationalist, and I know him today as a True Bleu, expressing from his place in this House astonishment at the fact that the electors of Dorchester do not allow Mr. Sévigny to be elected by acclamation, and hoping that this slight insurrection, as he calls it, will blow away. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier was the man who presided at the birth of the Nationalist party. The sponsors for that party were, among others, the present organizer of the Dorchester election, the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude), who first distinguished himself as organizer in the election in Drummond-Arthabaska, who repeated his work in the Chateauguay election and is now on trial in the Dorchester election. Along with these two sponsors was Mr. Cousineau, an unfortunate leader, who can say, as Francis the First said, all is lost save honour. Mr. Cousineau lost all he could lose in the province of Quebec. He was the leader of the Conservative party in that province in May last. He is the man who went forward with eighty-one candidates in the province of Quebec. Six of these were returned—no, five, because one was at the front and was allowed to be elected by acclamation in Westmount. Five of his candidates out of eighty-one were elected. The present ministers of the Crown representing the province of Quebec have constituencies there. Part of the constituency represented by the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude) returned by acclamation the Liberal organizer for the district of Montreal. The constituency of the present Post Master General (Mr. Blondin) went back on him to the tune of sixteen hundred votes; and the county of Dorchester which Mr. Sévigny carried by three hundred in 1911 as a Nationalist elected Mr. Cannon in the last local contest by over five hundred majority. Why did the province of Quebec turn so strongly to the support of the local Liberal Government? It was because the local Government was a good Government to begin with, but above all because the immense majority of the people of Quebec were tired and sick of Tory rule at Ottawa and at Quebec. Mr. Cousineau was one of the sponsors at the birth of the Nationalist party. This National party came into existence at Lachine; it took its first flight into history at St. Eustache, where the resolutions that I read yesterday were passed. Mr. Monk submitted these resolutions, but one paragraph was inserted at the request of Mr. Bourassa, who refused to take the leadership of the new alliance unless it was stated that the Borden policy was condemned as well as that of the right honourable leader of the then Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), These people began to preach this gospel. What was that gospel? It was: that the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was nefarious —that the policy of the Hon. Mr. Borden was equally nefarious. And what was meant by this word nefarious. It meant going to the support of England when England was at war; it meant that we should exercise our rights as free and loyal subjects of the King; it meant that Canada should not vote one dollar, or send one man to the defence of the Empire in any of its wars. That was the nefarious policy which Sir Wilfrid Laurier had preached in the province of Quebec, and which Henri Bourassa condemned, which the Conservatives of the province of Quebec condemned, and which every French-Conservative elected in the province of Quebec condemned. These gentlemen were elected upon this platform. But here I put a query. There are two facts in this case which have not yet been brought to light. The members of this House who knew the late Mr. Monk had for him nothing but respect. The honourable Mr. Monk was a man who gave a sincere proof of his convictions when he resigned his portfolio and practically retired from public life because he did not seek to impose a new naval policy upon Canada without consulting the people. The honourable Mr. Monk had given his promise to the electors of Jacques Cartier that he would not vote any money for the creation of a Canadian navy, that he would not vote for a contribution to the navy unless the people of Canada were consulted upon the subject. He moved such a motion in this House, and he declared so openly throughout the whole campaign. After the election, when, to the great surprise of the whole Dominion, and, I might even say, to the surprise of the whole English-speaking world, it was learned that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had been defeated by a combination of Nationalists and Conservatives, what happened? The present Prime Minister of Canada handed over to Mr. Monk the choice of his colleagues for the province of Quebec. The first man who was called upon by Mr. Monk to enter the cabinet was Mr. Armand Lavergne, the man who refused to answer the call of the late Minister of Militia to muster his regiment in the county of Montmagny, and enlist for overseas duty. Our friends from Ontario escaped the fate of having Mr. Armand Lavergne as one of their leaders, as one of the members of this Cabinet. Mr. Armand Lavergne is just as good as the three gentlemen who are in the Cabinet now. They all preached the same policy. I think Armand Lavergne is better.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MARCIL: Armand Lavergne stood true to his policy, and if the Liberals of Dorchester, or of Champlain, or of Montmagny, had been willing to support Mr. Lavergne, in doing what his Conservative friends in the province of Quebec did, enter into an alliance with the Nationalists, he would have run there. The very reason that Mr. Cannon is opposing Mr. Sevigny to-day is because the Liberals in the county of Dorchester insisted upon having a Liberal candidate in the person of Mr. Cannon, who is a loyal member of the party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh. oh.

Mr. MARCIL: If Mr. Armand Lavergne was invited by Mr. Monk to enter the Cabinet—and that will not be denied if we are to accept the version of Mr. Monk, and of Mr. Lavergne—Mr. Armand Lavergne came to Ottawa, and what did he do? He turned over the portfolio to Mr. Pelletier, the late Postmaster General. This was a very generous act on the part of Mr. Lavergne because Mr. Pelletier, during the campaign in the county of Quebec in 1911, had recognized Mr. Armand Lavergne as his leader. Mr. Pelletier had also been a political chameleon. In his early days he was a strong Conservative, but in 1885 he broke away from the Conservative party and ran against Sir Hector Langevin in the city of Three Rivers. Sir Hector Langevin was then leader of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, and Mr. Pelletier became a strong supporter of Honore Mercier. He was the Nationalist representative of Dorchester, the very constituency to which we are referring now. Then he went back on Mercier, and went into the Conservative Government after Mercier fell from office. In the days of the Laurier Administration, he was seen sometimes in Ottawa in company with the Minister of Public Works, the late Mr. Tarte, at the time when Mr. Tarte had left the Cabinet. He was preparing for another volte-face. Mr. Armand Lavergne also came to Ottawa. These facts were known to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. These were the men who were brought in to represent the people of the province of Quebec as the King's advisers. Mr. Pelletier was accepted because in the campaign in the county of Quebec, at Lorette, he had declared "My leader is Mr. Armand Lavergne; I am proud to serve under his leadership." And so Mr. Armand Lavergne turned over his portfolio to Mr. Pelletier, who was put down as choice number one. Mr. Monk had the selecting of his colleagues, and if he could select Mr. Pelletier why did he not offer a similar position to Mr. Bourassa? If Mr. Bourassa had been willing then to enter the Cabinet, could the Prime Minister of this country have refused him if Mr. Monk had insisted upon his going in? That question has never been cleared up, though Mr. Bourassa himself declared that he had never had any intention of entering the Borden Administration. Mr. Pelletier came here as a minister of the Crown, and there were two other gentlemen who came with him, Mr. Monk and Mr. Nantel. Mr. Pelletier was chosen because Mr. Armand Lavergne made way for him. Mr. Nantel was chosen because the representation of the French element in the Cabinet would be reduced to two, if the Irish element were to be represented by the Minister of Justice and the Protestant-speaking element by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). It was upon that occasion that the hon. member for Argenteuil waived the old time right of the Protestant representation of the province of Quebec, to a portfolio, so that the silent member for Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel) should have his portfolio. En passant I may say that Sir George Perley has been doing important work for the Empire on the other side of the ocean. He is now charged with a heavy responsibility. But if the duties of the representative of the Protestant element have been neglected they have been assumed by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), because when the Conservatives in the province of Quebec, particularly in the Montreal district are discontented in regard to questions of patronage and cannot get all the appointments they want, they place the blame on my honourable friend the Minister of Justice. These three men, Messrs. Monk, Pelletier and Nantel started in. What has become of them? Mr. Monk resigned on a question of principle; Mr. Pelletier went out of office to take a judgeship; Mr. Nantel accepted a railway comissionership, and Mr. Coderre, who came in afterwards, has also accepted a judgeship. When he started his Nationalist campaign in the province of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa stated that Nationalism was not a party, that Nationalism was an idea. It was an idea that he wanted to put into the minds of the Nationalists: "Le Nationalisme c'est un apostolat, c'est une idée et non pas un parti", and his idea was to lead a certain group of men to form a Canadian political party and to exercise the part of arbiter between the parties. He had eighteen, nineteen or twenty followers elected—

An hon. MEMBER: Twenty-three.

Mr. MARCIL: But he mistook his men. They abandoned the idea, which was to go to the fountain head, we might say, of constitutional principles, and they went into trough politics. They went in the wrong direction. The present Prime Minister of Canada has been kept busy appointing these Nationalists to office. Practically, the only changes in his Cabinet have taken place in the Nationalist ranks and in relation to Quebec matters are going from bad to worse. The old-time Conservatives in Quebec, Conservatives of the eminence of Sir Alexander Lacoste, Sir Auguste Real Angers, and Hon. Louis Beaubien, men who for forty years upheld the traditions of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, are no longer represented on the Treasury benches. The old Conservatives in the province of Quebec have been wiped out. It is Nationalism that is triumphant; the Nationalists are there, they are in office and they intend to stay.

There was another point that I wanted to have cleared up. Our friends in the province of Ontario think that the people of Quebec are very bad. I am amazed sometimes to think that men of the intelligence of John Ross Robertson and Sir John Willison can publish in their newspapers, the Toronto Telegram and the Toronto News, so much rubbish in reference to the province of Quebec. You will not find in the British Empire a more contented, a more peaceable, a more law-abiding citizen than the average farmer in the province of Quebec. If you wish to know what genuine hospitality is, if you wish to see what genuine politeness is—the politeness which existed in the old days—go into one of the parishes of Quebec. Every man you meet will bow to you, whether you are a perfect stranger or not. If there is anything he can do in the way of giving you information, or inviting you to his house, or extending to you hospitality, he will do it and you will find in him the true, ideal citizen. Do these people in the province of Quebec bother their heads about what is going on in Ontario or in the other provinces? Not at all. They are peaceful, law-abiding citizens; they never see the Toronto News or the Toronto Telegram; they never will, and they do not care whether these papers exist or not. Some of them have noticed the name of Sir John Willison as the former biographer of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. None of these people have ever seen or read the Orange Sentinel and never will. I want to say a word to our Orange friends from the province of Ontario who may be in this House. I do not agree with Orangeism, but this is a free country and a man has a right to think as he pleases in politics as well as in religion. But, if our friends from the province of Ontario want to know the true political history of Canada as Orangeism knew it in the old days, if they want to know what true, political liberty has been in Canada, they will find it in the province of Quebec. They will find it in the life of the late Julius Scriver, one of the "noble thirteen" from the province of Quebec who represented the county of Huntingdon—which ranks as the banner Orange constituency in that province—for twenty-five years on the floor of this House and who was not found in the ranks of the Conservative party. When my hon. friends utter such nonsense as that a vote for Laurier is a vote for Bourassa they must be very childish if they expect any one to accept an assertion of that kind. The people of the province of Quebec are prepared to extend to all the greatest cordiality, the greatest friendship and the greatest freedom of thought in religious as well as in civil and political matters.

In the past history of Quebec there are instances of this which are worth citing. The English element in the province of Quebec has sent to this House some distinguished men such, for instance, as the late Hon. Luther Hamilton Holton and the late Hon. Lucius Seth Huntingdon, the man who brought about the change of 1873 in connection with the Pacific scandal, and these great men were to be found in the ranks of the Liberal party. These men represented constituencies which were largely peopled by French-Canadians. In that province the Irish element, which is not as numerous, probably, as it might have been if circumstances had favoured a larger immigration from Ireland, has been represented in this House by distinguished men. I might mention the late Hon. Mr. Curran from Montreal Centre, the late Hon. Thomas D'Arcy McGee—the greatest of all—the present Chief Justice of Canada and the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). Two of them have gone but I appeal to the other two who remain to say if I am not giving a true statement of conditions which to-day exist in the province of Quebec. These gentlemen sat in this House largely as the representatives of French-Canadian electors, especially the present Chief Justice of Canada, who was the spokesman of the Irishmen of Canada, and who represented a constituency which was 99½ per cent French-Canadian. He was here as the representative of French-Canadian electors, but he spoke for the Irish people throughout Canada. The Minister of Justice knows well that one-half, if not more, of his constituents are French-Canadian. The people of Quebec are broad-minded in these matters; they elect English Protestants to this House and these are things that our Orange friends should remember.

There is an incident that I wish to recall. One day, when I was campaigning in Simcoe, near Penetanguishene, against the present representative of that riding, I was invited by the then Liberal candidate, a former member of this House, to enter an Orange lodge after the usual evening's business had been disposed of. My friend said: They will look upon you as a curiosity coming from the province of Quebec. I did not find any objection to entering this Orange hall. I entered and received a hearty welcome. Naturally, I was invited to speak; I did speak, and I gave these people a brief review of some of the conditions that had prevailed in the past political history of the province of Quebec; I showed the broad-mindedness of the French-Canadian people, and I cited the fact that the only instance in which the Protestant minority in that province had been honoured by having one of their own number elevated to the premiership of that province was when Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière, a knight of the old school of chivalry and one of the greatest and noblest in Canada, was placed by the Liberal party at the head of public affairs in the province of Quebec.

I mention these facts because, incidentally, upon reading the morning papers, I saw that the present Minister of Inland Revenue is going to some trouble to explain that the present candidate in the county of Dorchester is an Irishman, that he has Irish blood in his veins and that he has no authority to speak for the French Canadian people. There are Englishmen, there are Scotchmen and there are Irishmen who have undertaken to speak for the province of Quebec as their representatives in this House and I hope this will always happen because the people of Quebec look more to the man than they do to his creed.

I noticed that the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) went to some trouble to give a French pronunciation to the name of Mr. Cannon. Mr. Cannon is a good Irishman, he is the great grandson of an Irishman and the "Lucien" very probably came to him from his French mother. Yet, the Minister of Inland Revenue makes it an offence for him to undertake to speak for the French Canadian people in the county of Dorchester. But this is nothing new for the Minister of Inland Revenue. The first time he appeared upon a public platform in the province of Quebec was as a candidate for the local House in the county of Nicolet. Then he ran against a gentleman who was well known to many hon. members of this House, a broad-minded, great Canadian who, unfortunately was cut down in his full manhood. I refer to the late Hon. Charles Devlin, a man who had the distinction not only of being a member of the Canadian House but also of being a member of the Imperial Parliament and who died while a Minister of the Government of the province of Quebec. When Mr. Devlin went into the county of Nicolet, he was the bearer of an Irish name, but he appealed to the French Canadians and he was elected by them. The Minister of Inland Revenue at that time raised against the Hon. Charles Devlin the cry that he was "un Irlandais," an Irishman, and said that he should run in one of the Irish constituencies of the province of Quebec. So the present Minister of Inland Revenue is now reaping what he has sown.

There is one other point that I should like to clear up for our Ontario friends, as they may not know it, and that is with reference to the understanding that was arrived at in the province of Quebec in the reciprocity campaign of the summer and fall of 1911. Hon. gentlemen who were members of the House know what took place. I had the honour of being Speaker of the House at that time, and I know full well what happened. Speech after speech came from the Conservative benches urging Sir Wilfrid Laurier to go over to England and attend the Coronation. The idea of having the late King Edward VII, the great peacemaker, the creator of the bonne entente, the real entente cordiale, crowned in the absence of the great French Canadian Premier of Canada, was a thing not to be thought of. Hon. gentlemen opposite insisted day after day that the Premier must go over to the other side. Well, he did go over, and during his absence what did the present member for St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) do? I have great respect for the hon. member personally. He has done remarkably good work in connection with the Patriotic Fund, and I believe he is sincere in his political views; but he is very devoted to his party. He undertook the organization of the district of Montreal in the reciprocity campaign. Charles Chaput, a good old-line Conservative, was made chairman of the Anti-Reciprocity League, but the hon. member for St. Antoine was its chief organizer. He undertook to look after what we consider the English constituencies in the province of Quebec, and he agreed with Mr. Monk and Mr. Bourassa that they should look after the French constituancies of that province. While the hon. member for St. Antoine and his English friends were thundering against reciprocity, it was understood that Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Monk were to thunder against the navy. Mr. Bourassa has declared repeatedly that it afforded him considerable enjoyment to receive money from the Conservative election fund to enable him to carry on the campaign against a Canadian navy. It has been stated over and over again that the hon. member for St. Antoine, who at that time was representing the Conservative party in the district of Montreal and the Eastern Townships of Quebec, contributed personally in some form or another to the campaign fund, either in the shape of subscriptions to Le Devoir, or for the support of candidates in doubtful constituencies. I understand, however, that he contributed in the form of subscriptions to Le Devoir, to have it circulated in the province, because Le Devoir was against Laurier at the time, and they acted on the old principle, "anything to beat Laurier." So there we have the explanation of that fight. The manufacturers of Montreal, and in fact throughout Canada, opposed reciprocity; and the consumers of Canada all know now why the manufacturers were so stubborn against it at that time. But the Nationalists said, we cannot very well oppose reciprocity in the province of Quebec, because the people here think it a reasonable thing; they live alongside the American border, and do not see any difficulty in dealing with our American neighbors. So Bourassa and his allies, with Le Devoir, gave up the campaign against reciprocity and confined themselves to the navy; and Bourassa enjoyed it immensely, because his paper was being circulated at the expense of the Imperial-Conservative funds in the province of Quebec. These, Mr. Speaker, are the gentlemen who have been put in power and trusted by the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people with the organization and maintenance of Canada's participation in the war.

The people of the province of Quebec now find themselves in this quandary: Were the Nationalists sincere in 1911 when they told us that under the Militia Act of Canada, framed 60 years ago by the representatives of both elements in this country, the duties of Canadians should be confined solely to the defence of Canada, or are they now sincere when they come with their new Imperial ideas and tell us we must go beyond the seas to fight? In Drummond and Arthabaska they won a victory, and contributed to the downfall of the great man who leads the Liberal party. But now they are reaping the whirlwind; they sowed then, and now they must reap.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been generous ever since war was declared. He allowed the late Postmaster General to be elected by acclamation in the county of Quebec, where at the last election the local Liberal member was given a majority of 1,600. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to go and plead with the Liberals of the city and county of Quebec to allow the late Postmaster General to be elected by acclamation. The present Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) passed through the same door that was opened for the late Mr. Casgrain. When the ex-Secretary of State, Mr. Coderre, was elected as the successor of the late Mr. Monk, Sir Wilfrid Laurier again appealed to his people to elect him by acclamation. What was the reason for all this? The reason was that Sir Wilfrid Laurier wanted Canada to be united, that we might take our full part in the great war that is now in progress. The people of the province of Quebec, every man, woman and child of them, are heart and soul with the noble cause of the Allies, and we are so for two reasons. First, because the blood of France flows in our veins, and secondly, because of England, to whom we owe our liberty and our present status as free citizens on the North American continent. We are with the Allies for those two potent reasons, and there is not a man, woman or child in the province of Quebec who is not in some way or other helping the cause of the Allies. Away down in the Gaspé Peninsula, in the county of Bonaventure, in the whole south region, and in the north region, the people of the province of Quebec are contributing to the Red Cross fund, the Belgium Relief and other funds. Tag days are so numerous down there that there seem to be two or three of them every day. Then there is the work of the women, sewing and knitting, and the work of the school children, the work of the clergy under the appeal of the Venerable Archbishop Cardinal of Quebec, and of the whole episcopate of the province. All that could possibly be done in Quebec has been done to give the ranks of the Allies a fair representation of the people of the province of Quebec. If there has been failure, the failure is to be charged against the Government and its representatives in that province. It is to be charged against the men who represent the King in that province, and in whom the people have no confidence, and it is to be charged against their faulty organization.

I do not intend to speak at any greater length, but I wish to add this with regard to the National Service. The National Service cards have been circulated through the province of Quebec, but the questions are so vague and indefinite that it is difficult to obtain satisfactory answers, particularly in the more remote districts. When you ask a fisherman or a farmer living on the outskirts of the province of Quebec, and having a large family—and families in the county of Bonaventure and Gaspé are generally large—whether he is willing to give up his present work to do similar work in another part of Canada, he is in this position. Is he going to give up his farm and undertake munition work in other parts of Canada? And if he is free to leave the constituency where he may be earning $1.50 or $1.75 or even $2 a day, which is the highest rate of wages, is that man going to undertake to work in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa or Winnipeg at those rates? He naturally cannot undertake it and at the same time look after his wife and family who are left at home. The appeal in this respect is ineffective, and the returns would not be satisfactory. But what is troubling the people of the province of Quebec more than anything else is this. What impelled the Prime Minister of Canada to establish the fixed number of 500,000 men when an authority like Baron Shaughnessy, who in these matters I should consider is the equal of the Prime Minister, declared that 500,000 men could not be sent out of Canada without crippling its economic and industrial resources? Now, what is the Government after? Is the Government after men to go to the front? The speech from the Throne does not say so. The paragraph dealing with the National Service is very mild and is worth reading:

> Steps have been taken by my advisers for better organization of National Service, and attention has been given to the more thorough utilization of our natural resources.

But the questions are so vague and indefinite that people do not know what they mean. If the Government would send a circular throughout my constituency saying: We need 500 shantymen at $40 a month for a period of six months, they would get them in a week. If they would send another circular saying: We need so many deep-sea fishermen and we are going to pay them so much a day and employ them for so long, they would have an immediate response. But the Government cannot expect a deep-sea fisherman or a planter of potatoes to undertake to go to work in a munitions factory in London, or Winnipeg or Montreal, leaving his wife and family behind. The whole organization is faulty.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: If the Government sent out a request for 200 volunteers, would they get them in your constituency?

An hon. MEMBER: That is a different proposition.

Mr. MARCIL: I am proud to say that the county of Bonaventure has sent nearly 300 volunteers.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I am just asking what would happen if the Government sent out a request for another 200. Many counties have given three or four thousand.

Mr. MARCIL: If my hon. friend wants to have a splendid vacation next summer, he should come down with me to New Richmond, in the county of Bonaventure, where he will meet two thousand sturdy Scotch Presbyterians who will give him his answer. The county of Bonaventure is peopled by both races, and amongst those who have fallen was a gallant young Liberal, a man who, had he lived, would at some future time have become one of the representatives of my constituency. I refer to Mr. Frank Maguire, who entered the ranks as a mere private, but who worked his way up until he became captain, and who died on the field of honour. I know of one family in Matapedia where the whole family have gone away, the girls as nurses, and the boys as soldiers, at the front. The same thing has happened all through the country, the French-Canadian enlistments being almost as numerous as those of the English-speaking Canadians. I have seen copies of the letter sent by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, addressed to Gallants and Doucets and others whose relatives have fallen on the field of battle, in which letters the Minister of Marine and Fisheries extends his deep sympathy to the families in their bereavement. Do you want the people of Quebec to leave the farms of that province and enter the factories, or to enlist? Yet in your thrift campaign you have stated that work on the farms is as important as work in munitions factories. In the province of Quebec we have a number of young men who are not farmers or machinists, and who could do much better work as soldiers than they could do in the factories or on the farm. Let me give an instance of the haphazard manner in which recruiting is carried on. Last week man from Montreal was killed, leaving a widow and ten young children penniless. Is there any sense in that kind of recruiting? Could not that man have been utilised on this side just as usefully for the cause of the Empire?

If there is any necessity for men, Canada witnessed a strange spectacle last year. There were 150,000 enlisted men scattered throughout the country doing nothing. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) mentioned two or three regiments around his district which were anxious to go to the front. Yesterday I mentioned Major Asselin's regiment. Olivar Asselin was the man who placed in Henri Bourassa's head the idea of the foundation of the Nationalist party, and he is known amongst the people of Montreal as the Father of Nationalism. Having been through the Cuban war, and having seen considerable fighting, he thought it was his duty to enlist and he came to Ottawa and offered to raise a regiment on condition that the officer commanding should be someone who had already been to the front. His offer was accepted and the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) went to the province of Quebec and made an appeal for recruits, and the ranks of that battalion were filled. We were proud of that regiment, and it was a spectacular move on the part of the old French-Canadians in the province of Quebec to fill up the ranks so rapidly. What happened to that regiment? Was it sent to the front? It was packed off to Bermuda, where it spent six months, and it has now gone over to the other side. Major Asselin is left without a position, the regiment having been broken up, meeting the same fate as the Irish-Canadian Rangers, raised by the Minister of Justice, and the Highland Brigade, mentioned by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). In the province of Quebec the people have come to the conclusion that the whole thing has been maladministered; that there has been no organization; that there has been nothing determined; that there has been no fixed idea. Above all, you cannot take up a Conservative paper published in the province of Ontario without finding in it some slur cast upon the province of Quebec in regard to recruiting. We in the province of Quebec read both English and French papers; the people in the province of Ontario do not read our papers, and thus they do not get our side of the story, and they take for granted that everything said on the other side is all right. If, when the Premier, after having attended the Conference in London, and becoming thoroughly acquainted with the situation, comes back and tells us that this war cannot be won unless another hundred thousand men are supplied by Canada, he will get those hundred thousand men and Quebec will do its full share. But we want to know whether, at the present time, the Government is working for the factories or for the front, or what it really wants.

The Prime Minister yesterday very boastfully stated that the total trade of Canada would probably be $2,000,000,000 at the end of the present fiscal year. Well, what is the reason of that? The people of Canada have been producing. It was a sight, during the whole of last summer and up to the close of navigation, to see at the Montreal docks the enormous quantities of goods that were being shipped to the Allies—cheese, bacon, ham, wheat, everything under the sun. The men who produce these are entitled to some respect. The farmer who remains at home and works his farm, having probably only one son to help him and being unable to work the farm unless his son is there, is entitled to some respect, because he is helping the Allies. The same may be said of the thousands of men who are working in the factories. In one factory in Montreal 6,000 men are employed in manufacturing munitions, and I dare say that eighty per cent of them are French-Canadians. Between 7,000 and 8,000 French-Canadians are employed in the munition factories at Lachine; these men are working as effectively for the Allies as if they were in the firing line.

I have nothing in particular to say against these munition works because I do not know what the facts are, but the Montreal newspapers announce that in July last the Montreal Munitions Company paid a dividend of 900 per cent upon its earnings. Is there any fairness in this? Is this the way this thing should be run? Is that the way it has been run in Australia, in England, in France?

Let us be fair on this question. When the Premier of Canada launched the policy of participating in this war, did he intend that the effort should be a party effort or a national effort? When I first came to the House of Commons many long years ago I heard a phrase fall from the lips of Sir John A. Macdonald to the effect that he was always working by the party, with the party and for the country. When the Premier of Canada conceived this participation in the war, was his idea that of working by the party, with the party and for the party, or was it for the country and the Empire?

France has undergone a transformation which is almost marvellous. To-day France has a government comprising members of all political parties, it is truly a national government. What was the condition in England? Mr Asquith was a great man and a great leader. He is a man whose name will be embalmed in British history with that of William Ewart Gladstone and the other great Liberals who have done so much for the British Empire. But it was thought that Mr. Asquith did not fill the bill, and he was put aside for Mr. Lloyd George. Before that a coalition government had been called in; the strongest men in the realm had been brought together and England was really making a national effort in the war. Mr. Speaker, how has the Liberal party, representing half the population of Canada, been treated since that party gave its consent to our participation in the war? Have we had anything to say in the matter? Has any attempt been made by the men now in power to secure a truly national effort on the part of Canadians? Not at all. This thing has been run solely as a party effort, solely to obtain credit for the Conservative party. I am sorry to say that if an appeal were made to the country to-morrow you would hear men claiming credit for Canada's participation in the war and saying that that participation was solely due to the Conservative party and its great leader. The right hon. Prime Minister declared that he was going to stand by this policy of participating in the war. It was easy to stand by this policy because he had with him the whole of the Canadian people, regardless of origin or of creed. But in the sanctity of the cause that we had to defend we of the Liberal party overlooked the fact that we had been put aside and the great leader whom we have at our head gave us that example. Liberals went into the trenches; some Liberal members of this House enlisted as privates and have done their part. Others in the province of Quebec and in all parts of Canada enlisted in spite of all difficulties. They had no favours to expect either from this side or from the other side.

A slur has been unintentionally cast upon the province of Quebec. But, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec is at the present time running the war. Sir George Perley, the representative of English Protestants in the province of Quebec, does he not represent the county of Argenteuil on the Ottawa river, a constituency which is composed largely of French-Canadians? Who is in charge of the Canadian troops on the other side but General Turner, son of Hon. Mr. Turner, who is the representative of my constituency in the Legislative Council of Quebec? The province of Quebec has something to say in this matter, after all. It has produced good men, and it will produce more good men. Unfortunately for the effective participation of Canada in the war, the Conservative party has made this work a party work, seeking nothing but party advantage, hoping for the greatest glory to their own party and overlooking the country at large. Now they are passing through a crisis. They are up against it. They are called upon to supply more men, and they cannot very well do that if they are to keep up the production of the country, because if you send more men to the other side you cut off the producing power of the country in the mines and mills, on the water and in the factories.

The Prime Minister has said that production in the country at the present time is very high and that our exports have reached a value of nearly $1,800,000,000. But at what cost has that trade been created? At what cost have our exports and imports increased? At the cost of placing many a Canadian family in Canada in the direst necessity. We know what the cost of living is to-day compared with what it was some years ago. When the Government goes to the country the high cost of living will be the great question they will have to face. The day that peace is declared 600,000 men in this country will be out of employment. We have heard hon. gentlemen on the other side complain of the heritage which they received from the Liberal party when it went out of office; what will be the heritage that the Liberal party will assume when hon. gentlemen opposite go out of office? In the meantime, cost of living is tremendous. It is getting worse every day, and according as our products go to the other side the heavier does that cost become. Some articles are now entirely banished from the table of the ordinary workingman, because he cannot purchase them. The Minister of Labour has undertaken to arrive at some solution of this problem, but I must tell him that the housewives of Montreal have no confidence in his methods. In no case has the price of a single article decreased. Nothing has fallen; everything is going up, and the men of the middle classes—not those who work in the munition factories at $6 a day, or the members of the Montreal Munitions Company who get their share of the 900 per cent dividend—the middle classes, I say, the men with fixed incomes and with large families, who have to pay 70 cents a dozen for eggs, 50 cents a pound for butter, $2.50 a bag for potatoes, and so on: these are the men who are going to give the silent vote at the next election, because they think they are not getting a fair deal.

I was amazed yesterday when the hon. member for Brantford, who is a strong upholder of the protectionist idea and believes in a high tariff for Canada, spoke about the control of food, and referred to what he considered to be the high prices paid for potatoes produced in the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. It would almost bring tears if it was not so funny. But I do not insist upon that. I have spoken at much greater length than I had intended, and I wish to sum up in a few words.

I am willing to go to the end with this mandate of the Government. If the Government go to the country to-day I am willing to go with them. If they go to the country in three months I shall be ready to go—or in six months, or at any time. But if the Government want to make the country feel before their term is ended that they really want to help the Allies in the present instance, let them come forward and say what is wanted. If the men are to leave their homes in the country districts to go elsewhere, they must be told where they are going, to the front or to the rear, or whether they are going to the factory; what they are going to be employed at and what they are going to get, so that they can look after those whom they will leave behind. That practical suggestion I make. So I close these remarks, hoping that later on in the session I shall be able to supplement them by what I consider not unfair, but fair, criticism.

My chief object in speaking to-day was to put the position of the province of Quebec in its fair light, to make it clear that to say that the province is indifferent or is lukewarm to the cause of the Allies is the greatest slur and the greatest untruth that can possibly be uttered. If there has been any deficiency in recruiting in that province it is because proper methods have not been practiced, and these proper methods could have been adopted if we had had other men in the Cabinet from the province of Quebec. In the province of Quebec, before the war, we had very few militia regiments outside of the cities of Quebec and Montreal. We had one effective French-Canadian regiment in each of these cities, but the country regiments were practically only on paper. Some of them met only once a year, or not even that often. I represent a constituency with thirty thousand people. In each of the counties adjoining mine, Gaspé, Rimouski and Temiscouata, there are thirty thousand people. and more. We had a regiment there in the old days, but I do not suppose they met more than once a year, possibly not more than once in two or three years. I cannot mention Rimouski without saying a word in favour of the Deputy Minister of Militia, who comes from that constituency, and who has worked so earnestly and well in the prosecution of this war. He is another good man whose name may be added to those of Sir George Perley and General Turner, as the men from Quebec who are really running this war.

If we had had in Quebec the skeleton of a military organization and had twenty or thirty regiments with which to start the work of recruiting, the result would have been different. But the recruiting was altogether mismanaged from the start. The hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) came down several times, but he did not seem to be able to get in touch with the proper parties to undertake the work, and those who succeeded him seem to have thrown up the job altogether, because I see in the Gazette that for a week there has not been a single recruit in Montreal. The Government itself is to blame, and until they adopt better methods it is no use trying to place the blame on the shoulders of the people of Quebec. The people will not accept that responsibility, and will protest against it on the first opportunity that comes. The people of Quebec have as much interest in this war as any one, because they would be the first victims if the Huns ever got across. It would be up the St. Lawrence that the invaders would come, and none of their boats could ever reach Ontario. But we in Quebec would get it full. So the province of Quebec is willing to do its share, and if there has been any apparent shortage in recruiting, if all the circumstances are taken into consideration, it is wholly due to the faulty methods which have been followed.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I should not want a better setting for the few remarks I have to address to the House to-day than the incidents that have taken place. We have heard in the opening proceedings here to-day the announcement of the Prime Minister of Canada (Sir Robert Borden) to the House and country that he is prepared to accept the offer of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) for joint action for regulation of the conduct and business of this House. When he said that, I think he went a long way to prove what I intend to argue here to-day, that if it is good for both parties in this House to join together for the conduct of the business of the House, then the time has come for both parties and all parties and all citizens of this country to join hand to hand for the successful accomplishment of this war. Then if I wanted another setting for what I have to say to-day, would it not be found in the speech of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) just delivered to the House? I do not agree with all he says. I regret much of what he has said here to-day, because it went to show that there was a most regrettable divergence of opinion between the two great provinces of Ontario and Quebec in regard to the conduct of the war, and also to show that in connection with the election now under way in the county of Dorchester there is a great divergence of feeling, that there is almost, I shall not say hostility of race, but a strong feeling based more or less on race in connection with this war; and that should not be. Something ought to be done to bring about absolute unity in this country for the winning of this war. The little that I have to say will be in this direction. I am not going to appeal to provincial views or to race views; or to dwell on divisions that may exist between our people; but I am trying to find out if there is not at this stage of the war—and now it is more serious than ever—an opportunity of in some way uniting the country and doing away with all this discussion about differences between provinces and between races. Why should we not unite as they have united in every other country in the world for the successful accomplishment of the war? They have absolute unity to-day in France for the conduct of the war. There is no party spirit there. They have got together in England. They have got together in Russia. They have got together in the other countries, and they are all united for the war. Yet here we have to-day in Canada to listen to the speech—and I am not condemning the speech, bear in mind—made by the hon. member for Bonaventure. We have listened to this discussion to-day and have read of the other discussion that is going on in the county of Dorchester, and, in view of these discussions and of utterances of the press of the country to-day, I cannot see how we can have a successful participation by Canada in this war while these dissensions, or what appear to be dissensions, exist.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: There are none on this side of the House.

Mr. MACLEAN: I do not think I said there were any on this side of the House; there are dissensions in the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friends do not represent the whole country.

Mr. MACLEAN: I think I will be able to give some reasons why there should be co-operation, but first I want to point out that the war situation to-day is more serious than it has ever been. Within a few weeks, there will probably be the greatest active line of battle ever known in history. All the battles of the past, all other struggles, will be mere ant-hill contests compared with what is now impending in Europe. The liberties of the world, of Canada, and the safety of our homes and families are all concerned in this enormous struggle, and if the issue is so stupendous, and if Canada is to do her part, as I believe she will do her part, we have to find a way, we ought to find a way, of uniting the country on the conduct of this war. We ought to have an absolutely united Government, a united nation, with a united people behind them for the accomplishment of the war. We should not be a divided people. We should not have the discussions we have had, and are having now. These discussions divert and use up the energy of the people that should be directed to winning the war. Mistakes have been made. I could pass reflections on the province of Quebec; I could pass reflections on other provinces, upon my own province. There may have been derelictions in certain directions, but these are not things to talk about in the face of this great struggle and in the face of the Canadian people who are anxious to see this war brought to a successful conclusion. I think this House will learn when we go to the country, and the country has an opportunity to express its opinion, that the people of Canada, irrespective of party, want to see national unity in the shape of a national Government for the successful prosecution of the war. It is not a difficult thing to bring about. They have accomplished it in England where they had two or three adjustments. Call it a coalition Government if you will. The word "Coalition" may be objectionable; I am willing to take the responhibility of saying that—call it a coalition government, or a national government or a new party, if you will——

An hon. MEMBER: A third party.

Mr. MACLEAN: I expected that the hon. gentleman would say that. I do not feel ashamed of saying that if it is necessary, if we cannot unite, we may have to fall back on a new party. Not the hon. gentleman, but the people, will be the judges as to that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We want a change of some kind anyway.

Mr. MACLEAN: How can this be done? If we can unite for the conduct of the business of this House, as has been shown here on many occasions, does not the safety of the nation and the welfare of the Empire demand a similar unity? When the conduct of business calls for union, both parties seem willing to unite. Every one of us are doing our utmost for the war, and by union you will force Liberals and Conservatives to do all they can for the attainment of the great end we have in view. Instead of making charges against each other, you will get them to work for the successful prosecution of the war. That means something. There would be no dissensions in this country over recruiting. There would be no dissensions as to the enforcement of the Militia Act. I believe that the day has come when about the first thing to do is to enforce the Militia Act. It may be that we shall have to come to conscription in this country, and I am not afraid to say that if the situation becomes any more critical and the liberties of the world become more endangered, I am ready for conscription. If we are to have conscription we ought to have behind us, supporting it, a united people, a united Parliament and a united Government. To my mind the situation is even more serious than I have indicated. The war has been going on now for over two and a half years, and victory is not yet in sight. The struggle may be extended, and may run into another year. We all hope that it will end this year, but if so, and if the end is to be successful, every effort will need to be consecrated to that end. There should not be a single voice raised from a partisan point of view.

Party politics are all right; they have been at the bottom of our constitutional system for many and many a year. But when a supreme struggle comes there has to be a different attitude in the matter, and instead of looking to the advantage of a party we should only take into consideration the success of the war, the greatest war the world ever saw. I am not going to criticise the Government in power to-day, but we have in office a Government that is a peace-time Government and the result of a peace election, and I am not quite prepared to say that because a Government is the outcome of a peace election that Government is the best possible Government for the conduct of a war. A war Cabinet has to be forged out of different material from that out of which a peace Government is formed. I do not say that there is better material in the other party; not for a moment do I say that the material is better in the one party or the other. I believe that the best material for winning the war is to be found in both parties, and that a union of both parties in order to get a really strong war Cabinet is the only way in which Canada can successfully play her part in the conduct of this war.

I come to another phase of the matter. I cannot come to this House and say that the House can advise or tell the Government what to do. The only thing that I can suggest, or that anybody in the country can suggest, is that the Prime Minister might see his way to approach the Opposition to the end that there may be union of the two parties and of all classes in this country for the successful prosecution of the war. It is the Prime Minister's absolute right to do this. We in this House cannot tell him what to do; nobody can tell him. The initiative rests absolutely with him. He may think, as he has a right to think, that he should not intervene in this matter. Then there is left the only other thing, the indirect drive of public opinion. And he does not need to respect that or obey it, but it might have some influence upon him. All that I am trying to urge upon him, or rather upon the House and the country, is that instead of following the course we have followed, resulting more or less in dissension and disagreement, and also in a manifestation of disloyalty, we ought to try at this stage of the proceedings to follow the example of other countries and have a united party, a united people, and a united Parliament to prosecute the war and to stop the bickering that we have seen in the press and that, I fear, we shall see hereafter to a greater extent.

The Prime Minister does not need to listen to any suggestion of this kind, but if he will listen he will hear something in the country in the direction of what I am stating here to-day. First of all, I want to speak for my own city of Toronto; I want to speak for the province of Ontario, and I believe I am voicing the views of the people of Toronto and of Ontario, when I say that they are in favour of uniting and solidifying the country for the winning of this war, irrespective of party views or party fortunes. They want to see the people of Canada united. In this connection I want to call the attention of the House to the bon entente banquet given in the city of Toronto and attended by representative citizens of Quebec and Ontario. The big business men and the bankers were there, and I never saw such a representative meeting in Toronto. If I gathered anything from that meeting it was that the people of Toronto, as represented by their leading citizens, were in favour of joining together the people of Ontario and the people of Quebec, French-speaking and English-speaking, in order to win the war. That is the sentiment of the people of Ontario, and I believe it is the sentiment of the people everywhere. I think it is the sentiment of the great West, and I have had opportunities, directly and indirectly, of ascertaining what the people of the West are thinking upon this question. My summing up of it is that the people of the West are among the most loyal in all Canada and are prepared to make the greatest sacrifices in order to bring about the successful conclusion of this war. They have sent to the front their full quota of soldiers and are prepared to send others. I met farmers in the West within the last two or three weeks who, speaking on behalf of themselves and of their fellow-farmers, said: The Government can have every bushel of wheat that is left in our barns—and they have immense stores yet—if they say they want it for the winning of the war, they can have it, take it at their own price and we will never object. That is the feeling of the West. I believe that the same feeling animates the whole of the people of Canada. There was a meeting held here the other night, a meeting of the Canadian Club of Ottawa. I was not able to attend, but from what I gathered of that meeting I believe that the members of that club are in favour of a Canadian policy and a united Canada in regard to this war. I know that is the feeling which has been expressed by some of the Canadian Clubs in the West, and that is the feeling which is being expressed all over. It was expressed yesterday, I believe, by the Canadian Club of Winnipeg. We may have to wait a time until they have had the opportunity of expressing their opinions, but the feeling of the people of Canada is for union and the discouragement of any kind of dissension until the war is won.

If the Prime Minister saw fit to make a bid in the direction which I have suggested—and it is only a suggestion—what should we get? First of all we should get a war cabinet, and that is the essential thing in this matter. You want a war cabinet and you want men in that cabinet who will best represent the sentiment of the people. I do not think that a cabinet, selected in time of peace, is the best possible cabinet for the conduct of a war. If you had a war cabinet you would get a good start. The cabinet to-day may represent the people of the country, but it is to be remembered that it is six years since we had an election and the greatest political force that Canada ever saw has been developed and developed in the Canadian West within the last five years. I have paid some attention in my own way to what has been going on in the West and I have found out what that force is. The greatest democratic force in Canada to-day is located in the Canadian West. They are men of progressive ideas, they have new ideas in regard to economic questions, they have strong ideas in regard to this war, and they constitute a powerful political element in this country which is bound to dominate the country in the next election and say how it is to be governed. That element should have a voice in the national Government which, I hope, will be created forthwith. The support of that great and new democratic and modern element which has developed in the West would be the greatest backing that the Prime Minister could have in the successful carrying on of the war. The new war cabinet, which I hope we will have, will also find a place for a representative of labour in this country. What is the strength of the new war cabinet in Britain to-day? It is that it is headed by Lloyd George, who has the confidence of the labour men of the Mother Country and who has in his war cabinet the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, one of the ablest representatives of labour in the British Islands. The British Parliament to-day has in it not two or three labour representatives, but it has a great number—I forget whether it is forty or fifty. For the first time labour there has a strong and absolute force in the conduct of the war; and labour in Canada, under the proposal I suggest, would be represented in this new cabinet, and the working men, who are at times questioning what has been suggested to them in connection with the conduct of the war, would come in and would be a strong influence in aiding the Government. Would it not be a good thing if in some way we could find a way of uniting our people in accomplishing the object for which we are striving in this war? If we could have labour represented in the war cabinet, if we could have the farming element represented —and the great producing element to-day is the farming element, and they are all loyal and devoted to the cause—it would be a good thing because such a readjustment would bring about that union which is so necessary to success.

The farmers and working men of this country want to know something about two things. A good mission has been undertaken by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) with a view of bringing about the mobilization of the man power of the country. I am glad to know that satisfactory progress has been made in that direction. But not only have we to mobilize the man power, we have to mobilize the industrial power and the accumulated profits if we are to succeed in this war; and the only proper way to mobilize the man power of this country and its resources, for the successful prosecution of the war, is to reconstruct the Cabinet in such a way that it will be representative of the farmers of this country and of labour. If we had a National Government such as I have described, we should have all the support for the war that we now have, and we should have a more definite declaration from the farmers and from organized labour as to where they stand with regard to the war. The whole resources of our country would be mobilized.

You cannot mobilize labour only. You have also to mobilize the profits that have been made in this country and devote them to the war. So far the talk has been largely of the mobilization of men, but I want to see a mobilization of all the resources of the country, as well as of our man power, in order that they may be devoted to success in this struggle.

Not only have we before us his great task of winning the war, and it is still ahead of us, but there is another very serious task to be accomplished, and that is the regeneration and reconstruction of our country after the war. How can we build up this country and find employment for all our people after the war unless we have some kind of co-operation between the two parties to that end? I say that neither the Conservative party nor the Liberal party in this country, as we know them to-day, is in a position to reconstruct this country after the war unless the two parties co-operate. That may be a rather strong statement to make, but when you see how stupendous the task is, and what are the things that have to be done, and how easy it is to create dissension over these things if dissensions are encouraged by party appeals, you can also see how easy it would be to reconstruct the country if there was unity between all parties, and a united Parliament, as we ought to have. And the first thing in the work or reconstruction in this country is what? Great reforms in regard to the finances of our country. As I have said before in this House—and the war has fully justified what I have said—we have got to have in this country a national currency instead of a banking currency, and we have to have a great system of re-discounting in connection with our finances.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

W. F. MACLEAN: We have got to have farm loans, based on the credit of the country, in order that our farmers may get cheap money, on good security, for the development of our country and for the raising of live stock and the grain crops of the West. To-day the farmers are paying too high a rate of interest, and they are living alongside of a people who have all the advantages of which I have spoken in regard to financial reforms. We have even got to have, in addition to our larger banks with their branches—and I had the pleasure of speaking on this subject to a western audience the other day—a system of small banks, based largely on the same principles as those of the United States. When the American farmer comes to Canada, with all his experience of what they are doing for the farmers there in the way of small banks as well as large, cheap farm loans, which they have there, and a system of rediscounting which can be carried right to the farmer, and which gives him a low interest on mortgages and banking accommodation on live stock for long periods at low interest, that American farmer is going to draw a line of discrimination as between the United States and Canada. We must have progressive legislation in connection with the regeneration of this country after the war. They already have it in the United States, where it was worked out by that same progressive democratic element that we have in Canada to-day. The victory of President Wilson was not the result of the votes of the people in the East; they voted against him. But for the first time in the history of America—and I want to tell the House of Commons what they are up against—the majority of the voters in the United States happened to be located in the West, and it is from the West that all the progressive legislation came that they now have in the United States. To-day there is an equally strong demand from Western Canada for the same kind of legislation here, and that will form part of the work of regeneration of Canada after the war. I can see no way of doing this unless we get both parties together and have a real national policy for the successful accomplishment of the war, and for the regeneration of the country when peace is re-established. If anybody thinks that one party can administer the country and carry on the work of regeneration and do it successfully without asking the assistance of the other party, in my opinion he will be disappointed. But if in some way the two parties can get together and get the movement started, it would quickly gather impetus and would be carried forward successfully, and the war would be won in a way that none of us could expect.

While I am speaking only for myself, somehow I think I am reflecting the opinion of the great bulk of the people of this country, and if the people of this country cannot be heard in Parliament through the action of the parties in Parliament, and especially through the action of the Government, the people may take the matter in their own hands, as was suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) the other day. Perhaps the best thing would be to have the free wind of a general election blow over the country and the people find out just where they are in regard to the war. But to my mind there is no necessity for that. This is not the time for an election appeal; this is not the time for party discussions; this is not the time for such a contest as is now going on in Dorchester, though I blame neither party for that contest. This is a time when all parties should get together and form a war administration, so that we may have unity, and get the best ability in the country devoted to the war.

What would be the result? Is there any better news that we could send forth to the world to-morrow, in view of the present severity of the war and its uncertainty, than this: that all Canada was united; that both political parties were united for the successful accomplishment of this war. That would have a disciplinary effect on Germany which would be surprising. It would cheer the people in the old land, and put heart and hope, though they are full of heart and hope yet, into our boys in the trenches, and aid them in doing their best to win. Would not that be a great thing for Canada to give to the world to-morrow? Would it not be a clear intimation to our neighbours to the south of us of what Canada really thinks of this war and of the issues at stake?

And the issues at stake, are they not the liberties and the freedom of the world? Would not Canada disappear from the map if Germany should succeed in her attack now on the liberties of the world, and would there not be a great German influx from the United States? But the thing to let the Huns know, and to let the Mother Country know, and our boys at the front, is that all Canada is united now, irrespective of party, for the successful accomplishment of the war.

I have to repeat it, come back to it, and yet it is what is forced on me to say to-day, and I have said it in as plain a way as I can say it, thinking that in some way I am reflecting the views of my fellow-countrymen from one ocean to the other. They want to win this war; they want the strongest and best men in the Cabinet for the conduct of the war, and they want all the energies we have to be devoted to the war. We have not yet begun to give what we ought to give, and we must give more. Is it not a fact that at this moment we are hardly keeping up the strength of our fighting force? I have met officer after officer who is practically stalled in his efforts to enlist the full strength for his regiment, and regiment after regiment throughout the country is stalled because it cannot recruit up to full strength. The progress is slow; it is hard to get the men, and there are not enough of us out preaching to the men of this country that they must go to the front. I do not agree with the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that the man who produces on the farm or the man who works in the munition factory is the equal of the man who is in the firing line. The man in the firing line is the man of all men in this country, and we have to go out and get fighting men, because the regiments are not filled up, and their officers are discouraged on that account. I trace the cause of that largely to the political dissension in this country and to the fact that even yet, in the third year of the war, we have not begun to realize what war means. How many of us know what the English prayer book means until we read it now in the light of this war? The prayer book of the Church of England from one end to the other is a repetition of thanks to God, and also of prayers to God to save the nation from its enemies, and one understands what that means in the British Navy and in the British Army. We have been a peace-loving people, knowing little about war; but now we are beginning to see what war is and what it means for us and for our country, and if we are to keep a hundred thousand men in the fighting line and provide for the wastages and the reserves, we must change our system or we are not going to accomplish what we set out to accomplish in taking our proper share in this war. When I have said that I have said practically all that I have to say to the House; but in saying it, I think I speak for the people of Canada, and although no duty can be forced upon anyone in regard to the matter, it is incumbent upon this Government and upon the members of this Parliament not to think about party dissensions, but to think how they can get together and strengthen their resources for the winning of the war. The most discreditable thing that could happen to this country or to the Empire or to civilization would be that this war should not prove to be a success in putting down for all time the abominable doctrine that the Huns are preaching to-day, that they are the elect of God to rule and govern mankind, and that a military system made up of land-holders and men devoted to the business of soldiering must rule and govern the world. Germany has that in view to-day, as well as the destruction of the liberty, not only of the British and of all the other European peoples, but of America and especially of Canada, and our Canadian people would suffer terribly for the next twenty or thirty years if in any way Germany succeeded in carrying out her nefarious designs. If any one tells me that we are on the eve of a great victory, I say that I hope that is the case, but the evidence is not in sight. There is more fighting to be done, more enlisting required; more money must be spent, more munitions must be made, and, most of all, immense sacrifices must be made. There is no happy day for any of us in this House or in this country for the rest of our lives. The losses are so extensive up to the present time, and so many more have to come, that we are now a sobered people by reason of this war, and we are all, men, women and children, beginning to realize what sacrifices have to be made. Even our youngest children will grow up in the atmosphere of this great war, and will understand what it means for families, for homes, for the nation, for liberty and for the right to live. We are all in that sober attitude now; we know what war means in the prayer book and we know what we ought to do. There is only one thing to do, and that is to cease this partisan struggle in connection with the war, and to hold out the hand of fellowship of one party to the other and join together, consecrating our lives and energies to winning the war. We are not doing that, and we shall not be able to do it as we are trying to do it now. When the members go back to their constituencies at the adjournment of Parliament, I want them to visit the homes of the men who are making the sacrifices. In my constituency in one church a list was read out of over a hundred men who had been killed in the war, and I can go from church to church and find lists of a hundred or a hundred and twenty or a hundred and fifty men who have gone to the front, and many of them killed. Crippled men are beginning to appear in the streets of Canada, and if you go into a street car, you will meet men who have lost a leg or an arm; you will see everywhere the evidences of the atrocity of this war in its inception and what it is going to be hereafter, and the settlement is not in sight. If that is the case, I appeal to the members of this House to forget party, to unite irrespective of party.

As this is a constitutional machine and works as a machine, a union of parties can be made only along political lines; it cannot be done by sentiment. Would the Conservative party or the Liberal party be disgraced if they joined together on the conduct of this war? If they unite to work it out, they will be doing only their duty, and they will be voicing the views of their constituents and of the nation.

I could go into details concerning the records of the different parties and of the two races, but I do not wish to widen the breach; I rather prefer to try to heal it in some way. I wish to impress upon the House how necessary it is to consider the political union that can be accomplished here and that will assist in winning the war. Unless we get that union the war will last longer and cost more. Canada's record in this war will be judged largely by what our boys have done, but it will be judged also by what we have done here in this House. We have started well at this session, and since it is demonstrated that there can be a joining of hands in regard to the conduct of the business of this House in order to assist in the effective prosecution of the war, surely there can be a joining of hands and a union of hearts with regard to the main object—that of winning the war—of all the parties, peoples and races who call themselves Canadians.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): Mr Speaker, I wish first of all to pay you my respects, as you have been elected the First Commoner until the end of this Parliament. Although I had the best possible relations with your predecessors, I am somewhat inclined to express the wish that you had adorned the Chair since the beginning of this Parliament, because it is deemed by all parties that you, Sir, possess the three essential qualities which make an ideal Speaker: dignity of bearing, probity of life and unfailing courtesy.

I wish also at the beginning of my remarks to say that the new Governor General, in his accession to the gubernatorial functions, has been well received by the whole population of Canada, nowhere else, perhaps, as well as by the old province of Quebec, which since the beginning of British rule has always had the best possible relations with the head of the nation. The Duke of Devonshire, as was stated the other day, belongs to one of the great Anglo-Saxon families. The name of Devonshire is deeply enshrined in the hearts of all true Englishmen. That name, Sir, means, if it means anything, that the one, whose honour it is to carry it, bears it as a man of common sense. The illustrious uncle of the present Governor General known in England for years as the Marquis of Hartington and bearing later the title of Devonshire, was a man who pre-eminently possessed that very uncommon quality, common sense.

I have listened with great pleasure. as I always do, to the very interesting remarks which have been made by the member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean). My hon. friend has advocated a cessation of political hostilities and the formation of a national government. I quite concede that there are rumblings from one end of the country to the other which indicate the feeling that there should be a change in the political direction of the affairs of Canada. Not later than yesterday I received a resolution which was passed by a mass meeting at Regina on January 3. It reads as follows:

> That it is desirable that honesty, efficiency and singleness of purpose be established in the nation, and to that end we do here and now appeal to the patriotism of Sir Robert Borden to at once place the resignation of his Government in the hands of the Governor General and advise His Excellency to call as his new advisers a government in which all classes of the nation will be represented and particularly in which the working people will have such trusted representation as their numbers and importance in the country would justify.

This and many other resolutions adopted throughout the country show conclusively that there is a feeling of dissatisfaction and unrest, and that a radical change is demanded by the people. Whilst I do not agree with all the remarks which have just been made by the member for South York, I think that the ideas which he expounded are indeed deserving of very great respect. He is an old party man and an old fighter, and I commend him for the sacrifice that he is making on the altar of his country in the interest of the cause which he has just embraced. I wish, however, that the member for South York, considering the position that he occupies in his party and the influence that he commands in the House, had given expression to those sentiments at the very beginning of the war. I am bound to say to the hon. member and to those in the country who share his views—there are many, and I respect their opinion—that to give effect to the suggestion that a national Government be formed, a revolution would be necessary; a Cromwell would be needed in order to remove the present Government from office.

I say that the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for South York should have been expressed at the very beginning of the war. I do not blame him; probably he expected that the leader of his party would have been a big enough statesman to come to the conclusion that with the approach of danger and the looming up of the tremendous problems upon the horizon there should have been a union of the parties. Mr. Speaker, I do not speak for the leader of the Liberal party; I speak for myself. Respecting the spirit of the truce which had been proclaimed by the Liberal leader, I have said on many occasions that the present Prime Minister was in duty bound from the very beginning of the war to open his heart to the leader of the Opposition. It was the patriotic duty of the right hon. Prime Minister not to ignore the leader of the Opposition. On the contrary, it was his duty to consult the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who is recognized as one of the veteran statemen not only of Canada but of the Empire; who is one of the oldest Privy Councillors of the Empire, and who has been proclaimed by Mr. Asquith as the Nestor of imperial conferences—it was his duty, I say, to make terms with the right hon. leader of the Opposition pending the termination of the war.

That was the duty of the statesman; it should have suggested itself to the patriot. It is well that the country should know why this was not done. And it was not done for one reason, that reason being that the Tory party meant to run the affairs of this country on party lines during the war. Of course a national government would have been the proper thing. We take our precedents from the British constitution; we follow the lines of British statesmanship, not only Canada but even the United States, which has borrowed so much from Great Britain. What happened at the beginning of the war in England? The Radical party was in office. Mr. Asquith was Prime Minister. From the very outset the leaders among the Opposition's statesmen, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Austin Chamberlain, Mr. Bonar Law, gained admission to the inner councils of the Cabinet; and, Sir, a few months later on, a coalition Government was formed, and we know what happened not later than a few weeks ago. Another change took place. A Government headed by a well-known Radical, Mr. Lloyd George, a war Cabinet composed of members of both political parties, came into office. These are precedents which have been set by the Mother Country, by the mother of all Parliaments. In France the parties were even more divided. There is in France, so to speak, a mosaic of parties. You have the Radicals, you have the moderate Republicans, you have the Socialists, you have Royalists, you even have some old Bonapartists; you have Liberals like Mr. Ribot, the distinguished Finance Minister. You know that the French people are very emotional, that they are very eager in politics, and that at times they were very quarrelsome in their Parliament; yet, Sir, when war came, the French nation gave a great example of that sacred union which has never since ceased to exist. Royalists, Socialists, Labourites, Republicans, Bonapartists, Catholics, Huguenots, Free Thinkers, all united to save the country from the invasion of the enemy. That was the great example given by France and given by the Mother Country, England. Was it followed by the hon. gentlemen who claim to be the super-loyalists of this country? No, Sir; the Liberal party, the Liberal leader, were ignored from the very beginning; and it is only to-day, when you see their party shattered to pieces on the eve of a general election, that some pious Tory editors are anxious to have a national government. Mr. Speaker, a national government is overdue. It is not a revolution that will take place, but a revulsion of feeling, when the Liberal party will again be placed at the head of affairs. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will be able to form, not a Nationalist Government, but a truly national government.

I agree that during war time the discussions in Parliament should be as harmonious as possible, that there should be no party wrangling and that the Government measures should be given a fair hearing and generally the Cabinet should be given fair play. But, Sir, you are too good a parliamentarian not to admit that if during ordinary times, in peace times, criticism is healthy and necessary in order to secure a proper administration of the affairs of the country, in war time, when there is a huge expenditure going on, criticism is even more needed in the interests of the country and of the Treasury. If it had not been for the healthy criticism of His Majesty's loyal Opposition last year, do you believe that we should have to-day the Imperial Munitions Board? No, we should still be saddled with the old Shell Committee. En passant, let me say that I congratulate the Imperial authorities upon having confided the war orders of Canada to the present Munitions Board. I believe that with Mr. Flavelle and Mr. Gordon at the head of the Imperial Munitions Board, the country need not be nervous; the affairs entrusted to that Board will be run in a businesslike way, and with honesty of purpose. Again, I say that even during war times a loyal Opposition should not abdicate its duties and functions.

The other day I listened to the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the Government (Sir Robert Borden) when he was speaking about the probability of a general election. He told us that it would be sad indeed if we were to send the ballot boxes into the trenches. Would you believe it? Why his words are still ringing in my ears when, sitting in the old Commons chamber, the right hon. gentleman charged the leader of the Opposition and all those who questioned the propriety of sending the ballot boxes into the trenches, with returning officers passing over the graves and the crosses of our boys who had laid down their lives at the front, charged us with disloyalty. I remember that his slogan—if it was not his, at least, it was that of the Minister of Militia at the time—was: for each gun, one ballot. It was refreshing to listen to the Prime Minister the other day. Thanks to our criticism of that objectionable law, the right hon. gentleman realizes to-day that it is improper to give it effect. Sir, the Opposition should never abdicate its function—in war time less than in any other time. Who did not hear, year after year, the criticisms levelled at the Ross rifle in this House. When war began, during, not the short session of 1914, but the session which followed, at the very opening of the House, I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia of that day to an item which had appeared in the Canadian Courier, a paper published in Toronto. In that item it was reported that one of the soldiers, a Canadian, writing to his father, had said that when our boys had left Shorncliffe, the first thing they had done was to discard the Ross rifle. I asked the minister whether the statement was true or not. He denied it. Later on, complaints and criticisms were made. Finally, in the month of May last year, if I mistake not, there appeared mysteriously, perhaps, in the Ottawa Citizen, the letter of General Alderson condemning the Ross rifle with which our boys had been equipped. Mr. Speaker, can you say that it was not the duty of the Opposition to find out whether or not the facts mentioned in the letters from our boys at the front concerning the national weapon of Canada were true or not? When that letter was read in the House, my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) who never goes half way, stated that if the name of the civil servant responsible for the leak of the document became known he would take it upon himself to send the delinquent to the tower. After prorogation, my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) made several speeches throughout the country in one of which, speaking of the Ross rifle, he said: Of course we shall be taken to task for having equipped our soldiers with the Ross rifle. Defending the position of the Government in advance, he went on to say that they were bound by the contract entered into between Sir Charles Ross and the Laurier Government. Probably my hon. friend the Solicitor General knew at that time the contents of the report made by Sir Douglas Haig. What are the facts to-day? I do not state that Sir Charles Ross is right or that he is wrong; I say that if the Opposition had not fulfilled its true function of criticising the Government, possibly our soldiers to-day would still be equipped with the old Ross rifle. It is due to our criticism that the hand of the Government was forced, and that we have the report of Sir Douglas Haig condemning the weapon with which our soldiers were equipped. It is all very well to speak of a union of hearts, of a national government; but no national government, no coalition government, would tolerate a defective rifle for our soldiers.

The Government are spending huge sums of money, and in that respect their acts should be very seriously scrutinized. A speech was delivered not long ago by the Minister of Finance, in which he said:

> If every citizen of Canada would save to the utmost of his power in these days of high world prices for our produce and enormous munitions expenditures at home, I believe that notwithstanding the huge increase in our national debt which the war will bring, the people of Canada would be stronger financially when the war is over than before it commenced.

Further on he said:—

> I believe the people of Canada will rise to this as to all other occasions, and that the men at the front will not suffer for lack of shells so far as the industrial facilities of Canada are able to provide them. Let us economize. Let us save. Let us make our savings serve the purposes of the war. Let us make our dollars fight the Hun.

I agree with the Minister of Finance, but while he preaches economy I say that he does not practice it, and the example of economy should come from the gentleman who holds the strings of the purse. I was shocked last year, Mr. Speaker, when, during the hours preceding prorogation, the Government brought forward a measure authorizing them to spend something like six million dollars on the purchase of the Quebec-Montmorency, Quebec-Saguenay and Lotbiniere-Megantic railways, and this at a time when two transcontinental railways were declared in so many words to be bankrupt, at a time when a railway commission of experts was being appointed to investigate the whole railway situation of Canada, at a time when every man, woman and child in this country was being urged to save and economize, not only on their own behalf, but to aid the Belgian Fund, the French Fund, the Serbian Fund, the Patriotic Fund and the Red Cross Fund. At that very moment, Sir, the Government were asking Parliament for authority to spend six million dollars in order to disentangle some promoters from mysterious railway difficulties below Quebec. That policy was nothing less than scandalous, and I hope that the Government will think twice before they pay the amounts that are being asked for the purchase of those railways.

There are many problems apart from the war which are very important and require solution. From every part of Canada reforms are being urged. I have here, for instance, a copy of the resolutions adopted the other day by the farmers of the West, a body representing sixty thousand affiliated farmers. In spite of the war, they think that some reforms are overdue. For instance, they ask for an amendment of the tariff laws by reducing the duty on goods imported from Great Britain to half the rates charged under the general tariff, and they urge further adjustments in the remaining tariff, such as will insure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada within five years. They ask that the tariff be so amended as to give free agricultural implements, free farm machinery, free vehicles, fertilizers, coal, lumber, cement and illuminating, fuel and lubricating oils. They urge all of these reforms, and it is not because we are at war that the Liberal party should not voice them. It is our duty to bring these questions to the attention of Parliament and the public.

This much having been said as to the duties of the Opposition during this war, let me refer to the all-absorbing question —the question of the war—and the firm determination of the Canadian people to win that war. First of all, let me tell you that I am a British subject and a Liberal. It is because I am a British subject and a Liberal in the British sense that I stand for the Allied cause in the present gigantic conflict. I resent any imputation to the contrary. I do not care—I may just as well say so frankly—to be labelled a loyalist. The appellation "British" is good enough for me. As my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) stated the other evening, in the very excellent address which he delivered, loyalty is proven by deeds and not by word of mouth. Might I recall to this House the words of a famous woman who played a part during the French Revolution—Madame Roland. As she was brought to the guillotine at the Place Royale, she passed on her way the Statue of Liberty, and as she bowed reverently while passing before that statue, she exclaimed: "Oh liberty, how many crimes are committed in thy name!" I say to these ultra loyalists who are always parading their lip loyalty:

Oh loyalty, many crimes are committed in thy name! I am a Liberal, and I say that since the beginning of the war the Liberal party has adhered to the pledge which was given by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Prior to August 4, 1914, that right hon. gentleman said:

> I have often declared that if the Mother Country were ever in danger, or if danger even threatened, Canada would render assistance to the full extent of her power. In view of the critical nature of the situation, I have cancelled all my meetings. Pending such great questions there should be a truce to party strife.

There, the word "truce" was first uttered by my right hon. friend. The answer was a statement made at a ward meeting in the city of Toronto by the present hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Kemp), who said: "Why speak of a truce? There was never any truce and will never be any truce." That was the loyal answer made by a gentleman who has now a seat in the Cabinet. It is true that we have had from an honoured member of the Tory party in Toronto, Mr. McNaught, a declaration to this effect: Oh, during this war some Liberals may be loyal, but their leaders have not been loyal. Mr. McNaught was a member for the city of Toronto of the Ontario Legislature. The Liberals of Eastern Ontario met at Ottawa during the month of November last, and they passed the following resolution in answer to the onslaughts made on the patriotism of the Liberal party by such Tory heelers as Mr. McNaught:

> RESOLVED: That this convention of representative Liberals of Eastern Ontario, in session asembled at Ottawa this 16th day of November, takes this earliest opportunity of placing upon record its unswerving loyalty to the King and Empire and pledging ourselves to assist in the ultimate success, and at the same time to record our resentment at the reported remarks of certain Conservative politicians inpugning the loyalty of the Great Liberal party, which remarks we consider as entirely unjustifiable and an insult to the thousands of true Liberals who to-day mourn their sons and brothers who have given their lives at the front as proof of their loyalty and love of the British Empire;
> And that this Convention express its condolence and heartfelt sympathy with all Canadians who have lost their sons and relatives at the front.

What has been the official attitude of the leader of the Liberal party since the war began? His attitude has been to educate public opinion in his province, and such education was needed because it had been shamefully poisoned by at least three of the members of the present Government. Mr. Speaker, the sentiments of the leader of the Opposition are well known. They were expressed lately in a manifesto which was issued on the first of January, and from which I may read later on.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House took recess I was explaining the attitude taken by the leader of the Liberal party during the war, and was stating that his whole object, whilst to strictly observe the truce, was to educate public opinion, in his own province and in the Dominion generally. In his own province where it had been poisoned by three members of the present Government, not to speak of those who have been shelved. Perhaps the House will bear with me if, before giving the poison, I serve the antidote. Let me quote the language of the leader of the Liberal party in his speech in the city of Quebec at the last recruiting meeting ne addressed in that old historic city. I do this, Mr. Speaker, because it has been hinted in the course of this debate, and in the Tory press generally, and on public platforms, that he had not kept the promise which he made some years ago as leader of the Liberal party, that if ever the Empire was in danger, or even faced a time of trial, he would appeal to his fellow-citizens in the province of Quebec to answer the call of duty. Speaking at Quebec only a few weeks ago he said:

> It is not for Britain that Britain is at war to-day. Was it Britain which was invaded in 1914? Was it on Britain that Germany declared war on August 3, 1914? No, it was Britain which on the next day declared war on Germany, because of the invasion of Belgium, and her atrocious attack through Belgium on the heart of France because she stood true to her ally. Our children are to-day shedding their blood on the fields not of Britain, but of France, the land of our very own ancestors. Many have been wounded, many have died, but it was not for Britain that they fought. They gave their lives freely and loyally that France, as part of the comity of nations, might live and continue her role at the head of civilization. And it is for that ideal that I am here to ask young Canadians, and especially young French-Canadians, to take their part in a war which is one for civilization.

It is with such appeals as this that we have been able to muster in the province of Quebec the 35,000 young men who are to-day either at the front or ready to go there.

I was rather surprised the other evening to hear the right hon. the leader of the House (Sir Robert Borden) state that the leader of the Opposition had in one of those speeches mentioned the fact that in 1870 England had not gone to the rescue of France. The right hon. gentleman thought it was very bad form on the part of the leader of the Opposition to speak in that way of the Mother Country's attitude. The right hon. gentleman, if he will pardon my saying so, is rather over sensitive. The attitude of England during the war of 1870, and the consequences of that attitude are well known; it is a matter of history; and the statesmen of England to-day are the first to admit England was wrong in 1870 for not interposing herself between Bismark and Thiers, who then pleaded for France. It is simply a matter of history, just as it is a matter of history that England in 1854 to use the language of Lord Salisbury "backed the wrong horse" in siding against the Russians in the Crimean War. Just as it is a matter of history that England through Lord Salisbury made a blunder when she ceded Heligoland to Germany. But if it is a crime for the right hon. gentleman to refer to such an historical fact as he cited what shall we say about the Montreal Gazette, the best informed Conservative paper in our province, and certainly one of the most moderate in the whole Dominion of Canada? Speaking of the defeat, or I should rather say, the retreat of the Asquith Cabinet, the Gazette said editorially:

> The spectacle presented by the Asquith Government in the first days of August, 1914, was unlike anything that could have been imagined. On August 3, Sir Edward Grey, who also has fallen short of what was expected, came into the House of Commons and announced that Parliament was free to decide what the British attitude in the conflict then beginning wou'd be. Great Britain, he said, had not committed herself to anything but diplomatic support; but the Government had warned the French and German Ambassadors that if war were forced on France public opinion in the British Isles would rally to France. The Government abdicated its leadership when leadership by men who knew or should have known what conditions were was most needed. Never in England's history was there another such spectacle. When France chose war the noise of the yelling London press was taken for the voice of public opinion, and as if there were no hand on the helm the Empire drifted into war. All know the subsequent story.

That is the language, not of the Globe, not of the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition, but that of the leading Tory paper as regards the attitude of England, not in regard to the war of 1870, but in regard to the present war. England, according to the Montreal Gazette, did not yield to the voice of public opinion; England yielded to the voice of the yelling London press. That is the language of the loyal Tory press of Canada.

Let me once for all state, on behalf of my fellowmen in the province of Quebec, their real attitude in regard to this war. In their judgment there is but one question before us, and that is the paramount question of the great war which is now raging beyond the seas. It is the question of the participation of Canada in that stupendous struggle. It is, above all, the determination which they share in common with the people of other provinces that the Mother Country and her gallant Allies shall ultimately triumph. That is the opinion of the province of Quebec. The British Empire is made up of various races. We happen to belong to a minority, and we are rather proud to belong to that minority; yes, we are proud of the blood that flows in our veins. Because of that very fact we may perhaps present in a more dispassionate spirit the British point of view, as it appeals to us who are members of the minority. Yes, in the midst of this great war, where freedom is assailed, where all laws are trampled upon, where one man, surrounded by a military caste, backed up by formidable hosts, and seized with the lust of domination, has challenged the world, it is the proud privilege of those who were born and have lived under free British institutions in Canada boldly to proclaim what Britain stands for in the present emergency.

In our judgment, Germany stands at the bar of history. She and she alone is responsible for this awful catastrophe. Why did she precipitate the conflict? The answer is obvious: The German Empire had become too small for its population, and for economic reasons it needed expansion. "Expansion" is not the proper word to use; what Germany had been planning and scheming for during the last half century was nothing less than world-domination, and that will be the verdict of history.

To gratify her insensate ambition she determined to dominate Europe by crushing the small nations, by maiming our old mother country, France, for the second time, and by humbling the British Empire, which has given us and still maintains for us the liberties we enjoy. Her victory, in our judgment, would mean not only the garrisoning of Europe, but the garrisoning of Canada and possibly of the whole continent of North America. To attain that end she inaugurated a campaign of frightfulness, which, if unchecked, would bring humanity back to the dark ages. What kind of humanity and nationhood has she not violated? She has broken international faith for the sake of getting the first advantage of war—a heinous crime among nations. She has carried on through the war a campaign of frightfulness directed from headquarters, regardless of the virtue of women, the crying appeal of children and the sanctity of the home. She has thus poisoned the wells of her fair fame; she has not fought the fight in broad, square, manly fashion. She has sunken vessels in which thousands of neutrals and non-combatants have been sent to the bottom; she has murdered Captain Fryatt and Edith Cavell. Worst of all is that, by all classes of her people from the bishop of the cathedral to the artisan, every crime, every barbarity her men have committed in the name of the war has been saluted in Germany by the flying of flags and the giving of iron crosses. We know that it is to avenge such appalling crimes that the sons of Britain from every clime, from every Dominion, like the knight errants of old, have been called upon to buckle on their armour. Their object we know is not to conquer new territory; the aim is to crush militarism once for all, to restore small nations to their rights, to make civilization, justice and freedom secure forever. That is the view of the situation held by the people of the province of Quebec.

The tide has now turned and the silver lining of the cloud can be detected. For many long weary months the outlook was far from being bright; there were black days, black moods and a swaying indecision; but under the immense crisis Britain and overseas Britain, France and her Allies, have lifted to a clear determination. It has been stated in our province by the friends of the present Government that England had not done her full duty during the present war. That has been stated over and over again by the Nationalist allies of the hon. gentleman opposite. We know that England has not been deficient. No one I am sure, will say that the British fleet is not a decisive factor in the present war; and thanks to that fleet, a whole gigantic phase of the enemy's life has been suddenly blotted out. It is not only doing all that was expected of it; it has met with an amazing energy and ingenuity new obstacles. Under its protection, the best merchant service of England proceeds as usual. Her ships, those of her Allies and of all neutral countries sail the seven seas. The sleepless vigilance of the grand fleet and its silent victories during this war speak volumes for British efficiency.

On land England, at the beginning of the war was not expected to muster more than 200,000 soldiers, and of all the European countries she alone would not accept the principle of compulsory service: but, after Mons and Le Cateau, where the flower of the British aristocracy so gallantly perished, after the splendid example given so spontaneously by the overseas dominions, the British Parliament enacted a law of compulsory service. England, which, as I said, was not expected to give more than 200,000 men, and possibly less, started to raise an army which has reached the five million mark, and this vast army is rapidly being equipped with arms, guns, ammunition, clothing and food, as no army in the world has been in the past. But that is not all. On England, aided chiefly by America, has fallen the task of supplying, in a large measure, the manufactured necessities of war of her Allies and of some of her dominions, and while thus financing her Allies and her overseas dominions England has been exporting goods at the rate of $2,000,000,000 a year, and conducting a larger than ever increasing proportion of the carrying trade of the world. I have no hesitation in saying that in this battle for freedom, the effort of Great Britain constitutes the most staggering exercise of human energy of which history has any record.

And what of France, the great ally of Britain, in this gigantic struggle? We, in Canada, may speak with pride of the idealism of old France as evidenced by the pioneer days of this continent; but may we not also state that it is the same idealism and the same old spirit which to-day inspires the Frenchmen of the third Republic? The battles of the Marne and of Verdun will ever remain the most flamboyant names in history. Only once or twice in history has the world witnessed such a spectacle of greatness at tension. Everything spiritual in a nation touched with genius has been mobilized. Fineness of feeling, the graces of the intellectual life, clarity of thought, all the playful tender elements of worthy living are burning with a steady light. It is the fashionable cant of the day to say that a new France has arisen out of the ashes and ruins of the old; that warfare and deadliest peril have created in the breasts of Frenchmen another and nobler spirit of steady valour and stubborn endurance. And to us, this cant of admiration seems even more strange than the malignant misrepresentation which during the last half century pictured the men and women of France as a fickle, emotional race, voluble in peace, but weak in the stress of doubtful, stubborn battle. No, the French nation has not changed in these two years of war. The French nation to-day is exactly what the French nation has been for centuries. The French soldiers have had no new creation of valour and hardihood. The voice of France at Verdun is the voice of France of centuries ago.

Peace proposals, Mr. Speaker, have been mooted. Who believes that peace would be durable if not based upon the success of the Allied cause? To me, the situation is precisely that which the great Pitt, described in one of his greatest speeches, delivered one hundred and sixteen years ago; and the world echoes his words to-day. He said:

> I see no possibility at this moment of concluding such a peace as would justify that liberal intercourse which is the essence of real amity; no chance of terminating the expense or the anxieties of war, or of restoring to us any of the advantages of established tranquility. . . . As a lover of peace, I will not sacrifice it by grasping at the shadow, when the reality is not substantially within my reach. Why, then, do I refuse peace? Because it is deceptive, because it is perilous, because it cannot exist.

Mr. Speaker, the British Empire simply re-echoes the sentiments expressed by this great statesman. It contains the only answer which can be made to appeals coming from Washington or from elsewhere in favour of peace.

I stated a moment ago that the three Nationalist ministers in the present Government had consistently poisoned public opinion in the province of Quebec during the years which preceded the coming of the present party into office, and I referred to the antidote which was contained in the admirable speeches delivered in that province by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. Is that or is it not a true statement of the case? Let me marshal here a few facts, dates and names, and then the House will judge whether or not the statement be true. As the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) stated this afternoon and yesterday in the admirable speech which he delivered, we know that the Nationalist League was organized in Quebec in March, 1903, under the leadership of Mr. Bourassa. Among the articles of the programme launched by that League can be found the following—it is important to note them, because they give us the background of the agitation which followed:

> 1st. No participation of Canada in Imperial wars outside her territory.
> 2nd. To spurn any attempt at recruiting for British troops.
> 3rd. To oppose the establishment in Canada of a naval school with the help and for the benefit of Imperial authority.

Please mark the words, Mr. Speaker: "To spurn any attempt at recruiting for British troops." How did this article of the Nationalist programme come to life? You will remember, Mr. Speaker—I think you were a member of the House then—the introduction of a resolution during the session of 1909 for the building of a Canadian navy. A resolution was introduced by my friend the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Sir George Foster), accepted by the then leader of the Government, the present leader of His Majesty's Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and adopted unanimously. During the session of 1910 a Naval Bill based on that resolution was introduced by the then Prime Minister. Strange to say, it was bitterly opposed by the very man who had introduced the original resolution and who had declared himself in favour of a Canadian navy, manned by Canadian officers and sailors, and flying the Canadian ensign with the British flag. Why was it opposed? Because at that time a tacit alliance had been sealed between the present ministers and their friends who claimed to be the Conservative traditionalists in Canada, and the Nationalist League. The first fruit of that alliance was the victory in Drummond and Arthabaska. It is well that we should remember who were the organizers of that famous election campaign, in which a candidate nominated by the Nationalist party, M. Gilbert, ran against a straight Liberal candidate, M. J. E. Perrault, barrister, from Arthabaska, who declared himself in favour of Canada's helping the Mother Country. Who organized that election for the Nationalists? The late Mr. Monk, the Hon. Mr. Pelletier, ex-Postmaster General, who has been promoted to the Court of the King's Bench in the province of Quebec; Hon. Mr. Nantel, ex-Minister of Inland Revenue, also promoted to the Railway Commission, and Hon. Mr. Coderre, later on Secretary of State, also promoted to a judgeship in the city of Montreal. Who else took part in that famous election? Who delivered fiery speeches? The three present Nationalist ministers in this Government, the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin), the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude), and the probable—it is not very sure—

An hon. MEMBER: Improbable.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —the improbable future Minister of Inland Revenue. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that the appeals they made were justifiable? Would any one say to-day that those appeals were such as should earn the consideration of true and loyal subjects in this country? Let me quote one of the speeches delivered by the present Postmaster General. Speaking at a political meeting at St. Louis de Blandford, Quebec, on October 25, 1910, the Hon. Postmaster General used the following language:

> You are intimidating the people in waving the British flag and adding that we must contribute always and everywhere to the defence of that protector of our constitutional liberties; but we will not be made to forget that in 1837 it was necessary to bore holes in it in order to breathe the atmosphere of liberty.
> The English have never done anything for the French-Canadians. We do not owe them anything. The only liberties which we enjoy have been snatched. England has sown the world with hatred, quarrels and wars. We have had enough of England and the English.

I shall be reminded perhaps that the Postmaster General, when he was appointed Deputy Speaker of this House, suddenly denied ever having used that language. I shall observe that when he was receiving the loaves and fishes it was an easy matter for him to deny. What was the language of the present Imperialist candidate in the county of Dorchester, the present defender of the British Constitution and British liberties as against that infamous Lucien Cannon? Speaking on October 21, 1910, M. Sevigny said:

> The Laurier Cabinet is a Cabinet of Imperialists who want to sacrifice Canada's interest and plunge us into wars with which we have nothing to do. What has England done for you? She has no need of your help. You must protest against helping England in her wars.

I wonder if the Ottawa Journal or the Journal-Press will publish that to-morrow morning. Later on he said at Arthabaska, on November 1—All Saints Day—1910, when commenting on that provision of the Naval Act by which it is enacted that the control of the navy is vested in the King. He said:

> The navy belongs to His Majesty. Is that a Canadian navy? Who is His Majesty? Have we any Majesty here?

You are surprised that there are people in the province of Quebec who are not very anxious to enlist to fight the wars of Great Britain and the wars of the Empire when they see the men who preached that doctrine promoted from year to year to what is best in the Government of the day. Mr. Speaker, public opinion was aroused. But that is not all. Mr. Sévigny did not speak in Arthabaska only. Speaking on the 26th of July, 1911, at Ste. Flavie, in the county of Rimouski, he used the following language:

> When they talk of war with Germany, Russia, and probably France they would like to force Canada, which has always been happy and peaceful, to give cannon and a navy in order to make war against such great countries. Well, we do not want our money to be spent, because it belongs to our people and to our country. It is to you electors to obtain from us that this iniquitous naval law be repealed by sending to the House of Commons true patriots and not men deprived of honour like Brodeur, Lemieux and others.

Mr. Speaker, the campaign in Drummond and Arthabaska aroused the feelings of the country, and one of the leading English organs of Montreal wired, the day before the election, to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) quoting the speeches delivered by the Blondins, the Sévignys, the Pelletiers, the Patenaudes and the others, asking his opinion about that campaign. What was the answer of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? "The first duty of Drummond and Arthabaska is to defeat Laurier." That was the typical answer, the loyal answer, of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. And on the night of the election the whip of the Tory party, Mr. George Taylor, now Senator Taylor, wired his congratulations to Mr. Gilbert who carried the election—and I might remind you that when Mr. Gilbert was introduced in the House of Commons by the late Mr. Monk and perhaps by the present Prime Minister, he took his seat—at your left to-night? No, Mr. Speaker. He went and sat with the faithful at the then left, he sat with the good Tory members of the House of Commons, and he voted with the Tory party as long as that Parliament lasted. He has since been appointed by the Minister of Inland Revenue as revenue collector in the town of Victoriaville.

That election came in 1911, and as was stated this evening by the member for

Bonaventure, it was arranged that a double-barrelled policy should be preached by the Tory party. In the English-speaking provinces reciprocity was the bugaboo, but in the province of Quebec, it was the Naval Bill. Two committees were formed in Montreal, one presided over by my good friend from St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames), and the other presided over by the late Mr. Monk, one Tory committee and one Nationalist committee. And, as my hon. friend stated this afternoon, Le Devoir was circulated in the English-speaking portions of the country when there was a sprinkling of French votes. Help was given to Le Devoir with genuine Tory funds by my friend the present member for St. Antoine. I remember my colleague the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) coming to me one day and saying, in his mild language: How is it that in and around Edmonton, where there are many French-Canadian electors, Le Devoir is circulated by the carload? Who pays for this distribution of Le Devoir? I did not know then that Le Devoir was circulated through the good offices of the present knight who represents St. Antoine in this House. Well, Sir, the elections were won by the alliance, a cabinet was formed, and it is well known that Messrs. Bourassa and Lavergne were offered portfolios, which they refused because they were sincere, whilst others, as I said a moment ago, accepted the loaves and fishes. Certainly Mr. Bourassa was not satisfied with pounding his views in Quebec; he was invited to go on the border land. He went into northern Ontario, at the instigation of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, and on the request of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Smyth). Mr. Speaker, it might be interesting to read some of the telegrams that were exchanged during that election. Mr. Bourassa, as I said a moment ago, was sincere; he meant what he said. But he was not sure that those who were so keen to invite him to speak were as sincere, and, therefore, he exacted pledges from them. So Mr. Charles McCrea, of Sudbury, Ont., was addressed as follows on the 8th of September, 1911, by Mr. George Gordon, now Senator Gordon:—

I certainly am opposed to reciprocity and will support request for appeal of Naval Policy and a referendum to the people, no matter who is Premier.

You remember that Mr. Bourassa and the Nationalists were opposed to the Laurier Naval policy and to the equally nefarious policy of the then Mr. Borden, now Sir Robert Borden. Mr. Smyth, the member for Algoma, was forced also to give a pledge. He wired to Mr. McCrea—evidently Mr. McCrea had the confidence of Mr. Bourassa. Mr. Smyth's telegram was dated Providence Bay—quite an ominous name—on September 28, 1911. " I am opposed to the reciprocity pact "—that was for the English-speaking electors of the constituency.

I am opposed to Reciprocity pact. I am opposed to Naval Policy of Liberal Government. I will support request for repeal of same, and referendum to the people on Naval question, no matter who is Premier.

There were some doubting Thomases in the constituency. There were some good old Tories who were rather nervous at the sight of Mr. Bourassa in the constituency; and they began to howl, and to howl very vehemently. Mr. Gordon had to come to the rescue, and he wired: "The Liberals are blaming us"—of course he had to put it on the Liberals as usual; one would think we were reading the Journal Press—

The Liberals are blaming us for bringing the Nationalist leader here. I am willing to take full responsibility and to express my full admiration for Bourassa. I have no use for the navy and I think Reciprocity is a baneful policy. I give Monsieur Bourassa the keys of the district.

What did Mr. Bourassa say? In a statement published a year or so ago he said:

Mr. Cochrane, usually very shy of his compliments, has since done me the honour of telling me that my arguments had made a deep impression, deeper still among English-speaking than French-speaking people.

Mr. MARCIL: Mr. Gordon resigned.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, he resigned, and was promoted to the Senate, if it is promotion—and one would think it was, judging from the anxiety displayed by so many members of the Tory party. Five gentlemen only have been appointed, Mr. Speaker, and I have met in the lobbies of this House some members grinding their teeth and willing to give but one chance to the master of the Administration. If they are not appointed before the adjournment to fill some of the vacancies, I verily think the Government will be defeated.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend had better give the names.

An hon. MEMBER: You can give the names.

Mr. ROGERS: No, I cannot.

Mr. GRAHAM: Do not commit yourselves.

Mr. LEMIEUX: After the elections had been won in that way, the members of the new government, of course, held divergent views on the essential issues which had been fought at the polls; and when they were sworn in, one could not help remembering the incident referred to by my classical friend, the ex-Secretary of State; one could not help remembering what Lord Melbourne once said to his colleagues: "Gentlemen, it does not matter what views we hold in the Cabinet, but, mind, we must hold the same views before the public." In the Borden Government are Royalists and Republicans. There is a combination of the Guelphs and the Ghibellines, of the Lancasters and the Yorks, the two Roses, the Red and the White; an unholy alliance indeed. It reminded me of the very composite character of Lord Chatham's administration as described by Burke in one of his great speeches. Speaking of that administration, in which there were Whigs and Tories, " the King's Friends," as they were called, because in those days they claimed to be the King's only friends, Burke said:

He made an administration so checkered and speckled; he put together a piece of joinery, so crossly indented and whimsically dovetailed; a cabinet so variously inlaid; such a piece of diversified mosaic; such a tesselated pavement without cement; here a bit of black stone, and there a bit of white; patriots and courtiers, King's friends and republicans; Whigs and Tories; treacherous friends and enemies; that it was indeed a very curious show; but utterly unsafe to touch and insecure to stand.

Mr. Speaker, that is the best description I could give—and I thank the immortal Burke for affording it to me—of the present Tory-Nationalist Government. The Tory party is not unlike the untamed horse immortalized by Byron in "Mazeppa," the untamed horse which rushed out into the passes of the mountains, through the vales and across the fords, but could not unshackle itself because it bore the weight of Mazeppa on its back. The present administration is saddled with the Nationalist party, and it will carry it until the day of judgment; and when that day comes, both the horse and Mazeppa will be torn into pieces. The Tory-Nationalist party at present also reminds one of the robe of Nessus. The Tories cannot tear it away without suffering excruciating pain, and the supreme pain of a Tory is the loss of office.

Some people are very much excited over the Dorchester election. I know that there are a number of Orange representatives in this House. It is their right to belong to Orange lodges,—I myself would like to be invited to speak before an Orange audience at times. Be that as it may, I call their attention to a statement made by the Sentinel, the official organ of Orangeism in Canada. The Sentinel of January 25, 1917, contains the following, which I specially direct to the attention of my hon. friends, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen).

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of the Canadian navy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, of the Canadian navy, and I promise that I will not speak of the obsolescence of the Canadian navy. I call their attention to this statement published by the Sentinel, and I hope that to-morrow the chain of papers from the Atlantic to the Pacific which seems to receive its inspiration from Ottawa will publish it. Would you believe it, Mr. Speaker, the Sentinel "views with satisfaction the nomination of an opponent to Mr. Sévigny in Dorchester."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Sentinel says:

If he is defeated, it will open the way for an English-speaking member of the House to become Postmaster-General. Besides, it is well to have a show-down with the Nationalists without delay. The sooner the country is made aware of the course this type of politician intends to take the better it will be all round.

Let me repeat these words: "The sooner the country is made aware of the course this type of politician intends to take, the better it will be all round."

Mr. ROGERS: That refers to Cannon.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Sentinel of January 25 contains another very interesting statement, and I call upon my hon. friends who belong to Orange lodges to listen to this:

The by-election in Dorchester, Quebec, supplies an informing spectacle for the electors of Canada. The candidates are Albert Sevigny, the new Minister of Inland Revenue, and Lucien Cannon, who sat for that constituency in the Quebec Legislature. Mr. Sevigny won his seat in Dorchester in 1911 by playing the Nationalist game. His appeal to the electors of that county was upon lines dictated by Mr. Bourassa. On the present occasion he finds it impossible to talk Nationalism because he is a member of the Borden Government, and must defend the policy of that Administration. In 1911, he was the candidate of a party which was not in power, and played the Nationalist to get votes. The situation is different to-day. He must be more circumspect in his utterances. No doubt that is why he places a greater restraint upon himself than is found necessary by his opponent, Mr. Cannon.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, you have it all in the Orange Sentinel. They played the game in 1911, they played the Nationalist game and to-day they affect to be horrified at the idea that Mr. Albert Sévigny should be opposed by one of those disloyal Liberals in the province of Quebec.

I remember during the naval debate the speech delivered by the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). He heard all these quotations in the House, he listened to them and he looked somewhat despairing at times. How could he get out of it? As the Sentinel states here, it was only too true that they had played the Nationalist game in order to reach the ministerial benches. But, he took his courage in both hands and bluntly said: Yes, there was an alliance, but who won?—and he concluded by stating that the Tory party had had the better of it. I differ from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. Who won? Duplicity won and Canada lost. But what about the poor people of the province of Quebec who were led astray by the colleagues of my hon. friend? Their lot is a sorry one indeed and I pity the electors of Dorchester. They are traduced to-day by those very men who, five years ago, bargained in hard cash for the support of Mr. Bourassa, who, according to the Toronto News, spoke in Nipissing like a man inspired, whose words and sentences glowed like coals of fire. This is the same Nationalist leader who, according to Sir John Willison to-day, grows contemptible as he grows in experience. Of course, Mr. Bourassa is no more in alliance with the Tory party. He is still a Nationalist, but Sir John Willison, who has been knighted by the Tory party, thinks that Mr. Bourassa grows contemptible as he grows in experience. Yet, the good honest people of Ontario are led to believe that the great realities of the war, its needs and duties, are not grasped as speedily in Quebec as they ought to be. Notwithstanding the despicable campaign of 1911, waged by these three Cabinet ministers, Quebec, I am proud to say, is honourably represented in the trenches and at the front. Let us talk sense——

9 p.m.

Mr. ROGERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend will explain why the National Service is opposed in Winnipeg, Regina and in some other cities in the West, while the labour unionists in Montreal of French-Canadian origin are standing for it, I am sure it will be very interesting to the House. Recruiting is active in urban centres. It is not in rural centres. Where you have industrial centres you have active recruiting. The French-Canadian is not militaristic. During the early days of British domination it is known, and you can verify it by reading any elementary history of Canada, the French Canadian farmers were disarmed. They were ordered by the authorities to give up the arms that were in their possession and for a hundred years they have enjoyed uninterrupted peace. It is not surprising that you do not find within the province of Quebec the same military spirit that you find amongst people who have come from Europe, who have been brought up in military environment. The French Canadian is above all a tiller of the soil. Remember also, that there is no immigration coming from the old country to replenish the homes of Quebec, whilst during the past twenty-five or thirty years there has been in the English speaking provinces, and especially in Ontario and the West, a steady stream of British immigration. Therefore, it is easier, amongst the newcomers, to find recruits than it is in the rural sections of Quebec.

I have not the exact figures but I take the figures which have been given by the press. By the press here in Ottawa it was stated two or three weeks ago that according to our rosters there were something like 35,000 French Canadians at the front or who had enlisted and were ready to go. This figure includes not only the soldiers who actually bear arms, but also those in the hospital and auxiliary services. Senator Mason last year in the Senate gave figures which established that sixty per cent of the recruits were to be found amongst the British born and that forty per cent must be divided between the foreign born, the Anglo-Canadian born and the French-Canadian born. When you come to analyse these figures and to make up the averages you find, as I stated a moment ago, that the showing of the province of Quebec is quite honourable. I regret that in the press of this province and elsewhere Quebec is being branded as a province of slackers and shirkers. I make bold to say that with proper recruiting arrangements, and proper recruiting agents, goodly numbers of men could still be got in the province of Quebec, if the Government wish to carry out their promise of giving to the Mother Country 500,000 men. But do not send into the province of Quebec as recruiting agents your three Cabinet ministers, who in 1911 preached the very contrary doctrine to the people of that province.

Mr. REID: Why don't you do it?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Have I ever refused to deliver a recruiting speech in the province of Quebec? From the very day that war was declared I have been at the service of my fellowmen. Who recruited the 22nd Battalion, which fought so nobly at Courcelette? Sir, I claim some credit for having helped to recruit that battalion. I joined my humble voice with that of the late Postmaster General and the right hon. leader of the Opposition, and in less than three months we had raised a splendid regiment. I was also elected chairman of the civilian committee that helped to raise the Asselin Regiment, and in less than three months we had raised that battalion, which, I regret to say, instead of being sent to the front was sent to Bermuda to do the work of the negroes there. It should have been despatched at once to England. If that had been done, it would now be in the battle line. I addressed meeting after meeting, appealing for recruits. No less than three weeks ago I addressed the people of Montreal East, and urged them to sign the National Service cards. I explained to them that National Service did not mean conscription, but the mobilization of the economic wealth of the country. Sir, have I done nothing to help in recruiting? My nephew, a youth of 22, was killed at the Battle of Ypres, a cousin is serving at the front at the present time, and I have given my only boy, 18 years old, to the service of His Majesty. That is my answer to the hon. gentleman. But I have too much respect for the decencies of public life and too much regard for the common sense of my fellow-men in the province of Quebec to parade myself with the three Nationalists who appealed to that province, not with the hope of getting recruits, but with the hope of being interrupted and mobbed, in order to make votes in Ontario for the Tory party. What happened in Montreal the other day when the right hon. the Prime Minister went to Montreal, accompanied by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett), and by the present Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude)? I say without hesitation that the right hon. gentleman was given more than a fair hearing; he was cheered and cheered to the echo, as the leader, not of his party, but of the country, by the French-Canadians who were massed in that large hall. The hon. member for Calgary also addressed the meeting and received a very cordial reception. But the moment the Secretary of State appeared on the platform he was hissed into silence. Why? Because the people were disgusted at the idea that a gentleman who had branded the Tory and Liberal parties as traitors in 1911, because, forsooth, they stood for King and Empire, had the audacity to come before the people and preach the very contrary doctrine to that he preached in 1911. What happened a few hours afterwards? The Prime Minister went to old city of Quebec accompanied by my hon. friend from Calgary and by the late Postmaster General. The Prime Minister was listened to there with careful attention, and was supported by the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, Sir Lomer Gouin, whose son is leaving for the front in a few days. The hon. member for Calgary was given a good reception, as was also the late Postmaster General, who, although not persona grata in the province of Quebec, was none the less respected, because the people knew that his ideas and principles of to-day were the ideas and principles which he had always cherished and expounded before them. They knew he was no traitor. Do not be mistaken; do not be led astray with the false notion that some hon. gentlemen have, that the speeches of the three Nationalist members of the Cabinet will help the cause of recruiting in the province of Quebec. The habitants have common sense and good judgment. But enough of this subject.

Let me say a word or two about the Imperial conference. I am glad that the right hon. the Prime Minister should have accepted the suggestion which was made by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. We know that the right hon. gentleman will nobly represent the greatest of the overseas dominions at that important conference. I notice that his presence at that conference is made necessary, to use the language of the speech from the Throne, "for war purposes only." I am glad that the right hon. gentleman will not commit Canada to anything at the conference except what is regarded as necessary for the winning of the war. But I am rather surprised that in connection with that conference the Northcliffe press has evolved a scheme of reorganzing the Empire. I know there are people who are not satisfied with the present condition of the Empire. There are some ambitious people who are uneasy at the Empire's present position, and wish to reorganize it. It is easy to reorganize the British Empire, according to them. They take their pen and a few sheets of paper, frame a new constitution, publish books, and believe that with the dissemination of their ideas the Empire will at once be reorganized.

May I give, first of all, the sound of that alarm bell which preceded the invitation to that conference. I notice that in the month of October, Lord Northcliffe, who is so busy defeating Liberal Governments in the old country, sent out a series of cables, which bear a marked resemblance whether they are circulated in South Africa, New Zealand, Newfoundland, Australia, or Canada. One of these cables reads as follows:—

I voice the widespread feelings of the Canadians, South Africans and Australians here that it is for the dominions, with the breath of broader life, to revivify and give fresh boldness to authority. Fresh blood from Greater Britain is urgently needed in the central administration now.

The moment has come for courage, greater campaigns and real initiative. Will the dominions show the way?

About that time appeared the book of Mr. Lionel Curtis, The Problem of the Commonwealth, in which he states bluntly that the overseas dominions——may manage their own domestic affairs, regulate their commerce, create forces by land and sea, and do anything they please short of attempting to handle for themselves the ultimate issues of national life and death. Those issues, the moment they are raised, must be left to a Government in which they have no more voice than the peoples of India, of Egypt, or of Fiji. So far as the first, last, and greatest of all national interests are concerned, they are not self-governing dominions. They are simply dependencies, and no thinking man can face this conclusion and yet believe that communities like Canada and Australia can long continue to accept that position.

It is strange that a very noisy minority on the other side think that we are absolutely dissatisfied in Canada, Australia and elsewhere, and that there is an urgent need of reorganizing the Empire in order to centralize the army and the navy in Downing street, and possibly to enact a hostile tariff against the world.

The Nation, a good radical review published in London, speaking about the purpose of the Imperial Conference, contains the following: Of course, I would not myself offer such comments, because, forsooth, I should be considered as being very disloyal.

Mr. HAZEN: Is the hon. member reading from the National Review?

Mr. LEMIEUX: No, from the Nation. It says:—

The immediate practical purpose of this Imperial Conference is a little harder to discern than its emotional significance. It may suggest in a subtle, non-committal way to his new patrons that they need fear from him no inconvenient enthusiasm for any constructive idea of international peace, and it does this without wounding the feelings of the rest of the nation. But what is the immediate purpose? The immediate purpose is apparently to enlarge the war cabinet. We had been led to understand that the Empire would be imperilled, and victory jeopardized, if the War Council were to consist of more than three men —Mr. George and two others. We saw with alarm that it expanded to five. It will presently be swollen by the addition of another six or seven, who are to attend its sessions continuously and rank with its members, apparently giving a majority to the representatives of the dominions. There will be some able figures among the colonial premiers. But with the exception of General Botha, we should doubt if any of them will bring an appreciable contribution to its military wisdom. It is doubtful whether the Borden Government stands for Canada in any other sense than as a stop-gap to the coming Liberal reaction. Mr. Hughes (if he is still Prime Minister of a Commonwealth which has rejected his policy by a mass vote) may have energy and a certain facile eloquence. But it is a strange Cabinet which admits him as an adviser on European strategy and statecraft and excludes Mr. Balfour.

I myself dare not make such comments. They are made by a good old English radical editor, and there seems to be much common sense in the lines I have just quoted.

Sir, participation in the wars of the Empire overseas must be settled by the Parliament and people of Canada as such wars arise, and not by a war council in Downing street. There are too many men anxious to rebuild the Empire. Lord Derby, possibly the best friend of the present Governor General of Canada, speaking at a farewell banquet given to the Duke of Devonshire in London, used the following language, which I commend to all the busybodies who wish to frame a new constitution for the British Empire:—

New relations may arise after the war between ourselves and the dominions, but none can be as strong as these which are binding us. now. People talk glibly of a new constitution. Well, I am a Conservative, and the old Constitution is good enough for me when it gives such results as during the present war. Anything that can bind us together more closely, let it be done, but do not let us think by making a cast iron Constitution for ourselves or the dominions we are going to increase the affection they have for us.

This is good reasoning, which I commend to the right hon. gentleman who will represent us at the next Imperial Conference.

One other word from a little book which I read a few years ago, which was published by the famous English journalist, Mr. J. A. Spender, under the very captious title, The Foundations of British Policy. He says this, which applies exactly to the present situation:—

> The great thing for the moment is that the self-governing states are becoming thoroughly alive to the importance of this question, and our business is to make it easy for them to go forward. That we certainly shall not do, if we present them with the cut-and-dried logical dilemmas which are so much in favour with certain schools of strategists and Imperialists. Either, say these people, you must come under the control of the Admiralty or your navies will be useless in time of war; either your support must be unconditional or the Imperial Government must disregard it as a factor in its offensive scheme; either you must do more and come closer, or you may as well do nothing for the real purposes of war. If these logical martinets had their way, there might be an Imperial fleet directed from Whitehall; but there would not long be a British Empire.

Again I commend those words of wisdom to the re-organizers of the British Empire.

In conclusion, Sir, let me say that I fully agree with the paragraph in the Address having reference to the fiftieth anniversary of our Confederation. Some years ago I moved a resolution in the old House of Commons in anticipation of that event, and I suggested that a fitting commemoration would be the holding of a universal exhibition in Canada. But war has upset this plan, and to-day we are left with no programme for a fitting and proper commemoration of that great event. May I make the suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that no monument, no spectacular demonstration can make more for the welfare of the Dominion that the healthy movement which I am pleased to state has been inaugurated by the Fourth Estate in this country: I mean the "bonne entente" movement. Much credit is due to the British-Canadian journalist who has started the "bonne entente" movement; I refer to Mr. Arthur Hawkes, one of the editors of the Toronto Star. That movement, which has already budded into life, will, I believe, continue and will grow in proportion as the months and years roll on. There could be no better commemoration of the founding of our Confederation that this "bonne entente" movement. It should be promoted and firmly rooted in Canada. There should also be more intercourse between the east and the west. Mr. Speaker, we need no monument to celebrate this fiftieth anniversary of the union of the Canadian provinces it we but live up to the ideals of the Fathers of Confederation, which ideals have been revivified by the "bonne entente".

Mr. Speaker, when the new Parliament Buildings shall have risen from the ashes of the old, I hope that on its portals there shall be inscribed the watchword of the Scotch Highlanders when they were fighting with the French in France against a common enemy—"bon accord." Let us fervently hope that the star of union, harmony and justice will soon rise over Canada's fair land.

Mr. JOHN H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I wish to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your promotion to the Chair. It is no small honour to be the Speaker of the Canadian House of Commons. If I remember rightly, you are the first Nova Scotian who has had the honour of occupying that position, and we on this side of the House who have come from that province feel that we have some share in the honour that has come to you. I feel sure, Sir, that you will prove yourself to be worthy of the long line of distinguished men who have occupied that position in the past. I trust that you will have no occasion, however, during the present session of Parliament to put any of us on this side of the House in the Tower, or to use that weapon of political warfare known as the guillotine which the Government has placed in your hands.

In the Speech from the Throne reference has been made to the celebration of the national jubilee of this Dominion. We all agree that such an important event as the completion of the first fifty years of our history is one that should not go unnoticed. I trust, however, that no gaudy or expensive display will be thought of, for such a thing would be out of keeping at the present time. All good citizens are thinking these days of how they may best play their part in the great struggle in which the nation is engaged. Permit me to suggest, Sir, that the occasion be used to call for a very large contribution—I do not know how much but would suggest fifty millions of dollars—to equip and endow a home for battered and disabled soldiers, somewhat after the plan of the Chelsea Hospital in London, which is one of the great institutions of that great city. That hospital was built some 240 years ago, and it has been one of the glories of the British Empire that they have always taken good care of the veterans who have risked their lives in the Empire's cause. There is room in that hospital for about 540 pensioners, each one of whom has his own room, which is his home. He has in that room his own furniture, books and pictures. He is at liberty to go and come when he pleases. Attendants bring him his meals, if he would rather have them in his own room than in the general dining-room. He can go away for two or three months, if he wishes, and visit his friends. This room is his home, he is entitled to occupy it for life, and he is among his old comrades. In connection with the Chelsea Hospital is a chapel in which are hung the flags that have been captured by the veterans in the various battles in which they have figured on behalf of the Empire, and trophies of war are hung around the hall. Many of these men are unfit to do any kind of work. This hospital is open only to men who have distinguished themselves in battle and who have lost their sight or limbs in defence of the Empire. One of the most interesting sights that I saw at the Coronation ceremony in 1911 was a group of old soldiers who were standing at the end of the street called Shoe Lane, waiting for the King's procession to go by. These old fellows were battered and broken; some of them had lost arms or legs and some of them were blind. Some fifteen of them were grouped at this point, ready to salute the King as he passed, and the King stopped his carriage to speak to them. I afterwards learned that they were inmates of Chelsea Hospital and that they were the sole survivors of the Light Brigade. I do not suggest that this hospital which I am advocating should be available for all wounded soldiers or that it should in any sense take the place of the pension system. The pension system would suffice for the majority of cases. Among the four hundred thousand men who have enlisted, many of whom will be wounded, there will be broken and battered men, and lonely men, who will not have any families of their own, and they will be more contented among their own comrades at a place like this. Then, too, it seems to me that this would be a fitting memorial for the Canadian people to erect in memory of the war. The greatest achievement that Canada has yet won has been the part that she has taken in this war. It is more important, to my mind, to commemorate this than to commemorate the Jubilee. The very fact that in this country of free institutions we have been able to recruit between three hundred thousand and four hundred thousand men without any compulsion, is to my mind one of the triumphs of democracy; and this would be a fitting way to commemorate it. It would also be an opportunity for some of the older men among us, who are too old to fight, to contribute towards the comfort of those men who have sacrificed so much for us.

Mr. Speaker, this debate would be much more interesting to me if hon. gentlemen opposite would take a more active part in it. What is the reason that there is no response from the other side of the House? Hon. gentlemen on this side have raised some very important questions. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) has attacked the military record of this Government; he has raised such important questions as military promotions, whether they are made on merit or by favour. He has also raised the question of the treatment of the sick and wounded as dealt with in Dr. Bruce's report. These vital questions call for some answer from the leaders of the Government, but we have not had that response from them which we are entitled to expect. It looks to me as if when my hon. friend from Pictou spoke, all the big batteries on the other side were silenced. We have had some bombardment from the smaller mortars and machine guns, but we should like to hear from the big batteries, we should like to have some answer to these accusations, if there is any answer possible. It is awkward for us on this side of the House, as no man wants to be caught thrashing a dead donkey.

However, in this debate, the one overshadowing question is the war. The Empire is at war, and it is at war with the greatest military power in the world. When the Empire is at war, Canada is at war. This war has already lasted two and a half years, and the end is not yet in sight. We have three thousand miles between ourselves and the seat of the contest; the enemy has not yet knocked at our gates, but why? Because the strong arm of Great Britain and the strong arm of France are keeping him back, and because the British Navy still rules the seas. This war is not Great Britain's war any more than it is our war. This battle line, extending over these vast plains and along the river banks and the foot-hills of the mountains for thousands of miles on the eastern and western fronts is our battle line; and the result of this conflict is just as important for Canada as it is for Great Britain, or for France, or for Belgium. It is not a question of doing our share. I have seen that suggested in certain newspapers and by certain speakers. I do not look at it in that way. It is not a question of counting up what our share is, but it is one of winning in the fight; it is a question for us of doing whatever is necessary to obtain a complete victory. I was very much pleased the other day to read an interview by Sir Gilbert Parker, given to a New York newspaper. This is what he said:

> There will be no end to this war without victory to the Allies. England will win or perish.
> "I have not changed my mind," he said. "I look for peace this autumn—or sooner."
>
> He spoke of the drain upon English resources, of the toll of life and the outpouring of money. The war is costing England £6,000,000 a day, he said. How long can England stand this drain on her resources? he was asked.
>
> "Just longer than any other nation fighting" was the calm rejoinder. "In spite of the smallness of our nation we have a reservoir of imperial strength that is greater than the newly created empire of Germany. And don't forget this: In Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa there are four confederations with unlimited resources, ready to mortgage the last man and the last dollar of their possibilities. Don't ever forget in regard to this war that what was believed to be the weakness of England—a loosely organized empire—has proved to be of monumental strength."

I have no doubt that Sir Gilbert Parker in that statement voiced the sentiments of the British people, and, at the same time, the sentiments of the Canadian people.

Reference has been made frequently in this debate to the splendid record made by Canadian soldiers at the front. There is nothing too good to say about those brave fellows. Some of them have won promotion and military honours on the battlefield; others are returning home, maimed and broken; others will never return. But it is for us to cherish their memory and to do anything that we can do to show that we are worthy of the sacrifices that they have made for us. We are all proud of them, and I know that whatever the future has in store for us, we can depend that the boys at the front will do their duty. To-day people are asking themselves everywhere if we are worthy of the sacrifices that are being made for us. Men have died in France and in Flanders, in Galipoli and on the Tigris, and on the high seas. They have died in tens of thousands, they have staked their lives and their hopes. What for? Surely not alone in order that we, who are left at home, might be spared what they have suffered. We should be unworthy to be citizens of the country for which these men gave their lives unless their sacrifice made us better men, willing, as they were willing, to sacrifice all for the common good.

Referring to the military record of the Government, I am not inclined to be too severe upon them. I know that they have had their own difficulties. I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), who said that they were doing their best. But, at the same time, if that is so it furnishes to my mind the very strongest argument why there should be, with as little delay as possible, a reorganization or a complete change.

Some hon. gentlemen seem to deprecate all criticism in connection with the management of the war. Let me say that if the reputation of this Government was beyond suspicion, like Cæsar's wife, they would welcome criticism from any quarter. We on this side of the House do not look for perfection in the ranks of this Government. We expect mistakes to be made, mistakes of judgment; but we have a right to demand certain things, and those things we always will demand. In the first place, we want prompt decision whenever a matter of importance comes up, especially in regard to military affairs. In the second place, war appointments should be made on merit and not by favouritism. In the third place, there should be no party patronage. In the fourth place, there should be absolute honesty in the disbursement of every dollar of public money.

The motto of the Liberal party from the inception of the war has been: millions for the war, but not a dollar for graft. Patronage is bad enough, but there are certain things that are even worse in our circumstances than patronage. The leader of the Opposition struck a very important note of which the people of this country have been taking notice. He said that one of the great sins of the present Government was its indecision and lack of leadership. I submit, Sir, that the point was well taken, and that there is evidence to go to the jury. In England only a few weeks ago, they deposed a great man because he was lacking in certain qualities required in a leader of a Government in time of war; and if it was necessary to do that in England, why should we hesitate to do it in Canada, if we can secure more efficiency by doing it? Let me ask this question: Is there at present any driving force in this Government in regard to our military affairs? If so, where is it? Our military energies are scattered here and there. We have a War Minister in London, and no person seems to have defined with any exactitude his duties. We have also, if I remember rightly, a Military Council in London. We have also a Military Council at Ottawa. We have an Under Secretary of War who is travelling a good deal, from place to place, and I believe, carries about his office in his beaver hat. We have a National Service Commission and a Munitions Board, also various other commissions. Then we have the Minister of Militia himself and his departmental staff. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that the military affairs of this country have been spread out so thin that instead of a clear-cut forward policy we have drifted into a condition of what I will call sprawling incohesiveness. Lord Macaulay says that battles have been won under bad generals, but that never in the history of the world was a victory won under a debating society, especially when the debate lasted for four months.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition referred to the internal dissensions of the Government, and also to the lack of leadership. The Prime Minister in his reply did not deny the internal dissensions but he took issue with the leader of the Opposition on the question of the lack of leadership. The Prime Minister evidently regards himself as a man of decision. The proof that the Prime Minister gave that he was a man who could arrive at a quick decision was one particular instance in his own experience. He said that when the war broke out in August, 1914, he decided at once, without any reference to his Cabinet, that Canada would participate in the struggle. I am quite willing to give him credit for having made that decision promptly, but that is not sufficient. One case of prompt decision does not prove anything. The statesman who promptly declares that he will go to war, and then hesitates about the means of carrying on the war may become a very dangerous leader, and may bring disaster to the country. What then is the evidence of indecision? The most direct and convincing evidence is furnished by the Cabinet itself. No one can read the correspondence that passed between the Prime Minister and the ex-Minister of Militia without being convinced on that score. The ex-Minister of Militia was on the inside and knew what was going on. He gives us one notable example. He says that the second contingent was delayed for four months while the Government was fighting over a question of patronage, a petty question as to whether or not certain people were to get commissions out of the purchase of motor trucks. Let me quote his exact words so that there may be no mistake:

> I have closed my eyes to the petty intrigues and ambitions about me. It is not necessary to analyze, in detail, all disappointing matters in my association with you.
> I have yet to learn where once the Finance Minister of Canada brought before Council any proposed loan for the Dominion of Canada or any single important act concerning the administration of that department. The same observations apply to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is difficult for me to recall where you have actively supported me in the passage of any Order-in-Council concerning the upbuilding of the Militia when opposed by two members of the Cabinet actually antagonistic to anything proposed by me. As you are aware, it took up four months, in the midst of this great war, to fight through the principle of purchasing, for the Second Division, trucks at the lowest wholesale prices, instead of allowing large commissions to local agents who have had nothing whatever to do with securing the orders.

In this paragraph we have the statement of the ex-Minister of Militia that these gentlemen were actually fighting over who would get the graft arising from the purchase of these trucks. The innocent people of this country thought that the fighting was going on over in Flanders, but we have, Sir, the humiliating spectacle of fifteen Cabinet ministers in the Council Chamber in the Eastern Block chewing one another's ears for four months over this petty question of whose friends would get these commissions, while all the time thirty thousand soldiers were marking time at Valcartier or some other military camp, and waiting until the wrangle was over.

To show the utter lack of leadership in the Cabinet the ex-Minister of Militia goes further. It appears from this letter that the Prime Minister had complained to the Minister of Militia of the conduct of other ministers. The ex-Minister of Militia says:

> You instanced the Post Office Department, the Railway Department and the Public Works Department, where projects had been undertaken without authority by Order in Council, and I remember distinctively you stated that some boats had been purchased and other large expenditures incurred without your knowing anything about it.

If we are to believe what General Hughes says, if we are to credit his statements, these ministers were allowed to do just about what they pleased, and were absolutely without any Cabinet control. The Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were incurring large expenditures without referring them to the Cabinet, thus showing that there was no leadership or control at all, so far as the large expenditures of the country were concerned.

Take the question of the Ross rifle, and you will find there a glaring case of incompetence and indecision. The best judges were surely the men on the firing line who were using that rifle. As early as June, 1915,, Sir John French condemned the Ross rifle for the following reasons:

(1) That the Ross rifle could not be relied upon to work smoothly with the ammunition then available, and

(2) The want of confidence in the Ross rifle which a large number of the Canadian infantry felt was evidenced by the fact that 3,000 of them had re-armed themselves with Lee-Enfields taken from casualties.

You see, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian soldier on the battlefield had to hunt round for a dead German, or a dead Englishman, to get a rifle fit to fight with. That is how matters stood when Sir John French wrote that letter in June, 1915. You would suppose that this condition of affairs would have been corrected, that, on receiving that letter from Sir John French, some effort would have been made by the Government to see that a proper rifle was placed in the hands of the Canadian soldiers. That was not done and we have the proof that it was not done. Nearly a year after that, in May, 1916, nothing definite had been done and Canadian soldiers were still armed with the Ross rifle. Then we have a report from Sir Douglas Haig to the War Office, in which he says:—

I have satisfied myself, after extensive inquiries carried out throughout the Canadian corps, that as a service rifle, the Ross is less trustworthy than the Lee-Enfield, and that the majority of the men armed with the Ross rifle have not the confidence in it that it is so essential they should possess. The inquiry upon which these conclusions are based was the outcome of an urgent application from a battalion of the 3rd Canadian Division for re-armament with the short Lee-Enfield rifle in consequence of a high percentage of jams experienced with their Ross rifles during a hostile attack on the 1st of May, 1916.

You see that nearly a year after Sir John French had laid his complaint before the Canadian Government, the soldiers were still using the Ross rifle, and that, in a hostile attack, in which they were sent into battle in May, 1916, there had been a very large percentage of jams, as reported by Sir Douglas Haig. This is a matter in connection with which delay and indecision was nothing short of a crime. It is plain from the two paragraphs I have read, the one written by Sir John French, and dated June, 1915, and the second by Sir Douglas Haig, dated May, 1916, that nothing definite was done for nearly a year. In other words, a year after Sir John French had reported that the rifle could not be relied upon, 20,000 Canadian soldiers were sent into action armed with this unreliable rifle, and the soldiers themselves had to petition Sir Douglas Haig to make some change so that they would have a proper arm to go into battle with. This letter of Sir Douglas Haig bears date the 1st of May, 1916, and, if it was a cable message, and no doubt it was, it must have been in the hands of the Government on the 17th May, 1916, when the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) threatened to confine the editor of the Ottawa Citizen in the tower because he had published the Alderson letter relating to the same matter.

There is another question in regard to which indecision has been shown and that is the question of patronage which has been referred to in this debate. We do not forget that the leader of this Government pledged the party to the abolition of patronage. If, Mr. Speaker, you read the Halifax platform, as I have no doubt you often do, you will find that what I am stating is true, that we were to have no more patronage after the Conservative party attained power. There are men who occupy seats on the other side of the House who used to make stormy speeches in regard to this question. I am thinking of one especially at this moment, my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid). I recollect how flushed his face was as he denounced the crime of patronage from the Opposition benches. In those days he set his face against it like flint, but since he has got into power he sets his face not like a flint but like a pudding. Nobody will deny that patronage is rampant so far as this Government is concerned. Officers of the Department of Militia and Defence were examined under oath before the Public Accounts Committee. The purchasing agent of the Department of Militia and Defence admitted that he had 8,000 names on his patronage list. We asked him to bring the list to the committee room. He told us that it was a card system and that he would have to bring it in a wheelbarrow. It will not be denied by hon. gentlemen opposite that if there was such a large list as that in the War department alone, it must be still more formidable when you take into consideration all the other departments of Government. Our whole war system has developed into a huge system of outdoor relief for the Conservative party. We have to-day a minister of the Crown running an election in the county of Dorchester, in the province of Quebec, and he appealed to the people there the other day on this question. He said: if you elect 10 p.m. me you will have a friend on the Government benches; if you elect Mr. Cannon, you will have a man sitting in the cold shades of opposition who cannot do anything for you; meaning that the patronage system was the avowed policy of the present administration. Vote for me and we will get something for you; we will get jobs for you; we will get military expenditure for you; whether you fight or not, you will get the money of the Canadian people because we will give it to you, if you elect me. That is the doctrine. Then, the Prime Minister responds by sending this gentleman a telegram congratulating him on the campaign he is conducting. He made no reference to his speech on patronage, but his speech on patronage was a very material part of his campaign and the Prime Minister ought to have made reference to it and condemned it. There is not much leadership about that. You must admit after all is said and done, that this country belongs to the people and not to the Conservative party.

But, this lack of decision on the part of the Prime Minister and the leaders of the Government is not confined to military operations. You can go over the whole history of the present Administration and you will see signs of inaction and half measures. Take the high cost of living; instead of doing something definite about the high cost of living which is oppressing the workingman all over this Dominion the Government adopted the usual subterfuge of appointing a royal commission. This royal commission sat for about a year and then produced a report that did not contain one practical suggestion. There has been nothing done with it. The evidence upon which the report is based is so voluminous that no man has ever had time to read it, and the commission having got through with it the Government seems to have lost interest in the whole matter. It reminds one of Dickens' story about the celebrated Micawber who, when he was pressed for a debt that he could not pay, and when it came to the point at last that he was about to be sued, gave a promissory note and said: Thank God that is paid:

Take another instance. When the railway situation became acute about four years ago, instead of outlining a vigorous railway policy for Canada, the Government as usual allowed the matter to drift. But in the meantime the Government was pressed by the railways for money. If I remember rightly, in the year 1914, $15,000,000 was paid out, in 1915 $45,000,000, and in 1916 $10,000,000. In those three years $70,000,000 in all went into the sinkhole of the Canadian Northern, and after that money was all gone the Government resorted to its usual method of appointing a royal commission to find out what they should do next. The royal commission has not yet reported, and the Lord knows what kind of a report they will give and whether the Government will follow their advice when they get the report. Now, every hon. member of the House knows very well that the railway situation is not a question for a Royal Commission to solve. What is wanted is some kind of a railway policy, and the decision and the courage to carry it out.

Then take the question of the commandeering of Canadian ships. Here was another case of indecision. When the war broke out this Government should have acted promptly in regard to that matter. They did nothing. The Imperial Government began to commandeer Canadan ships without reference to the Canadian Government. They did not ask their advice at all. I believe that after the ships were all commandeered the Canadian Government did pass some kind of an Order in Council authorizing themselves to commandeer Canadian ships. I do not say that Canadian ships should not be commandeered. I do not say that Canadian ships should not be used by the War Department for any necessary purposes in connection with the war. Canadian ships should be used as well as British ships, and I am sure every Canadian ship-owner would be willing to give his last ship for the purpose of carrying on the war. But the commandeering of our ships should have been done by the Canadian Government and not by the British Government. Then the ships could be turned over as required. This is a free country; we have a Government of our own, and we manage our own affairs. The Imperial Government has no more right to commandeer ships than they had the right to commandeer Canadian men or Canadian money, and they would not have done it if our Government had looked after Canadian interests as they should have done. That is another case in which the Government showed its characteristic indecision.

There are numerous other instances of the same kind. I could name one in connection with the naval controversy. You will recollect, Sir, the indecision that was shown by the Government in that matter. You will remember that the question of the repeal of the Naval Service Act hung fire for a great many months; that certain gentlemen elected on that issue in the province of Quebec insisted on an answer in the House; that day after day the question was read by Mr. Speaker, "Do you intend to repeal the Canadian Naval Service Act?" That question stood on the Order Paper for months. The answer finally was given, "Yes, we intend to repeal the Act." But they never did repeal it. Again the Prime Minister himself, when he returned from England in 1912, at a large public meeting in the city of Montreal, propounded a naval policy for his party. My policy, he says, is to ask Parliament to vote $35,000,000 to build three dreadnoughts for the Admiralty, and if Parliament refuses to vote the money I shall appeal to the people. The Prime Minister carried out the first part of his programme and asked Parliament to vote the money. Parliament refused to vote it, and the Prime Minister could never make up his mind to make his appeal to the people of Canada. It was another case of indecision.

I have given a large number of these cases to show that hon. gentlemen opposite are past masters in the art of marking time. I do not know whether anything can be done to rouse them. If I might be permitted to use the elegant language of my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia, I would say: "The time has come when this Government should begin to scratch gravel."

I wish to refer for a few moments to another matter. Since we last met the long-looked-for report of Sir Charles Davidson has been made public. Now, Sir, if royal commissions are to be used for the purpose of delaying exposure, the first prize must certainly be given to Sir Charles Davidson. After two years he has brought down his report, and the report, now that it is brought down, turns out to be chiefly white-wash. Permit me to select one case as a sample. I refer to the case of the sale to Col. J. Wesley Allison of 3,000,000 rounds of small-arms ammunition. It will be remembered that the auditor general brought this scandal to the attention of the House and the country. When the war broke out, the Government had in the arsenal at Quebec 3,000,000 rounds of small arms ammunition. They kept it there for several months, and then sold it privately to Col. J. Wesley Allison for $20 per 1,000 rounds. The ammunition had cost $34 per 1,000 rounds to make. When this transaction was exposed in the House it was defended by the ex-Minister of Militia, supported by the Prime Minister, on the ground that it was sold to Vickers Limited for the purpose of testing guns. We accepted that explanation at the time, but that explanation had to be abandoned when Vickers Limited denied ever having anything to do with the purchase of the ammunition. After considerable investigation the truth came out that the ammunition was sold, not to Vickers Limited at all, but with the assistance of Sir Trevor Dawson, one of the directors of Vickers Limited, it was sold direct to the British Admiralty for $25 per 1,000 rounds, giving a profit of $15,000 to Col. Allison out of the transaction. Judge Davidson cannot discover anything corrupt or anything wrong in this transaction. There is one phase of it, however, to which he does not refer at all, but which I think is the main question in regard to it, and that is this. In the early period of the war, when, as I have stated, this small arms ammunition was lying idle in the arsenal at Quebec, ammunition was more valuable to the British Government than gold dollars. It was scarce and could not be procured. Hon. gentlemen will remember the battle of Mons, when General French, with his little army of 75,000 men and 250 guns, was forced to retreat until the Germans were almost knocking at the gates of Paris before they were turned back. Machine guns were scarce and ammunition was scarcer; everybody knew that. This was the case, and of course every member of the present Administration knew it. Yet all that time, while British soldiers were being shot in their tracks for lack of ammunition, our Government had 3,000,000 rounds of small-arm ammuniton packed away in the arsenal at Quebec and never offered to make use of it.

What would you expect the Government to do, Mr. Speaker? If you had been Minister of Militia, I know what you would have done. The first thing you would have done would be to send a cable message across the ocean to the Admiralty, saying: We have here in Canada three million rounds of ammunition; can you make use of it? If you can you are welcome to it for nothing. That would be the kind of message you would send. No such a message was ever sent, but instead of that the ammunition was kept in the arsenal at Quebec for several months, badly as it was wanted on the other side, and then it was sold privately to a friend of the ex-minister for the sum of $20 a thousand rounds. What excuse was given? One was that the ammunition was defective. Was the ammunition defective? I doubt it. There is evidence the other way. It turns out that the ammunition was used by the army, and so far as I can learn, it was good ammunition; but I do not care whether it was defective or not, the skirts of the Government cannot be cleared in that way. If the ammunition was defective, then it should not have been sold at all, because it would be a crime to put defective ammunition into the hands of any one from whom it would find its way into the hands of the British soldiers. If the ammunition was not defective it should have been sent direct to the British Admiralty without the intervention of Allison or any other boodler.

The question of the extension of Parliament has been referred to in the speech from the Throne. It is not necessary for me at this stage to deal with that question at any length, but an extension ought to be preceded by an accounting on the part of the Government. At the last session Parliament voted $270,000,000 of expenditures. Would it not be reasonable that the Government should tell us something of what they did with all that money before they ask for a second lease of power? I confess that I do not like the manner in which the application for this extension was announced by the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Kemp). The decision appears to have been reached at a meeting of the Cabinet some weeks ago, and the present Minister of Militia, when he had the Cabinet committed to apply for another year, immediately gave the announcement to the Toronto newspapers, and in the announcement he said that if the Liberal party did not agree unanimously to the proposal there would be an election. As we have been living under the threat of an election for a good while, of course, that did not affect us very much. The example of Great Britain has been referred to, and it was alleged that extensions of Parliament have been made there, but the example of Great Britain cannot be quoted as justification in this case. If any one will look into what has happened in Great Britain he will see that they have had a coalition Government, all parties being represented in that Government. If any one political party in Great Britain had attempted to run the Government of that country on party or patronage lines, as the Canadian Government has been doing here, that political party would not have lasted for three months.

Again, the Government say that it is a patriotic duty on our part to agree to this extension. The question is: Are they sincere about this? To me it looks a little like an invitation to walk into their parlour. What is the Minister of Inland Revenue saying about this? He made some reference to it the other day in one of his speeches in Dorchester county. He said that when we agreed to this extension last year, we all stultified ourselves. That is the view he takes of that matter. Let me quote a paragraph from the speech of Mr. Sévigny, delivered at St. Justin:—

> Mr. Cannon pretends that the Conservatives are corrupt, Mr. Sevigny went on, but what happened at the last session? The Conservatives asked the Liberals if they would allow them to go on for another year, and the Liberals said 'All right, go ahead, we have no objection,' and that is the corrupt Government of which Mr Cannon speaks.

All I can say is that if by agreeing to this proposed extension I am to become responsible for the Yoakum scandal, the Allison scandal, the motor truck scandal, the Garland scandal and the Foster scandal and all the other numerous scandals, then I shall be compelled to vote against the extension. I do not see why we should ignore the Constitution altogether unless some arrangement is made by which all parties can be represented. The electors of Canada, if permitted, would settle this question in twenty-four hours; an election would clear the atmosphere, and if the Liberals should win, as I think they would, it would bring about certain very important things. This Government had its human weaknesses before the war started at all, and we all know that no saints or archangels have been added to it since that date. Those people who object so strongly to an election ought to be reminded that it is for free institutions that the people of Canada and the people of Great Britain are fighting. A certain Conservative newspaper and two or three windy orators of the baser type have been saying that it would not be safe to entrust the administration of this country to the Liberal party, but I do not pay much attention to what men of that stamp say. They are the pole-cats of public life, and I hope that their influence, if they have any, will not be felt outside of a few back concessions in the province of Ontario.

While I believe in a change, I do not say that these gentlemen across the way are all bad. There is a mixture of bad and good, but I am afraid that the bad predominates. The activities of the patronage hunter, the greed of the grafter, the zeal of the political heeler and the hopes of the Godly, are all so inextricably tangled up together, and it is pretty hard to do anything with a combination like that. While these gentlemen retain power they do pretty much as they please, as they are not subject to any law but themselves, but it is our duty on this side of the House to remind them that the ten commandments are still in force in this country.

Now, assuming that an election comes, and the Liberal party wins, it would accomplish several things:

1. It would give to the country a vigorous government fresh from the people with a mandate to carry on the war, not in a half-hearted way as at present, but with the whole might of the nation enlisted in the task.

2. It would give us a trade policy that would make for expansion and development and would place the country in a position to grapple with the conditions that are certain to arise after the war.

3. It would bring the Liberal policy of British Preference again to the front and free Canada from the reproach of having increased the taxation against British goods at a time when the old land was engaged in a life and death struggle with the greatest military power in the world.

4. It would give Canada a naval policy that would at least restore her self-respect and place us in the same class on the sea as the Commonwealth of Australia.

5. In short, it would give us clean, honest and progressive government, and cut the claws of the grafter.

Mr. Speaker, when one looks over the political history of 1916 one is not surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite prefer an extension to an election. Look, for example, at the defeats suffered by the Conservative party in the provincial arena during the past year. There have been four provincial general elections. In Nova Scotia 30 Liberals and 13 Conservatives were elected; in Quebec, 73 Liberals and 6 Conservatives; in Manitoba, 44 Liberals and 4 Conservatives, and in British Columbia 32 Liberals and 10 Conservatives. The Conservative press takes the ground that a general election would be a calamity. Perhaps it would be a calamity to them, but I submit it would be the dawn of a new day to the people of Canada.

I should like to point out that the defeat of the Liberal party in 1911 was brought about by means that cannot be repeated in 1917. What hon. gentleman opposite is shouting to-day: "No truck or trade with the Yankees?" We do not hear a word of that to-day. Who over there is demanding the repeal of the Ne Temere Act? Even the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) is quiet at the present time. Who is claiming to win ten seats, or even one seat, in the province of Ontario on the issue of the Farmers' Bank? You never hear of it. Who is boring holes in the flag or cursing Laurier because he is an English imperialist? Who is pledging himself to repeal the Naval Service Act, or promising free medicine for the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces? Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of pride to us on this side of the House that while those bogus issues that won seats for the Tory party in 1911 have all gone to the limbo where they belong, the two great issues on which the Liberal party stood in 1911 are as good to-day as they were then. I refer, Sir, to the Canadian navy and to reciprocity with the United States. That is the reason why we on this side of the House are willing to carry on and to strive for the ideals of our party. We are proud of the Liberal party, proud of our leader, proud of the past history of that party and of those watchwords of duty, freedom and manly effort that have made it great in the past and will alone keep it great in the future.

Mr. ARHTUR B. COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself to the House for a short time, and as it is now late in the evening and it is not my desire to keep the House too late, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Friday, January 26, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORTS.

Report of the Minister of Agriculture for the year ending March 31, 1916—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

Report of the Department of Public Works for the year ending March 31, 1916 —Hon. Mr. Rogers.

DOMINION LANDS ACT—PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

Mr. George E. McCraney (Saskatoon) moved for leave to introduce Bill, No. 12, to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said:

The proposed amendment is to insert a new section, 30A, as follows:

30A—The Minister may issue letters patent to any entrant for a pre-emption or to any entrant for a purchased homestead who has complied with the requirements of Section 27 or Section 28 of this Act as the case may be, except as to the payment of moneys due in respect of the said pre-emption or purchased homestead. The said letters patent shall be issued pursuant to regulations to be made by the Governor in Council and the lands patented under this section shall remain charged with the moneys due to the Crown until satisfied according to law.

The purpose in view is to enable the Minister of the Interior to issue patent to pre-emptions and purchased homesteads, subject to the payment of the moneys due to the Government, in cases where all the other requirements of the Act, including residence and cultivation, have been complied with. It frequently happens that a settler has done all his duties except that of paying the balance of the purchase price of $3 per acre due to the Government. He wishes to borrow money on his land, and the usual advance by mortgagees in such cases is in the neighbourhood of $1,000, but he is unable to give the mortgage because of the balance owing to the Government, which must be paid before patent can issue. He is forbidden by the Dominion Lands Act to pledge his rights in the pre-emption or purchased homestead, and rarely has other security. In the case of moneys owing to the Government for seed grain, patent issues subject to a lien for the amount. It is proposed to permit a similar practice regarding pre-emptions and purchased homesteads.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MACDONALD: I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Labour to the following telegram which I have received from the miners of Coleman, Alberta:

Coleman, Alta., Jan. 25, 1917.

E. M. Macdonald,
Ottawa, Ont.

The following resolution was unanimously passed at a full meeting of Carbondale Miners' Union:

"That in the opinion of the miners of the Carbondale Miners' Union at a meeting held to-night, we consider that the action of the Government relative to the bonus of nine and one-half per cent., according to the finding of the Commission re high cost of living is unwarrantable and unjust, and calculated to be an incentive for the men to strike.

"That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Premier Borden and E. M. Macdonald."

We earnestly desire your good offices in this matter.

J. A. McDonald,
George E. Hogan, Secretary.

I may explain that this telegram was sent to me by virtue of the fact that a number of miners from my constituency have been working in the vicinity from which this telegram comes. I ask what action the Government has taken in regard to the bonus of nine and a half per cent which is alleged in this telegram to be objectionable. I ask also for information as to the exact situation of matters at Coleman.

Hon. T. W. CROTHERS (Minister of Labour): I have had no information directly from Coleman, and cannot say anything beyond what I said the day before yesterday. Negotiations are in progress which, I expect, will result in a satisfactory settlement within the next few days. I do not think it would be in the interest of any one concerned to go into the details of those negotiations.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think the hon. minister should tell the House what the action was which was taken by the Government and to which the telegram refers.

Mr. CROTHERS: Several of the officers of the Union at Fernie and other points in that district—District No. 18—came here in November last and submitted their desire either for a second war bonus of twenty-five per cent or an investigation as to what had been the increase in the cost of living between certain dates, and an undertaking that this increase should be paid in addition to the increase of ten per cent that had been given them on the 15th of August. They were quite satisfied with the gentleman who was appointed to investigate the question of the increased cost of living; in fact, I think they themselves suggested his name. This gentleman carried on the inquiry and reported that the increase in the cost of living within the period named had been nine and one-half per cent. This is the first time that I have heard any objections to that finding. The only question that has come up since the finding was made is as to how it is to be carried out.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. G. C. Wilson (Wentworth) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Thursday, January 25.

Mr. ARTHUR B. COPP (Westmorland): I should like to say, Sir, if you are not already overburdened with the congratulations that have been showered upon you by hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate, that it gives me the greatest possible personal pleasure to congratulate you upon the position that you have attained as Speaker of this House. Your constituency and mine lie side by side; we are very near neighbours at home, and we were brought up together. Knowing you personally so well and so favourably, I feel that I cannot allow this occasion to pass without expressing my pleasure upon your attaining your present high office. The only regret I have is that, inasmuch as the Speakership is controlled by the party in power, I cannot hope that you will hold that office for any great length of time. In that you will hold it for a time, however, I offer you my most hearty congratulations.

I regret exceedingly, Sir, that during the course of this debate, comparisons and contrasts have been made between the two great peoples of this country with regard to recruiting. I do not say how much foundation there is for the attacks which have come from the other side of the House as to the slowness of recruiting in the province of Quebec or the reasons therefor, but as a Canadian citizen and as a member of this House I regret that any such acrimonious remarks should be made or that contrasts should be suggested or comparisons instituted between the two great races that go to make up the greatest colony of the Empire. I say that I regret this, and cannot understand why it should be so. The constituency which I represent in the province of New Brunswick, the county of Westmorland, is composed of people of the two great races, and I want to say that my French Acadian friends in that county have in this crisis stood nobly by Canada and by the Empire. They have done their full part in the matter of recruiting and of subscribing to the different funds which have for their object the carrying on of this war. While we have in my county two races, two creeds, two nationalities, we do not look upon each other as different races; we are not pulling apart; on the contrary we are united and are becoming more united day by day and year by year. I want to say to the credit of the Acadian people that they have done their part willingly and in a straightforward manner. The clergy representing the Acadian people have taken the same platform with those of other denominations throughout the county of Westmorland and have done their part in urging, exhorting, almost imploring the people to do their duty. The people have done their full part, and I am glad to pay this tribute to my friends in the county of Westmorland.

In the Address with which His Excellency has been pleased to open this Parliament, there are not many subjects for consideration. There are three in particular, those referring to the organization of national service, the fiftieth anniversary of Canadian Confederation, and the extension of the term of Parliament. I am sure that every one of us subscribes earnestly and sincerely to the words spoken in regard to the valour of our Canadian troops and the manner in which they have acquitted themselves at the front. No one would question the courage, bravery, and resourcefulness of the Canadian boys who have gone to fight for their country. We knew from the history and traditions of the people of Canada that they would do their full part when the opportunity came, and the whole country must realize that they have done their duty nobly and well; that they are doing it now, and will continue to do it until the termination of this great struggle.

The number of men who have gone to the front is mentioned in the Address as being, roughly, 400,000. We are very glad to know that that number of our Canadian boys have donned khaki and gone to the front to do their bit. On the first of January, 1916, the right hon. Prime Minister stated that 500,000 troops would be raised in Canada. We must realize that that promise meant the enlisting and sending to the front of 500,000 troops, as well as the recruiting of many men in addition to that in order to supply the wastage from the 500,000 and in order to keep the Canadian army up to that strength. I quite agree with the view expressed by a number of hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House, that we require men not only at the front but in the munition factories, on the farms, in the forests, and in other lines of work which are being carried on in Canada. But, Sir, like the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) who addressed the House yesterday afternoon, while I realize the importance of carrying on the country's industries, I believe that more honour and more responsibility rest upon the man who leaves his home and family, goes to the front and shoulders a rifle in order that he may do his part in the trenches. It is there that the war is being actually fought, and the quicker the men are in the trenches the quicker the termination of the war will come—and an early termination of the war is the one great desire of the people of Canada.

Another clause in His Excellency's speech draws attention to the fact that we are on the threshold of the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of the Dominion, and suggests that some suitable ceremony should be held to commemorate that event. I quite agree that that would be a most noble and a most proper thing for Canadians to do. I regret that we cannot hold out the hope that we will be able to commemorate that event by a celebration because of the termination of the war. But while that seems to be beyond the bounds of probability, I sincerely trust that the Government will take into consideration a suitable commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the natal day of our Dominion, of which we are all so proud. I associate myself with those who have suggested that we should not hold any celebration that would be attended with any large expenditure of money. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) made what I thought an excellent suggestion; that is, that the event be commemorated by the erection of a memorial hospital to be used by returned disabled soldiers. Some measure of that kind might well be taken into consideration, and I believe it would meet with the full approbation of every person in the Dominion of Canada.

While we realize that Canada will soon pass the fiftieth milestone in her history, we might for a moment refer to the fact that during all that time the Government of this country has been carried on very largely, if not wholly, along party political lines. To-day there seems to be a whisper in the atmosphere, murmurs here and there, that the time has arrived when the people of the Dominion could very well lay aside their party differences and work together more harmoniously than under the party system, in the interests of the country. That suggestion has been referred to even on the floor of this House. It has been mentioned by many newspapers throughout Canada. It has been discussed, and resolutions have been passed upon it in Boards of Trades, Trade and Labour Council meetings, municipal council meetings, church organizations and other organizations that have the welfare of the country at heart. But I am forced to stop for a moment and ask myself, as I believe the people of Canada are asking themselves, why is this proposal made? Why is the suggestion now thrown out that we should have a different form of Government from what we have had in the past? It seems to me, speaking from my experience and knowledge of conditions in my own province, that the men who are asking, yea demanding, that we should have a different form of Government, that we should have a national Government or a coalition Government, are members of the Conservative party in the different provinces, and that they realize that their own party, which has been in charge of the affairs of this country for the past five years, has been weighed in the balance and found wanting; that it has made a miserable failure of the management of the affairs of Canada. That is the situation. I am quite willing to give to my hon. friends all the credit due them in regard to what they claim to be the awful burden that has been cast upon them by reason of this war. I realize that, Sir. But that is no proper reason to give to the country for their failure to conduct its affairs properly. It simply shows that they have been unable to rise to the occasion and deal with the extra burdens thus thrown upon them. Their friends throughout the different counties and provinces are now asking that we should no longer have party government; they say that they want men taken into the Government who are able to take over the burden of administration, and give them assistance to carry on the work which they have been unable to perform. I am not at all opposed to what may be called a national Government. I am of the opinion that some change must take place. But what is this national Government that is being talked about in the press of our country? What is the national Government that the Trades and Labour people want? What is the national Government that the Board of Trade of the city of Winnipeg wants? I see in the Citizen of to-day a despatch which reads:

At a regular meeting to-night the Winnipeg Board of Trade passed a resolution favouring a national Government.

Before I would feel like committing myself to a national Government, I should like some information as to what this national Government would be and what class of me would be called to its councils.

An hon. MEMBER: Tories.

Mr. COPP: Some one suggests Tories. That would not bother me if they were Tories of sufficient calibre and ability, and if their whole desire were to do what was best for the country. I am perfectly willing to listen to my friends from Winnipeg or elsewhere in the Dominion who insist upon a national Government, but how are we going to get this Government? There are only two ways that I can see. The first way of securing a national Government is for this Government to resign and give way to others. Then who should take their places? That seems to be one way of getting a national Government. Another way, the only other way and the constitutional way, is that when the time arrives, our friends opposite should give up their places and appeal to the people. The last jury and the only proper and constitutional jury to decide questions that come before the people are the people themselves, and if the people to-day, as expressed in repeated resolutions from the different places throughout the Dominion of Canada, are satisfied, as apparently they are satisfied, that the present Government is not a national Government, that the present Government is not composed of men who are equal to the tasks and burdens that are thrust upon them, then they must do only one thing, and that is to defeat the present Government. But when this Government is defeated, as defeated it is sure to be, then His Excellency the Governor General will call upon some one else to form a Government. Then a national form of Government might very well be inaugurated; and I have no doubt that the right hon. the leader of this side of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), when he accepts the mandate from the people in the near future and walks across to the other side of the House, will surround himself, as he did in 1896, with men of national character and national reputation who will do the best that is possible for the country, now as they did in 1896, and as they continued to do for fifteen years while Sir Wilfrid Laurier had charge of the affairs of Canada.

One of the many reasons why the people are becoming tired of the present Administration is that it has paid too much attention to party politics. There was not much fault found with that until the outbreak of the war, but upon the outbreak of the war the people expected, and reasonably so, I think, that the party in power would drop for a little their party schemes and undertakings and work for the interests of the people generally, and not in the interests of party or political friends. We find that party preferment has been going on. That has been the attitude of the Government during its whole regime, and it is no wonder that the people generally are resenting it and are becoming anxious as to the results throughout the Dominion. The Government during the past year has been trying to get the people interested in recruiting in order to make good the promise made by the right hon. the Prime Minister a little over a year ago. One of the reasons why recruiting has fallen off during the past year is that the people are uneasy and restless in regard to the conduct of the war, and particularly in regard to the expenditures of public money voted for that purpose. They are beginning to realize that all has not been right. They realize that money has been wasted, and that extravagance has been practised on every hand. We are now in the third year of the war, and this terrible extravagance and waste and graft, which have been going on since the beginning of the war, still continues. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem able to stop the leakage and the waste.

Yesterday, or the day before, in this House, one hon. member on this side of the Chamber made reference to the fact that politics were rampant in military appointments, and an hon. member on the opposite side of the House, who followed, declared that in his county there was no party preferment and that party politics were not considered. We are bound to accept the statement made by an hon. member of this House in regard to anything that takes place in his own constituency, and I am not here to dispute any such statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite; but it is folly, it is absolutely beyond reason to expect that such statements will be believed by the people who know that political preferment in the matter of appointments has been practised from the inception of the war. I do not say that during that time we have not had Liberals appointed to offices; they have been in exceptional cases. We could not expect anything else; but, generally speaking, we know that, down to the smallest office, everything has been done through party patronage. I know that it has been so in the province of New Brunswick, and in my own county; and every man of common inteligence knows that it has been so from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Go down to the province of New Brunswick and look at the men who have been selected as recruiting officers. Liberals and Conservatives alike, to do them credit, have thrown aside their party feelings to enlist in the service of the country; but go down to the province of New Brunswick, go where you will throughout the Dominion, and you will find that it has been the exception for any one who is not a strong Conservative to be appointed to a position, particularly when there is a good salary attached to it. Why, Sir, we find the recruiting meetings in the county of Westmorland being used—perhaps I should not use that expression—but you find the men in charge of those recruiting meetings selected because of their party affiliations. That is the condition of affairs, and it is no wonder that the people are becoming disgusted and ashamed of the Government in regard to recruiting and other matters connected with the war.

The people, too, are beginning to realize the terrible waste of public money in connection with the war. They realize that not only are we voting money, and borrowing it, and spending it, but that individuals, municipalities and towns throughout the Dominion, from one end to the other, are being asked to contribute to the various funds. Even the little children are asked to empty their banks for patriotic purposes. And yet, while that is going on, we know that not thousands, nor tens of thousands of dollars, but millions of dollars, are being absolutely wasted because of mistakes somewhere on the part of somebody that should not have been made. I picked up a newspaper this morning which states—I do not know whether the article is to be accepted as true; I do not vouch for its truth—that in England there are two hundred lieutenant-colonels from Canada who are doing nothing, and who have done nothing since the war started. I read a little farther and find that the daily cost of the upkeep and maintenance of these lieutenant-colonels amounts to $2,500 per day. Multiply that amount by 365 and you find that it is costing this country practically one million dollars a year for not one dollar's worth of advantage, so far as the war is concerned. That is the condition of affairs, and people are branded as disloyal, forsooth, because they call the attention of the people to the conduct of the Government in carrying on affairs of the country in this critical period of her history.

Mr. CARVELL: You can double that in Canada.

Mr. COPP: Yes, and not only is it true in regard to the colonels in England, but it applies also to majors, captains, and the subordinate officers. This article goes on to say that to-day in England alone we have at least 4,000 men in the Records Office. What about New Zealand and other dominions which have officers there? It is costing these dominions a mere bagatelle compared with what it is costing the Dominion of Canada for the upkeep of officers. I have no fault to find with a man being a lieutenant-colonel, or drawing the pay which is attached to his office, but if a lieutenant-colonel has nothing to do, and if he is not willing to take the rank of lieutenant, or some other subordinate position, and go to the front, he should resign and the remuneration that is being paid to him should be stopped, and he should come back to this country and assume the role of a private citizen as the rest of us are doing. I could go on and illustrate by a thousand and one instances how money is being wasted in Canada along this very line. The time has arrived when those who are in charge of the affairs of this country should call a halt, should clean house, and take the people of Canada into their confidence and give a strict account of their stewardship. Let me say to the First Minister that that is his first duty. He not only represents the Conservative party, but he, as the Premier of the Dominion, represents the people of Canada, and the people are clamouring, they are demanding, that they should have a full, frank and honest disclosure of what has taken place in the past and what he is going to do in the future in regard to the conduct of this war.

We all remember with what great satisfaction the Conservative newspapers—and I am bound to say a number of the Liberal newspapers and Liberals as well—throughout the Dominion, regarded the fact that when this war broke out it was the good fortune of Canada to have as Minister of Militia a man of the enthusiasm, energy and experience of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes). I am bound to say, Sir, because I want to be honest and frank about it, that I never looked upon the ex-Minister of Militia as being any better than the friends with whom he was associated. I looked upon the Government as a whole, and I felt that the whole Government were responsible for the administration of the affairs of this country, and particularly with regard to the affairs appertaining to this war. Public newspapers, particularly newspapers supporting the Government, would come out day after day and week after week and tell us what a wonderful man the ex-Minister of Militia was, and what a fortunate thing, what an admirable thing it was, that we had such a man administering the military affairs of the country. Yea, in different places, he was referred to as the Kitchener of Canada. What has taken place? If the ex-Minister of Militia was entitled to the praises which were so lavishly bestowed upon him during the past two years and until very recently, what do these same newspapers have to say now? You take up a newspaper since the resignation of our genial friend as Minister of Militia, and what do you find? You may find one line in the whole column referring to the energy he displayed, but the rest of the column will be devoted to the many weaknesses he showed as a member of the Government.

I now propose to take up in some detail the correspondence that has passed between the ex-Minister of Militia and the First Minister. I contend that this correspondence which has passed between two members of the Cabinet requires more than a passing notice. It seems to me that it cannot be answered by the right honourable the First Minister as he attempted to answer it the other day when, following my right honourable friend the leader of the Opposition, he rose in his place and said that he did not propose to discuss the question of the resignation of the Minister of Militia and Defence. I suppose that may be privately his right, but I contend that the Premier of this Dominion owes it to the people of the country to enlighten them as to what has taken place in regard to this matter. The letters that were written by the ex-Minister of Militia to the First Minister contain the most glaring charges that were ever levelled against the Prime Minister or the responsible head of any Government in this Dominion and yet no attempt has been made to answer these charges. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have referred to the matter and it has been passed by; not a word has been uttered to give to the people of Canada any just or cogent reason why the ex-Minister of Militia is to-day out of the Cabinet. No excuse is offered, no defence is made against the awful charges that the ex-minister has made against the First Minister in regard to this matter. I want to refer to this correspondence. I want to read some paragraphs from the letters that passed between these gentlemen and to comment upon them after I read them. The first I want to read is a paragraph from a letter from the ex-Minister of Militia dated October 23, 1916, in answer to one from the Premier, and it is as follows:

> Regarding your letter and memorandum, permit the following: From the outset I strongly objected to the fact that practically the entire management of our force, our supplies, our equipment, our transport, etc., had been taken completely out of our hands, and was controlled by the British authorities, we, notwithstanding, paying the bill.
> In October, 1914, in conversation on the subject with the late Earl Kitchener, he pointed out that the Canadian High Commissioner had intimated to him that it was the desire of the Canadian Government that these troops should be regarded as purely British, and that Canada should have nothing to say in their management while in England or at the front.

I think that is a most significant sentence. He says that in October, 1914, this trouble had taken place. Back as far as October, 1914, there was dissatisfaction, bickering and cleavage in the minds of the members of the Cabinet. The war broke out in August, 1914, and in October, 1914, the trouble had already commenced in the Cabinet. I have no reason to doubt, Sir, that in any Cabinet there must be differences of opinion. Men do not always see alike on many great public questions, but I contend, and I think I am only contending for what is a sound constitutional doctrine, that when the Cabinet takes up and threshes out the matters that come before them, their decision must be presented to the public as a united and unanimous one and they must work together harmoniously and unanimously in the interests of the whole country.

Further we find this statement:—

> I drew his attention to Section 177 of the Army Act, and to the spirit and principles of the Constitution, but he again intimated that he understood it was the desire of the Canadian Government that the troops were to be handed over to them absolutely as British Regulars. To this I objected, and pointed out that I fully believed that our force under officers of our own selection should, at the front, be under the command of the British Comander in Chief; yet the appointment of officers at the front and the control of everything in connection with the force while in Britain, should be entirely with Canada; but I further stated that I felt in such a great struggle where each was actuated by proper motives, there should be no need of friction.

Then he says:—

I do not know whether the Canadian High Commissioner had the authority of the Canadian Government or not.

That means that, although he was a member of the Cabinet, he did not know what authority Sir George Perley had as High Commissioner. He goes on to say:—

But a day or two later that gentleman of his own initiative strongly spoke to me and briefly said, "You do not pretend surely to have anything to do with the Canadian soldiers in Britain." I suggested that he might be well advised to study not alone the Canadian Military law, but the British Army Act, as well as comprehend the spirit of the constitution. I felt then, as I feel to-day, and as I am pleased to say the entire British Government and the War Office officers also realize to-day that our officers and men being in the pay of Canada, Canada should absolutely control them in Canada and in Britain, excepting in so far as securing camping grounds is concerned; and at the front for everything excepting the command and general administration under the command. However, for the first ten months our suggestions were practically ignored, our equipment, stores, supplies, armament, everything provided by us was set aside.

That means that the ex-Minister of Militia attaches his signature to a statement that ten months after the outbreak of the war all the supplies provided by Canada, all the trucks, all the equipment, everything—and we know that it amounted to millions of dollars' worth—were set aside and scrapped in England, and we, the people of Canada, are called upon to pay this enormous wastage and extravagance on the part of the Government because of their bickerings and their incapacity, because they were unable to grapple with the question and make prompt and definite decisions for the benefit of the country. He goes on to say:—

The pay department was found to be absolutely chaotic; the medical service modelled on the British, lacked system, efficiency and comprehensiveness.

There is another charge in regard to which it seems to me the people of Canada, the fathers and mothers of the soldiers who have gone to the front, are perfectly within their right when they not only ask, but demand in a respectful but in a most emphatic manner, that they should be given some explanation. In that sentence the ex-Minister of Militia implies a great deal more than he says. The phrase about the medical service lacking efficiency tells the fathers and the mothers of the boys at the front that when their kith and kin and flesh and blood are wounded or taken sick and are brought to the English hospitals, they are not given proper care and attention. Could anything be more detrimental to recruiting in the Dominion of Canada than that very statement. And yet that has been published, not by a Liberal newspaper, not by a Liberal on the hustings, but by one of the sworn members of the Cabinet, who has since resigned his seat. The time has arrived when we, as independent people of this country, should and do demand some explanations in regard to the matter. I cannot understand so many right-thinking, honest Conservatives throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion sitting quietly by and humbly following their party when we find one of their own Cabinet ministers making such an outrageous charge against the Government in regard to this matter that is uppermost in the minds of our people. The ex-minister says:—

The pay department was found to be absolutely chaotic.

We know that from experience. I doubt if there is an honourable member in this House who has not had letters and telegrams, who has not been personally and privately communicated with in regard to this very subject, in reference not only to the Mother Country, but to Canada. I have here letters and memoranda from scores of women from my own constituency who have been unable to get their separation allowance or their assigned pay from their sons and their husbands properly adjusted. I know one case in my own town where a woman had a son at the front and had been receiving from Ottawa his assigned pay for fifteen months, month by month. All at once this pay stopped. She wrote a letter to the department here, and when she got her reply, she could not understand it and brought it to me. The answer was that they had not this young man's name on their records at all. She thought of course that something had happened to her boy and that his name had been cut out, that he had been killed and she had not been advised. I wrote to the department pointing out that there was an error somewhere, because I enclosed one of the printed circulars that are sent with the cheques, and that the boy's name must be on the record. They then changed their answer and wrote in reply that the boy's name was there but that they would have to communicate with the pay office in London before the matter could be rectified. That is an illustration of what is taking place. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) smiles. He takes so little notice of people who are looking to him and the Government to take some interest in their affairs that he sits here and smiles and laughs in the face of members when they bring to the attention of this House some of the rights of the common people of this country. It is not becoming to the Minister of Labour to do that. Every one knows that he has never taken an active interest nor spent a serious moment in his life in looking after the interests of the people whom he is supposed to represent.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is going a little too far.

Mr. COPP: In what way, your honour?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think, when the hon. gentleman sees his language in Hansard to-morrow, he will be the first to admit that he is going entirely too far.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The language used by my hon. friend is not unparliamentary. Although it may be that he has diverged a little from the subject with which he was dealing, and he has a right to do that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman made the statement that the Minister of Labour was supposed to represent certain people in this House, the imputation being that he did not represent them. I say that the hon. gentleman's statement in that respect is out of order, and I so rule.

Mr. COPP: I shall be glad to retract any statement I have made that is unparliamentary because I have no desire to infringe on the rules of the House. If I say "the party that he, because of his office, is entitled to represent," will that be parliamentary? He has made a dismal failure of it.

Further on in this letter, the ex-Minister of Militia writes to the Prime Minister:

I spoke to you at the time about the rejection of all our stores and supplies of every description and proved to you that the excuses of the British office were totally without foundation.

You have my memorandum at the time proving the utter falsity of their bogus excuses regarding our wagons, etc.

Here we have the statement, on the authority of one who was then a minister of the Crown, that our supplies provided by the Government were being thrown aside. Yet those supplies were being manufactured, taken possession of by the Government, paid for by the people, and sent to England—only to be scrapped. And this went on month after month. He says further:

Your suggestion then was that as the changes had been made we should abide by the decision of the British officers. However, I did not wish to raise any trouble in the matter but I determined that Canada was not to be treated as a Crown colony, and that as we paid the bill and furnished the goods, which in nearly every instance were better than the British, I would act. I ordered muster parade of our men and tried to lay plans to stop the scandalous neglect going on in the pay department.

Here is a charge of "scandalous neglect"; not the waste of a few wagons, not the throwing aside of a few Oliver equipments, not the loss of a few days' munitions or supplies furnished by the Dominion of Canada, but "scandalous neglect" which the ex-minister felt called upon, to take means to bring to an end. And he goes on:

I had to accept under protest for the first year—

Why had he to accept? There can be no reason except that the other members of the Cabinet forced him to do so.

—I had to accept, under protest, for the first year, this management of the Force in Britain. The anomaly of such a state of things is apparent. The Canadian soldier in the trenches must voice his complaint, if any, through the Parliament of Canada and the Minister of Militia and Defence must accept responsibility.

This is a most cogent and convincing reason why the affairs of our soldier boys should be controlled in Canada—that any complaints they had in regard to the administration of affairs must be voiced through the Parliament of Canada and not through the Parliament of Great Britain. But the quotations I have already made show the position of the other members of the Government in regard to these matters. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) for instance, went quietly on just as though the boys at the front did not matter. And to-day the Government treat the whole people of Canada with silent contempt when asked what they have done to give the boys at the front a fair and square deal. I will say this for the ex-Minister of Militia, that, though he may have lacked judgment at times, he did show a very strong and earnest interest in the boys who went to the front. But his colleagues were not willing to give him the same latitude in the matters of his department that they gave to the other ministers in the affairs committed to their control. He goes on:

How could the Canadian soldier obtain redress through the British House of Commons? Kipling's lines hold good:

"Daughter in her Mother's house, Mistress in her own,"

as well as another standard maxim "Taxation implies representation and brings responsibility."

And in this letter there is this further striking passage:

During the last year's management we have introduced a new system of convalescent control upon which the British are now modelling.

In a previous passage of this letter he shows that there was inefficiency in the management of the British convalescent homes and hospitals. Apparently, the need of improvement was established, because the British authorities began to model their convalescent homes and hospitals upon the lines of those carried on by Canada. And the advantage of the Canadian system is shown in this very practical way:

We returned a much higher percentage to their battalions trained and fully fit for service, and saved to Canada the sum of upwards of six millions of dollars.

When hon. gentlemen opposite speak so glibly of the tens and hundreds of millions of dollars that are being expended, a saving of only six millions seems very little. Still, here is the statement of a former minister of the Crown that in this one matter alone he had been successful in saving $6,000,000 of our money. Is it not reasonable to believe that if the Government were wasting $6,000,000 in one year on convalescent homes and hospitals, they were wasting ten times that amount in the hundred and one other avenues of expenditure made necessary by the war? These charges are a most serious reflection upon the Government and their management of affairs in this crisis.

I turn now to another letter, that of October 31, in which the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence says:

Dear Sir Robert: In conformity with the suggestions made this morning, permit me to briefly summarize the situation. During the first year of the war, the plans adopted for the force in England were modelled on the British War Office, but I had nothing whatever to do with them. The Canadian High Commissioner seemed to be the one dominating as witnessed in the contract made for officers messing, etc., at Salisbury, for the British system in regard to pay department and the British system in regard to the medical department. From the outset I objected to these women's organizations in Britain in the shape of V. A. D. hospitals, etc., but the Canadian High Commissioner seemed to favour them. The appointments in the force were also based on two avenues of supply, one was British officers connected with society people, and the other Canadian permanent corps officers with their usual pull. In justice to a limited few of each class who were worthy, the majority of them were not up to the average of capability. Since a year ago Canadian control through the Militia Department has been, more or less, with the full consent of the British War Office, gradually recognized to the great advantage of the force.

Mr. Speaker, what does that mean? It means that, according to the charge made by the ex-Minister of Militia, these favours were being parcelled out through a man representing this Government, Sir George Perley, the High Commissioner in London, to those of social standing and to those who had the pull. What pull could he refer to but political pull on the part of the Government? That was the condition of affairs affecting our soldier boys at the front during the first year or two of the war.

On November 1 another letter was written by the hon. ex-Minister of Militia in answer to one written by the First Minister on October 31. After acknowledging receipt of the Premier's letter, the then minister went on to say:

I do recall my visit to Great Britain in the autumn of 1914. I did expect both under the statutory law of Britain, and under the law of common courtesy, that I would have been permitted to exercise some "control and direction" over our gallant Canadian boys in the way of organization.

While he does not expressly say it, the hon. gentleman implies that he was not allowed to exercise any control over the Canadian boys in the way of organization. I hold no brief for the ex-Minister of Militia, but irrespective of my opinion of the ex-minister's capabilities, nothing appealed to the fathers and mothers of the boys of my county who were going to the front more than the interest which Sir Sam Hughes was taking in them. I will say at least that much for the ex-minister. The ex-minister, then, was not allowed to have any control in the organization or care of Canadian troops who went to the front. In the same letter he goes on to say:

But there had evidently been some communication to the effect that "control and direction" of this magnificent force should be under the British Government direct. The then Mr. George Perley, acting High Commissioner, implied such in the following words: "You do not pretend, surely, to have anything to do with the Canadian soldiers in Britain?"

I read these extracts from the correspondence to show that the ex-Minister of Militia was shorn of power by another member of the Cabinet, without his receiving any notice from the Prime Minister. In the same letter he makes use of the following language:

Further, had I ventured to conduct this force on the basis of formal orders in council, the First Division would not have left Valcartier yet, and you know yourself by technicalities the Second Division was held up for four months through little petty haggling on the question of motor trucks, etc., etc.

The second line of your memorandum says: "So far as I am aware you exercised the same control and direction over the forces in Great Britain during the first year as subsequently."

Sir Robert, no one knows better than you that this statement, is incorrect. This last year, with the full concurrence of the War Office, our management and direction have been given every consideration, and by their request.

In these two paragraphs we find a series of charges—not merely suggestions or fault-finding—against the First Minister himself. The ex-minister says that had he waited for the Government to pass orders in council, the first contingent would be at Valcartier yet. I give due consideration to what may possibly be an extravagant statement on his part; yet these words prove beyond peradventure that there was a great holding back; that the troops were delayed in going to the front. And why? According to the statement made by the ex-Minister of Militia, because a few political friends, a few high and holy patriots, were haggling over the prices of trucks and munitions of war so that some of their friends would get a rake-off on the purchase. In respect of this charge made by the ex-Minister of Militia, no denial or defense has been vouchsafed by any member of the Cabinet or by anyone on their behalf. I quote another sentence from this letter:

One other point, and I am through. It might be implied from your memorandum that my failing to secure authority by order in council for this sub-Militia Council impelled you to the course you are now pursuing, regarding Sir George Perley. May I be permitted to say that both you and I know to the contrary. I knew early in August—

this was in November.

—that Sir George Perley had planned something along these very lines. You have, also, admitted that as early as the first week in September you had this matter under consideration. I understood that it was under consideration by you and Perley earlier. You incidentally remarked yesterday that you had not consulted any of your colleagues. Of course, when I drew your attention to the statement, you corrected yourself.

This language, which is now familiar to the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, indicates what had been taking place in the Cabinet during the first period of the war. At a time when our people were asked to send their sons to the front to fight for the Empire, a few gentlemen who should have been bending their energies towards the prosecution of the war were haggling and bickering over small matters connected with the purchase of motor trucks and other war supplies.

On November 11 another letter was written by the ex-Minister of Militia, in which I find the following:

Moreover, it is difficult for me to recall where you have actively supported me in the passage of any order in council concerning the upbuilding of the Militia, when opposed by two members of the Cabinet, usually antagonistic to anything proposed by me.

Further on he says:

As you, are aware, it took up four months in the first of this great war to fight through the principles of purchasing for the Second Division trucks at the lowest wholesale prices, instead of allowing large commissions to local agents, who would have nothing whatever to do with securing the order.

Again he says:

You will pardon me, but I can recall but one instance, namely Secret Service.

That is in answer to the Premier's statement that he had asked him always to have orders in council passed.

I do remember you asking me, on one occasion, to submit orders in council, where possible before incurring large expenditures, but the reason you assigned was not protests from my colleagues over my action, but that it was to set an example so as to assist you to control others. You instanced the Post Office Department, the Railway Department, and the Public Works Department, where projects had been undertaken without authority by order in council; and I remember distinctly you stated that some boats had been purchased and other large expenditures incurred, without your knowing anything about it, and without any order in council.

In answer to what the Premier writes to him, he replies by saying: "I remember you speaking to me and saying that I should have orders in council in regard to expenditures in my department." But it was not because he had any fears of the ex-Minister of Militia going beyond what he was entitled to do, it was simply because he wanted some excuse and reason for keeping his other ministers in check, namely, the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Public Works. And, Sir, what did the ex-Minister of Militia mean, and to whom does he refer, when he says that two members of the Cabinet were antagonistic to him? I say that members of this House and the people of Canada are entitled to know what members of the Cabinet were antagonistic to assisting the ex-Minister of Militia to carry out the promises that he made to the people of Canada, when he asked the mothers and fathers of the boys to allow them to go to the front to fight the battles of the Empire.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps the Minister of Labour will tell us when you get through.

Mr. COPP: Perhaps he will be able to, but if he is not more interested in this than in matters pertaining to his own department, I have little faith that he will be able to do much more in the interests of our soldier boys.

Mr. CROTHERS: I think I should give my friend a little light. I want to assure him that I was not smiling at any facts with which he was dealing—because he does not deal with facts—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Order.

Mr. CROTHERS: —but I was smiling at his bombastic manner.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Order, order. The Minister of Labour will have a chance when the hon. member for Westmorland gets through. The minister rose to a point of order.

Mr. CROTHERS: No, I did not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then what did he rise to? My hon. friend is too good a parliamentarian not to know that he could not rise to anything else.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I understood, the Minister of Labour interjected a remark with the assent of the hon. member for Westmorland.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He did not ask the permission of the hon. member for Westmorland.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that he asked it and secured it, because the hon. member for Westmorland resumed his seat and yielded the floor to the hon. minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He proceeded to say that the hon. member for Westmorland was not stating facts.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, there is no point of order before the House.

Mr. COPP: I am very glad to have the Minister of Labour rise, even if it was just to show that he has life enough to stand up.

Mr. CROTHERS: I cannot make as much noise as you.

Mr. COPP: He has not made as much—no, he has made too little noise in the interests of the people he represents. Now, Sir, my hon. friend says I do not deal in facts. I am very glad to have my hon. friend make that statement, because the statements I have been making for the last hour are statements made by the hon. the ex-Minister of Militia, Sir Sam Hughes, his own colleague in the Government until recently; I have been reading, letter by letter and word by word, all the charges he has made against his Premier; and when the hon. Minister of Labour says that I am not stating facts, he tells his ex-colleague that he has not stated facts in the letters he has written to the First Minister. I ask him if he still wants to insist that I have not been giving facts when I have been reading the letters of the ex-Minister of Militia.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let the hon. member state in what respect you have not been stating facts.

Mr. CROTHERS: Oh, no, I am not rising to a point of order.

Mr. COPP: When he says I am not stating facts, I ask him to name a statement I have made this afternoon that is not a fact.

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member some time ago referred to a lack of interest in the soldiers on my part and so on, and he was also saying that I was smiling because I had no interest in soldiers. When I spoke about his not dealing in facts, I was referring to what he said at that time.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend the Minister of Labour is skating on very thin ice indeed. I can tell him that if it takes him as long to consider any question that is brought before him by the labour men of this country as it has taken him to consider a question that I brought up something over three-quarters of an hour ago, which he has just come to understand, and with reference to which he says I did not state facts, I do not wonder that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with his administration on the part of labour men.

I want to read one or two other letters written by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia. In his letter of resignation dated November 11, 1916, Sir Sam Hughes says:

> You state "I conveyed to you on the 31st of July a clear intimation that upon so important a proposal involving considerations of the gravest moment, the Cabinet must be consulted before action was taken. All the Members of the Government have full and direct responsibility in respect to the very important matters which the proposed Council would advice upon and direct. The intimation which was given to you in my telegram of 31st of July should not have been necessary. As soon as it was received you proceeded to disregard it."

The first sentences of this quotation are absolutely true; and it is my belief that had you been actuated by the best interests of the Force, instead of favouritism, that cablegram would not have been dispatched.

The ex-Minister of Militia says that if they had been actuated by the best interests of the force, this cablegram would never have been dispatched. What does that mean? It certainly is an indication that the attitude of the Government was not in the interest of the forces at the front, in so far as they appealed to the intelligence and understanding of the responsible Minister of Militia at that time. Sir, the different paragraphs in the letters and in the correspondence go to bear out all the facts that I have alleged and have read from the statements made by the ex-Minister of Militia, and if they are not correct, if these statements are not facts, as my hon. friend the Minister of Labour says, let him say they are not facts, and show to the people of this country that they are not true. I say that not only is it his privilege, but it is a duty devolving upon the Government to show to the people that these statements are not true, because if they are not true, and they have gone unchallenged so far in this House and in this country, they should be controverted, and the people should be set right in regard to this very important question. I consider them of the very gravest importance to the people of this country, irrespective of whether they are supporters or opponents of the Government.

While the actual statements made by the ex-Minister of Militia could not possibly be known by the public but for the publication of this correspondence, it has been practically known and understood by the people of this country that there were grave differences in the Cabinet, and that very thing alone has been one of the biggest forces working against recruiting, working against the Empire, that could possibly exists. The trouble in the Cabinet, then and since has been very largely responsible for the falling off in recruiting throughout the Dominion during the past year:

That brings me to the clause in the speech from the Throne which refers to National Service. That is a subject of great importance to every Canadian, who, I believe, is interested in the carrying on of this great war. Much has been said in this House during the past week in regard to National Service. The first question which arises in one's mind is, why was it necessary to institute this National Service Commission? I presume, Sir—I do not think I am taking too much upon myself to presume—that it was because recruiting had fallen off, and that we were not likely to get the 500,000 men that were promised by the right hon. Prime Minister and that we all hope to obtain so that Canada may play its proper part in the war. If that is the purpose of the National Service Commission I agree with it up to the very hilt. I am willing to subscribe to it and to do anything that can be done in the interests of national service. I do not say that I will do nothing, or that I will not give it support until I see what is actually to become of it. I am willing to go into it a little blindly if it is along the line of being of advantage to the country generally, and in the interests of the war. Criticisms may be made in regard to the wording of the National Service cards, and in regard to other details; but whenever I have been consulted as to the filling up of the card I have advised my friends to fill them up, and have done everything possible, as I am prepared to do everything possible to assist the scheme in the hope, though possibly not with a great deal of confidence, that good may come out of it, and that the interests of the country will be better served through having a record of the man power, wealth and resources of the Dominion. I am willing to subscribe to anything that will help the mobilization of our troops and be of service in connection with the war; but we must realize that a number of people who are being blamed for not signing or returning their cards do not understand them. There are others who may not be able to fill up the cards, and therefore I think some latitude should be allowed. I believe that the great majority of the people have done their duty in regard to the National Service scheme, and I sincerely hope and trust that the results will be satisfying to the Government and to the people as a whole.

There is one other matter to which I would like to refer. I have referred before to the attitude of certain organizations throughout Canada towards the present Government, and I desire to bring to the attention of the Government a resolution that was passed a few days ago by the municipal council in my own county. We consider the county council of Westmorland one of the most important, if not the most important, municipal body in the whole province of New Brunswick. It is a very strong council and conducts its affairs in a manner that would do credit even to the Dominion House of Commons. This council is composed of both Liberals and Conservatives who, however, set aside their political affiliations in the conduct of the business of the county. They are chosen because of their fitness to represent their respective localities. We have in that council a gentleman who politically is a very strong opponent of my own, a gentleman who has stood staunch and true to the good old traditions of the Conservative party. In view of that fact, Mr. Speaker, you will, I am sure, be glad to hear the statement he made in regard to matters touching the question that I am now submitting to the attention of the Government. I am sure, Sir, that you, if not other members of the House, will know the gentleman when I mention his name—Councillor Fawcett of Sackville, one of the leading farmers in that locality. At a meeting of the council a few days ago he moved the following resolution, and it appeared to me to be of such importance that I take the responsibility of placing it upon Hansard. It reads as follows:

WHEREAS, the Municipality of Westmorland County (including the towns in the County of Westmorland and the City of Moncton) has since the commencement of the war, contributed the sum of $86,000 for patriotic purposes which has been levied by a direct tax upon the rate-payers of the county, and

WHEREAS, it is anticipated that a further and larger amount will be required for like purposes during the year 1917, and which amount it will be necessary to raise by direct taxation, and

WHEREAS, the Municipal Council of said Municipality have become and are aware that enormous profits have already been made and are still being made in this county and throughout Canada by certain persons and companies engaged in the manufacture of shells or other munitions and products, by reason of the war, and

WHEREAS, in many cases the plant and equipment of such industries were paid in effect by the people of Canada—that is to say, by the Munition Board of Canada, giving to such persons and companies before they embarked in the business, a sufficiently large order for shells at very large prices, as would enable and which did enable such persons and concerns to pay out of the profits therefrom the whole cost of such plant and equipment, and provide a handsome profit besides, and

WHEREAS, the avowed purpose of the said Munition Board in giving such high prices, was to indemnify those who might engage in the manufacture of munitions against any loss in case of a sudden termination of the war, and

WHEREAS, the war has now continued for about two years and a half, and the persons and companies who went into the business of manufacturing war products have been allowed to retain substantially the whole of the profits derived from such business, and

WHEREAS, such persons and companies by reason of the action of the said Munition Board in paying such high prices in the first instance, received in full the whole cost of their plant and equipment from the profits of the first order, and they would therefore, thereafter, actually have no moneys of their own invested in the undertaking, and

WHEREAS such persons and companies have during the last two years accumulated great wealth from said war profits, to which it cannot fairly be said they would be entitled, their plants and equipment having been paid for out of profits, and all operating charges, expenses, and salaries having been also charged up against earnings, and

WHEREAS, the people of Canada will ultimately be called upon to pay the debt that Canada is rapidly accumulating by reason of the war, and such debt would be materially less if the profits now improperly going into the pockets of private individuals, were diverted into the treasury of Canada, and

WHEREAS, the Municipal Council of the said County of Westmorland feel that a great wrong and injustice will be done to the rate-payers of the County of Westmorland, in requiring them to face direct taxation in connection with the prosecution of the war, while other people are being provided with what in effect are large "gratuities" out of the pockets of the people.

Be it and it is therefore resolved that the Municipal Council of the County of Westmorland do and it hereby does most respectfully and earnestly urge upon the Government of Canada that it insist upon the payment to it. during the remainder of the war, of all net profits hereafter made by all persons and companies engaged in the manufacture of war munitions, and in respect of such persons and companies as have in the past been allowed to retain profits of the cost of their plant and equipment engaged in the business that they may be compelled to account for and hand over to the Government all such surplus profits.

That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Prime Minister of Canada, the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Militia of Canada.

That is the resolution and the words of the gentlemen who introduced that resolution are so strong and so much to the point that I propose to read a few paragraphs from the statement which he made. In introducing this resolution Mr. Fawcett said:

Mr. Warden, while it is no doubt desirable to vote money to the Patriotic Fund, it is also desirable that this Council should make some emphatic protest against public moneys in the way of war profits being paid to private individuals instead of being appropriated by the Dominion Government for the purpose of prosecuting the war. That this is being done on a very large scale is now established beyond doubt. Protest should be made and that the facts may be placed clearly before the public. I know that Canada as a part of the British Empire is at war, and I am more proud of that Empire to-day than I have ever been before; I know that the young manhood of this country unhesitatingly sprang to arms at the bugle call for volunteers, and that they gloriously fought and died on the plains of France and elsewhere. I know that the women and even children of Great Britain and Canada are performing heroic services for the Empire, either without any or very small reward; I know that the privately-owned railways of Great Britain, the coal fields of that country and most of the munition plants are in the service of the state. I also know that the few remaining private enterprises are being taxed to the hilt in order that no discrimination shall anywhere exist, and I am assured, that the self-sacrifice and patriotism that is now dominating the minds and efforts of all classes, throughout Great Britain, and which is the marvel of the world, is largely traceable to this fact.

All are sharers in the struggle, all are making sacrifices. But this is not the case in Canada. The munition factories and many other of the business enterprises of this country are getting rich and richer as the war progresses, out of and because of the war, while many people are perforce becoming poorer. The people know, as I have said, that nothing like this state of affairs exists in Great Britain, and they also know that it would not be tolerated in France or any other European country engaged in the war, hence it is, that it is beyond their comprehension that it should be allowed to continue in this country. I wish to here say that the public are fast becoming disheartened and embittered over this condition of affairs, and are not in a humour to remain silent. They are not in a mood to stand for partiality towards any class or special interests, and they are not prepared to see these people gobble up money that should properly find its way to the Public Treasury.

These are statements made not by a partisan, and not by a man who is supporting, or whoever supported, the Liberal party. They are made by a gentleman who has consistently and honestly supported hon. gentlemen opposite. But, realizing that the people are becoming disappointed and discouraged because of the condition of affairs he takes this stand. Therefore, it will be seen that I am not reading this from the standpoint of party politics. I would have very grave doubts whether he would change his party allegiance. Possibly he has taken this means of showing his friends the position of affairs as it appears to the people of that portion of Canada. He goes on to say:

"The people of Canada today," said Council-Fawcett, "are interested solely in a body of men who will rule and run the country affairs with fairness and equality."

Councillor Fawcett substantiated his arguments by giving figures purporting to be the cost of construction of a munition plant, and of the profits made by the company. He gave details of the shell orders filled and of the profits in each shell.

He said that he was prepared to stand behind all his statements, and said further that he had been a strong Conservative all his life, but that he could not conscientiously see his way clear to stand for such conditions as existed in the Government forces today.

[Mr. Copp.]

That is the evidence of a gentleman who stands high in his community, who gives a great deal of careful study and thought to public questions and who occupies a very prominent place in the minds of the people of that portion of the county that I have the honour to represent. I have laid before you the fact that these charges have been made. It is not that I am making them myself but they have been made in other quarters and I am only reiterating what has been said elsewhere. They have been made by public bodies, organizations, and boards of trade independent of party, independent of what has taken place in this House, they must have very great weight with the Government and I trust that the Government will yet take time by the forelock and do something that will be more in the interest of the people generally.

The next matter I want to speak of briefly is the paragraph in the speech from the Throne that refers to the extension of Parliament. That is a matter that will come before this House by resolution. I do not know just what attitude Parliament will take in regard to it. I feel that it is a question that should be given the most serious consideration in the light of what would be best for the country generally and not for any particular party or body of men. I sincerely trust that when this resolution comes before the House the First Minister will be able to give very much better reasons for extending the present term of Parliament than he gave the other day when he addressed the House in answer to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition? The only reason that he gave the other day for saying that an extension of Parliament would be a proper thing was that if an election were called during the present year the probabilities would be that a very large portion of our population would be disfranchised because of the number of soldiers at the front. I was surprised to hear him admit the other day that it would be impossible to record the votes of our soldier boys at the front. When, something over a year ago, this matter was before the House and the Bill was passed giving soldiers the right to vote, there was evidence that the Government intended to appeal to the country at an early date. I understand that the ballots were prepared, shipped across to the Old Country and were practically placed in the hands of the gentlemen who were to have control of taking the soldiers' votes at that time. But, what a change has come over the spirit of the dreams of my hon. friends opposite? The hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) who was in charge of the Bill, pointed out in the most emphatic language at that time that it would be absolutely reasonable and quite easy to take the soldiers' votes at the front. Now, a change has come about and they say it would be almost impossible and impracticable to take the soldiers' votes. They say that the soldiers should not be disfranchised and that is one of the reasons given for an extension of the term of Parliament. I am not here to say whether or not I would support an extension of the term of Parliament. The matter will come before the House in the regular way, and I sincerely trust it will then be given the importance that it deserves.

Another matter that has been brought to my attention very frequently, not only during the progress of this debate but during the past year, is the loyalty cry. I had hoped that this cry of loyalty or disloyalty from any political party was at an end, but still the cry is kept up. Our friends on the Government side take to themselves all the credit for being the loyal party in Canada. While I do not wish to detract anything from them in that regard, as one member of this Parliament who has spent some little time in public life and who has always conscientiously supported the party which I believe to be in the interest of the country, although I am not thin-skinned, I do not like to have it cast up to me day after day and time after time by my opponents or by the Tory press that I am disloyal to my King and country or to any portion of the Empire. I sincerely trust that this cry that the Liberal people in Canada are disloyal will cease, because the time is past when any party of any standing in the country should stoop to such low tactics. We have heard a good deal of talk in this House in regard to loyalty or disloyalty of utterances by certain persons in different parts of the country.

I wish to refer for a few minutes to the election which is about to take place in the county of Dorchester, P.Q. Much has been said, and much has been published in the daily press in regard to this election, and I have been somewhat impressed with the very active manner in which the campaign has been carried on by both gentlemen who are contesting the constituency. I was more than surprised —I was simply shocked, on picking up this morning's Citizen, to read the following:

> Ste. Germaine, Que., Jan. 25.—The Liberal organization here sprung a mine tonight when they announced that Hon. P. E. Blondin, who is working at Ste. Rose in the interests of Hon. Albert Sevigny, minister of inland revenue, had been uttering disloyal sentiments in meetings at Ste. Rose.
> The following affidavit was given out tonight by the Liberal chiefs:
>
> We, the undersigned, declare that we heard last night at Ste. Rose, January 24, 1917, the Hon. P. E. Blondin make the following declarations:
>
> 'As for the Allison scandal and others of the same nature, let us suppose that if these thefts have taken place it has not importance for the people of Ste. Rose, because it was English money that was stolen.'
>
> Speaking of the danger of conscription, Mr. Blondin declared: 'Even if conscription was put in force that would mean little to the people of Ste-Rose, because they had only to cross the frontier to get away.'
>
> "(Signed) Dorille Prevost, Valere Lamontagne.
>
> Sworn before me, Justice of the Peace, J. B. Cote, at Ste. Germaine, Dorchester, this 25th day of January, 1917.
>
> (Signed) J. B. Cote, Justice of the Peace.'

There we have a member, not only of this House, but of the Government, going into a constituency in the province of Quebec and making a statement of that nature.

Mr. ROGERS: I would just like to draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that a few moments ago I was telephoned to from Quebec by Mr. Patenaude, who had been asked by Mr. Blondin, who had seen this statement to-day, to give it an unequivocal denial as being absolutely untrue, and to say that he will answer it himself when he comes into the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps my hon. friend has seen the answer which is given by Mr. Blondin and which is published in the Journal of this evening. I hope my hon. friend will read the contradiction.

Mr. ROGERS: It is not his answer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, in the Journal.

Mr. ROGERS: No, it is not.

Mr. COPP: I have not seen the reply in the Journal of this evening. I was going on to say that that is a statement signed by two men and sworn to before a Justice of the Peace in the county of Dorchester. The hon. Minister of Public Works says that Mr. Blondin has given it an unequivocal denial. That answer I will read in order to have it placed upon Hansard, because I do not want to say anything unfair about any one. If, however, the statement in that affidavit is correct, that this gentleman (who occupies a position in the Government and who is in the service of the country and has the secrets of affairs in connection with this matter) has made use of such a statement, it is no wonder that the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) pointed out last night how impossible it would be to expect recruiting to go on when one of the ministers of the Crown would go down to the county of Dorchester in the province of Quebec, and for the purpose of a little, cheap party advantage at an election to be held there on Saturday, would put it into the minds of his compatriots that, instead of signing the National Service cards and doing their part in the war, they should step across the border. Mr. Blondin says:

> Let us suppose that if these thefts have taken place—

He does not say the money was stolen, but by implication he comes very near to admitting that a great deal of the money was stolen; but he asks what difference does it make as it is the money of England. The matter should be taken up at once and some light thrown on it. I will now read the denial of Mr. Blondin.

Mr. ROGERS: Denial?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Alleged denial.

Mr. COPP: I am reading from the Ottawa Evening Journal of January 26:

> Hon. P. E. Blondin, through his lieutenant, Felix Durocher, has issued a reply to an affidavit, which purported to give a report of his remarks at Ste. Rose during a Dorchester county by-election speech on Wednesday night. The affidavit credited Mr. Blondin with contending that the Allison scandal was of no importance to Ste. Rose because it is English money that was stolen, while those who desired to escape conscription could do so by crossing the United States border. Mr. Blondin's explanation follows:
>
> "The statement which has been sworn to by certain Liberals with regard to my utterances are a distortion of my words. I never by any means intented to convey the meaning which they have attached to my speech. Mr. Cannon had been stating in his speeches that the Conservative party had been grafting from the Canadian treasury in connection with munition contracts.
>
> "In my speech at Ste. Rose I explained that, it was not true that the Allison scandal had to do with Canadian money pointing out that the money paid for the shells was the money of the British Government. I did not imply that Allison had done a worthy act, but simply corrected Mr. Cannon's mis-statement. In regard to the conscription matter I told the people of Ste-Rose that I did not believe conscription would be necessary because so many Canadians were eager to go and fight for the cause of liberty and humanity. I added that if any of them were afraid of conscription, if conscription should be passed and they did not want to go to the war, they had a remedy left. They could go across the United States line which is near Ste. Rose and escape military service."

What an exhibition on the part of a minister of the Crown, that when our friends are asking the people throughout 5 p.m. Canada to assist them in having the National Service cards properly signed and returned, he should go into a county where an election is to be held to-morrow and intimate to these people in that county that if they do not want to go to war, and if they fear that these cards will lead to conscription, they can easily step across the border to the United States and thus escape it.

I can well imagine the headlines that we should see in the Journal to-night if the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had made a statement like that, or if such a statement had been made by my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), or my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux). Hon. gentlemen opposite would have raised their hands in holy horror, and would have gnashed their teeth in an effort to rouse and inflame race prejudice. But the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) is the man who makes these statements in the county of Dorchester. Frankly and honestly, I had hoped that in reading the paper this morning I should find that the hon. gentleman had cleared his skirts by making such a denial as the Minister of Public Works stated he had received by telephone. That denial may appear in this evening's papers; I sincerely trust it may.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He admits it.

Mr. COPP: He does practically admit it, from what I have read. Knowing the deep and active interest that the people whom I have the honour to represent have taken in the prosecution of this war, as shown by their self-sacrificing efforts and the utterances of their several organizations and institutions, I have felt it my duty to bring before this House the charges made by the ex-Minister of Militia that there has been bungling by the Government in matters connected with the war, and to demand in their behalf some explanation.

In conclusion, Sir, may I hope that the Government, notwithstanding their many and almost criminal failures in the past, will amend their course for the time they still have the control of Canada's part in the terrible conflict—be it long or short; that they will awake from their lethargy, tear asunder the party shackles that have bound them hand and foot to the manufacturing and other monopolistic interests of this country, and sever the ties of that unholy alliance they have made with the Nationalists in their thirst for power, the most dangerous element that has ever been introduced into the political life of Canada, and that, before it is yet too late, they will show to the world at large, show to Canada, show to the thousands of our heroic sons who have gone to the front to do and die in the cause of liberty and civilization and for the memory of those gallant sons who have fought, bled and died that the flag we love shall still wave; show to the mourning fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, wives and children, who are left, that the Government of Canada, the public men of Canada, are able to rise above small party politics, and thus place our fair Dominion above and beyond further reproach, that she may maintain her position as the greatest of the overseas colonies of the British Empire.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): I had hoped that when the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) finished his address some hon. member on the other side would rise to continue the debate, and I waited for a moment before rising. But it appears that our friends opposite are not inclined to attempt to answer the arguments put forth from this side. This must be for one of two reasons; either they are not able to answer, or they are so anxious to get the debate finished and to get from under the accusations laid against them that they think their best policy is silence—least said, soonest forgotten. In my experience of twelve years in this House, I have never seen anything like this. However, if our friends opposite have nothing to say, we on this side have something to say as to the Government's management of the country's affairs.

In the speech from the Throne three subjects, and three only, are touched upon. One, is the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the life of the Dominion; the second, is the extension of the term of Parliament; and the third is the Imperial Conference. Some hon. members on this side, as well as some on the other side, who have spoken in this debate, have taken the position that we should do something in the way of celebrating this jubilee year of the Dominion. I find myself obliged to differ with those who take that view. Under ordinary conditions such a celebration would be most proper; but in view of the terrible circumstances of the country, with Canada and the Empire engaged in a tremendous struggle, with the end of that struggle not yet in sight, and no means of knowing what will yet be required of us in men and money, in my judgment the people of Canada would be making a great mistake if they undertook any large expenditure, or even a moderate expenditure, in celebrating even so important an occasion as the completion of fifty years of our national life as the Dominion. When this war is over and when conditions are improved, then, it seems to me, will be the time for us to celebrate. Then, I trust, we shall be able to celebrate a victory, such a victory that, for a hundred years at least, if not for all time, we shall be free from war.

I am aware that there has been tacitly more or less of an agreement that there should be no discussion on the question of the extension of the term of Parliament. I do not intend to take up very much time on that question, but there are a few reasons which cause me to believe that the term should not be extended, and those reasons I wish to give briefly. In the first place, there are to-day forty-three vacancies in this House. Nineteen seats are vacant through death or resignation. My right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has offered to the Prime Minister that all these vacancies caused by death should be filled by acclamation. My right hon. leader refused to agree that two members who had been read out of the Conservative party should, if they offered themselves for re-election, be elected by acclamation. He refused also to allow two vacancies in Manitoba which had been created for purely partisan purposes to be filled by acclamation. On that account the Government absolutely refused to accept the suggestion of hon. gentlemen on this side that vacancies caused by death should be filled by acclamation, the person elected being of the same political party as the deceased member had been. That is one reason why I am opposed to an extension. But the chief reason is that an extension would not be fair to the whole western country. Ever since 1911, the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have been entitled to twenty-two additional seats. The representation of the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia in the House at the present time is based on the census of 1901. Saskatchewan and Alberta are in a somewhat different position. Under the Autonomy Bills of 1905 it was provided that a census should be taken in those provinces every five years, so that their representation is based upon the census taken in 1906. Notwithstanding the fact that there are 43 vacant seats in this House, hon. gentlemen opposite contend that there should be another extension of the term of Parliament. While it may be argued that the life of this Parliament should be further extended, any such extension should be made by the people of Canada. We are sitting in this House not as a result of the votes of the people, but through our own votes. A number of men are sitting in this House by their own vote who could not possibly get back to Parliament. Maybe I am one of those members, but if that is so, it is one reason why there should be an election. If I do not represent the views of the people of my constituency, why should I vote myself into Parliament for a second additional year? I am not prepared to say that there should not be any extension of Parliament; I want to hear the question discussed. I want to hear what additional reasons the Government can put forward why there should be an extension of Parliament. Last year we voted for an extension. After that certain investigations were held which did not redound to the credit of the Government or lend it additional strength. Nor do I think that the result of those investigations led any of the people to have increased faith in the men who are running the affairs of Canada to-day. Moreover, before considering the advisability of extending the parliamentary term, I want the Government to bring down information as to what they have done during the past year and as to what they purpose doing during the next year if an extension is granted. When our friends on the opposite side of the House bring down this information and the matter is discussed, they may be able to offer good reasons for an extension; but they will have to be pretty good to satisfy me that such a course is advisable. I do not believe that the outfit sitting on the treasury benches are fit to govern this country in times of peace, let alone in time of war. If the people of Canada by their votes say that they are, well and good; we on this side will have no objections to make. I trust that there will be an appeal to the people, so that it may be ascertained whether the majority of them are in favour of a continuation of what we have had during the past three years.

The Prime Minister gave as one of his reasons why there should not be an election the impossibility of taking the vote of the soldiers at the front. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), who is now leading the House, practically chloroformed the right hon. leader of the Government two years ago when the Soldiers' Vote Bill was passed. What has caused the change of mind on the part of the Prime Minister? If the vote of the soldiers at the front can not be taken, why was that Bill passed? Why were the ballots printed and sent to England, all ready for the springing of an election at any moment? We on this side of the House felt that you could not fairly get the vote of the soldiers, but I said at the time the Bill was passed that if we could get the ballots properly delivered in the different constituencies, we would have no fear of the result. Judging from all the evidence, and particularly from letters received by parents of the boys who are at the front, if the soldiers' ballots are taken and properly delivered to the various constituencies, there will be a vote of three to one against the Government. That is why hon. gentlemen opposite have changed their minds; that is why they want to back out and avoid getting the votes of the soldiers. My genial friend the Minister of Public Works has told us in the House that if he does not know much else—I am using his own words—he knows how to win elections. My hon. friend did have that reputation, and for a while he made it good; but that reputation has been shattered since my hon. friend left a small province to assume a federal role. At that time the price he was paying to get into the Dominion Cabinet was an undertaking to turn over Saskatchewan and Alberta, bound hand and foot, to the Conservative party. Saskatchewan did not respond to his advances; Alberta did not respond to his advances, and even in the province of Manitoba, that he had trained and that he had controlled by the most diabolical political machine that ever had been in existence in the history of this world, even with that machine my hon. friend was not able to hold his own. My hon. friend took a part in the recent local elections in the province of Quebec. He won five seats out of eighty-one. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is five anyway, so we will leave it at that. I am not going to put any blame on my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works for what took place in British Columbia, except to say that our friends in British Columbia, when everything was fine and the flag was flying and waving all the time in Manitoba, looked on him as a big man and a safe man to follow in order to win elections, and they duplicated his political machine in British Columbia, with the result that to-day in British Columbia the influence of my hon. friend and of his friends there has been practically wiped out. In all these provinces that I have referred to Liberal Governments are in power, and there are mighty small Oppositions of our Conservative friends. And that is what awaits my hon. friend and his followers and his colleagues on the treasury benches whenever the people of this country have an opportunity of passing judgment on the manner in which this Government has conducted the affairs of Canada during the past five years. I do not wonder that my hon. friends are anxious to have a further extension of time instead of an election. It is the most natural thing for them to do; if I was in their place I would be very glad to have an extension of time, instead of facing an outraged public. It is natural, but the question is, should it be allowed them? We hear a good deal to-day of a national government. Where is all that talk coming from? Is it coming from the Liberals?

Mr. ROGERS: A good Grit.

Mr. TURRIFF: He is a very good man, and a good man has to be a Grit; he cannot be a really good man unless he is. It is a credit to Ralph Connor that he is not able to follow my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. That redounds to his credit. That is why he stands so high in Manitoba and in the Dominion, that he could not see his way clear to follow the present Dominion Government. But practically all the agitation for a national government is coming from the ranks of my hon. friends opposite. And why should there be an agitation at this time for a national government? For a government of business men? Why, practically all the business men of the country are in either the one party or the other. Does my hon. friend mean to say that in a population of seven million or eight million people, half of them Conservatives, he could not pick out more than twelve or fifteen men in his own party if a business government were wanted? Or if a national government were wanted, could not my hon. friends opposite pick out from among their own friends enough men to make their Government a good government? But in order to make a business government, or a national government, or a decently good government, it would be necessary to replace fourteen of the fifteen members of the present Government by new men. Is it possible that I have come so near the truth that it pleases even my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen)? I have left that one so that each member of the Government can take it to himself that he is the man who should remain in the Government, and that fourteen others should be selected. I know that my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie naturally would feel that he was the one, and I will do my hon. friend the credit of saying that, leaving out little pecularities such as being a great word-splitting acrobat, he has the brains, and if he would only use them right, as his conscience would direct—that is if he has a conscience, which sometimes I doubt—then I think he might be the man who would select the fourteen to form a national government. What does this national government mean? I do not know whether my hon. friend who is now leading the House (Mr. Rogers) would be called upon to make the selection, but if he did, what would the national government be like? But taking it at its best, allowing that in the selection of a new Government, a national government, a business government, great care was exercised by my hon. friends opposite, it would be, in my judgment, neither more nor less than a government of the big interests of Canada. There is no question about that. We have heard mentioned some names of men likely to be called to a government of that description, and from what I can judge it would be a government whose chief duty would be to so place the taxation of Canada on the poor and the middle classes of Canada that the big business interests and the millionaires would escape. Have you noticed that the direct taxation legislation that was passed last year was so drafted that it hit certain men, hit them pretty hard, but left others scot free? I do not think the legislation that was passed last year providing for direct taxation hit one of the multi-millionaires sitting on the treasury benches. If you had a national government selected by some one of the present Government, you would have very much the same result. Who is to select this national government if one is to be formed? There must be somebody in charge and, unless we have an election, it would have to be the party opposite, so far as I can see, and so you would simply get another party government. I do not doubt that you would get better men, because I think it is a moral impossibility to put in fourteen new men and not have a better government, I care not whether any care was exercised in the selection or not, it would be an improvement; there is absolutely no question about that.

But would it be the class of Government that the people of Canada want at the present time? Have the big interests done so much for the country during the past two or three years? They have been making money by the millions, the tens of millions, and the hundreds of millions out of the people of Canada. Have they been moderate in their demands for profits? Not to any extent. There have been one or two exceptions. We have had a few instances of what these men are making. Take the Montreal Ammunition Company. As stated by my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) yesterday, that company paid a dividend of 900 per cent for one year. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, the Government allowing any set of men to put in $100 for a share, and during one year take out $900 in dividends, and leave $600 more as a rest account, thus robbing the people of Canada and of Great Britain. Imagine this Government allowing them to do that, and not even taxing them any more than they tax the ordinary honest business man. Why should not these men who are making millions not be taxed as they are in Great Britain? The Prime Minister on his return from a visit to Great Britain stated that the whole resources of Canada in men and material would be devoted to the winning of the war, and in the face of that statement the Government are allowing a few of their personal friends to rake out money from the pockets of the people of Canada and Great Britain by the tens of millions of dollars, while they treat them exactly the same, so far as taxation is concerned, as they treat the ordinary honest business man who does a legitimate business.

Let us take another instance. A couple of years ago, a firm in Hamilton got a contract for shells. They filled that contract; they had a year's work at it, and they made a lot of money. The owner of the factory went to the Government and said: I have made as much money out of that contract as one man ought to have; I am satisfied, and am willing now to turn the factory over to the Government so that they may run it and supply the shells for the Canadian and British troops at cost. One would think that that was a pretty fair and reasonable offer, but did the Government accept it? No, they refused that offer. Why? Because, the Minister of Labour stated it was not in the interests of the country for the Government to go into competition with private industry. In order to allow their party friends to take millions of dollars from the people of Canada—because in this, as in everything else connected with the war, practically everything had to go to their partisan friends—the Government refused to take over that factory and run it. The result was that the gentleman who made that offer was compelled to continue the work, although he did not want to go on, and during the second year he made a profit of $750,000. As he had stated the year before that he did not want that money, he handed it over to the Government, but why should the Government allow any one to make money to that extent out of the agony of the people of Canada? Why does the Government not come forward now and take over a lot of this work, make the shells, fuses, and other munitions of war at cost price, and supply them to the soldiers of Canada and Great Britain at the cheapest possible price? That would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, to be the proper and business thing to do; but our hon. friends opposite have absolutely refused to move in any way at all, to do anything to prevent this extravagant waste of money, or to help out the Empire and Canada by supplying the munitions of war at a fair and reasonable price.

Mr. BURNHAM: Who sets the prices?

Mr. TURRIFF: Perhaps my hon. friend will tell me.

Mr. BURNHAM: I am asking you: You seem to know all about it.

Mr. TURRIFF: If I did not know more about it than my hon. friend I would not interrupt a speaker.

Mr. BURNHAM: That may be wit, but there is not much sense in it.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will my hon. friend tell me who sets the prices? He has been parading over at the front—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. TURRIFF: Well, he paraded in England, and paid a visit to the front, and he ought to be able to tell me who fixes the prices.

Mr. BURNHAM: You are making the speech; I am not.

Mr. TURRIFF: Then allow me to make it. I am trying to make the speech, but my hon. friend undertook to help me out.

Mr. BURNHAM: You are not succeeding.

Mr. TURRIFF: I think I am as capable of making my speech as my hon. friend is of helping.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. TURRIFF: Let me remind my hon. friend of what the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said the other day about metaphysics. I should have thought that that would keep my hon. friend quiet for a little longer than two days.

Mr. BURNHAM: My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. TURRIFF: With the evidence before us of what these munition manufacturers are making, why does the Government not tax them? They tax the honest business man twenty-five per cent on all he makes over seven per cent or ten per cent, as the case may be; but these munition men who are making money by the millions and tens of millions do not pay any more. Why does the Government not come forward and do as they do in Great Britain, as Lloyd George has done; as the Republic of France has done, and say to these manufacturers: we will allow you a certain percentage and after that we will take fifty or seventy-five per cent. If these munition manufacturers, who are making tens of millions of dollars, had to give up seventy-five per cent of what remained to them over ten per cent, it would amount to a very large sum of money and would help to relieve the ordinary business man who is heavily taxed.

Let us take another concern that is making money hand over fist. The other day the hon. the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), who is not in his seat just now—I wish he were—made an interesting statement with reference to one of the big steel companies of Canada. He said that this company, which has tens of millions of dollars' worth of common stock, on account of which not one single cent of money ever was in the treasury of the company, in addition to paying their fixed charges in the shape of interest on their bonds, dividends on their preferred stock, deferred dividends, and dividends on common stock, were to-day piling up at least a million dollars a month as a reserve fund. That is all made by turning out material for the manufacture of munitions of war. Why should not a company like that be taxed. They were given bonuses to the extent of tens of millions of dollars by this country, and now they take advantage of the fact that the people are at war to charge such prices that they can pay all these dividends that I have mentioned and put by on rest account a million dollars a month. That is what my hon. friends opposite are allowing to go on, not only in reference to the companies that I have mentioned, but in reference to dozens and scores and hundreds of companies who are profiting in the same way. They will not lift a hand to make these men pay more than the ordinary business man is paying. Is it any wonder that the people of the country are tired of that kind of rule? It is to be expected, and in view of this fact I think it would be a mistake if this Government should be given any particular extension of time. What the country wants is a sharp and strict account of how the Government are conducting its affairs. My hon. friend (Mr. Copp), who has just taken his seat, has read some correspondence between the hon. ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) and this Government, in which the ex-minister has made some fifteen or twenty direct charges of malfeasance against his colleagues, and my hon friends on the treasury benches say nothing about it, do not answer the argument, have nothing to say. I think, and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me, being a pretty fair man, that this Parliament should appoint a committee of the House to investigate the charges that their own colleague has made against these hon. gentlemen.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TURRIFF: Mr. Speaker, the subject that I wish to deal with now for a short time is the deliberate attempt that is being made in the Conservative press throughout Canada to connect the Nationalist party and Messrs. Bourassa and Lavergne with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and I challenge the Government to bring forward one iota of proof of any occasion before or since the war began that my honoured leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, has ever been guilty of favouring any of the policies advocated by Mr. Bourassa and the Nationalists who are to day members of this Government. I defy my hon. friends on the Government benches to point out a single instance in which a charge of that kind can be truthfully made. In spite of that fact the Conservative press, throughout Ontario particularly and in some parts of the West, is trying to connect Sir Wilfrid Laurier with the Nationalist party. In order to make my remarks clear, as a large part of them will consist of extracts and editorials from the Nationalist and Conservative press, I am going to read those extracts and also what I have to say on the matter. Hon. members will remember that the alliance between the Nationalists and the Conservative party started over the naval policy of the Liberal Government, and that in the year 1909 the House of Commons, Conservatives and Liberals alike, agreed on a policy to build a Canadian navy, building the ships in Canada and manning them by Canadians. In the year 1910, the Liberal Government came forward with a naval policy, and let me remark here that the present Government is to-day advertising for men to man light cruisers. What for? To send over to Britain? No, to defend the Canadian coast. The advertisement is to-day appearing in the Canadian papers, and I have a copy of it on my desk. In 1910, however, there was a change, and gentlemen on the other side of the House had adopted a new policy, and in so doing they were brought into alliance with their particular friends, Messrs. Bourassa and Lavergne.

Mr. BURNHAM: They are your friends, then?

Mr. TURRIFF: I think my hon. friend from Peterborough wants another story, but I will not waste any more time with him to-night.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Send him over to France.

Mr. TURRIFF: What position did Mr. Bourassa take? This change occurred over the resolution of 1909 and the Act of 1910, and although various excuses have been made, no satisfactory reason founded upon sound public policy has ever been given for it. The actual cause for this change of heart is to be found in the close connection of Borden and Bourassa.

It would be indeed surprising were it not true, that, notwithstanding their professions of loyalty and devotion to the Mother Country, their professed willingness to sacrifice all for the flag, their burning zeal to consecrate themselves and everything else for the upbuilding and maintenance of the Empire, the hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Government side would seize the first opportunity to form an alliance with the very men whom now they pretend to repudiate and whose principles they now pretend to oppose in the most violent manner. What was it that caused this change of heart on the part of the Premier and his followers? There can be but one answer, namely, their alliance with Bourassa and the adoption of his views.

What were, and, so far as we know, are Bourassa's views? The following articles were incorporated in the platform of the Nationalist party, of which Mr. Henri Bourassa was the head and front, and were readopted at a meeting of the National League held at Eustache, Que., in July, 1910:

(a) No participation by Canada in Imperial wars outside her territory.
(b) To spurn any attempt at recruiting for British troops.
(c) To oppose the establishment in Canada of a naval school with the help and for the benefit of Imperial authorities.
(d) Control over our militia and military colleges in time of war as in time of peace and for the defence of our territory exclusively. Refusal to grant leave of absence to any militia officer in order that he may take part in any Imperial war.

Is this not strong and clear enough? Is there any doubt of the attitude of the Nationalist party? Can any one reading the articles of their Nationalist platform come to any other conclusion than that there was to be no mingling and no commingling with Great Britain in wars outside Canadian territory. Such then was the position of the Nationalists. What was and is the position of the party now in power? What does Mr. Bourassa say? Let me refer to his paper, Le Devoir, of May 29, 1913, in which issue Mr. Bourassa writes as follows:

During the session of 1910-1911 two leaders of the Conservative party requested that I meet them at the House of a mutual friend of ours. The envoys opened as follows:

The Nationalists say they are fighting, as we do, the Liberal Government, but their stand upon reciprocity embarrasses us, the Conservative party, to a great extent. Were we (the Conservatives and Nationalists) to unite our efforts primarily against reciprocity, it is quite possible that an understanding satisfactory to both parties could be arrived at on the naval question since we are one on the point of popular consultation. If you press the naval question in Quebec it may provoke a display of loyalism in the extremist wing of our party. If reciprocity be but a subordinate issue with you, the difference between us might broaden still more, for the sole benefit of the common foe. At the time of a general election candidates will come forward who, while opposing the naval law will support reciprocity; yet others indifferent about reciprocity will come out against the naval policy of both parties.

This would be a puzzling situation for us. If we support the independent candidates, we shall be open to the charge of playing a game. On the other hand if we bring forward a third man—a straight Conservative—the Government candidate will get in between.

Mine was a decisive answer. Mr. Monk and his group have had support because of their pledge to oppose the naval policy of both parties until submitted for the peoples' verdict. Since Drummond-Arthabaska, Mr. Borden has come nearer Mr. Monk. He has practically endorsed his plan of a plebiscite. This is the only ground upon which we can meet. Not being a party we will not bring forward any candidate, but we will heartily support any man whether Liberal or Conservative, pro-reciprocitist or anti-reciprocitist, provided he pledges himself to resist any plan of direct or indirect participation in Imperial wars outside of Canada, or at least oppose such measure until submitted for popular verdict by way of a plebiscite; the welfare of either party is for us of no moment. It is up to Mr. Borden and his lieutenants to decide whether to secure the seat for a ministerial (Liberal) candidate by entering a three-cornered field, or suffer the election of the candidate whom we shall support.

I have no doubt that the High Priest and Sanhedrin accepted the situation, since the fight was carried out according to our terms.

This is the story as told, so far, by Mr. Bourassa, and he is the one to know. He was the leader of the Nationalists, exercising great influence over certain of his fellow-citizens, recognized by the Conservative party as an important factor in a general election, and as one whose support was worth securing. We have had in this Parliamentary term many instances of peculiar deals—horse deals, boot deals, shell deals, etc., etc.—but while these are bad, while they cause us to wonder if this Government has lost all sense of rectitude in administration, is it not, after all, a more serious, a lamentable, state of affairs to see a gang of conspirators bartering away the principles of a party for the sake of power?

But Mr. Bourassa is not through yet. In his paper, Le Devoir, of May 30, 1913, he continues:—

As elections drew nearer we have ample proof that the Conservative leaders were quite satisfied with the situation which the Nationalist campaign had forced upon them. The Monk group came out as the "Autonomist" party with its complete organization, headquarters and committees distinct from the Conservative party proper.

The Tory General Committee allotted the Autonomist party most of the ridings in the province of Quebec, saving for themselves the English-speaking counties of the Eastern Townships, besides Pontiac, Argenteuil and three Montreal divisions, St. Antoine, St. Anne and St. Laurent. It was distinctly agreed that with these exceptions, Mr. Monk had exclusive charge of the whole province with the right to accept or refuse prospective candidates; with the understanding that such candidates as were approved of must fight as best they could the Naval Law and the "No less nefarious policy" of Mr. Borden; that on reciprocity they could take whatever stand they chose, and that they should nevertheless receive from the Conservative party their wholehearted support. The Conservative party made use of its funds, and indirectly fostered the chances of such candidates as had declared themselves opposed to both policies.

On June 2, 1913, Mr. Bourassa, in his paper, states:—

The most obvious proof that the Conservative party had surrendered to Nationalist sentiment was to be found in the Eastern Townships. Throughout that district, with the exception of Drummond-Arthabaska, no Nationalist or "Autonomist" candidates had been brought out. He took no part in the fight. Local committees and the electors generally took upon themselves to spread our principles. Such favour had Nationalism gained in public opinion, that Conservative candidates, both English and French, had seen fit, willingly or not, to grant our doctrine considerable sway.

Such was the bargain. How was it carried out, according to the disclosures of this unholy alliance? According to Mr. Bourassa a manifesto was issued, which was eventually signed by all the Conservative candidates. This peculiar document is as follows:—

I declare that if elected on the 21st of September I shall oppose and vote against any Prime Minister of whatever party who will endeavour to maintain the Naval Law as adopted in 1910, without beforehand giving the people of Canada an opportunity to express their opinion thereon by means of a special referendum. I shall, if elected, see to it that the rights of the French-speaking Catholic minority are recognized and respected everywhere as are the rights of the English-speaking minority in the province of Quebec. I endorse separate schools, recognition of the French language, etc., and etc.

One wonders how such declaration on the part of their fellow-Conservatives will appeal to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), the member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), and to many others of the same fraternity. But it appears that the kindly offices of Mr. Bourassa were not to be confined to Quebec. He was invited, so he alleges, to deliver some addresses in Ontario and by no less a person than the Hon. Frank Cochrane, the present Minister of Railways and Canals. In order to make sure that his visit to Ontario would not be unwelcome and that the invitation was made in good faith and endorsed by what he considered to be responsible parties, Mr. Bourassa received exceedingly strong endorsations of his Nationalistic policy. From two Ontario gentlemen who were elected on the 21st of September, 1911, the following messages were received:—

Mattawa, Ont., Sept. 8, 1911.

Chas. McCrea,
Sudbury, Ont.

I certainly am opposed to reciprocity and will support request for repeal of Naval policy and a referendum to the people no matter who is Premier.

George Gordon.

Providence Bay, Sept. 8, 1911.

Chas. McCrae,
Sudbury, Ont.

I am opposed to Reciprocity pact. I am opposed to Naval policy of Liberal Government. I will support request for repeal of same, and referendum to the people on Naval question no matter who is Premier.

W. R. Smyth.

Fortified by these assurances of the fellow-feeling that existed so far as these two gentlemen were concerned, Mr. Bourassa visited Northern Ontario and when in the district of Nipissing received from Mr. Gordon the following effusive welcome:—

The Liberals are blaming us for bringing the Nationalist leader here. I am willing to take full responsibility and to express my full admiration for Bourassa. I have no use for the Navy and think Reciprocity is a baneful policy. I give Monsieur Bourassa the keys of the district.

So successful had his mission been in Ontario that even Mr. Cochrane, so Mr. Bourassa tells us, "usually very shy of his compliments, has since done me the honour of telling me that my arguments had made a deep impression, deeper still among English-speaking than French-speaking people." It is stated also by Mr. Bourassa that:—

One of the prominent members of the Conservative party came to his office carrying under his arm the voters' lists of all the Eastern Townships. He paid into our hands subscriptions to Le Devoir for thousands and thousands of electors. We asked nothing but the regular subscription price, deducting therefrom the ordinary subscription paid to agents. We thus enjoyed the satisfaction of using Tory money to circulate the good Nationalist gospel everywhere.

[Mr. Turriff.]

It will be interesting to know the name of his prominent Conservative, who, out of the intense love for the principles of Mr. Bourassa and the Nationalists, poured out his treasure for the circulation of this so-called valuable Nationalist literature. One wonders whether the member for St. Antoine Division, Montreal (Sir Herbert Ames) has any personal or other knowledge of this. He should know. Having established himself as a magic-lantern artist, a dispenser of patriotic funds, and a contributor to the boot and shoe supplies for the Canadian soldiers—surely he can tell us something about the circulation of Bourassa's Nationalist paper.

The campaign of 1911 resulted in the return of a large number of Nationalists from Quebec, and three from Ontario, namely: W. R. Smyth, the present member for East Algoma; Geo. Gordon, for Nipissing, and, following Mr. Gordon, who was transferred to the Senate, Hon. Frank Cochrane, now Minister of Railways and Canals.

In the ordinary course of events the present Prime Minister chose his ministers, and upon the formation of the Cabinet the light is thrown by the Toronto Telegram, certainly not very hostile to the present Government—in the following language:—

The process of Cabinet-making was in the final stages of its completion when the Nationalists proceeded to tell Canada's Premier "who's who and what's what."

The Nationalists' demand, with all the weight of Henry Bourassa's authority behind it, was, briefly:

Department of Public Works for F. D. Monk.

Department of Inland Revenue for W. B. Nantel.

Portfolio of Postmaster General for L. P. Pelletier.

No Quebec Protestant to hold a portfolio in the Cabinet.

The ultimatum failed to bend R. L. Borden to the purposes of the Nationalists. The Premier suggested that he would complete the making of his Cabinet in the spirit of justice to everybody. Whereupon the Nationalists departed, supplementing their ultimatum with words to this effect:

"You will either meet the demands of our ultimatum, or you will meet Parliament with a majority of eight to nine, the reduction being due to the nineteen Nationalists voting with Laurier."

The Nationalist gloatingly betrays the truth that the Nationalists were sent for on behalf of R. L. Borden, and they got everything they asked for in the allotment of portfolios, because the Premier of Canada weakened under the pressure of a pale bluff that the Quebec Nationalists would have never dared to make good.

Whatever influences prevailed upon the Prime Minister in the selection of his colleagues may never be fully known, but at any rate very positive statements have been made by Mr. Lavergne that he was asked to name the French-Canadian representatives in the Cabinet. Suffice it to say that three pronounced Nationalists were chosen, Monk, Pelletier and Nantel, as well as the sub rosa Nationalists, the present Minister of Justice and the overseas Minister of Militia.

As a result of the disagreement with his colleagues on the $35,000,000 ship-building proposition submitted by this Government, Mr. Monk resigned. His place was taken by Mr. Coderre, a pronounced Nationalist. Mr. Pelletier, through ill-health, it is alleged, resigned and went to the Bench. Mr. Nantel departed this life as a public man and became a member of the Railway Commission. Mr. Coderre, evidently tiring of the troubles and manner of departmental life, found a haven of rest in the calm and serene atmosphere of the judiciary. The vacancies so created were filled by the Hon. Mr. Blondin, Hon. Mr. Casgrain and Hon. Mr. Patenaude, two of them pronounced Nationalists. The recent death of the late lamented Mr. Casgrain created another vacancy, and this has been filled by the translation of the Hon. Mr. Sevigny from the Speakership to the Department of Inland Revenue. Throughout all of these appointments, amid all the Cabinet changes since 1911, the Nationalists have been recognized without fail.

Now then let us deal with the present Nationalist representatives in the Government. What is Mr. Blondin's record? Speaking at St. Louis de Blandford on 25th of October, 1910, he said:

> You are intimidating the people in waving the English flag and adding that we must contribute always and everywhere to the defence of that protector of our constitutional liberties; but we will not be made to forget that in 1837 it was necessary to bore holes in it in order to breathe the atmosphere of liberty.
>
> The English have never done anything for the French-Canadians. We do not owe them anything. French-Canadians have nothing to care about the opinion of the other provinces upon this naval question. They can and must settle the questions which concern them without consulting others. Those very ones who disembowelled their forefathers on the Plains of Abraham ask of you to-day to be slaughtered for their sake.
>
> England has gone so far as to grind down the colonies as did Imperial Rome of old.
>
> The only liberties which we enjoy have been snatched. England has not conquered Canada for love or to plant the cross of Christ as did France, but to establish trading posts and make money. She has so wed the world with hatred, quarrels and wars. We have had enough of England and the English.
>
> Those who butchered your forefathers on the Plains of Abraham ask to-day that you sacrifice your lives for their sakes. We have had enough of England and the British.
>
> Our liberties, we have wrested them from England, and we owe her nothing.
>
> Canada owes nothing to England. The British did not conquer us for love, nor to plant the cross of Christ, as did France; and we are kept under her flag for the advantage of the trade. She benefited by her colony of Canada. What do we owe her?

Mr. Patenaude, now Secretary of State, was chairman of the meeting when the Nationalist party was formed, and at St. Remi, in the province of Quebec, he declared:

> We (the Nationalist party) hold nothing in common with either of the political parties.

And last, but not least, we have the latest acquisition to the Government, the Hon. Mr. Sevigny, Minister of Inland Revenue, declaring:

> The Laurer Cabinet is a Cabinet of Imperialists who want to sacrifice Canada's interests and plunge us into wars with which we have nothing to do. The Navy Bill is an attempt by Ontario and the provinces of the West to coerce Quebec and enslave our people forever. What has England ever done for you? She has no need of your help. She is strong enough to defend herself. Laurier's ideal is to make you the vassals of the majority in the West. You must protest against helping England in her wars; unless you do, conscription will come next.

This, then, is the record of the connection of the Conservative party of this country with the Nationalist party. Examine it as you may, turn it as you will, you cannot get away from the outstanding fact that throughout the whole chapter there was a pre-arranged plan, that no matter what form the action took these two parties were to coalesce and work together for the one common object of destroying the Liberal party and the Liberal leader. But at the same time the Nationalist party had to save the situation as best they could on the naval question, and, though it was with a great deal of reluctance, as Mr. Sevigny is reported to have said recently, it was decided to drop the Laurier Naval Act of 1910, cease working for a Canadian navy, and in its place adopt the makeshift of a $35,000,000 contribution to Imperial defence.

Something has been said about the lack of recruiting in Quebec. How can you expect recruiting when practically every member of the Quebec representation in the Cabinet is pledged against assistance to the Empire outside of Canada? How can you expect this Government to assist materially in winning this war when from one-third to one-half of the Cabinet are opposed in principle to participation in the Empire's wars such as we are engaged in at the present time? Let the Conservative party, if it aspires to be credited with the loyalty that it claims, purge itself of these un-Canadian alliances and strike out on higher and better lines.

That, Mr. Speaker, is an account of the arrangement made between the Nationalists and this Government, set out in sequence and in proper chronological order. In view of these facts, one wonders at the temerity of the Conservative newspapers throughout the country which are trying to make the people believe that the right hon. leader of the Opposition is a friend and associate of Bourassa and the Nationalists. I challenge the Government or any member of it to produce one tittle of evidence that such is the case. That policy is being pursued in the province of Ontario but, thank God, it does not cut much ice in the West. People there know better; they are too broad-minded for that. Whatever faults may be attributed to my right hon. leader, you do not hear the people in my province saying that he should be voted against because he is a Frenchman or a Roman Catholic. You do not hear much of that in the province of Saskatchewan. Of course, that policy may work in some places, but I would be sorry to think that many men in any part of Canada would say that a man against whom nothing can be charged along those lines should be kept from coming back to power simply because he was born of French blood and that his parents are Roman Catholics. That is something that we all ought to frown down upon. Any man who has the ability to occupy a public position has a right to come forward and do so. I challenge hon. gentlemen to point to anything that reflects on the right hon. leader of the Opposition, either in respect of his position as leader of the Government for fifteen or sixteen years, or as leader of the Opposition for many years before he came into power and during the last five years since he went out of office.

It may be said by some that this alliance to which I have referred between Bourassa and Lavergne and the Nationalists generally, and the Conservative Government now in power, is a matter of ancient history; that it happened four or five or six years ago. That is true, but the connection has been close ever since; the Nationalists are still Ministers of the Government, and they sit on the treasury benches to-day. But let us see if the connection has ceased altogether. Let me give something that has occurred within the last two or three days that surely brings it up to date. In Thursday's issue of the newspaper L'Evenement, the chief Government organ in the Quebec district, we find that the front page displays in large type various quotations from Le Devoir signed by Henri Bourassa, touching on Sir Wilfrid Laurier's attitude towards participation in Great Britain's war. For instance, there is printed the quotation which Mr. Bourassa gives from one of Sir Wilfrid's speeches as follows:

> If England were, I will not say in danger—these are the words of Sir Wilfrid—but simply at grips with one or two or several of the great powers of Europe, the Prime Minister could demand, not thirty-five millions, but two, three, or four times thirty-five millions. We would put all the resources of Canada at the disposal of England; there would not be a single discordant voice.

What does Mr. Cannon think of that?—asks L'Evenement. Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that neither Mr. Cannon nor any other Liberal, and mighty few Conservatives in the whole Dominion of Canada, will raise one word of objection to what my right hon. leader said on that occasion. The words I have quoted of my right hon. leader I am proud to quote, and I am proud to stand behind the man who uttered those words at the time he uttered them, and who has stood by those words from the first day he entered public life until this moment, and has never gone back on them.

Just let Great Britain leave things as they are in Canada. We do not want to be tied any closer to the Empire. Could you have Canada do any better than she has been doing? If we are doing all right, why try to make changes? But there is the policy enunciated by my right hon. leader, and now Bourassa comes forward in L'Evenement in support of Sevigny, who is appearing before his electors to-morrow and who charges the Liberal party and my right hon. leader with being loyal to Great Britain, and asks the people of Dorchester to vote against Mr. Cannon because the Liberal leader has said that he stands by Great Britain, stands by the Empire, and is ready to put up every bit of the resources of Canada to keep the Empire intact, to keep Canada a portion of the British Empire, and to preserve the freedom not only of the British Empire, but of every small nation in the world besides.

Why was this alliance made between the Government and Bourassa? Why is it being kept up at the present time? Now, Mr.

Speaker, what I am going to say now I say feeling the responsibility of my words, knowing what I am talking about; and I make this charge against this Government, and I make this charge more particularly against the Prime Minister who is the responsible man, that this alliance has been kept in force, that three Nationalists have been kept in this Government, deliberately, on purpose, and for the one and only purpose of preventing recruiting in the province of Quebec. I make that charge against the Government. In order that there may be no mistake I charge the Government with deliberately maintaining—

Mr. WRIGHT: Shame.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Shame on your friends.

Mr. TURRIFF: Shame on you (Mr. Wright), you are perfectly right, you ought to be ashamed and I am glad you are.

Mr. WRIGHT: You ought to be ashamed

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind hon. gentlemen that there is only one method of address permitted in the Chamber, and that is through the Chair.

Mr. TURRIFF: I say that for no other purpose, the Prime Minister has kept in his Government these three Nationalists—disloyal Canadians, disloyal Britishers—simply and solely and purposely to hinder recruiting in the province of Quebec. Why, Mr. Speaker? Simply because my hon. friend who is leading the House (Mr. Rogers) and my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) know that they have no possible chance of being returned to power on their record as the administrators of the Government of Canada, and secondly that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his minister of elections know perfectly well that on their administration of Canada's part in the war they have no possible chance of being returned to power; and therefore they had to seek about for some other means that would bring them to power; and they have kept up this Nationalist arrangement, as I said a moment ago, for the sole and only purpose of being able to carry on the next election as a racial fight, bringing into line, so far as they could, all the English-speaking provinces in Canada, the eight English-speaking provinces, bringing them up and making the fight English against French in the province of Quebec. That is what I charge against the Government, and that is what the Government will have to clear themselves from. Why, Mr. Speaker, look at the Conservative press throughout the province of Ontario. They openly advocate it. You cannot talk with half a dozen Conservatives in this city or any other place that three, four or five of them will not tell you that is going to be the next fight. They make no bones about that, they do not hide it. They simply say: The bilingual question; Quebec is not recruiting—and that is going to be the bone of contention during the election.

Mr. Speaker, I was born and brought up in the province of Quebec. I am proud of the province of my birth. I am not here to defend the French people of Quebec; they are well able to defend themselves. I am not here to say that they have recruited in as large numbers as they should, but, in the name of Heaven, how can they be expected to recruit in the face of what I have brought forward in this House tonight, in the face of what has been said by my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil); in the face of what was said only last night by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux)? How could you expect recruiting to be good in the province of Quebec under the leadership it has had, and under the circumstances, and in view of what has been done to prevent recruiting. It has been said that Quebec has not recruited as largely as Ontario, and that is made a terrible crime against Quebec. As I said a moment ago, I think they should have put up more men; but you might as well say that Ontario has not recruited as largely as Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta or British Columbia—and she has not, not by any manner of means. Is that a particular crime?

I will tell you why Ontario has not recruited so well as the western provinces. The reason is that we have more men of British birth, Englishmen, Irishmen, Welshmen and Scotsmen in these provinces than in Ontario. We may laugh sometimes at the young Englishman who comes out to this country, and who knows nothing about it, but I take off my hat to the remittance man for what he has done since the war began. The moment hostilities broke out he did not stand on his going; he immediately went to the nearest recruiting place and enlisted. The reason why the proportion of recruits has been so big in Saskatchewan, in Alberta, in Manitoba, and in British Columbia, the reason why it has been longer than in the province of Ontario is that in these provinces there is a larger proportion of British born people. I say, Mr. Speaker, without fear of successful contradiction, that if you take the rural population of Canadian born people you will not find so much difference in the number of recruits in the different provinces. Do not misunderstand me. I say that if you could separate the Canadian born men in the English-speaking provinces the proportion of recruits would be larger, I know—and I am glad of it—but at the same time the difference would not be nearly so great as a good many people on both sides of politics seem to imagine. I do not want to defend Quebec; I do not need to do so, but I want to put the matter fairly and reasonably.

I am going to say something else that, perhaps, my hon. friends on the other side of the House may not like. I am sorry to say it, but I am going to say it all the same, because I believe it to be true. We hear a good deal to-day about what has been said down in Dorchester by a hot-blooded young Irish French-Canadian, and it has been twisted and distorted in the Tory papers until I believe very little of it. However, we are going to have that young man here next week, and he will make his own explanations.

Hon. Mr. ROGERS: No chance.

Mr. TURRIFF: This young Irish-Frenchman says he is a true Britisher through and through. We have heard a good deal of what he has been saying, but we have not heard anything from the other side of the House about the intimation made by the Prime Minister, the right hon. Sir R. L. Borden, last spring to the representatives of the Ontario Recruiting Committee, that if he had his way there would be no more recruiting in Canada, and that the attention of the Canadian people should be turned to the development of their industries. That intimation, Mr. Speaker, was followed by a direct falling off in recruiting from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: Who does the hon. gentleman say used these words?

Mr. TURRIFF: I will say it over again for the benefit of my hon. friend, because I want to make it absolutely clear. I said that we had heard a good deal about what a young Irish-Frenchman, Mr. Cannon, had been saying, but that we had not heard anything from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House about the intimation that had been made by Sir Robert Borden. I want to get this correctly. We have not heard about the intimation given by the Prime Minister last spring to the representatives of the Ontario Recruiting Committee in Toronto that if he had his way there would be no more recruiting in Canada, and that the attention of the Canadian people should be turned to the development of their industries. That was followed by a direct falling off in recruiting from one end of Canada to the other.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman give his authority for ascribing these words to the Prime Minister?

Mr. TURRIFF: If my hon. friend, who is a Minister of the Crown, will appoint a committee I will give my authority and bring him forward, and I will make it good.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Come on.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does the hon. gentleman really think—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BURNHAM: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TURRIFF: Certainly.

Mr. BURNHAM: Does he really think it fair to make that charge; is it his code of ethics to refuse to give his authority?

Mr. TURRIFF: I have offered my hon. friend the Solicitor General, that if he will appoint a committee I will bring forward my authority. What more can my hon. friend from Peterborough want?

Mr. BURNHAM: A committee on lunacy.

Mr. TURRIFF: What more can my hon. friend want? The Government now know how they can get the authority, and they can act accordingly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why will the hon. gentleman not give it now?

Mr. TURRIFF: Simply because I do not choose to satisfy the curiosity of my hon. friend at this moment; that is all. Let my hon. friend, who is one of the big men of the Government come forward with his committee, and I will get all the information he wants, and more than he wants along that line.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend is surely not ashamed of his authority; he is surely not ashamed of the newspaper from which he is reading, if he is reading from a newspaper.

Mr. TURRIFF: Did I hear my hon. friend rightly?——

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I take it that my hon. friend is reading from some newspaper report of the meeting he speaks of. Surely he is not ashamed to give the name of the newspaper.

Mr. TURRIFF: I always like to satisfy a moderate man when I can, and I am going to satisfy my hon. friend right now by telling him that I am not reading from any newspaper.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. TURRIFF: I said a moment ago that the reason for the alliance between the Nationalists and the Government was that the Government were perfectly satisfied. I know that my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, will in his heart agree with me because, as he says, he knows something about elections.

I suppose the Government felt that they were not able to carry the country on what I might call their domestic record—their record in connection with carrying on the affairs of Canada. You will remember that the present Prime Minister thought that the late Government were extremely extravagant, and promised all sorts of economies. I am not going into that question to-night, because I have taken up a lot of time already and that question can, and will come up for discussion later on. But, I may say, shortly, that the record of the Borden Government from September, 1911, to the present time has been a record of broken promises from first to last with one single exception. Of all planks in the platform issued by the leader of the Government prior to the election of 1911 there has only been one carried out. Therefore, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his friends know perfectly well that it would be ridiculous to appeal to the country on their record, or on the plea that they have carried out their promises. Have they done any better in carrying out the part which Canada has taken in the war? I heard my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) speak about the two hundred lieutenant-colonels who were in England, who have been in England from the time that the first contingent went over, who are there yet drawing salaries and incurring expenses costing the country about $1,000,000 per annum, and the country is getting absolutely nothing for it. My hon. friend only dealt with the lieutenant-colonels. What about the majors? We have some of them back, I see.

Mr. BRADBURY: I would like to know where the hon. gentleman gets his information when he says that there are 200 lieutenant-colonels in England. That means two hundred battalions and 200,000 men. It is absolutely absurd.

Mr. TURRIFF: We have lieutenant-colonels who are not with battalions.

Mr. BRADBURY: That is rot.

Mr. TURRIFF: We have more lieutenant-colonels than battalions over there.

Mr. BRADBURY: No, you have not.

Mr. TURRIFF: Yes, we have; my hon. friend is not such a good military man that he knows everything. Very many battalions went over with lieutenant-colonels at their head and these lieutenant-colonels are still in England. The lieutenant-colonel who went over with the battalion is still in England and another lieutenant-colonel has been appointed to do the fighting.

Mr. BRADBURY: That is not right.

Mr. TURRIFF: To-day you have more lieutenant-colonels than battalions over there. But, what about the majors and captains? The Prime Minister said that there were 2,700 men alone in the Pay and Records Office besides the hundreds of clerks hired in England to do the work; these 2,700 majors, captains, lieutenants and a gang that are no good for war purposes are hanging on to the skirts of the Government, the idea being to spend the money of Canada, and it is not $1,000,000, as my hon. friend from Westmorland said, but many millions of dollars a year that are being absolutely squandered and wasted for that very purpose. In addition to that, my information is that there are 30,000 men, privates, corporals and ser-

9 p.m. geants, in Great Britain to-day who are unfit to be sent across the channel to the firing line. What does that mean? It means that these 30,000 men cost this country at least $30,000,000 by the time they were landed in Great Britain. It means that since they have been landed in Great Britain another $30,000,000 of Canadian money has been expended. What are they doing?—nothing at all. They cannot be sent to the front; they are too old, or too cripled, or too young; they are men who never ought to have been enlisted at all. I say, with all due respect to many excellent physicians and doctors throughout Canada, that the manner of the examination of the soldiers in Canada has been nothing but a gigantic disgrace from beginning to end. Remember that these 30,000 men are altogether outside of the rejects of which we heard the other day—some 60,000—in Canada. When I speak of rejects I do not mean the men who came up to enlist and who were turned down upon the first medical examination, because I do not suppose those were counted, but the hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of men who were able to go from one doctor to another until they got some doctor to pass them, who were drilled for from twelve to fifteen months, and who, upon getting their final examination by a good doctor, were rejected. When the Prime Minister says that he has sent from Canada 434,000 men, he is making an absolutely misleading statement, a statement that has mighty few grains of truth in it. In that number of 434,000 men, why should he include Italians? A lot of these Italians went over before Italy was in the war. Why should French reservists be included? Why should they be mentioned at all except to impress the public with the figures? Why should British reservists be counted as Canada's share? Taking the figures he gave, and deducting these classes, we have 390,000 men. Then there are 60,000 to come off that number for rejects, and 30,000 for the men who are in England to-day and who are useless in so far as going to the firing line is concerned. So that, instead of 390,000, we have very few over 300,000 effective men in the Canadian army to-day. How are we to make good the promise of the right hon. the Prime Minister—a promise that never should have been made at the time he made it, and which was made for political purposes and nothing else? It was made within a couple of weeks of the assembling of Parliament, and it was a statement that should have been first made from his seat in the House as Prime Minister. But he chose to make it to get a little bit of party capital out of it. He comes forward now and talks about 434,000 men as having gone from Canada when, all said and done, we have about 300,000 effective men. That is about the position of affairs. The right hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that under the circumstances he has not very much chance of being returned to power because of the way in which he has conducted Canada's share in this war.

There is another evidence of extravagance that I wish to speak about. I see a statement in the papers to which I desire to direct the attention of the House. I have never been able to find out the facts exactly and if I make the statement incorrectly I trust some hon. member of the Government who is posted on the subject will put me right. I see by the press that three new large munition shops are being erected, one near Toronto—I forget at the moment where the other two are. One of them is to cost $1,750,000, another, $2,000,000 and the third $2,250,000, the three shops together costing $6,000,000. It does not make very much difference whether those shops are being built by the Government or by the Imperial Munitions Board or by the contractors. From an article I saw in one of the Toronto newspapers, I would be inclined to think that those shops are being erected by the contractors; but if they are, it is obvious to every hon. member and to every person in Canada that if a contractor is going to build a shop costing $2,000,000 for the purpose of manufacturing munitions for the Canadian Government or for the British War Office, the cost of that shop will come out of the contract that the contractor receives, because he will receive such prices for the shells, fuses, and other war material that he manufactures as to enable him to build that shop and have a profit over and above.

What I charge against the Government is, that while they are permitting the construction of those three munitions shops at a cost of $6,000,000, which will eventually come out of the pockets of the people of Canada and of Great Britain, they have had standing absolutely idle since the war began railway workshops that are already equipped with all kinds of machinery for making munitions, with the exception possibly of lathes for making the shells and drills for boring them. I venture to say, however, that an expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars would equip them with all the machinery required, and yet this Government have absolutely refused to allow those shops to be used for munition purposes, and they have absolutely refused to use them themselves to make munitions at cost price for Canada, for the Empire, and for our Allies. Why? Simply because it would take away from their partisan friends the opportunity of fleecing Canada and fleecing Great Britain to the extent of millions and tens of millions and, I think, probably hundreds of millions of dollars. Why should this Government not have done what was done in Great Britain? How long did it take the British Government to realise what faced it? As I said before six o'clock, the Prime Minister had promised to Great Britain all the resources of Canada in men and money to carry on this war, and yet here are shops controlled by the Minister of Railways and costing millions of dollars, that he could have used; that he promised Mr. Thomas when he was out here would be used for the manufacture of munitions, and yet that have not been used and the Government have absolutely refused to use them, simply because they do not want to make munitions at cost price for the Canadian and British soldiers. Although those shops are standing idle to-day, we are spending in one way or another $6,000,000 to erect three new shops. Those are the things that the Government will have to answer. My hon. friends opposite at present refuse to answer our arguments but the day is coming in the near future when they will not be able to sit tight in their seats and laugh, when they will have to come before the jury of the people and submit their records to them, and the people of Canada are at present in a frame of mind to pass judgment on the record of this Government in regard to its manner of conducting the war. It is no wonder that our friends opposite want an extension of the term of Parliament instead of an election; but they will be very apt to get an election that will give them a longer extension than they are asking for at present, an extension that will probably give them fifteen years in the cool shades of Opposition to repent of their sins, and their sins have been so many and so scarlet that I think fifteen years will be required for them to come to repentance, because they can repent of only so many at a time.

There is one question I want to ask, and as I suppose it can be answered only by the Minister of Finance and as he is not in his seat at the present time, I will ask the question, and possibly my hon. friend who is leading the House (Mr. Rogers) will ask the Minister of Finance to give a reply to it later on. You will remember, Sir, that either last session or the previous session, the Minister of Finance stated that Canada was paying for the upkeep of the Canadian army, both in Great Britain and at the front. It is generally stated that the war is costing Canada over a million dollars a day, but that is only for this end of it and does not take into account all the food, uniforms, boots, socks, shirts, all the wagons, horses, trucks, bicycles, shells, ammunition of all sorts and everything else that goes to make up the cost of the war. I do not know and I want to know what the war is really costing Canada daily; but, roughly speaking, half of the cost of the upkeep of the Canadian army to-day is being paid by Great Britain, to be repaid by us. My hon. friend, I think, stated the other day that we were financing this war ourselves, but we are financing only one end of it; Great Britain is financing the other end of the war, and the accounts will have to be adjusted at a later date. It is possible I may be wrong, but I think I would have heard something about the matter, if we had up to the present paid for all the uniforms, food, ammunition and guns supplied to the Canadian soldiers in France and Belgium, so that if we have not done so yet, instead of the war costing Canada over a million dollars a day, I am inclined to think that at the present moment it is costing us $2,500,000 a day. I may be wrong to the extent of half a million dollars.

Mr. ROGERS: A million and a half.

Mr. TURRIFF: We are spending over a million dollars a day in Canada.

Mr. HAZEN: Not in Canada.

Mr. TURRIFF: In England for what Canada is supplying to the soldiers in England? But when the soldiers go across the water, as I understand it, the British War Office supplies the food, the uniforms, everything that the soldiers in France and Flanders use. It may be that that only amounts to a million and a half a day. My hon. friend may be right. But that is what I want to know, and I would like to have the Finance Minister, if he has the facts, give us, a statement showing approximately, if he cannot show exactly, how much a day the war is costing us over and above what Canada is paying at the present time. I think it will be found to be a very large sum. The Minister of Militia (Mr. Kemp) is now in his place, and possibly he might be able to give that information approximately. I can quite easily understand that he has not the exact figures. But if he or the Minister of Finance will give us that information at a later day I for one would appreciate it very much.

I was surprised when the Prime Minister took the position he did concerning the extension of the life of Parliament. He spoke of the disadvantages of holding an election during the war. There would be disadvantages for the Government—I quite appreciate that. But what right has the Government to come forward with that plea now? War broke out on the 4th of August, 1914, and a special session was called to open on the 18th, which session lasted for five days. During that session my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and every member on this side of the House joined in with the Government and voted all the money the Government asked in order to carry on the war. My right hon. leader had a number of engagements to hold meetings; he cancelled them all. It is true that no formal political truce was made, as the hon. Minister of Militia stated at a meeting in his constituency, but there was a tacit abandonment of partisan activity—on the part of the Liberals, at all events. However, during that time hon. gentlemen opposite were preparing and sending out the most atrocious partisan literature ever sent out under the stamp of a member. This was done at the very time when they were saying: We must all join together, we must put the whole force of the country behind the Government in carrying on properly our share in the war. The circulation of this literature by hundreds of thousands of copies went on during September, October and November, 1914. It is not often that my hon. friend who is leading the House (Mr. Rogers) slips a cog, but he did it on that occasion. This literature was supposed to be sent out privately; but the West was flooded with it—and it was dated. If anybody questions the time, I have the goods and can show them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You call that "goods."

Mr. TURRIFF: It is goods of a kind, the goods the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rogers) uses to win elections. Hon. gentlemen opposite have, whenever it suited them to do so, claimed that there was a truce. But, if there was a truce, that is the way they kept it. I do not make this charge against all the members on the other side, because I know there are many men sitting before me who would not be guilty of such an action as that; but naturally they are all willing to take any advantage that may come to them from it.

One member of the Government, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), is travelling all over the world to secure trade for Canada; and he and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) and the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) are talking increased production. We are glad to see the Minister of Agriculture in his place, and hope that his health is fairly well recovered from the bad experience he went through at the burning of the Parliament Buildings last year. I would like to say to him, in the most friendly manner possible, that if he and his colleagues want to increase production and to secure more trade, it is not necessary for them to send the Minister of Trade and Commerce travelling all over creation. All that is necessary is to take off some of the trammels that now hinder trade. Let us in the West have the American market,—not that it will make much difference this year with wheat at $1.50 to $2 a bushel—let us have the right to sell our wheat where we please and get the best price for it. Take off the extra duties on everything the farmer uses. Put the farmer in a position to make the best of his land. Then there will be no need for the Minister of Agriculture to make appeals to the people for increased production; the increased production will come without any effort on his part. But under the system adopted by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) and the arbitrary action taken by his department, farmers have had to pay during the past year duties on agricultural implements amounting to from 48 per cent to 76 per cent, and that on goods on which the nominal rate of duty is 27½ per cent, with 7½ per cent extra, a total of 35 per cent. I say that through the arbitrary measures of the Minister of Customs and his Customs board, prices have been so changed, at the demand and instigation of the Canadian implement manufacturers, that the duty the farmer has to pay amounts to the figures I have given.

Mr. REID: That statement is both absurd and untrue.

Mr. TURRIFF: Did my hon. friend ever collect that duty and afterwards refund it?

Mr. REID: No, we have not. The rates of duty collected on agricultural implements are based on the prices at which the manufacturers invoice them to the people in the western provinces.

Mr. TURRIFF: In spite of what my hon. friend has said—and he has not made a straight answer—I say again that the importers of goods in the West have in many cases paid duty on a valuation which was 20, 25 or 30 per cent more than the price they paid for the goods. For instance, if a man imported a machine for which he paid $100, the Customs Board would say: the valuation for duty purposes of that machine upon its entry into Canada is $120 or $125. They use the dumping clause to do this.

Mr. REID: The members of the Board of Customs are the same gentlemen who have been the members of the board for the last twenty years.

Mr. TURRIFF: I know that.

Mr. REID: The large implement manufacturing companies in the United States have a regular price list upon which they sell in the United States, and on that price-list are based the values upon which customs duties are collected. There has been no change of policy on the part of the Customs Board since this Government came into power. The policy adopted is that which was in force during the 15 years that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, when the hon. gentleman was sitting on the Government benches.

Mr. TURRIFF: My hon. friend says that the Customs Board has not been changed. That is true enough, but unfortunately for Canada the minister was changed. I say again, and the minister knows that I am stating the truth, when I say that the prices at which the goods are sold are in many cases not those of the price-list and that the minister has made importers pay duty on a valuation greater than the price paid for the goods imported. I stand by that statement, and I do not take it back in view of anything that has been said, because I know what I am talking about.

Mr. REID: You have been giving us no evidence but your word, and I do not think that is good so far as this case is concerned.

Mr. TURRIFF: Will my hon. friend give me a committee to prove it? He knows better than to give a committee; he knows that what I say can be proved, because I am stating an absolute fact that is known to many people. It is no secret. I have seen price lists from which deductions of 50, 20 and 10 per cent are made; you cannot go by price lists. As I said a moment ago, this has been done at the instigation of the big manufacturers in Canada. I say to the Minister of Agriculture: take these burdens off the farmers and you won't be able to keep the people away from the land. It will not be necessary to put advertisements in the papers calling on the farmers to increase their production, because no man knows better how to use the land than the man who is working it.

We have heard a good deal about these National Service cards. I would like some member of the Government to say what they are going to do when they get these cards all in. Suppose every man in Canada filled in and returned the National Service card, how much further ahead would you be? I will tell you how much further behind you are going to be. These National Service cards have already driven thousands of people out of Canada, and thousands more are going. I have heard it stated—and there is much to be said for it—that we are as well without the man who would leave Canada for fear he would be sent to the war. But many of these people who have left are not Canadian citizens as yet. They are people who have come into Canada, many of them into the West, and they are going over the border in hundreds and thousands. They say that they are going to visit their people at home and that they will be back. Yes, I believe they will be back, but not until after the war is over. The same applies to eastern Canada; they are going by thousands simply because of the fear that these National Service cards may lead to conscription. For myself I do not think so; I do not believe the Government has any intention of that. But what I say is that these cards are doing no possible good and any amount of harm.

We heard to-day before six o'clock that not later than the day before yesterday a member of this Government told the people in the county of Dorchester that if they feared conscription they could go across the line and there would be no danger. You cannot stop people from going across the line. The hon. Postmaster General, Mr. Blondin, telephoned the Minister of Public Works and asked him to deny that, but unfortunately for the Minister of Public Works, who has just made the denial—probably in good faith—Mr. Blondin had already sent a letter to the press in which he acknowledged both charges. Here is the letter, Mr. Speaker, on page 5 of to-day's Evening Journal.

Mr. MARCIL: Read it.

Mr. TURRIFF: It was read before, but I will read it; I am always willing to oblige. It is as follows:

SAYS LIBERALS HAVE DISTORTED HIS WORDS.

Hon. P. E. Blondin Says He Never Intended to Convey Meaning They Attach to His Speech.

By Canadian Press.

Montreal, Jan. 26. — Hon. P. E. Blondin, through his lieutenant, Felix Durocher, has issued a reply to an affidavit, which purported to give a report of his remarks at Ste. Rose during a Dorchester county by-election speech on Wednesday night. The affidavit credited Mr. Blondin with contending that the Allison scandal was of no importance to Ste. Rose because it is English money that was stolen, while those who desired to escape conscription could do so by crossing the United States border. Mr. Blondin's explanation follows:

"The statements which have been sworn to by certain Liberals with regard to my utterances are a distortion of my words. I never by any means intended to convey the meaning which they have attached to my speech. Mr. Cannon had been stating in his speeches that the Conservative party had been grafting from the Canadian treasury in connection with munition contracts.

"In my speech at Ste. Rose I explained that it was not true that the Allison scandal had to do with Canadian money, pointing out that the money paid for the shells was the money of the British Government. I did not imply that Allison had done a worthy act, but simply corrected Mr. Cannon's mis-statement. In regard to the conscription matter I told the people of Ste. Rose that I did not believe conscription would be necessary because so many Canadians were eager to go and fight for the cause of liberty and humanity. I added that if any of them were afraid of conscription, if conscription should be passed and they did not want to go to the war, they had a remedy left. They could go across the United States line which is near Ste. Rose and escape military service."

Mr. Speaker, when you find a Minister of the Crown advising the people of Canada in Quebec to get across the line to escape conscription, do you wonder that recruiting is slow in Quebec?

Mr. WILCOX: Is that a signed letter?

Mr. TURRIFF: Do you imagine that recruiting would be good in Quebec in view of a statement of that kind by a Minister of the Crown, a Minister who has just been promoted? Why it is absurd to expect anything, and if it had not been that by mistake that letter got into print, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works would have got away with his bluff.

Mr. ROGERS: No bluff.

Mr. TURRIFF: It was not a bluff on the part of my hon. friend, perhaps, but it was a bluff on the part of the Hon. P. E. Blondin, and my hon. friend, in his innocence, was carrying it out.

Mr. McKENZIE: Innocence, eh?

Mr. TURRIFF: We have the three Ministers in this bluff on the Canadian people; and it apparently worked, because while there is the letter on page 5 of the Evening Journal of to-night, it is in only a few of the papers. In all the balance of the issue of to-night's evening Journal, the home edition, these two columns, down about two-thirds of the way, are cut out. Somebody found out that there was a bad give-away in this letter, that there was an acknowledgement of both charges in the affidavit, and they got busy in the Journal office and cut out the whole two columns, in order to keep that particular letter out. But some papers of the issue had already been distributed and I hold one of them in my hand, with this article in it. So my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works, nearly got away with it, but he just slipped a cog for once—and I give my genial friend credit that he does not often slip a cog in that manner. It was not in his hands. If it had been in the master's hands the cogs would have clutched together all right, and it would have worked. But the tools that my hon. friend uses are not as good as he is himself. You cannot expect the ordinary mechanic to be as good as the master mechanic, and I take off my hat to the Minister of Public Works and express my sympathy for him that the cog slipped on this occasion. But do not wonder if in the future, so long as this gang are trying to get recruits in Quebec, they do not get very many.

Mr. WILCOX: Order.

Mr. TURRIFF: Why order? They are not a single individual, and what are they if they are not a gang—and the gang is not improved any by my hon. friend.

Mr. WILCOX: Compare favourably with yourself.

Mr. TURRIFF: Perhaps. My hon. friends are starting in now recruiting from the Civil Service, and I want to say just one word on that. If you are going to recruit from the Civil Service let it be genuine all through, let there be the same treatment to everybody. Why, in the House of Commons here, have we so many young able-bodied men, single men, between the ages of twenty and twenty-five? Why are those men hired by the House of Commons for the session when they ought to be at the front, fighting for their country? And they would be if they had the blood of men in them. But, if you are going to recruit from the Civil Service, let it be fair all round. I know the case of one Minister who has a man working for him who wanted to go, but the Minister says he cannot be spared. I understand that in the recruiting that is taking place now in the Civil Service, the chief clerk in a department has the right to say what men can go and what men cannot. Is that fair? Does anyone mean to tell me that there is any man in the Civil Service, or any man in this Government, or in this House, who cannot be spared? I never knew a man yet so big that he could not be replaced. So, if the Government wants to get the Civil Service to recruit, they should make the recruiting fair and even all round, and not have one taken and the other left, because one has a little bit of influence.

I had intended to speak on the high cost of living and also of what is going to happen when the war is over and three hundred thousand soldiers and four hundred thousand munition workers are discharged. I was also going to speak of the Ross rifle, and I will say one word on that. Mr. Speaker, I have talked to men who have come back from the trenches, and those men have told me with tears in their eyes that on several occasions when they were in the trenches and the Germans made attacks on them, they were there in the trenches with the Ross rifles jammed, and they could not get a cartridge in or out and could not use the rifles, and the Germans came right up to the edge of the trench and shot them in the trenches with the useless guns in their hands—and them cursing because they could not retaliate and kill some of their enemies. The Government and my hon. friend the Solicitor General said that they were bound by the contract that was made by the Liberal Government, the contract that provided that no change could be made inside of a year. But Sir Charles Ross has said that he never insisted on that part of the contract, but was always ready to make any changes, and Ross has challenged my hon. friend to say what he means by this statement. My hon. friend has kept a judicious silence ever since.

Another returned soldier told me of one battle that he was in where his battalion made an advance and were able to dig shallow trenches about a foot deep, in which they were lying protected to a certain extent from the German bullets. After firing a few shots their rifles jammed, and they could not get the bolts to work. In their eagerness to do some execution against the enemy, they would rise up on one hand and their knees and take the other hand to get a crack at the bolt in order to force it back so as to be able to insert a cartridge, and as they would rise up six inches or a foot above the ground, they would fall over dead or wounded by the scores and by the hundred—and the fathers and mothers of this country have a right to know from this Government what they meant by continuing the use of that rifle for a year after they knew that it was no good for war purposes, a year after the commander at the front had to withdraw a division of Canadian soldiers because of the arm they carried, and knew that thousands of our men had discarded the Ross rifle and stood around the dressing stations to grab a Lee-Enfield rifle whenever one was dropped by a wounded British soldier. This Government is responsible. I do not hold them responsible at the first, but when they found out that the rifle would not work in war, I say this Government is absolutely and directly responsible for the death of hundreds and thousands of our Canadian boys who were killed because of the uselessness of the rifle that they had in their hands.

If they had had a good rifle they would have put the enemy out of business, and fewer of them would have been killed. At this hour of the night I have not time to take this matter up—I have spoken too long—but we intend to take it up and to hold the Government responsible. My hon. friend the Solicitor General has a good deal to do yet before he can make good his claim that the Government were bound by the contract made by their predecessors with the Ross Rifle Company. That contract was for a rifle agreed to by the Government, a rifle which could be changed at any time; and what is more, Sir Charles Ross himself pointed out the defects of the rifle a year before they stopped manufacturing. What are the Government doing now? They are buying thousands and tens of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands of uniforms more then they need, but they have not ordered any more rifles. Why, I do not know, but they have not, and it is up to them to explain. I will not say anything further about the Ross rifle in the meantime.

I had intended to take up the question of nickel. My hon. friend the Solicitor General did some fancy skating around that matter last year, but it looks pretty poor stuff in view of the information that has come out during the past year. These are things that will have to be taken up. The men and women of Canada who have sent their sons to the front want to know, about how the Government have handled the nickel, the Ross rifle, and other things; but they will keep until after the adjournment, until the Prime Minister comes back, and then we will take them up and discuss them with our friends opposite.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): Moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of hon. Mr. Rogers the House adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

Monday, January 29, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Copy of amendment to sub-section (d), section 104, of the Radiotelegraph Regulations.—Hon. Mr. Hazen.

Annual report of the Department of Customs for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Reid.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: I should like to ask the Minister of Railways whether the Government have come to a decision concerning the announcement made by the First Minister the other day, that the consideration of this Bill might be taken up in Committee during recess?

Mr. COCHRANE: When the Prime Minister makes a statement, he means what he says.

Mr. MACLEAN: We did not get a statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order to go into a discussion on the first reading of a bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What did the Minister say?

Mr. ROGERS: You had better read Hansard.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

[Mr. Turriff.]

RECRUITING.

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER.

On the Orders of the Day:

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, during my absence on Friday the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. J. G. Turriff) made a statement in the House with regard to myself to which my attention has been directed. I need not read all of his speech, but the statement to which I refer was in effect: that I did last spring intimate to the representatives of the Ontario Recruiting Committee that if I had my way there would be no more recruiting in Canada and that the attention of the Canadian people should be turned to the development of their industries. That statement is on its face so transparently absurd that I must apologize to the House for making allusion to it. However, my silence might be misunderstood, and therefore I desire to assure the House and the country that neither to the Ontario Recruiting Committee on the occasion mentioned, nor to any other organization or individual on any other occasion, did I ever convey any such intimation as that suggested, or anything that could be tortured into such an intimation. I regret that my hon. friend should have seen fit to make a statement which is entirely inconsistent with every act and word of mine from the commencement of the war up to the present time.

CONFISCATION OF COAL BY RAILWAYS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a telegram which I have received, as follows:

Have sent Premier Borden to-day a telegram reading as follows: "The Dominion Atlantic Railway has confiscated coal consigned to the Nova Scotia Underwear Company, Limited, of Windsor, after arrival of coal at Windsor freight yard. The confiscation of Underwear Company coal is serious, as they have military contracts to perform and will be unable to do so if confiscation of any of their coal by railway is permitted. If you will kindly instruct Dominion Atlantic Railway that coal confiscated must be returned at once, and that coal for the Nova Scotia Underwear Company, Limited, must not be interfered with in future, we feel they will obey. While the Nova Scotia Underwear Company is willing to co-operate with the railway in every reasonable manner, it feels that interference with its coal supply is unwarranted by conditions obtaining in this vicinity, and such interference is a matter of serious importance to them. Your kind offices in the premises will be appreciated.

This is a duplicate of a telegram which was sent to the Prime Minister. I sent notice to the Prime Minister that I would bring this matter up, and I trust that he will be able to give some satisfactory information on the subject.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The telegram to which my hon. friend refers was received by me, and I at once asked the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada for any information that they might have with respect to that or like matters. I have a memorandum from the Chairman of the Board, Sir Henry Drayton, which has just been handed to me. It is as follows:—

The practice of commandeering coal by railways is the occasion of great annoyance and frequently positive loss to consignees. It is a practice which is not covered by the Railway Act, one way or the other, nor authorized by any regulation of the Board. The practice is very similar to the practice of general average applicable at sea, and the taking of necessary cargoes, belonging, of course, to consignees, in case of emergency. It is justified by the railways in that it is better that some freight should move rather than that no freight should move at all.

Railway companies, of course, ought to lay in their own coal; they ought to have supplies; they ought to be able to carry on their business without commandeering coal; but, at the same time, it has to be recognized that the coal shortage is very acute, and that railways in some instances have been entirely unable to obtain supplies of coal which they in due season contracted for.

The Board has already had up the question of coal confiscation with the railways, and everything has been done to minimize it. The complaints on this score now are very much fewer than they were, and the situation is being got in hand.

The Board has not been advised of any confiscation of coal belonging to the Nova Scotia Underwear Company, but the matter will be immediately taken up.

My hon. friend will bear in mind that the telegram reached me only this morning, and that the Board of Railway Commissioners, to whom I referred it, have had only a few hours to consider the situation. The hon. gentleman will note the statement in the concluding paragraph of the memorandum, to the effect that the board will investigate the matter at once and give me further information. I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for giving me an intimation in advance that it was his purpose to ask a question in the House upon the subject.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BUCHANAN: I ask the Government for a statement regarding the latest developments in connection with the coal strike in southern Alberta and eastern British Columbia. Is it their intention to carry out the policy outlined in an official statement of the Government, made on Monday, January 15, that if the increase fixed by Commissioner Harrison was not granted by the operators, the Government would take over and operate the mines at the expense of the operators?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Labour left last night for the West with a view to getting into direct personal touch with the parties and of doing what he can to bring to an end the unfortunate condition which is now prevailing in the West.

THE IRISH-CANADIAN RANGERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MACDONALD: Will the Minister of Militia make a statement to the House as to whether the rumour is correct that the Irish-Canadian Rangers of Montreal are to go to the front as a unit?

Mr. KEMP: I shall be very glad to make inquiries from the Overseas Minister of Militia; then I shall be able to give my hon. friend an answer.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. G. C. Wilson (Wentworth) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Friday, January 26.

Mr. G. W. KYTE (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I know you will not deem me lacking in courtesy if I do not give expression to those sentiments of congratulation upon your accession to the Speakership that were so gracefully voiced by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. I desire to adopt them to the fullest extent as expressing my own feelings in respect to the action of the Government in your selection, as well as in respect to the honour which has been conferred upon the province of Nova Scotia through you as one of its representatives.

We are now in the seventh session of the twelfth parliament. Since the 21st of September last the Cabinet has been governing this country, not by virtue of the mandate of the people of this country, but by grace of the representatives of the people sitting in Parliament. It does seem to me that it would have been fitting for the Government in this debate to enter into some explanation of the manner in which it has carried out its trust, particularly since the 21st day of September last, when the period of the extension of the life of Parliament first began to run. Except for the intervention of the right hon. the Prime Minister in this debate, which according to parliamentary usage and custom he was bound to, we have had no statement or explanation from any member of the Government of the manner in which they have administered their responsibilities, not only since the extension began but before that time.

Before entering into the discussion of the more general questions that naturally arise in the course of this debate, I desire to refer to a matter having a more local interest in the province of Nova Scotia, and particularly in that part of the province from which I come. I refer to the recent appointment of senators for Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia, as you well know, is made up of two geographical units, Nova Scotia proper and the island of Cape Breton. At the time of Confederation it was agreed that Cape Breton should be accorded three senators in the distribution of senatorships at that time. Since then the number has increased to four, and on no occasion, except in recent years, has the number been less than three. The island of Cape Breton has made tremendous advances in industrial life during the last twenty years. It has now a population well on to one hundred and fifty thousand, or nearly one-third of the total population of the province. Its coal, steel and iron industries are well known throughout the Dominion of Canada, and it has on the whole as important and diversified interests as can be found anywhere in the Dominion of Canada. Some few weeks ago the Conservative party of the United counties of Cape Breton and Richmond passed a resolution referring to the appointment of senators, which I shall now read:

"In view of the fact that the resignation and death of the late Senator William Macdonald has left a senatorial vacancy in this Island; and, whereas Cape Breton Island has never had since Confederation less than three representatives in the Senate of Canada; and, whereas we are now represented by one senator only who lives a greater part of his time from the Island; and, whereas a persistent rumour declares that the Government's intention is to fill the late Senator William Macdonald's seat by a resident of the City of Halifax; and, whereas, Cape Breton with its record of almost unswerving loyalty to the Liberal Conservative party ought not to be penalized for any other county of the province and least of all in the interests of Halifax whose record, from a party viewpoint, is quite well known to the Premier and whose present senatorial representation is already amazingly beyond its deserts.

"Therefore resolved that the Liberal Conservative Association of South Cape Breton and Richmond earnestly request that the seat of the late Senator Macdonald be filled by a bona fide resident of Cape Breton and by a man whose whole interest will be more or less identified with the moral and material advancement of our Island."

The reply to that resolution was the appointment of the Hon. Senator Tanner from the town of Pictou and of the Hon. A. B. Crosby from the city of Halifax. Regarding the appointment of the former gentleman, I have not a word to say. He filled a considerable place in the public life of the province of Nova Scotia for the last twenty years. During that period he was the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition in the Legislature and he did all in his power and within his capacity to bring the Conservative party back into office in that province. As I said, he deserves well of the Conservative party, and I congratulate both the Government and Senator Tanner upon the appointment. I should have nothing to say in regard to the appointment of the other gentleman from Nova Scotia, were it not for the fact that party organs in the province of Nova Scotia claim that Senator Crosby was appointed to represent the island of Cape Breton in the Senate. The Halifax Herald says:

Mr. A. B. Crosby has the high honour of being called to the Senate to represent eastern Nova Scotia and Cape Breton.

Senator Crosby himself gave an interview in the Halifax Herald a few days after his appointment and said:

I will see more of Cape Breton in the future than in the recent past. It is my intention to spend much of my time in that part of the province, particularly in the summer season, and I look forward to this with unfeigned delight.

Let me repeat, it is a matter for justifiable pride to be appointed to the Senate of Canada, but what gives me added pleasure is that I will have the honour of representing Cape Breton in the upper chamber of Parliament.

This is an extraordinary declaration coming from a gentleman residing in the city of Halifax who has recently been called to the other Chamber of this Parliament. The gentleman I refer to was the colleague of the First Minister in the election of 1908, and he was his colleague in 1911, in which election he suffered defeat. The time has now arrived when the Conservative party in the city of Halifax feel that they ought to be making some preparation for the next Dominion election; and inasmuch as Senator Crosby was very persistent in his claim to be the colleague of the Prime Minister in the next election, it was necessary that he be disposed of in some way in order that a stronger candidate might be selected. That is really, in my judgment, the reason for the appointment of Senator Crosby. I am sure it will afford great consolation to the people of the island of Cape Breton to know that in the future Senator Crosby will visit them occasionally to receive tributes of loyalty and fealty from his liege subjects. The Government of this country is absolutely haphazard and topsy turvy; its whole course appears to be subject to that peculiar dispensation of Providence that Charles Dickens said determined the distribution of clothing among the inmates of charitable institutions, by which all the tall boys got the short trousers and all the short boys got the long ones. Four senators represent and tread upon each other's heels in the city of Halifax, while Cape Breton, with its enormous and varied interests, that give life and vigour to the whole commercial fabric not only of Nova Scotia but of the Maritime Provinces, is doomed to absentee representation. Shades of Bourinot, Archibald, Macdonald, McKeen, Miller and Ross! Cape Breton that in days of yore, through her native sons, shed a lustre and radiance over the Senate Chamber, must hereafter be content to shine by the reflected glory of the junior senator for Halifax, while men prominent in its professional, business and public life are burned deeply with the brand of senatorial unfitness—in order that the Prime Minister may be rid of an unwelcome colleague.

The condition of affairs throughout the Dominion of Canada is not such as should bring very much congratulation to the Government at the present time. We have had some evidence in the speech of the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) as to the public sentiment that exists in the province of Ontario from which he comes. The whole burden of his speech was not congratulation for what the Government had done, but condemnation for what the Government had failed to do. The hon. member for South York has always been known to be a thick-and-thin and loyal supporter of the Conservative party. It is true that on occasions he has propounded doctrines that are not altogether acceptable to the majority of the party he supports, but, taken on the whole, his support of the party has been loyal and true. When such a prominent member of this House, such a prominent citizen of Canada as he is, makes the declarations he made a few days ago, there must be some reason for thinking that things are not well with the Government of this country or with the country itself. Other opinions in favour of a change in the form of Government in this country have been voiced by large representative bodies throughout the Dominion. We have had resolutions passed by city councils, trades and labour congresses, and other representative bodies calling upon this Government to give way to a more patriotic and more energetic Government, one capable of dealing with the great obligations that arise from day to day in respect to the war. The cry from Ontario apparently is for a national Government, whereas the cry from the other provinces is for a Liberal Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KYTE: But there appears to be no cry for a continuation of the present Conservative Government.

The subject of the cost of living is one that affects the people of this country, perhaps, more than any other, except the great question of the war. During the last three or four years the burdens of the people of Canada have been increased to an enormous extent. There have been agitations in every part of the Dominion urging the Government to take steps to bring relief to the people in respect to the high cost of living. The Government, or a sub-committee of the Government, met some months ago and evolved an order in council which apparently they felt discharged their full duty and obligation to control the cost of living. That order in council was put forward as the acme of perfection and as a full discharge of the duty of the Government. I know that in the city of Sydney some attempt was made under that order in council to regulate the price of one of the important commodities of domestic consumption, but after examining the order in council, and after endeavouring to put it into effect, the whole proceeding came to an end because it was found that the order in council and the proceedings under it were absolutely unworkable. A large delegation waited upon the sub-committee of the Government with respect to this matter some months ago, and my recollection is that the hon. Minister of Public Works, who was a member of that sub-committee, declared that the Government were not called upon to take any action inasmuch as no remedy had been suggested by the people of Canada. The hon. the Minister of Labour took the ground that, inasmuch as the cost of living was high and was increasing in other parts of the world, there was no particular reason why we in Canada should worry over the matter. In the Dominion of New Zealand the Government have taken stringent steps for the purpose of regulating the cost of living. By orders in council, by regulations, and in some cases by statute, they have actually fixed the prices of certain commodities of life which had been unduly increased to the consumers of that Dominion. They have dealt with the price of flour, of butter, of cheese, of milk, and of coal. They have prepared an elaborate system which renders it absolutely impossible for the dealers in those commodities to unduly enhance the prices of articles of domestic consumption. When the time comes to discuss the Budget, I hope to be in a position to place upon Hansard the regulations and orders in council by which the Government of New Zealand have dealt with these matters.

In England, steps have also been taken with the same view. One of the provisions adopted by the Government of England some months ago empowered the Board of Trade to requisition stocks of food on such terms as the Board of Trade may direct, the amount of compensation payable in default of an agreemeent as to price to be determined by a single arbitrator, who must take into consideration cost of production and a reasonable profit, but without necessarily considering the market price.

With regard to bread stuffs, the price of flour, being a commodity of universal consumption, more particularly fixes the standard of the cost of living. It is well known that when the price of flour goes up, the price of every other commodity increases in sympathy. Strong objection was taken to the action of the Government two years ago when they proposed to increase the revenues of this country to meet the war emergency by a general increase of the tariff. It was contended by hon. members on this side of the House that to make a flat increase of the tariff to the extent of seven and a half per cent would result in unduly enhancing the cost of living to a people already overburdened. I have before me a statement issued by the Ogilvie Milling Company previous to its last annual meeting. We know that whenever there is a complaint that the price of flour, or of other commodities of domestic consumption increases, the increase is attributed to war conditions. The universal answer and defence of those who increase prices is that it is entirely due to the war. I think that I will be able to show that the increased price of flour, which the consumers have to pay, is not due entirely to war conditions, but is due to the avarice and greed of the men who are engaged in the manufacture of that commodity, and who are making the war a pretext for increasing the price. The Ogilvie Milling Company, in the month of October last, issued the following statement:

> A bonus of 4 per cent. for the year ended August 31st last was declared by the directors of the Ogilvie Flour Mills Co., Limited, on its $2,500,000 common stock, at a meeting held here yesterday afternoon. The bonus will be paid on October 1st along with the regular quarterly dividend of 2 per cent., making a total distribution out of the year's profits of 12 per cent.
> The bonus declared yesterday is the first extra distribution to be made by the Ogilvie Company since the stock was listed on the Montreal Exchange in 1908, although bonus payments have been popular with other milling concerns when an exceptionally good run of business has been struck. When the stock was listed the common shares were returning 7 per cent.; the rate was advanced to 8 per cent. in 1910 and has been held steady at that level through good times and bad.
>
> A year ago, when exceptional profits from wheat brought the earnings up to the phenomenally high level of 95 per cent on the common, the directors held to their conservative course, and shareholders received the usual 8 per cent. and nothing more. Investment values added to by this conservation of resources have naturally been potent in increasing the earning power of the stock. The status of the company, with a large supply of liquid capital at its disposal, has changed from that of a borrower to a lender.
> At yesterday's meeting the directors took the view that the results of another year's business having been extremely satisfactory, there was no reason why an extra distribution of profits should be withheld any longer.

Here, Mr. Speaker, we have a statement by the company themselves that, whereas previous to the war all they earned was six per cent and seven per cent, and in one year eight per cent, owing to the exceptionally good prices they were able to get after the war they were not only in a position to declare a dividend of eight per cent but to give a bonus of four per cent in addition. How was it possible for the Ogilvie Milling Company to get such exceptionally good prices during the war if it was not by unconscionably enhancing the price of their flour on the pretext that it was due to war conditions? I have seen the statement made that the actual earnings of the Ogilvie Milling Company were twenty-five per cent, that in addition to the twelve per cent which they paid to stockholders, they put to rest account, a sum equal to another thirteen per cent. If the flour placed upon the market by the Ogilvie Milling Company was the product of wheat purchased last year, when the farmers got an unusual price, and when wheat was selling upon the Grain Exchange at from $1.70 to $1.80, we could understand that it would be necessary to put up the price of flour in order that the Ogilvie Milling Company might give fair dividends to its stockholders. But, bear in mind that the flour, manufactured by the Ogilvie Milling Company and upon which they declared dividends and bonuses of twelve per cent during 1916, was flour manufactured from the wheat crop of 1915, for which the farmers did not receive more than 75 cents a bushel. Therefore, it is perfectly clear that the enormous price of flour in the markets of Canada during this past summer was not due to war conditions, but, as I said a moment ago, was due to the avarice of the soulless corporations that controlled that commodity and were free to take full advantage of the last dollar that they could extract from the people. Not only were they suffered to do so but they were assisted in their design to do so by the course of the Government in keeping up the duty on food products and increasing the duty notwithstanding that every consumer in Canada was in favour of keeping the duty where it was if not absolutely reducing it.

But, it may be said that the Ogilvie Milling Company has contributed a large amount of money to the treasury of Canada by reason of the war tax. I stated a moment ago that the bonuses and dividends paid to the shareholders of the company amounted to twelve per cent. The statement of the company which I have just read shows that the dividends were paid upon $2,500,000 of the common stock of the company. I do not know what the total capitalization of the Ogilvie Milling Company is, but, taking the item of common stock alone, I will be able to show you how much the Government got out of this war tax and how much the stockholders of the Ogilvie Milling Company were able to put into their pockets by reason of the enormous earnings which they enjoyed. Twelve per cent upon $2,500,000 of common stock would amount to $300,000. Seven per cent, the amount which this company was able to retain clear of any war tax, amounted to $175,000 and 25 per cent upon the balance of the profits, or upon $125,000, would amount to $31,500. So that out of the earnings of $300,000 of the Ogilvie Milling Company upon its common stock, the Government only secured $31,250 and the stockholders of the company put $268,550 in their pockets. If it is true that the earnings of the Ogilvie Milling Company amounted, as a matter of fact to 25 per cent instead of 12 per cent, then we have this condition of affairs: The profit of the company would then amount to $625,000 and the amount of the war tax upon that profit, over and above seven per cent, would be $145,000, which would go into the coffers of the Government. But the shareholders of the Ogilvie Milling Company would still be able to put $479,700 into their pockets.

It is said by the friends of the Government that they have done all that could reasonably be expected in the way of commandeering the wealth of this country in order to make sure that it shall bear its full proportion of the war expenditure. But, is it not idle for the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) to tell the people of the country that he is taking 25 per cent of the profits of the large corporations, over seven per cent, because, when we come to actually figure out what that means, as I have done with respect to the Ogilvie Milling Company, we see what a bagatelle it is that the Government receive out of this war tax compared with the enormous profits that these corporations are making out of the overburdened people of the Dominion. If our friends who are governing the country to-day are really anxious to bring this war to a termination—and I know they are—if they are determined to mobilize our men, industries and supplies, the one thing above all others which they must mobilize to a greater extent is the wealth of this country. If we are in the war to the same extent as Great Britain is in the war—and we are in the war to that extent—there is no reason why we should not follow the example set by Great Britain, France and the other allied countries, and take from these manufacturers who are making money out of the war, not only 25 per cent of all the profits they make beyond 7 per cent, but every dollar over and above a reasonable compensation for the money which they have invested in their enterprise. I scarcely think that our friends on the Government benches realize that there is a class of people which is not doing its duty in regard to carrying on the war. Talk about sacrifice, talk about doing our bit in the war! Where is the sacrifice of the shareholder of the Ogilvie Milling Company, who pays 25 per cent to the Government over and above the 7 per cent profit upon his total investment? What is that sacrifice compared with the sacrifice of the farmer, fisherman, or miner, whose only son has, perhaps, enlisted, has gone to the front, has been wounded, or, perhaps, killed in defence of the liberty and freedom of the British Empire? What is the sacrifice involved in a paltry tax of 25 per cent upon this profit compared with the sacrifice of the widowed mother who has allowed her only son to give up his life in order that the Empire might be preserved? In every village, town, hamlet and city throughout Canada there are sacrifices going on among the humble and simple people, in the houses of the fishermen, the farmer, the miner and the artisan, that are far greater in proportion than any sacrifice that the wealthy have been called upon to make up to the present time.

This war has given rise to industries that have yielded enormous dividends to those who have engaged in them. The other day I saw where a company down in Montreal that has contracts for the manufacture of munitions had made profits amounting to over 300 per cent. That is not exceptional, but it is the case wherever munitions are manufactured. I think that under the circumstances, in order that the sacrifices that the people are making should be equalized, in order that the sacrifice of the wealthy manufacturer should approach in some reasonable degree to the sacrifice of the classes I have mentioned, the manufacturer of munitions, and the manufacturer of every other commodity, ought to be obliged to give not only 25 per cent over the 7 per cent allowed, but every dollar over and above a reasonable compensation for the money which he has invested.

It was a great disappointment to find that shortly after the appointment of Sir Thomas Tait as head of the National Service Commission this distinguished non-partisan felt obliged to resign, and we got back to where we were a year ago. Sir Thomas, in his letter of resignation as head of the National Service Commission, addressed to the Prime Minister on the 12th of October last, said:

> In view of what has occurred in the case of Mr. G. M. Murray, who had been offered by me and who had accepted the position of Secretary of National Service, and of that incident as indicative of what may be anticipated in connection with the future organization and work of National Service, I feel compelled after serious consideration to relinquish the position of Director-General of National Service, and I therefore do now resign from that position.

That was the result of the first real effort of the Government to conduct affairs pertaining to the war on non-partisan lines. What was behind the enforced resignation of Mr. G. M. Murray? Mr. Murray has been secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association for many years. I do not know which particular political party he supported, if, indeed, he supported either party. We have been told time and time again that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is a non-partisan organization, and I presume that is true. Therefore, I assume that if Mr. Murray was not a non-partisan, he was at all events not sufficient of a partisan to merit the rebuke he received at the hands of the Government upon his being suggested as secretary of the National Service Commission. It is true that Mr. Murray had something to do with certain correspondence that passed between the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Prime Minister in the fall of 1914, a few months after the war broke out, wherein protests were made by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association against the intervention of middlemen in the letting of contracts for war supplies. It was alleged in that correspondence that the interference of middlemen was resulting in increasing to a very large extent the prices of munitions and other war supplies to the War Office, in order to provide commissions for the middlemen; and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, through Mr. Murray, protested that if this matter was not stopped the high prices in Canada would result in the British War Office withdrawing orders for war supplies in Canada and placing them elsewhere. But whatever the cause may have been, Mr. Murray was evidently not persona grata with the Government, and his appointment as Secretary of the National Service Commission was not confirmed. As a result, Sir Thomas Tait resigned, and the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) was appointed in his stead.

I have in my mind another illustration of how the question of National Service has been taken out of politics, and for the condition which I shall describe I do not hold the two hon. gentlemen responsible in the slightest degree who went down to the city of Halifax to address a meeting there on the subject of National Service. The hon. member for Calgary, as chairman of the commission, and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) went down to the city of Halifax to address the citizens on the aims and purposes of the National Service Commission. It was announced in the Liberal newspapers of Halifax that in addition to these two gentlemen the Premier of Nova Scotia would also address the meeting. But, strange to say, in the announcement of the meeting that appeared in the columns of the Halifax Herald, there was no reference whatever to the fact that Premier Murray would speak. The only speakers mentioned were the hon. member for Calgary and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. If the National Service Commission does not intend to do business on such lines of narrow partisanship, I would suggest that the chairman of the commission, or some other functionary interested in its success, give instructions to the party press throughout Canada to give something like a fair deal to members of the Liberal party, who are as anxious for National Service as any hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

There is another matter in which the people of Canada have been very much concerned since the last sitting of Parliament, and that is the resignation of the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence. Very pointed references have been made to that correspondence since this debate opened, but up to the present we have had no explanation with regard to it either from the Prime Minister or from any other hon. gentlemen sitting on the Government benches. I am sometimes inclined to suspect that a discussion of the correspondence that passed between the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence and the Prime Minister is not what hon. gentlemen opposite are most anxious for. It appears to me that the ex-Minister of Militia has hon. gentlemen opposite scared into a blue funk, so that they dare not venture into a controversy which would bring to the discussion to-morrow afternoon some observations from the ex-Minister of Militia that perhaps they would prefer him not to make. The charges and allegations made by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence stand uncontradicted at the present time. The ex-Minister of Militia placed the Prime Minister in a position where his words were challenged and his motives in certain respects questioned. Allegations of a serious character were made against the colleagues of the Prime Minister, and I do think this debate ought not to close until we have an explanation from some member of the Government or from gentlemen supporting the Government, as to whether the allegations made by the ex-Minister of Militia are true or not.

We have also had a report from Dr. Bruce, who was appointed to inquire into conditions prevailing with respect to the medical service in England. A summary of Dr. Bruce's report contains twenty-three charges, which reflect very seriously upon the conduct of the Medical Staff in respect to the way in which they have treated our soldiers. The answer to the Bruce report was made a few days ago by an hon. gentleman for the Government, and that answer was that another commission had been appointed, at the head of which was Dr. Baptie, and had completely disproved the charges that were made by Dr. Bruce. It so happens that the report of the Baptie Commission was published a few days ago, and those who are familiar with the particulars of Dr. Baptie's report will not be surprised to learn that of the twenty-three charges made by Dr. Bruce, eighteen are confirmed by the Baptie Commission. I will read the summary of the report of the Baptie Commission. It gives the twenty-three charges made by Dr. Bruce, with its own comments on each charge.

1. Soldiers arriving in England medically unfit. Criticism largely justified.

2 and 3. Segregation of Canadian wounded and centralization of Canadian hospitals. Board admits this to be a fair question for argument, but thinks Dr. Bruce's suggestions impracticable and inadvisable.

4. Unnecessary detention in hospitals, Board professes to disagree with Dr. Bruce, but admits the justice of much of his criticism.

5. V. A. D.'s inefficient, Board thinks criticism unjustified and regrettable.

6. Shorncliffe V. A. D. hospitals. Board admits justice of some of the criticism.

7. Relations with Red Cross. Board admits justice of some of the criticism. "Glaring departures from service methods passed unnoticed."

8. Detailing of C. A. M. C. personnel for Imperial service. Board's opinion disagrees with that of Col. Bruce.

9. Colonel Rennie in dual role at Shorncliffe. Board thinks it's all right.

10. Surgical operations not tending to increase military efficiency, Criticism partially concurred in.

11 and 12. Special hospitals Ramsgate and Buxton. Col. Bruce's criticisms partially concurred in.

13. Venereal situation. Criticism partially concurred in.

14. Infectious diseases. Board thinks present arrangements all right.

15. Medical Board situation. Board thinks Dr. Bruce's words too strong, but "reformation" (a significant word) is essential.

16. Records. Criticisms generally concurred in.

17. Pensions. Criticisms too strong.

18. Co-ordination. Criticisms partially concurred in.

19. C.A.M.C. personnel not used to advantage. Board disagrees.

20. Consulting specialists. Criticisms partially concurred in.

21. Discontent as to promotions. Board thinks this is not abnormal, but a change is recommended.

22. C.A.M.C. Training School. Board agrees this has not been properly organized.

23. Economy in management. Board thinks there has been economy.

This summarizes the findings of the Baptie Commission which, as I said, concurred in eighteen out of the twenty-three charges contained in Col. Bruce's report.

As there seems to be a question whether the findings of the Baptie Commission or the statements of Col. Bruce are correct, it does appear that further inquiry ought to be made in order that the people of Canada may be able to reach a proper conclusion. Col. Bruce, a gentleman eminent in the medical profession—so eminent that he has since been appointed by the British Government as surgeon in charge of two hospitals in France—made charges and allegations of a serious character as regards the management of hospitals under the Medical Staff in England. A commission—hand-picked, it is said, by the Overseas Minister of Militia in London—has made a report which, we were told, completely refutes the allegations of Col. Bruce. But, from the summary I have read, it will be seen that the commission has not disagreed in any essential particular with the report of Col. Bruce. That leaves the people of Canada in a haze, to some extent, as to these allegations. I do think the Minister of Militia ought to have this matter put in such a position that some intelligent judgment can be arrived at as to whether these allegations are well founded or not.

It is alleged that recruiting at the present time is not carried on as briskly as it might be, or as briskly as the necessity of the time calls for. As to the province of Nova Scotia, I know that while the citizens of that province have done well, perhaps have done very much better than other portions of Canada,—and I do not say that for the purpose of casting reflections on any other parts of the Dominion—yet a good deal more could be done in that province if there were a better system of recruiting. I am not speaking in a critical spirit, nor with any desire to make political capital out of conditions that have arisen; but I do think that if we are not doing more in the matter of recruiting in Nova Scotia it is largely due to the fact that no regular system of recruiting, apart from the system of political patronage, is relied upon to get recruits.

In the matter of the separation allowance and Patriotic funds, I am sorry to say that in certain parts of Nova Scotia these two funds have been annexed as part of the political patronage system. In some cases members of the Patriotic Fund committees who are not in sympathy with the present Government find that their colleagues who are in sympathy with the Government undertake to dispose of these funds without reference to them. I cannot conceive of any reason that would suggest the dividing of the membership of a Patriotic Fund committee on party lines unless the object be to enable the Conservative members of the committee to control the funds as part of the political patronage. As to the separation allowances, I regret to say that some criticism can be made. Members of Patriotic Fund committees throughout Nova Scotia are frequently consulted by the officers of the Department of Militia and Defence who have to deal with separation allowances, and their recommendations are not in any case submitted to the Liberal members of the committee. A year ago I received a copy of the regulations under which separation allowances are paid. They provided that no person should enjoy separation allowance except the wife of a soldier who has enlisted, the mother of a soldier who is a widow, or the minor children of a soldier who is a widower. It may surprise you, Mr. Speaker, as it will surprise other hon. members of the House, to know that, notwithstanding the regulations, there are women drawing separation allowances although their husbands are living and are contributing to the support of the family as before the son enlisted. A few weeks ago I applied to the Department of Militia and Defence for information as to whether any change had recently been made in the regulations that would permit the fathers of soldiers to participate in the benefits of the fund, and was told that no such change had been made. But if the separation allowance is to be paid in such cases as those I have indicated it should be under a change of the regulations made after full consideration and for good reasons. I am only calling the attention of the minister to the matter in order that it may be taken up, and that, if abuses are found in the payment of these allowances, these abuses may be corrected at the earliest possible moment.

There is evidence that partisanship has continued to permeate military affairs in this country, in a statement that appeared in the Toronto Globe of a few days ago, as follows:—

> Is it necessary for a returned soldier in Toronto to join a Conservative ward association before he has any chance of securing a government position? Is the spoils system still in operation? Can no Liberal who has fought for his country hope to serve it in time of peace without renouncing his political creed? These questions are forced to the front by the uncontradicted statement that Sergeant Soloman, a returned soldier wounded in France, was told by Sergeant-Major Creighton at the city hall, when he applied for a position, to "go and join the Second Ward Conservative Association and get in line for a government job." The sergeant-major says he told the returned soldier to see the Conservative Patronage Committee, not to join the association, but that is a very lame excuse.

I submit that the explanation of the Sergeant-Major does not inspire us with very much hope that the allegation is not perfectly correct. Why should a returned soldier be asked to go to a Conservative patronage committee in order to get that relief and assistance to which every man is entitled who has taken his place in the ranks?

Mr. BURNHAM: What authentication has the hon. member (Mr. Kyte) for this newspaper statement? Let him establish the facts, and then he can make a charge, instead of asking the attention of the House to what may be a mere supposition.

Mr. KYTE: I am making the allegation; it is up to Sergeant-Major Creighton to say whether or not the allegation is true. He says that he did not tell the returned soldier to join the Conservative association; he told him to see the Conservative patronage committee. What I desire to impress upon the House is that according to Sergeant-Major Creighton's own statement the matter of the employment of returned soldiers in the city of Toronto is in the hands of the Conservative patronage committee. I do not see why a man who goes to the front, is wounded in battle and returns, should be sent to any patronage committee to get that which every person in Canada knows he is entitled to. Every incentive to patriotic action on the part of at least one-half of our population is blasted and withered by this accursed blight of political patronage. If a recruiting meeting is held in Nova Scotia, the recruiting officer is a Conservative who has been recommended by the Conservative patronage committee. If he addresses a meeting every man upon the platform is a Conservative. If a young Liberal comes forward to enlist he is sent for examination to a Conservative medical officer; and the more offensive a man is in politics the more likely he is to get an appointment of that kind. Why should there be any restriction in this respect upon the young men who enlist? It would be only fair if this Government should take steps completely to remove that part of the Militia Department out of politics. If the young man passes the medical examination and goes into training, he finds that everything he is supplied with and every service that is rendered to him is done by virtue of the system of party patronage. If he goes across to the other side in company with one of his young Conservative friends, he finds that his Conservative friend is very soon promoted and transferred to officers' quarters, while he is left to do battle in the trenches. If he goes to the front, he knows that his mother is not likely to get her allowances out of the Patriotic Fund unless she is able to enlist the sympathy and support of Conservatives who handle that fund. He knows also that she will not get the separation allowance unless she is strong enough with the Conservative members of the Patriotic Fund Committee to get them to recommend her for a separation allowance. The mother of the young Liberal recruit will have grave difficulty in getting her separation allowance, whereas the mother of the young Conservative recruit, notwithstanding the fact that her husband is living and is supporting her, will get a separation allowance without any difficulty. If the young Liberal recruit is wounded and comes back from the front, the chances are he will be told, as Private Solomon was told, that he cannot get employment unless he is recommended by the Conservative patronage committee. If he comes back incapacitated, I believe that under present conditions he will get a pension, because the Pensions Board is administered absolutely apart from political patronage. But if our Conservative friends do not make the Pensions Board a part of their patronage system, it is evidence that they are losing their instinct for getting everything they can out of this war.

The people of Canada are seriously concerned in this war. Many of them are anxious to do more than they have done if they way were only made clear to them. The National Service Commission, notwithstanding the resignation of Sir Thomas Tait and the substitution of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) is, I believe, designed to do well. There are people and interests in Canada who are anxious to co-operate to a greater extent than before in the winning of this war, and the only thing that is holding them back is political patronage. Whatever excuse there may be for hon. gentlemen opposite for keeping their hands on political patronage in respect to other departments of government, there is certainly no excuse whatever for their administering the Department of Militia and Defence along those lines, particularly since September 21, 1916, when the mandate of this Government expired, and when they were continued in office only by the vote of both political parties in this House.

I am very glad to see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) has returned from his travels and is once more amongst us as an ornament to the House and a great figure in debate. We all remember the magnificent speech which was delivered by the hon. minister in this House a year ago on the subject of political patronage, during the course of which he said:

> On the contrary it almost always causes dry rot and disintegration that break up Government after Government and party after party; and I wish now in the white heat and light of the great contest and struggle and the self-sacrifice that we are called upon to make that we might speak from the heart and make an agreement in this country between both parties that hereafter patronage shall not be applied by political parties in the administration of our public services. . . . If there is any canker of public corruption in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred you can trace it to the baleful effect of political party patronage.

Political patronage generally called forth this vigorous condemnation from the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce; what shall we say of the political patronage which is being employed in respect of services rendered and money voted for the purposes of the war? Every assertion made by the Minister in that speech applies five hundred-fold more strongly to the question that is now under discussion. But what evidence have we that these pious exhortations of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce received even a respectful hearing from his colleagues? I regret to say that up to the present time there is no evidence of their eliminating party patronage in connection either with the other departments of government or with the money which is voted for the purpose of carrying on the war. Now that we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce back with us again, I do hope that before this debate closes he will refer once more to the text upon which he preached so admirably a year ago and make one more effort to convert his recalcitrant colleagues to the truth and virtue of the observations that he made respecting political patronage.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I desire, to express my concurrence in the regret so eloquently voiced by the two leaders in this House at the departure from Canada of Their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and the Princess Patricia. I also desire, in the name of Frontenac, my constituency, to bid a cordial welcome to Their Excellencies the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire and to express the hope that their stay in Canada will be as pleasant for them as I am sure it will be profitable to us.

There is one very important point upon which we are all agreed in regard to this war, and that is the justice and righteousness of our cause. There is no stain upon Britain or upon any of her Allies in regard to causing the terrible conflict which is raging. Russia stands clear in that regard, and history will so write it. Russia, with her vast territory of eight millions square miles, possesses perhaps the most inadequate and poorly-equipped railway system of all the countries of Europe. Her fleet is small and scarcely sufficient, with the assistance of land fortifications, to protect her capital. Her army, large in numbers, as the war has demonstrated was very poorly equipped when the war started, and that fact alone seems to me to show that Russia had no intention of aggression. But Russia went into this war, not because she wished to do so, but because to remain out of it would have forced her forever after to hide her head in shame and dishonour. France stands acquitted of any desire for war. With an army very much smaller in numbers and lower inefficiency of general equipment than that of Germany, with a fleet much inferior to the battle fleet of Germany, no person who gives the subject a moment's consideration could think that France had any thought of aggression. History will clear the name of France in that regard, as the world will ring for generations and ages with the valour of her sons and the splendid courage of her women and children. England, as we know, from the very outset had done all that a nation could possibly do to prevent this struggle. She pleaded and begged for peace and pleaded and begged in vain. On one arm of the service England could rely; she possessed the most powerful and best equipped navy in the world. But she had practically no army, so far as numbers are concerned; simply a force of about one hundred and fifty thousand British regulars.

The one country above all others on the continent of Europe that was absolutely safe from invasion, was absolutely safe from the danger of war being waged on her soil by any other country, was Germany. She had a population of nearly seventy millions. She had a railway system under Government control and built for strategical as well as commercial purposes. She had the best organized, the most thoroughly equipped and best trained army in the world, and she had a navy second only to the navy of Great Britain. But the time had come, in Germany's estimation, to attempt world conquest, and she therefore declared war; and as we all know, in the month of August, 1914, this terrible conflict started. Not one of us in this House would have believed that any country calling itself civilized would have perpetrated the crimes, the atrocities, which Germany has committed since the beginning of this war. Not one of us would have thought possible, two and a half years ago, the wanton destruction of Louvain with its priceless treasures of art, the bombardment of Rheims cathedral, the sinking of the Lusitania, the murdering and butchering of women and children, or the driving into slavery of the remnants of the crushed and broken Belgian people. So far as our side of this struggle is concerned, such was and is impossible. We may be thankful that the teachings of centuries have become so imbedded in the hearts and minds of the people of England and France that since the outbreak of this struggle there has been not one single act of barbarism to mar the glory of their achievements or to stain the pages of their future history.

But we may ask: how is it that we find on the continent of Europe at this time two such different ideals? Cromwell purged England, and the French Revolution purged France of the false ideals which Germany has systematically encouraged for generations. We, in the British Empire, we, throughout the Anglo-Saxon world, have passed through centuries of cruelty and oppression to the final triumph of democracy. Throughout the Anglo-Saxon world, yes, and also in France, the individual has been encouraged to develop his individuality; he has been made to feel, no matter whether he is rich or poor, that he possesses within himself a value and a status in the national life which the nation regards as worth while. Democratic principles have been given expression to in such measures as Magna Charta, the Habeas Corpus Act, the Bill of Rights. But what are the conditions in Germany? In Germany for generations they have taken an opposite course. There the individual has been taught that he must blot himself out as an individual, that he must become or should become a mere military number, and that he has no right to be anything else; that he must become and should become a mere cog in the national machine. The gospel of hate has been preached in that country, in their schools, in their colleges and in their universities, yes—and from their pulpits; and men throughout the German Empire have been taught to regard the war teachings of Bernhardi and the writings and theories of Treitschke as something more worthy of their admiration and adoration than the gospel of Christ. These are the two different ideals which we have in Europe, and which are largely responsible for the outbreak of this conflict. The world is too small for these two ideals to exist side by side; one or other must triumph; either democracy as represented by Great Britain and France and Russia will triumph or militarism will triumph. I repeat the world is too small for both of these two ideals to exist any longer in it, and the time has come when the Allies must not only crush and defeat Germany's army but crush for all time Germany's ideals.

Mr. Speaker, reference has been made by different hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate to matters of patronage in connection with Canada's participation in this war. The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), when speaking a few days ago, said there were very few places where supplies for the troops were provided by anybody but followers of the Government. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Kyte) has spoken along somewhat the same lines, only, as one would naturally expect, in somewhat more extravagant language. Allow me to call your attention to the statements made by the hon. member for North Oxford and to make one or two comments on them. If I have any fault to find with the Government it is that they have been rather too generous in the matter of distributing their patronage along certain lines.

Allow me to be explicit. I for one do not endorse the action of the Government, for instance, in giving advertisements to any newspaper which will print the most scurrilous and scandalous articles, which can only have the effect of retarding recruiting. I do not endorse the action of the Government in giving patronage to papers of that kind. There is one man who has a seat in the press gallery of this House—and I am glad to say there is only one—who has been capitalizing his scurrility and selling his lies at so much a word throughout this country. The lines of Byron apply very well to that gentleman and to men of his class:

> A would be satirist, a hired buffoon,
> A monthly scribbler of some low lampoon,
> Condemned to drudge the meanest of the mean
> And furbish falsehoods for a magazine,
> Devotes to scandal his congenial mind
> Himself a living libel on mankind.

Mr. Speaker, I say that any newspaper which in this time of stress of war, when every effort is being put forth to get recruits, and when the Government should receive every possible encouragement along that line, a newspaper which will print on one page of its issue the most scandalous and shameful lies in regard to the action and conduct of the Government, and will accept an advertisement from that Government and insert it on another page of its issue, is playing the part of a hypocrite.

In regard to the question of patronage, the War Purchasing Commission was appointed on, I think, the 8th of May, 1915. This commission has had supervision of the purchases of supplies for the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, the Naval Service, the Military Internment Camps, and so on. It receives its authority for making expenditures from the Privy Council, and before seeking authority to make purchases or to authorize contracts, it prepares a report for the Prime Minister based upon the requisition of the department concerned. It seems to me on the face of it that that is fair and reasonable. Purchases by this commission are made on tender, on the competitive basis, and upon the files of the commission, and in the departments are to be found the documents relating to each transaction. Tenders are opened in the presence of a member of the commission and a representative of the department concerned. These tenders are called for by poster advertisements and by tender forms mailed to known dealers and to those who ask for tender forms. Surely that is fair, as fair as it possibly could be.

I have spent some little time in getting figures from the report of the commission which was brought down just a few days ago. Let us see how the system works out at the various camps. Tender forms for provisions and supplies to Barriefield Camp were sent out to 116 firms; for Borden Camp, to 172 firms; for Camp Hughes, to 100 firms; for Niagara Camp, to 186 firms, for Pettawawa Camp, to 96 firms; for the Sarcee Camp, Calgary, to 142 firms; for Valcartier Camp, to 196 firms; for Vernon Camp, to 148 firms. Will any person say that these various firms or individuals were all Conservatives? Tender forms were sent out not only to known dealers, but to any person who requested a form to be sent to him. In the matter of teas and coffees, some ninety-eight different firms tendered, or had tender forms sent to them, and for the supply of fish for overseas, 130 firms. I am not going to mention all the different articles, but let us take general supplies. For ambulance stretchers, 44 firms tendered or were asked to tender; for hospital clothing, 78; for boots and shoes, 130; for bedding and blankets, 138; for housewives, 60; for boxes, chests, and cases, 223; for canvas goods, such as bags, haversacks, tents, kit bags, 156; clothing for uniforms as jackets, trousers, etc., 226, and for white and grey flannel khaki, 31, harness and leather goods, 108; knitted goods, socks, sweaters, etc., 130; medical supplies, 242; service and flannel shirts, 92; wagons, carts and carriages, 88.

One could go through the whole list and show similar results. As I have stated, I spent some time in satisfying myself that, so far as the purchase of supplies by the Government for overseas is concerned, there has been nothing of a partisan nature about it. The door was thrown wide open, and every person in the business has been given an opportunity to put in his bid for the supplies that were wanted. In the constituency of my hon. friend (Mr. Nesbitt), some 81 firms were afforded an opportunity to submit tenders, and in looking over the list I find that only eight of them happened to be outside of the city of Woodstock. I submit that these facts and figures demonstrate clearly that the statement made by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) was not a correct statement, and was not any more accurate than the statement which has been made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte).

The hon. member who has just taken his seat referred to the distribution of the Patriotic Fund separation allowance, and that sort of thing, in the province of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman went so far as to say that if a boy from that province went overseas to the trenches he must realize that his mother could not get her share of the Patriotic Fund allowance without going to some Tory official and asking for it. He made other statements along that line, but what are the facts? Who is the secretary of the Patriotic Fund in the province of Nova Scotia? The secretary, I am informed, is A. S. Barnstead, who is also secretary for immigration in that province, a strong Liberal, who was appointed to his present position by Premier Murray of Nova Scotia. In regard to the distribution of the Patriotic Fund, Liberals and Conservatives alike must go to that gentleman, who is not a Conservative, but a Liberal of the Liberals. I am also informed that his actions have shown him to be fair to every person regardless of the party to which he or she belongs. That is only as it should be.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte), referring to the question of military appointments, stated that if two boys left Nova Scotia, one a Conservative and the other a Liberal, the Conservative would get a commission, while the Liberal would have to fight in the trenches. That statement is not in accordance with the facts, and the hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that it was not. Why do I say that? Allow me to refer to the fact that Mr. W. F. Carroll, a Liberal member of this House who went overseas, holds the rank of lieutenant. I might also call attention to the fact that the son of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is a lieutenant, and I do not think that any person will charge the hon. member for Pictou with being a Tory, whatever else they may think of him. Mr. Ralston, a Liberal member of the Provincial Legislature, holds the rank of captain, and so we might go on and name dozens and dozens of such. As far as I have been able to see, speaking for my own locality, I have never observed any distinction whatever made in regard to politics in so far as military positions are concerned. I speak honestly and sincerely in making that statement. I have not seen the slightest indication of any favouritism along that line. I do not think that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kyte) will make very much out of talk of that kind. The boys who enlisted from Nova Scotia and from every part of Canada, enlisted to serve their country, and I think the boys who have enlisted have a higher sense of their duty to their country than has the hon. member for Richmond. If they can best serve their country by fighting in the trenches, I give them credit for being willing to do so, and the fact that they have enlisted proves that they are willing.

The hon. gentleman blames the Government very strongly for the war tax on excess profits over seven per cent, and he says that it is a great burden to the people. My recollection is that that measure went through the House unanimously, that there was no division upon it, and that being so, the hon. gentleman is as much responsible as any person else for the seven per cent additional war tax. However that may be, whether the Government are or are not, taking as much from the manufacturers and others as they should, the truth of the statement cannot be denied that this is the first Government that ever did impose a special tax of that kind upon the manufacturers of the country.

The hon. gentleman from Richmond bewailed the fact that there was no representative from Cape Breton in the Senate. He said that Cape Breton was very unfortunate in that regard. I may say that there are a great many of us on this side of the House who think that Cape Breton is also very unfortunate with regard to its representation in this House, and especially so with regard to that portion of it which includes the county of Richmond. Last year there was a provincial election in Nova Scotia. That election resulted in the return of the Liberal Government by a very largely increased majority. But there was a very significant occurrence in connection with that election. The county of Richmond, which is represented in this House by my hon. friend, was for years and years represented in the local legislature by two Liberals. When the election came on the hon. member for Richmond appealed to the people there to return his two friends, the Liberal candidates, but, although the tide was running very strongly in favour of the Liberals in Nova Scotia, the people of Richmond county would have nothing to do with the two Liberal candidates who were backed by the hon. member for Richmond. That, I say, is a significant fact. The two Conservative candidates were elected in that county and it is currently reported that the reason they were elected was that the hon. member for Richmond had opposed their cause. They had been reading the papers and they remembered something of the spectacle which the hon. member for Richmond had made of himself in Ottawa last session, and they showed their disapproval by casting their votes for the gentlemen who were opposed to the candidates endorsed by the hon. member for Richmond.

There was also a by-election last year in the county of Carleton, New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman who represents Carleton in this House (Mr. Carvell) declared to the press that he made this fight his own, and he went out and worked assiduously and energetically for the Liberal candidate, with the result that the Conservative candidate was elected by a very large majority. Why was this? What is the significance of it? The significance of it is that the people in Carleton had become aware of the manner in which the hon. member for Carleton had forced them to take only $8 a ton for their hay in times past; they had also heard of his doings in this House last session, and they would have nothing to do with a man who was backed by the hon. member. As the election in Carleton progressed the hon. member for that constituency in this House sent an S.O.S. call out to the prairie, which was responded to by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). I am told that the hon. member for Assiniboia never had been in that part of the country before, and he has not been there since. I do not know whether that is correct or not but he responded to the call and immediately he landed in the county he went to see the hon. member for Carleton. He did not stay very long. In two or three hours he was on his way back to the West, but it is said that he left the house of the hon. member for Carleton with his satchel somewhat lighter and his conscience somewhat heavier. Be that as it may, the people of Carleton showed that they were not for sale in that election, they repudiated the candidate who was endorsed by the hon. member for Carleton, and in repudiating that gentleman they repudiated the hon. member for Carleton himself. So that we have in these two facts in regard to the hon. member for Richmond and the hon. member for Carleton, an explanation of the somewhat changed demeanour which has been shown by these two hon. gentlemen since this session opened. Every person must have noticed the sad and gloomy appearance which these gentlemen have had since the opening of this session. The hon. member for Richmond's sadness and sorrows are not caused so much by the absence of any representation of Cape Breton in the Senate as by his dread of what is to come, and will come, as far as he is concerned when the next general election takes place. I fancy the gloomy countenance of the hon. member for Carleton is due to somewhat similar reasons. Last session two new political Zeppelins ventured forth emitting thunderous sounds and poisonous gases. These two Zeppelins came down to earth with a crash and all that was left of them was a mass of twisted and distorted political wires and a bad odour. The electors of Carleton and Richmond, when the next election comes round, will clear away the wreckage and disperse the bad odour which has been caused by these hon. gentlemen.

But now we have another election, one of a more recent date, one which took place in the county of Dorchester in the province of Quebec. On January 18 of this year, the following letter was sent to Mr. Lucien Cannon, the Liberal candidate in Dorchester:

> My dear Lucien:—You have done a good act in renouncing your provincial mandate to revindicate and affirm in Dorchester the rights of outraged conscience. I trust the electors will respond to your noble appeal. I wish you all success.
>
> Your devoted friend,
> WILFRID LAURIER.

There seemed to be some little doubt in Dorchester whether Mr. Cannon was really endorsed by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal party in this House and country, and the matter came up at a meeting at Ste. Rose on January 21, when Mr. Lucien Cannon, the Liberal candidate, emphasized even more clearly than before that he was a candidate because of the approbation of the Leader of the Liberal party, and of his supporters in the county. He said at that meeting:

> When Mr. Sévigny was made minister of the Borden Cabinet I asked my friends to meet at Ste. Henedine in convention, not, as Mr. Sévigny says, on my own initiative, but at the demand and following the desire of the venerable head of the Liberal party, hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It was after he asked me to have the electors of my county meet that I sent notices of a convention in the county.

This convention was, I believe, presided over by Mr. Lapointe, the hon. member for Kamouraska in this House. The Liberal organizer for the province of Quebec also took a very active part in the election. I do not think there is any doubt in any person's mind at the present time that Mr. Cannon was a candidate in Dorchester with the endorsation and approval of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. At St. Prosper on January 18, the same day that the letter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier was sent to Mr. Cannon, the Liberal candidate in Dorchester used this language at one of his meetings:

> National Service is preliminary to conscription, and with the chief of my party, I am against conscription. Do not forget one thing. There are men in the Borden cabinet who want to cut the head off the French-Canadian race. Are we to ruin our country from the point of view of men and wealth and everything else for England? I say no, without hesitation. If you elect Sévigny, there will be no limits to the sacrifices Canada will have to make.

I would ask the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition whether he endorses those sentiments expressed by Mr. Cannon in Dorchester county?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I might answer my hon. friend that Mr. Cannon has repudiated that language.

Mr. EDWARDS: My right hon. friend will realize that he has not answered my question. I asked whether he endorsed the sentiments alleged to have been expressed by Mr. Cannon in Dorchester. His statement that Mr. Cannon has repudiated those sentiments is not telling this House whether the right hon. gentleman endorses those sentiments or not.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friends knows my sentiments. I have expressed them in this House, not once, but hundreds of times.

Mr. EDWARDS: I should indeed be happy if I knew the sentiments of the right hon. gentleman, but the difficulty I have in knowing what his sentiments are is that they differ so widely on different occasions. At times we find him making most eloquent statements in regard to recruiting and Canada's participation in this war, and at other times in his career the right hon. gentleman has used different language, which I am sorry to say he has never seen fit to retract, and he used such language, not as an irresponsible youth, but as leader of a great party in this House and country. These are the things which leave me in doubt as to what the real sentiments of the right hon. gentlemen are.

Mr. Cannon in his remarks at meetings in Quebec also referred to the Hon. Dr. Sproule, a former Speaker of this House, as the master of Orange lodges and the bitter enemy of the French-Canadian race. I want to say that a statement of that kind is unworthy of Mr. Cannon, and I say that any person who knows the Hon. Dr. Sproule would not believe for one moment a statement of that kind against him. This precious Liberal candidate in Dorchester appealed to the people of his constituency to condemn his opponent, Mr. Sevigny, and he included in that condemnation Mr. Rainville, also a member of this House. And why? Because they had stood up in this House and sang "Rule Britannia." Mr. Cannon also appealed to his constituents to condemn this Government and defeat Mr. Sevigny, because the Government made them put an extra stamp on their letters and pay a war tax on a bottle of medicine. Notwithstanding the repudiation by Mr. Cannon of the statements he is reported to have made, one has only to follow the reports of the different meetings he held throughout the riding to be convinced of his attitude, and his attitude was not that which should be expected of a man seeking a seat in this House. It was not one person alone who reported Mr. Cannon to have made the statement about, "Are we to ruin ourselves for England?" There were several reporters there, and his words were carefully taken down, and reported from one end of the country to the other.

One thing however does stand out and it is this: I think in a time of war like this, when such statements were alleged to have been made by a Liberal candidate in the field, with the endorsation of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, and when those statements were reported in the papers from one end of the country to the other, it would have been in the best interests of Canada and the cause we have at heart, if the right hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to stand up in this House the moment those sentiments were reported, and say that those sentiments were not his sentiments. What a pitiable, contemptible position Mr. Cannon, the Liberal candidate in Dorchester with the endorsation of the right hon. gentleman, places himself in when at a time like this he appeals to the people to condemn the Government, because, forsooth, the people have to put an extra stamp on a letter or pay an extra cent as war tax on a bottle of medicine. The pitiable thing is that this gentleman, well educated as he is, and of a very good family, having every advantage, and possessing, one would naturally suppose, more than ordinary ability—the pitiable part of it is that in seeking a seat in this House he apparently lost sight of the big things and descended to the small and petty. He asks, "Are we to ruin Canada for the sake of England?" "No," he says, "I have no hesitation in saying no to that." Ruin Canada for the sake of England! For England! England, which at the outbreak of war sent across the Channel every man she had—a little army of 150,000 British regulars, every man of them a hero. That little army stopped the German hordes, blocking the way to Calais at a point almost within sight of England. And Calais is in France. That little army, nearly every man of whom lies buried in France, should not have been supported by Canadian arms, according to Mr. Cannon, when he was making his racial appeal in the county of Dorchester. Ruin ourselves for England? England has poured out her money to all the countries engaged on our side in this war to the point almost of bankruptcy, and has thrown into the struggle every available man for the defence of France. Ruin ourselves for England? No, says Mr. Cannon, no.

There is only one kind of bankruptcy or ruin that we have to fear in Canada, and it is not represented by dollars, but it is represented by discredit and dishonour. We need not be afraid of spending money, of spending the extra cent on a letter or on a bottle of medicine, though these taxes were represented as burdens by Mr. Cannon whose candidature was endorsed by the leader of the Opposition. The bankruptcy we have to fear in this country is the bankruptcy of high ideals—ideals which do not seem to be possessed by the Liberal candidate in the county of Dorchester.

An hon. MEMBER: But they are possessed by the people.

Mr. EDWARDS: As my hon. friend has said, they are possessed by the people. I offer my congratulations to the newly-elected Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny), because he is a member of this House sitting on this side, and because he is a member of the Government. But I offer my congratulations more to the people of the county of Dorchester than to Mr. Sévigny. They are to be congratulated because of the stand they have taken. It is a good omen; I take it to mean that the day of the political demagogue in the province of Quebec has passed. Not only the county of Dorchester, but the province of Quebec is to be congratulated because of this victory; as is also the Dominion of Canada and the British Empire. This election was wider, far wider, in its scope and influence than the county of Dorchester, or the province of Quebec, or even the Dominion of Canada.

Allow me to refer to some of the statements made in this connection by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). I desire to test some of the logic of that hon. member. Speaking here a few days ago he said:—

> Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to go and plead with the Liberals of the city and county of Quebec to allow the late Postmaster General to be elected by acclamation. The present Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) passed through the same door that was opened for the late Mr. Casgrain. When the ex-Secretary of State, Mr. Coderre, was elected as the successor of the late Mr. Monk, Sir Wilfrid Laurier again appealed to his people to elect him by acclamation.

And he asks:

> What was the reason for all this?

And this is the answer he gives to his own question:

> The reason was that Sir Wilfrid Laurier wanted Canada to be united, that we might take our full part in the great war that is now in progress.

Will the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) give his endorsation to that question and that answer? Is it true that the right hon. gentleman allowed these members to be elected by acclamation because he wanted Canada to be united while this war was on? If so, is it not as important that Canada should be united now as that Canada should have been united when these members were elected? It seems to me even more important that Canada should be united now. Then, what other inference can we draw from the statements of the hon. member for Bonaventure except this—either that the right hon. leader of the Opposition does not want the country to be united now on account of the war, or else that his influence is not as great now as it was when these other gentlemen were candidates. The hon. member for Bonaventure also says:

> I think this House will not be much surprised should Mr. Sevigny be defeated, and if he is defeated it will be in vindication of a great principle, a principle which should be respected, not only in Canada but everywhere. That principle is that public men must be true to their declarations.

When I read that, I really was surprised to find that a gentleman on the other side could make use of such words. Follow this statement to its logical conclusion, and there are not half a dozen members on that side of the House who would have seats here. Public men true to their declarations! Has the leader of the Liberal party in this House been true to his declarations? What about the declaration he made that he was going to cut off the head of protection and trample on its body? What about his declaration in favour of the reform of the Senate? What about a hundred and one other declarations that he made from one end of the country to the other, and not one of which he ever fulfilled? The hon. member for Bonaventure went further and quoted for us the Nationalist doctrine, and I am going to place it on Hansard again:

(a) No participation by Canada in Imperial wars outside her territory.

(b) To spurn any attempt at recruiting for British troops.

(c) To oppose the establishment in Canada of a naval school with the help and for the benefit of Imperial authority.

(d) Control over our militia and military colleges in time of war as in time of peace and for the defence of our territory exclusively. Refusal to grant leave of absence to any militia officer in order that he may take part in any Imperial war.

The hon. member for Bonaventure says that that was the Nationalist doctrine and the doctrine to which Mr. Sévigny subscribed in 1911.

Mr. MARCIL: In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I may say that I quoted in full the resolution adopted at St. Eustache. I suppose the hon. member is giving a summary of the resolution.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am giving what was given in this House—

Mr. MARCIL: Not by me, I read the resolution itself.

Mr. EDWARDS: Then it was quoted either by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) or the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), if I recollect correctly. The hon. member (Mr. Marcil) will not say that these were not the principles declared—

Mr. MARCIL: I suppose that that is a summary of the resolution, but I should think it would be more satisfactory to the House if the hon. gentleman will refer to the resolution in full. He will find it in Hansard.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am giving here what was given on the floor of this House by the hon. member for Rouville as the Nationalist doctrine, and the hon. member for Bonaventure, and the hon. member for Rouville condemned the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny) because, as it is said, he subscribed to that doctrine in 1911. I would like to ask the hon. member for Bonaventure this question— does he think a man is doing right or is doing wrong in subscribing to that doctrine which I have just read.

Mr. MARCIL: That is not the question.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is the very question. And I will put it again to the hon. member,—does he think that a man is doing right or is doing wrong, who subscribes to the doctrine of no participation by Canada in Imperial wars outside of Canada's own territory?

Mr. MARCIL: I think that under present circumstances he is doing wrong, because the whole of Canada wants to participate in this war. The whole Liberal party has declared that over and over again.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman says that he thinks he is doing wrong now. Does the hon. gentleman think that he was doing wrong in 1911 in subscribing to that doctrine?

Mr. MARCIL: I opposed that policy; we all fought against it in Quebec.

Mr. EDWARDS: You think he was doing wrong?

Mr. MARCIL: Certainly.

Mr. EDWARDS: Let us see where that lands the hon. member for Bonaventure. Speaking the other day in this House, my hon. friend, after paying a glowing tribute to Mr. Lamarche because he had stood true to Nationalist principles, went on to say— he will find it in Hansard:

If the present Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny) had preached this week and last week the same gospel to the electorate of Dorchester that he preached in 1911 he would have been elected by acclamation as was the late Postmaster-General.

The hon. member says to-day that the doctrine of "no participation by Canada in the wars of the Empire" is wrong. He says, therefore, that Mr. Sévigny must have been wrong in 1911; if he was wrong in 1911 he is right now in repudiating that doctrine. But the hon. member for Bonaventure, and the hon. member for Rouville and the right hon. leader of the Liberal party in this House condemned Mr. Sévigny because he dared to repudiate the Nationalist doctrine which they say he espoused in 1911.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I never repudiated Mr. Sévigny for taking the attitude which he did take in this House. I blame him and his party for proclaiming in the province of Quebec that under no circumstances should Canada ever take part in the wars of Great Britain. He obtained his mandate in the 1911 election by appealing to the vilest passions of the human heart.

Mr. MARCIL: I have a correction to make, if the hon. member will permit me. If he will look at the revised Hansard he will see the correction that I have made. It would have been nonsense for me to say what appears in unrevised Hansard; the reporter misunderstood me. What I did say was that if Mr. Sévigny had proclaimed in 1911 the policy that he was now proclaiming, he would have been elected by acclamation. My statement was reversed in the unrevised Hansard.

Mr. EDWARDS: Unfortunately for my hon. friend we have Hansard reporters in this House. I am taking his own words from Hansard and there they are. It is all right for my hon. friend to twist and turn now so that he may change this in some way to suit his purpose.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. gentleman is bound, under the rules of the House, to accept my statement.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am bound under the rules of the House to accept the hon. gentleman's statement. I will accept it, as I have to, under the rules; but I will do so with a mental reservation.

Mr. MARCIL: Reporters are liable to make mistakes as well as anybody.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule is clear that the statement of an hon. member as to his words must be accepted unqualifiedly, which I hope the hon. member for Frontenac will do.

Mr. EDWARDS: The spoken word, Mr. Speaker, or the written, printed or reported word? I am accepting the statement made by the hon. gentleman as recorded on the pages of Hansard. If Hansard made a mistake in the report of the hon. gentleman's speech, the hon. gentleman should have made the necessary correction.

Mr. MARCIL: The moment the unrevised Hansard report came before me I made the correction, as the hon. gentleman will find in the revised Hansard. What I said was that if Mr. Sevigny had preached in 1911 what he was preaching now, he would have gone in by acclamation. How could a Liberal have opposed him now if the policy we are supporting in this House had been supported by him.

Mr. EDWARDS: Do not ask me to explain why a Liberal should do this or that; ask me something easy. I ask my hon. friend to explain how it was that the Liberal party supported a man of Mr. Cannon's calibre—a man who would make use of the expressions that he has used, according to reports in the press?

Mr. MARCIL: Mr. Cannon has made a correction; perhaps my hon. friend does not wish to accept it.

Mr. EDWARDS: Of course he did, just as my hon. friend made a sort of correction.

Mr. MARCIL: I have been 16 years in this House, and my statement has never yet been challenged.

Mr. EDWARDS: If my hon. friend will sit down for the time being, I have something else that I wish to refer to.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope that the hon. member for Frontenac does not mean that he does not accept the statement of the hon. member for Bonaventure.

Mr. EDWARDS: No, Mr. Speaker; I accept the statement of the hon. member for Bonaventure as it is on Hansard, and if the hon. member says that the report in Hansard is not correct, I will accept his statement as he gives it now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that that is what the hon. member for Bonaventure does say. He says that he has corrected the report accordingly.

Mr. EDWARDS: Let us now come back to the subject. The hon. member for Bonaventure at least says that a man who accepts the doctrine of no participation by Canada in Imperial wars outside her territory is doing wrong. It is alleged by the member for Rouville that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue did subscribe to that doctrine in 1911 and that he was opposed for that reason. In other words, if he had remained true to that doctrine he would have been elected by acclamation; because he did not remain true to that doctrine he was to be punished. The member for Bonaventure and the member for Rouville placed the Minister of Inland Revenue, the present Postmaster-General, and the Hon. Mr. Coderre all in the same box with regard to their Nationalist proclivities in 1911. The member for Bonaventure states also that his leader allowed certain of those members who had professed Nationalist principles to be elected by acclamation, but would not allow this particular gentleman, who had professed that doctrine but had since repudiated it, to be elected by acclamation. What explanation is there other than that they sought to punish him because he had fallen away from that nefarious doctrine of 1911? The hon. Minister of Inland Revenue said the other day:

I placed the question of the war before my electors and told them that it was their duty to make all sacrifices to assure victory.

We on this side of the House can all subscribe to that doctrine, but hon. gentlemen on the other side cannot. They endorse Mr. Lamarche for sticking to his Nationalist principles, but they have no mercy or consideration for a man who came to the conclusion that the principles that he had espoused in 1911 were wrong. If ever there was a time when a minister of the Crown deserved to be elected by acclamation, this was the time, even from the standpoint of hon. gentlemen opposite, because he had repudiated the doctrines which they said they were opposed to. Another reason why they should have offered him no opposition is that given by the member for Bonaventure as to why these other gentlemen were not opposed: because Canada should be united while this war is in progress.

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) referred quite extensively to the matter of recruiting in the province of Quebec, and I desire to place upon Hansard some views upon that matter. Allow me to quote from a paper called l'Autorité, of the issue of September 5, 1914. That French-Canadian paper makes this statement:—

Of the thirty thousand troops at Valcartier, how many are French-Canadians? We cannot answer this question with any degree of certainty, but from the best information at hand we are led to believe that there are scarcely four hundred.

I also wish to quote from l'Evenement of date June 4, 1916, which says:—

We must perforce submit to evidence. The recruiting campaign in the province of Quebec is almost a complete fiasco. . . After twenty-two months of war it would be stupid to try and justify this extraordinary fact by local considerations. It is better to admit this truth publicly—The large majority of French Canadians is hostile to the idea of all participation in the war. Why? First by lack of military vocation; second by antipathy to the cause of Great Britain.

We add immediately that, from our point of view, this antipathy for the British cause is a misfortune. . . The respect of civil authority represented by the King does not exist any longer in this province. . . Most certainly, the Catholic Episcopate reacts against this pernicious tendency, and the elite of the laity cordially seconds its wishes. But the lower clergy, the politicians in favour, and the French Canadian middle class are indifferent or hostile to the Mother Country and to our compatriots of English origin. Is it not time to loudly and frankly express this sad truth?

I have quoted from two French-Canadian papers. I wish now to quote some expressions given utterance to by the hon. member for Bonaventure in regard to this matter of recruiting.

Mr. MARCIL: What is that paper l'Evenement of Quebec, and who is the editor of it?

Mr. EDWARDS: Very frankly I answer: I do not know, and I do not care.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to tell him?

Mr. EDWARDS: If it will satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. MARCIL: It is the chief Conservative organ in the city of Quebec, and the editor is Mr. Bernard, who was Mr. Sévigny's candidate in the county of Dorchester in the provincial election and was defeated by Mr. Cannon.

Mr. EDWARDS: And the other?

Mr. MARCIL: The other is published in Montreal, by a man who is not in politics. It is a Sunday paper and it hits at both political parties.

Mr. EDWARDS: The whole thing is then that one paper has the misfortune to be published by a Conservative and the other by a man who is not in politics. If my hon. friend gets any comfort from that he is entitled to that comfort.

Let me refer to other statements and see if my hon. friend will get as much comfort out of them. The hon. gentleman, speaking in this House the other day, said:

All Canadians, regardless of their origin, regardless of the province in which they reside, are one in wishing that the Allies will soon win a great victory, the victory of civilization and of humanity.

That is a very nice expression. We will see if it is borne out by the facts. The hon. gentleman also says:

If there is anybody in this country who has reason to be loyal to the British flag it is the French-Canadian. I want you and the members of this House to put this down deep in your hearts, that the last gun to be fired here in defence of the Union Jack will be fired by a French-Canadian, because for us the British flag means all that we have.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is very nice language and I think I have heard something like that several times before. Allow me to call my hon. friend's attention to this fact, that nearly always when they are speaking in those terms, they refer to the last gun being fired for the defence of the flag and say it will be fired by a French-Canadian. Now, we are not so much concerned about the last gun, we would like some one to go over and fire the first gun and the middle gun; to take a crack at it along that line. Allow me to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) and the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and some other gentlemen who have got off that last gun business in this House, to, for Heaven's sake the next time they are bringing that up as an evidence of the loyalty and devotion of French-Canadians of the province of Quebec, change that word 'last" to "first." Let us have a change in that way.

My hon. friend from Bonaventure said in the course of his remarks the other day that certain of the people of his province took a limited view of their duties as British subjects. These are his words, they are not mine. I cannot be blamed for repeating them. He also said:

We are with the Allies, and there is not a man, woman or child in the province of Quebec who is not in some way or other helping the cause of the Allies.

In what way does he think a certain man by the name of Bourassa is helping the cause of the Allies, or is he to be left out of Quebec? There is another gentleman down there by the name of Lavergne. Does my hon. friend include him in the list of every man, woman and child, or does he place him out of the category of men?

Mr. MARCIL: I will make an exception of those two.

Mr. GAUTHIER: The exception proves the rule.

Mr. EDWARDS: If my hon. friend will except many others, we may let the matter pass. Now, about this remark of my hon. friend from Bonaventure, I hope I am quoting him correctly—again I am quoting from Hansard, although he may have had this corrected. I shall give him an opportunity to say:

All that could possibly be done in Quebec has been done to give the ranks of the Allies a fair representation of the people of the province of Quebec.

All that could be done has been done? So he alleges.

If the Government would send a circular throughout my constituency saying: We need 500 shantymen at $40 a month for a period of six months, they would get them in a week. If they would send another circular saying: We need so many deep sea fishermen and we are going to pay them so much a day and employ them for so long, they would have an immediate response.

Oh, indeed? So in the county of Bonaventure, according to my hon. friend's statement, if the Government wants somebody to cut wood or to fish, the county of Bonaventure can provide them and provide them speedily and quickly provided they pay so much a day or a month and agree to employ them for a certain specified time.

Mr. MARCIL: If my hon. friend will allow me to explain—

Mr. EDWARDS: I am sorry if I am getting on my hon. friend's nerves.

Mr. MARCIL: I made those remarks in connection with the National Service, which I understood had no miltary intent whatever.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARCIL: Is that the intention of the Government or not? The Government have declared that the cards were sent out for economic reasons and not for military purposes.

Mr. EDWARDS: Allow me to point out that there is a bigger National Service than that represented by the National Service cards. I wonder does my hon. friend realize that. But at the same time since, he challenges me in regard to those words of his not of mine. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) asked:

If the Government sent out a request for 200 volunteers, would they get them in your constituency?

What was the answer of my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) to that? He said:

If my hon. friend from North Grey will come down to the county of Bonaventure to spend his vacation two thousand Scotch Presbyterians will give him his answer.

Mr. MARCIL: Is that not fair?

Mr. EDWARDS: Was it from the Scotch Presbyterians that my hon. friend's constituency sent the one per cent of its population, as he alleged to the war? The only man he mentioned as having gone from his county was a man who bore the name of Maguire. That sounds somewhat Irish to me. But there it is on Hansard, and it is unfortunate that my hon. friend should express himself in such a way that he has to correct himself and make explanations later on.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to explain now? In answering my hon. friend from North Grey, I did not want to impose upon him the obligation of coming to my constituency and addressing the French people there. What I intended to say was that I would get together two thousand English-speaking citizens of Bonaventure county at New Richmond, in the centre of the county, and give him the opportunity of making the appeal he was then making. That is what I meant.

Mr. EDWARDS: Very good. I notice that my hon. friend did not answer the question of the hon. member for North Grey as to whether Bonaventure would give him two hundred recruits.

Mr. MARCIL: Will my hon. friend allow me to make another explanation; it will be the last one.

Mr. EDWARDS: My hon. friend is rather infringing the rule. I understood that an hon. member could speak only once in the debate on the Address.

Mr. MARCIL: It is merely an explanation.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not wish to prevent my hon. friend from making his explanations. However, I will not dwell too long on one point, because there are one or two others.

Mr. MARCIL: I will tell my hon. friend exactly how things are. We are all interested in recruiting at the present time. The Rev. Father Freve, who is, I understand, in the employ of the Militia Department, has been going through the whole county of Bonaventure, accompanied by two officers. They have practically made a house to house visit, and I am told that the reports are very satisfactory. My hon. friend can obtain the exact figures from the Militia Department at any time.

Mr. EDWARDS: The reverend gentleman deserves the highest commendation for his patriotic action and service. The hon. member for Bonaventure made a reference to a regiment which was raised in the province of Quebec and the colonel of which was named Asselin, who, I believe, was at one time in his career a Nationalist. Referring to the fact that this regiment had been sent to Bermuda, my hon. friend, according to Hansard, made use of these words:—

> There a mistake was made. This gallant band of French Canadians who were anxious to go to the front were sent to Bermuda to do the work of the coloured men in that place.

What was my hon. friend's purpose in making a statement of that kind? Was he desirous of helping recruiting, or was he desirous of stirring up a little bit the people of his province in regard to this particular regiment? Was he desirous of conveying the idea that, because Colonel Asselin was at the head of a French-Canadian battalion, that battalion was being imposed upon by being sent to Bermuda to do the work of the negro? What was the explanation of that statement? I have indicated how it appeared to me, and I cannot draw any other inference from it. Otherwise, why was it made?

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), copying the President of the United States, who plagiarized the statement of some Emperor down in Brazil some sixty years ago, spoke a day or two after the hon. member (Mr. Marcil), and made use of practically the same words. The hon. gentleman said:

> I was also elected chairman of the Civilian Committee that helped to raise the Asselin Battalion, and in less than three months we had raised that battalion, which I regret to say, instead of being sent to the front was sent to Bermuda to do the work of the negroes there.

What was the object of the hon. member for Rouville in making a statement of that kind if it was not to jar the minds of the people in the province of Quebec? But this same hon. gentleman, who represents Rouville in this House, is on record in Hansard of 1916, page 4152, as having used these words:

> Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, I received a telegram from Mr. Asselin saying how proud he was to inform me that he had been ordered to go to Bermuda. I suppose it is for training purposes, as other battalions have been sent to Bermuda, and that ultimately it will go to France. It is very anxious to go to the front.

What do you think, Mr. Speaker, what can any person think of an hon. member who was a member of the Liberal Government getting up in this House and making the statement that the Asselin regiment was sent to Bermuda to do the work of negroes when that same gentleman had stated last session that he had received a telegram from Colonel Asselin to the effect that he was proud to have been sent to Bermuda? What could have been his object? Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the failure in getting recruits. I will tell them why we are not getting recruits in the province of Quebec as we should get them, and as we would get them if the people of that province were allowed to follow their own consciences in the matter. It is because hon. gentlemen like the member for Bonaventure, (Mr. Marcil) and the member for Rouville, (Mr. Lemieux) are poisoning the minds of the people of Quebec, and have been doing so for the last two or three years. That is the reason why the province of Quebec is not recruiting as it should in this war.

The French Canadian Battalion referred to was not the only battalion sent to Bermuda. A battalion from the city of Ottawa was sent there, but no reference was made to that fact by the hon. gentleman. Why was the Asselin Battalion sent to Bermuda? As the hon. member for Rouville says it was raised in three months, which shows what men can do when they go to work earnestly and sincerely. What was the best course to follow if they wanted to get that regiment to the front? Was it not to send it to Bermuda where they could train during the winter to better advantage than they could here? That is the reason why these battalions went there. The Asselin regiment was sent to the front and like every other battalion containing French-Canadians, it has done splendid service. No better men have been placed in the field by any country on God's earth or have done better work—that is the admission of officers—than the French-Canadian soldiers who have gone overseas. I pay them that tribute, and I pay it gladly. The only thing is, we want more of them, and I repeat that we would have more of them but for such poisonous stuff as has been circulated in the province of Quebec by hon. gentlemen who occupy seats in this House.

What are the figures in regard to recruiting in this country? Allow me to place upon Hansard the figures by provinces. These figures show the enlistments up to December 31, 1916:

Ontario..	157,908
Quebec..	41,729
Maritime provinces	34,802
Manitoba and Saskatchewan.	77,254
Alberta..	34,517
British Columbia	37,575

[Mr. Edwards.]

Mr. OLIVER: May I ask the hon. gentleman where he gets these figures?

Mr. EDWARDS: I would not be certain, but I think these figures were given the other day by the Prime Minister himself. They do not include reservists or any one of that kind. I am not perhaps prepared to give the answer to my hon. friend that he would naturally expect, but I will state that the figures I am now giving are up to the end of December, and they are from the Militia Department.

Mr. OLIVER: May I give the reason why I asked the question? I wish to say, on behalf of the province of Alberta, that the figures are absolutely incorrect in that they do not give that province credit for all the men who have been recruited.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, the statement is up to December 31, 1916. My hon. friend may have other information. These figures total 383,967, and the return which I have here shows a total to January 17 of 387,409. What is your district, please?

Mr. OLIVER: Alberta.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is it No. 10?

Mr. OLIVER: Military district No. 13.

Mr. EDWARDS: The return for No. 13, is 34,659 to the middle of January, which differs little from the figure I have given —34,517 to December 31, 1916.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to reflect upon the hon. gentleman's figures, but I do not want the statement to be made, apparently, officially and to go, apparently, uncontradicted. Alberta is credited only with the number of men in the battalions that have been enlisted there, but there have been at least 10,000 men recruited in Alberta for units whose headquarters were outside of the province and these men are credited to those other provinces and units.

Mr. EDWARDS: That, of course, is true of every province. I could name dozens of men from my own county who, in the last four, or five, or ten years, have left my county and gone to some part of the prairie west to settle. Of course, I do not feel that I have a right in these figures to include them amongst the recruits from the province of Ontario. At all events, I have no desire in the world to minimise what Alberta has done. My hon. friend will I know give me credit for that?

Mr. OLIVER: Quite so; I do not throw any aspersions at all upon the hon. gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS: When we take into consideration the population of each of these various districts or divisions, as represented by the last census, that of 1911, we find that the enlistments per thousand of population are as follows:

Ontario	63
Quebec	20
Maritime provinces	38
Manitoba and Saskatchewan	81
Alberta	92
British Columbia	104

Let me put that in another way. The Prime Minister asked for half a million men. What would be the allotment, or fair share, of that half million men to be put down to each of the provinces? The following table will show the allotment of each of the provinces and the percentage of the allotment which has been enlisted:

Province	Allotment.	Percentage Enlisted.
Ontario	170,213	93
Quebec	138,298	30
Maritime provinces	65,957	53
Manitoba and Saskatchewan (including a portion of Northwestern Ontario	70,213	110
Alberta	34,517	135
British Columbia	29,787	126

Now, commenting upon this statement, might I here remind the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) that he made a little mistake the other day, not intentionally, of course, if Hansard has correctly reported him, in saying that the population of Ontario was one million greater than the population of Quebec. I do not know where he gets those figures. The population of Ontario is 2,500,000, according to the last Dominion census, and the population of Quebec is a little over 2,000,000. He was just wrong by about half a million. It will be seen that Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have enlisted more than their allotment. I may say, also, that these figures are based upon the census of 1911, and it is only fair to state that the population of the western provinces probably has increased more rapidly than has the population of the eastern provinces since that time. But the showing of the western provinces is magnificent; we are all proud of the showing they have made and the members from the west have every reason for pride in what the divisions represented by them have done.

Let me point out to the House, Mr. Speaker, that if the province of Quebec had done as well as the Maritime Provinces, that is to say, if Quebec had recruited 53 per cent of its allotment, instead of 30 per cent, it would mean 31,568 more men in uniform to-day, and it would bring the total up to 415,535. If Quebec had recruited, as well as the province of Ontario, 93 per cent of its allotment, it would mean 86,888 more men, and bring the total up to 470,855. The provinces of the west have done better than Ontario even, but if Quebec had done as well as Ontario—and there is no reason why Quebec should not do as well as Ontario—then, counting in the reservists and so on, we would have to-day more than the half million men that were promised by the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden.

Let me still further call your attention to this fact, that Manitoba and Saskatchewan have contributed 7,041 over their allotment in the half million, British Columbia, 7,970 over its allotment, and Alberta, 8,985. Altogether the western provinces have contributed 23,996 more men than their allotment or fair share of the half million promised by the Prime Minister.

Is there anything fair about that? Do you wonder that in certain parts of the country there are people who say that we should have compulsory service? Do you wonder that there are in several parts of Canada people who see the unfairness of this, who recognize that one of the greatest provinces of this Dominion has been rather behind in the matter of recruiting while the other provinces are making up the numbers required of them? More than that I want to say this: Our boys at the front feel this and feel it keenly. They are obliged to stay in the trenches for months and months at a time instead of getting that relief which they are entitled to. On the enlistment—30,000 or 40,000 more French-Canadians, or recruits from the province of Quebec, would give them more opportunities to go back and rest and more chance of coming out of the war.

These are things of a practical character, and I bring them to the attention of the House because I think the House should be seized of the facts. I think the time has arrived in the Dominion of Canada when it behooves every hon. gentleman opposite from the province of Quebec to go down to that province and place the facts fairly before the people. Tell them that it is not only the men of France who are laying down their lives in this war, but the women of France, and, I may add, the children as well. Tell them that England is doing her part, that to-day there are millions of British soldiers in France gradually crowding the German foe back off French soil. Tell them that the very best blood of England is being sacrificed in defence of liberty and justice. Point out to them what German success in ths war would mean to the province of Quebec as well as to the rest of Canada. Place men of the Bourasa and Lavergne type, who have been preaching treason for years, where they belong. I believe the people of the province of Quebec would respond to such an appeal if hon. gentlemen opposite did not at the same time breathe in their ears excuses for not recruiting, as they have done from time to time, and as was done just recently by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal party in this country. Speaking in Montreal, on the 4th or 5th of June, at a meeting in aid of the 178th Battalion, the right hon. leader of the Opposition referred to a recitation which had just been given on the suppression of the French language in Alsace, and said:

> There was something very apropos in the choice of this recitation, because the French language is menaced in other countries besides Alsace. . . So long as there are French mothers in Canada the French language will not die.

That remark was naturally received with vociferous applause. A few days later another man from Quebec, speaking at Hull, said:

> Do not deceive yourselves. The Prussianism in Alsace-Lorraine is not so oppressive as the Prussianism of Ontario and Manitoba.

That man was Bourassa. You will note, Mr. Speaker, the same ring in both these quotations. The language used by Mr. Bourassa is almost word for word the same as that used by the right hon. leader of the Opposition in Montreal. And what was the purpose of using such language at a recruiting meeting in the city of Montreal? Was the right hon. gentleman more concerned in getting political recruits than recruits for the army? What other interpretation can you place on his language? What earthly reason was there for making use of language of that kind at a meeting the object of which was to induce men to come forward and enlist? Were statements of that kind calculated to make men come forward and enlist? Were they not rather calculated to make men who wanted an excuse quote his very words as the reason why they should not enlist? That is the sort of thing I condemn, and I am not the man to stand up and condemn men like the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and let pass what I think should be condemned in a man very much higher than either of them can ever hope to be.

That is not the only expression that has been made use of by the right hon. gentleman in times past to which I wish to refer. At that same meeting in Montreal he said that the thought that had been with him in all his long political career was "to perfect the harmony and bring together the two elements composing our nation." It seems to me, Sir, that the right hon. gentleman was very unfortunate in the means which he adopted to bring about harmony. He was unfortunate last session in forcing this House to pass upon the bilingual question. Why could he not have waited until the Privy Council had given its decision? Why? Because it would not have had the same political effect. Because it was necessary to make an appeal to the people of the province of Quebec, and that was as good a thing as he could possibly get to appeal to them on. His concern was to consolidate, if it was possible, the province of Quebec for political purposes, not to consolidate it in the interests of this war or in the interests of the Empire. The right hon. gentleman from time to time has made use of expressions which have led astray the people of his province, and many other people in this country. What was his object years ago when speaking in Boston he said:

> It is a mistake, a fatal mistake, to make allegiance, British allegiance the basis of trade.

It seems to me that language of that kind used by the right hon. gentleman in a foreign country has a bad ring to it. Referring to British displomacy in 1892, he said:—

> British diplomacy in so far as Canada is concerned has been a record of failure, of surrender and sacrifice.

In using that language, was it the right hon. gentleman's idea to bring together the two peoples and win the respect of the people of Canada for British institutions, or was his object to come nearer to the day when he would reach the goal of his aspirations, which he has repeatedly stated to be the independence of Canada? The right hon. gentleman also used the following language in this House in 1892 (Hansard, p. 1145):—

> The hon. gentleman stated also that at Boston I had said that the conduct of Great Britain and of Canada during the American Civil war had been unworthy of British civilization. Sir, I would not have been guilty of making that statement in a foreign country if I had not made it again and again in my native land, and even on the floor of this House. In the year 1889, I stated in the presence of the Government what I stated in Boston, that in my estimation the conduct of Great Britain and the conduct of Canada had been unworthy of the civilization both of Great Britain and of Canada. I stated the same thing at Boston.

What was his object in making use of statements of that kind? Those statements are not in accordance with the facts. The right hon. gentleman should know that the Archives of Canada contain the published thanks of the Government of the United States of that day to the Government of Canada and the Canadian people for the wise, prudent, neutral and conservative course which they took during that Civil War. Yet the right hon. gentleman goes to Boston, in a foreign country, and declares that Canada and Great Britain should be ashamed of their conduct during the American Civil War. I could cite many similar utterances of the hon. gentleman. Speaking of British diplomacy, he said:—

Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy the day when we would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy?

At another time he said that if he had been on the banks of the Saskatchewan when the Northwest half-breed rebellion broke out he would have taken up arms against the Government. I understand that the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) and the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes) fought to suppress that rebellion. Just fancy what a calamity it would have been to this country if the right hon. gentleman had gone out there and shouldered a musket and his aim had been true, and he had deprived this country of the present Minister of Justice, or, horror of horrors, if he had deprived it of the services of the ex-Minister of Militia. The only hope these hon. gentlemen would have had would be that the right hon. gentleman was as inaccurate in his marksmanship with the rifle as in his marksmanship throughout his political life.

I wish to call attention to another statement of the right hon. gentleman. Speaking in this House the other day, he said:—

After the passing of a year I think I can repeat that the only complete victory which is being won in this war is the victory which is being achieved by the British Navy.

With those sentiments I heartily agree. This is not the first time the British navy has stood as the bulwark of the liberties of mankind. Ever since the days of Elizabeth the British navy has been the strongest guarantee the world has had of the security of its liberties.

The British navy has kept fourteen million square miles of British territory, during the continuance of this war, so that not a single hostile German has placed his dirty foot upon one inch of it. It has adequately protected in their homes four hundred and fifty millions of this earth's people who live on British soil. It has protected our commerce, and not ours alone but that of France, that of Russia, that of our Allies, and it has driven the commerce of Germany from the seas, and has forced her cruisers and battleships to hide behind land fortifications. We are not the only people who may be thankful that there is a British navy. Over there in the United States are a hundred millions who, if they ever lift their eyes from their money-bags long enough to offer a prayer to Heaven, are thanking God every day they live that there is a British navy. And well they may, because it stands as their security as well as ours.

I wish to call the attention of the House to one fact in this connection. After that memorable battle which Sir David Beatty fought, the Secretary of State for the Colonies sent to the Governor of New Zealand, and also to the Governor of the Malayan States cablegrams of thanks and congratulation. These cablegrams were identical except in the name of the ship referred to; in one case the Malaya and in the other the New Zealand. The cable to the Malayan States was as follows:

The battleship Malaya was in the thick of the naval fight on May 31, and the Admiralty desire once more to place on record the debt of the Mother Country to the Federated Malay States for the generosity which has enabled the navy to place so valuable a unit in the fighting line.

Every man of us, I care not whether he sits on this side of the House or on the other, would be glad to-day if we could read a telegram from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, saying that the battleship Canada, or more than one of our battleships, had been in that fight as were the battleships from New Zealand and Malaya. The premier oversea dominion of this Empire, the brightest jewel in the British Crown as we proudly call it, could not supply a battleship for that fighting line, but the Malayan States and every other oversea dominion took part in strengthening that navy which means the very existence of this country, our national independence, and the liberties we prize. Let me add one word. I quote now from the naval expert of the London Chronicle, a newspaper regarded as the mouthpiece of the British Liberals and one of the strongest supporters of the Government of that time, the Asquith Government, in a discussion of the naval battle to which I have referred.

> Sir David Beatty could have overwhelmed the enemy if Britain could have given him three or four more battle cruisers than were assigned to his command.

Had Sir David Beatty had three or four more battleships, he could have smashed and obliterated the German fleet. And whose fault is it that he did not have these battleships? The blame is not to be laid at the door of hon. gentlemen on this side. We voted the money; we were willing to spend $35,000,000 in supplying three battle cruisers to strengthen the navy. But opposition came from the leader of the other side of the House, and the Bill was defeated by his partisan Senate at his command. The responsibility lies at his door. It was the party of hon. gentlemen opposite who refused to allow us to strengthen that navy which they, as well as we on this side, recognize as the greatest guarantee of our liberty and our greatest security from danger.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. EDWARDS (continuing): I wish to place upon Hansard one or two more extracts from the remarks of probably one of the greatest authors that this country has ever produced. I refer to the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition. One of the gems in the political literature of the right hon. gentleman is the following statement:

> I am ready any day, whether I am charged with annexation or not, to take a Yankee dollar in preference to an English shilling.

Whatever the faults of the right hon. gentleman may be, no one can truthfully say that he is mercenary. He is not a man who is after the dollars for himself, and never has been; therefore when he made use of this expression he was not laying particular emphasis upon the value of a shilling or of a dollar—he was rather using the words in another sense. Such expressions are unfortunate, especially when they come from a man who has occupied the position which the right hon. gentleman has occupied.

At the time of the South African war he said:

> There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so.

But when an agitation arose from one end of this country to the other in favour of taking action, troops were sent from Canada. If we except those sent by Lord Strathcona, about 2,500 men were sent to play their part in that war—and they were sent on the c.o.d. principle.

At the Imperial Conference in 1907 Dr. Smart, Premier of Cape Colony, brought forward this resolution:

> That this Conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the Empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the Dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the upkeep of the navy, as may be determined by their local legislatures, the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the Admiralty and as would best accord with their varying circumstances.

Speaking to that resolution, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> I am sorry to say so far as Canada is concerned that we cannot agree to the resolution. For my part, if the motion were pressed to a conclusion, I should have to vote against it.

I do not think that on that occasion the right hon. gentleman truly represented the sentiments and feeling of the people of Canada. These expressions of the right hon. gentleman have had a great deal to do with the framing of opinion in Canada, especially in his native province, where he is held in high and, one would almost say, venerable esteem by the great mass of the people as one of their compatriots.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) in the course of his remarks the other day made a vigourous attempt to connect the Prime Minister with the Nationalist party. He referred to the by election in Drummond and Arthabaska, in which Mr. Gilbert was elected. He said that Mr. Gilbert had run as a Nationalist and had been introduced in the House by the present Prime Minister; the hon. gentleman's idea being to link up the Prime Minister with the Nationalists. If my hon. friend will turn to Hansard of November 28, 1910, he will find that Mr. Gilbert was introduced not by the present Prime Minister but by the Hon. Mr. Monk and Dr. Paquet, the member for L'Islet. I merely refer to that to set the matter right in the minds of the people. We have ample evidence that there is not now and never has been anything in common between the Nationalists or the principles for which they stand and the right hon. Prime Minister. They are as far apart as the poles. Not an expression which has been uttered by the leader of the Nationalist party or any member of it can find its counterpart in any utterances by the Prime Minister. On the contrary, expressions used by Henri Bourassa and other leading Nationalists in the province of Quebec do find their counterparts in language repeated again and again for years back by the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition.

I wish again to refer for a moment to the matter of recruiting. The member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) said on January 18, 1916, page 54 of Hansard for that year:

> In six months, the turn of the tide having taken place, the public of the province of Quebec will have been educated—yes, educated as regards this war, because the population being largely rural, and having enjoyed peace for a hundred years, is not, as many would think, so much affected by events in Europe as other sections of Canada, because it is Canadian born, seven, eight, nine, ten generations back. I say that the public, having been made acquainted with the facts concerning the war, thanks to the eloquence of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, thanks to the campaign of my hon. friend the Postmaster General, thanks to the articles published by the Quebec press—> within six months we shall have nearer 20,000 than 15,000 new recruits in the province of Quebec.

He does not mention what part of the Quebec press; I suppose he does not refer to Le Devoir.

After two years of the bloodiest conflict that the world has ever seen; after two years of fighting that had been drawing to the limit upon the resources of the Empire in men and money, the hon. gentleman looked forward to what would be done at the end of another six months. Well, the six months have passed, Something must have been wrong in the methods of the educational processs which, as the hon. gentleman suggests, was being vigorously carried out by his right hon. leader. Some little word must have been thrown in which weakened the influence of even his most eloquent appeal for recruits.

In speaking of enlistment this afternoon I was not quite fair to the province of Ontario. The figures relating to certain portions of Ontario, embracing the large towns of Port Arthur, Fort Williaim, Rat Portage, and Rainy River, were included in those relating to Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It is estimated that some 6,000 men have enlisted from this district, the northwestern part of Ontario. I do not know whether or not that is strictly correct; at any rate a number of enlistments included in the figures for Saskatchewan and Manitoba should very properly have been included in those relating to Ontario. This would bring the Ontario figures up to 96 per cent of the total allotment of the 500,000 instead of 93 per cent, still showing an excess on the part of Saskatchewan and Manitoba over their allotment.

Mr. DEVLIN: The same applies to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec: in Military District No. 3, the Kingston district, for instance.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not understand that district No. 3 included any portion of the province of Quebec.

Mr. DEVLIN: I understand that it includes Pontiac, Wright, Labelle and Argenteuil.

Mr. EDWARDS: I was not aware of that; I am very glad to accept the correction. I am credibly informed, however, that the total number of French-Canadian enlistments in Canada since the war began is 17,400, of whom 14,200 have gone overseas.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these figures official?

Mr. EDWARDS: I have these figures on the very best authority.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they official?

Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, I think they are.

Mr. MARCIL: The Premier refused to give an answer to a question of that kind last session. I read to him figures prepared by Senator Mason in the other House, and the Premier said that there were no official figures.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am well aware of that. I myself asked for information along these lines and failed to get it, but I understand that the figures have since been compiled.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they officially compiled?

Mr. EDWARDS: Officially compiled by officers of the Militia Department. Nobody else could compile them.

Mr. MARCIL: They have never been brought down in the House.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is true. Neither have the figures that the hon. gentleman gave the other day been brought down except by himself. I am giving these figures on what I believe to be good authority, and the hon. gentleman has the same opportunity that I have of confirming them by asking for a return in the regular way.

Be that as it may, whether it is 17,000 or 20,000 or 25,000, the fact is that the province of Quebec has not recruited in the same proportion as other parts of the Dominion. There is no question of that, nor do I think that any person will attempt to question that statement for a moment. I repeat what I said this afternoon, that in my judgment the fault for that does not rest with the mass of the people of the province of Quebec. No person can make me believe that the mass of the people of the province of Quebec are less courageous than the mass of the people of any other province in Canada. As a matter of fact, those who have gone to the front from Quebec have proved themselves just as good stuff as any men from any country in the world, and I would not be acting fairly if I did not pay them that tribute and pay it gladly; it is their due. The fault lies, I am afraid, in the fact that a certain set of politicians, political leaders down in the province of Quebec, have made their chief stock in trade in political elections anti-British talk. In election after election in that province, in order to get votes they have depended upon playing on the passions of the people, appealing to them on racial grounds. That is what I wish to condemn and to condemn as strongly as I can.

Some hon. gentlemen speaking in this House—the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and some others—say that the reason we did not get recruits is that the wrong class of men were sent down there, that it is no use sending these Cabinet ministers from Quebec there, that they are not the right class of men. Then why under Heaven did they not go themselves? There is nothing to stop the hon. member for Rouville, the hon. member for Bonaventure, or any of the rest of them from going on the stump in Quebec, as practically every man from Ontario has done throughout his constituency. There is nothing to prevent them going on the stump and attending recruiting meetings.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. gentleman—

Mr. EDWARDS: Will my hon. friend keep quiet? They cannot lay the blame entirely—

Mr. MARCIL: Will the hon. gentleman deny that I went on the stump to advocate recruiting?

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. PARDEE: Yes, you did.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not make use of any expression that could be construed into that language at all. I did not say anything of the kind. I said there was nothing to prevent the hon. gentlemen from going on the stump recruiting. It is up to the hon. gentleman. He knows to what extent he availed himself of the privilege of appealing to the electors of the province of Quebec; and I want to tell my hon. friend from Bonaventure that, if in speaking at recruiting meetings in the province of Quebec he adopted the same line of argument and the same line of talk that he adopted in his address in this House the other day, he could not expect to have much result. That is the point I wish to bring home to the hon. gentleman. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) said the other day:

> I want to say this, that at this present time and under these conditions, when the future of the world depends upon the success of the allied armies, inefficiency is treason—

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: (reading)

> —and the talk that leads to inefficiency is treason.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS: To part of that I am prepared to subscribe. The hon. gentleman says inefficiency is treason. I am not prepared to subscribe to that literally; it depends on whether that inefficiency—governmental inefficiency I presume is meant—is wilful or not. There was a certain amount of inefficiency, nobody can deny it, in the Government of Great Britain. Inefficiency was found in every department, in every arena of the war; that is, a certain amount of inefficiency, and as it was found it was corrected as fast as possible. But will the hon. member say that because it was found advisable to replace Premier Asquith, of England, by a man whom I presume they considered would be more efficient, Mr. David Lloyd George, therefore any inefficiency that there was while Premier Asquith was First Minister is to be characterized as treason? I say no; I will not subscribe to that literally, but I will subscribe to the latter part of the hon. member's sentence and say that the talk that leads to inefficiency is treason. I will subscribe to that, and I will refer my hon. friend to a good deal of the talk which has emanated from hon. gentlemen on his own side of the House, talk which was not calculated to advance recruiting or to make our efforts more efficient, talk such as that which fell from the lips of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) the other day, the wild talk of that man—was that the kind of talk which was likely to lead to efficiency or inefficiency? Was that the kind of talk which would produce recruits in this country, or which would encourage men in this country in recruiting? Was the talk of the hon. member for Assiniboia not calculated to provide any man who wanted an excuse for not enlisting with a reason why he should not give his services in this war? I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton and I refer his words to the hon. member for Assiniboia and to the hon. member for Rouville and other gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House, and who have spoke in regard to this matter not only here, but throughout the country. I also refer the words of the hon. member for Edmonton to certain of the newspapers throughout Canada which have used their columns for party political purposes, regardless of the effect this would have upon recruiting in this country. Their first aim, their chief object—and they have demonstrated it up to the hilt from one end of Canada to the other—has been to try and bring this Government into disgrace, and effect a change of government in this country. They have been more concerned about the welfare of their own political party than about the conduct of this war and its successful termination. That is what I state here to-night, and I state it with a full knowledge of exactly what my words mean.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the other day, referring to the war and its possible termination, said:—

> On the contrary, it seems to me that there are circumstances which may lead us confidently to expect that at the end of this year, 1917, we shall see the beginning of the great victory for which we have been fighting during the last thirty months.

I sincerely hope, as every man in this country hopes, that the right hon. gentleman's prediction will prove true. I am going to assume that in making that statement the right hon. gentleman said what he believed to be true. Of course, no person can tell when the war will terminate, but in the opinion of the right hon. gentleman the beginning of victory will be seen at the end of 1917. Now, Mr. Speaker, if we are to take that as a correct prophecy, it means that if the beginning of victory is to take place at the end of 1917, it will be well into 1918 before victory will be finally achieved, and our men at the front in a position to come home. I have referred to this matter for this reason: in the Speech from the Throne reference is made to a further extension of the life of this Parliament. I say that it would be one of the greatest disgraces in the history of the Dominion of Canada if we deliberately do that which will disfranchise those soldiers who are at the front risking their lives for Canada.

Some hon. gentleman opposite referred to the Act enabling soldiers to vote and said, if I mistake not, that they thought at the time the Bill was introduced that it was insufficient, and so on, and wondered why it was introduced at all. Surely we will all agree that if an election must come, provision should be made to give those men a chance, even if it be a poor chance, to poll their votes. Since the attempt of the province of British Columbia to poll the vote of soldiers at the front, we have all become aware, I think, of the difficulties attending such an attempt. In that case, if I am correctly informed, they were only capable of polling about one quarter of the votes. My point is that, if the right hon. gentleman is correct in his prophecy that the war will not end until 1918, I suppose the right hon. gentleman, if he is to be logical, will say when this Bill for extension comes up; because I believe that it will be impossible to poll the vote of the soldiers at the front, because I believe that those men, more perhaps than any other men of our country, are entitled to poll their votes, I will grant an extension of Parliament for that reason, if for no other. I submit, Sir, that this is a sufficient reason for granting an extension of the term of this Parliament, in order that we may give the men who have gone over there to risk their lives an opportunity to poll their votes in the next general election. If hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere in stating that they believe that that vote will be overwhelmingly cast in their favour, and in condemnation of this Government, then all the more reason why hon. gentlemen opposite, being human, as all of them are, should accede to the proposition of extending the life of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I referred very briefly this afternoon to what was done by that first band of 150,000 British regulars who went over to France at the beginning of the war and blocked the road to Calais. Since I spoke this afternoon I have come across a statement which I desire to place upon Hansard. It is from a leading French newspaper, and refers to what that band of soldiers did. It reads as follows:

> It was their difficult mission to bar the road to the new German invasion between Ypres and La Bassée. To accomplish it they had to hold the trenches for several weeks, in face of an enemy which was not only superior in number but which also attacked with the resolution of despair. In many places at the beginning of this new battle the British lines were so thin that without the display of a stubbornness worthy of Waterloo they were in danger, if not of being broken, at least of being driven back in perilous conditions. None the less they held on.

Sir, I want to place that on Hansard as a tribute to that first army which Britain sent over to France, and I desire to say—and I say it with the full consciousness of all the glorious deeds that have been performed by other armies on our side since the war began,—that I do not believe there was at that time on the face of this earth another 150,000 men that could have done what those 150,000 British regulars did. That is the tribute I desire to pay to those men. In that connection, before I sit down, allow me to read a sentence uttered by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) the other day. In referring to the magnificent stand made by the French troops at Verdun, my hon. friend used words which appealed to me because of the poetry in them. This is what he said:

> Only once or twice in history has the world witnessed such a spectacle of greatness at tension. Everything spiritual in a nation touched with genius has been mobilized.

That was his tribute to the French soldiers who held out against overwhelming odds for so long at Verdun, and it is none too great a tribute to pay to those men. We will all agree, I am sure, in that. But there was another time in history when men did as much. To that time I referred just a few moments ago. Later on, I think there was another achievement which came very close indeed to those two exhibitions of valour, the one referred to at Verdun, and the other by the first army from Britain. That was the achievement by our own Canadian troops against overwhelming odds when they held the salient at Ypres. These are deeds to which we as Canadians may refer with justifiable pride. I wish we could apply the words of the hon. member for Rouville to every part of this country. I wish that were possible.

Mr. Speaker, I said this afternoon that Germany had committed crimes and atrocities that none of us two and a half years ago would have thought it possible that any civilized nation would commit. I tried to point out that the reason why the German people had got into that condition of mind was that for thirty or forty years they had been assiduously and persistently trained along wrong lines, that false ideals had been brought before them, and that they had been taught certain doctrines in their schools and colleges and universities and from their pulpits until their minds were utterly perverted and they became capable of committing acts which no other nation on earth, at least on the Allies' side, could possibly have committed. The point I wish to make is this—and again I desire to refer back to the question of recruiting. It is unfortunate that during his long political career the right hon. gentleman has from time to time thought it advisable to give expression to opinions which, if they had any tendency at all were bound to have a tendency of weakening the regard which the people of Canada would have for Britain and British institutions. I have placed some of these phrases on Hansard and I say that just as the appeal to false ideals brought the German people to the state in which they were, and they are, just so must the many unfortunate remarks which have been made by the right hon. gentleman from time to time against British diplomacy, in favour of annexation and so on, have a tendency to weaken the regard of the people of his native province, who hold him in very high esteem, for British institutions, and in my humble judgment we are now reaping in the lack of recruiting in that province, the fruits of his teaching during the last thirty or forty years. It is unfortunate that it is the case.

A new Canadian nation, a new Canada, has been born on the battlefields of Flanders and baptized by the blood of our own Canadian heroes and it is up to us as Canadian citizens to be worthy of the sacrifice which has been made on far away battlefields in different parts of the world.

The greatest permanent good which we can get out of this war will be in higher ideals, in a nobler character on the part of our people, in a nobler and better conception of our duty as individuals and citizens of a greater Canada and of a greater Empire. I hope, Sir, that one of the results of this terrible struggle which is now going on will be that a greater Canada will grow out of this war and that the Canadians who have taken their place with the best troops of France and Britain and proved their worth upon the battlefield, as well as those of us who have been left behind in safety, will play our part in making this Canada what it is intended to be—one of the greatest countries the world has ever seen.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I was at a loss to understand many of the statements of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Edwards) until I heard him towards the close of his address remark that he was somewhat of a poet. It is well known that poets enjoy a license not accorded to other people. Those of us on this side of the House who are endeavouring in this debate to confine ourselves to facts relating to this war and the conduct of the war must be excused if we refrain from following the flights of this poetic gentleman and any of his friends on that side of the House who may also court the muse.

Mr. Speaker, the political history of the county which you have the honour to represent in this House contains a notable record of public achievement on the part of its representatives both in the Legislature and in Parliament, a record of which your native province is justly proud. In your person, Mr. Speaker, that record has been enhanced by your elevation to the position of first commoner of the Dominion. The congratulations that you have received from your fellow members, and to which I now desire to add my own, are not only an earnest of the belief held by both sides of the House that you will worthily maintain the traditions of the high office to which you have been called, but they are also an assurance that you can count upon your fellow members at all times, and under all circumstances, to assist you in upholding those traditions.

Let me associate myself with those gentlemen on both sides of the House who have extended their felicitations to the mover and the seconder of the address for the way in which they discharged the duties assigned to them at the opening of this session.

This debate has now been in progress for a week. It has been confined chiefly, and properly, to the discussion of the Government's conduct of Canada's part in this war. Incidental to that discussion there has been some analysis of the correspondence exchanged between the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) and the ex-Minister of Militia (Sir Sam Hughes). Mention has also been made of the Bruce report upon hospital conditions overseas and of the failure of the Ross rifle under active service conditions. Dealing only with these three heads of criticism, I desire, Sir, before going into details, to point out that if what the ex-Minister of Militia says in his correspondence be true, if what Dr. Bruce says in his hospital report be true, and if what General Haig says in his report on the Ross rifle be true, then it is clear that unnumbered Canadian lives have been needlessly sacrificed, and that the responsibility rests upon the Government and upon the Government alone. If the Government seeks to escape this responsibility, then I submit that a searching inquiry in each case is necessary, and that these inquiries should be commenced before the House rises for the proposed adjournment. The Prime Minister has already suggested that the approaching recess might be utilized by a committee to revise the Consolidated Railway Act. Important as that work is, it is vastly inferior to the duty cast upon us, as the representatives of the Canadan people, to fix the responsibility for the needless loss of Canadian lives, and for that reason, Sir, I urge, from my place on the floor of this House, that three committees be appointed to investigate the Hughes charges, the Bruce charges and the failure of the Ross rifle, and that these committees conduct their inquiries during the approaching parliamentary recess and have their reports ready when Parliament reassembles after the Prime Minister's return from the Imperial Conference. If this is not done the conclusion will be irresistible that no matter what the Government, or its apologists, may say, its failure to order these inquiries will be due to the fact that it dare not run the risk of the exposures that these inquiries would bring to light. From that position there is no escape for the Government.

In connection with the correspondence between the ex-Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister, let me draw the attention of the House to what happened on Monday last, the 22nd instant, when this subject was first mentioned in Parliament by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Speaking in reply, the Prime Minister not only did not give the House the explanations required by constitutional practice as to the Cabinet change necessitated by the resignation of the ex-Minister of Militia, but he flouted constitutional practice and stepped down to a place never before occupied by any Prime Minister of this country, when he put forward as an answer to the criticism of my right hon. leader a saying attributed to the late Hon. Mr. Tarte; that the members of the Liberal Cabinet of his day "fought like blazes'. A statesmanlike utterance to those Government supporters, who laughed at it, but one which, as a Canadian, I heard fall from the lips of the Prime Minister with great regret. Mr. Speaker, grave matters of public concern are not to be dismissed or brushed aside with smoking-room flippancy. In these days of trial and grief the Canadian people are not concerned about what may or may not have been said or done by Cabinet ministers who are dead and gone. What they are concerned about is whether the charges made by the ex-Minister of Militia against the Prime Minister and his colleagues with reference to their conduct in regard to this war are or are not true. That is the arraignment the Prime Minister has to face, and the people of this Dominion want to know what is his defense to the charges made by his late colleague, the ex-Minister of Militia.

For the purpose of brevity, let me summarize the charges as they are contained in this correspondence. I will take them as they occur in the letters in the order of date, and I pass over purely personal matters, such as the conversations with Kitchener and others, and matters in regard to which the ex-Minister of Militia has not pledged his personal knowledge. Here are the charges made by the ex-Minister of Militia as I have summarized them:

1. That from the outset the management of our forces, supplies, equipment, transport, etc., were taken completely out of our hands and controlled by the British authorities.

2. That for the first ten months of the war our equipment, stores, supplies, armament, everything provided by us was set aside.

3. That the ex-Minister of Militia spoke to the Prime Minister about the rejection of all our stores and supplies of every description and submitted to him a written memorandum proving the utter falsity of the reasons given by the British officers for their rejection of everything that came from Canada, but that nothing was done.

4. That the Pay Department was found to be absolutely chaotic, and that the Medical Service lacked system, efficiency, and comprehensiveness.

5. That a force was raised and managed in spite of all sorts of intrigue.

6. That appointments in the force were based on two avenues of supply, of which one was British officers connected with society people, and the other Canadian Permanent Corps officers, with their usual pull.

7. That few, if any commissions, are of any practical value, and that everybody connected with the Hospitals Commission, the Pensions Board, and the National Service Commission knows of the absurdities they contain.

8. That had the forces been conducted on the basis of formal orders in council the First Division would not have left Valcartier yet.

9. That the Second Division was held in Canada for four months by the Cabinet's petty haggling over the question of paying commissions to agents on the sale of motor trucks, instead of purchasing at the lowest wholesale prices.

10. That no one knew better than the Prime Minister that the statements made by him in his letter of October 31, 1916, regarding the control of the forces during the first year in Great Britain, were not correct.

11. That the Prime Minister's reason for appointing an Overseas Minister of Militia was not, as alleged by him, due to the failure of the ex-Minister of Militia to secure authority by orders in council for his acts, but was the result of several months planing between Sir George Perley and the Prime Minister.

12. That for a long time there were petty intrigues going on in the Cabinet to which the ex-Minister of Militia had shut his eyes as he wanted to win the war.

13. That the Prime Minister had not supported the ex-Minister of Militia in the administration of his department.

14. That from the opening of Valcartier Camp the Prime Minister had agreed that matters of urgency need not be brought before the Privy Council, and that ratifying orders in counil could be passed after action had been taken.

15. That the Minister of Finance never brought before Council any proposed loan for the Dominion of Canada, or any single important act concerning the administration of his department.

16. That the same observation applies to the Minister of Trade and Commerce

17. That two members of the Cabinet were usually antagonistic to anything proposed by the ex-Minister of Militia, and when they opposed him the Prime Minister did not support him.

18. That the Prime Minister asked the ex-Minister of Militia to submit orders in council before incurring large expenditures, so as to set an example and assist the Prime Minister to control the Post Office Department, Railway Department and Public Works Department, where projects had been undertaken without the authority of orders in council.

19. That the Prime Minister also stated that some boats had been purchased and other large expenditures incurred without his knowledge and without orders in council.

20. That for more than a year the ex-Minister of Militia had known of the meddling and intriguing that had been going on to place Sir George Perley in control in England, and that the position taken by the Prime Minister in the correspondence in regard to the matter was untenable.

21. That the Prime Minister was actuated by favouritism rather than by the best interests of the force.

22. That the Prime Minister misrepresented the attitude of the ex-Minister of Militia with regard to the sub-Militia Council.

23. That except when in trouble himself the Prime Minister had never been frank or loyal to the ex-Minister of Militia, and that he rewarded loyalty by preferring those who had been untrue to him.

Mr. Speaker, I have said elsewhere, and I repeat here, that this indictment of the Prime Minister and his colleagues by a member of his own Cabinet is absolutely without parallel in any country enjoying responsible government, and that to find anything approaching it we must go back in English history to the impeachment of Warren Hastings. But there are two features in regard to which the charges of the ex-Minister of Militia are absolutely unique. In the first place, the right hon. the Prime Minister, although he replied to the several letters containing the charges, did not deny the charges, nor in fact did he deny them in his speech in this House last week. In the second place, the Prime Minister dismissed his colleague, not for making the charges, not for incapacity or mismanagement in office, but merely for accusing the Prime Minister of not telling the truth.

Now, Sir, what do these charges reveal? They reveal at the outset divided authority and no attempt made by the Government to end the resulting evils and conflict. They reveal continued indecision, delay, and incapacity, when decision and prompt action were of vital importance. They reveal quarrels and intrigues and treachery within the Cabinet at the most critical periods of the war. They reveal Cabinet contempt for constitutional precedent and practice. They reveal patronage rampant, and the waste of millions of dollars. They reveal from first to last a criminal neglect to which must be attributed the loss of Canadian lives. Therefore, I repeat that if the Government disavows or seeks to escape responsibility a parliamentary inquiry at the earliest possible moment is absolutely necessary.

To the ex-Minister of Militia has been ascribed the reputation of being a fighting man. He is announced to speak in this House to-morrow. To-day's papers tell of strenuous efforts having been made to induce him to spare the Government in his speech. He can do that only at the expense of his own reputation, for these charges are his, and the people of Canada expect a fighting man to stand by his deliberately-written statements. More than that, the people of Canada expect the ex-Minister of Militia to explain why recruiting fell off when his recruting methods were changed about the time he left Canada for England last summer.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and other honourable gentlemen have referred in general terms to the Bruce Report on Canadian military hospitals. If that report is in the hands of the Government it has not yet been laid on the table of the House and it is therefore impossible to discuss it with first-hand knowledge. But its findings were given wide publicity in the press, and they were of such a startling character as to produce a feeling of general alarm throughout the country. That feeling was not allayed by the second or Baptie Report, which, as the right hon. leader of the Opposition said, praised what the Bruce Report blamed, and blamed what the Bruce report praised. The matter cannot be left in this shape, and nothing short of a thorough inquiry will satisfy public opinion. I need only make one citation from each report to prove the necessity for such an inquiry. In the course of his findings Colonel Bruce made the following explicit statement:

> It has been found on investigation that many of the officers who have been given commissions have been failures as medical men at home, or are over age, or are drug fiends, or addicted to alcoholism, and these officers are not only of little or no use as C. A. M. C. officers, but their presence on an overseas unit is a detriment to the efficiency of that corps.

And dealing with this particular finding, the Baptie report says:

> As to allegations of unfitness among officers selected for commissions in the Canadian Medicals, through being over age or addicted to alcohol and other drugs, etc., this is not borne out by facts. Had Col. Bruce added what must have been within his knowledge, that the proportion of undesirables in the corps is at least as low as in any other branch of the service, there would have been no objection to his criticism.

Commenting on these two findings, the Toronto Globe, in its editorial of January 5, 1917, had this to say:

> To ask the people of Canada to set aside Col Bruce's specific charges respecting the drug and alcoholic habits of some of the Canadian medicals on the ground that "the proportion of undesirables in the corps is at least as low as in any other branch of the service," is an insult to the intelligence of Ministers at Ottawa, and to the common sense of the relatives of the men who have gone overseas to fight. The Canadian people will insist that there must be no proportion of undesirables among the medical men entrusted with the grave issues of life and death in the military hospitals. No drug fiends or alcoholic victims should be allowed to remain for a single day in the Canadian Army Medical Service. The thing is intolerable. The Government must act, and act at once.
>
> The Baptie report is not the last word in this controversy. The etiquette of the medical profession is not worth the life of a single Canadian soldier. When Parliament meets the facts must be dragged to the light of day. There is no room in the Canadian Medical Service for a single drug fiend or drunkard. The life of the soldier who is serving his country in the trenches is too sacred to be gambled away in the operating theatre or sick ward by medical men whose efficiency the Baptie report refuses to guarantee.

In the absence of the details of these two reports, there I will leave the matter for the present.

Last week the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) laid on the table of the House correspondence relating to the Ross rifle. A glance through the file shows that the correspondence is not complete, but there is enough of it to prove that our soldiers were not equipped with the proper weapon to defend themselves against the attacks of the enemy. By way of preface to the correspondence, it is, in my judgment, advisable to place before the House a few important facts that will help to a better understaanding of the general situation regarding the Ross rifle and its manufacture in Canada.

The Breech mechanism of the Ross rifle was the invention of Sir Charles Ross. The bolt had a straight pull, or single motion, as compared with the half turn and pull, or double motion, of every other military rifle. This was supposed to be an advantage in quick firing.

The Liberal Government of Canada, the late Sir Frederick Borden being then Minister of Militia, entered upon the manufacture of military rifles for the Canadian militia under contract with Sir Charles Ross, and adopted the Ross patent as the Canadian model. The Ross Company manufactured sporting as well as military rifles, and from time to time developed their rifle for sporting and target purposes, with the result that, at the outbreak of the war, the latest make of Ross rifle was recognized as equal to the best target rifle in the world. It was therefore not unreasonable to believe that the Canadian troops were going overseas armed with the best weapon available. This was the belief of the Canadian people, and they rested confident in that belief.

The Canadian First Division went into the trenches in January, 1915. It was very soon found that the conditions that made the Ross a good sporting or target rifle did not fit it for service at the front.

The battle of St. Julien, in April, 1915, was the first real test to which the Ross rifle was submitted. It is now a matter of common knowledge that the Ross rifle failed under that test. How many of the Canadian casualties were due to the failure of the Ross rifle can never be known, but without doubt they were numerous and terrible. Not only were the losses great, but the danger of actual defeat was even more terrible. Not to flinch at the surprise of the German gas was heroism, but it was even greater heroism for our men not to flinch at the still more unnerving surprise of the failure of the weapon placed in their hands upon whose efficiency their lives and the holding of their positions depended.

The occurrences at St. Julien must have come to the knowledge of this Government within twenty-four hours after that battle. There is no evidence of this fact in the correspondence brought down and still less evidence of any action having been taken on the initiative of the Government to remedy matters.

The earliest mention of the Ross rifle in the correspondence is in a report of Sir John French to the British War Office, dated June 19, 1915, in which he states that, having looked carefully into the merits of the Ross rifle he had found that the Canadian infantry had so lost confidence in it that he had re-armed the First Canadian Division, then under his command, with Lee-Enfields before the battle of June 15, and that even before that date three thousand men of the division had armed themselves with Lee-Enfields without authority.

In other words, 3,000 Canadians had been so convinced of the inefficiency of the Ross rifle that they had thrown away their Ross rifles whenever they could pick up a Lee-Enfield. The obvious inference is that the only reason all the Canadians had not armed themselves with Lee-Enfields was because they could not get them without authority. General French gave as the reason for his rejection of the Ross that it could not be relied upon to work efficently under rapid fire with British ammunition, and that Canadian ammunition was not available.

There is nothing on the file to show that any correspondence took place between June 19, 1915, the date of General French's report to the War Office, and March 30, 1916. That there should have been no such correspondence is unthinkable. The Canadian Government knew that the First Division had been re-armed as a result of the experience at the battle of St. Julien and subsequent engagements. They were arming and placing in the field two new divisions. Either they corresponded with General French on the subject of the Ross rifle, or they did not. If they did, the correspondence has been suppressed in the file brought down—an absolutely damning action—or they ignored the fact that the Ross rifle had been discarded by General French for stated and definite cause—a still more damning action.

On March 30, 1916, nine months after General French had discarded the Ross rifle, these rifles were still being delivered and accepted by the Canadian Government. On that date the Prime Minister cabled Sir George Perley that the Government was seriously considering letting a further contract for 100,000 Ross rifles, delivery to begin in April, 1917, two years after the disastrous failure of the rifle at St. Julien.

On May 12, 1916, almost a full year after the Ross had been discarded by General French and the First Division re-armed with Lee-Enfields, Sir Max Aitken cabled Sir Sam Hughes:—

> Serious situation has arisen regarding Ross rifle. I request that you will show this telegram to the Prime Minister.

There is nothing further in the correspondence to show directly what the situation was or how serious it was, but a passage in a report of Sir Douglas Haig to the War Office, dated May 28, 1916, may be regarded as throwing some light on it. General Haig reports that as a service rifle the Ross is less trustworthy than the Lee-Enfield and that it has not the confidence of the Canadian troops. He therefore recommends that the Second and Third Divisions be armed with Lee-Enfields, and he continues:

> The inquiry on which these conclusions are based was the outcome of an urgent application from a battalion of the Third Canadian Division for re-armament with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, in consequence of a high percentage of jams experienced with these Ross rifles during a hostile attack on May 1, 1916.

Mr. Speaker, there is terrible significance in General Haig's guarded language. What a high percentage of rifle jams during a hostile attack meant in Canadian casualties we have no means of calculating, but the casualties must have been appalling when they impelled an urgent application from Canadian troops for re-armament with the Lee-Enfield rifle.

It will be observed, Sir, that the hostile attack mentioned by General Haig took place on May 1, 1916. Obviously it was to the failure of the Ross rifle in that engagement that Sir Max Aitken referred in his cable to Sir Sam Hughes on May 12, 1916, when he said:

> Serious situation has arisen regarding Ross rifle. I request that you will show this telegram to the Prime Minister.

And yet, with the information conveyed by this cablegram and with all the other information that they had in their possession, the right hon. Prime Minister and his Minister of Public Works stood in their places in this House on May 17, 1916, and specifically denied knowledge of the failures of the Ross rifle. The Minister of Public Works even suggested the imprisonment of those who would criticise it. The Prime Minister said:

I desire to say in the first place, that even if the Ross rifle were the best rifle in the world, it would be possible to destroy its usefulness by making and circulating public statements about it, and it is far from patriotic service to discredit the only rifle we are capable of producing in Canada at present. No one is more convinced of the absolute necessity that our men fighting in the trenches shall be served with an efficient and effective weapon than the members of the Government in common with all good citizens.

On the same occasion his trusted colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) said:—

The conditions complained of at that time have all been remedied. The chamber of the Ross rifle has been enlarged.

I may interject here that when the story of the enlarging of the chamber of that rifle comes out there will be something more to be said in this House regarding the matter.

The chamber of the Ross rifle has been enlarged in such a manner that the difficulties that were met with a year or more ago have been corrected. So far as I know, with any information it has been possible for me to obtain, there has been no difficulty and no jamming of the Ross rifle for many months past.

Now, Sir, one would think that after receiving Sir Max Aitkens' cablegram of May 12; after the discussion in this House on May 17, and after receiving the report of General Haig of May 28, the Prime Minister would no longer desire to keep an inefficient weapon in the hands of the Canadian troops. But, Sir, incredible as it may seem, such was his desire. It will be recalled that the battle of Zillebeke lasted from June 2 to June 12. On June 7, 1916, while the battle of Zillebeke, where the Canadian losses were even greater than at St. Julien, was still raging, the Prime Minister dispatched a lengthy argument about the Ross rifle to the War Office, in which this statement occurs:—

The Ross rifle is the only one we are at present equipped to make in Canada and we believe it to be efficient if properly handled.

To this General Haig promptly replied in a report to the British War Office, dated June 21, 1916, in which he confirmed his previous report as to re-arming with the Lee-Enfield after consultation with the Officer in command during recent heavy fighting near Ypres, "The experience of the commanding officer in this fighting was that the Canadians of the 3rd division, at least, had 'lost confidence in their rifles'".

The hideous significance of these words can be read in the casualty lists and in the fact that in the attack of June 2 the Germans captured 700 yards of Canadian trenches, which were retaken later by the first Canadian division, which was armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle. General Haig's report of June 21 concludes:—

I must therefore adhere to my recommendation that the 2nd and 3rd Canadian divisions should be re-armed shortly with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, and I would urge that the necessary steps to give effect thereto be taken without delay.

Notwithstanding General Haig's statement of the urgency of the case and its approval by the Army Council, which offered to supply Lee-Enfields, and which requested that no more Ross rifles be brought to England, it was not until August 30, 1916, more than thirteen months after General French's report and sixteen months after the failure of the rifle had been demonstrated at the battle of St. Julien, that the Government of Canada finally gave its consent to the British War Office supplying Lee-Enfields to the second and third Canadian divisions, but expressed the hope that no re-arming had been done without their knowledge.

The correspondence closes with a reply from Bonar Law to Sir Robert Borden, stating that the fourth division sent to France with the Ross rifles had already been re-armed with Lee-Enfields; that is, they had been re-armed without the knowledge or consent of this Canadian Government.

As to the assertion by the Prime Minister on June 7, 1916, that "the Ross rifle is the only one we are equipped to make in Canada," the obvious answer is given by the Army Council in their memorandum of July 11, 1916, that the Government of Canada alter the equipment to make Lee-Enfields, Mark III, with improvements. The contractor, Sir Charles Ross, has publicly and repeatedly stated that he is and has always been ready to adjust his equipment to any requirements of the Governement, regardless of his contract.

That brings me to a brief consideration of the part recently played by the Solicitor General in connection with the public discussion of the Ross rifle. Speaking at Montreal in December last, the Solicitor General sought to absolve the Government of its guilty conduct by saying:—

As soon as the report that the rifle was defective reached the Government, what could the Government do? We were bound by the contract made by the late Administration.

The speech in which this statement was made led to a newspaper controversy, in the course of which Sir Charles Ross wrote to the Ottawa Citizen and stated his position under the contract to be as follows:

Since the outbreak of the war, I have endeavoured to assist the Government to turn out a rifle satisfactory in every respect, not standing upon the letter of the contract but acting upon the spirit of it.

The Citizen then asked Sir Charles Ross if he had made his position clear to the Government, and he replied by repeating the sentence I have just quoted. In response to a further question as to whether the Solicitor General was right in affirming at Montreal that the Government was bound by the contract made by the former Administration, Sir Charles Ross wrote:

I am quite willing to reply to your question, but to enable me to select the most appropriate extracts from official documents to back up my statement, I should like to know authoritatively first just what Mr. Meighen means by the word "bound".

Now, Sir, up to the present time the Solicitor General has not replied to Sir Charles Ross's challenge, and if he does not do so the public will conclude that once more he has been found out in the game of political sophistry, and this time in a matter affecting the lives of thousands of Canadian soldiers.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude as I began. If what the ex-Minister of Militia says in his correspondence be true, if what Dr. Bruce says in his hospital report be true, and if what General Haig says in his reports on the Ross rifle be true, then it is clear that unnumbered Canadian lives have been needlessly sacrificed, and that the responsibility rests upon the Government and upon the Government alone. If the Government disavows or seeks to escape this responsibility, then I submit that a searching inquiry in each case is necessary, and that these inquiries should be commenced before this House rises for the proposed adjournment.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings P. E. I.): Mr. Speaker, in the speech from the Throne which we are now considering, there is a paragraph which states that the Government intends to introduce legislation to further extend the life of the present Parliament. It therefore becomes the duty of the members, in my judgment, to consider whether, in the interests of Canada, in the interests of the Empire, and in the interests of the world, such legislation should be passed. In considering this question, we have to examine the record of the Government since it obtained power, but principally since this terrible war burst upon the world and threatened to overwhelm and destroy all the progress that the world had made from the dawn of civilization to the present time. From the time the Government took office until the time when the extended term expires they will have been in power for six years. Three of these years were years of peace, and three of them have been years of war. Looking at the whole record, with the greatest goodwill that I can command, I am forced to the conclusion that from the moment they came into existence, until the present time, this Government have never realized their duties or responsibilities, have never appreciated that they are the servants of the people and trustees for the people, but that, on the contrary, they seemed to think that the accident of power gave them the right to consolidate and aggrandize themselves and enrich their personal and political friends. Mr. Speaker, perhaps you may think that these statements are pretty strong, but I will submit the proofs of them, and then I will ask you to tell me what you think of them. I will be able to submit to you but a very small part of the Government's record, because it was with the greatest difficulty, and in face of the most strenuous opposition, that members on this side of the House were able to unearth even a portion of it. The time at my disposal will not permit me to submit more than a part of what we know, but it is a well known principle in every day affairs that from a part we can fairly judge the whole, and judge it with a fair degree of accuracy.

I desire to address myself for a few moments to the civil administration of this Government, and then say a few words about their administration since war was declared. When the members who now constitute the Government were in opposition, they stated time and again that the expenditure of some $80,000,000 on the Consolidated Account was proof positive of extravagance and incapacity; and the Prime Minister himself repeatedly declared that if he obtained power he would reduce the expenditure of this country by at least $10,000,000, without impairing the public service. Shortly before the last election the present Prime Minister visited Prince Edward Island, accompanied by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), and addressed a meeting in the town of Souris, my home town. In the presence of a large number of people, he pledged himself, if returned to power at the approaching election, to reduce the expenditure of the country by at least $10,000,000 every year without injuring the public service. That pledge, as those hon. gentlemen know and as the people of Canada know, has never been implemented.

Turn to the Public Accounts and you will find during the first year that instead of reducing the expenditure by $10,000,000 this Government increased it, on the same account, by $11,000,000. In the following year, during which they were entirely responsible for the expenditures, instead of reducing the expenditure by $10,000,000, they increased it by $25,000,000. During the third year of their term of office, instead of reducing the expenditure by $10,000,000, they increased it by $40,000,000; and in the fourth year, the last year for which the Public Accounts have been made up, notwithstanding that that was the first full year of the war, when we were called upon to make economies in every direction and to face the dreadful issues that were at stake, instead of reducing the expenditure by $10,000,000, as promised, they increased it by $48,000,000, and remember this was all civil expenditure and had nothing to do with the war. This is a record of which some explanation should be given. If time permitted, I could go into the different departments and point out where those enormous increases in expenditure took place. The Civil Service was loaded up with new men. While 11,000 civil servants had been dismissed, 25,000 were appointed, and the salaries alone showed an increase of $14,000,000. Commissions of all kinds were appointed. I believe that in the Post Office Department alone 87 commissions were appointed to enquire into certain matters and to advise the Postmaster-General how to conduct his department. There was extravagance on every hand; indeed, the commissions were so plentiful that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce said they were as thick as huckleberries in Kalamazoo. This would have been bad enough in ordinary circumstances, but when the war broke out and we were called upon to face new issues, one would have thought that some kind of economy would be practised.

I remember that during the August session held after the outbreak of war, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Finance urged the people of Canada to brace themselves for the unknown issues that were before them, and advised economy. But it was then that the floodgates were opened. If ministers had made mistakes, a good deal would be forgiven, because they were called upon to face new and heavy responsibilities; but the things which I intend to point out were not mistakes, and could not be mistakes. Men who had dealings with the Government came before the Public Accounts Committee and made statements, all of which I cannot relate to you to-night. Large orders for all kinds of equipment were, of course, necessary. A man named Shaver, the Canadian agent of Bauer & Black, the largest drug manufacturers in the world, knew that the Department of Militia and Defence would be giving orders for drug supplies. He represented manufacturers who made a specialty of field army dressings, and supplied drugs for the United States army. He came before the Public Accounts Committee, and on his oath testified that he had come to Ottawa to look for an order for his goods, that he had called upon the superintendent of the Militia Department who instructed him to interview the head of the medical staff, Colonel Jones. Colonel Jones told him that he could do no business with the department until he got an agent in Ottawa, and suggested that he interview the late member for Carleton county. Mr. Garland, the late member for Carleton county, suggested that a clerk in his own store become the agent for Bauer and Black; and Mr. Powell, a lad of about fourteen or fifteen years of age, became the agent for these drug supplies, and sold $40,000 worth of drugs to the Militia Department out of which he made $9,000 profit. He never saw the goods, for they went straight from the Railway Department to the Department of Militia and Defence. There was no mistake there. That was a premeditated arrangement whereby friends of the Government would get a rake-off; and that is only a sample of what went on. The money obtained by Powell was returned to the Government after an exposure had been made by the members of the Opposition, and Mr. Garland was read out of the House and out of the party.

The Department of Militia and Defence required a large number of horses, and some $70,000 of departmental money was placed at the disposal of the member for Kings County, Nova Scotia. When this matter was brought before the Public Accounts Committee, and an effort made to get at the facts, officials of that department stated that the vouchers and books relating to that transaction were not in the department, and that they had been removed by some officials who were familiar with the transaction, and taken out of the country. That was a serious state of affairs. It showed that an effort was being made to conceal transactions which would not bear investigation. The only thing left to the members of the Opposition in the Public Accounts Committee was to subpoena the men who had sold the horses, bring them to Ottawa, put them on their oath, and get from them the facts, as far as possible. That was done, and a serious state of affairs was revealed. These men came to Ottawa, and on their oath stated that they had sold horses that were lame, blind, spavined and ring-boned, and had all the disorders which horses could have There were horses that had been old at the time of the South African war, and yet they were sold to the Government for military purposes. One man swore that he brought a fairly good horse to the place where the horses were being bought and sold, and that seeing the quality of the horses that were being bought for the army he put his good horse in the barn and telephoned to his son to bring up the old mare. The old mare was brought up, and went with the rest. He stated that he had intended to shoot her that fall. These things are almost incredible.

Another man swore that he sold to the Government for military purposes a horse which he had traded for two ducks and a drake, and as I stated, even horses that had been too old at the time of the South African war were passed and sold to the army. Some of them died before they left Nova Scotia; others died on the way to Valcartier, and a good many died when they reached there. The exposure was so serious that the member representing Kings County, Nova Scotia, had to leave Parliament on account of it. That arrangement was not a mistake; dealings of that nature were not mistakes. So it was with almost everything which the Government purchased for the army; it was made manifest that the money of the people was being deliberately squandered. Binoculars were bought for the army costing $9, $15, $18, and $20, but when they reached the department they cost $58. Bauche-Lomb, manufacturers of binoculars in the state of New York, sold binoculars to a man named Harris. Harris sold them to Bilsky, a jeweller in Ottawa. Bilsky sold them to Birkett, Birkett sold them to Ellis & Company, Toronto, and Ellis & Company turned them over to the Government at a profit to them of ten per cent. The middlemen received their profits and the binoculars cost the Government $58 apiece. Everything else was in proportion.

That was in the early stages of the war but as the war progressed the appetites of the grafters increased, and we all remember that last session the leader of the Opposition moved a resolution asking that an investigation be held into the transactions that had taken place under the Shell Committee. It was known that enormous sums of money had been taken out of the pockets of the British taxpayers, and the charge was made by members of the Opposition that unreasonable prices were being paid, that the British taxpayer was being mulcted in millions and tens of millions of dollars, and that if an investigation were granted these charges would be established beyond a shadow of a doubt. But an investigation was refused until that memorable evening when the member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte) made charges of such a character that even members on the Government side led, I believe, by the hon. member for Dundas county (Mr. Broder) told the Government plainly that if they refused an investigation into those dreadful transactions they could no longer give the Government their support. It will be remembered that upon that occasion the Minister of Finance stood up in his place and refused an investigation. Shortly after the hon. member for Richmond had resumed his seat, the Conservative members who insisted upon an investigation met in Room 16, and, it is alleged, sent for the Prime Minister and told him that they would no longer support his Government if the investigation was refused.

The minister sent a note to the Finance Minister asking him to adjourn the debate, which he did. A few days later the Prime Minister came down to Parliament and agreed to allow a partial investigation into certain transactions that had taken place in the United States but not into transactions that had taken place in Canada. Nearly all the members supporting the Government were satisfied with that but two or three of them were not—the hon. member for Dundas county (Mr. Broder), the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) and one or two others. However, that passed and that was the origin of the Meredith-Duff Commission. It was established before the Meredith-Duff Commission by the testimony of the chairman of the Shell Committee, General Bertram himself, that $42,000,000 of excess profits had been made by the Shell Committe on the orders they had received from Great Britain over and above the profits that the subcontractors had received, the subcontractors being largely themselves. It was known that they had made inordinate profits. That amount was reduced afterwards upon further investigation to $31,000,000. The statement of General Bertram under oath was that, on the first order for 200,000 shells that they had obtained from the War Office in the autumn of 1914, they had made an excess profit of $52,000. They intended to give that money to the Patriotic Fund, but they consulted General Hughes and he advised them to return it to the War Office and this they proposed to do. But this strange feature of the case came up that notwithstanding the fact that they had made $52,000 of excess profits on the first order, they wanted to increase the price on subsequent orders so that, I suppose, they would have more money to return.

But the British War Office cabled that they could not pay a higher price and would not place any more orders in Canada if they were not taken at the original price. They were taken at the original price and in the spring of 1915 the surplus profits had amounted to $14,800,000. They were going on mounting up and the prospective profits were $31,000,000. Now, there is a strange circumstance in connection with this. General Bertram on his oath said that in the fall of 1914 that they had consulted the Minister of Militia and Defence as to what they would do with the money, and he advised them to return it to the War Office. The Minister of Militia and Defence knew, accaccording to this testimony, what was to be done with the surplus profits. I think it is the constitutional principle that what one member of the Government knows all know. The Opposition, during the greater part of the session, was accusing the Shell Committee of having charged the War Office and the British Government an enormous price for shells. A complete answer would have been that all the excess profits should be returned to the British Government. Yet the Minister of Militia and Defence spoke three or four times on the ubject, the Prime Minister twice, the Solicitor General twice, and the Minister of Finance at least once, and not one of these hon. gentlemen ever intimated that a dollar of this money was to be returned. This restitution, if I may call it that, in the opinion of nearly every man you meet on the street and who is familiar with the circumstances, was the result of the investigation made by Carvell and Kyte and pressed by members of the Opposition on the Government. That is what brought about the Meredith-Duff Commission of inquiry and apparently what brought about the return to the British Government of these enormous sums of money. Yet, the newspapers in Canada—for instance, a newspaper in my own province, the Charlottetown Guardian—have not a word to say in favour of the movers of this motion, but they call them carrion birds, who were wasting the time of Parliament in having this investigation held. This is the record of the Government in regard to this matter.

When we come to this year and read the correspondence that has taken place between the ex-Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister, we find that every assertion made by the Opposition against the Government is supported by the statement of the ex-Minister of Militia and that many others of a more serious and damaging character are made. The statement of that hon. gentleman reveals a condition of affairs that few men in this country thought was possible. The statements of the ex-Minister of Militia are made by a man who knows what he is talking about and he states that the second division had to be held up four months at Valcartier while the grafters were quarrelling amongst themselves as to the division of the spoils and that the Prime Minister of Canada was looking on hopelessly and could not do anything. He states that the Prime Minister and other members of the Government were intriguing against himself and that intrigues were going on all the time. He stated that some of the order in council, and actions of the Prime Minister, could have had only three motives and that not one of these motives was in the interest of the men, or officers, of the army or in the interest of the successful prosecution of the war. Could a more damaging statement of the case be made? The matter is so serious that an investigation should surely proceed. My hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) has asked for an investigation and he proposes that it shall proceed during the adjournment. I repeat that before this correspondence was made public I do not believe there were ten men in Canada who thought that the conditions were so serious as they have been shown to be or that anything like what we now know was going on.

The Prime Minister admits in his speech some of the statements made by the ex-Minister of Militia are correct. Up to this time neither the Prime Minister nor any other minister has denied any of the statements and I say as a member of this House that if the Prime Minister fully appreciated his responsibilities to the country he would either deny and disprove these statements of the ex-Minister of Militia or he would resign his position. I have stated that the Prime Minister in his speech on the Address a few days ago actually admitted the correctness of some of the statements made by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence. He stated that an order in council was passed taking from the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence much of the authority that he possessed over the troops in Great Britain and France, that this order in council was passed during the minister's absence and that he was not notified of it. That was a serious matter indeed. Here was an order in council passed in the absence of the very man who should know more about military affairs than any other member of the Council, a man who was considered by the Prime Minister and other members of the Government to be exceptionally capable, and well qualified for the position he held. Without his knowledge this order in council was passed, taking from him the power he had previously exercised over the troops in Great Britain. What was the result? As soon as the ex-Minister of Militia heard of this he came back, and the Government, apparently fearing his wrath, cowering before his anger, actually rescinded the order in council, and gave him back the power he had previously possessed. The Prime Minister says the order in council was amended: the ex-Minister of Militia in the correspondence says that it was rescinded. That, I suppose, is a sample of the Prime Minister's firmness and decision. The Prime Minister said the other day in reply to the leader of the Opposition that he was quite willing to compare his firmness and decision with that of any other man in Canada, and particularly with that of the leader of the Opposition. The incident to which I have referred does not appear to me to reveal very great firmness or strength of character.

But the most serious matter of all arises in regard to the rifle with which the Canadian troops were armed. It is now known from the report of General French that he had to withdraw the first line of Canadian infantry from the trenches because of the ineffective weapon with which they were armed. He had to withdraw them, I suppose, in order to save their lives, to prevent them from being slaughtered, from being murdered. But notwithstanding that this fact was known to the Canadian Government, the Second and Third Divisions were armed with the same weapon, and as has been pointed out here tonight, notwithstanding all the information the Government had in regard to this matter, last session, when this question was before the House, The Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works stood in their places and said they had no knowledge of the fact that the Ross rifle was inefficient and there were defects in the British rifle, they said. This is the most serious thing that has ever transpired in the Dominion, and nothing has done so much to injure recruiting in this country, or is injuring it so much at the present time as the correspondence which took place between the ex-Minister of Militia and the Prime Minister, and the charges that are therein made and have not been denied. How could it be expected that there would be effective recruiting under such circumstances?

The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) said this afternoon that the falling off in recruiting was due to the speeches made by members from the province of Quebec. No member from the province of Quebec ever could do so much damage to the Government as the letters written by the ex-Minister of Militia. But the defence of the Ross rifle made by the Solicitor-General, Mr. Meighen, is worse than all, with its cold-blooded, heartless, calculating cynicism, when he said that the Government of Canada was bound by a contract to arm the troops with a rifle that was not good; bound by a contract to send out troops to be slaughtered in the trenches without one chance in ten of defending themselves. If ten thousand contracts existed, it would not justify the Government in an action of that kind. The worst that could happen to the Government, if they were bound by a contract, would be a suit for damages brought by Sir Charles Ross, the manufacturer of the rifle. But would any man in his senses bring an action against the Government under such circumstances? Sir Charles Ross says that the Solicitor General had no foundation for the statement he made, and that he had never tried to force an ineffective weapon on the Government of Canada. Supposing an action had been brought against the Government, Parliament would most certainly indemnify the Government for any damages incurred. An excuse of that king may be satisfactory to a few strong Tory newspapers, such as the Toronto News and the Charlottetown Guardian, but it will not bring consolation to the mothers in Canada, to the Rachaels that are weeping for their children and will not be comforted because they are not. It is possible that many of the casualties among our troops were due to the fact that they had no chance of defending themselves. This is a matter that will have to be investigated, and that will have to be investigated before an extension is given, and a matter that should be investigated before the Government even ask for an extension.

I did not intend to say anything with regard to naval matters, but I shall say a word as the subject has been referred to this afternoon by the hon. member from Fontenac. If there is one thing the present Government and the Conservative party should be ashamed of it is their action in regard to naval affairs in this country. It is well known that when the subject was introduced into the House by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1909, the resolution then proposed was accepted by the Government of the day, and after one or two verbal amendments had been made at the request of the present Prime Minister, then the hon. member for Halifax (Sir Robert Borden), the resolution passed unanimously, every member voting for it except the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, the late Mr. Monk. The Government took immediate action, and the very next session brought in and placed upon the statute book the Naval Service Act. Acting on the advice of the British Admiralty, Canada entered into an arrangement with Australia and New Zealand, whereby this country would do its duty in naval matters, thereby carrying out the mandate of Parliament as unanimously expressed a year or two before. All reasonable speed was made. Tenders were called for and examined; the Admiralty was consulted, and arrangements were made with Australia and New Zealand. We were all to act in concert. The Nationalist party of Quebec—this is an old story, but is worth repeating—Monk, Pelletier and all the rest of them, and the present members who sit on the Government benches from that province, opposed the arrangement and denounced both parties for it. An election was held in Drummond and Arthabaska. The Nationalists put up a candidate, and so did the Liberals. The Conservatives had no candidate, and a newspaper in Montreal wired the present Minister of Trade and Commerce asking which candidate Conservatives should vote for, as they had no candidate of their own, and the reply of the man who brought in that resolution in 1909 (Sir George Foster) was, "Defeat Laurier by any means, fair or foul. Let the navy go."

Yes let the navy go—let the Empire take care of itself—let Great Britain take care of herself—but defeat Laurier, let the consequences be what they may. This was the Nationalist campaign in Drummond and Arthabaska, and from that day to this the alliance between the Nationalist party and the Conservative party has been cemented.

When this Government came into power they found two training ships in commission, one at Halifax and one at Esquimalt, they found a Naval College established, they found a large number of men enlisted for the navy. They dismantled the ships and discharged the crews. They did everything they could do to discredit the enterprise. They had promised the people of Quebec that they would repeal the Naval Service Act. In the very first session after they came into power the member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) asked if they intended to implement their promise, and the present Minister of the Naval Service (Mr. Hazen) said they did. But they did not repeal the Naval Service Act, and it is under that Act that we have done whatever we have done in the way of assisting the Mother Country on the sea. Not only did they discharge the crews and dismantle the ships when they came into power, but they filled the boilers and tubes of the Niobe at Halifax with a composition, and when war was declared it took over a month to dig out that composition and to get the vessel ready for sea. Had she been ready to go to sea on the declaration of war, she could have captured enough German merchantmen before they could get to safety to pay for the whole Canadian navy.

In the session of 1912-13 this Government brought in what is known as the Naval Aid Bill, appropriating $35,000,000 to build three ships to be presented to the British Admiralty. The Prime Minister in introducing that Bill said that if it did not pass, or if there were any strenuous opposition to it, he would dissolve Parliament and consult the people. He failed to carry out that promise. It has been stated here today, and has been stated over and over again by the party press in the country, that the Senate killed that Bill. The Senate did nothing of the kind, Sir George

Ross, who was leading the Senate when the Bill went before that body, said that, inasmuch as this was a departure from the principle laid down by both parties and unanimously adopted in the House of Commons, the Senate would withold its consent until the people of Canada would be consulted. It would not have taken more than two or three months at most to consult the people. Then, had the Conservatives been returned to power, they could have gone on with the Naval Aid Bill, and if the Liberals had been carried into power again they would have proceeded with their scheme. But, rather than endanger their political necks, the Conservative party withdrew the Bill. But, more than that, Sir George Ross pointed out to the Government that there was no need for that Bill in order to carry out what the Government said they wished to carry out, but that everything they proposed could be done under the Naval Service Act; under that Act the Government could build three ships of war, or any other number they wished, build them in England or anywhere else they chose, and, after they were built, might do with them whatever they liked, and neither the Senate nor anybody else would prevent them. Then, why did they not proceed under the Naval Service Act? Because had they proceeded under that Act they would have acknowledged the principle that Canada ought to provide men as well as ships and that was a principle the Nationalists of Quebec would not allow the Government to accept. No other reason than this can be given for their course, unless we are to assume that the Government was entirely insincere and was merely looking for an excuse to drop the whole affair. There was no reason why Canada should not have been in as good a position as Australia if the legislation placed upon the statute books by the Liberal Government under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with the consent and advice of the Admiralty and by arrangement with Australia, had been proceeded with. We should have had ships on the ocean when this war broke out, as well as Australia, and probably the Canadian ships would have taken as glorious a part in this struggle as did the Sydney when she captured the German raider.

It was stated by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) this afternoon that if Admiral Beatty had had three more dreadnoughts in the Jutland battle he would probably have won a greater victory, and that if Canada had done her duty in 1913 these three ships would have been available to the British Admiralty. The very day before Parliament prorogued in the session of 1913 the Prime Minister stated that, because Canada had declined to build these ships the British Admiralty was proceeding with three additional ships, and would have them ready for sea as quickly as they could be finished. There was, therefore, no diminution in the number of ships at the command of the British Admiralty, when the war broke out, in consequence of Canada's action. The Prime Minister further stated on that occasion that, if the Government remained in power, as he believed it would, before its term expired he would bring down legislation to purchase three ships, or to pay for the three additional ships the Admiralty was building —another pledge the Prime Minister forgot to implement.

In short, there is no other thing the party in power has done since coming into office that is so discreditable as their action in this matter. I have already spoken of their dismantling the ships and discharging their crews. It is only this year that we have taken up the naval service again. To-day, under the Naval Service Act placed upon the statute-book by the Liberal Administration under Sir Wilfrid Laurier, we are recruiting all over Canada men for the navy. But four or five years of valuable time have been lost. We were told that Canadians would not enter either the Imperial or the Canadian navy. Time and again, when the matter was under discussion in the session of 1913, we were solemnly told that Canadians had no desire to enter the navy and that you could not get Canadian ships manned. But we find that, even after 400,000 men or thereabouts have been taken from Canada for the army, there is a considerable number of Canadians left who wish to join the navy, men for whom the seafaring life has attractions. Had it not been for the action of the Conservative party in this matter, Canada would have been in as proud a position as Australia.

These are some of the reasons why I think any man of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite is ill-advised who raises this question at all. I can see nothing to justify this Government's asking for an extension of the term of Parliament. Moreover, I see many reasons why the members of Parliament should refuse to grant an extension, particularly if full investigation is not made into the question of the Ross rifle and into other matters, including the very serious charges made by the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence against the Prime Minister and his former colleagues in the Government.

Mr. DONALD NICHOLSON (Queens, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I wish before this debate is closed to say a few words. Not being accustomed to public speaking I shall have to draw very largely from notes that I have made, and I hope that the House will bear with me in the few observations that I desire to make. Coming, as I do, from the smallest province of this broad Dominion, but representing the chief county of that province, I feel that I should place my views before the House, and I shall do so as briefly as possible.

I feel that the part that Canada has taken in the most momentous events of history, the war, is a matter of the heartiest congratulations not only to this country, but to the Empire at large. Three years will have elapsed next August since the beginning of the war, and I need not say that the situation to-day from the Allies' standpoint is infinitely more favourable for a victorious ending of the war than it was when Parliament last assembled. Throughout Canada there is no dislocation of business; prosperity abounds from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in spite of the great conflict. In my own province, in which I am particularly interested, prosperity has prevailed and increased under Conservative rule. In proof of this, Sir, I should like to submit the following facts.

The value of field products for the year amounted to nearly $13,000,000. To this may be added the yield of the fisheries, which was $1,000,000, making $14,000,000 worth of products of land and sea which were shared amongst scarcely 100,000 people.

Important enterprises in Prince Edward Island which have been originated and carried out by the Conservative Government go to make for greater prosperity and continued development of our resources. In brief, I might refer to the completion of the car ferry terminals at Carleton Head, giving the Island complete connection with the mainland and the Intercolonial railway and carrying out in their entirety the terms upon which the province entered Confederation.

And who, Sir, have the people of Prince Edward Island to thank for this great boon? When the Prime Minister visited, in his political campaign, the province of Prince Edward Island during elections of 1911, he gave a pledge to the people that if the Conservative Government were returned to power, a car ferry would be constructed and the broken link between the Island and the mainland would be united. How nobly and generously the right hon. leader of the Government has fulfilled that pledge, let the magnificent terminals at Capes Traverse and Tormentine and the splendid car ferry steamer now operating between the Island and the mainland tell. Besides, through freight rates now exist between the Island and the mainland, thus eliminating the long grievance of the three short hauls, and proving a lasting benefit to our trade. These matters, which speak louder than any words of mine, show that when a prime minister of the Conservative party undertakes to carry out a great enterprise for the benefit of a province or of the Dominion, he crystallizes his words into action.

The passage of progressive and beneficial legislation has marked the administration of this Government. It has from the first day it assumed office particularly looked after the interests of the farming community. The expenditures on agriculture have almost doubled since Hon. Martin Burrell became minister, while the Aid to Agriculture Bill, appropriating ten million dollars for co-operation with the provinces in the development of the agricultural industry, is the greatest advance ever made by a Canadian Government.

Among other important measures may be mentioned the Bill to regulate cold storage warehouses and the legislation to regulate the sale and manufacture of dairy products. The latter measure is designed not only to protect both producer and consumer and to prevent the adulteration of butter, but also to guard against imposition upon the farmer by buyers. All this particularly benefits the agricultural province of Prince Edward Island.

It would take me a long time, Mr. Speaker, and it would weary the House, if I attempted to enumerate the many Bills of great importance and vast benefit to Canada that have been passed since this Government came into office. In the Departments of Justice, Trade and Commerce and Post Office—in all departments beneficial measures have been applied. Hon. L. P. Pelletier, the late Postmaster-General, was responsible for two Bills providing for increased pay to the underpaid letter-carriers, mail clerks and other employees of the department in the outside service.

Then, Sir, in addition to all these, the Tariff Bill must not be forgotten. The Tariff Bill has placed the steel industry on a sound basis without injuring the consumer in Canada, while there was a substantial cut in the tariff on agricultural implements. The whole design of the Tariff Bill was to encourage the home market, looking also to the protection of all classes, particularly the farming community.

Two important and progressive Bills which could not be passed during the last session because of lack of time were the Bill to Consolidate the Railway Act and the Co-operative Credit Bill. These are two of the most advanced pieces of legislation ever introduced into Parliament. They will, no doubt, be dealt with this session. Then there was the Canadian Northern Bill, which settles the Liberal Government's legacy, provides for the completion of the Transcontinental Railway, and gives the Government outright $40,000,000 worth of stock.

It was with great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, that I read the splendid address of the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White), delivered at Halifax last October before the Board of Trade of that city. It was a masterly statement of the manner in which Canada is carrying out her duty and her priviege of assisting the cause of the Empire in this great war. Tributes were paid by leading business citizens of that city to Sir Thomas White's administration of the Department of Finance.

Mr. G. S. Campbell and Hon. G. E. Falconer, were hearty and spontaneous and evidently voiced the feelings of all the business men of Halifax.

The minister pointed out that within two years, Canada had recruited, equipped and was now maintaining an army of 360,000 men, of whom 250,000 had been sent overseas to fight for their King and country. Besides this, we have floated in our own market loans aggregating $200,000,000, with $300,000,000 offered by the public. To quote the minister:

> At the outbreak of the war, with our adverse balance of trade and our foreign obligations for interest, it was the obvious policy of the Dominion to borrow as much as possible abroad to prevent gold exports. We consequently borrowed from the Imperial Government for our war expenditures and arranged loans in New York. There came a time, when with our trade balance favourable and our savings increasing, we were able to place the first domestic war loan in Canada. We asked for fifty millions. The public gave us one hundred millions. In September of this year, we asked for one hundred millions. The public offered us two hundred milllions.

And in these trenchant words, the minister summed up his address:

"What is the important question from a financial standpoint with relation to the war". And he answered his own question by pointing out that, with the Dominion Government spending $750,000 and the Imperial Munitions Board spending over $1,000,000 a day in this country, the important point is, how is this high expenditure to be financed? The Imperial Government cannot pay for munitions made in Canada by drawing cheques on the Bank of England. It can do so only by establishing dollar credits in Canada, and that can be accomplished only by the people of this country placing large sums to the credit of the Imperial Government. "If we give them the money we can get all the orders we want, and more," said Sir Thomas, "but we must save." Here, Sir, is a striking tribute to the patriotism and generosity of our people, and one that proves, beyond all dispute, how willing we were to spend our means and strength for the Empire.

In times like these, when rigid economy is the watchword, it is surprising and most gratifying to find that the revenues of Canada are abounding, and that so far the pinch of war has not been felt to any appreciable extent in this country. In the course of the coming few years, the question of where to obtain sufficient governmental revenue in Canada is likely to become a matter of serious discussion. If this anticipation is realized, the great public debt which Canada is now assuming will not be entirely a misfortune. Somehow, the debt will be met—or the interest on it will—and nothing terrible will happen. The soil of this country is rich enough to yield a living to all who are able and ready to put it to the test. Had it not been for the development of war business, yielding, in many instances, exceptional profits, the Federal Government would have been put to it to devise taxation to produce the necessary revenue. These profits, it is presumed, will, in the course of a few years, disappear, and the Government will again have to seek other sources of revenue.

I also notice, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. J. D. Hazen, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, has been doing his bit as head of that great department, during the war. After the war broke out, the Canadian Government asked the British authorities how they could best help, and suggested recruiting men for the navy as well as for land forces. At first there was no need of these for the navy, but since then, the naval building programme has become greatly accelerated and many new ships having been put into service, these have had to be manned and there has been an increasing call for sailors. To-day the Imperial Navy, which has swept the seas, bottled up the German fleet in the Kiel canal, and guarded the whole of the Empire, requires men. The navy at all costs must be maintained at full fighting strength.

And the Hon. J. D. Hazen, in an interview, as reported in the press says:

> As soon as Canada was made aware of the change in the situation in regard to the navy, we offered to form an overseas division of the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve and lend them to the Admiralty for service in the Imperial army. The Admiralty was pleased to accept the offer and asked if possible that five thousand men be sent, out of which two thousand would be required by the end of the present year. Every recruit Canada gives to this force will mean the saving of one soldier for the British army, for if the necessary men are not secured, the conscripts at present serving in the army will have to be transferred to the navy.

All this goes to show how admirably the three departments of State, Militia and Marine, have been working together for our own country, in the assistance rendered to the Empire.

In the Departments of Public Works and Trade and Commerce, the showing is magnificent, and the Dominion Trade Returns record abounding national prosperity. The figures for September, completing the record for the first six months of the last fiscal year, show that in six months ending September 30, 1916, the aggregate foreign trade of the Dominion had surpassed high water mark for the best twelve months Canada knew before the outbreak of the war. For the month of September itself, our foreign trade amounted in value to $161,797,951, as against $92,687,862, for the corresponding month of 1915. For the six months from April 1, to September 30, Canada's foreign trade reached the enormous and altogether unprecedented aggregate of $1,148,809,402, as against $550,535,360, for the corresponding period of 1915. Imports for the first six months reached a total of $390,995,024, being almost double the volume of import trade during the corresponding period of last year. In September our imports totalled $68,796,262, showing an increase of some $30,000,000 over September, 1915.

But by far the greatest expansion has been in the export trade of the Dominion. For the six months it has considerably more than doubled, the total being $536,721,514 as compared with $246,392,148, for the six months ending September 30, 1915.

The greatest expansion has been in the volume of exports of agricultural products and manufactured goods. During the six months agricultural products to the value of $206,141,036 have been exported, as compared with $146,794,343 for the corresponding six months of 1915. Manufactured goods have been exported during the period under consideration to the value of $190,823,240, as against a total of something like $70,000,000 for the corresponding period of 1915.

These figures tell a tale of industrial and commercial growth vastly in excess of anything that was thought possible two or three years ago. The records establish, beyond peradventure, that the foreign trade of Canada, for the fiscal year, will be vastly greater than any record ever achieved by a country of seven or eight millions. Commercially and industrially, Canada is forging ahead at a rate which must bring pride and satisfaction to all patriotic Canadians.

I might outline some of the very important matters regarding the policy of the Government towards the province of Prince Edward Island, besides the completion of the car ferry, which make for the betterment of our people and the advancement of our province.

There are great terminals being constructed at Halifax and harbour improvements made. These are all for the benefit of trade and commerce in that part of Canada, and Prince Edward Island, being contiguous to Nova Scotia, will share to a certain extent in the benefit flowing from the vast works nearing completion there. Then there have been improvements in St. John harbour, which also will, to a certain extent, benefit the island, as it is now on the eve of being connected with the mainland.

I might also refer to the fixing of our representation in the House of Commons, whereby this province has now four representatives, although at one time it looked as if the entire representation of the province might be swept away, owing to the fact that our population was not increasing at as rapid a rate as that of the pivotal province of Quebec.

Then I might refer to the increased subsidy paid to Prince Edward Island by the Federal Government, whereby the province is given the handsome sum of $100,000 a year of additional revenue. The establishment, too, by the Federal Government of the means by which agricultural education has been brought within the reach of our farmers and their children has been of enormous benefit. The expending of nearly $30,000 a year will thus enable professors and instructors in agriculture and horticulture to live amongst us and spend their time instructing our people in the latest and best methods regarding these two important branches of industry.

I may truly say, Mr. Speaker, that it was a red-letter day in the history of this county, which I have the honour to represent, and the province at large, when the Conservative Government came into power in 1911.

There are other important things which have taken place under Government rule, but it would take a man of more eloquent tongue than mine to enumerate them. Naturally, owing to the truce between the two parties, the people, I take it, Sir, have not been taking the same profound and active interest in party politics that they took when the Empire was at peace. I may tell you that the little province of Prince Edward Island, with only, according to the census taken in 1911, a population of 93,728 people, has nearly 3,000 of its sons enlisted in the war, or about three and a half per cent. This I consider, Sir, owing to the smallness of our province and the limited number of our people, a most gratifying showing. We have raised in that province two siege batteries and one of the most magnificent regiments, the latter being composed of 1,200 men. In that regiment the largest proportion of the men are Scotchmen. There are descendants of the men of Tipperary and there are also descendants of the men of the North of Ireland. We have had considerable talk about what the French-Canadians have done and have not done. There are only about 10,000 French-Canadians in Prince Edward Island, but I notice one name—that of Arsenault—in the regimental list about fifty times. The French-Canadians have done more than their proportion down there. It shows that they are under good political influences in that part of Canada.

Many homes throughout the island are in mourning for boys who have found their graves on the battlefields of Europe. Yet with courage and confidence our people down in Prince Edward Island, in common with all peoples of the British Empire, Canada, Australia, India and all allied nations, are facing the Huns, and assisting in bringing about their ultimate defeat in order to preserve the freedom of mankind and the liberty of the world.

I can speak with deep feeling of the sacrifices made by the people of Prince Edward Island. I feel, Sir, that I have a right to stand on the floor of this House and eulogize the bravery, self-sacrifice and loyalty of our people to our King and country. Two members of my own household are at the front, and I know that I am looking into the faces of those all around me who have sons or other relatives at the front, yet who have not hesitated to say to their boys or their girls "Go forward, do your bit, and may God be with you till we meet again."

Canada has done and is doing her part and the Government, and notably the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia, have worked miracles in this country since the war began. I have already referred to what has been accomplished, but I feel, Sir, that this is the paramount thought in all our minds, and I desire to place before Parliament and the country the fact that the province from which I come has responded as nobly and as loyally as any other part of the British Empire.

The prosperity of the year perhaps is better told as follows:—The close of the calendar year found the revenue of Canada well in advance of last year's receipts. The Customs revenue for December amounted to $11,884,000, as compared with $9,432,000 for the corresponding month last year, an increase of $2,451,000. In the nine months of the fiscal year the Customs revenue reached a total of $106,613,000, an increase of $34,891,000. Further, I may state that Canada's total exports for the eleven months ending November 1916 were $979,646,833, as compared with $559,893,809 in 1915 and $389,467,415 in 1914. Her total imports for the same period were:

Canada's total exports (11 months, ending Nov.)	$ 979,646,838	$ 559,893,809	$ 389,467,415
Canada's total imports (11 months ending Nov.)	698,976,783	405,949,673	450,926,446
Canada's total trade (11 months, ending Nov.).	1,078,623,621	965,843,482	840,393,861
Western grain crop (bush.)	500,000,000	750,000,000	318,419,000
Western wheat crop (bush.)	167,000,000	376,448,000	140,958,000
Value of Western grain crop	126,000,000	391,947,000	250,654,000
Bank clearings	10,564,043,329	7,797,430,809	8,063,539,898
Deposits in Banks in Canada, November 30	1,295,870,723	1,120,954,457	1,016,879,005
Failures, liabilities for 9 months	20,681,441	41,162,321	30,741,292

While dwelling on the expanding revenues of our country and the prosperity which these figures tell, we must not lose sight of the fact that conditions, although so vastly favorable to the producer, are bearing somewhat heavily upon the consumer. Not for one instant do I admit, Sir, that the Government should be held responsible for the exceedingly high price of foodstuffs to the consumer. The law of supply and demand governs these, and the prices of commodities are fixed by the increase or lessening in the demand for such. Such is the condition we find in this country today, for while there are splendid prices for all the farmer has to sell, those who dwell in cities feel that the burden for necessities is greater than before. But this Canada is largely agricultural, the farmers predominate, so all that makes for the increased prosperity of the consumer. This may sound paradoxical to some, Mr. Speaker, but with greater demand and higher prices for the producer, there will naturally follow more demand for labor and higher wages for the working-man, and the city dwellers generally. With your permission, Sir, I would like to quote the following editorial, which appeared in the Toronto "News", not long ago:

> Prices are high. Wheat merely shows the way to meat products, to vegetables, to dairy products. An unfavorable summer may have some partial influence on prices by creating local scarcity, but the main cause is the war. Russia's wheat must be reserved for home consumption. The closing of the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus removes Russia as a competitor in the world's markets. Indian wheat is subjected to high insurance rates and there is a famine in ocean transport. A bad season in Argentina and a half crop in America, with tonnage scarce, make a combination that necessarily would force up the price, even though not one man was speculating in grain futures. Meat consumption is greater than ever before because fighting men are liberally fed, perhaps in many cases more liberally fed than in peace times. Millions of men are in arms and war has put an end to stock-breeding in large tracts of fire-swept countryside. So all food products are in great demand, while the supply is stationary or even lower than before the war. Other necessaries are affected. Leather is expensive, steel prices are high, every fabric is more difficult to secure.
> A few weeks ago, the Russian Government placed one order in England for 9,000,000 yards of woollens. The mills are shorthanded, or manned by inexperienced workers. The British Government's demands are firstly filled and rightly so. Broad-cloth is made in these days after all the khaki orders are filled, and before the new ones come in. The marvel is not that living is so expensive, but that it is comparatively so cheap. In the year 1810, wheat in England was 110s, a quarter (8 bushels). This is equivalent to about $3.43 a bushel. It was due wholly to the Napoleonic wars, and even two years after Waterloo normal conditions had not returned for in 1817 it had risen to 148s or $4.62 a bushel.
> People do not realize that they must suffer in some way when more than half the civilized world is enduring ordeal by battle. There can be no war without sacrifice. Undoubtedly men will be found who will seek to trade on the necessities of others in order to make unseemly and sometimes criminal profits. If such men or combinations of men can be found, it is certainly the duty of the Government to curb their operations.

Now, Sir, I believe that in the spring of 1916 this Government was spending at the rate of one million dollars a month in separation allowances. Besides this, there are some 360,000 men in arms, for which the Government must provide salaries, and all that goes to make up the complexity of the organization and equipment of a modern army. These are all rather extraordinary expenditures called forth by the war. Nobody is objecting to these, vast though they may be. But, Sir, the taxes must be increased, higher duties must be levied and the people must realize that economy will have to be practised, in order to meet the outlay. The Government must set the example in this regard. It must economize in the face and stress of these perilous times. It must use its best wisdom and see where necessary retrenchment may be introduced and operated. It must set the people an example, because, should the war continue, times naturally will become harder and unless the Government and the people begin to practise rigid economy in all departments of public service and in all personal activities, the result will be discouraging and disastrous. However, I am satisfied that the Government in its wisdom, with the wise and far seeing statesmen whom we have in the Borden Cabinet, fully realize the gravity of the present and the seriousness of the future situation, and will not only crystalize into legislation the principle of economy, wherever possible, but will also educate the people of this country to be careful in all their outlays and save, to a certain extent at least, their money, and not to now indulge in the frivolous pleasures and reckless extravagances so prevalent in times of peace.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, while I am referring to conditions in the Maritime Provinces, and that is with respect to ship-building, and the bonusing or assisting of individuals or companies in the construction of such. In our province particularly, the press has been printing innumerable letters from sea captains and ship-builders, besides editorials, upon the important subject of the coastwise trade and the building of ships. So keenly has this subject been advocated that the Government appointed a commission of three gentlemen to investigate into this trade, particularly in regard to the delay of sailing vessels procuring their cargoes of coal at the coal ports. This commission held meetings at Halifax, Charlottetown and Sydney, and probably in other points of the Maritime Provinces, but the result of their deliberations has not yet been disclosed.

There can be no doubt but that the delays at the coal ports have been very serious and engendered a big loss to owners of the smaller sailing vessels. Indeed, so much so, that they have been to a great extent driven out of the trade and off the seas. I could cite instances innumerable in proof of my statement, but I do not care to weary the House by so doing. Suffice it to say that the merchant marine of Canada, from holding fourth place in the world—some contend third place—has greatly degenerated, and to-day, I am well informed that the Scandinavian flag has supplanted the flag of the British in regard to the merchant marine on the Seven Seas.

In the "Canadian Railway and Marine World" for October, 1916, a long article appears, entitled, "The Dominion Government asked to start ocean ship-building." The Quebec Board of Trade, in their action, affirmed that they thought it would be wise for the Government to take the initiative and build six or more commercial steamships of eight or ten thousand tonnage each; say two at Montreal, two at Quebec and two in the Maritime Provinces, on the basis of the cost of labour and material, plus a reasonable percentage for the builder. By doing this, they would introduce an element of competition, and at the same time establish a basis of cost to guide them in the legislation necessary to establish this most important industry.

I could easily refer to statistics which show that the United States shipyards had at that time on the stocks three hundred and sixty-eight steel steamships, aggregating more than one million tons, and that there are more than twice the number of ships carrying the Stars and Stripes than there were before the war. If they can do this, with wages for shipwrights as high as seventy-five cents an hour, surely we can do much better with the more moderate scale of wages prevailing in Canada.

For these and other reasons which I might advance, I do hope the Government will see fit to respond to the wishes of the people and take action in the near future in the matter of encouraging ship-building and alleviating the grievances complained of by the coasters.

Ship-building is bonused in Norway, Russia, British Columbia, England, New foundland and the United States, and I suppose in all the great nations. So for the good of Canada, its future and its continued prosperity, I trust the matter will be seriously considered by the House.

There is one paragraph in the Address that I wish to refer to, and that is with reference to the fiftieth year of Confederation in Canada. To me as a Canadian born, it is very cheering to see the financial condition our country is in notwithstanding the war. Let us go back to the year 1867 for a moment. The total revenue of this country then was $13,000,000. In 1873 the revenue was $17,000,000. After 1873, a great man, Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, became Premier, and at the end of his term of office, in 1878, our revenue had only increased to $23,000,000 or $24,000,000. Then there was a change of Government, and in 1896, at the end of their term, our revenue had amounted to $40,000,000. That is only twenty-one years ago. A new government came in under the leadership of the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and at the end of his term of office our revenue amounted to $100,000,000. I am given to understand that this year our revenue will amount to $180,000,000. I am sure the wonderful advance we have made in the last fifty years must be cheering to every Canadian.

I should also like to call the attention of the House to the debt of Canada. In 1911, after those fifty years, the net debt of Canada was about $346,000,000. When the war commenced, after three years of Conservative rule, the debt amounted to not one dollar more, which is very gratifying. At the end of those fifty years, after providing for the expenditures of the various departments, there was a surplus of $250,000,000. But for that surplus of $250,000,000, our debt instead of being $346,000,000 would be $596,000,000. This is most gratifying to every Canadian.

I do not want to be controversial, but I wish to say a word in regard to some of the remarks of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) the other day. I perfectly agree with him in what he said about the French Canadian people. I am often down in the province of Quebec, at fairs and public gatherings of one sort or another, and I am quite satisfied there could not be any better people in the world than the French Canadians. The hon. member also said that he was in Toronto once, and went into an Orange Lodge and I am satisfied from the gracious way in which he spoke, that the lodge had done him very much good, and I think he ought to go there again. The next time he goes up there I would suggest that he take with him the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and persuade him to take the Royal Arch degree in the Orange order. He would learn something then about brotherly love, for we teach it in the Orange Lodge, and then the hon. member for Rouville would not stand up in this House and say that three educated young gentlemen, members of this Government, were traitors. That is the statement he made the other day, and I was very sorry to hear him make it, although probably he made the remark in haste. If he will take the Royal Arch degree in the Orange Order he will learn something of brotherly love, and hereafter speak more kindly of his brother. I would certainly advise him seriously to consider taking this degree, so that he would treat his brother a little more courteously in future.

I do not know that I shall ever be here again; I do not care much about this job; I do not know whether I will run again. The present situation reminds me of the time England was at war with a foreign country, and when her people were divided something like we are in Canada, and the Scotch poet addressed the following lines to her:

> Let us not like snarling tykes
> In wrangling be divided,
> Until an unco loon
> With a snap divides us,
> Be Britons still, to Britain true,
> Among ourselves united,
> For never but by British hands
> Will British wrongs be righted.

Mr. EMMANUEL B. DEVLIN (Wright): Mr. Speaker, will you permit me to join with others in tendering you my sincere congratulations upon your elevation to the dignified position which you now occupy in this House? I have listened with considerable pleasure to my hon. friend from Queens (Mr. Nicholson), and whilst I cannot answer on behalf of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), I am sure there will be members in the House who will extend to them his very cordial invitation, and with them, as with every man in this country, I think the idea that my hon. friend has expressed will, if put in practice, bear fruit; I speak now of brotherly love. I have known the two hon. gentlemen to whom he has referred for a great number of years, and I can assure the hon. member that both in their private life as well as in their public life they have never forgotten the principle of brotherly love. I am sure the hon. gentleman will pardon me and not consider me discourteous if I do not follow him any further in his remarks, but in listening to the precept of brotherly love which he was expounding I thought it might very well apply to a number of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who have taken part in this debate. I refer particularly to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys), and the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt); also to the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best), in connection with certain statements he has made as a public man outside of this House. It was not at first my intention to take part in this debate. I did not see that there was any strong compulsion of duty upon me to engage in the discussion. With such speeches as have been delivered by hon. gentlemen opposite, especially those of the hon. members to whom I have referred, I waited patiently to see if any member of the Government from Quebec, or any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House representing a constituency in that province, would repudiate the statements which have been made. But none of these gentlemen have spoken, and that fact, I think, makes it incumbent upon me to say a word, I am going to speak very plainly for a very few minutes. The thought uppermost in my mind has been that the course of events in this country at this moment tends to disrupt the good feeling which ought to exist between the different races, and this tendency is accentuated by speeches delivered in this House as well as by speeches of some hon. members when addressing audiences outside.

If we expect to make of this country such a nation as was conceived by the Fathers of Confederation, a country with provinces united by common ideals of freedom within the Empire, it is imperative that the members of this House and all who ask the attention of the people to their utterances shall try as much as possible to unite the provinces and not to cast slurs the one province at the other. There is a movement which was started in the province of Ontario and which was referred to by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) and which is known as the bonne entente. I understand that this is a movement taken part in by men of both political parties with the object of creating a better feeling between the sister provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Let me say here and now that I cordially join forces with that movement. A great deal has been accomplished already, and a great deal more will be accomplished. For, as one member of that movement said to me, "If we cannot succeed in uniting the two parent races of this country, then what becomes of all the other races that dwell within our boundaries?" I do not wish to place myself upon record as a doctrinaire; but, if, before I leave this House, or before I leave public life, I shall have said some word or done some thing to aid even in a small way to make better feeling between the English-speaking races and the French-speaking race in this country, I shall feel that I have not laboured in vain.

Hon gentlemen opposite have cast slurs at the distinguished leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I would ask these hon. gentlemen in all sincerity: Do you think that at a time like this, when it is so necessary that the efforts of all the Overseas Dominions should be united with those of the Mother Country and the Allied nations in the defence of civilization and freedom, you contribute toward good feeling among the races in Canada by constantly attacking the right hon. gentleman? I am still quite a young man, but I have known the leader of the Opposition in the closest intimacy for the last twenty years. It has been my privilege on many occasions to stand with him upon the same platform. And I venture the statement, and challenge contradiction in this House or out of it, that, throughout the career of the right hon. gentleman, whether he spoke in Canada or outside of Canada, whether speaking here, or in England, or in France, or in the United States, he has always shown that he felt it his paramount duty to work for harmony and good feeling between the races in this country. And along with that he made the effort to strengthen the attachment between this country and the Empire. Why talk of the loyalty of any province in this Dominion? Are not the men of each province who go to the front fighting for the same object and the same ideals, and doing their best to make prevail that cause which you and I believe to be just? How shall we measure loyalty? Is it to be measured by the number of men that any particular province sends out to the front? Or is it to be measured by the deeds performed upon the battlefields of Europe in this war? I prefer, for one, to believe that the only measure of loyalty in this case is the loyalty of the men who are doing their best at the front and the loyalty of the men who are doing their best to unite the races in this country. We have seen in cable reports and in the press, we have heard it said in this House, that the French-Canadians have done nobly on the field of battle. If you listen to Ralph Connor, or to any other man who has been at the front you will hear praises of the French-Canadians, if for no other reason than for their supreme bravery at Courcelette.

Why, then, should it be stated that the English-speaking people of the province of Quebec gave more to the Patriotic Fund than did the French-Canadians? Why should it be stated that the province of Ontario is furnishing more recruits than the province of Quebec? Upon what are those statements based? I have tried, by inquiring of the Militia Department, and through listening to speeches in this House, including the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister, to find the exact number, by nationalities, who have left this country. Not that I thought that it was the work of a very great mind to advance the argument to which I have referred; but I thought in view of the attacks that had been made, that it would be useful to have this information. The first statement given to the House in this connection was that of the right hon. Prime Minister. He said that the enlistments were as follows: For overseas service, 392,647; in the active militia, called out and under orders, 9,052; permanent force, 2,470 in Canada—total, 404,169; Canadian Naval Service, 3,310; British Naval Service, 1,600; Imperial Mechanical Transport, 1,200; in the munition works in Great Britain, 3,000; in the British Army Reserves, 2,750; British Naval Reserves, 1,000; French Reserves, 2,750; British Naval Reserves, 1,000; French Reserves, 5,000; Russian Reserves, 7,500; Italian Reserves, 5,000—a total of 434,529 men supplied by Canada to the cause of the Allies. I confess that I sometimes think that it is not prudent to give information which might show the enemy how many men we have sent and how many we are sending. What prompted the right hon. gentleman to make the statement that Canada would supply 500,000 men? The statement was made on December 31, 1915, when he said, speaking from his sick-room:

> On this, the last day of the old year, the authorized forces of Canada number 250,000, and the number enlisted is rapidly approaching that limit.

Then he goes on to say:

From to-morrow, the first day of the new year, our authorized forces will be 500,000 men. This announcement is made in token of Canada's unflinching resolve to crown the justice of her cause with victory and an abiding peace.

When the Prime Minister made that statement the people concluded that he had information which would lead him to believe that he could easily send 500,000 men overseas. He tells us now that he sent 434,529. Let us analyse those figures for a moment. On active militia duty in Canada there are 9,052 men; in the permanent force, 2,470; in the munition works in Britain, 3,000; in the British Army Reserves, 2,750; British Naval Reserves, 1,000; French Naval Reserves, 5,000; Russian Reserves, 7,500; Italian Reserves, 5,000; making a total of 35,772 to be deducted from the 434,529.

I proceed with an analysis of the right hon. gentlemen's figures. He tells us that up to December 31 there were overseas 280,562 men; in the Imperial service, 9,550; in the Imperial and Allied Reserves, 17,500; in the Canadian Naval Service, 3,310. Therefore, according to the right hon. gentleman's figures, the total number that left Canada was 310,922. There are training in Canada at the present time 48,312; active militia on guard duty, 9,052; permanent force, 2,470, making a total in Canada of 59,834. The total number enlisted for service is stated to be 434,529 and the total number sent overseas and remaining in Canada, 370,756, leaving a balance of 63,763 who have not been sent overseas and who are not now in Canada. The Prime Minister did not tell us where they were.

The right hon. gentleman tells us that at the front there are 110,000 men; under orders for the front, 10,000; and doing sundry services in England, 17,383. The casualties are 71,263, making a total of 209,646. If, as the right hon. gentleman's figures show, the total number sent overseas amounts to 280,562 and the total number accounted for only 209,646, what has become of the 70,916? I have no doubt that before the House adjourns and the right hon. gentleman goes away he will explain this discrepancy, because it is necessary that we should have some accurate statement from him upon which we may base our calculations. If the Prime Minister gives the people to understand that there are overseas 434,000 of the 500,000 whom he intended to send, they will say: since the Prime Minister asked for only 500,000 men, why so much energy with a view to further recruiting? If he does not, and we must deduct over 70,000 from the figures that he has already given, there is necessity for even greater activity in recruiting. On the other hand, some hon. gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches are telling the people of the province of Quebec that it is important for them to keep the men upon their land and to increase production.

And then, if they followed that advice, there are hon. gentlemen opposite who would come into this House and tell the members and the people of Canada that because the province of Quebec, forsooth, listened to certain ministers, they were therefore disloyal. I hold absolutely no brief from the province of Quebec to defend it in connection with its system of recruiting, absolutely no brief; but I should like, in justice to those who might feel disposed to go overseas and who have not gone, or to those who are overseas doing their best, to point out to this House the exact status of the province of Quebec as compared with the province of Ontario. I did say this afternoon that men from the adjoining counties of Pontiac, Wright, Labelle and Argenteuil were included in military district No. 3, the Kingston military district. That is the information which is given to me; it may not be absolutely correct. What I wish to convey to the House is that every man who comes from one of these counties in the province of Quebec and enlists here in the city of Ottawa, where the recruiting offices are, is put down as coming from the province of Ontario, and Ontario is given the credit, whereas they should be allotted to the province of Quebec. That is the point I wished to bring out when the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) was speaking. I said that I wanted to make a comparison between the two provinces, for the better understanding of those who are interested in the recruiting movement and who are disposed to believe that the province of Quebec is not doing what it should. In Quebec in 1912 we received 50,602 immigrants. At the same time Ontario received 100,000. In 1913 we received 64,835 in Quebec, while Ontario received 122,000. In 1914 we received 80,000 in Quebec, while Ontario received 123,792. In 1915, when immigration had fallen off, Quebec received 31,000 and Ontario 44,000. So that you have more of the immigrants who came into the country to draw from in Ontario than you have in Quebec. You have more of the men who were born in the British Isles and who are resident in the province of Ontario to draw from than we have in the agricultural province of Quebec. You have, to begin with, 500,000 more people to draw from in Ontario than we have in Quebec. You have, according to the statistics of 1911, 71,000 more families in the province of Ontario than we have in the province of Quebec. What does that mean? If you take only one man per family, you would have right away 71,000 more men in the province of Ontario who would be eligible to go overseas than we have in Quebec.

Mr. MORPHY: You have bigger families down there.

Mr. DEVLIN: There is another point. I grant you that the families are somewhat bigger. It is not uncommon in the province of Quebec to find a family with ten children; indeed I have known families of twenty children.

Mr. MORPHY: Mostly boys?

Mr. DEVLIN: Providence has not given to each family only boys; a great many families include several girls. But take the ordinary family: there is the father, who is working the farm; he cannot work it alone, he needs one of his sons to work with him. My hon. friend knows that labour conditions in this country are very stringent at the present time. If the farmer keeps just one son we may find that the remaining members of the family are not eligible for service. I know any number of families situated in that way. So that, following out my hon. friend's statement of larger families, while that is true, there are a great many more young children. But there are 71,000 more families in Ontario. I am not making an argument out of this, I assure my hon. friend; I am simply putting the facts as I have been able to gather them. My hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen will draw their own conclusions. I want to further say that in the province of Ontario, according to the statistics of 1911, there were 348,681 inhabitants who were born in the British Isles, while in the province of Quebec there were only 67,920. Now, if credit is going to be given to Canadians for going abroad, if that is the argument in measuring loyalty to the Canadian born, you have got to eliminate the 67,000 from the province of Quebec who were born in the British Isles, and you have got to eliminate the 348,681 British born in Ontario. I simply want to point that out, and hon. gentlemen in this House will draw their own conclusions. I make no argument of it, because I have not yet been able to obtain from the Militia Department the number of soldiers by nationality who have gone across the sea.

Let me instance one further fact in speaking of Quebec, and that is that in 1916 when there was a call made to contribute towards the Patriotic Fund, by a population of 2,600,000 (the estimated population at the present moment of the province of Ontario), there was contributed $1,750,000; and I for one would like to say that I heartily congratulate the province of Ontario for having made such a noble contribution to the Patriotic Fund. In the province of Quebec, with a population of 500,000 less, we gave $1,675,000. In other words, we gave per capita a contribution of 80 cents, whereas Ontario gave a per capita contribution of 68 cents. It would not be logical upon my part to try and make an argument out of this statement, as I hardly think that that is the way in which we ought to measure loyalty in this country to the British Empire, but there the statement is.

Mr. MORPHY: Is the hon. gentleman referring to Governmental grants, or to grants from all sources?

Mr. DEVLIN: I am speaking of all grants in 1916. These are the figures I have. If I were to speak of this year I would point out that the Government of the province of Quebec had donated $1,000,000 to the Patriotic Fund. I believe they did perfectly right; I make no argument out of it, because I do not measure loyalty thereby.

I have made reference to a statement made by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best), and before closing my remarks I should like to further deal with it. The statement appears in the press, and I hope the hon. gentleman will correct me if my citation from his speech is not as he delivered it. Speaking in the county of Carleton the other day, he said:—

> In the province of Quebec the church was keeping its people in a feeling of enmity against those who were delivering them in the present war.

Reading that, I thought that a member of this House might eliminate such talk in war time. That statement is altogether false. In the churches in the province of Quebec—and I do not except any denomination in this statement—every Sunday prayers are asked for the cause of freedom and for the success of British arms. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Best) went on as reported:—

Touching upon the Dorchester by-election he declared the best thing that could happen would be that the Government candidate be defeated for it would show Quebec up for what she really was. He referred significantly to certain agitation going on for a purpose, to cope with which all English-speaking Grits and Tories should throw their political differences to the winds and stand out as true British subjects. If there was an election held the Conservative party would win because he believed every intelligent English-speaking elector would vote for the Government. He said the French-speaking and the dissatisfied Germans would vote against them—

He excepts the Germans who are not dissatisfied and whom he thinks would therefore vote for the Government. He proceeds:

—and he asked where would the English-speaking people be if the Government changed. The next Premier would have been elected by the French and Germans and he would legislate for them. The English-speaking people should face the situation squarely and throw political differences to the wind.

When I read that statement, my mind went back to the report of Lord Durham made in 1839 upon the state of affairs in this country. Lord Durham, among other things, reported the fact as an instance of the state of feeling at that time, that there were two lines of steamers plying between the city of Montreal and the city of Quebec, one line owned by English capitalists, and the other line by French Canadians. There was considerable feeling between the rival companies, and the French papers advised their friends not to take the English boats, and the English papers retorted by asking the English-speaking people not to take the French boats because those boats were owned by radicals, rebels, and disloyal people. The best answer I could give, if I wanted to find an answer, as to whether the province of Quebec was doing its duty in this war, and as to whether gentlemen occucupying seats on this side of the House were doing what they believed in their consciences to be right, would be found in a notable speech which was delivered by an hon. gentleman who till recently occupied the position of Postmaster General. I refer to the late Hon. Thomas Chase Casgrain, a gentleman for whom I had a very high personal regard. The speech was delivered by him at a luncheon given in his honour by the Canadian Club of Vancouver, B.C., on the 16th August, 1915, and this is the note he sounds:

I am not giving these different figures and instances in any vainglorious spirit, or because I believe that the loyalty of the French-Canadians can be attacked or doubted, but coming through the other day on the train I was pained to read in one of the western papers the following statement: "Liberals believe that the anti-war feeling in Quebec will give them at least fifty seats in that province, and they seem to be determined to risk their political fortunes on this sentiment in that province." I hold no brief for the Liberal party, but I am enforced to say, in the face of the statement contained in this newspaper, that there is no anti-war feeling in the province of Quebec. At the very outset, in company with Sir Wilfrid Laurier, my predecessor, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, Sir Lomer Gouin, Premier of the province,, and Mr. Maréchal, K.C., I addressed a tremendous patriotic gathering in Sohmer Park, in the city of Montreal, and all of us, laying aside our political differences, told the people that the sole pre-occupation of everybody should be the proper means to be taken by Canada to fulfil its duty and take its share in the great war of aggression which is being waged against the Empire. The result of this meeting was the immediate recruiting of the 22nd French-Canadian Regiment under Colonel Gaudet. Not only was the voice of French-Canadian public men heard in this connection, but the voice of the Roman Catholic bishops of the province, who, in a collective pastoral letter, gave the proper direction to their flocks and impressed upon them their duties and their obligations.

I am sorry that I have been obliged to go beyond the grave to find testimony to the patriotic policy of the Liberal party of Canada at the present time. I thought that hon. gentlemen in this House would credit us with some degree of sincerity and with wishing to do our level best in this awful time of struggle, but, Sir, in going beyond the tomb, I go to an authority which I think no hon. gentleman on the other side of the House will gainsay. Whilst my distinguished leader, (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the hon. member for Rouville, (Mr. Lemieux) the hon. member for Bonaventure, (Mr. Marcil) and many other members from the province of Quebec were out doing what they could to aid recruiting, what was one Cabinet minister doing? A truce had been proclaimed. The present Minister of Militia (Mr. Kemp) stated in the city of Toronto that there never had been a truce. There was a truce and that truce was in full operation in the month of May, 1915. The hon. the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) went to the town of Aylmer, in the county of Wright, which I have the honour to represent and I was very glad to see the Minister go there. But, was he there to speak for recruiting, was he there telling the people what their ideal should be, was he there telling the people that there was a truce? No, he was not. Here are some of the things that he did say:

"While the Borden Government has been heart and soul at work looking after the war, Sir Wilfrid and his supporters have been kicking at petty thefts which, by the way, were perpetrated by Grits left in office by the Laurier administration, instead of standing shoulder to shoulder with us in this fight for civilization.

"Speaking about the boots scandal, do you wonder that mistakes were made, when this country, which had often talked of and played at war, had to gather together and equip an army of 33,000 men for the front? Mistakes must surely be made by us all; I make them every day."

The speaker then went into a résumé of pre-election promises that the Government has carried out during the three and a half years they have been in power, and took a heavy dig at the Senate, whom he dubbed as "a bunch of old fossils," who were at the beck and call of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who put the majority of them there.

He sent his audience into roars of laughter by giving an imitation of the mannerisms of some of the senators, and wound up with an exhortation to the new association to dig in, and produce a fighting organization which would result at the next general election in placing Wright county in the ranks of the Blues, where she belongs.

At a moment when the two political parties were supposed to have a truce! I will leave to the consideration of the House whether the attitude of the Minister of Labour is to be commended; he speaking in the town of Aylmer and delivering election speeches, whilst the leader of the Opposition is addressing big meetings in the province of Quebec and calling upon the young men to enlist in this great struggle for liberty and civilization. I would like to say a few words more but, in view of the lateness of the hour, might I suggest the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Devlin the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Tuesday, January 30, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORT.

Copy of the evidence taken before the Hon. Sir Charles Davidson, Kt., Commissioner appointed to inquire into the purchase by and on behalf of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, of Arms, Munitions, Implements, Materials, Horses, Supplies, and other things for the purposes of the present war, and as to the expenditure and payments made or agreed to be made therefor; together with the report of the said Commissioner concerning the Sale of Small Arms Ammunition; purchase of Submarines; and Military Cloth (Auburn Woollen Mills Co.)—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

WAR CONTRIBUTIONS, MONTREAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Mr. Speaker, by your leave may I be permitted to read a telegram which I have just received, and which has been sent to me in order to correct a statement which was made a few days ago by the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best), with regard to contributions made in Montreal by the French Canadian people in connection with the war. The telegram is as follows:

Montreal, January 29, 1917.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier,
Ottawa.

As chairman of day's pay Committee which last year secured subscriptions exceeding five hundred thousand dollars from employees in Montreal, I can safely say that at least half of this amount was contributed by French-Canadian workingmen and women. The English and French-Canadian citizens of Montreal are at present working hand in hand in the organization of another campaign to raise two and a half million dollars here in February. All interests are working together in the most energetic and harmonious manner for its success.

J. W. McConnell.

RECRUITING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BURNHAM: May I ask if any provision has yet been made or permission granted by which recruiting can be done for specific battalions at the front instead of in the ordinary way?

Hon. A. E. KEMP (Minister of Militia): The matter to which the hon. member for Peterborough refers is under consideration. A large number of battalions are still below strength and these are being filled up as rapidly as possible.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

Consideration of the motion of Mr. G. C. Wilson (Wentworth) for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Monday, January 29.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): (Resuming.) Mr. Speaker, when the debate adjourned last night I was saying that I believed it was the duty of every man in this House and every man in public life in this country to work for the harmony of the races which compose the people of Canada. I was speaking of the attacks which have been made upon the province of Quebec, and of attacks which have been especially directed against the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I spoke also of the testimony which had been given at the banquet in the city of Vancouver by the late hon. the Postmaster General, Mr. T. C. Casgrain, when he said that there was no anti-war feeling in the province of Quebec, and that he could testify that at the very outset of the struggle my right hon. friend and others on this side of the House had laid aside their political opinions and had appeared with him upon the public platform of that province to advocate recruiting. I could have gone further and instanced testimonials of loyalty which were given to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition at different banquets in the city of London, notably at the banquet at the Imperial Institute in June, 1897, which was presided over by the then Prince of Wales, afterwards King Edward VII. I do not think that it is absolutely necessary this afternoon to do so, and I shall content myself simply with stating, in answer to hon. gentlemen opposite, that one of the present ministers, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sévigny), speaking in the county of Dorchester——

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN: That "hear, hear" is very weak. However, we will let that pass. Here is what Mr. Sévigny said:

> After explaining National Service as usual, Mr. Sevigny said that he was ready to retire and leave the field to Mr. Cannon if anybody present was ready to say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had not advised the people to sign the National Service cards.

Sir, I give that testimony to the House for what it may be worth.

The second thought that was in my mind, and with that I shall conclude my remarks this afternoon, was the attempt which is being made by gentlemen opposite to make political capital out of this war so as to satisfy the prejudice of political opinion. We have had instances of that in this country unfortunately, both in the public press and in the utterances of men in public life. I did tell you last night, that when the right hon. leader of the Opposition was in the province of Quebec urging the young men to join the colours, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) was out in the town of Aylmer trying to incite his friends to find somebody in the county of Wright who would redeem it to the Conservative cause. Let me instance another case. The whole province of Ontario, and in fact the Dominion of Canada, was thrilled by the words of Mr. Ralph Connor in the city of Toronto calling upon the people of this country for national unity and saying that there was only one thing worth while, and that was winning the struggle. Yet the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) sat back and contented himself with dismissing the idea by saying: "Well, Ralph Connor, after all, is only a Grit." Now, Sir, we have other gentlemen who have the honour of having seats on the treasury benches who are trying to make political capital out of the war. Let me begin with the right hon. gentleman who leads this Government. The House was amazed and the country was amazed the other night when the right hon. gentleman who, generally speaking, has the reputation of being broad-minded, thought it necessary to cast aspersions on the right hon. leader of the Opposition for some attitude, which he did not thoroughly explain, mark well, but which would give the impression to friends opposite and to others in the country that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was disloyal to the Empire during the South African war, when the history of the case, when all the facts of the case, are directly against such a contention. Is it surprising, then, that other members of his Cabinet stoop so low as to try and make political capital out of the war. We have the hon. Minister of—What is he now? He is Postmaster General, Mr. Blondin. Speaking in the county of Dorchester a few days ago, and what was he doing in the county of Dorchester? Was he advocating recruiting?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh; it hurts.

Mr. DEVLIN: It hurts? I have no doubt it does hurt hon. gentlemen opposite. What was the Postmaster General saying in the county of Dorchester? Does it cause merriment upon the other side? It did not cause as much merriment with the right thinking people of Canada after they had read the words which were uttered by the Postmaster General. He was not advocating recruiting, but a policy of emigration from this country to the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh, "take it back"; "that's exploded."

Mr. DEVLIN: Let me give his words; I am quoting now from the Montreal Gazette of January 26:

> St. Germaine, Dorchester County, Quebec, January 25th: The following affidavit was given out to-night by the Liberal chiefs here:
> We, the undersigned, declare that we heard last night at Ste. Rose, January 24, 1917, the Hon. P. E. Blondin make the following declaration: "As for the Allison scandal and others of the same nature, let us suppose that if these thefts have taken place, it has no importance for the people of Ste. Rose, because it was English money that was stolen."

Speaking of the danger of conscription, Mr. Blondin declared that, even if conscription was put into force, that would mean little to the people of Ste. Rose, because they had only to go across the frontier to get away.

That language was intended for home consumption, but when he found that these words had gone abroad, Mr. Blondin thought he would manufacture something else; so he immediately sent a correction, and I take his correction from the Ottawa Evening Journal, another good Tory paper. Here is what he says:

The statement which has been sworn to by certain Liberals with regard to my utterances are a distortion of my words. I never by any means intended to convey—

Mark well, that he did not intend to convey.

—the meaning which they have attached to my speech.

So it was not plain speaking.

Mr. Cannon had been stating in his speeches that the Conservative party had been grafting from the Canadian treasury in connection with munition contracts.

No man in this House or in the country can deny that.

In my speech at Ste. Rose I explained that it was not true that the Allison scandal had to do with Canadian money, pointing out that the money paid for the shells was the money of the British Government.

It was all right to steal the money because it came from the British Government; it would have been a crime if the money had come from the Canadian Government.

In regard to the conscription matter I told the people of Ste. Rose that I did not believe conscription would be necessary because so many Canadians were eager to go and fight for the cause of liberty and humanity. I added that if any of them were afraid of conscription, if conscription should be passed and they did not want to go to the war, they had a remedy left. They could go across the United States line which is near Ste. Rose and escape military service.

Will hon. gentlemen opposite now applaud these words? There was another statement made by the hon. gentleman, only it was for exportation. It is contained in the wire which he sent to the right hon. gentleman, the Prime Minister, on the morning of the election. Mark well, for therein lies the danger. Here is an hon. gentleman in the Cabinet who makes a statement sworn to by electors of this country. He finds that that statement is creating disturbance in the Conservative ranks, and he makes a correction which is worse than the original statement. Then he lets matters go on until the morning of the election when he sends a telegram to the Prime Minister in which he does not refer to his words upon conscription. I hold a copy of the telegram in my hand, and not a word in it refers to conscription. He does not deny that he advised the people of Dorchester County to go across the line to the United States. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that they are not making political capital out of the war.

Let me say to my hon. friends opposite that their press, backed by the party, is creating the same sentiment in this country as that to which I have referred. The chief organ of the Conservative Party in the province of Quebec is L'Evenement, and here is a sample of what that paper was publishing during the Dorchester campaign. I quote it for the sake of my merry friends opposite:

I may first state, however, that the idea of L'Evenement was this: If conscription was adopted in Canada it would not be due to any action on the part of the Conservative party; the sole blame was to fall on the head of my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition. L'Evenement prints in very large type for distribution throughout the county of Dorchester words that were signed by my right hon. friend's friend of 1911, Mr. Henri Bourassa, the friend of the Postmaster General of the present day (Mr. Blondin), of the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Sevigny), and of the Secretary of State (Mr. Patenaude). The statement published in L'Evenement is as follows:

If England were, I will not say in danger, but simply at grips with one or two or several of the great powers of Europe, the Prime Minister could demand not $35,000,000, but two, three, or four times $35,000,000. We would put all the resources of Canada at the disposal of England. There would not be a single discordant voice.

These words were not given to the electors of Dorchester county as those of the Prime Minister of this country; they were given as the words lately uttered by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. Again in big type, we find this in L'Evenement:

It was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who had passed in 1904 the Militia Act which would permit of the establishment of conscription in Canada. This Act is found in Chapter 41 of the Statutes of Canada of 1906.

And the article ends:

If we shall ever have conscription, it would be put into force thanks to a law passed by Laurier. Electors of Dorchester do not forget that.

I submit, Sir, that the Government have been making all the political capital possible out of this war. The Prime Minister made a statement and gave figures, which I quoted last night, purporting to show just what the Government had done for the Allied cause. He took credit to himself for having sent a large number of young men across the ocean. He stated that he had sent some 17,000 Russian, Italian, and French reservists. I want to tell my right hon. friend that if he or his Government had never existed, and the war went on, those French, Russian and Italian reservists would have had to go anyway under the laws of the countries whence they came.

Mr. BURNHAM: I ask my hon. friend if he is in favour of conscription under any circumstances?

Mr. DEVLIN: Will it materially aid my hon. friend if I enter into a dissertation upon conscription? The question will come up in the House when it will be discussed fully.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DEVLIN: At the proper time, I will give my views upon the question of conscription, and I will be very happy to listen to my hon. friend when he gives his views. But I assure my hon. friend, that if I had to go to fight I would go to fight, and would not come back to Canada unless I came back wounded.

Mr. BURNHAM: You evidently won't go at all.

Mr. DEVLIN: I want to give the Government credit for what they have actually done in this war, and I want to remind the Government at once that they are now existing upon a life that has been borrowed from us and which we lent them. They have occupied their short time in filling positions in this country with active partisans. They have filled positions upon the bench, they have filled positions in the Senate with partisans, and whilst the country, or certain sections of it, is calling upon the Government for a national Government, we find this Government inactive, sitting back, preaching discord amongst races and claiming for themselves credit for what they have not done. But, they have done certain things. We had a man in the Cabinet, Sir, the former Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes). I see him sitting in his seat. Men on both sides of the House may differ from him in political views but I want to say right away that from the beginning I always gave him credit for doing what he believed he could do to aid our young men in going across the sea. It is not the Government that has helped in this case. The Government did not send the young men abroad. The men, women and boys of this country are the ones to whom credit should be given for what has been done for the allied cause. The Government, it is true, in order to satisfy, apparently, political friends outside, thought they were working for the Allied cause in dismissing the hon. gentleman from office. That is their business, but it is also the business of this country, and the country will want to know the reason from the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government has not yet told the country just why he chose the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence for dismissal after he had asked the country for an extension of Parliament to sanction the acts of the former Minister of Militia. The country will also want to know why it is that he did not dismiss other hon. gentlemen from the Cabinet for the same offences which he charged against the ex-Minister of Militia. The country, it seems to me, would like to know why it is that the ex-Minister of Militia was dismissed from office when his programme is now being carried out, when his appointments still remain, when his whole scheme of military organization remains, when the only difference apparent between the Government and the ex-Minister of Militia is that the ex-minister thinks that he could do alone the work that the Prime Minister believes it takes four other men to do. The Government have appointed two active ministers of militia and two inactive ministers of militia. The Government have appointed one overseas in the person of Sir George Perley, one here in the person of my esteemed friend the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) and two others in the person of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy). The right hon. gentleman has not given to this House or to this country a statement of why it is necessary that he should have done so.

Will you let me conclude by urging upon the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government and other hon. gentlemen opposite that the country feels that the time has come when the question of the war should be taken out of our domestic politics, or, rather, when our domestic politics should be taken out of the war. We are now about to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation. Our one thought should not be to cast aspersions upon different provinces, but it should rather be to celebrate the harmony which exists between the people of these different provinces and to preserve Canada's constitution and the authority which secures to all of us that same liberty, that same freedom for which men are now going to the front, for which men are now fighting, and for which men are now dying upon the battlefields of Europe.

Lieut.-General Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, permit me to join with the House in congratulating you, Sir, upon your elevation to the important and dignified position which you now occupy. Knowing you from experience in the past, knowing your military training and your self-control under trying circumstances, I believe that you will be entirely successful in the task of managing the affairs of this House. I want also to join in congratulating the mover and seconder of the Address upon their eloquent utterances and upon the material which they presented to the consideration of this House. I also want to associate myself with the House in commending Their Royal Highnesses for the good work which they accomplished during their stay in Canada. To the present occupant of the gubernatorial chair, the Duke of Devonshire, I extend a most hearty welcome. He comes of a family in English history long known as staunch in upholding the liberties of the common people.

At the outset, lest I should be misunderstood, I want to take this opportunity of placing on record my high appreciation of the splendid assistance given by Lord Kitchener, by Mr. David Lloyd George, by Mr. Bonar Law, and by Lord Derby; in fact, by the entire British Cabinet, in from time to time helping to the best of their ability to remove any friction, to smooth down difficulties which may have arisen and to advance the cause of the colonials at the front to the best of their ability. Where differences have arisen between their interpretation of the Constitution and mine, in every solitary instance, I may say without any egotism, they have joined with me in bringing about the best state of affairs that possibly could exist after explanations had been given them. I want, also, to express here, lest any misapprehension might arise from what I may say later on, that General Robertson, Chief of the General Staff; General Whigham, his chief assistant; General MacDonough, in fact all the senior officers of the War Office, including the permanent Under Secretary of State, Sir Reginald Brade, have been insistent in season and out of season in recognizing to the fullest extent the powers and responsibilities of the Canadian force and the limited powers and responsibilities of the British Government and the British War Office in relation to our military force.

I also want to take this opportunity of placing on record my high appreciation of the splendid services of Sir Max Aitken, now, I am pleased to state, Lord Beaverbrook, and of General Lord Brooke, who is well known to our Canadian volunteers, for their intermediary and diplomatic work in connection with the management of our forces in England and overseas. To the efforts of these two gentlemen, more than to any other cause, is due the splendid harmony that, taking it all in all, has existed between the Canadian and the British forces at the front.

Sir, I find myself in a very peculiar position to-day. As Robbie Burns says:

> Wad some power the giftie gie us,
> To see ourselves as ithers see us.

During the past few weeks I have been the recipient of scores of letters from supporters of both political parties, and I shall take the liberty of giving a few extracts, alternately from each side. One friend, very likely a Conservative, says, "Go slow and do not give the Grits any ammunition." Another gentleman, whom I should take to belong to the other political persuasion, writes—and I may say that with one or two exceptions they all sign their names: "That Tory gang have slated you. Give them something hot." Another writes, and this is from a gentleman who last year was insistent in trying to get me to desert my friends: "Stand by your friends. Be loyal to Borden and the Conservative party." The next one says: "See how your Tory colleagues have knifed you. All one needed to do to get Borden excited was to write him a letter finding fault with you; then he would go back on you. You are a fool to be loyal to him and the crowd." I had a sort of suspicion that I kept my hat on my own head last year. A gentleman of the opposite political persuasion writes: "See how Grit papers attacked you over the Shell Committee matter last year, trying to fasten blame on you and your friends; but they failed. Our friends stood firm then. Do not trust the Grits." Then comes quite an extract from a communication to me:

> Now is your chance to get even with the Finance Minister and the High Commissioner, or Overseas Minister of Militia, for their intrigue and undermining you. Can't you see the ring against you? The Montreal Daily Mail, the Montreal Evening News (both owned by a half brother of the Finance Minister), the Toronto Telegram, on which the Finance Minister served for years and which is regarded as his Toronto organ, whose editor is reported about to be knighted for viciously attacking you; whose representative and nephew in London, connected by marriage with the High Commissioner, or Overseas Minister of Militia, has been constant in misrepresenting you, and slobbering over your enemies in the Associated Press notices from England, paid for by Canadian money—these Tory papers and people have led in the vicious attacks on, and attempts to undermine you.

And he writes a lot more that I will not read. Even the dear old Toronto Globe gives advice and warning against the Tory pitfalls, and the Ottawa Journal-Press urges me to beware of the wily old politician from Quebec, under whom the editor of that paper so long served. It is very pleasing to receive such good advice. But some of those now urging me to stand to my friends were, within a year, active in urging me to desert friends as true, as honourable, as capable, as patriotic, as self-sacrificing, men who have done as much for the cause of humanity and the Allies in this war, as could be done; while others now professing friendship and offering advice were then busy in their efforts to discredit me. All good advice, but Sam Hughes now, as then, stands by principles and by every honourable man, rather than in wasting his time attacking mere creatures of the hour. Men are transient and soon forgotten, but principles are eternal.

Many people—and I am sorry to see by reading the Hansard debates, even some members of this House—seem to forget that we are engaged in a struggle for our very existence. Now, Sir, I am a firm believer in responsible government, which means party government. I always waive non-essentials for party, but always as certainly do I waive party for essentials. With me, country and cause come first. I have differed from party leaders in days gone by, but the verdict of history has vindicated my action in every instance. Party government involves intelligence, instruction, and independence on the part of the electorate. Party government involves the same conditions for members of Parliament, and let me also say, party government involves the same conditions for a cabinet. Party government does not imply autocracy either in the leader or in the cabinet. The danger of party government is where members lose their independence for any cause—for hope of office, or reward, or for any other reason sacrifice their individuality for temporary, selfish and incompetent leaders. The party should always assert itself; its members should not be mere slavish followers.

Now, as to loyalty. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has claimed that it is a vice or a weakness in me that my heart gets the better of my head. I have studied history and have observed that no man has ever benefited humanity whose heart did not greatly overbalance his head. But there is not much danger in some quarters of any such over-balancing. My way is not strewn with milestones to abandoned friends. The Prime Minister has stated that he has always been loyal to his colleagues, and his colleagues have been and are loyal to him. I think it is quite unnecessary that I should take up the time of this House for a single moment in reviewing my loyalty to the Prime Minister of Canada, but it might be not amiss to inform the public and the House that Canada and Great Britain are engaged in a war to the death, and that I shall stand by party where party interests are the people's and the soldiers' interests—but, where the party fails in its duty, especially in regard to the war and to our soldiers, then I shall not hesitate to have duty done and self-sacrificing patriotism rewarded.

I am strongly urged by some to stand true to my friends. Why, the reproach to me by many is that I never desert a friend. I may be deserted; but to break with the dear good fellows of the great Liberal-Conservative party would wrench me almost as much as losing the war. It pains me to see, however, that party feelings, party prejudices, are so strong in Canada over non-essentials.

I have been asked by some—not officially by Liberal leaders; I want to make that distinctly understood—to cast in my lot with Laurier and the great, time-honoured Liberal party. In all love and kindness, let me say that the idea shocked me. To assist in placing a statesman of even his high character and power, with the principles enunciated by his authorised supporter in Dorchester, and have Canada depend on his ideals for the conduct and the settlement of the war, would be repugnant to my very soul, although everyone knows my personal admiration for the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

"Canada has done enough in this war for England," and so forth, are the utterances of the acknowledged, the endorsed henchmen of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. Canada is forced into this war, not for or by Britain; for Britain never asked a man, never hinted for a man; but Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific sprang to arms because the liberties of this fair land were and still are threatened.

Whatever my course to-day may be, and whatever the effect to me may be, you may rest assured, Sir, that my aim, my purpose, my determination, has but one conclusion: the active, energetic conduct of the war to a victorious issue. Men and munitions, and still more men and more munitions, is the cry. Our hearts go out to the gallant boys at the front, and also to their mothers and other loved ones at home who long for the return of the lads; or if they be not among those returning, to get a chance some time to see the spot where the beloved boy did his duty and gave his life for human liberty and dear old down-trodden humanity. These people, as well as our soldiers themselves, ask, what is Canada doing? Canada has a higher duty to perform, a more important duty in the war, than gathering harvests, assisting in making munitions and helping to furnish bread to the soldiers. And yet, as reported by the Montreal Gazette and the Ottawa Journal-Press, the hon. Mr. Sévigny, in a speech delivered by him, stated that the only duty of Canada was to gather harvests, assist in making munitions and help to furnish bread to the soldiers. I have no hesitation in saying that I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition, unless he could prove that his candidate in Dorchester had not uttered the words he did, should have called him off in that contest or repudiated him publicly, and I have also no hesitation in saying that the right hon. leader of the Government, when he read these words uttered by Mr. Sevigny and when he read the speech delivered by Mr. Blondin, should have, without any delay, repudiated those gentlemen or called for a cancellation of their statements. I wonder why the good people of Dorchester county did not throw both candidates out of their riding, if the piffle we hear was really uttered amongst them. I have always claimed that the people of the province of Quebec have never had a real opportunity of showing what they can do. They have had this party and that party. In 1896 it was the Liberal party, with the cry: What, going to put Tupper in and spend three million dollars to send your sons off to fight? A few years later it was the Conservative party going through the ridings of the province and proclaiming the same sort of doctrine, appealing to the passions and prejudices of the people. My experience of the people of the province of Quebec is that, when they hear the proper side of a case, they act like men, and when they get an opportunity to go to the front and fight, they fight like men; and it annoys and maddens me to see the two great parties of the Canadian people tell them all that little tittle-tattle that was reported in the papers in connection with the Dorchester election.

Argentine and the United States both supply harvests and make munitions and furnish bread for our soldiers. Canada should do a little more. What action is being carried on by Canada? We must go forward and not backward. Let action be the mandate.

It is well known to the members of this House and the people of this country that my policy has been for many a long year and still stronger is than ever before: Full partnership of Great Britain and her colonies throughout the world, with the great Central Government dealing with what concerns the Empire, and each of the component parts of the Empire dealing with what concerns itself in various degrees, and one not interfering with the other. Therefore, any stand which I may take to-day for the protection of our Canadian soldiers at the front, for the up-building of our army, and for the success of the cause, will, you may rest assured, be along the lines of my love and admiration for all that is great and good in the motherland, but the motherland should take her own position in relation to her soldiers, and Canada should have absolute control of her soldiers.

In the addresses of both the right hon. leader of the Opposition and the right hon. leader of the Government reference was made to participation by Canada in the South African war. May I be permitted to mention one or two particulars in that connection? Let me frankly say that I was the one who had the honour of first bringing up this subject in the Parliament of Canada, and I was brow-beaten by my honoured leader at that time, the late Sir Charles Tupper, who objected to it, and who did the same thing in Europe. I could not get one man on either side of the House as late as the year 1896 to second a resolution bringing the matter before this House. The late Colonel Tyrwhitt, the son of a British admiral, was the only one who did it, and he did it, as he expressed himself, as a matter of courtesy, merely to give me an opportunity of stating my utopian ideas, but he would not endorse it. Therefore, when I meet a man who does not get as enthusiastic over our duty to the Empire as I do, I am always willing to give him the same right as I claim for myself of doing my own thinking, and my policy is always not to blackguard a man, but to show him the advantages of my side of a case.

In order to do justice to a young man who has been much maligned in this country, may I say that Col. Armand Lavergne has for upwards of two years been insisting on being given permission to raise a regiment to go to the front. His only objection was that we had not enforced the compulsory clauses of the Militia Act as he wanted us to do. Our policy was purely voluntary enlistment, and Mr. Armand Lavergne very properly pointed out that long before the war he had been opposed to sending troops voluntarily to Great Britain, and that if they were sent they must be sent by the Government of Canada under the Militia Act.

At the time of the South African war mine was the only offer made officially or unofficially from the Dominion of Canada, of troops to serve in that war until long after it broke out. No official offer was made. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister, will remember that I annoyed him considerably by endeavouring to get him to send over a contingent. He objected to any precipitate action, and told me I was rather presumptuous; that I did not represent anyone except the people of my constituency, and he was not very sure that I represented them. I am willing to give him every credit for the position he took. He took the ground that the leader of the Opposition might come to the House at the next session and condemn him if he consented to send troops. I asked him if a telegram from Sir Charles Tupper strengthening his hand would be of any service to him. He said it would, and the telegram which was recently published in the Journal-Press, sent to the Prime Minister by Sir Charles Tupper, was the result. I wish to place this on the official record in case history might not be inclined to deal kindly with the matter in the years to come. The ex-Prime Minister will remember that when he made that statement I promised that I would endeavour to get a telegram from Sir Charles Tupper. I went to the telegraph office and wired Sir Charles Tupper at Halifax; but he was at some place in the country—Bridgewater or Berwick; I forget the name, but I know that it commenced with B. I sent a telegram to Sir Charles Tupper and he immediately replied, sending me a wire stating that he had done so. Later the Prime Minister informed me that he had not heard from Sir Charles Tupper. That same day I received a bill from the telegraph office for the telegram. I went to the telegraph office and demanded that the matter be looked into. It seems that there were two offices in Halifax, and, through some mistakes which occurred in transmission, the telegram had been held up in one of these offices for a day or two. The telegram eventually came to the then Prime Minister, and strengthened his hand. At a dinner some few years ago Sir Charles Tupper mentioned this fact himself in the presence of Sir Thomas White, Minister of Finance, Sir Collingwood Schreiber, Sir George Perley, and to a number of others later. I mention that merely to show that I was carrying out a diplomatic role at that time in an endeavour to smooth matters over with both parties.

I shall not take up the time of the House in discussing the causes of the war; hon. gentlemen are already familiar with them. But before I proceed to the main part of my address I may remark that my friends say that my terribly quarrelsome disposition is one of the many points that I must make clear to the House. I enjoy a fight as much as any man living. I shall enumerate a few—all, in fact—of the troubles that I can recollect in connection with which even a ripple of temper was shown since the beginning of the war.

At the outset of the war the Prime Minister enunciated the principle that there would be no political patronage in this war. That met my view exactly, and I proceeded to carry it out. After I took office I religiously carried out that principle, and in connection with contracts, supplies, promotions or any other matters having to do with the war, I gave no regard to political considerations in any sense. I know that that policy meets with the approval of both Liberals and Conservatives throughout the length and breadth of Canada. However, not understanding the matter, a couple of my colleagues at that time took ground against me for not resorting to political patronage in the matter of contracts. As soon as I explained the position of affairs to them their actions in that respect immediately ceased and everything was harmony and peace from that time onward.

A number of agents whom I regarded as German agents were at one time going around the country and endeavouring to stir up trouble with people in Canada, especially with myself, in order to prevent recruiting. Among the many little tricks of the trade, as we may call them, was that of telling people who had any cause of complaint whatever to "write to Borden." They seemed to have the idea that by writing to the Prime Minister they would create trouble. However, that passed over; I think the Prime Minister, sooner or later —I do not know at exactly what period— became wise to this sort of thing.

The next trouble I had was with a very able young politician who had a quarrel with his colonel and brigadier. I am asked by my friends to explain all these things, and there is no harm in doing so. Because I would not override the brigadier and the colonel, with whom I had no quarrel, this gentleman turned on me, although I offered him a better position in another battalion. The matter was afterwards amicably arranged, and to-day that officer commands one of the best regiments in Britain.

On another occasion a very distinguished ecclesiastic came to me and objected to any Salvation Army chaplains being appointed. The senior chaplain, who happened to belong to the same church as he did, had appointed representatives of the Salvation Army to act as chaplains. This ecclesiastic, claiming that he spoke in the name of the great religious denominations of Canada, demanded that I dismiss these Salvation Army chaplains. I was somewhat busy that day, and I did not waste much time on that matter.

Another officer who raised a great deal of noise was a gentleman who had something to do with the organization for the prevention of cruelty to animals. He wanted me to appoint him and forty others, all of whom I considered to be physi-
4 p.m. cally fit for active service, to look after the animals in the military service. I told him that in war, where a question of life and death was concerned, a horse was not to be compared with a man, and I declined to have anything to do with him. He made charges, which I repudiated, about one of my officers having burned a horse, and that sort of nonsense—then he got out of the camp.

I wish to relate another incident. One day I drove 15 miles through the Valcartier camp, and I found 21 officers on duty out of some 1,500. Having made inquiries, I found that the fishing was good up in the mountains, and that the company was very genial at the summer hotels. In other words, the whole camp had degenerated early in the game into a huge picnic party. I called a meeting of some fifteen or sixteen hundred officers the next day, and told them in plain Anglo-Saxon language what this war meant. I told them that they were not there for picnic purposes, and that if I found them absent from the camp or from duty I would take it as an intimation that they wanted to return to their homes. I pointed out the seriousness of the war, and the need of the officers making themselves efficient in their duties. All but about fifteen or twenty rolled up their sleeves, and the splendid record of the Canadian officers has been the result. Many of them told me that that occasion was the first time that they took the matter seriously. I may say incidentally that a few of them did get return tickets to their homes, the result being a very beneficial effect upon the service.

Another matter that I had a little trouble about, and concerning which I understand there was a good deal of complaint, was the contention that I did not concede to the permanent corps what they claimed to be their right to the road. For instance, it was claimed that if a part of the permanent force should come along, any non-permanent corps must take the ditch. I rectified that one day in short metre and I heard that very serious complaints were being lodged along these lines. I want to say here that so far as I am concerned there is no permanent force at the front and there is no non-permanent force. There are officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the great Canadian Militia, and be it said to the eternal credit of our citizen soldiery that the permanent forces have not by any means surpassed men of the non-permanent forces in their work at the front, in the field, or in any capacity in which they may be working.

As to my relations with my colleagues, we never came to holds or fought like blazes. Perhaps if we had done a little more fighting, things would have been better. We have had our differences. On one occasion the Finance Minister, in his anxiety to keep down expenditure and to keep track of erring boys like the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Railways and Canals, myself, and others, wanted in the early days to interfere in matters connected with the details of our expenditures. To this I objected. I was a minister of the Crown and I resented the interference of anybody except the Prime Minister and the Cabinet in the petty details of administration. If the estimates had to be cut down, I said, let us know the lump sum that has to come off and the apportionment to the different departments. I remember telling the Finance Minister that it was not his function to meddle in these little matters but to carry out a policy of raising revenue and of keeping the country buoyant and prosperous. I was very sorry that I myself had to lead the way later on and show him how that should be done. These are the only rackets that I can recollect. If anybody can recall any others, I would like to hear them.

The only overseas troubles we had, arose from unsettled views regarding the status of the Canadian forces in Britain. No one will charge me with bowing and kow-towing to a man because he happens to be a British officer. It is worth that I stand for. There is a tendency to bow to everything labelled "British officer."

Another grave charge, I understand, that is laid against the department and my officers, is extravagance. I shall not say anything about that here further than this: that I challenge the world to produce an equal record of economy, good buying, and careful management, with one or two exceptions in the case of the initial purchasing in connection with supplies for the forces when we had no orders in council, or no tenders, when everything was done under the direction of special officers selected for that purpose. I might refer to one instance where things did not go quite right and that was in connection with the purchase of trucks, bicycles, etc., by Mr. Russell, who was recommended to me by his old friend, Sir Thomas White, who, I believe, had been associated with him in the Canada Cycle Company and the Russell Motor Car Company. I believe that the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) discovered that these articles had been purchased, some at 25 per cent off and then had been turned in to the Government at 10 per cent off, and some petty details like that—I have not had time to read it up yet; I may have time now.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

I wish to take up the status of the Canadian forces and to discuss two matters of military law which every one seems to dodge, viz: the right of Canada and the duty of Canada to introduce compulsory service, and the status of our boys when they are serving with British soldiers. Section 15 of the British North America Act says:

> The Commander in Chief of the Land and Naval Militia, and of all naval and military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

The Queen here means, of course, the Governor General in Council.

The British North America Act, section 91 says:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

That is all the British North America Act has bearing on the subject. The Militia Act goes further. The interpretation clause, section 2 says:

> (b) 'Emergency' means war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended;
>
> (g) 'On active service,' as applied to a person subject to military service, means whenever he is enrolled, enlisted, drafted or warned for service or duty during an emergency, or when he is on duty, or has been warned for duty in aid of the civil power;

Then section 4 deals with the command in chief and says:

> The command in chief of the militia is declared to continue and be vested in the King, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the Governor General as his representative.

Governor General means, of course, the Governor General in Council. Section 69 deals with active service and provides:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Section 72, dealing with command in time of war is as follows:

> In time of war, when the militia is called out for active service to serve conjointly with His Majesty's regular forces, His Majesty may place in command thereof a senior general officer of his regular army.

Section 74 of the Militia Act (Army Act and regulations) is our charter for our service beyond the seas, just as the British North America Act covers the Administration of Canada. Section 74 is as follows:

The Army Act for the time being in force in the United Kingdom, the King's regulation, and all other laws applicable to His Majesty's troops in Canada and not inconsistent with this Act or the regulations made thereunder, shall have force and effect as if they had been enacted by the Parliament of Canada for the government of the militia.

Thus Canada has full authority to enrol her militia at any time and to train them. The Government could call out 300,000 men to-morrow and train them if they chose to do so. Canada has authority to send them overseas, for the defence of Canada, in an emergency, and "war" is an emergency, according to the interpretation clause of the Act.

Canada has full authority to equip, officer and manage her forces as she pleases while they are within her borders. Beyond her borders and within her own laws, Canadian authority for management and control is wanting, except by adopting the Army Act. Canada has no constitutional authority, as I interpret it—and of course I am giving my own interpretation—to administer or control our men once we send them beyond our border until we adopt, as the law provides, the Army Act and the clauses relating thereto.

But British military law, especially the Army Act, gives that authority to Canada. The statesmen and war officers of Great Britain have foreseen such situations as now present themselves. Not only in cases where the colonial governments raise the troops and pay the cost, but even where Britain enrols and pays colonials, the British Government has by law safeguarded in every conceivable instance the rights, privileges and liberties of the colonists. Therefore the Canadian forces are in no sense "British regulars."

I may say that I take the blame of that clause upon myself, for not enforcing the law, but as I regard this matter, we did not know how long the war was going to last, and I expressed my views again and again on the principle and they were understood, and we, rather than have any trouble, decided to pass along in a quiet way and everything seemed to go fairly well and in good working order, in so far as relationship between the two forces is concerned. So we did not raise any trouble.

I come now to a consideration of the British military law, 1914. I refer first to the Army Act, section 190 (sub-section 23) page 557 which says:

The expression "colony" means any part of His Majesty's dominions exclusive of the British Islands and of British India, and includes Cyprus and any British protectorate, and where parts of such dominions are under both a central and a local legislature, all parts under the central legislature shall, for the purpose of this definition, be deemed to be one colony.

I want you to observe how carefully the British statesmen and officers have guarded our interests in every case.

Chapter XI, page 194, Military Law, provides that the military forces of the Crown shall consist of three classes, British, Indian, and Colonial. Colonial forces are defined by section 3 as follows:

The colonial forces are of two classes, namely, the forces raised by the government of a colony, and the forces raised in a colony by direct order of His Majesty to serve as auxiliary to, and in fact to form part for the time being of, the regular forces. The first class of colonial forces—those raised by the Government of a colony—are only subject to the Army Act when so provided by the law of the colony and when serving with part of His Majesty's regular forces, and then only so far as the colonial law has not provided for their government and discipline, and subject to the exceptions specified in the general orders of the general officer commanding the forces with which they are serving. The Army Act, however, (s. 177), provides that the colonial law may extend to the forces, although beyond the limits of the colony where they are raised.

The second class of colonial forces—of which the West India regiment, the Royal Malta Artillery, the West African regiment, the non-Europeans of the Fortress Companies, Royal Engineers, at Hong Kong and Sierra Leone, and the Hong Kong Singapore battalion, Royal Garrison Artillery, are examples—is referred to by ss. 175 (4) and 176 (3) of the Army Act. Their pay and maintenance are voted annually by the Imperial Parliament, and they are in fact Imperial forces, although serving in a colony.

The section of the Army Act, section 177, which I am about to read is the section which I quoted to Lord Kitchener. It is the section which gives to Canada supreme control of her troops, not in Canada, as we have it here under the British North America Act, but in England and at the front:

The Army Act, Section 177, Page 539, provides:

Where any force of volunteers, or of militia, or any other force, is raised in India or in a colony, any law of India or the colony may extend to the officers, non-commissioned officers and men belonging to such force, whether within or without the limits of India or the colony; and any such law may apply, in relation to such force and to any officers, non-commissioned officers, and men thereof, all or any of the provisions of this Act, subject to such adaptations, modifications and exceptions as may be specified in such law, and where so applied this Act shall have effect in relation to such force, subject to such adaptations, modifications and exceptions as aforesaid; and where any such force is serving with part of His Majesty's regular forces, then so far as the law of India or the colony has not provided for the government and discipline of such force, this Act and any other Act for the time being amending the same shall, subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the general orders of the general officer commanding His Majesty's forces with which such force is serving, apply to the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men of such force, in like manner.

This section shall not apply to any officer belonging to any such force when attached to or doing duty with, or to any non-commissioned officer or man belonging to any such force when attached to or otherwise acting as part of or with, any portion of the regular, reserve, or auxiliary forces in the United Kingdom.

Inasmuch as I have a number of paragraphs from the military law which are more or less lengthy and very technical, I would be very pleased if the House would excuse me from reading them and permit me to place them on Hansard.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Perhaps my hon. friend could state in a few words the effect of the sections which he is not going to read?

Sir SAM HUGHES: They are merely explanatory and declaratory. They are explanatory of sections 175 and 176 which refer to colonial troops paid by Britain. I am quoting them to show that Britain safeguards the colonies. Take for instance any colonial regiments raised and paid for by Britain; when in England they are absolutely under their own laws. They go as far as that in Britain to safeguard the interests of the colonies and to preserve their own self respect.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend might indicate the numbers of the paragraphs that he desires to put in.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Notes 2, 3, 4, and 5 refer to section 177.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the House it is permissible, according to custom, to place such statements on Hansard; if there is any objection, it cannot be done.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I desire to place on Hansard notes 2, 3, 4, and 5, relating to section 177, as follows:

(2) This section applies to what may be termed strictly colonial forces, that is to say, forces raised on the responsibility of the government of the colony. The amendments made by A. A. A., 1909 and 1912 are intended to make it clear that colonial legislatures can apply the whole of the Army Act, or any part of it, to the forces of the colony, subject to such adaptations as may be necessary to make them applicable.

(3) So long as such forces are within the colony their discipline can be provided for by the law of the colony. This section removes any doubts as to whether that law would apply to such forces when outside the limits of the colony.

(4) In order to prevent difficulties arising from deficiencies of the colonial law in cases where the colonial forces are serving with the regular forces, the section provides that such deficiencies may be remedied by the application of the Army Act, subject to any modification made by general orders of the general officer commanding the regular forces in question.

(5) "This section shall not apply", etc. The effect of this provision (added by A. A. A., 1909) is that where the Army Act applies to colonial forces serving with the regulars (see, for instance s. 175 (11) and s. 176 (8. A.), it will apply to them as if they were regulars.

Then there is an explanatory clause:

The last paragraph of section 177 beginning "this section shall not apply," etc., had also in view, when it was added, the control of bodies of militia or troops from the colonies visiting the United Kingdom.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will remember this because it was passed when he was Prime Minister. He may remember that soldiers went over to Britain for athletic purposes, or to the Coronation, or for some other purpose, and they went around England in uniform without any control; and this clause was added: Then in regard to colonial forces, Class 2, not only are colonial forces, Class 1, under colonial law in any part of the world, but colonial forces, Class 2 are exempted from the Army Act where a Colonial Act is in existence applying thereto. Army Act, section 175, relating to officers, subsection 4, and section 176 relating to soldiers, subsection 3, are as follows:

Section 175, subsection 4, page 534:

(4) "All such persons not otherwise subject to military law as may be serving in the position of officers of any troops or portion of troops raised by order of His Majesty beyond the limits of the United Kingdom and of India, and serving under the command of any officer of the regular forces. Provided nothing in this Act shall affect the application to such persons of any Act passed by the legislature of a colony."

Section 176, subsection 3, page 536:

(3) "All non-commissioned officers and men serving in a force raised by order of His Majesty beyond the limits of the United Kingdom and of India, and serving under the command of an officer of the regular forces: Provided that nothing in this Act shall affect the application to such non-commissioned officers and men of any Act passed by the legislature of a colony."

Page 536, note 1, paragraph 4, section 175:

"This is not meant to include strictly colonial forces, but only forces raised at the Imperial expense."

Subsection (8. A.), section 176, page 538:

"All non-commissioned officers and men belonging to a force raised in India or a colony when attached to or otherwise acting as part of or with any portion of the regular, reserve, or auxiliary forces in the United Kingdom."

Page 538, section 176, note 2, paragraph (3): "This is not intended to include strictly colonial forces, but only forces raised at the Imperial expense, whose maintenance is voted annually by Parliament. It might, however, no doubt extend to a force raised under a Colonial Act, but under the Imperial control. But strictly colonial forces are dealt with by section 177."

Now, Sir, I wish to take up the question of service under the Militia Act. At the time of the census of 1911 the male population of Canada between the ages of 18 years and 45 years, was 1,720,000. Married men in Canada of all ages numbered 1,332,000, and married men over 45 years of age numbered 650,000. The number of married men under 45 years of age was estimated at 682,000. Duduct from the total of 1,720,000 the 682,000 men, and you have 1,088,000 single men in Canada between 18 years of age and 45 years of age. The number already enrolled is 400,000, 100,000 married men and 300,000 single men. Therefore according to the census of seven years ago, there are 788,000 single men in Canada, who have not enlisted. We can apply the Militia Act and get for home training and defence, any number we like, say, 300,000 men. Then in the spring we could call for volunteers for overseas, and I am satisfied that there is not a district in Canada that would not furnish its quota. If we did not get enough volunteers for overseas we could send them under the law as militia, each district being credited with the men already enrolled therefrom. Here let me point out what I found in the course of my visits to Quebec. One gentleman would say: why should my sons go away to the front and perhaps be maimed for life if my neighbour does not allow his sons to go. There was one case of a gentleman who had four sons. They wanted to go, but he would not let them. He asked whether it was fair that he should let them go and run the chance of becoming maimed for life while the fellows who went into the munition factories remained at home and earned their $4, $5 and $6 a day. We are all human, and there is a good deal of logic in the position taken by that man. I am satisfied that you would meet the wishes of the great mass of people of the province of Quebec, as well as of every other part of the Dominion, by applying the Militia Act and by saying: "We will take so many men for home defence, and then when we want more soldiers to go overseas we will call for volunteers. If there are not enough, we will send them under the Militia Act." I am satisfied that these men would do their duty fearlessly and well.

The rule from time immemorial in Britain has been that the man becoming a soldier loses no rights of citizenship. On the contrary, special privileges have been conferred upon him as a soldier. I may point out that while in England last summer, the question arose as to the right of the soldiers of British Columbia to vote in the provincial election. Those I talked to were men high up; they were not underlings. I asked them what right they had to refuse permission to the soldiers of British Columbia to vote. I asked under what authority they meddled. I pointed out that the province of British Columbia was a self-governing province and that Canada was a self-governing country, and that if British Columbia wanted her soldiers to vote all she had to do was to notify the Prime Minister of Canada and he would arrange the matter through whatever diplomatic channel he chose. I quoted. also, that the rule from time immemorial in Britain was that the man, in becoming a soldier, loses no right of citizenship, but that on the contrary special privileges have been conferred upon him as such soldier. I fail to see why the soldier at the front should be disfranchised, while the slacker or the munition worker at home should exercise his franchise. The Home Government appoints the Governor General of Canada; Canada has the right of appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The command in chief of Canadian forces rests with His Majesty through the Governor General, which, of course, means through the Governor General in Council. Thus Canada has absolute control of her soldiers in Canada, in the United Kingdom, and at the front, subject to any general order of the Commander in Chief, but such order must be in conformity with the laws of Canada and subject thereto. Canada, therefore, has the absolute right to provide her own equipment, arms, ammunition, supplies, transport; in short, everything for her troops at the front. Further, the appointment and promotion of officers rests entirely with Canada for her troops in any part of the world. Any association with the War Office in any of these regards is merely a matter of convenience, courtesy, and for exchange of ideas. The Canadian forces are in no sense British regulars. The wisdom and foresight of British statesmen and War Office officials in framing the Army Act and amendments thereto have left nothing unguarded in the interests of the colonies. Where the practice has differed from the law the fault lies with those concerned for not understanding, or, if understanding, for not applying the law. It was different in the case of the contingents we sent to South Africa. There Britain paid while Canada, as agent of Britain, enrolled. Now, Canada as Canada, not as an agent, enrolls, pays and controls. I am not casting that up as any reflection upon the ex-Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I may say here that the plan to be followed in relation to our Canadian troops was laid down by me with Lord Lansdowne two years before the South African war broke out. Lord Lansdowne has the plans which I laid down in the month of December, 1897, for colonial assistance before war broke out, and the Sydney Daily Telegraph, an Australian newspaper, on the occasion of my visit there in 1897, published a statement exactly bearing out the line of policy I had laid down.

I see some of my Liberal friends opposite looking as if they thought that I was finding fault. I am responsible for the plan that was carried out. In view of the opposition there was in Canada and in other parts of the world to the colonies serving for the Motherland, I thought the best plan would be at the start to let the troops be paid by Britain and thus one objection would be removed. I had taken the matter up previously with Lord Lansdowne and the identical plan that I proposed was the one that was carried out. Canada furnishes her own uniforms, weapons, equipment, hospitals, nurses, and doctors' staff, and yet, when I sent over the dentists, the first time the system had ever been introduced, they were thrown out by the medical service of Great Britain and attached to the British hospitals up and down the line; they would not have them. We put our foot down and finally, after a great deal of struggling, they were recognized. They were to have one dentist with every hospital. They were bound that the dentists should be under the control of the medical officers, and I was bound that they should not be. I did not see why a dentist who was over twenty-one years of age should not be allowed to pull a tooth without having to do it under the authority of a medical officer. I take the ground that it is none of the business of Great Britain if we chose to use wheel-barrows for our transport service at the front. We must take it for granted that we know our business and that Canada will have the best things that are going as we have the best things that are going, and that it is our privilege to say what is good and what is no good. In this connection the Prime Minister made a statement the other night and the ground which he took then is the ground which has been taken by others. In bringing this up I am not divulging any secret. Without actually quoting the right hon. gentleman, he said that wherever a committee of the British service examined goods and threw them out he was ready to abide by the decision of that committee. That, I think, is a fair interpretation of the right hon. gentleman's remarks.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Well, I did not just put it in that way.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I will quote—

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is immaterial.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I will quote what the right hon. gentleman said:

> On the other hand, I do not propose, I have not proposed in the past, and I do not propose in the future to set up my judgment or the judgment of this Government against the opinion of military experts who may say that it is necessary that the type of equipment, of transport, or of anything else necessary in this war ought to be uniform and that the war cannot be carried on effectively unless it is uniform.

That is the ground taken by the Prime Minister. I am not finding the slightest fault with his taking that ground, but it is not the ground I take. The halo had gone off a lot of these fellows so far as I was concerned long ago, and I did not see why the opinion of a young sprig of a captain about twenty-two years of age, who threw out our equipment should prevail as against the opinion of a young Canadian officer. I am not impressed with any man who shuts out any Canadian stuff, such, for instance, as our Canadian wagons. Our little Canadian two-horse wagons in South Africa would carry a heavier load than the British wagons with four teams, and we could out-distance and out-travel them. In the Northwest Rebellion the ordinary farm wagons which were used there travelled more miles up to their axles in mud than the heavy British wagons travelled on the good roads of France and Belgium. When our wagons went to England they were thrown out by these young officers, yet, I may say that many of our trucks and wagons were running after many of those sent to the front from England were thrown out.

But, let us see for a moment how these inspections are made and what they amount to. Here is a letter that was addressed to me as Minister of Militia:

Hotel Cecil, London, W.C.,
March 15, 1915.

Major Genl. the Hon. Sam Hughes,
Minister of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear General,

Re Motor Lorries:

The main fault that the Mechanical Transport Department of the War Office had to find with our Motor Lorries was the fact that we had five makes in use, three of which were being sent over to France, and which necessitated carrying over spare parts for all these various makes.

When I heard that everything else had been thrown out, I naturally raised Cain with my officers here and found that everything was all right.

As I advised you before, when our 1st Division were ready to go to France, the British Mechanical Transport Department supplied us with 51 motor lorries and 9 motor cars to make our equipment complete.

The motors they rejected cost us about $2,800 each, and they charged for the ones they gave us $5,241 apiece.

I have been endeavouring ever since I got back here to get details of these lorries and cars; these have just been received by me and I am more than astonished to find that six English makes of motor lorries were supplied to us as follows:—

Leyland	5
Halford	4
Wolseley	6
Daimler	9
Albion	7
Seabrooke	20

and two makes of motor cars as follows:

Sunbeam	9
Vauxhall	2

These people do beat me! They impressed on me in no uncertain terms that we must positively get down our makes of motor lorries to if possible two, as the question of taking spare parts to the Continent and keeping them in stock was a very serious one indeed, and here they are doing the very thing that we were instructed not to do and doing it to a much greater extent than we had ever dreamt of doing. These things are rather difficult for me to comprehend, and I intend to take the matter up with the War Office officially tomorrow, but do not expect that I shall receive any more satisfaction than usual.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd) John W. Carson.

So that the claim was all moonshine that we must have a uniform system in regard to the trucks because they themselves had nothing of the kind.

I take the stand that the soldiers who fought and won at St. Julien, Festubert, etc., are fit to furnish soldiers and officers for any service, and that we have inspectors in Canada who can determine what we shall have and what we shall not have. I did not know there were any people in the universe who would revive that old, exploded idea, but to show that there are such pre-historic people, I may say that the auditor general on his return recently brought back the old question which I explained last year, as to why our transport wagons and that sort of thing had been thrown out. I do not want to repeat what I have already said, but I may say that the objection to our wagons was based chiefly on the ground that they could not turn on the narrow roads of France. Why, Sir, the British wagon takes 35 feet of a circle in which to turn, while ours takes 31 feet 9 inches. That was put before the Government in May 1915, or earlier, and yet we find a British officer in our service here bringing it up again a short time ago. The thing is nonsense. Our wagon turns in 31 feet 9 inches, while theirs takes 35 feet and, as I have already pointed out, our wagon has proved better and has outlasted theirs. My stand is that Canada should decide as to what she herself shall use.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before my hon. friend leaves that matter, could he say what was the value of the equipment which was thrown away?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I forget; it was millions. We did not look at the value; we were so busy swearing we had no time to figure up the value. Now, Mr. Speaker, my object in bringing this matter up is this: I am anxious that this Empire shall rest upon a stable foundation. I have given the best years of my life to advocating the cause of full partnership union. I have taken part in two wars for the Empire, and I am going to stand or fall by the rights of Canada under its Constitution.

In the first year of the war Canada had no say whatever. In the appointment of General Carson to go over there and represent me, I brought in my Order in Council. My idea was that he should represent the minister over there, and look after the soldiers' interests, and things of that kind, but he was only allowed to look after supplies. I am not blaming anybody; this is not a new thing. I had the same trouble in South Africa, where it was pointed out that the British did the paying, and I did some very vigorous kicking at that time on the rights of Canadians. In this war we are doing the paying, the equipping and outfitting of our men, and the ground I take is not in the interests of Canada alone, but in the interests of the whole Empire, because unless we have a proper understanding things are going to go wrong. Why, at the very time I have been speaking of, when these motor trucks were being purchased, every man that came home invalided, and every letter from the front, talked of another Boston tea party. It went so far that some fellows on the staff drew lots as to who should punch the head of the officer who had been offensive to them. Can I be blamed for standing to the law? Carson was not to interfere in any way with the forces. The Pay Department was modelled after the British, and so was the medical service.

Now, my hon. friends opposite cannot make any political capital out of this, for it is the same with Grit and Tory alike. To-day, in Great Britain, you appoint a Canadian to an office and when a British officer comes along the Canadian kow-tows to him. That is the only fault I have to find with Canadians in Great Britain. They have not understood their individuality as Canadians, and have not stood up for their rights kindly and firmly. The only Canadian officer who has done it to the King's taste is Frank Meighen of Montreal. He has stood up for the rights of Canada under the law up to the hilt and he gets along better than any other officer in our force.

I am not going to enter into a discussion of the medical service to-day, but rest assured that when the time comes I shall have a hand in it, and it may be, up to the elbow. Last year when I was in the Old Country I found that under Colonel Jones' administration—and the Prime Minister will remember this—it took me three weeks to get from him a list of the hospitals scattered all over the country in which our men were being treated. I asked at the time why, when we were paying the expenses of our own men, they should be treated in V.A.D. hospitals away up in the north of England and other parts of the United Kingdom, and I asked why our good nurses with three years' training were being utilized for more than half their time looking after British soldiers. I asked why when we were paying seventy-five cents a day, we should have our fellows' brows smoothed and their hands held by nice little girls who had taken a six weeks' course in the St. John's Ambuance Corps or something like that. It was very congenial of course, but at the same time I think our boys would have liked to have their brows smoothed and their hands held by our own girls.

As to the command of the troops, I have recognized from the outset that in the field the troops should be, not that they legally are, under the command of a British officer. The general command of the troops is part of the law, and I have not sought to evade the law in the slightest degree. When it came to sending over the second division—and the Prime Minister disputed my statement the other night, that I had informed him in regard to this and I might here remind him that I showed him copies of my telegram to Lord Kitchener, and the Prime Minister drew my attention to the fact that in one of the telegrams my language was a little too strong. In other words, I received a gentle reprimand for my language in one of the telegrams.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not remember at the time. But I will look up the correspondence, and if there is any corection to be made, I shall gladly make it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: On March 20, 1915, we agreed that Steele should command, and I sent the following telegram to Kitchener:

> I purpose appointing Major General Sam Steele to command Second Overseas Canadian Division. He is splendid organizer and disciplinarian. Do you object?

Kitchener replied as follows:

> London, March 22, 1915.
>
> General Hughes,
> Minister of Militia,
> Ottawa.
>
> Reference to your telegram of twentieth March. I am sorry that in present state of warfare on the continent, it would not be possible to place General Steele in command of a division. Very experienced officers are necessary in such positions to do justice to the troops under their command.

That got me rather hot under the collar, because Steele had had a lot of these gentlemen under his command in South Africa. Some of the very best men at the front have been trained by Steele in South Africa. I am not saying that he has not his faults as an administrator, but as an organizer and trainer and commander of troops I think he would be hard to beat; and I always endeavoured to put these fellows where they would do the most good. I would not have dreamed of putting General Steele in a place of administration in comparison with some others, but I would put him in to command men. On March 29, 1915, I wired Lord Kitchener as follows:

Regret your views re Steele. Could he have done worse than at Salisbury?

I need not refer to Salisbury, where our men had to put in a winter of horror, and where the General Officer Commanding visited them only twice during the whole winter. The telegram reads:

Regret your views re Steele. Could he have done worse than at Salisbury? My opinion based on years of experience and observation in war and on manoeuvres convinces me Steele, and my brother, Colonel John Hughes, each has qualified for division as any officer in British service.—General Blank.

Then I named an officer whose name I will not repeat because he has not come to the front; he has not been heard of publicly. In other words, several names were suggested to me, and this was one of them. The telegram continues:

General Blank—seriously suggested from England. Believe I have fifty better. However, Steele could take division across and commander satisfactory to you could be named later. How would Lowther do?

Sam Hughes.

I was willing to meet him more than half way every time. On April 1, Kitchener replied as follows:

General Hughes,
Ottawa.

Your telegram of twenty-ninth. I have no objection to General Steele coming here in charge of contingent, if it is clearly understood by General Steele that when the contingent takes the field as a division, other arrangements for its command will have to be made.

Kitchener.

That got me rather hot under the collar, as if I was going to deceive Steele! So I sent the following reply, which the Prime Minister, very properly in his opinion, objected to:

Ottawa, April 7, 1915.

Earl Kitchener,
War Office,
London.

Am somewhat surprised at your 3833 cipher April 1st. Am not in habit of deceiving and Steele will certainly know exact situation. Am not dictating, merely reviewing. I know many of your major generals; some good and capable, but many absolutely reverse, far inferior for administration in office or capability in the field to Steele or a dozen other of my officers. Have calmly and loyally remained aloof from interference with Salisbury horror and disintegration of First Canadians, but please do not ask that too much be borne. Claim no authority to manage force in field but under Army Act, Canada has absolute authority in respect to appointments. Further, offensiveness and contemptuousness of some army officers in First Division became almost intolerable. I look to you to see that courtesy, even-handed justice and fair play are accorded to all my deserving officers.

Sam Hughes.

A good many hon. gentlemen have insisted that I should clear up matters with regard to contracting for supplies. My plan at the beginning of the war, so far as Canadian purchases are concerned, was that the director of contracts—incidentally he is a cousin of the Prime Minister—together with capable business men should have control of the purchasing for the Canadian forces, and that it should be done by public tender or universal service, and that supplies for Great Britain and the Allies should also be managed by the director of contracts. The first buying done for Canada was on the above lines and the results were splendid, except in the case of the trucks and bicycles purchased through the friend of the Minister of Finance. The second plan of purchasing that was adopted was purchasing through a sub-committee of the Privy Council. When I was in England in 1914, they prepared jointly the Orders in Council I do not know how they ever did it, for I tried it once myself. However, that plan gave place to another one, where the minister on the recommendation of the Quartermaster General and D.O.C. sent in an order in council, which was referred to a sub-committee of the Privy Council. This resulted in failure and delays, and gave place to the War Purchasing Commission under the Hon. Mr. Kemp, which I need not say was a much better system, although I think the plan I had at the very beginning of having the buying done by the director of contracts was still better. The War Purchasing Commission amounts practically to the same thing and its work has been very well done.

The fourth system of buying was by the War Purchasing Commission, using the Quartermaster General and the Director of Contracts to help them. The first subcommittee of the Privy Council ran the buying on the basis of patronage. Next the British commission was appointed, and then the War Purchasing Commission and the Munitions Board.

In regard to munitions, I may say that I do not hear the words "Shell Committee" mentioned now. To the Shell Committee and to your humble servant in inaugurating that committee, is due the financial success that Canada enjoys to-day, and to them and their kindred operations is due the fact that the Minister of Finance can tell the banking institutions of this country that he wants so much money, and as their vaults are filled with it they can hand it out as required. Let us not forget the Shell Committee. The Imperial Munitions Board is a nice name, but I like the old Shell Committee, and I like the men that ran it. It was well run; it kept this country from bankruptcy, and it has helped to bring about a condition of affairs that this country will be thankful for for many a long year. The munitions were handled in the first instance by the Shell Committee, and afterwards by the Imperial Munitions Board.

I may say that a good deal of the trouble concerning all this matter has been raised by Mr. T. A. Russell, the chosen friend of the Minister of Finance and of the Chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board. He has consulted the right hon. leader of the Opposition; he has posted him, and he has written letters to the Prime Minister of Canada finding fault with the old Shell Committee, thus creating an unhealthy atmosphere.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend is utterly wrong as to Mr. Russell consulting me. I never saw Mr. Russell.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the right hon. leader of the Opposition let me inform him that not only did Mr. Russell consult him, but Mr. Russell handed him correspondence to put in the Toronto Globe.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Not to me.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Oh, but I know it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I accept, of course, the statement of my right hon. friend, but I can prove what I say.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that the rule is very clear as to the acceptance of statements made by hon. members.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Our memories sometimes become defective. I was sorry to see the Prime Minister forget two or three things the other night and I am sorry that the leader of the Opposition is forgetting this now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend is absolutely misinformed. I never received any communication from Mr. Russell.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would not dream of charging the leader of the Opposition with equivocation. Will he say that Mr. Russell did not put into his hands an article for publication in the Toronto Globe, and ask him to have it published?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Not Mr. Russell, another gentleman did, not Mr. Russell.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Well, the article was prepared by Mr. Russell.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That I do not know.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do know.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The article in question never went from me to the Globe. I kept it in my archives.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I thought it was thrown out and picked up in the waste-paper basket. The reason I am bringing up this matter is to show that all this agitation against the old Shell Committee was for the purpose of getting rid of it. Letters were written by Mr. Russell to War Office officers and shortly afterwards we find Mr. Thomas coming out here with the intention of not spending one dollar in Canada on munitions. He made a speech in Montreal—I am out of the Government now and I will talk a little—stating that Canadian prices were high. I trimmed him the next day and in twenty-four hours thereafter Mr. Thomas was recalled and Mr. Hichens and Mr. Brand were sent out here to look after the munitions, and steps were taken by which Canada received orders for munitions. All the time Mr. Russell was playing the game against the Shell Committee. Soon after the new Munitions Board was appointed, Mr. Russell secured a contract for one million fuses and the Northern Electric Company of Montreal secured a similar contract, but the price at which Mr. Russell got the contract was $339,000 more than the price given to the Montreal firm for the same fuse. Call it what you like. Mr. Russell is now employed by the Imperial Munitions Board.

I wrote a letter to the Prime Minister on May 13, 1915, and I presume there is no objection to my reading it. The faults complained in it have been rectified by the War Purchasing Commission, and I think it is in justice to myself that I should place it on record to show the life we had to lead in the Militia Department:

May 13, 1915.

Dear Sir Robert,

Since my return from England last November, I have repeatedly notified you that owing to the interference and plans of the "so-called" sub-committee and to the repeated hold-ups and needless obstructions of some of my colleagues in the affairs of this department, the Contract branch has been very much hampered and practically blockaded; delays have been very prolonged; the cost has been greatly enhanced and the goods supplied have been, in many cases, inferior. Indeed, the most ardent agents of the German Government could scarcely have been more successful in holding up the proper equipment of our forces, had they been in control.

As one of many specific examples. Take the trucks for the Second Division. They should have been ready last December, they are not ready yet. Some of my colleagues constituted themselves champions of this or that truck and brought about delays whereby untried trucks would be purchased; high prices would be paid in commissions to agents, and the Government, and the country would be treated practically as a retailer. My policy, as you may remember, in this and in all other matters, was to force dealers to give the Government wholesale, or manufacturers' rates.

At the present time there are upwards of one hundred requisitions that have long been in. The quartermaster general has over and over and over again, until his heart has grown sick, brought them before me, they have been promptly passed on to the director of contracts, and the great majority of them, when passed on to the Privy Council, have been held up in Council, or by the Treasury Board, laid aside or sent back—but always delayed; while the director of contracts and his officers have unceasingly been interfered with, delayed, and given endless and unnecessary work by the sub-committee.

I saw, by an article in the Free Press, that it is current everywhere among the soldiers and officers, that they are short of nearly every class of equipment and supplies. In fact, three times recently I have been severely reproached about shortages in supplies and equipment, by outsiders who had learned of these shortages from soldiers and officers of the force.

Further, to my surprise, I was spoken to in Montreal this week, and informed that our Medical units going over were only half equipped, while many of our combatant units are not properly outfitted.

In addition to the serious aspect of the case and from the viewpoint of the efficiency of our soldiers, there is the disheartening side. It is not only unfair to the gallant boys, who are giving and willingly risking their lives for the cause, and making domestic sacrifices, but it is absolutely unjust to me and my officers.

Therefore, as Minister of Militia, I must respectfully enter my protest, as I have frequently before entered it, at the interference and delays caused in all these things. It tends, not only to the injury and inefficiency of our soldiers, thus jeopardizing the success of British arms, but it must politically reflect seriously upon the Government.

It is charged that the sub-committee have given contracts for soldiers' clothing to be made by jobbers, who sublet them and never entered a stitch themselves. Women's linen underwear, women's blouse makers, women's corset makers and truss makers, have all been among these contractors.

We believe, we are in a position in this department to truthfully say that there never was such a volume of business so successfully and economically transacted, or under such an efficient system of purchase and inspection, as had been developed by us up to the time when I went to Europe, and when the sub-committee took control.

I may say that at that time I did not know of this truck and bicycle question. (Reading):

I feel very fortunate in having under me officers, both civil and military, in all the leading departments, in whom I can place absolute trust. They have done nobly, under very adverse surroundings, and I can conceive of no plan by which the work could have been more honestly, economically and effectively done, than was ours.

I regret to have to submit these facts once more, but in justice both to myself, as well as to the splendid, gallant soldiers we are endeavouring to equip for the front, I must ask your serious consideration of these matters.

I have but one desire, the upbuilding of Canada, the Empire and humanity.

Let me hope that you will regard this letter as written with due respect to myself, to my country, to you, as my leader, and in justice to our soldiers.

Faithfully,
(Sgd.) Sam Hughes.

The matter was taken up very shortly afterwards by the War Purchasing Commission, and the decks were cleared.

I am charged with having been autocratic. I ask any one to point to an instance where I overstepped my rights as Minister of Militia or as Officer Commanding the forces. I wish to point out further that there is nothing in law or custom, of the Constitution or in the Army Act, which prevents or forbids one regularly in authority from doing any of the following things:

1. Requiring officers to make themselves fit, active, energetic, temperate, courteous and proficient. Hon. gentlemen may rest assured that every officer, no matter who he was, or where he came from, was made just as fit as it was possible to make him.

2. Making railway and steamboat lines handle troops properly. We had to ginger the companies up a little bit; it was a question of moving, not of sitting down in armchairs. All the railway companies got together, and we showed them what they had to do. They did it splendidly, but they had to be driven.

3. Requiring contractors to fulfil their contracts properly. I did not support anybody, friend or foe, who failed to carry out his contract properly.

4. Failing to take orders on this, that or any other subject from every person constituting himself an autocrat. Thousands of people were telling me how to do things —and I was foolish enough to follow my own lines.

5. Seeing that all ranks do not make of war an occasion for pink tea training, and that they do not turn the force into a society institution. One of the very serious complaints made against me was that I used the bands of the two permanent forces at Valcartier for the entertainment of the soldiers rather than have them entertain a lot of women who came from around the country, annoying the fellows and taking them from their work by their pink tea performances every afternoon.

6. Taking precautions that promotions and appointments are made on the basis of merit, fitness, and capability, not through social, aristocratic, society, or other irregular influences. The army that went from Canada was a democratic army, and second to none in the world.

I have a few suggestions to make. I have talked this matter over with Mr. Lloyd George, Generals Robertson, Whigham, MacDonough, MacCready, Sir Reginald Brade, Sir Douglas Haig, and every officer of standing at the front. Last year our boys were without rest for nine months, being always within sound of the bursting shells at the front. Human flesh and blood cannot stand that, and I decided that we would put six divisions at the front instead of four. The men in the supporting trenches and reserve positions are always within reach of the shells, always within sound of the guns. I was going to form two corps, and have six —possibly eight—divisions there, so that the fifth would support the first and second, and the sixth would support the other two. These divisions would be out of range of the guns part of the time until their turn came for duty in the front trenches. They would be moved up by battalions, regiments or brigades, so that the men would be gradually trained, while one-third of our boys would be resting all the time. This plan met with the hearty approval of everybody. I am making these suggestions because I want to follow positive lines. I am anxious that the war shall be successfully prosecuted; I am not after scalps—they will come quick enough.

I would promote General Byng; that would get rid of one obstacle which is in the way. He is a very good fellow; he is in command of our Canadian corps. You cannot throw men like him out; he is just as good as some of the others who command armies.

[Sir Sam Hughes.]

I did take the liberty of suggesting to Sir Douglas Haig and General Robertson that they ought to put General Byng in command of an army, so that our boys would still be under him—but in the army.

5 p.m. I have no hesitation in suggesting that General Currie, a prudent and efficient officer, should be in command of one of these new corps, and that some other Canadian should be put in command of the other. General Turner has seen fit to take up a side-show job in London. It is none of my funeral that he has gone over there; he will regret it all the rest of his days. There would, then, be at least six divisions, with Canadians in command and on the staff at the front. At the present time many of the staff positions are held by persons other than Canadians. At the outbreak of the war Great Britain had about 160,000 soldiers, who were in charge of a very insufficient staff. To-day she has about 5,000,000, and, strange to say, the small staff in charge has been swelled and stretched out so that it holds all the key positions, not only in Kitchener's Army, but in the Canadian army as well.

By some mischance an Order in Council was drafted during the absence of the Prime Minister and myself last year, and passed after my return, but also in my absence, giving absolute command at the front to General Alderson, who should have had no more to say in the matter than this ink bottle on my desk. That is the time that all these important appointments were made. These matters should be taken over by the Canadian Government; these appointments should be under our control.

Under the suggestion that I have outlined, we would have 18 brigades commanded by Canadians—and we have plenty of the finest boys that have ever faced an enemy. As I have pointed out, under this arrangement new troops would be broken in gradually, and two divisions would always be at rest. Except for the command, the forces would be directly under the authority of the Canadian Government.

I have no hesitation in saying, as I have said to the Prime Minister on other occasions, that there is no use for such an office as that of Overseas Minister of Militia. It should be abolished because it is purely ornamental, and will cost Canada about $3,000,000 a year. Poor old General Carson and Colonel Murphy had about 30 officers assisting them, at comparatively small cost —but I am told that there are six or seven hundred around the place now, and the Lord knows how many more there will be before the war is over. My aim has been to attain the greatest possible efficiency with the least possible cost, friction and trouble. I always tried to have these questions settled as quietly as I could, but, chiefly because of the newspaper show on the other side, inspired, I assume, from Canada, there was always that little tittle-tattle creating friction and doing harm. But, in spite of all that, the boys got on well.

I should like to say a word on the subject of recruiting. When the war broke out my plan was this: The Prime Minister offered a contingent; it was decided that it should be a division. I had a telegram prepared which was sent to every officer in the Dominion of Canada, as well as to the district officers commanding, the moment that our offer of assistance to the cause of the Empire had been accepted. The result was that the boys got into harness the next day; whereas if we had proceeded in the ordinary way it would have taken two or three weeks to get them together. The system worked well, and 33,000 men prepared to embark within six weeks of the acceptance of our offer. Our troops having gone over, we proceeded to raise battalions in large centres. The next year, when we found that our task was to be even greater, I inaugurated a system of recruiting, and I challenge the world to show anything to equal it. I divided the country into areas of about 40,000 men each; in other words, we took one large riding or two small ridings as a general basis and gave a battalion to each centre. We allowed recruiting in every hamlet, village, town and city, in accordance with the number they could raise. Twenty-five was the minimum. And let me say there never was such a system of recruiting so successfully carried out in the history of the world. We raised 160,000 men in practically no time. Finding that we were still going to be about 80,000 short of the offer made by the Prime Minister—on his own responsibility—I doubled up the divisions. That is, I took areas of 80,000 to 100,000, and I apportioned battalions to a great many of these. But here another hindrance stepped in. I do not know whether it was in the interest of munition workers or not, but I stand here to say that I look on all this talk of munition workers as piffle, compared with the need of men at the front, piffle of the worst kind—this kind of piffle of considering men getting $7 a day in munition works as compared with a man in the trenches, running the risk of being blown to pieces. It is piffle, and the commonest sort of piffle.

An order in council was passed forbidding the Department of Militia from authorizing a battalion here, there or elsewhere, and it is said that the reason was that too many battalions were being raised in Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal and other large cities.

Mr. MACDONALD: When was that order in council passed?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am not sure. It was passed in my absence anyway, you may be sure of that; I have never read it yet. The point is that they said: Here you must not have so many regiments recruiting in Toronto or so many recruiting in Montreal.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think what my hon. friend says might be misunderstood. There was not an order in council passed saying that no further battalions should be recruited, but that no further battalions should be recruited without an order in council.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The object being to prevent two or three being raised in Toronto or Montreal, for instance.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Too many being raised in one place.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Toronto has a population of 600,000. Toronto should have fifteen regiments recruiting at once; but it never had more than three. Montreal, with a population of 750,000, should have had about eighteen or twenty battalions recruiting at once. Montreal never had more than three. I do not see why my county, which has turned out nearly 5,000 men, should have one battalion being raised there with 40,000 people while Toronto should have only three with 500,000. I never could see the logic of it, and I do not now. I think that Toronto should have at least fifteen battalions going on while the counties of Ontario, Peterborough and my own county, with about 40,000 each, should be raising about one battalion each.

Mr. MACDONALD: What was the result of that order in council? What effect did it have on recruiting?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know. Recruiting has not gone on, I know that. The Minister of Public Works wanted three battalions in Winnipeg—he was not afraid of it, and I passed the order. That was when I happened to learn that this order in council to which I have referred had geen passed. I went to England and when I got back he had not yet started raising the battalion; authority had not been given; it was held up in the Treasury Board or some place and nothing had yet been done. Had I been running the show in the old way we would have had them raised in six weeks. We raised the troops for Valcartier in that time, and we would have got them in the same way. In other words, three months was lost, not in organizing the battalions, but in getting the power to organize them. I am not criticising, only there seems to be a desire to play to the gallery in connection with these munition workers. There was a drop in recruiting at all events. I have heard all sorts of stories, but I have never asked my officers. When I came back my officers made certain statements; they had been directed to go slow in recruiting, but I never asked; I do not know whether it is true or not.

However, seeing the falling off, seeing the need of straining every nerve we could strain at the front, when I came back I set to work to try and get the pulse of the boys. I have always been in favour of universal service, training the boys. I did not deem conscription necessary, and it was not. I could have raised 500,000 men by voluntary enlistment. I could have raised 600,000 by voluntary enlistment without any trouble, I believe. That is only a statement; but I believe I could have done it. However, this order in council stopping the authorization of regiments was passed, and the talk came on from every hand—I presume paid for by German agents—against taking men from munition works, when we have 800,000 single men between the ages of 18 and 45 in Canada, single men not doing their duty in any way except in jobs where others could take their places.

On October 17 I wrote to the Prime Minister stating that I had come to the conclusion that we must resort to compulsory service. I take the ground to-day, I have no hesitation in telling my hon. friend from Wright (Mr. Devlin) that I would not be afraid to go into Dorchester or any other county in Quebec, to meet the intelligent electors in that county; and I am sure that they would endorse the stand I take in favour of applying the Militia Act to secure men for the army. They must know that nothing stands between them and Von Hindenburg except the British Navy. And if 50 ships of war with transports should go down, what stands between Great Britain and Von Hindenburg? If the German navy ever overbears the British, then Von Hindenburg can march to Ottawa without hindrance; and then I suppose these gentlemen who have opposed our men being trained would take to the woods and leave their wives and children.

I come now to the business end of the war, and I trust not to detain you much longer. Early in the war Lord Kitchener asked for certain things. We appointed the Shell Committee, made up of General Bertram, the Carnegie Brothers, Colonel Cantley and Colonel Watts. We made shells. Canada, I see by recent statements, has received directly and indirectly upwards of $750,000,000 from shells and munitions, and the country generally, as the result of that, has been prosperous. The use of basic instead of acid steel in the manufacture of shells was introduced, and billions of pounds —not millions—but billions of pounds of basic steel, made in Canada, have been used in place of acid steel which we would have had to import from the United States. That was done through the action of Colonel Cantley and your humble servant in the premises; and, I make no bones about it. We claim the credit, the Shell Committee and your humble servant claim the credit of introducing good times into Canada through the Shell Committee and munitions work. Bankers would not lend a dollar at that time; they were very adverse to lending money for the purpose. The manufacture of tri-nitrotoluol was introduced into Canada, as was also that of gun-cotton, acetone from the distilleries, and other materials necessary for the production of munitions. Copper was refined in Canada for the first time. Zinc also was refined, and on the first order for zinc the British Government saved $4,000,000 owing to the difference between our price, 15 cents, and the American price, 42 cents. Hundreds of thousands of tons of lead were produced in Canada, and steps have been taken for the manufacture of nickel. Then the fish industry in Canada has been greatly stimulated and expanded. We have no conception of the value of the stimulus that has been given to the fishing industry. It is estimated that $100,000,000 a year can easily be brought into Canada through the supplying of Canadian fish to the soldiers of Canada, Great Britain and France. I am informed that the French Government—and I took this matter up direct with the French Minister of War and the Minister of Munitions—has now placed a contract for fish in Canada, and that delivery of these fish will start very soon. I took the matter up with the British Government in connection with the supply of fish for their soldiers, and the British Government, as well as the Canadian Government, is giving large orders for these fish. Then we had plans laid for the development of our timber trade with the Motherland, and also for agricultural products and manufactures. Why should we not supply munitions? We are supplying men, why not munitions too?

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is a point in regard to which I should like some information, because I think it is important. My hon. friend, in one of his letters to the Prime Minister, as quoted upon page 62 of Hansard, refers to the organization in England, and he makes the statement that it is now proposed to go back to the old conditions as at the end of the first five months of the war, which my hon. friend states he is sure would produce a chaotic condition of affairs. Has the hon. gentleman any information as to what the result of that has been in England?

Sir SAM HUGHES: That is a question of hearsay, and I am not going to butt in. I have my own views and data, but I have no official authority.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend in one of his letters makes the statement:

> As you are aware, it took us four months in the midst of this great war to fight through the principles of purchasing, for the Second Division, trucks at the lowest wholesale prices.

When was it that the four months were lost?

Sir SAM HUGHES: I read a long letter —was my hon. friend not listening?—showing that the motor trucks should have reached England in December.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that that is what he refers to in the letter which he addressed to the Prime Minister in regard to the delays in purchasing?

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is distinctly stated in that letter that those trucks should have been ready in December, and they were not ready in May.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That letter was not in the correspondence published.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to see it.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It is on Hansard. I am asked to back the Tory Government and party. Yes, I will gladly back the Tory Government and the Tory party—I have done so for a good many years—but the platform must be broader than "keep Laurier and the Grits out," and action must be something different from epileptic utterances and theories re the labour wanted at home and the National Service Commission. I will back any party whose interests are the best for the welfare of our soldiers and the energetic, active, successful prosecution of the war to a victorious conclusion at any cost. There are in Canada millions of mothers, fathers, sisters and children of the 300,000 boys across the water who are wondering what Canada is doing to support these lads in every legitimate way. Canada wants another 100,000 men, maybe 300,000. They can be raised. They must be raised. Less than half a hundred battleships and their consorts of the British navy stand between Germany and sea supremacy. The right hon. the leader of the Opposition hopes for victory through famine and exhaustion; others for victory along similar lines, but should famine and exhaustion fail to materialize, and should by any mischance disaster befall Britain's navy, then there is nothing between Von Hindenburg and Ottawa, and we will have to take to the woods. Let me point out that the German papers are proclaiming that even Canada is getting near the famine stage. People are talking about compulsory thrift and that sort of bugaboo. That is published in Germany, and Germany thinks that Canada with all her resources, and with the United States at her door, is exhausted. It is the same in England with those agitations about food and meatless days. They are all published in Germany, and the German people are wondering if Britain is not on the verge of a food shortage.

Let us not live in a fool's paradise. This thing is serious, and must be treated seriously, not by theorizing but by energetic action. I have no dread of Quebec province and compulsory service. In my heart I feel that should the Militia Act be applied, our compatriots of Quebec province, following their wish for an even-handed compulsory service, will not merely be enthusiastic in volunteering, but be found to respond loyally and well. I have one aim above all others, the winning of this war; but the winning of this war will never be accomplished by theorizing; it can only be accomplished by action, action, and still more energetic action.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to participate in this debate upon the Address, but the ex-Minister of Militia, (Sir Sam Hughes) has made some remarks regarding myself and his relationship to the Government of which he was a member, which seem to call for a reply on my part. At the outset of his remarks he read some letters. I do not understand him to claim the opinions expressed in his correspondence as his own, but I was struck with the political wisdom of these letters. We have heard of the letters of Chesterfield, and it seems to me that the advice which was given to the ex-minister in these letters contained more political wisdom than even the letters of Chesterfield.

In one of these letters, reference is made to intrigue on my part against the ex-Minister of Militia, who was my colleague for so many years. There are some things, Mr. Speaker, which a gentleman will not discuss, and one is his own honour. I believe I have the confidence of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and I believe that I have the confidence of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Outside of the ex-Minister of Militia I do not believe that any one in this House is of the opinion that I am capable of intriguing against any one, much less a colleague. I say further that if the ex-Minister of Militia believes—and I really do not believe that he believes—that I intrigued or conspired against him, all I have to say is that the strain of the last two years has impaired the powers of what was once a very strong mind. The ex-Minister of Militia referred in the letter which he read to the House, to the Montreal Daily Mail, and to its attitude towards him. He stated that the president of the Montreal Daily Mail is my half brother. That is correct. Mr. Nichols is my half brother. His profession is that of journalism. He is president and manager of the Montreal Daily Mail, but I have no interest in the Montreal Daily Mail. I do not even know the shareholders of that paper, and if my brother, in pursuance of his judgment and discretion as editor in chief, or as president, of the Montreal Daily Mail, attacked the ex-Minister of Militia, it certainly was not at my instigation, but was, I have no doubt, in pursuance of what he believed to be his duty to the public whom he is serving to the best of his ability, as I am in the position which I have the honour to occupy.

The hon. ex-Minister of Militia also referred to the Toronto Evening Telegram. He says that I had a connection with the Toronto Evening Telegram. So I had, thirty years ago, from twenty-five to thirty years ago, to be accurate. The ex-Minister of Militia has not, I think, read very carefully the Toronto Evening Telegram during the last five years, because I do not believe that there is any public man who has come more frequently under the animadversion of the editor of the Evening Telegram than myself. I was connected with the Toronto Evening Telegram for many years, and I desire to say to the ex-Minister of Militia, and to the House, that there is no man outside of the proprietor who controls that paper. The Toronto Evening Telegram is an absolutely straight, independent paper, and if the action of a public man is such that the Evening Telegram can approve of that action it will approve. If the action of a public man is, in the opinion of the editor or the proprietor of the Evening Telegram, such as to call for criticism, criticism will be passed upon that public man. So far as concerns any attacks which have been made on the ex-Minister of Militia by the Montreal Mail, or by the Toronto Evening Telegram, I have had absolutely nothing whatever to do with them and I have no responsibility for them and never had.

My hon. friend has dealt with his relationship with the Government. He was my colleague for five years and I always gave him a generous measure of support in regard to his policy and his plans for the improvement and development of the Canadian militia in which, in common with him, I have always had a just pride. Not only that, but I always regarded the ex-Minister of Militia as a gallant soldier and a true patriot and I regard him so to-day. I do not believe that the ex-Minister of Militia has been quite fair to me but I believe he has been misled. I am going to be scrupulously fair to him and any statements I make here will be made in that spirit. My hon. friend has stated that he was on some occasions brought into conflict with me because I took the view that I should exercise supervision over the estimates of every department. In a certain degree that is true. That is the duty of the Finance Minister. The Finance Minister, more than any other minister, is responsible to the public for seeing that expenditures are kept within reasonable bounds. That must be so for two reasons. In the first place, he is the minister who is most likely to know what the revenue of the country will probably be, and, secondly, he knows what are the resources available by way of borrowing to the government of the day. The result is that he occupies a rather unique position towards his colleagues. Every Minister of Finance has taken the position that he is charged with a special responsibility as to the matter of expenditure. I do not believe that I was singular in that regard. I remember that, some three years ago when, on my initiative, it was determined that instead of the Estimates being considered by Council as a whole, they should, for convenience, for the saving of time, and for their better consideration, be brought first before the Treasury Board, the ex-Minister of Militia did not readily fall in with that idea. He did not desire to come to the Treasury Board. Well, I said: The main thing is not to come to the Treasury Board; the main thing is to get these Estimates right and if the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet will go to the mountain. The ex-minister will recollect that instead of his coming to see me in my office, I went to see him in his, he received me, with that courtesy and cordiality which have always characterized him and we got the Estimates in a condition which was entirely satisfactory to both of us. I always gave the ex-Minister of Militia good support, loyal support, generous support, in connection with his policy for the improvement of the Canadian Militia and it is not a question of my word against his word although I would not expect him to deny that. The Estimates for 1912, 1913, and 1914, show that what I am stating is correct. The ex-Minister of Militia had my support in regard to his plans for inaugurating a cadet service, he had my support towards the purchase of rifle ranges throughout Canada, he had my support for the establishment of training areas and the Estimates of 1912, 1913 and 1914 will show that what I state to-day is correct.

When the war broke out all the members of the Government, including the ex-Minister of Militia and myself, were in entire accord with the policy of the Prime Minister, that Canada should prosecute this war to the very utmost of her ability. That was the policy of the Prime Minister, that was the policy of the ex-Minister of Militia, that was the policy of the Minister of Finance and of every other member of the Government without any exception whatsoever. The policy that we have followed from that day to this has been to prosecute this war to the utmost of the power of Canada, and our actions have been such as to attract the admiration of the world outside of this House of Commons. No one believed at the time that the war would last so long or attain the magnitude that it has since attained, but the intention of the Government from the first has been to leave nothing undone which could assist in the great cause.

The ex-Minister of Militia assembled some 30,000 or 35,000 men at Valcartier. He did it in record time. I always gave him credit for it and I give him credit for it to-day. It was a great achievement on the part of the ex-minister, an achievement which will stand out in times that are to come—to assemble these men from all parts of Canada within a few weeks, organize them, equip them, give them preliminary training and send them overseas. It was not only of great assistance at the time from a military standpoint but as a matter of fact it drew attention to the Dominion of Canada throughout the world. It was a great national achievement on the part of Canada. In that organization and at that time the ex-Minister of Militia had the support of every one of his colleagues from the Prime Minister down. He said very truly that this Government, unlike the Government that was in power a few years ago, did not fight like blazes amongst themselves.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He says that he himself swore.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I did not understand him to say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The ex-Minister of Militia got generous and loyal support —and I am sure he will say it here to-day —from every one of his colleagues in connection with sending forward the first contingent. Why, the ex-Minister of Militia and myself were on such good terms that he actually—and I regard this as an evidence not only of esteem but almost of admiration—offered to make me an honorary colonel. But, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that I was obliged to decline because I felt that I had not the necessary military qualifications. So that, upon the matter of policy in regard to the Militia Department before the outbreak of the war, and in regard to the prosecution of the war after the war broke out, the ex-Minister of Militia and myself and all the members of the Government, as far as I know, always saw eye to eye and did everything we could to assist in winning the war. Occasionally we had differences as to methods. Temperamental differences sometimes exist. The minister might desire to do things in one way and I might think that these things should be done in another way. Particularly did those differences arise with regard to the matter of expenditures under the War Appropriation Act of 1914. Hon. gentlemen will recall that a special session of Parliament was summoned in August, 1914, and Parliament, without a dissenting voice, voted the sum of $50,000,000 in a War Appropriation Act. There was this difference between that vote and the vote for the ordinary estimates: the vote for the ordinary estimates sets out the amount that shall be expended in respect of the separate services, but this vote was a lump sum. It was proper that it should be voted that way. Parliament reposed a great deal of confidence in the Government that was to expend that $50,000,000, but nevertheless provided as a safeguard that the money, and this is the express wording of the Act, should be " expended by or under the authority of the Governor in Council." We all realize that in the hurry of getting the first contingent away we could not stand too strictly on legality. The ex-Minister of Militia went ahead, through his director of contracts and other officers of his department, and gave orders for equipment, and was never interfered with.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I point out that not only was he not interfered with, but he had the direct sanction of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Not only was he not interfered with, but he had the direct sanction of the Prime Minister of Canada, and he was not interfered with either by the Finance Minister or any other colleague in connection with the equipping of the first contingent. The question of the expenditure of the $50,000,000 voted by the Parliament of Canada was first raised, so far as I am concerned, about the 20th of August, 1914. It was drawn to my attention that large expenditures were being made from this $50,000,000 vote, and that in all cases competitive tenders were not called for.

Mr. MURPHY: Was that in 1914?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is 1914 that I am speaking of. On August 27, 1914, I wrote the following letter to the Prime Minister, and I intend to place it on Hansard, because I want the ex-Minister of Militia to understand the position I have taken, and I think when he knows the facts he will commend the position I took:—

Ottawa, August 27, 1914.

Military and Naval Expenditures.

My dear Sir Robert,—As instructed by you I have asked my deputy to convene this afternoon a meeting of the chief officials of my department of the Militia and Marine Departments and the auditor general for the purpose of considering the question of the procedure to be adopted, in order that the public interest may be protected on the one hand and no necessary delay occur on the other, in connection with the authorization and audit of expenditure under the provisions of the Act appropriating a war credit of fifty million dollars.

Under this legislation it is clearly provided that no expenditure shall be made save under the general or special authority of the Governor in Council. It is apparent therefore that all contracts of every kind—for transport, munitions of war, food, clothing and other supplies —must be sanctioned by order in council. Personally I realize that in the emergency which so suddenly confronted us on the outbreak of the war prompt action had to be taken by the Militia Department, which evidently proceeded to give orders for supplies and let contracts in accordance with the custom of the past. This custom should, however, no longer be followed because of the very large amounts involved and the necessity for the Government seeing to it that large contracts should only be awarded after tenders have been called for and duly considered. Any other method of procedure can only result in improvident contracts with great waste of money to the national loss and the enrichment of individuals. What I am contending for is that the vast expenditure which we must make for military and naval defence be authorized by Council in the usual way before it is entered upon. The statute expressly provides for this and the auditor general will not be able to certify payments unless its terms are strictly complied with. What I have to suggest is this:

(1) A complete list of contracts and expenditure already entered into and made to be laid before Council for ratification.

(2) All future contracts and expenditure to be entered into and made only after Council has passed the necessary orders (general or special) under the authority of the Act.

No delay of any consequence can possibly arise in carrying out my second suggestion. The ministers are all here and likely to be here for many months to come and we are holding Council meetings once or twice daily.

If the course I have indicated is not adopted expenditures amounting to almost one-fourth of the total annual outlay of the Dominion will be made by the officials of the two departments in question, notwithstanding that responsibility for such expenditure devolves upon all members of the Government individually and collectively.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) W. T. White.

What was the motive that actuated me in sending that letter? My motive was to protect the treasury of Canada, and in my present position I conceive that to be my duty. On January 11, 1915, I addressed the following letter to the Prime Minister:—

Ottawa, January 11, 1915.

My dear Sir Robert,—During the past few days I have been outlining my budget speech, and have consequently been examining carefully into our financial situation. Frankly, on account of the huge expenditure of the war and our uncontrollable expenditure upon capital account for railways and public works, I have become exceedingly apprehensive as to our finances for the coming year. It may be necessary for us to consider the shutting down of some of our larger works, but I hope this may not occur, as it is an object to us all to continue to afford as much employment as possible. So far as our war expenditure is concerned the fact that we can obtain the money readily from the British Government should not blind us to the fact that it has to be repaid, and that in the meantime interest is running upon it. Our borrowing under this heading to the end of March will amount to sixty million dollars, upon which interest charges next year will be two and a half million dollars. If we borrow one hundred million dollars next year, the interest charge will be four million dollars, which added to the two and a half millions referred to will make a total fixed interest charge of six and a half million dollars. The additions will of course go on as long as the war lasts. I am only drawing this to your attention to show how rapidly our fixed interest charges will mount up. When we issue our Canadian war loan to repay the British Government, an even higher rate of interest will have to be paid, because our credit is not so good as that of the Imperial Government.

As you know I have been strongly desirous from the beginning that we should put forth every effort to bear our share in the burden of the war notwithstanding the expense involved. What I desire to ask now is that you will give particular attention to the matter of saving unnecessary expenditures in connection with the administration of the Militia Department during the war. No doubt a great deal of such expenditure is inevitable, but it appears to me that everything that might be considered as an extra and not really required for the equipment or substantial comfort of our troops should be omitted. Suggestions will no doubt be continually brought to our attention for the purchase of accoutrements or equipment or for other expenditure which might fairly be regarded as useful, but at the same time not indispensable.

I could mention certain equipment of that character if I so desired.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the Minister ought to do that.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would respectfully ask the Finance Minister to do so.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What I had in mind when I wrote that was a shovel.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I was mighty well aware what the hon. gentleman had in his mind.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The letter continues:—

All items of this kind should be scrutinized most carefully. I do not care to take the matter up with the Minister of Militia myself, but would suggest that you do so in view of the foregoing grave financial situation which I have drawn to your attention. I have been doing my best with the estimates, but notwithstanding all our efforts they are bound to be exceedingly large.

Yours faithfully,

W. T. White.

I now come to the month of June of last year. The ex-Minister of Militia has criticised the appointment of an Overseas Minister of Militia as unnecessary. In that I do not agree with him. I propose to read to the House certain letters which will show clearly my views with regard to the necessity, as I regard it, of the appointment of an overseas minister. When I say necessity, I mean necessity from a financial standpoint, the necessity of safeguarding the enormous expenditures of the Dominion which have been and are being made in Great Britain:

Ottawa, June 23, 1916.

Dear Sir Robert,—

On account of the immense volume of business now being transacted by the Militia Department both in Canada and in England and the magnitude of the expenditure involved, it has occurred to me that it would be in the interests of the Government to appoint some outstanding firm of chartered accountants for the purpose of advising respecting the administrative system of the Militia Department both here and abroad and upon the matter of safeguards upon expenditure such as auditing, etc. I understand that Hon. Mr. Kemp employed the firm of Price, Waterhouse & Company with good results in establishing the excellent business system of the War Purchasing Commission. The Imperial Munitions Board has also engaged firms of auditors for the same purpose. Firms such as Price, Waterhouse & Company, Touche, Niven & Company, and Marwick, Mitchell, Peat & Company have organizations in Canada and England and would no doubt be glad to undertake such duties as I have outlined at a reasonable rate of remuneration, although the question of price for services of such importance is really of secondary character. If the idea generally commends itself to you I would suggest that you discuss it with the Paymaster General and other officers of the Militia Department. In my view nothing but good could result from such action on our part and it would I think meet with the approval of Parliament and the country.

On July 27, 1916, I directed another letter to the Prime Minister:

Ottawa, July 27, 1916.

Dear Sir Robert,—

While Sir George Perley is here I think we should consider carefully the question of our war expenditures in England. From a statement presented to me this morning by the Dominion accountant it appears there are large outstanding liabilities and unadjusted accounts running into the millions. Personally I feel that there should be some further check upon the expenditures. No doubt the officers in charge have been doing their best, but with the responsibility of their actions devolving upon us here I feel there should be a closer connection and a more rigid supervision than has prevailed in the past.

On August 30, 1916, I directed a further letter to the Prime Minister:

Dear Sir Robert,—

I am somewhat concerned over the fact that the Governor in Council exercised no control, except through officials, over our growing military expenditures in Great Britain. We must have one hundred thousand men there and we are borrowing from the British Government for military expenditures at least a million pounds a month or sixty million dollars per year. A considerable part of this sum is of course for pay, but I am satisfied that there are large expenditures for supplies and equipment. This expenditure should undoubtedly be subject to authorization by or on behalf of the Governor General in Council. As it is not practicable for the Government to deal with such expenditures here I think we should appoint a commission somewhat like the War Purchasing Commission, whose authorization would be required before any contract for supplies or equipment is entered into or any expenditure made for construction or other purposes.

That I may say was my first idea of overcoming the difficulty which we had in checking and safeguarding our war expenditures in England.

If this is not done there will be opportunity for irregularities which will undoubtedly be taken advantage of; in fact rumours of irregularities have reached me from time to time recently. My idea is that this commission should be directly responsible to the Governor in Council and should have at its head Sir George Perley, acting high commissioner. With such a commission we would have every confidence that this large expenditure was being made properly and that waste would be practically eliminated.

There is another suggestion which I have to make, namely, that a firm of chartered accountants, such as Price, Waterhouse & Company, or Marwick, Mitchell & Company, should be engaged to audit all our accounts in Great Britain. When it is considered that our expenditures there are equal to the entire expenditure made by Canada only a few years ago, the necessity for the closest possible check is apparent. Such an audit should not only cover future transactions but past expenditures also in order that we may be assured of the regularity of the transactions which have already taken place. My view is that the auditor general should also have a representative in England as I do not believe his office here can properly audit expenditures made abroad.

As the question of expenditure so closely concerns my department I had intended making a submission to council embodying the above suggestion, but upon reflection it appeared to me that any submission should be made by yourself. I hope you will take the matter up at an early date as I am frankly anxious about the situation.

[Sir W. T. White.]

This is the letter I submit of a minister of the Crown who is desirous of safeguarding the money of the people of Canada, and throwing all proper checks around expenditures in Great Britain. It was at my suggestion that the auditor general went to England during the past year for the purpose of looking into the situation and, if he found it necessary or desirable, of establishing a branch of his department in Great Britain. I submit that my course in that regard was proper from every standpoint, and I have no apology whatever to make for it. It was the sound and proper course. The auditor general went over to England, and with him and Sir George Perley we looked into the question of the expenditure of the pay office and the organization there, and I am glad to say that I came back very much reassured as to the situation in Great Britain. The administration in Great Britain has, on the whole, been an honest one. The officials there have, as a general rule, done excellent work, having regard to the difficulties with which they had to contend.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not know that the Minister of Finance had all this data here. I had intended to touch on this very aspect of the case. At the first the financial situation on the other side could not have been more rotten than it was, but I changed that in the year 1914-15. I appointed Mr. Dowie in charge of remodelling the pay office in Great Britain; I afterwards strengthened it by sending across Mr. Ross, an expert accountant of Montreal, and I could have told the hon. Minister of Finance, if he had asked me, that he would find things there better than in the city of Ottawa.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not at all clear as to that; but I am quite clear as to this, that if we are spending sixty or eighty million dollars in Great Britain, we cannot surround that expenditure with too many safeguards.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the hon. Minister of Finance not aware that almost every dollar of that money spent in England is statutory expenditure?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A great deal of it is for pay, but a great deal of it is expenditure otherwise. Let my hon. friend make no mistake about that. The position I take in that letter is a sound course and one that will commend itself to every member of this House.

On October 6, 1916, I wrote another letter to the Prime Minister with regard to the appointment of a Minister of Overseas Services. I produce the letter because I do not believe that the ex-Minister of Militia knows my true attitude with regard to that appointment. I believe he has been misled with regard to my attitude.

Mr. MACDONALD: By whom?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It might be by some of his good friends on the other side. I do not know.

On October 6, 1916, I wrote this letter to the Prime Minister:

Ottawa, October 6, 1916.

Dear Sir Robert,

On August 30 I wrote you stating that I was concerned over the fact that the Governor in Council exercises no control except through officials over our growing military expenditures in Great Britain. This expenditure will soon reach an amount equal to the total annual expenditure of Canada ten years ago. After giving the matter my best consideration I am of the opinion that the time has arrived when we should have a Minister of Overseas Services who will have direct supervision and control over all our expenditures abroad and be responsible therefor in the same way as a minister here is responsible for the administration of his department. No system of administration through officials will be satisfactory, as the principle of responsibility to Parliament and the people will be lacking and grave irregularities are bound to arise for which the Government and every member thereof will be accountable. For myself I feel that the matter is vital and that I cannot assume responsibility for the acts of officials not under the immediate supervision and control of a member of the Government. In my view it is not possible for a minister here to exercise the necessary degree of supervision and control over officials carrying out such extensive and constantly increasing operations as are involved in our transactions in Great Britain. I feel that it is particularly my duty to call your attention to this subject and to express to you the opinion which I hold respecting it, as the Department of Finance is more immediately concerned and has probably, in the eyes of the public, a higher degree of responsibility for the effectual control and safeguarding of our expenditures than any other department of the Government. I commend these representations to your most earnest consideration.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the minister read the answers to any of those letters?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are no answers. I sent them to the Prime Minister, and no replies came to hand, except, possibly, acknowledgements. It was perfectly clear to all of us—not only to me as Minister of Finance, but to the Prime Minister and to the Government as a whole—that the time had arrived when, on account of our great expenditures, of the enormous forces that we had in Great Britain and of the necessity for co-ordinating the services in Great Britain and on the Continent, a Minister of Overseas services had to be appointed. No man, I care not who he is, could administer from Ottawa military affairs three thousand miles away, and involving as much expenditure as the whole Parliament of Canada administered ten years ago. No minister could do it successfully and as it should be done, having regard to the necessity for safeguarding the public interest. I say further that if I had been Minister of Militia, I should have insisted upon the appointment of an Overseas Minister of Militia; so that I have pretty clear views as to the necessity for taking that course.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not appoint an Overseas Minister of Finance?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Because the situation does not demand it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It is finance we are dealing with.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. So far as general finances are concerned, the work over there has not been very greatly increased; it is the expenditure in connection with the military situation that has increased.

My hon. friend has animadverted to the appointment of an Overseas Minister; he has been disposed to criticise it. Well, if I read correctly the correspondence, he was willing that an Overseas Minister should be appointed. He wanted Sir Max Aitken to be appointed.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Never.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The correspondence seems to indicate that. If the hon. gentleman, however, says that I am wrong, I shall be glad to withdraw my remark at once.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman can read the English language; that is all I have to say. There was nothing of the kind in the correspondence.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman made a reference to me; if he does not wish me to say anything, I shall have to sit down.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Go on.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have been using Sir Max Aitken as an intermediary—a gentleman who is capable of carrying out any job that is handed over to him, unlike the other gentleman who was put in there. My suggestion was not that Sir Max Aitken should be a Minister of the Crown, but that he should have rank or title to give him authority.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As Minister of Finance I consider it my peculiar duty to the citizens and taxpayers of Canada to safeguard our expenditures both here and in Great Britain to the utmost possible extent, and upon these letters that I have read to the House I may rest my case before this Parliament or before any body of citizens in Canada.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had placed before it certain letters which I had addressed to the Prime Minister, during the years 1914, 1915 and 1916, with respect to safeguarding the war expenditure of the Dominion. I may say that in the suggestions which I made to the Prime Minister I had always his entire support and the support of my colleagues. The letter of August 27, 1914, which I read first, referred to instructions received from the Prime Minister himself; and the suggestions which were made to the Prime Minister in the letter of August 27, 1914, were acted upon. That is to say, all orders which had been given without the express authority of the Governor in Council, on account of the necessity for haste in getting forward the first contingent, were ratified by order in council, and all subsequent orders were sanctioned by the Governor in Council before being given. Those letters embodied the principles which have actuated myself, as Minister of Finance, and actuated the Government since the outbreak of this war. I spoke in one of the letters of the matter of equipment. I stated that, having regard to the large expenditures which the Government was making and to the general financial position, it was advisable, in my opinion, that all purchases of equipment, unless clearly indispensable, should be scrutinized closely. Now, I do not mean to suggest for one moment that the then Minister of Militia was bringing forward or was about to bring forward any proposals for the purchase of equipment which he did not regard as desirable. On the contrary, I believe this, that in the case of no belligerent in this war or in any other war has there been less waste in the administration of the war than there has been in connection with the administration of this Government since the war broke out. War makes demands upon governments and governments must act quickly. The real question is whether the Government has acted, on the whole, with good judgment and in good faith. The ex-Minister of Militia brought forward many proposals for equipment, always in good faith. Patents were placed before him. The minister, pressed with the multitudinous duties of his office, came forward with what he thought might be of use for the purpose of protecting the lives of our soldiers at the front or giving them greater efficiency in their work at the front. So I say, with regard to this matter of equipment which I touched upon in one of the letters, I was not suggesting for a moment that any equipment had been purchased, or was likely to be purchased, that was not, in the opinion of the minister, necessary or advisable. What I was contending for was that all things that were not clearly indispensable should be scrutinized closely. I think it is only fair to the ex-Minister of Militia that I should make that explanation. I repeat that if you take all the nations that are engaged in this war, and have regard to the scale of their operations, the mode of purchase, the administrative acts which have been taken, their financial operations, having regard also to the proportion which must be observed between their operations and ours, in my belief there has been less waste in connection with the administration of the Militia Department and this Government of Canada than in connection with the administration of any other belligerent in the world. I say that not only with regard to the present war but in regard to any war of the past. I say it has been possible because the Prime Minister and all the ministers of this Government, including the ex-Minister of Militia, while we have been desirous of doing our whole duty, doing everything possible to carry on this war, we have at the same time been desirous of eliminating waste so far as possible and carrying on the war in such a way that our finances would stand the strain; because this war had not been long under way before it was apparent to most of us that it would be a long war, that it would probably be determined on the principle of attrition, by the exhaustion of the combatants, and that it was necessary to preserve, so far as possible, our credit and our resources. Apart from that, making large demands as we have been upon the tax payers of the country, borrowing heavily from the patriotism of the people, it is desirable in a large degree that the utmost economy should be exercised, having regard always to the exigencies of the war.

I have spoken briefly with regard to the office of Overseas Minister. Some reflection has been cast upon Sir George Perley, who is not in the House. I have been desirous for a long time of paying what I regard as a much merited tribute to Sir George Perley. Sir George Perley went over to England in 1914 intending to stay as acting high commissioner for a few months only. But war broke out, and at great inconvenience to himself, because he lives here, and his interests are here, he remained at his post. I wish to say that the services of Sir George Perley in the office of acting high commissioner since the war broke out have been, in my judgment, simply invaluable to Canada. I do not think that anyone in this House, outside the members of the Government, have any idea of the extent of the negotiations that have taken place between the Government of this country and the Government of the United Kingdom since the outbreak of war, of the cabling which necessarily takes place, of the financial and other transactions which have been carried out through the mediation of Sir George Perley. I was gratified in the highest degree, but not surprised—because I knew the man—to find the high standing which Sir George Perley enjoys in official, financial and other circles in London. I make bold to say that no representative, either of this Dominion or of any of the overseas Dominions, ever enjoyed a higher standing than that enjoyed by Sir George Perley as acting high commissioner of Canada in London.

Reference has been made also to General Turner. I was in England during the month of November, and it was during that month that the retirement of the Minister of Militia occurred. Sir George Perley consulted with me a good deal about the situation existing in Great Britain. He reached the conclusion, I think soundly, that a commander in chief was needed in Great Britain with an adjutant general, quartermaster general, inspector general, and other officers of a general staff. It was necessary, not only from the standpoint of the efficiency of the Canadian forces in the United Kingdom, but, in our judgment, and in the judgment of the Government, in order that the work of the forces in the United Kingdom and on the Continent might be properly co-ordinated. The problem over there is to train the contingents that are sent from here, first in England, and, after they have been trained sufficien'ly, to send them forward to reinforce the men at the front. Reinforcements have been required on a scale undreamt of at the outbreak of the war, because the casualties have been so heavy, and if there is anything that appears clearly to me it is that, having regard to the extent of the forces in Great Britain and on the Continent at the present time, it is desirable that there should be a staff with a commander in chief, a man who knows the situation in Great Britain and on the continent, and who will assist in coordinating the British situation with the continental situation. That is precisely what the commander in chief, who has been appointed in Great Britain, will help to do. In selecting that man, regard was had to the troops at the front, and, so far as I know, no more popular appointment could possibly have been made, no better man could possibly have been appointed than General Turner. I was surprised and delighted on my visit to the front in talking with the brigadiers and colonels to find the high esteem in which every divisional commander was held by all the men at the front—General Turner, General Currie and General Lipsett. I was delighted to find the high esteem in which they were held by all the officers and men with whom I had the privilege of talking while I was there. General Turner is a man who won the Victoria Cross. He is a man of the highest standing, and is beloved by his division, and, as far as I could ascertain, by all the other commanders, brigadiers and officers in France; and, so far as I am concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that I do not believe that any better appointment could have been made. General Turner was not desirous of leaving the front. Let me make that plain. Nothing but a letter from the Prime Minister of this country asking him to accept the position, which was deemed of great importance, the position of commander in chief in Great Britain, induced him to leave the front. I think it is only fair to General Turner, as a gallant officer and a man who would much rather have remained at the front than have returned to England to assume the duties, and important duties they are, of commander in chief of the Canadian forces in Great Britain, that that explanation should be made in this House.

This afternoon the ex-Minister of Militia made a statement, which I am sorry to say reflected upon myself, with respect to Mr. T. A. Russell's connection with the purchase of motor transport. The ex-Minister of Militia stated that Mr. T. A. Russell had been recommended to him by me for the purpose of purchasing the motor transport. This statement is absolutely incorrect. I did not recommend Mr. Russell to the ex-Minister of Militia for the purpose of purchasing the transport for the first division. If the ex-Minister of Militia had asked me whether I would recommend Mr. T. A. Russell for the position, I would have said without any hesitation that I would, because I believe him to be a thoroughly honourable and capable man. But, as a matter of fact, I did not recommend him. As I understand it, Mr. Russell came to Ottawa to try to get an order for the Russell Motor Company, of which he was the managing director. The minister desired the transport quickly for the first contingent, and he said to Mr. Russell: I want you to buy the motor transport; you have three weeks in which to do it; and, as I understand it, Mr. Russell did the work in three weeks. Unless I am mistaken, that was the evidence given before the Public Accounts Committee.

Sir SAM HUGHES: By whom?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: By Mr. Russell.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to make a correction? I had several names before me, and I remember I took the matter up in the presence of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister. I knew that Russell had been recommended. A number of the heads of the departments had been looking for men, and I stated that Russell had been recommended. The Minister of Finance said, "An A1 man," or words to that effect, and the Prime Minister also said he was a very good man.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I only wish to say that the memory of the ex-Minister of Militia is not clear. If he had asked whether I would recommend Mr. Russell, I would unhesitatingly have said that I would; and if to-day I were asked if I would recommend him, I would say without hesitation that he is as good a man as we could get, a capable man, an honourable man. I stand by that. The reflection that has been made upon me is that for some reason of interest to myself I recommended Mr. Russell, and that Mr. Russell's company made a profit upon the purchase of the transport. I repeat that I did not recommend Mr. Russell, and I did not know of Mr. Russell's appointment until after it had been made. But after he was appointed, I decidedly said that Mr. Russell was a good man. If the matter were left there, if there was no other evidence upon this point, the position would be that the ex-Minister of Militia says the Minister of Finance recommended Mr. Russell. Mr. Russell, according to his statement, made a profit for the Russell Motor Company and the Minister of Finance was a friend of Mr. Russell. It was stated further that the Minister of Finance had some transactions with Mr. Russell in connection with the Cycle Motor Company. I desire to say that I never had a business transaction with Mr. Russell in my life, not to the extent of one copper.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Were you not connected with the Canada Cycle Motor Company?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The company of which I was general manager acted as transfer agents for the Cycle Motor Company. If any body wanted to transfer shares of the stock he came into the office of the National Trust Company and transferred, in the books, of the company the shares of the Cycle Motor Company. We had scores, if not hundreds, of transfer agencies and I do not know of any trust company that has not transfer agencies. Mr. Russell is connected with the Cycle Motor Company, as I understand. I never had a dollar's worth of interest in the Russell Motor Company. I want to say further, because I want to clear this thing up—I believe in clearing the air—that when I became Minister of Finance I proceeded to sell out every security of every kind whatsoever that I had in Canada because I did not want any one to be in the position of saying that the Minister of Finance is interested in this industry or in that industry, or in this company or in that company. That may be quixotic but I want to make that statement; it is true. Just to clear this up a little more——

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish we had all sold about that time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We should have all sold out just about the time this Government came in.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If my hon. friend will look at the quotations on the stock exchanges to-day, and I have no doubt he is fully posted on them——

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is owing to the war.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If he will look at the quotations, I think he will find a degree of prosperity that this country has never had before.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is what they call war bride stocks.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Now, one word on another matter referred to by the ex-Minister of Militia, because I do not think he wants to be unfair to me. After the transports had been bought for the first contingent, it was brought to the attention of my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) that a commission had been paid in connection with the purchase of transport to a firm in Ottawa on a sale by the Ottawa Car Company of certain transport. It was alleged that Mr. Russell had bought this transport and the implication was that he had been a party to the paying of a commission. We did not know the circumstances under which that commission was paid. Mr. Russell having concluded his work in purchasing the transports for the first contingent, I had given to him, as I had given to scores of business men in Canada, a letter of introduction to Sir George Perley because he was going over to England to see if he could sell some transports to the British Government. I heard that Mr. Russell had been appointed a purchasing agent for the British Government. I had every confidence in Mr. Russell but nevertheless, as soon as I heard the suggestion that a commission had been paid which might have been improperly paid in connection with the purchase of transports from the Ottawa Car Company, I sent this cable to Sir George Perley:

Ascertain and cable whether T. A. Russell whom I introduced to you has been appointed as purchasing agent for British Government as reported here. Sorry to state there has been grave criticism of his buying for Militia Department here. If he is purchasing for War Office ask him to see you and show him this cable. Important.

I got a cablegram back from Sir George Perley, in which he said that:—

Have seen Russell who says he has not been appointed purchasing agent for British Government except that he arranged through another firm to buy in United States some goods for War Office about which he wrote fully to Doctor Reid but which for war reasons ought not be generally known. I am writing you some particulars by to-day's mail. Russell has also been asked by War Office report on some large machines when he returns home early in December.

The letter to Doctor Reid refers only to matters of customs. When Mr. Russell came back from England I asked him to come to Ottawa and we held a Treasury Board meeting, at which the Solicitor General was present. We asked him for an explanation of the commission of the sale by the Ottawa Car Company. He gave a full, direct and entirely satisfactory explanation and I wrote to Sir George Perley as follows:—

Ottawa, January 5, 1915.

Personal.

My dear Sir George,—At my request Mr. T. A. Russell, to whom I gave a letter of introduction to you some time ago, appeared to-day before the Treasury Board with reference to purchase for the Militia Department of transport necessary for the first contingent. In view of my cable to you I think it only proper to say that Mr. Russell's explanations were not only entirely satisfactory to the members of the Committee but such as to entitle him to the thanks of the Government for the untiring intelligence and zeal displayed by him in arranging for the purchase within a period of twenty days of the entire transportation equipment of the first contingent. There has been much ill-founded criticism by interested parties but we are all satisfied that Mr. Russell's conduct throughout has been wholly exemplary. He had a most difficult task to perform and carried it out, in my judgment at least, with very great ability. As Mr. Griffith saw the cable which I sent you I shall be glad if you will acquaint him with the contents of this letter.

With kind regards.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) W. T. White.

Hon. Sir George Perley,
London.

That looks as if I were interested in Mr. Russell making commissions for the Russell Motor Company. If the ex-Minister of Militia, in view of the correspondence and of the statement I have made, believes it, all I have to say is that I am sorry for him.

Before six o'clock I stated that I understood the ex-minister had been willing that an overseas minister should be appointed, provided that the minister was Sir Max Aitken. I accepted the statement that the ex-minister made, that that was not his intention, but the statement made in his letter of October 26, 1916, which possibly has been before the House, is this:—

But I will be more than proud to support the proposition, with all my heart and all my power, if you fill in the name of Sir Max Aitken. It is a question of the man and not the office.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Read the next letter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Which one?

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman must know that if there is one letter there must be others. Read the next letter. Be fair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Very well; but, however, I accept the explanation of my hon. friend and I am quite willing to take his statement that he was opposed to the appointment of an overseas minister of militia. I think I have cleared up nearly all the matters touched upon by the ex-Minister of Militia except the question of delay in the purchase of transports. My own recollection in regard to it, although, as a matter of fact, I had very little to do with it, is that there was some delay as to whether Kelly-Springfield or some other truck was the better truck. But my recollection is that the ex-Minister of Militia appointed a committee for the purpose of determining that, and whatever delays took place were delays inseparable from making a decision on the very important subject of motor transportation. That is all I desire to say upon that.

There are one or two observations I desire to make upon the general debate. I do not propose to generalize, but I am sorry, and I think many members of this House are sorry, as well as many people of this country, that in some respects this debate has degenerated into a petty political controversy. I have no desire to generalize, I say, because it would be unfair. Some notable speeches, some serious speeches, some earnest speeches have been made, but it seems to me that there has been a lot of idle talk about patronage and appointments and Nationalists. Here we are in the midst of the greatest war in the world, a war in which we are engaged as belligerents; the flower of our youth at the front; others of our sons in the United Kingdom ready to go to the front, and thousands in Canada ready to cross the seas. We are at the very crucial period of the war—the third and probably the decisive year, the year in which the greatest battles in the history of the world will be fought, the year in which the greatest strain will be imposed upon the belligerents, the year of defeat or of victory, and yet in this House some of us are talking about patronage, appointments, and Nationalists, and assailing the Government for trying to make capital out of the war.

Mr. PUGSLEY: For making political capital out of the war, not for trying to.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There has been a good deal of talk about lack of leadership, and slackness in carrying on the war, but I say, and history will confirm what I say, that there is absolutely no room for national self-depreciation. Canada, and the Government of Canada, have played a great and noble part in this great war. Take your minds back two-and-a-half years ago, when the ex-Minister of Militia was assembling his troops at Valcartier. I gave him credit for that this afternoon, and I give him credit now. It was a great achievement. Let any man in this House or in this country ask himself what he would have thought at that time if it had been suggested to him that this country, peace-loving Canada, unprepared for war, composed of mixed races, diverse nationalities, a heterogeneous population of eight million, scattered over a territory as large as Europe, as large as the United States of America, would in two-and-a-half years, recruit, organize, equip, and train an army of 425,000 men. The only people who belittle that achievement are partisans. The organization of this great army has commanded the admiration of the world. Go to New York; what do they think about it there? Go to London; what do they think about it there? They never hear of it without greeting it with cheers. What room is there for national self-depreciation? What room is there for criticism of this Government in connection with the raising of an army of 425,000 men under the conditions I have mentioned? It is wonderful. There is not a man here, I do not care what his imagination, that could have forecasted it or would have believed it possible.

What about finance? Canada, a borrowing country before the war, a country that had never made a single loan of more than six million pounds, and borrowing in London a million dollars a day, or three hundred million a year, for the Dominion Government, Provincial Governments, railways and other companies, borrowing in Great Britain principally, and also in the United States, Canada was suddenly confronted with the war, and the dislocation of business that it caused. From the very beginning, so far as it has been possible to me, and so far as it has been possible to this Government, we have aimed to maintain financial and industrial and commercial stability. We have aimed to maintain confidence, and confidence lies at the very root of prosperity, and the prosperity of this country to-day is the best evidence of the confidence we have succeeded in maintaining in this country. Six months dislocation of business at the outbreak of the war. And yet what have we succeeded in doing? The hon. member for Pictou, (Mr. Macdonald) is worrying as to who is to get the credit. We never stopped to consider who was to get the credit. This is not a boys' school. Sufficient for us if the thing is done. The main thing is to get the big things done and that is what the Prime Minister has been doing, and what his ministers have been doing. We have not worried about who is to get the credit.

I have spoken of the effect on the world of the raising of an army of 425,000 men in Canada. Let me speak now of the effect on the world of what Canada has done in a financial way. Canada was a borrowing country before the war. A loan had never been made in Canada, except perhaps a little currency loan thirty or forty years ago. What have we done since the outbreak of the war, and by "we" I mean the people of Canada. I always give the credit to the people of Canada. The Government are the instruments; we take the initiative; choose the time for the loan; see that market conditions are favourable, and the people do the rest. I do not care whether you call it leadership or not. All I want is results, and we get the results. What have the results been? In 1915 we asked the people of Canada for $50,000,000, and they gave us $100,000,000. Last November we asked the people of Canada for $100,000,000, and they offered us $200,000,000. Canada has financed her war expenditure on this side of the Atlantic since the outbreak of the war and that in itself is a notable achievement, but that is only the beginning of what she has done. What else has she done in a financial way? The Dominion of Canada has advanced $150,000,000 to the Imperial Treasury to purchase munitions on this side of the Atlantic, and in addition to that, we have arranged for a credit of $100,000,000 from the chartered banks of Canada, making a total of $250,000,000, which we have placed to the credit of the Imperial Government for the purpose of purchasing munitions in this Dominion. Is not that an achievement? Consider the prosperity of this country to-day. There are high prices, of course, for agricultural and other products. But what of the munitions output, so large a portion of our exports? The prosperity of the country is related to agriculture and our other productions and to the production of munitions.

Now, I am going to give the ex-Minister of Militia a good deal of credit in connection with the establishment of the Shell Committee. He and I sometimes differ, but we always differ in an open way. The ex-minister deserves credit for originating the idea. An idea may be developed, but the man who originates it deserves a great part of the credit. The ex-Minister of Militia believed in the industries of this country and he started the Shell Committee, and I give him credit for starting it; but at the same time do not let us altogether lose sight of the fact that the financing of it has had something to do with the result. An exchange situation exists to-day, by reason of the fact that Great Britain is importing so much from this continent, by reason of the fact that the exchanges have partially broken down, under which Great Britain can purchase munitions on this side of the Atlantic only if she can raise money with which to pay for them on this side of the Atlantic. That statement is absolutely true; in fact, it falls short of a full statement, because she not only has to borrow, on this side of the Atlantic, all the money required to pay for her enormous purchases on this side of the Atlantic, but she actually has to borrow money on this side of the Atlantic to support the exchange, so that it is a fact that Great Britain can not purchase in Canada unless Great Britain is financed in Canada. Finance lies at the basis of Great Britain's purchases in Canada just as finance lies at the basis of Great Britain's purchases in the United States. What does that mean? That means that the $250,000,000 that we provided for the Imperial Government has meant that she was able to give the orders for munitions in Canada during the past twelve or fifteen months. No leadership! I do not care whether you call it leadership or not. What would leadership be under those circumstances? Would it do more than provide the $250,000,000 or $300,000,000? If there is anything more that leadership would do, I would like my hon. friend the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) or any one else to tell me. No leadership! No one would have dreamed of such a thing happening. Ask any financial man in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, or any other place you like, if two or three years ago he would have believed the Dominion of Canada would pay her own war expenditures, amounting as it does to the tremendous sum of $1,000,000 a day, and would, in addition to that, have been able to provide $250,000,000 for the Imperial Government for purchasing in Canada. He would have laughed at you. Is there any room for national self-depreciation? Has there been no leadership? The prosperity of this country is to-day abounding. There is no belligerent country in anything like the condition in which we are, financially, commercially or industrially. Not a man who will work is out of work in this country to-day; wages are higher than they have ever been, and yet it is said that there is no leadership. Our hon. friends opposite accused us of lack of leadership. I cannot help but think of the story that is told of Abraham Lincoln and General Grant. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who is fond of history, the other night accused the Prime Minister of indecision.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Amongst other things.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is a great admirer of Abraham Lincoln. Let us bear in mind what has been accomplished. We have recruited 425,000 men; we have financed ourselves and Great Britain, and let us also remember the prosperity that exists in this country to-day. And yet my right hon. friend says that the Prime Minister is guilty of indecision. Abraham Lincoln appointed General Grant as Commander in Chief of the forces of the United States. Grant had some enemies who sent word to Lincoln: "He drinks!" Lincoln replied: "What brand of whisky does he use? I want it for my other generals." If that brand of leadership has produced that magnificent result, why, lack of leadership would not be a bad thing for the Prime Ministers of Canada from this time forth, to say nothing of those in the past, such as my right hon. friend. My right hon. friend has an imagination. Let me appeal to it. Years ago we used to talk of the total trade of Canada as being $500,000,000. The year before the war the total trade of Canada, exports and imports, amounted to $1,000,000,000, and we congratulated ourselves upon the fact. It was wonderful that the total trade of Canada should be one-fifth of the total trade of Great Britain. Canada was coming on. For the first six months of the year just past the total trade of Canada exceeded $1,000,000,000, which was the high-water mark for the year preceding the war, and this year we shall have a total trade of over $2,000,000,000. And yet my hon. friends say there is no leadership. Of course, being modest men, we give the credit to the public. If my right hon. friend had found a condition like it he would take the credit for the party. We say that under our administration the favour of Providence, and the energy and intelligence and patriotism of the Canadian people, all these things have been accomplished.

In 1912, 1913 and 1914 the balance of trade was against us, $300,000,000, $200,000,000 and $140,000,000, and there has been a balance of trade against us for many years past. This year, however, there will be a balance of trade of probably three or four hundred million dollars in our favour. Yet, my hon. friends say there is no leadership. Well, if no leadership gives such magnificent results as that there is a good deal to be said for it. Now, I am not particular whether we get the credit or not. After all, this is not a boys' school.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It looks like it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It does sometimes, when I look at the other side of the House, not only a boys' school, but when I hear some of the followers of my right hon. friend speak I think it is an infants' class. We are content with the results.

What is required of Canada? We are in the third and crucial year of this war. Talk all the election talk, talk all the partisan talk you like in the House of Commons, but we are in a year of the greatest events in the history of this war, and talk of that kind will make but little impression and will not last long. I was in England during November—

Mr. GRAHAM: So the ex-minister said.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: —and I want to tell hon. gentlemen that the seriousness of this situation dawns upon one when he visits England and France. We are 4,000 miles from the western battle-front, but when you are in England, France or Belgium you realize what war means. You see the fleet, as I saw it—and in my opinion the fleet of Great Britain, which is the greatest human agency to-day between the Hohenzollerns and the domination of the world, was never actually or relatively as strong as it is to-day. When you see that fleet; when you see the great body of clean-cut, strong men who, day in and day out, in summer and in winter, in heat and in cold, maintain that monotonous and weary vigil which means the safety of our commerce and the preservation of our civilization, you realize that the Empire is at war. And when you go to the front and see the men there—the officers living in dug-outs comprising two little rooms, cold and damp; when you see the men going into the trenches and coming out encased in mud; when you observe the uncomplaining, cheerful demeanour of these men who daily walk with death, you realize what this war means, because these are our boys. There is little patience at the front with talk of patronage, appointments or Nationalism, and there will be less patience with it as the war goes on. No thinking man can visit the fleet and visit the front without coming away profoundly impressed with the terrible seriousness of this war, and that impression will grow more and more upon the people of Canada, of the Emprie and of the world as the war proceeds during the present, as I believe, crucial year. That is the spirit in which we should give consideration to the important matters of public business before us, and that, I believe, is the spirit in which the great majority of the members of this House are approaching them—a spirit which exemplifies a realization of the seriousness of the war and which is manifested in its deepest sense by men who have sons there and by men who have lost their sons.

It devolves upon every member of this House and every citizen of Canada to do his part. The Prime Minister cannot be on every platform of Canada, week in and week out. He has spoken scores of times since this war broke out; so have I, and so have other members of the Government. We have been necessarily oppressed with business since the war broke out. Transactions with the Imperial Government, matters relating to the troops in England and at the front, the organization of our troops in Canada, matters arising out of the dislocation of business which is inevitable when a war is proceeding, international questions, matters of the utmost moment and importance—these are the burdens which from day to day, from week to week, morning, noon and night, Saturday and Sunday, have been borne by the Prime Minister and his colleagues. We are not complaining; it is our duty, and we do it. But it is open to any member of this House to do his best to impress the public mind with the necessity for men and munitions and the necessity of saving for the purpose of assisting the financing of the war. I believe that most of the members have done this, and I am quite sure that they will continue to do so. What is required at the present time, not only in Canada and the United Kingdom, but throughout the entire world, is organization and the creation of a certain attitude of mind on the part of the public with relation to this war. The great majority of the people are seized with the importance of the war, but many are not, to the same degree. There must be man organization; there must be organization of vital industries; production must be stimulated and increased as much as possible. There should be no personal or public extravagance, and there should be national saving, because in the last analysis it will be money and resources as well as men that will win this war. There must be self-denial and there must be self-sacrifice. The men at the front are undergoing sacrifices cheerfully and uncomplainingly; it is not too much to ask every person to exercise self-denial and self-sacrifice in 9 p.m. order that he, too, may contribute to the utmost of his power to the winning of the war.

A great number of important questions are mooted from time to time—important, but secondary and subsidiary questions. The real question before the Empire to-day is the winning of the war, and nothing else. How do governments, oppositions, individuals, measure up against the great question of winning the war? That is the question to which the governments of all the communities in the Empire must direct themselves. The British nation was slow in getting organized for the war, because it was so entirely unprepared at the outbreak of hostilities. In Great Britain these questions were met as they arose, and to-day I believe that the nation is very highly organized. Millions of men have been sent to the front; no one ever expected that more than 200,000 or 300,000 men would be sent from England to Europe. The loans that have been raised by the British Government would have staggered the imagination of men before the war broke out.

The Government since the outbreak of this war has addressed itself to the utmost of its ability and power to the great questions that have been presented for its consideration. The successes which we have met with—with the co-operation and support, of course, of the Canadian people, because the Government can do nothing without that—are exemplified in the statements which I have made to the House with regard to the recruiting of our forces and our finances and trade. I repeat that there is absolutely no room for national self-depreciation, but I am the first to say that we can do better. We can all do better. We have gone so far; we can go much farther. The Government will continue to put forth its best efforts as in the past, and I am perfectly confident that, putting forth our best efforts, with the rest of the overseas dominions putting forth their best efforts, with the mighty effort which Great Britain is putting forth, with the heroism and the sacrifices of France and the efforts which she will put forward in the future, this war is going to be won this year.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John City): Mr. Speaker, there are some remarks which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has made with which I am sure we will all agree. The one that strikes me as being the most important is that all the people of Canada should be united in a determination to do the utmost that is possible in assisting in bringing this war to a successful conclusion. My hon. friend has very frankly stated that we could all do much better than we have done. With regard to the Government, Sir, I think we will all be disposed to agree with him. We will all agree that the Government, if it applied its mind, if it applied the united efforts of its members, could do a great deal better than it has done in the past, and, may I add, Sir, the hope that after the expression which my hon. friend has used, that the Government can do better than it has done, it will make a sincere effort to do better and to perform a service which will entitle it even in some measure to the gratitude and confidence of the people of this country, because, Sir, let me assure my hon. friend, as I believe, that no one upon this side of the House is desirous of seeing this Government lost the confidence of the people of this country merely in order that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and hon. gentlemen upon this side of the House, may assume the seals of office. We have no especial personal desire for that. Speaking for myself, I would assure you, and I do assure you most earnestly, that I never was so happy since the day I first entered political life as I have been in opposition; and my pleasure has been increased by the fact, Sir, that I have been engaged in the worthy cause of attacking a Government which, I believe, is not deserving of the confidence of the people of this country. That, Sir, is a worthy object for any body of men. To do one's duty as a member of His Majesty's loyal Opposition is to perform one of the noblest services which a public man can render to his country. Therefore, in all sincerity, I express the hope that from this moment this Government will turn back upon its tracks, will reverse the course which it has pursued in the past, and will endeavour well and faithfully to serve the people of this country. It may be too late for them to regain the confidence of the people; it may be, but still it is not too late for them to try.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend says that in this House and in this country there is an attempt to make party capital. I interjected a remark to that effect when my hon. friend was speaking. If I were asked for proof, I should give it in the fact that ever since this war broke out this Government and its supporters throughout the Dominion have endeavoured, so far as they could, to make their conduct of the war the means of increasing their party influence and a stepping stone to their return to power. The Minister of Finance says that, being now in the third year of the war, the most strenuous year in the history of the war, our attention should be entirely directed to the winning of the war, and that we should not stop to give consideration to such questions as patronage, and partyism, and nationalism and questions of that kind. What does that mean, Sir? It means that the Government should not be criticised for using patronage in the making of war contracts; it means that they should not be criticised for the effort to strengthen their party with the people of this country by passing money and patronage into the hands of their supporters or those whom they hope will become their supporters. And this, Sir, when there are in that Government, members of the Nationalist party. We have the evidence before us that in 1910 the Nationalist party of Quebec first took the unpatriotic ground, laid it down as a matter of policy for the people of Canada which they at all events were determined to support in Quebec; that Canada should take no part in the wars of the Empire, that neither the money, nor the men, nor the ships of Canada should be sent beyond the confines of this Dominion; and they appealed to the prejudices of the people who had confidence in them to stand by their policy as against any participation in the wars of the Empire. From that day to this we have seen the Nationalist party in Quebec adhering to that position, and, Sir, only two or three days ago, we had the spectacle of the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) going down into a constituency in the province of Quebec where a by-election was being held, and declaring to the people there that they need have no fear of conscription, because, if it came into force their young men could easily cross the boundary into the United States and so escape from the effects of the war. And yet we find that gentleman, so far as we can judge from the statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, still enjoying the confidence of his colleagues. So it comes with ill grace from the Minister of Finance to taunt us with speaking of Nationalism and condemning Nationalism on the floor of this Parliament.

Then, Sir, what further have we so far as patronage is concerned? We have the statement made in this House, we have the statement made in this country, made without contradiction, because it is impossible to contradict it, that even in the case of soldiers, even in the case of our boys who have gone to the front prepared to make the supreme sacrifice for their country, when they have returned wounded and have asked for positions which they could properly fill, they have been referred by the committee having the matter in charge to the patronage committee representing the Government of this country, speaking for the Conservative party in this country, and they have been obliged to get the recommendation of this patronage committee before they could be appointed to fill any position! Sir, only a few days ago, in the city of St. John, there was a meeting of the recruiting committee, and I am now going to quote from what took place at that meeting as supporting the statement which I make, and not merely the statement, but supporting the charge, a charge which this Government ought to be ashamed to lie under, supporting the charge that even in the case of the returned soldier the question of whether a man has belonged to a Liberal or to a Conservative family is to determine whether he is to get employment, is to determine whether or not his country is to recognize the sacrifice which he has made for the flag. Well, Sir, this meeting in St. John was presided over by a gentleman whom the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) knows well, presided over by one of the most prominent Conservatives in the province of New Brunswick, a gentleman who not long ago was appointed by the Conservative Government in the province of New Brunswick as one of the directors of a company which is constructing that important line of railway known as the St. John Valley railway; I refer to Mr. Richard O'Leary, of the county of Kent, in the province of New Brunswick. At that recruiting meeting in the city of St. John, on the 3rd of January last, as reported in the St. John Telegraph of 4th January, Mr. O'Leary said:—

> In spite of the resolution, it still is necessary for even a returned soldier to secure the recommendation of the patronage committee before he can secure a Government appointment.

That was the statement made by a gentleman who has been closely identified with recruting in the province of New Brunswick, who was chairman of the recruiting meeting for that province; a gentleman of the very highest standing, who has given of his wealth and time to every patriotic cause in New Brunswick since the war began; and that statement is simply confirmatory of what hon. gentlemen have stated on the floor of this House as to what is going on in this country. And yet my hon. friend the Minister of Finance says: Oh, because the war is on, and because our united effort should be directed towards the winning of the war, you must not speak of patronage; you must let us exercise it to the fullest extent in respect to our supporters throughout the country, and you must not make any complaint or criticism. Why, not long ago, the newspapers reported my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) as having gone to the city of St. John and given a banquet to his patronage committee who are making these recommendations for the filling of positions of this character and of other positions which come under the control of the Government.

We have had an extraordinary exhibition this afternoon and evening. Although Parliament has been sitting now for some days, we have had no explanation by the ministry as to the reasons why the Minister of Militia was dismissed from office. The ex-Minister of Militia is not in the position of one who resigned; he was dismissed from office. The letter of the Prime Minister to him shows clearly that this is the position in which he stands. Ordinarily, in such circumstances, ministerial explanations are made. Ordinarily, the Prime Minister takes Parliament and the country into his confidence, and gives the reasons for ministerial changes; but the Prime Minister has not done this House or the people of this country the courtesy of giving the explanations which a Prime Minister always thinks well to give in such circumstances. It has remained until this afternoon and evening for us to hear something of the reasons for the change which has taken place. The statements made by the ex-Minister of Militia and the Minister of Finance lead us to believe that very many more statements might have been made and very much more information might have been given to the people of this country as to the reasons why the change took place. My hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Militia, is clearly holding himself in leash. It would break his heart to separate from his dear Conservative friends, he says.

Mr. WILCOX: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: He says it would almost give him as much anxiety and as much sorrow to do that as if we were to lose the war. Loving his Conservative friends as he does, he holds himself in apparent restraint in order that he may still have a bridge across which he may walk backwards and again get into the confidence of his party. Perhaps between the time when he informed the public through the newspapers that he was going to make a full statement, and to-day, he has heard rumours which have come across the Atlantic that it will not be long before there is a change in the high commissionership, and that some other gentleman, possibly one who stands high in the Government of this country, may take the place of the gentleman who now occupies that position. It is not impossible that my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia may think that when the changes that may come about in the whirligig of time, possibly within a few weeks, take place there may be an opportunity for him to go back. Perhaps he feels that it is due to himself that he should not say too much or say anything that would prevent him from returning to the fold. But he tells the House that, for the first ten months of his administration of the Militia Department, he was continually hampered in his work; that he was treated as a responsible minister ought not to be treated, and that in the Cabinet he had two enemies. He uses polite language, the language of Parliament, but he tells us there were two enemies who constantly intrigued against him and prevented him from carrying on the great work which he felt he ought to do in his department in the interests of Canada and of the Empire.

How does my hon. friend the Minister of Finance answer that? Does he give us an explanation? He says there was something relating to trucks in regard to which the ex-Minister of Militia made some recommendation. He was getting information as to the Kelly truck or some other truck, and that it took some time to decide. That is what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance says. But that is not the charge made by the gentleman who for five years was the trusted colleague of the Prime Minister, the gentleman who for five years was entrusted by this Government with the duty of managing the military affairs of this country. I will read what he says in his letter to the Prime Minister dated May 13, 1915. So far from agreeing with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in what he states regarding the little matter of trucks and the delay that was caused, this is what the ex-Minister of Militia says:

> Dear Sir Robert: Since my return from England last November, I have repeatedly notified you that owing to the interference and plans of the "so-called" sub-committee and to the repeated hold-ups and needless obstructions of some of my colleagues in the affairs of this department—

Will the Minister of Finance take notice? If the Minister of Public Works were here I would ask him to take notice also.

> —the Contract branch has been very much hampered and practically blockaded; delays have been very prolonged; the cost has been greatly enhanced and the goods supplied have been, in many cases, inferior. Indeed, the most ardent agents of the German government could scarcely have been more successful in holding up the proper equipment of our forces, had they been in control.

Mr. Speaker, did you ever read a more serious charge than that made by a retiring minister against his colleagues with a war on? When a few weeks' delay might mean the cost of thousands of lives, and might materially affect the fortunes of war; when there was necessity for the utmost haste, the ex-minister says that he was not only not given a free hand, but was not even allowed to do that which other ministers claimed the right to do, to carry on the detail work of his department. But, by means of this sub-committee, which was appointed apparently behind his back, appointed for the purpose of taking control really of his department and, may I not also say, Sir, appointed for the purpose of enabling those gentlemen who were hostile to the then Minister of Militia to succeed in eventually driving him out of office—by means of this sub-committee—I say, contracts were held up, our soldiers were delayed and the most serious results therefore necessarily would follow. Has the Minister of Finance, in whose presence that letter was read, any answer to make to that charge? If that charge is true, Sir, it ought to bring upon this Government the strongest possible condemnation of the the people. Every man, every woman, every boy, whether at the front or in Canada, whether still fighting the battles of the Empire, or whether he is one who has returned after doing his duty and being wounded is no longer able to be at the front, must feel that if that charge is true the Government must stand condemned at the bar of public opinion. Yet, Sir, notwithstanding that most serious charge, made in this House of Parliament, made before the people of this country, a charge which, to-morrow morning will go broadcast in the press of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Minister of Finance has either not found it possible, or has not deemed it desirable, to attempt to give to this Parliament and the people any answer. Then, the ex-Minister of Militia gives an example. He says:

> As one of many specific examples, take the trucks for the second division. They should have been ready last December.

Think of that, Mr. Speaker, this sub-committee apparently has had the matter of the trucks in charge since the previous December. Although the trucks ought to have been ready in December they are not ready even as late as the 13th of May.

> They should have been ready last December, and they are not ready yet. Some of my colleagues constituted themselves champions of this or that truck, and brought about delays whereby untried trucks would be purchased; high prices would be paid in commissions to agents, and the Government, and the country, would be treated practically as a retailer. My policy, as you may remember, in this and in all other matters, was to force dealers to give the Government wholesale, or manufacturers' rates.

If there is any answer to be made to that letter, any answer to be made to these two paragraphs, if any reply can be made, to the most serious charge which is contained in these two paragraphs, is it not due to this House, to the people and to the Government themselves that they should make an answer to that charge to which the Minister of Finance should have made a reply while he was addressing the House this evening? Not one word of a reply has been made. If the ex-Minister of Militia is the kind of gentleman whom this Government must have thought him to be when they placed him in charge of this most important department, if he is the man they have thought him to be for five long years in the midst of the greatest war in history, and in the midst of the first great war in which our country has been engaged, if they have allowed him to control that important department having an expenditure of millions upon millions of the people's money and if he is the high minded gentleman whom we must believe him to be, and whom they believed him to be, surely there is a duty cast upon the Government to endeavour to answer the most serious charge contained in these two paragraphs. Then, he says:

> At the present time there are upwards of one hundred requisitions that have long been in.

These are requisitions for the soldiers; these are war supplies which are necessary to be issued to the soldiers before they can go to the front.

> The Quartermaster General has over and over again, until his heart has grown sick, brought them before me; they have been promptly passed on to the director of contracts, and the great majority of them when passed on to the Privy Council have been held up in council, or by the Treasury Board, laid aside or sent back —but always delayed; while the director of contracts and his officers have unceasingly been interfered with, delayed, and given endless and unnecessary work by the sub-committee.

Where is the answer to that? Has the Prime Minister any answer? No, apparently not. The Minister of Finance has not attempted to give any answer and we have a right to assume that it is because no answer can be given, because these hon. gentlemen must know it is true. Is it not too horrible to conceive of, to think that when our boys needed these supplies, no proper effort was made to furnish them? The ex-minister states that more than one hundred requisitions have long been made, that the Quartermaster General, whose duty it is to furnish the supplies, has over and over again, until his heart had grown sick, brought them before him, that they have been promptly passed on to the director of contracts by the minister, that they have been forwarded to the Treasury Board and they have been held up, laid aside, or sent back and always delayed. Is it not a sad thing to think that when these articles were required—were absolutely required—in order to enable Canada to take her part in the carrying on of this war, they, simply through apathy, the indifference of the ministers, through some of them, as the ex-Minister of Militia says, wanting an article purchased from one manufacturer and others wanting an article purchased from another manufacturer, and not being able to come to a conclusion for months and months, have been held back and the director of contracts has not been able to get his wants supplied? Could you think of a more serious charge to make, one which reflects more strongly upon the indifference and inefficiency of the Administration, than the charge made by the ex-Minister of Militia contained in the paragraphs which I have just read? Then, he says:

> I saw, by an article in the Free Press, that it is current talk everywhere among the soldiers and officers that they are short of nearly every class of equipment and supplies. In fact, three times recently I have been severely reproached about shortages in supplies and equipment by outsiders who had learned of these shortages from soldiers and officers of the force.

Here is another very serious charge regarding the medical department:

> Further, to my surprise, I was spoken to in Montreal this week, and informed that our medical units going over were only half equipped, while many of our combatant units are not properly outfitted. In addition to the serious aspect of the case, and from the viewpoint of the efficiency of our soldiers, there is the disheartening side. It is not only unfair to the gallant boys who are giving and willingly risking their lives for the cause, and making domestic sacrifices, but it is absolutely unjust to me and my officers.

There is the wail that goes up from the heart, apparently, of the ex-Minister of Militia demanding that his boys, as he is proud to call the Canadian soldiers, should be promptly and adequately supplied with those things which they required to enable them to perform their duty to their country. He tells the Prime Minister that these requisitions are tied up by the sub-committee of Council or tied up in Council until it has made him heartsick and until it has made the Quartermaster General heartsick as well. Yet there is no reply. There is no attempt on the part of the Prime Minister to explain or excuse, and no attempt on the part of the Minister of Finance to deny or excuse. The ex-Minister of Militia goes on:

> Therefore, as Minister of Militia, I must respectfully enter my protest, as I have frequently before entered it, at the interference and delays caused in all these things. It tends not only to the injury and inefficiency of our soldiers, thus jeopardizing the success of the British arms, but it must politically reflect seriously upon the Government.

I need not read any more from this letter, as it has been read by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia, and will appear in Hansard. I think I have read sufficient to show that it discloses a most serious state of affairs during the time the ex-minister was a member of the Government. It was written as long ago as May 13, 1915, and yet for a year and a half after that time, a year and a half after the ex-Minister of Militia had made this heart-rending appeal to the Prime Minister to assist him in seeing that necessities were supplied to our soldiers promptly, the minister continued as a member of the Government, and still had the confidence of the Prime Minister, and still, apparently, enjoyed the confidence of the majority of his colleagues. We must believe that the statements he makes here he would not make except from positive knowledge. We must believe those statements are absolutely correct, and as I said before, if they are correct, I want to know what more damning accusation could be brought against a government? In the face of these charges, does it lie in the mouth of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to tell us we ought not to criticise the Government, but ought simply to join with them and do our part in winning this war; that we ought not to criticise, or find fault, or point out defects in the Administration. Sir, I would want nothing more than this letter of the ex-minister to justify my conscience in bringing these matters to the attention of Parliament. If any member of Parliament under these circumstances declined to bring a matter of this kind forcibly to the attention of the House and country, he would not be discharging the duty he owes to the people he was sent here to represent. I do not know that I need deal further with the statement which was made by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia, and the very unsatisfactory statement made by the Minister of Finance, but just let me say this in passing, that it is a habit with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when fault is found with them, when it has been shown that they are wasting money, or distributing patronage for party purposes, at once to begin to talk about the bravery of our gallant boys at the front. As if the fact that upwards of 400,000 of Canadian boys have shown their willingness to shed their blood in defence of the Empire was a defence of the shortcomings of the Government! But that is what they do. That is what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has done to-day. Instead of answering the just criticisms made by the ex-Minister of Militia, he tells us what has been accomplished by our brave boys; he tells of the sacrifices that are being made by the mothers, fathers and sisters of the boys who have gone to the front, as well as of the sacrifices which the boys themselves are making.

The Minister of Finance says we ought not to criticise the leadership which this Government has given the people. Well, I do not know that we are debarred from doing that, if we honestly think they might have done much better than they have done. If we honestly think they have mismanaged the affairs of this country since the war began, I do not think we ought to hesitate, I do not think we should be discharging our duty if we did hesitate to criticise the Government. But the Minister of Finance says: If you do not like our military leadership, see how splendidly we have led you in finance. See how splendidly we have led you in the way of borrowing money, and increasing the revenues and trade of this country. He even boasted of the fact that whereas some three years ago we only had a trade of between $500,000,000 and $600,000,000 in the current year our export and import trade will be in the vicinity of $2,000,000,000. Sir, I think that trade is not a trade for us to rejoice in. It is a trade that is washed in blood. It is a trade that tells many a tragic story of many a broken heart. It is a trade that is dependent entirely upon the war. We bring our imports of the comparatively raw materials from the United States; we manufacture them in our munitions factories and other factories throughout this country, and then send them forward as manufactured goods at a higher valuation, which includes the labour that has been put upon them. That is how our present exports are largely made up.

Mr. CARVELL: What about profits?

Mr. PUGSLEY: And the profits which have gone to the munition manufacturers are also counted in the value of the export. When the war is over matters will get down again to a normal condition, and these fictitious exports and imports will no longer be a factor in the prosperity of our country. Look at the United States. Some politicians there are boasting of the enormous exports of the United States, but the right-thinking people of that country are pointing out that these exports are entirely fictitious and wholly due to the war, that they have grown to abnormal proportions, and have brought amazing wealth to the people of the United States. But the wealth comes from a war in which they are taking no part. For us, this greatly increased wealth comes from a war in which we are taking a heroic, a noble, but at the same time, a sad part, and I, for one, would be very glad indeed to see the time come when these enormous exports would cease, and we would again have peace in Canada, peace in the Empire, and peace throughout the world.

I desire, with the indulgence of the House, to speak for a short time on a few matters which are contained in the speech from the Throne, as this is the only opportunity which one will have of referring to these questions which are general in character, but which at the same time are of considerable public interest. In his speech His Excellency makes this statement:

> Steps have been taken by my advisers for better organization of National Service, and attention has been given to more thorough utilization of our natural resources.

This brings to my mind a subject which I think ought to have been dealt with long since by this Government. I am told by experts that we have in Canada natural resources, which, if they had been taken hold of in a proper manner, would have furnished the raw material for practically everything which is required by Canada for war purposes. Instead of spending in other countries vast sums of money for raw material, we have plenty of raw material at hand, which might have been utilized. After two and a half years of war, we are told by the Government, what? That attention has been given to the more thorough utilization of our natural resources. Attention in what way? Have they appointed a commission to investigate? If they have, it will be about the 106th commission which this Government have appointed since they came into office. Perhaps my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who seems to be taking a serious view of the observations which I have been making, will enlighten the House upon this subject, because it will be interesting to know in what respect this Government are paying attention to the natural resources of this country. What are they doing in the way of assisting in the development of our mining industry? What are they doing to encourage the utilization, within our own country, of the magnificent and valuable nickel deposits of Canada? What are they doing in the way of shipbuilding, of utilizing the vast deposits of iron for the purpose of building ships? In this, the third year of the war, the Government must confess that they have done absolutely nothing.

I trust my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will pardon me for calling his attention to some of his political activities, as, of course, it is difficult to refrain from doing so, because my hon. friend is very much in the limelight. Not long ago he went to the province of Quebec in order to attend a very interesting ceremony at the Vickers Maxim dock of launching a dredge or an ice-breaker—I forget which it was, and he spoke there of the great work which is being done in shipbuilding in Canada. My hon. friend, however, did not tell the assembled guests—perhaps he had not time to do it—that they would not be building any ships in the Vickers Maxim plant had it not been for the course which the late Government pursued when I was Minister of Public Works. It was at that time and under our administration that the Vickers Maxim plant was established, which has enabled them to do the creditable work to which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries referred. My hon. friend also spoke of the splendid ships which were being built at the head of lake Superior by the Port Arthur Dock and Shipbuilding Company, which is not only building some splendid ships to sail on the Great Lakes, but which is now building some ships for the Norwegian Government. My hon. friend did not stop to think. If he had, perhaps he would have remembered that I turned the first sod of that dry dock and shipbuilding plant at Port Arthur when I was Minister of Public Works, and it has been doing magnificent work since. My hon. friend would have probably had brought to his mind that uneasy thought which would perhaps have caused him some unhappiness, that not long ago he told the members of this House and the people in the country that it would take twenty-five years or on to fifty years to establish a shipbuilding yard in Canada. If he had paid especial attention to the Port Arthur Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company, he would have known that it only took the short period of two or three years to get that plant into working condition so that it could turn out the greatest steamers that ever floated on the Great Lakes. So I could go on with other cases. But I wish that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had been able, on that pleasant and interesting occasion, to tell the people that the Government had taken steps to establish shipbuilding plants in the Maritime Provinces. I well remember that in one of those eloquent speeches which my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows so well how to make speeches which thrill the hearts and evoke the admiration of his listeners, he told this House that he longed to see shipbuilding established in the Maritime Provinces; that he had the smell of the sea in his nostrils, and that he was simply aching to commence an enterprise of that character on behalf of the Government of this country.

He must not forget this; and if he ever does, I shall be sure to remind him of it, because I do not want him ever to forget it; I do not want this Government ever to forget it, and I do not want the people, who wish to know what a great penalty has been paid by the people of Canada because of the unholy alliance between the Nationalists and the Conservative party in 1911, ever to forget it. Let me remind my hon. friend that when he came into the office of Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the fall of 1911, he found on the files of his department an offer from one of the greatest shipbuilding firms in the United Kingdom, the firm of Cammell, Laird and Company, agreeing to establish a magnificent shipbuilding yard at the port of St. John, to build ten war vessels, namely, six cruisers and four destroyers. and to have them all completed before or in the year 1916, the year which is now past. He also found there on deposit the sum of $100,000 as a guarantee that this great shipbuilding company would perform its contract. What did my hon. friend do? During the election of 1911, the Nationalist party of Quebec had declared that we should have no Canadian navy, that being a part of their policy. They were not going to participate in the wars of the Empire; they were not going to allow Canadians to man the ships of Canada to sail upon the high seas, and to have their young men disembowelled upon the seas of China, or of Europe; they would pledge themselves to secure the repeal of the Naval Service Act, and there was to be no Canadian navy. When my hon. friend came into power, dearly as he would have liked to establish that shipbuilding plant at the port of St. John, dearly as he would have liked to enter into that contract with Cammell, Laird and Company, his hands and the hands of the other members of the Government were tied by that unholy alliance between the Liberal-Conservative party and the Nationalist party, which has been like a millstone around the necks of the people of Canada from that day to this. The Government did not dare go on because they were bound not to go on, and they returned the deposit to Cammell, Laird and Company, and the contract was never entered into. And that magnificent inlet of the Bay of Fundy at the port of St. John, where this splendid shipbuilding yard would have been built, had the contract been let by my hon. friend, according to the tender, where to-day there would have been ships under construction, where there would have been from three to five thousand men employed, where there would have been great docks, that splendid sheet of water to-day is as quiet as a grave. Where there would have been the hum of industry, to-day there is nothing but the sound of the seagulls passing over the waves. All is dead, as dead as this Government will be, when the people of Canada have an opportunity at the next election of expressing their will.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Did you hear about Dorchester?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, I heard about Dorchester, and let me tell my hon. friend what I heard about Dorchester. My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) stated that all that he did with regard to the money which Allison took was to tell the people that they were not concerned because it was England's money and not Canada's money which had been taken, and that all that he told them with regard to conscription was to point out to them that Mr. Cannon had said there would be conscription, but that the young men of Ste. Rose need not mind it because, if they did not want to serve their country, they had a remedy, they could easily cross the border and seek safety in the United States.

In addition to that, I heard another thing that Mr. Sevigny said. He claimed credit, even now, for having prevented the building of a Canadian navy. That is quite in accordance with the position which was taken by gentlemen like Mr. Blondin and Mr. Sevigny when a contribution of three battleships was suggested. They assured the people that that did not mean anything at all as compared with the proposal for the building of a Canadian navy. The building of ships would mean that Canadian boys would have to man them, but the giving of three dreadnoughts would simply mean that so much money, coming mostly out of the English-speaking people of Ontario, would be contributed. This, they said their friends would not mind very much, because the money would be all they would have to contribute and their young men would remain safely at home.

Something was said by one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke in this debate with regard to the great mistake Canada had made in not giving three dreadnoughts to the Empire. Looking at matters in a practical way, I appeal to every right thinking member of this House—which is, I think, appealing to every member, because while we sometimes differ I am satisfied that we all try to think aright—as to whether it would not have been a splendid thing for Canada to-day if we had even the ten ships which were to be constructed under the Naval Act of 1910. Opportunities have not been wanting in which they could have done great service to the Empire and have added to the glory of Canada. Only the other day a Hun raider appeared in the waters of the South Atlantic, and within a few days from 16 to 20 merchant vessels were sent to the bottom. If we had those ten vessels for the protection of our trade routes, as was designed by the Government which was led by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition, these vessels would be patrolling the north and south Atlantic looking for raiders and doing work which now has to be done by British ships. In this we would be following the splendid example which Australia has set in constructing a navy designed for the protection of her own coasts and available to the Empire in time of war. The war has now lasted more than two years, and we do not know how long it may continue. Even now it is not too late for my hon. friend on the treasury benches to take hold of the question of building a Canadian navy. It may not yet be too late to build vessels to form part of a Candian navy—cruisers, destroyers and submarines—which would be of enormous benefit to Canada and to the Empire.

In the speech from the Throne there is another paragraph of great interest. It is as follows:

> The life of the present Parliament will expire in October next, and under existing legislation a dissolution and election would be necessary in the early future. My advisers, however, are of opinion that the wishes of the Canadian people and the urgent requirements of the war would be best met by avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time.

If it were possible to avoid a general election during the war, it would be desirable to do so, provided such a course would be in accordance with the wishes of the people. When this question came up last year I used practically the same words. Many people throughout the country said to us last year: if you grant an extension, a precedent will be created; you may be asked to grant another, and it will be difficult for you to refuse. I think there was a good deal in the position taken by Mr. Lamarche, from the province of Quebec, who said that under the Constitution of Canada, Parliament has to sit for five years; that he was elected to serve the people for a term of five years and that he could not conscientiously vote himself a longer term as a member of Parliament. We have no guarantee that the war will end this year. It may run on to another year, and the question will naturally arise, as, indeed it has already arisen among the people, whether the members of Parliament would be justified in renewing their term of office from time to time for an indefinite period. That is the question to which the Government will have to direct its attention in submitting the matter to Parliament. Perhaps hon. gentlemen on the other side will take occasion to let us know whether there is any truth in the rumour that the Minister of Public Works will accompany the Prime Minister to England and that when the date of re-assembling comes there will be no meeting, but a dissolution of Parliament and an appeal to the people. If that decision has been arrived at the House and the country ought to be taken into the confidence of the Government at as early a date as possible. We ought to know whether we have to return for actual business, or simply to be told that His Excellency has dissolved Parliament and that we have to submit ourselves to the people.

Mr. ROGERS: We might as well set my hon. friend's mind at rest at once. He can depend upon being called upon early in the spring to attend business as usual.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am very glad to have that assurance from my hon. friend. He will observe that I am not nervous by reason of the rumour which I have heard. I believe in the words:

> Still achieving, still pursuing,
> Learn to labour and to wait.

An hon. MEMBER: Especially wait.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Whenever the elections come—and I am prepared to wait until they do come—I shall be ready to submit to any fate that may befall me.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister is going to England to represent Canada as a temporary member of the War Cabinet. I assume that he will have the right to vote at the meetings of this conference. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition took occasion early in the session to say that the Liberal members in the House would facilitate in every way the Prime Minister's attendance at that conference.

I am very glad, as one member of this House, that my right hon. friend made that statement, because, of course, it makes the path of the leader of the Government easier, and we shall all be prepared to make any sacrifice necessary in order to allow him so to attend. As one member of this House, I desire to say that when he goes to England he will have the sympathy and the support, I believe, of all the people of this country, irrespective of party, irrespective of their political differences, irrespective of the faults which we have to find with the Government in its administration in the past. We are all united in the one desire to serve the Empire in every possible way.

With regard to the conduct of the war, I am sure that he can carry to His Majesty the King and to the British Government a guarantee that the people of this country, irrespective of party, irrespective of religion or race, are united in a determination to make every sacrifice which is humanly possible in order to carry the war to success.

With regard to the terms of peace, of course we can say nothing. I notice that is one of the great subjects on which the overseas ministers are expected to deliberate. But let me say to my right hon. friend that the people of this country, while praying for peace, yet want a peace with glory for the Empire, and a peace which we can be sure will be lasting, and which will secure the realization of those ideals for which the Empire and our Allies are fighting. We trust that when it comes the joy bells will ring around the world acclaiming a victory for democracy, for civilization and for the highest Christianity.

Mr. A. BELLEMARE (Maskinongé) (translation): Mr. Speaker, before the closing of the debate on the Address, I wish to say a few words in explanation of my stand on the question of recruiting, and would ask the hon. members' kind attention for a few brief moments. Although the Government have as yet taken no definite steps towards adopting compulsory service, which to a few might seem desirable in the present circumstances, there exists, nevertheless, a strong current of opinion in favour of compulsory enlistment or conscription. I do not question the honesty of purpose of the hon. members who favour conscription, but I deem it my duty to call the attention of the House to the serious consequences of such a policy.

But let us not be carried away by the enthusiasm of the moment and led into an over-disinterested patriotism. I am not opposed in principle to Canada taking her fair share in this titanic struggle, in view of the possibilities it implies for ourselves; but our participation must not be such as to put in jeopardy our own safety and interests.

To this day Canada has done its duty towards Great Britain, and we may well keep on helping the Empire, without, however going beyond the resources of the country or renouncing the principle of voluntary military service.

The thousands of our men on active service or under training in the British camps; our contribution to the supply of munitions by home production; the enormous sacrifices made by our people all go to show to what extent and with what patriotism Canada has answered the call of the Mother-Country.

As yet the sacrifices we have made have not overtaxed the resources of the country. But it is a debatable question whether by further action and by substituting compulsory for voluntary service a dangerous situation may be created, the risk of which should not be minimized, even with the best intentions in the world.

It is only a few weeks ago that the census of our resources was taken by the National Service Commission, and yet, as was stated yesterday by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), more than a thousand of our citizens have gone over to the United States.

My conclusion can therefore be no other than if we were to enforce conscription, a guard of 150,000 men would not be sufficient to prevent our people from crossing the imaginary line which separates our country from the neighbouring republic, and thus evading compulsory service. I therefore wish to state in this House that I am opposed to compulsory enlistment or any other coercive measure.

I go so far as to hold that if even Canada were in danger we would not need conscription, for all men of military age, of whatever race, would rush to the defence of the country.

We can most efficiently help the Allies by stimulating the manufacture of war munitions and increasing the output of our coal mines. Thus would we better contribute to the success of the Allies for whom those products are of prime necessity.

Moreover, Canada being essentially an agricultural country, not only is it most important that the present production of the land should be maintained, but that it should be increased as much as possible. In fact, our surplus production is, each year, one of the most important sources of provisioning for the allied countries where war paralysed agricultural works.

Every year, the available stocks of Europe are reduced, if we are to believe the following extracts of the report of the "International Institute of Agriculture of Rome", as published in Le Devoir of the 1st of November last. I am here quoting the most significant:

The International Institute of Agriculture, which has published the most voluminous report on the question since the beginning of the war, advocates the practice of the strictest economy of foodstuffs the world over on account of the unusual requirements of European armies. It states that all nations are facing a serious problem. The consumption of wheat for the year ending July 31, 1917, is estimated at 2,300,000,000 bushels at least, and the remaining stocks of that cereal would then amount to no more than 46,000,000 bushels. The report adds that it is only on account of last year's abundant crop, which left an overstock of 350,000,000 bushels of wheat, that there is enough left to fill the demand up to the end of July, 1917.

It is strange that a despatch of such importance should have gone unnoticed by the press—unless it was suppressed for fear of alarming the people; which would be very poor policy. Is it not better, on the contrary, that the people should know what to expect if the war lasts and if its efforts are directed to channels leading away from the road to success instead of leading to the haven of peace?

This menace of an universal famine was presaged in the very first weeks of the war, in 1914, by Lord Milner who is one of the best informed men of England on general economic conditions. On the 1st of September of that year he wrote a letter to the British press—which was little commented by our Canadian papers at the time—recommending an actual enlisting of the people for agricultural purposes, which he estimated to be as urgent as the enlistment of troops, and to sow in wheat 6,000,000 acres in the United Kingdom, instead of 2,000,000 acres only. He predicted also that should the Allies not take immediate measures to guard against this famine, they would be confronted by it, as well as the rest of the world, before the end of 1915.

France has realized that fact long months ago. Although that country grows her own supply and imports very little wheat from foreign parts in normal times, she was short by 100,000,000 bushels this last fall; and England has just found out that she is lacking 225,000,000 bushels. In spite of woman labour in the belligerent countries, this year's crop has partially failed. Unfavourable weather conditions and the scarcity of farm hands have left unproductive in 1916 part of the wheat fields of the West which were under crop in 1915, with this result that in the United States and Canada and the whole of North America the production of wheat has been from 500 to 600 millions of bushels short of that of the year 1915.

But there are complications arising from the problem of transportation, and if the world produces an average crop next year and the Allies have to solve this problem, there can be nothing else than dire famine for Europe, and even for America. There will be a shortage of wheat. The 45,000,000 bushels in stock would hardly be sufficient for home consumption and for seeding purposes.

If I draw conclusions from the article I have just quoted and which seems to me well founded, the present Government should stimulate in every way the production of wheat, and not only in the Canadian West, but also in all the provinces of the Dominion. I gave a few lectures last summer in the county of Maskinongé, which I have the honour of representing in this House, and have advised the farmers to sow wheat. Some have followed this advice and are now quite satisfied, for you know that wheat is highly priced and flour is dear. I believe that by sending lecturers through all the provinces—even in our province of Quebec—we would help not only our own Canadian population, but also the Allies who are now fighting for the cause of civilization.

Motion of Mr. Gordon C. Wilson (Wentworth) for an Address to His Excellency, the Governor General agreed to.

Hon. Mr. HAZEN: In the absence of the Prime Minister I beg to move, seconded by the Hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane):

That the said Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this House as are of the honourable the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen it was ordered that this House do to-morrow resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen, it was ordered that this House do to-morrow resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

[Mr. Bellemare.]

On motion of Hon. Mr. Hazen, the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Wednesday, January 31, 1917.

The House met at Two o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) presented the following report of the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of the House during the present Session:

No. 1.

ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Motion agreed to.

THE PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That Messrs. Fripp, Pardee, Ross and Stanfield, be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Restaurant, as far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Restaurant, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to:

REPORT.

Report by the officer in charge of the Canadian War Records Office—Sir Robert Borden.

ESTIMATES FOR 1917-18.

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1918, was presented by Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House and referred to the Committee of Supply.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

FREE TRANSPORTATION FOR PROVINCIAL LEGISLATORS.

Mr. GEORGE E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the Railway Act. He said: The proposed amendment is intended to give to Cabinet Ministers of provincial governments the same rights of free transportation throughout Canada as senators and members of the House of Commons now have. It further gives to members of the Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies free transportation within the provinces which they represent.

The various railway companies now give them passes and this legislation would add no burden to them. It would, however, relieve members of provincial parliaments from any suggestion that in their dealings as legislators with the railway companies they might be influenced by the receipt of passes from the companies. The relationship would then be one founded on statute and not on the favour of the company. The proposed amendment is:—

1. Section 343 of the Railway Act, Chapter 37 of the Revised Statutes of Canada is amended by inserting after the words "House of Commons of Canada" in the third line thereof the words: "and to members of the Executive Councils of the Provinces of Canada, and within the provinces in which they reside, to members of the Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies of the Provinces of Canada."

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill No. 14, An Act respecting The Grain Growers' Grain Company, Limited, and to authorize it to change its name to "United Grain Growers, Limited."—Mr. Bradbury.

Bill No. 15, An Act respecting the Saint John Board of Trade.—Mr. Pugsley.

Bill No. 16, An Act to confirm certain agreements made between The Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company and The Canadian Northern Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill No. 17, An Act respecting The Western Dominion Railway Company.—Mr. Smyth.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CONSULTATION WITH DOMINIONS ON PEACE TERMS.

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Is the Government aware that the Entente Allies have agreed that, as one of the terms of peace with which the present European War will be concluded, Russia shall be given Constantinople and the Dardanelles?

2. Was the Government of Canada consulted regarding such agreement?

3. If so, did it approve thereof?

4. Has this Government been informed by the British Government that the Overseas Dominions would be consulted as to peace terms?

5. If so, when was the Government so informed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1, 2 and 3. The Government has had no official communication from the Government of the United Kingdom with respect to the subject mentioned in this question.

4 and 5. The Government received on the 21st day of January, 1915, a despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, as follows:—

> Will you inform your Prime Minister that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to consult him most fully, and if possible personally, when the time to discuss possible terms of peace arrives.
> (Signed) HARCOURT.

From present reports it would appear that members of the British Government have, from time to time, made declarations in accordance with the intention thus expressed. Recently in despatches received during the months of December and January, copies of which have already been laid on the table of the House, the intention to consult the Overseas Dominions respecting the terms of peace has been more fully expressed and the intention to discuss the terms of peace at the approaching War Conference has been definitely announced .

STEAM TRAWLERS.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has an order in council been passed permitting steam trawlers to operate outside a three-mile limit and inside a twelve-mile limit?

2. If so, what is the date of said order?

3. At whose request was this done?

4. How many steam trawlers operated in Canadian waters in 1916?

5. How many are on the Canadian registry?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes, during the portion of the year from January 18 to April 30, excepting in Chedabucto and St. Peter's bays, where such trawling is allowed from the 1st February to the 30th April. During these portions of the year trawling up to the three mile limit will not interfere with inshore fishermen, and will enable the landing of larger quantities of fish at the time when producers find it difficult to fill demands.

2. December 28, 1916.

3. On the recommendation of the Minister of the Naval Service following advice by his officers.
4. Two.
5. None, as such.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—TENDERS FOR ICE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Were tenders asked for supplying ice to the Canadian Government Railway at Mulgrave this season?
2. If so, what was the name of each tenderer and the respective amounts of each tender?
3. To whom was the contract awarded?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Yes.
2. Dan Johnston, Tracadie, N.S., $1.15 per ton, delivered and packed in icehouse. S. W. Hagerty, Mulgrave, N.S., 60 cents per ton, delivered on cars at Point Tupper, N.S., or $1.05 per ton, delivered and packed in icehouse.
3. S. W. Hagerty, $1.05 per ton, delivered and packed in icehouse.

THE FARMERS' BANK.

*Mr. LEMIEUX.

Is it the intention of the Government to reimburse the shareholders of the defunct Farmers' Bank?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not the intention of the Government to introduce legislation for the purpose during the present session.

ROYAL NORTH WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Is the Royal North West Mounted Police force now engaged in enforcing law in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta to be withdrawn from the authority of the respective Provincial Governments?
2. If so, at what date is this withdrawal to take place?
3. Is the force to remain in the provinces?
4. In what duty is it to be employed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I had expected to be able to lay on the table of the House to-day the orders in council which answer this question. I hope to have the answer to-morrow.

REMOVAL OF RAILS FROM CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Are the rails on the Canadian Northern Railway on the main line west of Edmonton to be taken up?
2. If so, at what time are they to be taken up?
3. What use is to be made of them?
4. What price is to be paid the railway company for them?
5. From what treasury will the funds come to make payment?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No.
2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by No. 1.

RANCH LEASES IN ALBERTA.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Are any ranch leases in Alberta held by George Hoadley of Okotoks?
2. If so, what is their extent and where are they located?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

MR. J. W. HYDE.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Was J. W. Hyde, late Indian agent on the Blood Indian Reserve at Macleod, removed from this position by Order in Council?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

OIL-BORING MACHINERY.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. What was the value of the oil-boring machinery, including casings, brought into Alberta through the Calgary port of customs in the years 1914, 1915 and 1916?
2. Who were the importers, and what was the amount of duty paid?

Mr. REID:

1. Dutiable oil boring machinery is not separately classified in the customs returns as compiled, and it would require a special compilation and considerable time to obtain this information.

The value of "well-drilling machinery and apparatus of a class or kind not made in Canada, for drilling for water, natural gas, or oil, and for prospecting for minerals, not including motive power" entered for consumption at the port of Calgary during the fiscal years ended 31st March, 1914, 1915 and 1916, respectively, was as follows: 1913-14, $4,415; 1914-15, $191,992; 1915-16, $39.

2. This well-drilling machinery was entered duty free. It is not usual to give the names of individual importers entering goods through the customs.

MEDICINE HAT MILITARY RESERVE.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. Is the military reserve north of Medicine Hat being used for the purpose for which it was secured?
2. Has any request been made to have a portion of this reserve opened for homestead purposes?
3. If so, what action does the Government purpose taking?

Mr. KEMP:

1. This area, which was transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Militia and Defence as a permanent reserve for the use of the Department of Militia and Defence as a remount depot and training area, was leased to the National Live Stock Exchange, Ltd., for the purpose of training remounts.

2. Yes—but, in any case, as the reserve will be required for a training area, it will not be available for homestead purposes.

3. Answered by No. 2.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. Is the Government aware that the Conference Committee of the United States Senate struck out from the Rivers and Harbours Bill, a clause limiting the amount of water which can be diverted from Lake Michigan for the Illinois river improvement?

2. Has any report been made to show what detrimental effect this may have on the water level of the Great Lakes and rivers connecting them with the sea?

Mr. HAZEN:

Nos. 1 and 2. The Government is aware that a conference committee of both Houses of Congress of the United States eliminated from the Rivers and Harbours Bill for 1916 an amendment authorizing and approving a proposed expenditure of $5,000,000 by the legislature of the state of Illinois for the purpose of improving navigation of the Illinois river.

This amendment contained a provision to the effect that the amount of water to be diverted from lake Michigan through "this system of water ways" should at no time exceed 250,000 cubic feet per minute.

The elimination of the entire amendment left the matter as it was previous to the introduction of the Bill.

The permit issued by the United States Secretary for War on December 5, 1901, limits the amount of water to be diverted from lake Michigan through what is known as the Chicago drainage canal to 250,000 cubic feet per minute. That permit has not in the meantime been modified or changed.

SEED GRAIN INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. McCRANEY:

1. What indebtedness was incurred to the Dominion Government by the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta respectively, for seed grain supplied to settlers on patented lands in these provinces in 1908?

2. What amount is still owing by each of these provinces in respect of these advances?

3. What was the amount of seed grain indebtedness by settlers on unpatented lands in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta respectively, for seed grain supplied in 1908, and what amounts are still owing in each province in respect of same?

4. What amount is now owing by settlers in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta respectively, for advances of seed grain prior to 1915?

5. What were the total advances for seed grain and fodder to settlers in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta respectively, in 1914, 1915 and 1916, and what amounts are still owing in each province in respect of same?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Province of Saskatchewan	$ 714,944 09
Province of Alberta	150,914 30
2. Province of Saskatchewan including interest	300,459 84
Province of Alberta, including interest	5,472 52
3. Province of Saskatchewan	326,511 96
Province of Alberta	75,109 80
3a. Amount still owing in provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta	4,443 83
4. Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta	233,536 46
5. Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, 1914	60,462 46
Province of Saskatchewan, 1915 and 1916	8,655,144 29
Province of Alberta, 1915 and 1916	3,542,223 38
Amount still owing in provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, 1914	54,716 16
Amount still owing in province of Saskatchewan, 1915 and 1916	5,498,480 16
Amount still owing in province of Alberta, 1915 and 1916	2,143,675 98

SHERBROOKE EXHIBITION GROUNDS.

Mr. McCREA:

1. Did the Government have the use of the Sherbrooke Exhibition Association grounds and buildings for a military training camp in the years 1915 and 1916?

2. If so, did they pay anything to the said Association for damages or repairs to grounds and buildings, and how much for each year?

3. Did the Government pay anything to any other person or persons for damages to property left or stores on said grounds or in said buildings?

4. If so, what is the name of the party or parties to whom such payments were made?

5. What amount was paid to each person?

6. What was, in detail, the kind or nature of goods so damaged?

Mr. KEMP:

1. Yes. From January, 1915, to August, 1915, and from October, 1915, to July, 1916.

2. Yes. $5,000 to August, 1915, and $1,050 to July, 1916. Repairs account damages.

3. No payments were made by the Government to any other person or persons for damages to property left or stored on the said grounds or in the said buildings. If any such payments were made they were paid by the Eastern Townships Agricultural Association.

4. Answered by No. 3.
5. Answered by No. 3.
6. Answered by No. 3.

FRASERVILLE RECRUITING STATION.

*Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Does the Department of Militia and Defence pay rent for a shop at Fraserville, which has been used for the purpose of a drill hall and armoury for recruits?
2. What amount has been spent either by the Department of Militia and Defence or the Public Works Department for the heating apparatus, lighting plant, water supply and furnishings of such buildings?
3. Who is the proprietor of said building?
4. What does the Government intend to do with this building now that there are no more recruits at Fraserville?

Mr. KEMP:

1. Yes.
2. $2,145.60 (from 19th May, 1914, to date.)
3. S. C. Riou.
4. This question is irrelevant, as it contains a statement of fact.

QUEBEC & SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

*Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. Has the Government purchased the Quebec and Saguenay Railway?
2. If so, on what date and at what price?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. An agreement to purchase has been entered into, pursuant to the Statutes of Canada, 1916, Cap. 22 This agreement has already been laid upon the table of the House.
2. The agreement is dated July 25, 1916. The price is to be fixed by the Exchequer Court, in accordance with the terms of the above statute.

*Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

1. Has the Government entered into a contract with the Quebec and Saguenay Railway Company for the completion of said railway?
2. If so, at what date, and upon what terms?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The Quebec and Saguenay railway is being completed by the companies under the conditions set out in the copy of the order in council.
2. Answered by No. 1.

ADVANCES FOR SEED GRAIN.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. What amount was advanced for seed grain and relief in the Dominion Lands Districts of Lethbridge and Medicine Hat in the years 1914 and 1915?
2. How much has been repaid in each of the years 1915, 1916, and up to January 15, 1917?
3. What was the total amount advanced in Alberta and Saskatchewan in 1914 and 1915?
4. What is the total amount so far returned?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. $2,190,045.93.
2. Amount repaid, 1915 .. .. $259,036 34
   Amount repaid, 1916 .. .. 655,912 65
   Amount repaid, 1917, (15th January) 59,170 82
   Total $974,119 81
3. $12,197,367.67.
4. $4,652,894.52.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—FREIGHT HANDLERS AT PICTOU, N.S.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. How many men were employed in the freight handling by the Railway Department at Pictou in conection with the winter service during the month of December, 1916?
2. How many men were employed for same purpose in the same service during the month of December, 1915, by the Marine Department?

Mr. PATENAUDE:

1. There were eighteen permanent employees and one hundred temporary labourers and longshoremen.
2. The handling of the freight under the Department of Marine and Fisheries, in December, 1915, was performed by contract, and the department has no record of the number of men employed.

MILITARY SUPPLIES.

Mr. MACDONALD:

Who were the contractors, in December, 1916, for furnishing supplies for the troops at Trenton and Pictou, respectively, in the county of Pictou?

Mr. KEMP: Trenton—Meats and lard, Harris Abattoir Co.; bread, Dominion Fish & Fruit Co.; bread, F. A. Mulligan (Hygienic Bakery); groceries, Jas. McArthur; jams and marmalade, T. Upton Co.; potatoes and vegetables, A. H. King; coal oil, Imperial Oil Co.; straw for men's bedding, J. B. Strickland.

Pictou—Fish and corned beef, Pope Bros.; groceries, John Munro; potatoes and vegetables, John Munro; bacon and lard, John Munro; jams and marmalade, Dominion Canners; coal oil, Imperial Oil Co.; bread, Jas. D. McDonald.

MR. A. DE WITT FOSTER.

Mr. KAY:

1. Is Mr. A. De Witt Foster, late member for Kings, Nova Scotia, employed by the Government or any department thereof, or is he in any way representing the Government?

2. If so, what is he doing, and what salary does he receive?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

PROHIBITION OF OLEOMARGARINE.

Mr. KAY:

1. Is it the intention of the Government, during the present session, to make any change in the law which prohibits the manufacture, importation and sale of oleomargarine?

Mr. BURRELL:

1. Any necessary announcement with respect to this matter will be made in due course.

PICTOU, N.S., MARINE AGENCY.

Mr. MACDONALD:

2. If so, who is the appointee?

3. If not, will the vacancy be filled?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes.

2. John R. Davies.

3. Answered by No. 2.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAY LEVEL CROSSING.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Is the Railway Department aware of the dangerous nature of the crossing on the Canadian Government Railway north of the Eastern Car Works at Trenton, Pictou county?

2. If so, is it the intention of the railway to construct a subway to remove the danger?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The elimination of the level crossing on the Pictou Harbour branch, north of the Eastern Car Works at Trenton, Pictou county, has been given consideration.

2. An item has been placed in this year's Estimates for the construction of a subway at this point.

WHARF AT MUCHABOOM.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. Was any survey made for a proposed wharf at Muchaboom, Halifax County, in the calendar year 1916?

2. If so, by whom, and what was the cost of same?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. Made by Messrs. Cox and Mosher of District Engineer Morrison's staff at a cost of $28.05.

[Mr. Kay.]

STONE FOR THE NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDING.

* Mr. MURPHY:

1. In the construction of the new Parliament Building will stone from the Tyndall Quarry in Manitoba be used?

2. If so, what quantity of the said stone is to be used, and what will be its cost per cubic yard or foot delivered at the works on Parliament Hill?

3. What quantity of the said stone has been delivered up to January 25, 1917?

Mr. ROGERS:

1 and 3. Whether stone from the Tyndall quarry in Manitoba is to be used in the reconstruction of the Parliament building is still under consideration by the Joint Committee on the reconstruction of the Parliament building.

2. In the event of it being decided to use this stone, 138,000 cubic feet will be required. This stone is quoted at $1.02 per cubic foot, f.o.b. Ottawa. The cartage from the Canadian Pacific Railway terminal to the stone shop on Sussex street is 30 cents per ton, giving an additional cost of 2·4 cents per cubic foot, or $1.04·4 per cubic foot at the stone shop.

* Mr. MURPHY:

1. In the construction of the new Parliament Building will stone from the Wallace Quarry in Nova Scotia be used?

2. If so, what quantity of the said stone is to be used, and what will be its cost per cubic yard or foot delivered at the works on Parliament Hill?

3. What quantity of the said stone has been delivered up to January 25, 1917?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. Forty thousand cubic feet will be required, to be delivered in quarry blocks at the stone shop on Sussex street, for 75·4 cents per cubic foot.

3. Thirty-one thousand five hundred and fifty cubic feet.

* Mr. MURPHY:

1. Prior to November 11, 1916, how many cubic yards of rock had been excavated at the site of the new Parliament Building?

2. What was the total cost of excavating the said quantity of rock?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Nine thousand six hundred and fifty-one cubic yards.

2. Thirty-seven thousand three hundred and fifteen dollars and sixty-eight cents.

MONTREAL PUBLIC BUILDING.

* Mr. MURPHY:

1. Is the Government, or any department thereof, erecting a building in the rear of, and connected with, the post office sub-station occupying the premises formerly known as the Carslake Hotel on St. James street, in the City of Montreal?

2. If so, (a) who has the contract for such building, (b) and was the said contract awarded after public advertisement and tender?

3. If tenders were not advertised for, how was the contract awarded, and the prices fixed?

4. What is to be the total cost of the said building?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes, the Department of Public Works is erecting a shed and covered passageway to be used by the Post Office Department.

2. (a) E. T. Verbanise. (b) Yes, tenders were invited by public advertisement and the contract was awarded to the lowest.

3. Answered as above.

4. Contract price $7,490, and a unit price of $1.30 per cubic yard for excavation, and $8.50 for concrete foundations, if required.

MUNITIONS BOARD CLERKS.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Are the clerks employed in the Munitions branch of the Government permanent or temporary?

2. Are they paid on the average better salaries than the permanent clerks of the other departments of the Government Service?

3. Is the Government aware as to whether or not some of the women clerks receive over one hundred dollars per month and some of the men over two hundred dollars per month?

4. What is the highest salary paid (a) to a man; and (b) to a woman?

5. Have these clerks any special or technical knowledge entitling them to the higher salaries?

6. Are the clerks of the Munitions branch paid higher salaries than those who are permanent in other departments of the Government Service? If so, why?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The reference in this question is apparently to the Imperial Munitions Board, which is not a branch of the Canadian Government, and of which the administration is not under the control of the Canadian Government. The Government has no information as to the salaries paid to the clerks and other employees of the Imperial Munitions Board, and those salaries are determined altogether by the British Government through that Board. The Canadian Government has no information as to the special or technical knowledge possessed by the several clerks and employees of the Imperial Munitions Board.

SEED GRAIN—COLLECTION OF ADVANCES.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. What officials are engaged in the collection of the Government advances for seed grain and relief in Saskatchewan and Alberta?

2. Were the homestead inspectors used in every land district affected? If not, why not?

3. What are the salaries paid those persons apart from regular departmental officials engaged in this work?

4. What are the names of these persons?

Mr. ROCHE:

1. Chief Inspector H. G. Cuttle, Inspector Thomas Bronsdon, a number of clerks out of the Land and Immigration offices and about half the homestead inspectors.

2. Yes. About half the homestead inspectors were used in connection with seed grain and relief collections. It was necessary to retain half of the homestead inspectors at their regular duties in order to keep up the most important homestead inspections.

3. One hundred dollars per month.

4. T. Brownlee, T. Carmichael, T. H. Cochrane, A. Hardy, J. B. Hawkes, J. D. Mitchell, A. Sipes and H. A. J. Scott.

STANLEY McCUTCHEON.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Was Stanley McCutcheon, preventive officer at Sonora, N. S., dismissed?
2. If so, why and when?
3. At whose request was he dismissed?
4. Was there an investigation?
5. If so, by whom?
6. Was a successor appointed?
7. If so, at whose instance?
8. What is the salary connected with the office?

Mr. REID:

1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. The employment of Mr. Stanley McCutcheon, acting preventive officer of customs at Sonora, N.S., was discontinued on the 20th November, 1916, in accordance with the terms of his letter of appointment dated 27th December, 1907.

6. Yes.

7. Minister of Customs.

8. $150 a year.

L. B. DODGE—HAY PURCHASES.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN:

1. What amount, if any, was paid to L. B. Dodge of Middleton, N.S., as salary and expenses, in the calendar year 1916, for the purchase of hay for the Government of Canada?
2. What quantity of hay was purchased by Mr. Dodge?

Mr. BURRELL: No hay was purchased by L. B. Dodge for the Government of Canada.

QUESTION TO STAND FOR SPEAKER'S RULING.

On the question by Mr. McKenzie:

1. Is the Minister of Justice aware, either officially or by common report, as to whether or not the Post Office Department, during the spring or summer of 1916, issued an order excluding from the mails a certain news sheet called Racing Form, published in the United States, containing advance information or tips on horse races to be run in Canada and the United States?
2. Is the minister aware, either officially or by common report, as to whether or not said news sheets are still being imported into Canada through the medium of the railway express companies?
3. Did the minister observe in the press, or was he informed that statements had been made by officials of the Justice Department to the effect that it was not the intention of said department to prohibit said express companies from bringing into Canada said news sheets?
4. Was the minister approached on the subject, either personally or by correspondence, either in favour of or against the importation of said news sheets by said express companies?
5. Is the minister aware of the provisions of Chapter 10 of the Acts of 1910 (Federal), section 3 and subsections f and h, which impose a penalty of $1,000 with a year's imprisonment upon persons dealing in news sheets of the type of said Racing Form?
6. If the above statute is not being enforced against said express companies, will the minister state the reason for such non-enforcement?
7. Is it the intention of the minister to permit the importation of said news sheets by said express companies?
8. Is the minister aware as to whether or not very large sums of money are wagered and lost every day and week by the young men and women of Canada, as the result of information given them through the medium of said sheet known as the Racing Form?
9. Is the Government aware of the following provision of the statutes, Chapter 10 of the Acts of 1910, section 3, sub-section f—"Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment and to a fine of $1,000 who: '(f) advertises, prints, publishes, exhibits, posts up, sells or supplies, or offers to sell or supply, any information intended to assist in, or intended for use in connection with book-making, pool selling or wagering upon any horse race or other race, fight, game or sport. (h) Wilfully and knowingly sends, transmits, delivers or receives any message by telegraph, telegram, mail or express, conveying information relating to book-making, pool selling, betting or wagering'"?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask that this question stand, to afford me an opportunity of consulting the authorities more fully. As at present advised, the question, to be in order, will have to be amended, if not entirely eliminated.

Mr. Macdonald.—For a copy of the order or orders in council providing for the appointment of a Minister of Militia in Great Britain and for the creation of a Militia Council there and for any appointments thereto or changes in said council.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. Pugsley.—1. What is the total value of the Oliver equipment, so-called, supplied to Canadian soldiers, who have crossed to England since the commencement of the present war?

2. Was such equipment discarded when or soon after the Canadian soldiers wearing the same arrived in England?

3. If so, what was done with the said equipment, and why was it discarded?

[Mr. Speaker.]

4. What equipment was supplied in its place?

5. Was such equipment so supplied in its place better than the Oliver equipment?

6. If so, in what respects?

Mr. Sinclair.—1. What were the names, home addresses and former occupations of all censors, decoders or other employees of the Government in the different cable stations in Nova Scotia during the calendar year 1916?

2. What is the name of the person who recommended each of the said censors, decoders or employees?

3. What salary was paid to each of the said persons for the calendar year 1916?

Mr. Graham.—1. How many men have been enlisted in Canada for overseas service?

2. How many of these have been subsequently discharged as unfit?

3. How many of these were discharged in Canada, and how many overseas?

Mr. Steele.—1. How many applicants for enlistment in the Canadian overseas forces have been rejected on account of being physically unfit?

2. How many have been discharged after enlistment for the same reason?

Mr. Carvell.—1. Were any changes made in the Ross Rifles Mark III, in England?

2. What changes were made, and when were they made?

3. Who gave the instructions for any changes made?

4. Were they carried out under the supervision of the Militia Department by duly qualified experts?

5. Were the rifles, as changed, duly proven according to War Office regulations, before they were given back to the Canadian troops?

Mr. Turriff.—1. What was the date of the last order given by the Government to the Ross Rifle Company?

2. How many rifles were ordered?

3. Was a recommendation of the British Army Council for the utilization of existing Canadian facilities in manufacturing the new and improved Lee-Enfield received by the Government?

4. What was the date of the recommendation, and when was it received?

5. Has the recommendation been acted upon?

Mr. Cruise.—1. What was the total number of Ross rifles made by order of the Government of Canada to date?

2. What was the cost per rifle?

3. How many of these rifles are in the hands of Canadian soldiers in France?

4. Are these rifles still being made?

5. If they are not being made to the Government order, at what date did the making cease?

6. What was the disposition made of the Ross rifles taken from the Canadian Forces in France when they were re-armed with Lee-Enfields?

7. Has the Government any information as to whether the Ross Rifle Company is now making Lee-Enfield rifles for the British Government?

8. Will the Government lay on the table the report of the Military Commission of inquiry regarding the Ross rifle, which sat in England in the year 1915?

Mr. C. A. Wilson.—1. Can the Government inform the House as to what was, on the 1st

December, 1916, the quantity of butter, cheese, eggs, fowl, turkeys in the cold storage buildings of the Dominion, particularly in the city of Montreal?

2. What was the value of these goods?

VOTES FOR WOMEN IN DOMINION ELECTIONS.

On the notice of motion:

That, whereas, in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the provincial franchise has been granted to women by legislative enactment, and in British Columbia the electors have voted in favour of similar legislation:

Whereas it is provided in the Dominion Elections Act that persons entitled to vote for members of a Provincial Legislature shall also be entitled to vote for members of Parliament, but in respect to Alberta and Saskatchewan—alone of all the provinces of Canada—it is provided that only males shall be entitled to vote for members of the Federal Parliament, thus creating an anomalous situation as between the provinces, which should be removed;

Whereas during the present Empire struggle the women of Canada have shown a most intelligent and patriotic interest in, and an unselfish devotion to, the welfare of the state;

And whereas it seems but just and right that they should be given a voice in the direction of its affairs;

In the opinion of this House it is desirable that provision be made either to grant to women who are qualified to vote for members of a Provincial Legislature, the right also to vote for members of the Dominion Parliament, or to grant to women throughout the Dominion the right to vote for members of Parliament, subject to such provisions and limitations as may seem reasonable to Parliament.—Mr Pugsley.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In a short conversation which I had with my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers), who took a somewhat active part in a discussion on a similar resolution at the last session, it was suggested that this motion might stand for the present; but I would remind my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that when the matter was before the House at the last session, he intimated that possibly the Government might take some action upon the subject. I would just call his attention to the matter so that it might be remembered when the resolution comes up again.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall be very glad to bear that in mind.

Notice stands.

NATIONAL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Right hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Quebec East) moved:

For a copy of the order in council establishing the National Service Commission, giving the names of the members appointed and the rate of their remuneration.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think this information has already been laid upon the table of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Not the order in council. I have not seen the order in council at all.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I was under the impression that it had been laid upon the table of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In connection with this motion, I would like to call the attention of my right hon. friend to the fact that it has been stated in the press that the remuneration to the Director of the National Service has been fixed at $250 per month, in addition to travelling expenses. I also saw an intimation that the Director General, the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) would not be paid any salary. I understand, however, that there is upon the commission Mr. Green, one of the members for British Columbia, and I think my right hon. friend will agree with me that it will be a violation of the Independence of Parliament Act for him to be paid a salary. I would also call attention to the fact that one of those appointed to the commission is Mr. Tilley, who is a representative of the city of St. John in the provincial legislature. The provincial statute expressly provides that for any member of the provincial legislature of New Brunswick to accept an appointment under the Dominion Government to which a salary is attached is a violation of the Act and renders his seat vacant. I do not know whether the attention of the right hon. gentleman has been called to this matter, but I thought it my duty to mention it. I have no objection to Mr. Tilley acting as a director, but, of course, he could not act as director and still continue to be a member of the legislature.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My attention has not been directed to the New Brunswick statute, nor am I informed as to the fact whether Mr. Tilley is being paid remuneration for his services or not. Mr. Bennett is receiving no remuneration; he accepted the appointment distinctly on the condition that he would accept nothing for his services. The same is true of Mr. Green, who is the other gentleman to whom the hon. member refers. I shall make inquiry about the New Brunswick statute.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The right hon. gentleman will find it in the Act relating to the members of the legislature.

REMOVAL OF RAILWAY MATERIAL TO FRANCE.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

For a copy of all correspondence with the Imperial Government on the subject of sending to France rails and other railway material taken from existing Canadian railway lines, giving copies of orders in council and a statement of all action taken in regard to same.

He said: Some time ago a despatch appeared in the newspapers to the effect that the Canadian Government had been asked by the British authorities whether Canada could dispense with rails now in use, that they might be supplied for the construction of railway lines in France. I do not know whether there has been such correspondence, but in case there may have been, I move for it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There was, naturally, some correspondence on the subject; and the Canadian Government, after consultation with the several railway companies of the country and with the officers of the Intercolonial railway, were prepared to take certain action. This correspondence took place during my absence, therefore I am not wholly familiar with it; but I believe that in the end the extent of the requirements was considerably cut down, as compared with what was stated at first. I do not know that I have seen all this correspondence myself, and I cannot speak as to the nature of it all, but the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will understand that some of the information as to the necessity for the rails would possibly be of a character which would make it inexpedient to lay the correspondence on the table of the House. Should that be so, there would be no objection to submitting the secret correspondence to my right hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not call for anything of a confidential nature. What I wish to know especially is the action taken by the Government in answer to the inquiries made.

Mr. OLIVER: Some weeks ago a very extraordinary announcement appeared in the public press—in the absence of the Prime Minister, as the right hon. gentleman (Sir Robert Borden) has just stated—to the effect that the rails upon certain railway lines in the Northwest would be taken up and sent to France. The newspapers stated very clearly that the Government was entering upon a definite policy, and that policy appeared to be the tearing up of rails on established railway lines in the western provinces, and particularly in northern Alberta. Of course, I do not assume that the Government has control of the press of the country to prevent such anouncements being made; but I wish to say to the Government that when such announcements are made so publicly and so definitely as in this case they have a most disturbing influence upon the public mind and lead to very important conclusions having a direct bearing upon the business of the localities affected. It was announced very definitely that the rails on the Canadian Northern west of Edmonton for a distance of over two hundred miles were to be taken up. At that time contracts were in process of being let for taking out railway ties in the wooded country through which this line, in part, runs. I am unable now to say whether these contracts were cancelled because of this announcement, but I am in a position to say that the question whether they should be cancelled or not was seriously considered because of that announcement, and a general disarrangeemnt of business was caused along the whole line. In the newspaper press there seemed to be a general consensus of opinion that there were too many railroads in the Northwest and particularly in northern Alberta, and that it would be entirely in the public interest to have these railways taken up. I have taken occasion several times to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in northern Alberta, so far from there being too many; there are railroads there the grade of which has been completed for several years, running through settled parts of the country, where the people are in desperate need of railway communication, and the excuse is made by the railway—this same Canadian Northern Railway Company—that they cannot get the rails to lay upon these lines, the money for the grading of which has been spent. It certainly strikes the people in our part of the country as entirely peculiar that, after the money has been voted, after guarantees have been given by the provincial Government in the one case and by the Dominion Government in the other in the full belief that these railroads were needed, and the railroads having been completed in the case of the Dominion guarantees and partially completed in the case of the provincial guarantees, the proposal should be sent broadcast through the country that the rails on the lines under Dominion guarantee should be taken up and the lines partially built under provincial guarantee should remain without rails being placed upon them, on the general assumption that there are too many railroads in the Northwest at the present time and that the public money had been wasted in giving railroad accommodation to the people of that part of the country. I take this opportunity of pointing out to the Government how serious the business effect of such a report must necessarily be, and I can hardly think that the Government was doing right in permitting such a report to become current without promptly contradicting it if it had no foundation. In regard to the superabundance of railroads, there are people to-day in the constituency immediately to the east of that which I represent who have been living for years 100 and 120 miles from railway communication. I say that in such circumstances the idea that seems to prevail that there are too many railroads in that country is entirely mistaken.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways): The first request that came from the British Goyernment for rails was for about 1,000 miles, and it was thought then that we should do anything in our power in order to help the British Government during the war. The intention in taking up the rails in the western part of Canada was to take them from stretches where the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway parallel. It would certainly have been no hardship to take those up. When, owing to the difficulty of securing transportation overseas, the request was cut down to 300 miles, we decided to take the rails up at divisional
3 p.m. points of the Transcontinental railway, and that is what has been done.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be sidings?

Mr. COCHRANE: At divisional points, the yards.

Motion agreed to.

HON. DR. BELAND, M.P.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL: My attention has been called to a newspaper cutting dealing with the case of the Hon. Dr. Béland, the hon. member for Beauce. I would like to know if there is anything new in his case. This newspaper points out that two Germans, one Baron von Polenz and another named Mundheim, have been liberated from internment camps in Canada. I would ask whether the release of these men would not have been a good opportunity for effecting an exchange in the case of Dr. Béland who, as we all know, has been a prisoner of war in Germany for about two years.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not familiar with the circumstances attending the alleged releases from the internment camps, but I do know that not only this Government, but the British Government have made every possible effort to secure the release or exchange of the Hon. Dr. Béland. In every instance I think I have made my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition acquainted with what has been done. I have sent to him, and also to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), and to another gentleman who was a very intimate friend of Dr. Béland, the correspondence which from time to time has taken place. The difficulty with regard to this case, as well as to other cases, is that when very strong efforts are made to secure the liberation or the exchange of any person who is held by the German military authorities, that circumstance in itself seems to strengthen the determination of those authorities not to liberate or to exchange. I shall make inquiry of the Minister of Justice as to the matter referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the Prime Minister complete his answer by saying who has control of the release of men interned in Canadian camps?

SIR ROBERT BORDEN: The Minister of Justice. All the internment operations are under his direction by authority of an order in council passed for the purpose.

MONTREAL CUSTOMS COLLECTORSHIP.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MARCIL: I notice in the Montreal morning papers a statement that Mr. R. S. White, collector of customs in Montreal, a highly respected official, is about to retire from the service, and that he has been replaced by Mr. Bertram, the collector in Toronto. Is there any truth in the report?

Mr. REID: Mr. R. S. White, the collector of customs in Montreal, applied for superannuation. He is over the age limit for superannuation, and I have asked for an order in council granting his superannuation. In the meantime, until his successor is appointed, I have transferred Mr. Bertram, the collector at Toronto, to Montreal to take charge there, as Montreal is the most important port in the Dominion, and Mr. Bertram is one of the most experienced officials in the service. It is because he has the experience that I have transferred him.

Mr. MARCIL: Then is this appointment only temporary?

Mr. REID: I have transferred Mr. Bertram temporarily, and have put in Mr. Bertram's place temporarily Mr. Blair, who is one of our best inspectors at Ottawa.

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): I am asked to draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche) to the fact that hardship is being experienced by people on account of the rule applied to the deportation of children coming into Canada from the United States. I have had two cases drawn to my attention within the last few days in which women with their children were turned back from McAdam junction, New Brunswick, and required to travel long distances back to the places from which they had come in the United States to obtain health certificates for their children. One was the case of the wife of a Canadian soldier who is at the front, who had been visiting her father in New York, and who was returning with her child to her home in New Brunswick. On her way back home she was refused entrance into Canada because she did not have the necessary health certificate for her child. She was subjected to the necessity of making a return trip to New York to obtain this certificate. It looks like a case of unnecessary hardship. One would think that there would be a health officer at McAdam junction, or at other points at which people are entering Canada, to make an examination, if an examination is necessary. I would like to know from the Minister of the Interior, or from the right hon. the Prime Minister, if it is absolutely necessary to have such a rigid rule as that applied to people coming with children into Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the inquiry of my hon. friend, and ask him to give the information.

DEPARTMENT OF MILITIA.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Kemp) a question with regard to his department. I have a letter from a retired militia officer who would like to know if it is the policy of the department to allow a man who is now permanently in the service to fill another position at the same time, or if officers of the department are required to retire from their former positions and give their whole time to the public service. Is there any rule in regard to a case of that kind?

Mr. KEMP: What is the case in point?

Mr. MARCIL: Of course, I understand that if an officer were overseas he would be required to give his whole time, but I would like to know if a man employed in the Department of Militia and Defence in Canada is required to give his whole time to the department; or will he have time to give to his former civilian duties as well as to his duties as an officer of the department?

Mr. KEMP: There are a great many branches of the service under the control of the Department of Militia and Defence, and there are instances in which a man can attend to his own profession and also perform service to the department or the country. Unless the hon. gentleman has more specific information, I am afraid I cannot give him a more definite answer.

Mr. MARCIL: I am merely speaking of the case of an officer of the militia who has been permanently appointed to the force.

Mr. KEMP: I do not know of any such case, but I can find out. Would not my hon. friend give me the case in point, not publicly if he does not desire to do so, but confidentially, in order that I may look into it?

Mr. MARCIL: I wanted to know if there was a rule preventing that.

Mr. KEMP. There is a rule against a man doing anything that is dishonest. If my hon. friend has in mind some irregularity in regard to this matter I would say to him that there is no intention to countenance anything of the sort.

Mr. MARCIL: I am not suggesting that there is anything wrong or irregular, but I want to know if a man is required to give the whole of his time to the department or if he can hold two positions and serve two masters, remaining in the employ of a corporation and still being on the staff of the department?

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

LIMITATION OF RACING MEETS.

Mr. OLIVER J. WILCOX (North Essex) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: The Bill, which I now propose to be read a second time, is intended to add a provision to sub-section 2 of section 235 of the Criminal Code, as enacted by chapter 19 of the statutes of 1912. This statute was passed in 1910 and assented to in 1912. The statute of 1910, or 1912, was intended to have dealt effectively with certain abuses that had developed throughout the country in connection with the extensive race meets held by various racing associations. The legislation as so passed has not proved effective. The racing men, or those who have been inclined to be speculative, have broken through this statute; if not by word, by action, they have declared it to be a scrap of paper. By digging up antediluvian charters and galvanizing them into life and by establishing different units in the same community, they are now having a greater number of days' racing in a locality than they had previous to the legislation that was passed in 1910 and which was calculated to limit the evils of the race course. The object I had in introducing this Bill was to make clear the intention of this Parliament and as the result of the full and careful investigation which I have made into the subject I do not expect that it will prove to be contentious in character. In view of the fact that there are in the country certain men interested in the question, some of whom are interested in suppressing the operation of race tracks entirely and some who do not like the idea of any limitation whatever, I desire to go fully into an explanation of what I regard as the actual situation and the evils incident thereto in connection with these associations.

The other day I read a very long article in the Toronto Globe by Mr. Raney, a very distinguished and honourable gentleman of the city of Toronto, written on behalf of the Social Reform Council of the Dominion of Canada. There is one statement that he made in connection with the legislation of 1910 with which I do not agree. He said that the reason why the Miller Bill, which sought to eliminate race track gambling throughout the Dominion, was not effective for the reason that Sir Allen Aylesworth, then Minister of Justice, opposed the Bill, and for the further reason that certain gentlemen high up in politics were interested in this institution, and men with strong financial means were backing them. It is my view that the Bill was considered on its merits. We all remember the late Mr. Miller, who introduced his Bill in the House in 1910. I think the House will agree that his presentation of the case was fraught with honour to himself, with discretion and skill. Mr. Miller was responsible for the appointment of a commission by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, then Prime Minister of Canada. I was present at the meetings that were held in Ottawa, which were attended by men from one end of the Dominion to the other, and men were even brought from the state of New York, at one time one of the greatest racing states in the Union. Mr. Hughes, a candidate in the recent Presidential election, succeeded in getting a law passed some time ago that made race track gambling a crime within the state of New York, and so important did he consider that legislation, that in his campaign literature reference was made to it as one of the outstanding accomplishments of his public life.

These men that I have spoken of, representing the Racing Associations, the Horse Breeder's Associations, the Thoroughbred Associations, and the Social Reform Council of Canada, gathered together and gave evidence, and upon their evidence Parliament came to the conclusion that certain legislation should be passed to deal effectively with the situation. I repeat, that in view of the full and complete investigation, lasting for days and weeks, that Parliament made of this question, both in the House and in committee. Mr. Raney is hardly justified in insinuating that the men who composed Parliament at that time were actuated by any other motive than the consideration of the case on its merits. The commission that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister, appointed at that time was composed of Mr. Miller, chairman, Mr. Blain, Mr. McColl, Mr. Martin, M.P. for Regina, now premier of Saskatchewan, Mr. Stratton, Mr. Sinclair, and Mr. Monk.

Racing in Canada was organized, as I understand from my study of the subject, in the year 1860. Queen Victoria set aside a certain sum of money to purchase what was known as the Queen's Cup. This trophy was given to encourage racing, with the idea of developing the breeding of thoroughbred horses in Canada. As I understand, previous to the year 1892, it was a crime to make a bet on a race track; and when the Criminal Code was consolidated, there was added to it a provision calculated and intended to allow the registration of a bet or the selling of a pool on a race track. That legislation was subsequently tested in the courts, and the decision of the courts in connection with it is clearly set forth in these reports. Sir Allan Aylesworth, speaking to the House upon the debate on the Miller Bill, and the provision which was inserted in that Bill and which was supposed to deal effectively with this evil, as it had developed in the country, made this reference to it:

> We have all heard of the ancient conundrum "When is a dog's tail not a dog's tail?" With the answer: "When it is a waggin," It seems to me that this is something of the same sort: "When is a place not a place?" The definition is that the word "place" is to include any place, whether it is or is not a fixed place. Now to my mind, the word "place" necessarily implies and carries with it the idea of localization and of definite fixity. I cannot understand a place that is not a fixed place, and I cannot therefore think that the object which the framers of this Bill had in view, in endeavouring to get over the decision of the courts I have described, can be accomplished by any juggling with words or verbal trickery such as, it seems to me, with all respect to the draftsman of this Bill, the definition I have referred to, literally amounts to.

It appears that the provision that was added to the Criminal Code of 1902 has been questioned in the courts, and that the courts had ruled that if the bookmaker in the selling of a pool or in the registration of a bet stood still or under an umbrella, then he was committing a crime; but if he was moving from place to place in the booth, he was not committing a crime, so that it would be clear that previous to the legislation passed by this Parliament in 1910, the registration of a bet, or the selling of a pool was really on the verge of criminality. As I am a layman so far as legal matters are concerned, and as my opinion might not be considered as very authoritative if I attempted to give a definition of the statute with regard to this subject, I desire to quote the opinion of the Hon. S. H. Blake, K.C., of Toronto, who, I think, will be regarded as a reasonable authority upon the construction of any statute. Speaking on the peculiarities of the statute as it had been construed by the highest courts in the land, because the case had gone to the Court of Appeal and from there to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the highest judges in the country had placed their construction upon the insertion of the particular clause to which I have alluded heretofore in the Criminal Code in the year 1902, the Hon. S. H. Blake thus added his voice to the chorus of church denunciation of the Woodbine race track at the afternoon session of the diocesan synod meeting:

> It will be seen by reference to section 235, sub-section 2, of the Criminal Code that some provision was supposed to have been made for betting on and during the meet of a regularly organized and incorporated race track. This was taken advantage of until race track gambling became a public scandal, demoralizing in the extreme, until a case known as the Queen vs. Hanrahan, in which the Police Magistrate of Windsor convicted the defendant for keeping a common betting house. This case was taken to the Court of Appeal, where the conviction was unanimously sustained, the late Chief Justice Armour in his judgment, was very emphatic, holding as he did, that betting on any track, whether incorporated or otherwise, was an offence against the Criminal Code. The writer, acting in accordance with this judgment, brought the president of the Ontario Jockey Club into Court, where Colonel Denison convicted, giving a stated case, which was taken to the Court of Appeal, where the conviction was quashed, the court holding that as the president neither took part in the bookmaking nor profited thereby, a conviction could not be sustained against him. At the same time, one of the judges made a remark to the effect that the Crown should have proceeded against the bookmakers. At the next race track meet, evidence was secured and several bookmakers were brought into court, one of whom was selected as a test case. Colonel Denison again made a conviction, and this case was also taken to the Court of Appeal, where the conviction was sustained. It was then carried to the Supreme Court at Ottawa, and the judgment of the Court of Appeal was upheld, with one or two of the judges dissenting. This, however, did not put a stop to the gambling on the Woodbine race track, which was shown by a change of tactics in which the bookmakers stood on the lawn (and enclosures set apart for the bookmakers and their customers) and continued business as usual, the only difference being that they stood marking time instead of sitting.
> A case was brought into court and a conviction secured before Col. Denison, who, when passing sentence, stated that the attempted subterfuge in order to evade the law (in his judgment) intensified the offence. This case was also taken to the Court of Appeal and quashed on the grounds that standing up and moving about whilst the business of betting was carried on did not constitute an offence, not being a house, room, or place.

So it appears reasonably clear that, as I have said, previous to the legislation of 1910 on this subject the right to carry on race track betting or gambling had a very narrow margin indeed to stand on.

After full consideration of the subject, I believe that the majority in this House based their judgment upon three considerations, which considerations in turn were based upon the expert testimony given before the commission to which I have referred. The first consideration, I think, was this—that horse-racing was necessary to the development of the thoroughbred horse, that it had the effect of developing his speed, stamina and character, and that, to the extent that thoroughbred blood was infused into the light horse of this country, to that extent the light horse of this country was improved. The second consideration, I think, was this—that a very large number of the best citizens of this Dominion held horse-racing as their real sport, and that Parliament should not go so far as to deprive them of the privilege of associating themselves to carry on a race track. The third point was this, that the evils which, it was admitted, had developed upon the race track were due to excessive race meets. The evidence of the detectives of New York, the evidence of the thoroughbred men of Canada—I mean the thoroughbred horse-breeders in Canada—and of all others interested, I think, supported that view. The evils that had developed in Victoria and Vancouver during the time of the Seattle exhibition were the consequences of the fact that there had been forty-two days' racing. To this was due the deplorable, demoralizing and degrading condition alluded to by Hon. Sydney Fisher, the late Minister of Agriculture, in his sworn testimony as published in the report of the commission, in which he stated that he would not like to find himself after dark with those who were connected with the racing on that occasion, in Victoria and Vancouver. I think this Parliament believed that the limitation of the days of racing would be the means of eliminating the very undesirable element which was complained of, and whose presence was regretted by everybody, including the racing men themselves, as the cause of the demoralization attending this sport throughout the Dominion. It was pointed out that during the first days of a race meet in any community, the class of citizens to which I have alluded, the class that hold horse-racing as their real sport, predominates upon the track; but that in a few days their desires in that connection are gratified. Then, if the racing is allowed to continue day after day, week after week, and month after month, it resolves itself into a gambling institution pure and simple. The legislation passed in 1910, and rightly passed, was intended to limit the evil by limiting the race meets to seven days twice a year. Well, that legislation did not hold. I think the racing men 'put one over' on Parliament, as they say. So I come to this House as a representative of a free constituency that has been outraged to ask that this evil may be remedied. Before the passing of the Act to which I have alluded, the Act of 1910, we had in the city of Windsor twenty days' racing in the spring, and nine in the fall. Public opinion was developing against it because this was regarded as excessive. The Miller Bill was passed and the number of days' racing limited to fourteen. From that day I never heard a single complaint from the people of the county of Essex regarding the operation of that one track and the fourteen days of racing. But certain speculators, mostly from the American side, to some of whom I shall probably refer at greater length before I close my remarks, have taken advantage of the situation. I am not going to find fault because of the law passed years ago under which certain charters were granted. There is no reason to find fault. Previous to 1900, when certain restrictive legislation was passed in the great racing states of New York and Michigan, we in Canada did not suffer from the abuses which have since arisen. It is not to be wondered at that our statute made it very easy for men to secure race track charters in Canada. But the limitations placed upon race track operations by the great states of New York and Michigan led to the whole institution being imported bodily into the province of Ontario and that is the cause of the difficulty to-day in Canadian racing. Years ago, as I understand—and again I want to say that I am not a lawyer——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: You ought to have been.

Mr. WILCOX: —any man could apply to the Secretary of State, and by letters patent, obtain a race track charter in Canada. That was previous to the legislation that was passed in 1910, which provided that in future no race track charters should be granted in that way, but only by special Act of this Parliament. I venture to assert that not a man who sat in this House at that time ever thought of the existence of these old charters. But that legislation had this effect; it at once placed a value upon those old charters, and in some cases they are asking to-day as high as $50,000 for one of them, because Parliament made it absolutely impossible for any new charters to be granted. Therefore, the owners of one of these charters could go to a good racing point like the city of Windsor, with 827,000 people across the line in Detroit eight hours or ten hours from Chicago, six hours from Buffalo, five hours from Toledo, and six or seven hours from Cleveland, and dispose of such a charter at a great profit. Situated as we are in close relation to the cities I have mentioned, we can have races with 6,000, 8,000, 9,000 and 10,000 people every day, in the summer, and we do have as many people there as 20,000 on some occasions. It is that evil, that excess, that abuse which I am asking this Parliament to remedy under the provisions of the Bill which I have introduced.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is racing forbidden by the laws of Michigan?

Mr. WILCOX: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Absolutely prohibited?

Mr. WILCOX: Yes. Racing is prevented by the laws of Michigan and New York. They do bet, but it is not within the law. Therefore the fact that the law makes it an offence to bet in Michigan, is a restraint upon those running races within the confines of their own state.

When I introduced this Bill in the House the other day, I was attacked through the press by a Mr. Francis Nelson, who is the sporting editor of the Toronto Globe. I think I have met Mr. Nelson once or twice, and from all I know of him he is a courteous, kind gentleman, but he has not been fair to me in the columns of his paper. I want to say to this House that he is a servant of the Racing Association, and that the insinuations and the aspersions which he has cast are not fair to me. I desire to allude to them this afternoon. I happened to make reference to the fact that the interests involved in this excess racing were permeated by American influences. Well, Sir, I do not think that it was an offence to say that. But in the columns of his paper, Mr. Nelson at once set up the argument that I did not complain about all these business men of Detroit who come over to the city of Windsor and invest their money in my constituency. No, we do not complain of that, and we have no criticism to offer of the great body politic of the United States, the great open-hearted, free, patriotic public of the United States. When I used the term American, I had reference to that particular class of people whom many of the states in the Union have seen fit to legislate out of existence in the confines of their own state; and I absolutely refuse to have my constituency made a refuge for the surplus of that class of the population of the United States.

[Mr. Wilcox.]

I want to make some reference to some of those gentlemen. There is a race track at Fort Erie. There are three race tracks at Windsor. There is a fourth application now filed with the Treasury Department at Toronto. A fifth one, I understand, is being organized. Three race tracks gave us last year forty-two days racing. Four will give us fifty-six days racing and five, if they are established, will give us seventy days. Will anybody say in this House, in view of the decision which Parliament came to in 1910, that I am not justified in coming to the members of this House and asking their support of this Bill which will establish clearly and distinctly what Parliament meant by its legislation of 1910? With further reference to that term "American influence" I want to make myself absolutely clear on that point, because in the city of Windsor and in the town of Walkerville and in the town of Ojibway, which will in the future be the great industrial centre of Ontario, we have prominent Americans and we welcome them; but let us see some of the men who are connected with this Racing Association—and I am fully alive to the fact that we have prominent Canadians connected with this association, men who are high in social circles and business circles and are the cream of society. I know it, and against them I have not a word to say. But I want to place my complaint clearly before the House this afternoon. And I do not desire to use my own words; I desire to quote from the official records and the sworn testimony given at commissions that have been held in Ottawa and in Washington.

We have connected with the Fort Erie race track, Mr. Madigan, who is the president. I must quote some evidence in regard to that, because the statement might be disputed. On page 273 of the report of the special committee on Bill No. 6, relating to Race Track Gambling, I find that Mr. E. T. Malone was called and examined. Mr. Malone was the solicitor, and he came to Ottawa to give evidence. The following is his statement:

Mr. Malone.—I have a telegram from Mr. Madigan authorizing me to appear as solicitor for the association, also a telegram from Dr. Bruso, Buffalo, stating that Mr. Madigan is confined to his room with acute bronchitis and he has advised him to return south when he is able to travel. I am solicitor of the association which took out its charter under the Ontario Companies Act on the 27th day of April, 1906.

We were endeavouring to get some of the parties connected with these associations to Ottawa, in order to obtain some evidence as to their connection with American race tracks, and otherwise. With regard to the Windsor track, the following telegram appears in the report of the special committee on Bill No. 6, at page 290:

Mr. Raney.—Then I think there is a statement due from Mr. Counsell as to the books and statements that were asked for from the Windsor Association.

Mr Counsell.—The only statement I have to make is contained in the telegram that I received last night from Windsor, it is to the following effect:

Chief Wills sick, Magistrate Leggatt left last night, bookkeeper for Windsor Racing Association died recently, his successor ill with typhoid fever. Knows nothing regarding the books. Geo. M. Hendrie in the south, ordered there by his physician, present address unknown.

It would appear on the face of it to be a rather unhealthy organization. I wish to say in fairness that I recognize that the Windsor Driving Park Association has a large number of Canadians interested in it. I also recognize that the other tracks to which I have alluded have Canadians interested in them. But I do say that at the bottom, in and through them, they are connected with associations that operate south of the line, as far away as Mexico, and that in the summer they come to the southern part of Ontario. Who are some of these men? On page 9, I find that an application was made to the district attorney of Brooklyn, who had a very full and complete knowledge of the operations of race tracks in New York state, to give evidence, from which I shall give a few extracts with reference to the Windsor Racing Association, and to some of the men who were prominent in it, and also as to their operations in the United States. The district attorney of Brooklyn had this to say with reference to Samuel Wagner, familiarly known as Sam Wagner, a noted owner of gambling houses in Chicago and other cities in the United States, and one who was for several years the principal owner of the race track at Windsor:

When the prosecuting attorney for Wayne county, Michigan, started after the race track gamblers, the Highland Park Club, which had conducted racing at Highland Park, about seven miles north of Detroit, leased the Windsor track and the races at Windsor are now run under the control of the Highland Park Club. According to the records of the county clerk's office, Wayne county, the Highland Park Club was incorporated in 1897, under the laws of Michigan. George M. Hendrie, of Detroit, is the president and Walter O. Parmer, of Nashville, is the secretary.

With regard to Fort Erie, the district attorney's report has this reference:

The racing club is practically controlled by John H. Madigan, the Texan. Madigan has a reputation all over the country as a fighter of game-cocks, and is in the habit of wagering thousands of dollars upon the outcome of one of these contests. He is simply a gambler and on the race track is a plunger. Dan. J. Stuart, whose name appears in the annual returns of the association to the Ontario Government as a director of the association, was the man who staged the fight between Corbett and Fitzsimmons.

That is a sample. There was an investigation held at Washington, at which some very interesting evidence was given as to the operations of this institution. At Washington, on December 14, 1909, before a sub-committee of the Judiciary of the United States Senate on Bill 225, "To prevent the nullification of State anti-gambling laws by international or interstate transmission of race-gambling bets or racing odds," Mr. Henry Brolaski, an experienced racing man, gave evidence. He said:

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Committee.—In answer to the inquiry of Senator Nelson, I will state in a moment what bookmaking is. I will preface my remarks by stating that I reside at Monrovia, Cal., 18 miles from Los Angeles. I am engaged in the real estate business, being associated with the "Home Builders" at 129 South Broadway, Los Angeles, Cal. Prior to entering that business, I was for twenty-one years a gambler, pool-room proprietor, bookmaker upon race tracks, and a handbook maker. I have booked in St. Louis, Chicago, Worth, Roby, Atlanta, Charleston, New Orleans, San Francisco, Oakland, Los Angeles, Latonia, Louisville and Benning."

Senator Nelson.—You might tell us a little more fully what a pool room is?

Mr. Brolaski.—A pool room is a place where 20 or 30 or more people congregate in an afternoon to bet on horse races run on race tracks at a distance, the news being sent from the tracks to the pool room by telegraph.

The pool room service is handled by an information bureau known as the Interstate News Company in the East, which leases wires from the Western Union Telegraph Company. Over these wires they send the names of the jockeys and scratches (meaning horses not to start this day), and then the betting and the official description of the race. The pool room allows from twenty to thirty minutes between races for their patrons to gamble.

It costs these pool rooms for this service $22 per day for each set of races that they may take. At present they are racing at Jacksonville and Tampa, Fla., Oakland, Cal., and Juarez, Mexico, 1¼ miles from the International boundary line.

Senator Burkett: Please tell the committee where the race tracks are.

I made the statement that they were affiliated with these tracks down there and here is the sworn testimony of Senator Burkett:

The main one now is in Mexico. It is two kilos from the boundary line, about opposite El Paso, about a mile and a quarter away. Another, but in the United States, is at Tampa, Fla., and there is another at Jacksonville, Fla., now in operation. Another is in Oakland, Cal., running in defiance of law.

During the summer time they race at Windsor, Canada, opposite Detroit. That race track is about 3⅛ miles from the middle of the channel of the river dividing the United States from Canada. Another one in Canada is at Fort Erie, 4¼ miles from the International boundary line, near Buffalo.

Betting is being done in defiance of the law at Emeryville race track at Oakland, Cal.

Tracks running near the United States border line and sending prices to pool rooms in the United States are: One track at Juarez, Mexico, now running; one at Fort Erie, Canada; and one at Windsor, Canada. Those last are only run in summer.

I could quote ad nauseam on this subject but I do not intend to speak any longer. I think it is reasonable to ask Parliament for a Bill to limit race track operations and thus to carry out the intention of the legislation passed in 1910. I want to remind the House that I was a strong opponent of the Miller Bill. I was the second to speak in this House, following Mr. McColl, and I take the following extract from my speech delivered on April 6, 1910, Hansard Vol. 4, page 6453:

Evils, as they exist in all walks of life, can sometimes, by judicious legislation, be regulated, but not entirely suppressed, without great injustice, and this method is what is required in Canada, so far as protracted race meetings are concerned.

Reflecting men who know of what they speak express the view that the most direct and effective way to ultimate reform would be to materially shorten the meetings, as well, of course, as to cut out some other admittedly objectionable features.

Then on page 6459:

While I am entirely in sympathy with the moral reform association which has made its influence felt upon this question, I am inclined to the view that the legislation proposed goes just a little too far. There have been, in my opinion, excesses under the present law. I believe there is a certain amount of disorder which should be prevented, and I believe it would be possible to amend the law so that these abuses would be avoided, and at the same time certain very important interests in the country would not be injuriously affected, the ends of sport met, and a very great improvement brought out in the direction in which my hon. friend from South Grey seeks to legislate.

The position I took in 1910 is the position I take to-day. I ask for a limitation of these days to 14. I recognize that some may use the argument that this will create a monopoly. Does not a monopoly exist to-day in regard to these charters? There are only some 15 or 20 charters, as I understand it. No more can be granted without a special Act from this Parliament, and when Parliament steps in and grants charters to a certain number of associations and refuses to grant them to others a monopoly exists no matter how you may fix it. But the plan which Parliament should adopt in this matter is to place such legislation upon the statute-book as will prevent a duplication of tracks in any one place in order to prevent the abuses that were admitted to exist in Vancouver and which will exist in any other part of this country if thirty, forty, fifty or sixty days' racing is carried on. What does the license mean? Any institution that is licensed has a monopoly, and the proper way to deal with the question is to place a tax upon the racing association having regard to the benefits which the privilege is to the association. What is the operation of a racing association worth to them without a license? What is it worth with a license? The difference between what it is worth without a license and what it is worth with a license is the value of the license to the association, and I submit that a reasonable basis for the House to proceed upon with regard to this Bill is to pass it in order to prevent the duplication of tracks in any one locality and then to impose a tax on these associations equivalent to the full benefit that such a license is to the association after a reasonable profit is made by the association.

There are just one or two other points that I desire to allude to. The wording of the Bill is as follows:

Provided that where there is more than one race course in any city, town or county, or where there are two or more race courses less than fifty miles apart, the race meetings on all the race courses in such city, town or county, or on all the race courses within fifty miles of one another, shall not exceed in number or in duration the limit prescribed in the above provisions for one race course or race track.

The question might arise in the mind of some hon. gentleman: Who will apportion these days? I leave that to the provincial treasurer who issues the yearly licenses to these associations. I think it will be found not to be financially profitable to operate one of these tracks for less than fourteen days and the legislation will have the effect of causing the associations to negotiate one with the other, to dispose of their separate interests and to establish only one track where more than one exists.

There is just one other point, and that is with reference to the inevitable difficulties of the Immigration Department in dealing with these institutions when they cross over the line. Complaint after complaint reaches the department that the associations refuse to employ Canadian labour and that if they had their own way they would not employ Canadian labour at all. They bring their own trained staff with them from the South, and naturally want to use them when they come to Canada. I just want to quote a few extracts from the official correspondence of the Immigration Department, to show the difficulties they have in this respect; and if there is one thing more than another that Mr. Scott, the Superintendent of Immigration, is entitled to credit for, it is for the strong position he has taken that Canadian labour must be recognized and Canadian returned soldiers given the preference. The first extract is from a report by Mr. James G. Mitchell, one of the best officers on the immigration staff, who was instructed to see that Canadian labour should be recognized by these racing associations. He says:

Ottawa, July 3, 1916.

Sir,

I met Mr. Lowden by appointment Monday, June 26th, and told him plainly that if all Canadians that were competent were not given positions, I would examine every alien working there, whether the races were going on or not. They then agreed to give all Canadians that were competent positions, even if they had to lay off Americans, and since the opening day there were twenty-seven Canadians given work.

Further on, he says:

I am informed that some of these American ticket sellers were expert and not above reproach. I am also informed that Canadians are not employed in the United States race tracks. There may be an odd one given a job for a purpose, also that in Kentucky a commission governs all racing, and this commission imposes a penalty of $500 on any association employing a non-resident of the State. The following estimate is approximately correct: In the money room there are three Canadians and 8 Americans; ticket sellers 17 Canadians and 15 Americans; cashiers 20 Canadians and 9 Americans. This is not complete. The checkers are as far as I can see, all Canadians. As they receive only $5.00 a day outsiders would not take this job.

And further on:

Among these Americans there are a few of them of German descent; two were removed, in one case a German-American by the name of Fink. They were quite willing to dispense with their services providing I told him that he was objectionable, but as the Jockey club had hired him, I did not consider it my duty to select those who should be laid off, while I gave them to understand that parties of German descent should go first. The Jockey Club wants to select men who are competent, and they would have to take their advices from Americans who are in charge of the pari-mutuel system, and no doubt they like to bring their whole staff right along from one track to another.

I shall now read a report made to Mr. Scott, Superintendent of Immigration, by Mr. James C. Mitchell, inspector of Agencies:

Sir,

With reference to the Fort Erie races, I beg to advise you that there were approximately eleven American ticket sellers and nineteen Canadian ticket sellers; nine American cashiers, and twenty-one Canadian cashiers; miscellaneous money counters, etc., nineteen Americans, and sixteen Canadians; clickers, which is a local man's job, there were two Americans, and twenty-nine Canadians employed at the recent race meet.

They have now started applying for admission to Canada, and Inspector Johns has admitted about twenty of them at Fort Erie on temporary admission. Many of them room in Buffalo, and only cross over at Fort Erie to work at the races. As these are not bona-fide residents of Buffalo, I do not think that the reciprocal arrangements in reference to border towns would include these men, as they come from Kentucky, Baltimore, New York, etc. In view of the fact that they are now applying for admission, the pari-mutuels are apparently making every endeavour to discriminate against Canadian operators, as in Fort Erie, three competent Canadians were given inferior positions. I feel that it is only right that the department should make every effort to exclude United States operators until our own citizens, who are available and competent, are first employed and not given inferior positions. I think the inspectors in charge at border points should be instructed to reject United States pari-mutuel operators under section 3, subsection (g), "persons likely to be a public charge."

In conversation with some of our inspectors at border points, I find that they are of the opinion that they must admit United States citizens of good health, provided they have the necessary twenty-five dollars, as race track followers are likely to become a public charge at any time.

To fully explain my contention that the Canadians are being unjustly discriminated against, I wish to draw your attention to the fact that at Fort Erie three competent Canadians were given inferior positions; also, they did not answer Canadian letters applying for positions. I would also point out that if I or some other officer of this department had not been sent to Hamilton, very few Canadians would have been employed.

When I interviewed Mr. Madigan, President of the Niagara Racing Association at Fort Erie, he explained to me that most of his patrons were citizens of Buffalo, and he had to put on some Americans to please the Buffalo Press. There were several German-Americans employed on the better positions while a Canadian returned soldier, by the name of Lawrence, who has worked on the pari-mutuel since its inception, was given an inferior position. There were several German-Americans to get a position on this track than a good Canadian; in fact, Mr. Martin's secretary told me that if they did not like the positions they were given they could quit. I think any track in Canada should not be dictated to by the Buffalo press or the pari-mutuel operations in charge from the other side.

On July 18, 1916, Mr. W. D. Scott writes the following letter to Mr. G. Seebach, Inspector in charge of Immigration, Bridgeburg, Ont.:

Sir,—As you are probably aware, the department has met with considerable trouble in the matter of the employment on race tracks of Americans imported for the occasion to the detriment of Canadians.

Inspector J. C. Mitchell has been following up the case lately and finds that in many cases (particularly at Fort Erie) the management of the race track claim that as the patronage comes largely from Buffalo, they are obliged to employ American ticket sellers, cashiers and clickers; some of the help admitted is German-American and pro-German in sympathy.

I think the time has come that we should no longer be dictated to by the Buffalo press or the management of these race tracks, and you may, therefore, enforce the immigration regulations in the strictest possible way as regards race track employees. The character of the men and the nature of the employment is not of the best, and if everything else fails you may invoke section 3 s.s. (g), especially when you know that there are qualified Canadians available for the work.

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) W. D. Scott,
Superintendent of Immigration.

Immigration Branch,

Toronto, Ont., August 4, 1916.

Sir,—I beg to advise you that I am going to the Fort Erie race tracks to-night, as the pari-mutuel operators have not received any word of their appointment from the Niagara Racing Association. They are, apparently, doing as at last meet, not replying to applications, probably hoping that these men will not show up on the track to-morrow. They are all going to be there.

I met Mr. Madigan at the Windsor meet and told him that where men were qualified to work on other tracks they would have to be given the same positions at Fort Erie. He still persists in claiming his right to place them wherever he sees fit, no matter what positions they have held on other tracks. As you may know the class of man he is, I have pointed out to him how he had made a returned soldier work as a clicker at the last meet, who has held the position as cashier at practically all the other tracks. Since his return from the front he has been a cashier at the Woodbine, both Hamilton meets, and at Windsor. He told me that he did not care about soldiers. I think a man of this stamp does not deserve any consideration.

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) Jas. C. Mitchell,
Inspector of Employment Agencies.

If there is no objection, I have a few more letters that I would like to be permitted to file without reading:

[Mr. Wilcox.]

Immigration Branch,
Department of the Interior,
Canada.

Toronto, Ont., July 7, 1916.

Sir,—There is some dissatisfaction owing to three Canadians, Messrs. Lawrence, Quinn and Canning, having been put on as clickers, while I am satisfied that they are competent ticket sellers and cashiers, having worked on other tracks in Canada. Mr. Martin would not say these men were not competent ticket sellers and cashiers. His contention is that he has given all Canadians work, and he has the right to say what work he may put them at. It looks very much like discriminating against the Canadians, giving the Americans the positions at twelve dollars per day, and these three Canadians positions at five dollars per day, especially while some of these Americans are German-Americans. Mr. Lawrence is a returned soldier from the front, and quite naturally feels hurt.

Mr. Madigan says he is a Canadian. He told me that he prefers Canadians, but that so much of his patronage comes from across the river that he has to employ some Americans. I am quite satisfied that the management of this track is purely American, as their office is at Ellicott square, Buffalo, N.Y. As for Mr. Madigan claiming that he is a Canadian, it does not look very well when he will allow a German-American to be given preference over a Canadian soldier who has returned from the front.

I may state that the Canadians are very grateful to the department for the action they have taken in seeing that they were given positions on the Canadian race tracks. One of the Canadians was taken in to the office on Tuesday and accused of being the secretary who was responsible for bringing this matter to the attention of the department.

Mr. Martin complained yesterday that one of the Canadians was impertinent to one of his men, and as there is a good deal of feeling over this matter, I have decided to visit Fort Erie until the close of the races to see that no Canadian is unjustly treated.

Toronto, Ont., July 24, 1916.

Sir,—I am informed that Mr. Smith, an American, is a very large stockholder in the Hamilton track, and that Sam Spencer, who is known as the New York Jew on the race track, and who caused the trouble on the Dorval track, where the Canadians were refused work in the first place, is Smith's representative. He was around the Hamilton race track at the last meet. I made inquiries and they always claimed that he was not employed there, although he was in and out of the pari-mutual offices all the time and paid the men off the last day of the meet, and my impression is that he may have had something to do in offering some of the Canadians inferior jobs. Smith was in the Hamilton Jockey Club office to-day, and I was told by one of the operators, who was one of the outside officers, that Smith was going over the lists to-day.

I shall be in Hamilton on Wednesday at the opening of the meet, and will endeavour to see that these Canadians are not discriminated against, and, if necessary, I will examine the Americans as to their entry into Canada. I think the Hamilton Jockey Club has had fair warning.

I am enclosing herewith a copy of the notice sent out to the Americans.

Sir,—Mr. J. C. Mitchell, an officer of this department, is attending the Windsor Jockey Club meeting. Mr. Mitchell has been instructed to furnish the department with a full report in the matter of all aliens employed by your association, I shall be glad if you will kindly furnish this officer with a list showing the names and nationalities of all employees in your pari-mutual department. Mr. Mitchell will call upon you and obtain the above list.

Windsor, Ont., August 16, 1916.

Sir,—I wish you would advise George M. Hendrie of the Windsor Jockey Club, as soon as possible, to supply me with a list of all the employees employed in the pari-mutual department in order that I may check the same up to see how many Americans are actually employed. The other racing associations have supplied me with this list and I do not see why any exception should be made in this case.

You might also advise me what action you desire taken in the Garland case, sending same in care of Immigration Office at Windsor.

Ottawa, August 29, 1916.

Sir,—There were approximately employed at the Windsor track at this meet sixty-three Americans and seventy-four Canadians in the better positions, made up as follows:

Cashiers—18 Americans, 34 Canadians.
In money room—12 Americans, 4 Canadians.
Ticket sellers—19 Americans, 18 Canadians.
Calculators—4 Americans, 2 Canadians.
In ticket room—4 Americans.
To change money—1 American, 3 Canadians.
Ticket checkers—2 Americans, 1 Canadian.
Messengers—2 Americans, 3 Canadians.
Blackboard man—American.
Field board man—Canadian.
Machinists to look after pari-mutuels—2 Canadians.
Telephone man—American.
Miscellaneous—3 Canadians.

Clickers—6 Americans, 31 Canadians. (There were Canadian clickers refused positions.)

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) Jas. C. Mitchell,

W. D. Scott, Esq.,
Superintendent of Immigration,

Department of the Interior,
Canada.

Ottawa, August 29, 1916.

Sir,—In reply to the letter of the Windsor Jockey Club in reference to myself, I may state that at the first meet this year I was promised the list of the employees on the pari-mutuels, but was refused at the last moment, only given the number of Americans and Canadians employed in the different departments.

On the first day of the second meet I spoke to Mr. George M. Hendrie, the president, in regard to the list, and the only satisfaction I got was he said he would see. I wrote the department and under date of August 18, Mr. Hendrie was notified to furnish me with the list. I did not receive this list until the 22nd, the second last day of the meet, and it only stated that the men were American or Canadian and did not give the permanent residence of the Americans. I had most of these men's permanent addresses and I checked the list over and secured from Mr. Elrod, who was in charge of the pari-mutuels, the number of the wicket that the different men were working at whose permanent address in the United States I did not have. I took every care not to disturb these few men when they were busy. I found a number of these had entered Canada without inspection, but it being the second last day of the meet I did not disturb them.

I might say that there were six American clickers employed at the last meet from different parts of the United States—one from Washington,—and that Canadians were refused. I was unaware of this state of affairs through Mr. Hendrie not complying with my request to furnish me with a list on the first day, and I only discovered on receipt of the list that these American clickers were on.

I must take strong objection to Mr. Hendrie's statement that the Canadians who are complaining are incompetent and undesirable, and it is very unbecoming in the President of the Windsor Jockey Club to insult the Canadian people in such a manner, as they are more than equal to some of the Americans he employs on his track.

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) Jas. C. Mitchell,

Inspector of Employment Agencies.

W. D. Scott, Esq.,
Superintendent of Immigration,
Ottawa.

In conclusion, I ask that the Bill be given the second reading and be permitted to go to committee for consideration.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings): Mr. Speaker, While, I am sure every member of the House has listened with interest, pleasure and profit to the historial review of racing given by my hon. friend (Mr. Wilcox), I am equally sure that on consideration of the Bill, it will be found that it is unfortunately lacking in the machinery which would make it practical and usefully operative. Take the very case spoken of by my hon. friend in his own constituency where five race tracks are to be operated under recently resurrected charters. I think every member of the House feels that something should be done in regard to the matter; but all this Bill says is that only fourteen days should be given to racing in that constituency. Who is to decide which race track is to have the fourteen days racing? My hon. friend says that the provincial secretary in issuing the license for the year can do so. What right has this House to impose that duty upon the provincial secretary or what right has it to assume that he will undertake to perform that duty? If this Bill passes, will not these apparently somewhat unscrupulous racing men from the United States perhaps obtain an advantage in this country at the Woodbine Jockey Club or at the Blue Bonnets meet in Montreal, race tracks conducted in such a way that no one can take offence at the meets held there. If only fourteen days were allowed to Montreal or Toronto, one of the organizations on the other side might snap up the fourteen days and the Woodbine or the Blue Bonnets might have no opportunity of furnishing the pleasure which these race tracks furnish. I think, therefore, in view of the statements made by the hon. gentleman as to the serious injury that is being done to his constituecny, and in view of the lack of machinery in the Bill to carry out any of its provisions, it would be advisable that the Bill be read the second time, and, after the return of the Minister of Justice, it be referred to a committee of this House.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): Mr. Speaker, to supplement what the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) has said, I think that not only would the amendment, if passed, destroy that class of what we might call legitimate racing at Montreal and Toronto, but hon. gentlemen will remember that this section states that if two race courses are in existence within fifty miles of each other, then fourteen days' racing must be divided among the two. It so happens that Toronto and Hamilton are within fifty miles of each other, and if this amendment should pass, Toronto and Hamilton could have only fourteen days between them. Who would decide as to who should have the fourteen days? The hon. member for Essex (Mr. Wilcox) says that he would leave it to the provincial treasurer; that the provincial government can deal with the matter at present. The whole trouble which has arisen is the very weak manner in which this law has been administered by the provincial government, which has allowed defunct charters to be revived for the purpose of establishing race tracks around Windsor, which charters should never have been revived, and which the provincial government should not have allowed to be revived, because it knew that those charters were being revived practically for the purpose of evading the law. The provincial government has at present the power to license race tracks, and no race track can operate in the province of Ontario or anywhere without a license from the provincial government. If there are more race tracks in operation in and around Windsor than the hon. member for North Essex thinks is good for the community, or than he thinks should exist there, then his remedy is to appeal to the provincial government to hereafter cease granting licenses to those various race tracks, and he will then have only one instead of four.

Mr. WILCOX: Those charters were submitted to three of the best lawyers in the province by Mr. McGarry, the provincial treasurer, and they advised that the associations having got the charters, after the tracks were built according to charter, the provincial government had no right to revoke the licenses.

Mr. GERMAN: Section 28 of the Provincial Company's Act says:

> That if a corporation incorporated by Letters Patent does not go into actual bona fide operation within two years after incorporation, or for two consecutive years does not use its corporate powers, such powers, except so far as is necessary for the winding up of that corporation, shall be ipso facto forfeited.

And a company whose powers are ipso facto forfeited has no more legal status in the province of Ontario than though it had never been incorporated, and the renewal of the charter is simply the incorporation of a new company.

What is known as the Miller Act, passed in 1910, provides:

> That all the penalties imposed by section 235 shall be operative, excepting as follows:

Speaking of betting and confining ourselves to that:

> Shall be legal on a race track, at a race meeting, held upon the race course of a racing association now incorporated;
>
> Or upon a race course located in or within three miles of a county town or city having a population of not less than fifteen thousand people.

It seems to me that by no stretch of legal interpretation can it be held that four race tracks can, under law, exist within three miles of the corporate limits of the city of Windsor.

Mr. WILCOX: But they are there.

Mr. GERMAN: Then they are there only by grace of the Ontario government because the Ontario government is deriving the revenue. If that government wished to pay the expenses of the province from gambling revenues, they could start a Kentucky lottery; they could establish another Monte Carlo. But, I apprehend, the Government of Ontario does not choose to derive a revenue from race tracks, they simply wish to regulate the race tracks, and to see that no more race tracks are in operation than should be carried on for the general good of the public. Then, it is up to the Ontario government to regulate these race tracks and prevent the conditions in and about Windsor which now exist and which, I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Wilcox), are a disgrace to that section of the country as well as to the provincial government.

Mr. WILCOX: Would it not be as reasonable, and as logical, to insert a proviso into the Act to limit the number of race tracks in Canada, and to limit the number of days' racing in any county to fourteen, as it was in 1910, to limit the meets on a race track to two of seven days each in a year?

Mr. GERMAN: I should say, most emphatically, no. Companies, properly and legally incorporated, have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in establishing magnificent race tracks under the law as it stands, such as the Woodbine, the Hamilton, the Fort Erie, the Highland Park, the Blue Bonnets, and the Dorval tracks. Why destroy that property for the sake of the gambling element which, as my hon. friend has suggested, comes from the United States to establish what we might call outlaw tracks? I believe that seventy-five per cent of the people of Canada desire to see such tracks as those I have named, continue in existence. I think it would be better to cut out the illegitimate tracks that my hon. friend is proposing to regulate by this Bill, especially as it seems to me that his Bill will not attain the end he contemplates, while it will destroy the property already in existence.

Mr. WILCOX: I have no desire that my Bill should in the slightest degree——

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Unless the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilcox) is exercising his right to conclude the debate, he cannot speak again.

Mr. WILCOX: I shall have another opportunity.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would appear from what the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Wilcox) has said, that a result has come about which was not contemplated by Parliament when the Acts of 1910 and 1912 were passed. As I understand him, some racing interests have executed what might be termed a flank movement against the intention expressed by Parliament in those statutes. It seems to me that a remedy is desirable, and even necessary. On the other hand I share the doubt of the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) as to whether the Bill in its present form could be given practical effect. I regret that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is prevented by illness from being in his place to-day, because he is much more familiar with the legislation and the conditions to which it relates than I am. It might, however, be worth while to point out that the Act of 1912 contains the following:

> And provided that no such association holds, and that on any one race track there be not held, in any one calendar year more than two race-meetings at which there are running races and that there is an interval of at least twenty days between meetings.

There are certain other provisions of that section to which I need not now call attention. My hon. friend from Essex proposes to amend that section by adding:

> Provided that where there is more than one race course in any city, town or county, or where there are two or more race courses less than fifty miles apart, the race meetings on all the race courses in such city, town or county, or on all the race courses within fifty miles of one another, shall not exceed in number or in duration the limit prescribed in the above provisions for one race course or race track.

The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) has pointed out that the conditions with regard to the race tracks at Toronto, Hamilton, and elsewhere, to which the Bill under consideration does not seem to be directed, would be interfered with by the amendment as proposed. The hon. member for East Hastings also points out that the Bill does not constitute any authority which shall determine in what proportion the time suggested by the Bill shall be divided among the several race tracks, or what particular race tracks shall be permitted to carry on these operations. It seems to me that the Bill is susceptible to amendment which would remove any difficulty of that kind while carrying out the purpose the hon. member for North Essex has in view—and I am sure that the thanks of the House and of the country are due to that hon. gentleman for the very great industry and ability he has shown in making Parliament and the country acquainted with the conditions which require redress and which it is the purpose of this Bill to remedy. I am disposed, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for East Hastings, namely, that this Bill be read the second time, and that it shall then stand, awaiting the return of the Minister of Justice, that it may be referred to a special committee of the House to consider the conditions described by the hon. member for North Essex, and the necessity for a remedy and to suggest to the House the appropriate amendments.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw): Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who did not support the former Bill as presented by the late Mr. Miller, and I opposed it for reasons which seemed good to me at that time. My position now is that of supporting the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. gentleman from North Essex (Mr. Wilcox), and my reason for doing so is that I think anything which tends to curtail and reduce the magnitude of this racing habit while the war is on, is something that deserves our commendation. I would go further, and be in favour of legislation which would do away with all these race meets while the war is raging. The sight which is presented to the country of 5,000 to 20,000 people, men and women, some of the women dressed mostly in men's clothes and the rest dressed like dolls, spending all the money they can succeed in wasting, shouting and hurrahing and waiting in breathless interest for the conclusion of a horse race, while the soldiers are making their race for life, taking perhaps a year to go a few metres or at most a kilometre or two, seems to me a spectacle such as is not to the credit of the country or such as the people of the country desire to see in any way encouraged. I am quite aware that there are large sums of money invested in a financial way in these institutions, and one has to be careful of the results which might be effected. If it were necessary, I would rather be a party to voting a reasonable Bill for a system of compensation to these people to keep ruin away from their doors, because that would be a thousand times cheaper to the nation in the end than to continue this menace of race meetings that we know now exists. Personally I do not live in a part of the country where they have these race meets; but that has nothing to do with the merits of the argument one way or the other, and I think the wishes of the people we represent would not be misinterpreted if the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice were to take into their very careful consideration the advisability of introducing legislation to suspend all such race meetings while the war is on. I think the moral effect upon the men whom we might wish to reach in the way of recruiting is bad. I think that the waste of all this money is not conducive to the best organization of our young nation at this juncture; and I support the principle of the Bill because it goes a small direction in the way of reducing what I think is an undesirable state of affairs. I should be glad if the Government could go even further, and suspend all such race meetings throughout Canada during the continuance of the war.

Mr. WILCOX: I very gladly accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), and I agree with the Prime Minister in regard to it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That on Wednesday, the 7th February, and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the House shall meet at three o'clock, p.m., and that the sittings on such days shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other days:—That on and after Thursday, the 1st February, up to and including Thursday, the 15th February next, Government Notices of Motion and Government Orders shall have precedence on Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays over all business except Questions by Members and Notices of Motion for the production of papers; and that on Saturday, the 3rd day of February and on Saturday, the 10th day of February, the House shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon and the order of procedure shall be the same as on Fridays.

He said: In the discussion of this matter between my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and myself, it was hoped that we would be able to conclude the work which I mentioned in the House as work that should be done before the adjournment, by the 7th instant, or at the outside the 8th instant; but inasmuch as one could not be absolutely certain of that, and as I do not desire to have to bring down another motion, I have proposed as the date the 15th of February so as to guard against any contingency of that kind. With that explanation, I would move this motion in its amended form as above.

5 p.m.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The first part of this motion concerns the rule of the House which says that on Wednesdays the House shall meet at two o'clock and adjourn at six o'clock. The suggestion of my right hon. friend, as amended, now is that from this day until the end of the session, the usual rule of meeting at three o'clock shall prevail on Wednesdays. I agree to that. In these war times there are no entertainments, or there ought not to be; there are none on Wednesday evenings, and there is no reason at all why we should not have the same rule prevailing on Wednesdays as on other days. As to the remainder of the motion, it simply provides that on private members' days Government business shall have precedence over all business except questions and notices of motion. But it is understood that this rule will cease when the House meets again.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: By its terms it will cease then.

Motion agreed to.

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. R. BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St. Lawrence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code and to abolish capital punishment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Bill that I have introduced has a two-fold object, first, to prevent the possibility of recurrence of what has taken place at different times throughout the country, namely, the putting of innocent men to death; and secondly, to make it possible for juries to convict so that all murderers will be confined in prison. To-day, juries hesitate to convict unless the crime has been proven beyond a shadow of doubt, and, as a consequence, any number of murderers are to-day walking the streets of different cities in Canada who would be confined in penitentiaries if this amendment had been adopted at a previous session.

I think I am safe in saying that our whole system of punishment in Canada is on wrong lines. We punish largely for revenge. You say: it serves him right; hanging was too good for him. Punishment should be confined to improving the man, to making him a better man instead of shutting him up where he will become a worse man, or of sending his soul to eternity. A mother punishes her child, but she punishes it in love, for the purpose of making it a better child. She may close it up in a dark room, and she does so, not only for the benefit of the child, but for the benefit of other members of the family. But all the time that that child is shut up in the dark room the mother's heart is with it. In my opinion, that is the system of punishment that we should adopt in Canada. Sir, to hang a man because he deserves to be hanged is the poorest way of shirking our responsibility towards a lower soul who has come into this world for his fellow men to help him to develop into a higher and nobler life. If a man is capable of being made better, we have no right to send him out of the world until he has taken this step of development for which he was sent into the world, and which his higher fellowmen should help him to take.

Capital punishment is not based on Christianity, and any law that you have in this country, or any other country, that is not based on Christianity becomes a failure. Our law of capital punishment is based on vengeance. I have no doubt that a great many members of this House, and a great many people in this country claim that capital punishment is a deterrent. I think I will be able to prove, before the House adjourns, that capital punishment is not a deterrent. During the year 1916 there were fifty murders in this country. I think that that awful fact ought to satisfy any inquiring mind that there is no such thing as a deterrent, and that when a man commits a crime he is, at least at the moment, insane beyond a shadow of doubt. Forty of these cases went to trial for murder. In twenty the accused was found guilty. Some of the others pleaded guilty to manslaughter; some got clear; ten were executed; in nine cases the sentence was commuted, and one committed suicide. That is the record of our system in Canada: 50 murders, 40 men tried for murder, 20 found guilty of murder, 10 executed, nine commutations and one suicide. The suicide was, of course, in Ontario. I will not give the names of the men who were executed; it would not be fair to their families or relatives. But I will give the names of the judges. They were Justices Newlands, Drysdale, C. J. Graham, Sir J. A. Boyd, Galt,—Justice Galt has two executions to his credit, and I think if he could have had his way, he would have had a third with the Minister of Public Works as a victim—Macaulay, Simmons, C. J. Harvey, Walsh, Prendergast, Falconbridge, Mulock, Macdonald, Haszard, Harris, Monet and Kelly. Unfortunately we had one case in the province of Quebec, only one; and that was such a brutal case that the public were all in favour of hanging the man. Otherwise he would have got off, because the people of the province of Quebec are determined not to send a man to eternity unless his guilt is established beyond a shadow of doubt, and I think they are right. I wish the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who is leading the House, would just place his ear to the ground, and follow the dictates of his own conscience. If he did so, he would adopt my Bill as a Government measure. My hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) shakes his head, and like Pharoah of old, hardens his heart; and the Government, just to keep their hands in, strangles a few prodigals every year.

There are four great reforms marching hand in hand across this continent to-day, which no number of hidebound politicians, be they Grit or Tory, or Grit and Tory combined, will be able much longer to prevent becoming law by the consent of the citizens of Canada. They are, first, the right of the mothers in Canada to contribute towards making the laws of this country; second, the abolition of the bars; third, penitentiary and prison reform; fourth, the abolition of capital punishment. The first of these I feel safe in leaving in the hands of our most recent convert amongst our leading Canadian statesmen, the right hon. the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who, having championed a good cause, fights for it, and fights to a finish. I regret very much that the hon. gentleman has not pronounced himself so strongly in favour of the other three reforms, but if I would be allowed to repeat an expression made use of by one who has gone to his rest, I would say that we should hope for the best, as the ship is heading in the right direction. The second—abolishing the bars—I will leave in the hands of the hon. the leader of the Opposition in the Ontario Legislature, whose battle cry is: 'Abolish the Bars.' The third I feel to be quite safe in the hands of the hon. representative of the county of Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who has been making such a good fight for penitentiary and prison reform in Canada. The fourth—that of abolishing the death penalty in Canada—I intend to deal with to the best of my ability. It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House at any length, as I exhausted most of the arguments in my possession on this question on previous occasions in this House, when the question was being dealt with. I fail to understand how any man, claiming to be a Christian, and believing in an eternity of the soul, can be party to sending that soul into eternity.

Mr. BURNHAM: Is it not in eternity now?

Mr. BICKERDIKE: Who?

Mr. BURNHAM: The soul.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: If my hon. friend had remained where he should be at the present time serving in the country's defence he might have got his soul there too.

Mr. Speaker, I condemn any law that proposes to thrust souls into the fathomless abyss of the inscrutable beyond by the commission of a public crime. I have no doubt that the House will recall the fact that when this fight was started four years ago there were six of the states to the south of us which had abolished capital punishment; six more have now thrown off the yoke and to-day twelve states have abolished capital punishment. They are: Rhode Island, Wisconsin, Kansas, Minnesota, Maine, Michigan, Washington, Oregon, South Dakota, North Dakota, Tennessee, Arizona.

I was told that this was too big a fight for an old man like me to undertake. Well, it is true, it is a big fight, but it is a fight of democracy versus caste, humanity versus brutality, enlightenment versus superstition, construction versus destruction, Christianity versus heathenism, civilization versus blood, golden rule versus vengeance. Experience has shown that executions are followed by increased homicide. It is unwise economically. Lives are destroyed which would be economically valuable to the state. Capital punishment is unnecessary. It is not effective as a deterrent. Many murderers are not deterred by any punishment. Many criminals know that infliction of the death penalty is extremely unlikely.

The Minister of Justice, who, I am sorry, is not here at present, seems to be wedded to the scaffold. He claims that he has divine authority for hanging these poor men. I think the scaffold is a disgrace to any civilized country and in many respects, like the tree of sorrows, it is watered only by the tears of the widows and orphans.

Allow me now to quote the words of one of the most eminent, most noble, and best statesmen that it was ever the good fortune of the great republic of France to produce. President Fallieres of the French Republic says:

> Among the unpleasant duties of the President of France is that of signing all death warrants issued in the republic.

This is well. He says, however, that there should be a slight change in the arrangement, to wit:

> The judge who sentences the man to die should also act as his executioner.

President Fallieres claims that if this were the case, it would do away with all legalized homicide. He further says:

> I will not ask any man to do that which I myself am unwilling to do. I will do no murder, even for the State.

Therefore President Fallieres, during his time, commuted all death penalties to life imprisonment, and where there was a reasonable doubt about the man's guilt, he pardoned him. He says:

> France must learn to take care of her criminals without killing them.

It is a poor use to make of a man to take his life. It is an acknowledgement of our inefficiency. Then, a life sentence should hold out to a man the promise that a number of years of good behaviour and useful work, will make him free. Penology must be made a science to the end that when we imprison a man we do it for his own good, with the intention of turning out a better man than we took in. Just as long as the state sets an example of killing its enemies, they must expect that individuals will occasionally kill theirs. Many years ago, when England had forty six offences punishable by death, there was very much more killing than now. Crime has decreased in England as well as elsewhere, as laws have become more humane. There is no such thing as a criminal class. When the state ceases to breed murder in the minds of her citizens, her citizens will then cease, not only the killing of each other, but also the desire to kill. Judicial murders are worse than those done in passion. They are so atrociously premeditated, so deliberately planned, that no excuse can be made or found for them beyond that of precedent or cowardice. The sentiments of the people in Canada are opposed to this legal killing business, and this is why so many murder trials turn themselves into a farce. When there is to be a hanging, every sheriff tries to get out of the job. In New York, when there is to be an electrocution, nobody wants to undertake it, and the deadly current is always turned on by a man at a distance from the scene, who salves his consience by pretending to think he is turning on the lights, and in many of the cases, the executioner is a convict, working under orders. President Fallieres' refusal to either act as an executioner, or to order or engage others to take human life, is a manifestation of the better spirit of the age. Now let enlightened Canada, by her Governor in Council, take the same stand. Our Governor General and our Prime Minister and members of the Cabinet are a negative party to these judicial killings. They know what is being done, and by lifting a finger can stop it just as President Fallieres did. Let them commute every death sentence to imprisonment for life, all without argument or question, and they will thereby express the spirit of the times, and show to the world that they believe in the future.

Man commits a murder and the state murders him. That is reciprocity with a vengeance. When I listen to a clergyman in the pulpit preaching Christianity on Sunday, and advocating the death penalty on Monday, I ask myself the old question: Was it he or his parents who sinned, that he should be born blind? The state claims Divine authority for this leprous out-cropping of the dark ages, but I claim that the state has no Divine authority for the death penalty. Those who clamour most for capital punishment deduce their severity from the Bible, and yet it is the Bible which declares that no man should be put to death.

Dr. Josiah Oldfield, of London, says:

> Can we ever forget that Cain was guilty of the worst of crimes, brutal, passionate, fratricide, and that by the laws of Canada, he would be hanged amid the execrations of our very righteous community, who would not raise a finger to get a reprieve in such a case, but would clamour for the hangman 'to do his duty' on the ground that 'such a monster ought not to live.'

Yet the infinite pity of God shielded Cain from the vengeance of pitiless men, and with a protective mark upon his forehead, he was sent out with an express command that no man should injure him; and no church dare to say that Cain, the first fratricide and the beginning of murderers, has not a seat now in the Heaven of the Blessed, and yet, to-day, if Cain were to come to civilized Canada, he would be hounded to the gallows as a monster not worthy of having spent upon him the pittance which the cost of one extra prisoner would entail. Yet the Bible declared that Cain should not be hanged.

Mr. BURNHAM: Will the hon. member be good enough to read that chapter in the Bible where it says that Cain was sent out with a protective mark upon his forehead.

Mr. BICKERDIKE: My hon. friend will find that in Genesis. Being a good biblical scholar he will know where to put his hand on it. I would impress, too, the striking fact that were Moses to land upon our shores he would land as a criminal who had committed a murder which is punishable by hanging; and when I read the story of how Moses took the poor Egyptian and killed him, and surreptitiously buried his body, and covered the place over with sand so that his crime should be hidden, and then went home and went about his daily duties with serene face as if nothing had happened, I recall similar murders that have taken place in Canada, and I remember the popular outcry about the callous brutality of the crime, and the hard-hearted hypocrisy of the murderer, all quite true, and I can picture from the experience of similar cases that if Moses were to come to Canada to-day and were to repeat the crime which he perpetrated upon the Egyptian, the press and the public would combine to talk about "another brutal murder," and demand the expiation of the crime upon the scaffold. The Minister of Justice would never be satisfied until he had Moses hanged on the scaffold. I take these two striking cases because it is to the law of Moses that the modern pro-hanger appeals. To the Caesar of the Mosaic law does the pro-hanger appeal. By the Caesar of the Mosaic law shall the greatest of the world's prophetic law-givers be judged, and the majestic patriarch who had moulded for good the destinies of millions of people and the great races of men, would fall branded under the statute law of Canada as a common murderer not worth keeping alive.

Capital punishment is unjust to the criminal. He has no chance to reform. His soul is sent into eternity regardless of whether it is saved or not. It is unfair to his family; it disgraces them and robs them of any means of support. If you doubt it, ask any hon. member who has known of a family where the parent has been hanged, and knows how they have been hounded from one city to another. Capital punishment makes no allowances for varying degrees of guilt. It is irrevocable. It is wrong in principle. The State has no right to take life. Killing by a group of people is no more right than killing by one person. I claim that the law of Moses, "Thou shalt not kill," applies to the State as well as to the individual. The same arguments for capital punishment were formerly advanced for torture. Statistics show that murders have decreased in countries and in states that have abolished capital punishment. Life imprisonment is better. It is more effective as a deterrent. Conviction is more certain, and it is the certainty rather than the nature of punishment which deters. Its duration makes it a more severe punishment. It offers adequate protection to society. It prevents murderers from committing new crimes. It reforms the prisoners in order to determine the causes of crime. It makes the prisoner's life valuable to the state. He will support himself. He will provide for his family. His labour can be used in carrying on important public works.

I venture therefore to appeal, by the sacred mercy which spared Cain, and the infinite power which transformed Moses, to every one whose heart beats for the suffering and whose soul yearns over the agonized, to look with the eye of a sorrowing father upon every prodigal in the land, and not to rest until they are won from the misery of the brutal passions which bind them as slaves, into the glorious freedom of the sons of God. There is greater joy in heaven over one murderer who is converted than over ninety and nine murderers who are justly (?) hanged in their sins.

I wish to quote the words of a friend of mine, and of some other hon. gentlemen in this House. His Excellency, the Hon. Geo. W. P. Hunt, Governor of Arizona, says:

> The abolishment of capital punishment is an appeal to man's better nature, not his baser; to his reason, not his passion; to his thought, not his prejudice; to his hope for the future, and not his pitiful blindfold reverence for the customs of a dark and sanguinary past.
>
> Wholly practical and essentially scientific, the protest against legalized killing must naturally look to education for its victory. Aeons struggled for expression. The subject is yet so new to the great majority who have viewed the corpse-strewn course of criminology until its gruesome way is become an accustomed sight, that the mind of the public must be aroused, its thoughts developed, study urged, investigations encouraged; and to this end, as an educational treatise for which there exists an ample and important field.
>
> The blowing out of that God-lighted flame, the taking away coldly, deliberately, premeditatedly of a human life, either by an individual or by the chosen agents of a collection of individuals—the State—is an enormous responsibility. Who views it lightly from the standpoint of the State is as great a menace to society as the criminal of disordered mind or distorted brain who employs it to achieve his evil ends.

I view it with the utmost solemnity, with a profound conviction of the terrible wrong it contemplates. Heroes are made of criminals. Respect for human life is lessened. The spirit of lawlessness is developed in the criminally inclined and in individuals of low mentality.

The evolutionary mutations of the centuries, from chaos almost to light, ever steadily advancing, educating, humanizing, building-up, reconstructing, will never halt, until at their feet shall stand the bright and shining goal whose motto gleams through the aurora of the Golden Rule. There will be no halt until the brutal and brutalizing process of expiation, which even now must hide in shame its visible symbols of ferocity, and in the deathly seclusion of high-walled keeps work its cruel way, shall be utterly destroyed, even as an awakening horror of this national crime has already forced its banishment from the public's horrored eyes.

I do not think that any man who has not witnessed an execution can vote intelligently on this question. In 1861, when I was a youth, I saw a young man hanged in Montreal, the executions in those days being public. I felt then that surely there was some better way for Canada to treat its criminals. When I saw that poor man strung up between heaven and earth and all his convulsions witnessed by some 20,000 people at the old Montreal jail, fighting and scrambling and some of them playing cards, I felt that as long as I lived I would do everything in my power to have capital punishment abolished in Canada. I know some hon. members think that I have a big task ahead of me; that I have so far not succeeded very well, and that I probably never shall; but when I am gone, I feel certain that the Lord will raise up some young men whose eloquence in this House will bring about the abolishment of capital punishment.

Legalized killing must go. It is the only form of crime denied the individual, but preserved in the processes of the state. It fails in its aim to serve society, but holds humanity in check. It writes God's law in earthly statute books, and becomes the chief offender. It destroys, but it cannot renew. It punishes, yes, if we think of the broken hearts of wives and mothers and innocent babes, but it does not punish where it seeks. It works an example, true, but an example of blood and revenge and murder, and as it sows so it reaps. It protects, aye, it protects the world from one man's hand, a hand that may be easily held, but it gives no shield against the malignity of a thousand passions by its crime unloosed. It deters, but it deters only love and good, and the growth of the brotherhood of man. Criminal tendencies are due largely to conditions for which the state, rather than the individual, is responsible?

The State would be justified in taking life in self-defence, but there is no other excuse for the State taking life and the State does not need to take life in self-defence. The death penalty is not in accord with the modern theory of penology. It does not reform the criminal. There is, regrettably, a disposition on the part of some of our most worthy citizens to bring passages of Scripture to the support of capital punishment. We have heard unto the point of weariness the quotation of the old Mosaic law of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." We do not hear so frequently, however, of Christ's own allusion to the Mosaic law in the following words:

Ye have heard it said in olden times, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," but I say unto you, love your enemies and pray for them that despitefully use you.

If any one, however adept in placing construction on the English language, is able, in the light of these words, to attribute even tacit support of the death penalty to the Saviour of mankind, he will exceed all bounds of mental agility within my comprehension. Again, we hear from those who would quote the Bible in justification of legalized murder, the citing of that part of the sixth verse of the ninth chapter of Genesis which reads as follows:

Whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.

This has been very effectually answered by a statement with whose greatness every school child in America is familiar. I refer to Benjamin Franklin, who, in commenting upon the relation of the Old Testament to the death penalty, uttered the following words, alluding to the Scriptural passage quoted:

This has been supposed to imply that blood could only be expiated by blood. But I am disposed to believe with the best commentators on this text of Scripture, that it is rather a prediction than a law. The language of it is simply that such is the folly and depravity of man that in every age murder shall beget murder. Laws which inflict death for murder are, in my opinion, as un-Christian as those who justify or tolerate revenge; for the obligation of Christianity upon individuals to promote repentance, to forgive injuries, and to discharge the duties of universal benevolence is equally binding upon the state.

To attempt to discover, on grounds of morality, any distinction between murder and legalized execution is the sheerest quibbling. The only instances recorded in law as murder extenuated and in a degree justifiable, are an officer's act in killing one who is resisting arrest, the course of action of any one who slays in attempting to prevent the committing of some forcible or atrocious crime, and the deed of homicide committed either in the heat of passion, by accident, or in self-defence. In none of these conditions can the State find a justification for capital punishment since a deliberate execution is not extenuated by any of these circumstances. Nothing tends to make the heart of an honest man or an honest woman bleed more than realizing that some innocent people are being hanged. Although I have here a dozen cases where innocent men have been hanged, and although I have no doubt there are hundreds of such cases, I will not detain the House by bringing them up this evening.

Capital punishment does not protect society; it is based on revenge, and is dangerous to society. It brutalizes human nature. Legal executions increase the number of murders. If I take a pistol and fire it at the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and the bullet strikes his watch and does not kill him, as far as I am concerned, my crime is just as bad as if the bullet did kill him. If I do not kill him, the chances are that I shall be imprisoned and not executed. If I do kill him, the chances are that I shall be executed. I claim that the crime is committed when the shot is fired. If I do not succeed in killing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that is not my fault; I am equally guilty as if I had killed him, but I shall not be hanged for it. Surely the hon. members of this House will see the distinction.

Judge Robert McMurdy of Chicago says that the death penalty is a cruel invention of caste. Ignorance lazily follows the beaten path; wisdom chooses the way. Readers of history cannot fail to perceive that the death penalty is disappearing step by step. We are told that deaths through religious persecution alone averaged thousands a year for a period of six hundred years. Hume quotes Harrison as authority for the statement that in the reign of Henry VIII seventy-two thousand persons were executed for theft and robbery; and in the "Golden age" of Elizabeth between three and four hundred a year. This reckless slaughter is no longer possible; and with less sanguinary laws have come a number of other changes which indicate an advancing civilization. Trial by jury has been instituted; hanging in chains has been done away with; quartering and breaking on the wheel and burning at the stake have passed into tradition; the death penalty for political crimes has been abandoned generally; it has substantially disappeared for infanticide; the execution of a woman is rare; public hangings have been almost wholly abolished; two degrees of murder have been established by law, one of which in nearly all countries is not capital; in some forums the determination of the punishment to be inflicted is left to the jury. In these particulars we have gradually approached, and in others we are rapidly nearing, the abolition of the death penalty. This form of punishment is discriminatory. Because of the severity it is almost never inflicted upon a person of wealth or influence. In general we hang only such as belong to the abjectly miserable portion of humanity. The long and the short of the matter is that the death penalty is too severe to be inflicted upon the rich or the strong. It is one of the cruel inventions of caste,—it is a class penalty, just as some of the laws governing it have been class laws. One of these men from the United States to whom I have referred said, "Why abolish capital punishment? Why not adopt our system of execution?" And he went on to explain how neatly it was done. I said that I did not see there was much improvement. In the early days, in New York, they burned criminals at the stake until they were dead, now they burn them in the chair until they are dead. There is not much difference to the poor criminal. Is it cowardice? Most people justify the deliberate taking of a life by the state for the wilful taking of a life by a man on the ground that life is sacred and that he who takes it must expect the most severe of all punishments. But if life is sacred enough to be protected from destruction by personal violence, is it not so sacred that we should make it certain that it will not be taken through conspiracy, public prejudice or judicial mistake? Why not go a step further and say that life is so sacred that Canada should not take it at all? Among the Quakers, who live by this rule, there are no murders. The contemplation of an execution with the horrors that accompany it degrades and brutalizes. The death penalty renders human life less sacred by inducing the desire for suicide on the part of the criminal, so that every prisoner under sentence of death is guarded, lest he destroy himself and thus set before the community another evidence of disregard for life. Cowardice has had much to do with retaining this form of punishment. In cases of murder we do not inflict the extreme penalty for the crime itself, but for the result. If one discharges a load of buckshot into the breast of another with the distinct intention of murdering him, and it happens that the man survives, the punishment is limited to imprisonment. If the man dies, the penalty may be death. Morally, the crime is committed when the gun is discharged, and to be consistent the sacredness of human life and all the other arguments used to sustain and justify capital punishment demand that the offender be executed. Yet such is not the law. We refuse to abolish this penalty for crime which results in death because we fear that our lives may be less secure. In other countries this fear has come to the surface when it was proposed to abolish the punishment, although the abolition, in every instance, proved the fear to be unfounded.

A penalty so severe as not to be enforceable has a basic objection; it produces unrest to have a constant miscarriage of justice. A wealthy malefactor, an influential murderer cannot go free in a community where paupers and friendless foreigners and prodigals are hanged, without the people acquiring a contempt for the laws, such as they felt in England during the period of fifteen years when 555 verdicts were rendered for stealing from dwellings thirty-nine shillings, at a time when it was a capital offence to steal forty shillings. When the amount was changed to five pounds the juries raised their verdicts to four pounds, nineteen shillings.

Capital punishment is generally defended upon religious grounds. The passage upon which those who favour the death penalty rely is that part of the sixth verse of the ninth chapter of Genesis, which reads: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." These are the words of the Old Testament. If we are to derive our authority for capital punishment from that part of the Good Book, we may likewise there find our authority for slavery, since we are told that "of the heathen that are round about" us we shall make bondmen. And by these words slavery was defended not very long ago. We are told in Exodus that "He that curseth his father, or his mother, shall surely be put to death," and that if an ox known by its owner to be vicious escapes from its stall and kills a human being, the ox and "his owner also shall be put to death". To be consistent, then, those who undertake to sustain capital punishment by the sentence from Genesis must uphold hanging for cursing a parent, or even for negligence in the care of a vicious ox; and for thirty-three transgressions, including witchcraft, all of which are designated as capital in the Mosaic law. The doctrine of "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth," given us by the Old Testament, is expressly repudiated in the New. We are told that vengeance is the Lord's; we are commanded after the most solemn fashion not to kill and if we adhere to the original Hebrew, expressly enjoined not to kill man.

Aside from the fact that no sufficient warrant is to be found in the Scriptures for the infliction of death as a punishment, it would seem clear that the State has the right to deprive a man of his civil rights only. It may lawfully withdraw its protection and its privileges from an offender, but the right of a human being to live is derived from the Creator, and the State cannot justly take it away. Constantine prohibited branding the faces of criminals because he believed it to be a violation of the law of nature to mar the majesty of the human face. And nature's first law is life. No one has the right to take his own life, and therefore no one has the right to consent that others shall take it. It follows that if others acquire such a right it must be wholly on the specious ground of self-defence, or "expediency", as it is generally called. A matter of logic. All logical minds agree on this fundamental proposition: If the death penalty does not deter, or if communities are safe without it, we have no right to retain it; for, under either of these conditions, it cannot be justified on the ground of self-defence or expediency. Let us proceed to learn from the facts that both these conditions obtain.

So far as the penalty is aimed at criminals it would seem to be useless. Such deterrents do not reach to the subnormal. In general this class of people do not prize life highly. Moreover, criminals who are homicides, as a class, are not to be frightened. They are the bravest of their kind. Many of them in committing murder have had the courage to risk their own lives. While the constant recollection that the state has fixed the extreme punishment for murder may induce a habit of mind averse to committing the crime, it is by no means certain that the same result would not be produced, and to the same degree, if the punishment were deprivation of liberty. And this mental state is disrupted, and every other restraint swept aside, by strong passions which continue to dominate until the crime is consummated. But even such a habit of mind is foreign to the majority of criminals, who are struggling against heredity, environment, poverty and drink. Most of our homicides are committed in a more or less drunken state, when the aggressor has dulled himself to considerations of fear. In the few cases of sudden impulse there is no time for weighing consequences. Even if a man with murder in his heart were to stop and consider the likelihood of punishment he would naturally believe that he would be one of the 56 who escape the gallows and not the one in every 57 homicides, in the United States for instance, who is hanged. In view of the uncertainties of a jury trial he would feel that he probably would be acquitted, and at all events would not be condemned to death. In New York city, during a period of three years, 141 persons were convicted of murder, but of these only two were executed. The old criminal knows these figures in a general way, and if he calculates his chances at all he believes that even if he should be caught and convicted he will be one of the 139 and not one of the two. As long as there is the element of chance or uncertainty about threatened death, it loses its terrors. Otherwise, we would have few volunteer soldiers and very few in our extra-hazardous employments.

The deterrent effect of hanging has always been overestimated. It was the experience of England for generations that men by the thousand would risk the gallows to forge a five pound note or to steal property of insignificant value. And it was not the fear of extreme punishment, but the invention of the steamship, that broke up piracy. When hangings were public, it was not uncommon for ten or fifteen thousand people to witness them, and in some instances the crowd numbered more than twenty thousand; but it was found that, so far from the sight operating as a deterrent, these occasions were the scene of ribald jests, profanity, fights and brawls, in some cases leading to another murder before the crowd dispersed. And during the executions of pickpockets, thieves of that class have been caught plying their trade in the assembled crowd. Experience has led us to execute in private.

[Mr. Bickerdike.]

We are just beginning to learn that murderers are controlled in some degree by a morbid desire to imitate, and that murders are committed in cycles bearing no relation to the degree of punishment. In France, one of the Ministers of Justice became satisfied that crime would not decrease as long as so few prisoners sentenced to the guillotine were put to death. Upon this assumption, during a period of twelve months every condemned prisoner but one was beheaded by "the knife of the law"; and the next year murders increased nearly fifty per cent. Montesquieu tells us that it is certainty and not severity which deters—that excessive severity hinders the execution of laws; and Beccaria that it is not the intensity but the continuance of punishment that produces the greatest effect on the mind—principles fully established by the history of the criminal law of England. We need to keep in mind the celebrated petition against punishing with death the crime of forgery, presented to Parliament in 1830 by a thousand bankers located in 214 cities and towns, reciting that the petitioners "find by experience that the infliction of death, or even the possibility of the infliction of death, prevents the prosecution, conviction and punishment of the criminal, and thus endangers the property which it is intended to protect." After the execution of Fauntleroy, the lawyers of England sent up a similar petition in which they predicted that if the Crown were to cease punishing forgery by death, the crime would become less frequent. And when hanging for that offence was abolished the crime became very rare. So with the rest of the 160 crimes which Blackstone tells us were formerly punishable in his country by instant death. And so with murder. The experiments of abolishing this penalty for the crime has been tried without bad results in all parts of the globe, in a great number of instances, at different periods and under diverse conditions. Where the abandonment of the penalty has been immediately followed by an increase in the number of homicides, investigation has shown that the offenders at the time the crimes were committed had not learned that the change had taken place. It is admitted, also, that the restoration of capital punishment where it has once been abolished has not decreased the number of murders.

It may be added that substantially all the arguments now advanced for the retention of the death penalty for homicide were urged with vehemence in the endeavour to prevent its abolition for offenses against the laws protecting property, and coupled with these arguments were solemn predictions of dire calamity in the event of a change. We learn from experience that when executions are most numerous, convictions are most difficult, and on the other hand, when executions are least frequent convictions are most readily obtained, so that it is quite impossible to combine certainty of punishment with the penalty of death. For some persons, the penalty of death has a certain fascination arising out of vainglory, a characteristic weakness of criminals. Many of them would readily choose the scaffold, with its suggestion of heroism and martyrdom, rather than the penitentiary which has no other meaning than disgrace. During cycles of corruption in other lands, capital punishment has been a menace to liberty, especially with respect to that indefinite crime we call by the name of treason—still a crime in the United States and Canada. Sir, had the venerated signers of the Declaration of Independence been men of less heroic character, and had they been deterred by this penalty, one of the best pages of history would never have been written.

Life is as secure without the infliction of such a penalty. In the ancient world nations existed for hundreds of years in perfect safety without the death penalty. In modern days, eight of the civilized countries have abolished capital punishment and are living in security without it; in some of them, it has been abolished for half a century; in others, again, it is never inflicted; while in still others it has been abrogated for long stretches of time. But it is said by sanguinary supporters of the penalty that its retention is necessary to hold in check the criminal classes in the great urban centres. The answer is that many large communities have lived in security without executions—Bombay, Amsterdam, Brussels, Warsaw, Moscow, Odessa, Naples, Milan, Rome, Marseilles, Lyons, Lisbon. It is objected that these cities are not of the first magnitude. The answer is: St. Petersburg, Paris. It is urged that these are not in America, where murder is most frequent. The answer is: Milwaukee, Detroit, Providence. In any given instance it will not do to brush all argument aside with the comment, sometimes heard: "Served him right. Hanging was too good for him." Such sentiments proclaim the savage. Revenge is the lowest of our characteristics. This standard has been abandoned even by the most violent and drastic penologists. Punishment by the state, we are taught, has but three objects: to restore to the injured, to reform the criminal, to prevent a repetition of the crime—(the idea of expediency, or example to others, is secondary). In murder it is impossible to restore to the injured. The death penalty prevents the reformation of the criminal, but it does effectively stop repetition by the same man. If, however, repetition can be prevented by imprisonment, hanging is without an apology. The modern prison is amply sufficient, whatever may have been true in former days. If we can restrain the homicidal madman, we ought to be able to control the ordinary murderer.

Mr. Speaker from the time of Calvary to the present day innocent men have been put to death. We are told by Mittermaier of guiltless persons executed in Italy, France and Germany. He speaks of a condemned man, afterwards proved innocent, concerning whose case Baron Martin, the trial judge said: "The evidence was about the clearest and most direct that, after a long course of experience in the administration of criminal justice, I have ever known." Chief Baron Kelly says that from 1802 to 1840 he traced twenty-two men who were wrongly convicted of murder in England, seven of whom were hanged. Mackintosh says that in the same country, taking a long period of time, one innocent man is hanged in every three years. It may be safely asserted that the thousands who were put to death—at the stake and otherwise—for witchcraft were not guilty of the crime with which they were charged. Again there is no way of ascertaining to a certainty the guilt of any one charged with murder. Felonious intent is the essence of crime. The jury must determine, then, in each instance, the state of mind of the accused. In many cases this is a difficult task, and in not a few the verdict is a mere guess. A confession of guilt, if voluntary, would seem to be a strong evidence; but by way of illustrating a general rule, it will be remembered that a number of men confessed to the murder of Nathan in New York City, all of whom were innocent. In some cases of acknowledged murder the supposed victim has turned out to be still alive, and in at least one instance interrupted the trial. Whatever may be the testimony of a witness, it cannot be certain to a demonstration, in some cases, that he is not committing perjury or is not mistaken.

Even in those cases where the murder is proved to the satisfaction of the most exact mind, there is no way of determining whether the culprit was sane when he committed the act. If insanity is present, the very nature of the disease often leads the offender to conceal its symptoms. If a man of normal mind should commit murder and be convicted, it cannot be known absolutely whether at the time of his hanging he is mentally sound. Yet our nature revolts at the thought of hanging a man who is insane, and the law does not permit his execution. To the hanging of women there is a special objection. More than one instance is related of an unborn child being destroyed at the same time with the mother. Such a result may be avoided, but the objection illustrates what all these facts accentuate, the difficulties that surround the infliction of this penalty. Throughout history man has been endeavouring to devise some decent method of putting a brother to death in cold blood. Hanging has been preferred to other methods because it does not literally shed blood; but a bungling hangman or a faulty rope may make it most revolting. Electrocution is but the forerunner of abolition. What nature has rendered so difficult, man should accept as forbidden.

With regard to the deterrent effect, let any one cast his mind back to the days of the Declaration of Independence. One of the greatest chapters in history would never have been written if the men who signed the Declaration of Independence had been in fear of the rope; but they signed the Declaration of Independence knowing that the rope was hanging over them. We hang men because they are rebels. We hanged Riel, a man whom I knew very well. He was no more guilty than George Washington was; they were both rebels—one succeeded and became the father of his country, the other failed and was hanged.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the rule.

Thursday, February 1, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

REPORTS.

Report of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916.—Hon. Mr. Blondin.

Public Accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1916.—Sir Thomas White.

[Mr. Bickerdike.]

ELECTION OF MR. RAINVILLE AS DEPUTY SPEAKER.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): It has become necessary to appoint a chairman of committees of the whole House, and I need not say that the appointment is an important one, involving the duty of presiding over committees of the whole House, and also of presiding over the House itself in the absence of the Speaker. I have very much pleasure in proposing to the House that Mr. Joseph H. Rainville, member of this House for the electoral district of Chambly-Vercheres, be appointed chairman of committees. Mr. Rainville, who has had experience for the past six years as a member of this House, has, I think, manifested a thorough acquaintance with the rules of the House, having been called on from time to time to discharge temporarily the duties of chairman of committees. He has also the qualities which will enable him to discharge his duties in a manner satisfactory in every way, possessing, as he does, the promptness of decision, impartiality, courtesy and tact that are essential to the position which he will be called upon to fill if my proposal should meet with the acceptance of the House. I therefore beg to move, Mr. Speaker:

That Mr. Joseph H. Rainville, member for the electoral district of Chambly-Vercheres, be appointed Chairman of the Committees of the Whole House.

Motion agreed to.

GERMAN SUBMARINE WARFARE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, a telegram has been received from His Excellency the British Ambassador at Washington, which it is proper that I should communicate to the House:—

TELEGRAM FROM BRITISH AMBASSADOR AT WASHINGTON.

Washington, January 31, 1917.

Urgent.

German Ambassador has just informed Secretary of State that all pledges as to restriction of submarine warfare have been withdrawn from February 1st.

(Sgd.) Spring Rice.

CONFISCATION OF COAL BY RAILWAYS

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: A question was asked in the House a few days ago in regard to the commandeering of coal by the Dominion Atlantic Railway. In answer to the hon. gentleman who sought information upon the subject, I stated that it would be taken up by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I am to-day in receipt of a letter, dated yesterday, which is as follows:

January 31, 1917.

Dear Sir Robert Borden,—As the question of commandeering of coal by the Dominion Atlantic railway came to me through you, for your information, I beg to advise that the company makes the following explanations as to the situation.

Your telegram yesterday re coal for Nova Scotia Underwear Company. This coal was taken at Truro. Action made necessary in order to keep traffic moving. On night of 23rd Dominion Atlantic took three cars, one consigned to the Underwear Company and two to F. W. Dimock, local coal dealer, Windsor, who was under contract to supply Underwear Company with one car a week. Railway Company returned one of these cars to Dimock on the 25th and one on the 24th and three will be replaced to-day under arrangement with local coal dealer Wolfville and Mr. Ballantyne, Manager Underwear Company with whom company have been in constant touch. Am advised coal was not taken without first making sure that Underwear Company would be in no way inconvenienced. On account of very heavy demand for munition plants, etc., mines have been unable to meet requirements. Effective February first Railway Company is making heavy reductions its passenger trains in order to save coal and enable it to move overseas traffic. It is purchasing coal from whatever source possible at prohibitive prices in order to keep situation in hand.

The coal shortage is, of course, severe, and our troubles many. On the one hand, trains have to move; but, on the other, factories have to be kept going.

Yours faithfully,
H. L. Drayton,
Chief Commissioner.

The Right Honourable the Premier,
Ottawa, Ont.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Is the Royal Northwest Mounted Police force now engaged in enforcing law in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta to be withdrawn from the authority of the respective Provincial Governments.
2. If so, at what date is this withdrawal to take place?
3. Is the force to remain in the provinces?
4. In what duty is it to be employed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg to lay on the table of the House the orders in council which are alluded to in this question, and which, I think, will give a full answer to the inquiry made by the hon. gentleman.

REMOVAL OF RAILWAY MATERIAL TO FRANCE.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. What trackage of railway is Canada sending to the Allies?
2. What is the tonnage?
3. Are ties included?
4. From what lines and at what points is this trackage taken?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Three hundred miles.
2. Approximately 45,000 gross tons, including fastenings, turnouts, etc.
3. No.
4. From yards at divisional points on the National Transcontinental railway.

PATENT MEDICINES.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

Will the Minister of Inland Revenue introduce, during this session, a Bill respecting the classification of patent medicines, especially as to abortive drugs and medicines or their equivalent?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Any necessary announcement in regard to this subject will be made in due course.

MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Who secured the mail contract between Trois Pistoles and St. Jean de Dieu, Temiscouata?
2. What is the price paid to the present contractor?
3. How many persons tendered for this contract?
4. What were the names of tenderers?
5. What was the amount of their respective tenders?

Mr. BLONDIN:

1. Florian Rioux.
2. Four hundred and fifteen dollars per annum.
3. Seven.

4 and 5. Cyrille Rioux, $349; Zephirin Marquis, $373; Florian Rioux, $415; Vallier Lavoie, $500; Thomas Dauteine, $525; Louis de G. Rioux, $550; Leon Rosseau, $590. The contract was awarded to Cyrille Rioux, the lowest tenderer, who refused it. After Zephirin Marquis had notified the department that he would not be able to perform the service if his tender was accepted, the contract was given to the next lowest tenderer, Florian Rioux.

EXCHEQUER COURT CASES.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Does the Honourable the Minister of Justice allow the Government Solicitor, in the Exchequer Court cases, in the district of Kamouraska, to take a counsel with him for the hearing of the evidence and to defend the Government?
2. Is it the usual practice of the Department of Justice to appoint two attorneys when very simple cases can be pleaded by only one, at this period when the war expenses are already so heavy?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. There is no such office as that of 'Government Solicitor' in the district of Kamouraska or elsewhere. The considerations governing the employment of counsel in Kamouraska are the same as in other parts of Canada. Out of nine cases in the district of Kamouraska since 1911 counsel were employed in only two, and these were cases involving considerable amounts and depending upon doubtful questions of law.

2. No. Counsel are employed only where by reason of the nature of the case it is considered advisable by the Department of Justice to retain counsel.

SEPARATION ALLOWANCE.

Mr. MACDONALD:

What class of persons are entitled to receive separation allowance whose relatives are in Overseas service?

Mr. KEMP:

Under present regulations the classes of persons who are entitled to Separation Allowance as dependents of Officers and men enlisting for overseas service are set out in orders in council:

P. C. 2266, September 4, 1914; P. C. 2553, October 10, 1914; P. C. 2613, November 6, 1915; P. C. 1997, August 23, 1916; P. C. 2246, October 20, 1916; P. C. 2615, October 28, 1916; which have been laid on the table of the House of Commons. The regulations are modelled after the British regulations governing payment of Separation Allowance.

HOME GUARD DUTY.

Mr. BUCHANAN:

1. What is the reason that men enlisting for Home Guard duty are not being dealt with, as regards pay and allowances, in the same manner as men originally in the Canadian Expeditionary Force and subsequently transferred to Home service?

2. Why were the special rates authorized for the Canadian Expeditionary Force not extended to Home Service?

3. Have representations been made to the Government to have all guards placed on the same basis?

Mr. KEMP:

1. (a) The only men who have enlisted for Home Guard service are men who are serving in the Active Militia. They receive exactly the same pay as members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, but they do not receive separation allowance.

(b) Men who originally enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and were subsequently transferred to Home Service, were those who after they enlisted for overseas service became either temporarily or otherwise medically unfit for overseas service. These men are used on guard duty or on detail work of various kinds necessary in the district. When they become medically fit for overseas service, they proceed overseas. They are subject to the same regulations as the overseas forces.

2. Separation allowance was not extended to members of active militia units, as these men are used for guard duty in Canada only, and the members of these militia units are largely employed in the locality in which their homes are situated. The members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who are being employed on guard duty in Canada volunteered their services unreservedly for the defense of the Empire, and in so doing were prepared not only to endure hardships and hazards, but to sacrifice their lives if necessary. They are therefore in most cases removed from their families by great distances, and the wives and mothers of these men, who have given their husbands and sons for the common cause, have suffered the sorrows necessitated by such removal. It is therefore considered that they are entitled to separation allowance.

3. Yes, representations have been made to the Government to have all guards placed on the same basis.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—LEVEL CROSSING.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Is the Railway Department aware of the dangerous nature of the crossing on the Canadian Government Railway north of the Eastern Car Works at Trenton, Pictou County?

2. If so, is it the intention of the railway to construct a subway to remove the danger?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. The elimination of the level crossing on the Pictou Harbour Branch, north of the Eastern Car Works at Trenton, Pictou County, has been given consideration.

2. An item has been placed in this year's estimates for the construction of a subway at this point.

THE RACING FORM.

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Is the Minister of Justice aware as to whether or not the Post Office Department excluded from the mails The Racing Form, published in the United States?

2. Is the Government aware as to whether or not the said publication is finding its way into Canada through the agency of the express companies?

3. Is it the intention of the Minister of Justice to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent the coming into Canada of the said publication through the agency of the express companies?

Mr. DOHERTY: With regard to this question, as it stood on the Order Paper up to to-day it was not in the same form as that in which it stands to-day. The answer was prepared to the question as it stood but as it reads to-day it asks whether the Government had information about certain matters. To answer the question as it stands to-day, I should have to get more information and I therefore have to ask that the question be allowed to stand.

Mr. McKENZIE: The question was reconstructed at the suggestion of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might explain that the question, as it originally stood, was, in my judgment, objectionable in part; and after a conference with the hon. member for Cape Breton (North) the question was revised so as to read as it now appears on the Order Paper.

Mr. McKENZIE: The answer that would be given to the former question would be quite acceptable to me if the Minister is prepared to give it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question stands.

Mr. DOHERTY: I should like to point out that first of all the question read "Has the Minister of Justice" certain information. This question asks "Has the Govern ment" certain information, and before I can answer that I must make inquiry of every department, to see whether they have information on the subject.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Minister of Justice is the Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: It ought to be that way.

BRICK FOR NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDING.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. In the construction of the new Parliament Building is it the intention to use brick supplied by the Ontario National Brick Company, Limited?
2. If so, what quantity of the said brick will be supplied and at what price will it be delivered at the works?
3. Up to January 25, 1917, what was the total quantity of the said bricks delivered at the works?

Mr. ROGERS: 1, 2 and 3. A contract has been awarded for 5,000,000 common brick, which is one-half the total estimated quantity required. This contract is not with the Ontario National Brick Company, Limited, but they will have an opportunity of tendering on the balance, when the same is required.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. In the construction of the new Parliament Building is it the intention to use brick supplied by the National Brick Company of Laprairie, Limited?
2. If so, what quantity of the said brick will be supplied, and at what price will it be delivered at the works?
3. Up to January 25, 1917, what was the total quantity of the said bricks delivered at the works?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes.

2. A contract has been executed with the National Brick Company of Laprairie, Limited, under date of September 6, 1916, for the supply of 5,000,000 common brick at $10.50 per thousand, delivered at the site.

3. 4,449,000.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS—SAFETY-FIRST INSPECTORS.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. How many safety-first inspectors are there on the Canadian Government railways?
2. What are their names and salaries, respectively?
3. Is there a safety-first engineer employed?
4. If so, who is he, and what is his salary?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Three. They also perform duties of first-aid instructors.

2. W. H. Tout, P. P. Begin, and H. Mitchinson. Salaries, $83.33 per month.

3. Yes.

4. J. E. Long; $225 per month.

DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY MEAT SUPPLIES.

Mr. COPP:

1. Who has the contract for supplying meat for the Dorchester Penitentiary?
2. What is being paid per pound for the different kinds of meat supplied under said contract?
3. When does present contract expire?

Mr. DOHERTY:

1. The Harris Abattoir Company.

2. Beef, $9.60 per 100 lb.; mutton, $10.60 per 100 lb.

3. March 31, 1917.

ENLISTMENT OF NOEL GAZELLE.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Has the Government been made aware that a minor of fifteen years of age, named Noel Gazelle known as Razel (Number 324853), has joined the Canadian troops, without the consent of his parents?
2. Under the King's Regulations, is such an enlistment valid?

3. Did the parents of this boy demand his release?
4. If so, has such request been granted by the Department of Militia? If not, why?
5. To what nationality does soldier Gazelle belong?
6. Where is he at the present time?
7. Is it the practice of the Government to enlist minors of fifteen years of age without the consent of their parents?
8. If so, what are the reasons for so doing?

Mr. KEMP:

1. Private Noel Gazelle enlisted in the 57th Overseas Battery on March 8, 1916. On October 14, 1916, a letter was received from Lt.-Col. Armand Lavergne, M.P.P., stating that this soldier enlisted without the consent of his parents, and was only sixteen years of age, and requested that he be returned from England. Lt.-Col. Lavergne was informed that, owing to the statement of age taken under oath at attestation, this soldier was over eighteen years of age, and no further action could be taken. No application was received from this soldier's parents for his discharge until he had been in the forces for over seven months, and was, at the time of application, in England and under Imperial authority.

2. Under King's Regulations, such an enlistment is valid.

3. Not until seven months after enlistment.

4. Request not granted for reasons stated in No. 1.

5. Gazelle was born at Levis, Quebec. His father claims to be a Syrian.

6. Private Gazelle is at present in England or at the front.

7. The Government does not enlist minors under eighteen years of age without the consent of their parents. Age sworn to on attestation is legally binding.

8. Answered by No. 7.

DISMISSALS FROM THE MILITIA.

Mr. DELISLE:

1. Did the Department of Militia bring any deserters before the Court of Sessions at Quebec last summer?
2. If so, how many of such cases brought before the court were dismissed?
3. Did the Judge recommend that costs for some of the dismissed cases be paid by the Crown?
4. Has the Government declined to pay said costs?
5. If so, for what reasons?

Mr. KEMP:

1. Yes.

2. Eight acquittals during whole of 1916.

3. Yes, in four cases.

4. Yes.

5. On the ground that the prosecution was on behalf of the Crown, and no costs are collectable against the Crown as a matter of right. The Crown may, in its discretion, pay costs. It was not considered advisable in these cases that costs should be paid.

ARTHUR STEELE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Was Arthur Steele, of Boylston, preventive officer of the Department of Customs, dismissed?
2. If so, why, and on what date?
3. Was there an investigation?
4. If so, by whom, what was the charge, and who laid the complaint?
5. What was the salary of said officer?
6. Who was appointed as his successor, on whose recommendation, and at what salary?

Mr. REID:

1, 2, 3 and 4. His services were dispensed with by order in council of 24th July, 1915, owing to the fact that the Customs business transacted at Boylston did not appear to warrant the employment of an officer at that place.

5. Salary $150 a year.

6. There has not been any one appointed as his successor.

WAR SUPPLIES—HAY.

Mr. PROULX:

1. How many tons of hay has the Department of Militia or the War Purchasing Commission purchased during the month of December last, to be delivered at the sheds of the wharf or harbour of Montreal?
2. What was the price paid per ton?
3. How many tons were purchased since the first of January, 1917, and what was the price paid per ton?

Mr. BURRELL: 1, 2 and 3. The hay referred to was not purchased by either the Department of Militia or the War Purchasing Commission, but by the Department of Agriculture acting for the British War Office. It is undesirable in the public interest to give information on such matters at the present time.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Buchanan.—For a copy of all communications, reports and documents concerning the alleged treatment of Thos. Kelly, a prisoner in the Stony Mountain Penitentiary.

Mr. Sinclair.—For a copy of all letters, petitions and other documents in the possession of the Department of Customs relating to the dismissal of Arthur Steele of Boylston, N.S., a preventive officer of said department.

Mr. Sinclair.—For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of the Department of Public Works bearing date after September, 1911, relating to the expenditure of money voted last session for harbour improvements at Tracadie, in the County of Antigonish, including copies of all letters relating to the same written by Mr. G. A. R. Rollings to the said Minister of Public Works or to any other member of the Government.

Mr. Sinclair.—For a copy of all correspondence in the possession of the Department of Public Works bearing date after September, 1911, relating to the extension of a breakwater at Breen's Point, in the County of Antigonish.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURN.

Mr. Turriff.—1. What are the names and present rank of all appointees as chief recruiting officers or as district or special recruiting officers, not local or regimental, made since the beginning of the war?

2. What were the dates of their respective appointments?

3. What were the ages and vocations of respective appointees?

4. What is the name of military organization, if any, in which appointees had previously served?

5. What was the rank of appointees while serving in any military organization?

6. Have the services of any of these appointees been dispensed with?

7. If so, what were their names, and on what dates were they retired?

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

STATEMENT BY HON. P. E. BLONDIN.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. P. E. BLONDIN (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I saw yesterday for the first time, in the Ottawa Evening Journal of Friday last, January 26, a report of the Canadian Press, which I will read:

Montreal, Jan. 26.—Hon. P. E. Blondin, through his lieutenant, Felix Durocher, has issued a reply to an affidavit, which purported to give a report of his remarks at St. Rose during a Dorchester county by-election speech on Wednesday night. The affidavit credited Mr. Blondin with contending that the Allison scandal was of no importance to St. Rose because it is English money that was stolen, while those who desired to escape conscription could do so by crossing the United States border. Mr. Blondin's explanation follows:

The statement which has been sworn to by certain Liberals with regard to my utterances are a distortion of my words. I never by any means intended to convey the meaning which they have attached to my speech. Mr. Cannon had been stating in his speeches that the Conservative party had been grafting from the Canadian treasury in connection with munition contracts.

In my speech at St. Rose I explained that it was not true that the Allison scandal had to do with Canadian money pointing out that the money paid for the shells was the money of the British Government. I did not imply that Allison had done a worthy act, but simply corrected Mr. Cannon's mis-statement. In regard to the conscription matter I told the people of St. Rose that I did not believe conscription would be necessary because so many Canadians were eager to go and fight for the cause of liberty and humanity. I added that if any of them were afraid of conscription, if conscription should be passed and they did not want to go to the war, they had a remedy left. They could go across the United States line which is near St. Rose and escape military service.

First of all, as for Mr. Desrochers, I beg to state that he did not act as my secretary or lieutenant, and that during the whole election I had no connection with him whatever. I never spoke to him concerning the matter referred to in the report which I have just read. I never authorized him to make any statement for me, and I never was informed by him or anybody else of the statement reported to have been made by him on my behalf. I have inquired from Mr. Desrochers about the correctness of the statement, and he denies, and authorizes me to deny in this House, the last part of that report, namely, that part which relates to conscription.

As to the statement itself, to wit, that I advised people to cross the boundary, which I am informed, was freely commented on by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), and the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp), I must say that there is not a single particle of truth in that report. The facts concerning the matter are very plain. I was replying to a speech in which my opponent had strongly endeavoured to show that conscription was coming by means of the National Service cards, which, he said, meant nothing but conscription, and that very soon coercion would be used by the Borden English-Protestant Government against the Catholic French-Canadians, and that very soon armed soldiers would come and force their husbands and sons to go to war.

These are the very notes that are still fresh on the paper on which I wrote them when preparing my answer.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Can you swear to that?

Mr. BLONDIN: I can swear to it. I can bring into this House the affidavits of a hundred and fifty men worthy of confidence, which, I am afraid, will make the whole Liberal party blush.

My answer to these arguments was that the National Service cards did not mean anything of the kind and were only an appeal to the patriotism and good-will of every citizen whose duty it was to sign them; that if conscription had to come it would come openly; that this Government could not promise or declare that conscription would never come, as it would be cowardice on the part of the Government to make such a declaration or promise; that it might have to come; but that for the present there was no question of conscription, and the Government did not by the National Service cards intend any coercion of the people, and that the best proof of this was that the stretch of 4,000 miles of frontier had been left unguarded and open. And this I said in order to show the stupidity of the contentions of my opponent. I may add, Mr. Speaker, that any other construction of my words is purely and simply gross misrepresentation.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to supplement his explanation by giving us the name of the Liberal gentleman who spoke as he did.

Mr. BLONDIN: In Ste. Rose, Mr. D'Anjou, who presented himself as a lawyer from Rimouski, and I can give some of the other names.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Who is Mr. Desrochers?

Mr. BLONDIN: He is a lawyer of Montreal.

GRAIN CONGESTION IN THE WEST.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McCOIG: I draw the attention of the Government to an article that appeared in one of to-day's papers. It is headed "Congestion of Grain in West becomes serious," and reads:

> Saskatoon, Jan. 30.—Grain congestion in the West has reached a serious condition, in the opinion of J. R. Wilson, superintendent of the Dominion Government elevator here, who declares that unquestionably there is far more grain in the country than anyone had any idea of at harvest time.
>
> With the embargos against inward shipments to Port Arthur, Fort William, Saskatoon and Moosejaw, it is little use for either farmers or interior elevators to receive cars for there is no place to route them to.

My reason for calling this matter to the attention of the Government is that during the past year there has been a great shortage of feed throughout the province of Ontario, and in many cases hundreds of cattle and hogs have been taken to market before being brought to a fit condition for selling. To-day, there are no doubt hundreds of cattle and hogs that should be retained for feeding purposes that, on account of the shortage of feed, are being slaughtered, and this will greatly affect the meat situation next year. If the Government can remove the embargo and allow grain to be brought into Ontario, their action will be greatly appreciated by men who are anxious to comply with the Government's request for the greatest possible production in the coming year.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The despatch which the hon. gentleman has read contains information most of which I apprehend to be the facts. Part of it is not disagreeable information, as it tells us that the Northwest, on the ultimate revision of its output, shows a much larger yield of grain than we had heretofore thought would have been turned out. That, as far as it goes, is useful and very agreeable information. As regards the car congestion, there is probably not a foot of ground on the North American continent where congestion is not very strong and very pressing, and causing a variety of hardships. The railways have to impose embargos when it is necessary, and I am quite certain they do not put on any embargos when it is not absolutely necessary. If my hon. friend can point out any way by which the car shortage can be diminished in its pressure upon the industries and upon the traffic of the country, we would be very glad to have his suggestions. The railroad companies are doing everything they possibly can. and the Board of Railway Commissioners is using the powers at its command in order to ameliorate the situation as far as possible. But the situation is a pressing one, and we shall simply have to bear what we cannot get rid of by any reasonable means.

Mr. OLIVER: Is there not a Common Carriers' Act that requires the railway companies to take goods for shipment to destination according to the order of the owner?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: My hon. friend the Minister of Railways can answer that better than I can.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not know whether the Act covers that or not, but I know that both the railway companies and the Board of Railway Commissioners are doing everything in their power to get the freight delivered.

WAR PURCHASING COMMISSON.

INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. CARVELL: Just before the close of the last session an order was passed by this House calling for a return of all purchases made by the War Purchasing Commission.

A few day ago I inquired of the clerk of records and I found that, so far as he knew, this return had not been brought down. I made no remarks about it, as I assumed that we should have the auditor general's report in our hands and that it would cover at least a portion of the information required. Now, we have received the information from the Minister of Finance that that portion of the auditor general's report covering the transactions of the War Purchasing Commission will not be available until after the adjournment. I would like to know if the Minister of Militia cannot have that return brought down before we adjourn next week?

Mr. KEMP: A few days ago there was laid upon the table of the House a report of the War Purchasing Commission in four large volumes. Was my hon. friend aware of that?

Mr. CARVELL: That is not a compliance with the order of the House which required a statement of the purchases. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia, who was then Acting Minister of Militia, will remember that we discussed the matter on a number of occasions, and that finally the House ordered that the report be given. I think that, an order of the House having been passed, we are entitled to the information.

Mr. KEMP: It is certainly correct for the hon. gentleman to say that any order of this House must be honoured. The idea, however, was that, as the report which was being published would contain such a tremendous amount of detail, there would be sufficient information in it to answer my hon. friend's purpose. Moreover, the auditor general's report would be forthcoming, and between the two reports all the information would be given that would be desirable. The report which my hon. friend asked for was one of tremendous detail, and the department was so busy that it seemed almost impossible to get the work out. In view of the report of the War Purchasing Commission and the report of the auditor general giving practically all the information asked for in the order of the House, I hope my hon. friend will be willing not to insist upon the labour being expended that will be necessary to get out the return for which he has asked.

Mr. CARVELL: I suppose I have no right to discuss the matter at this stage, and I do not intend to do so. I ought, however, be allowed to say that I think the minister has not treated the House exactly as he should, in view of the somewhat extended conversation we had about the matter during the months of April and May last.

Mr. KEMP: I may add that I was acting-Minister at the time—for about two months, I think. After that I was not in control of the Department of Militia and Defence, and consequently was unable to follow the matter up in the way my hon. friend thinks it should have been followed up.

WESTERN COAL MINING.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. BUCHANAN: In the papers this morning there is a despatch from Lethbridge concerning the situation with regard to the coal supply. The fear is expressed that unless the trouble between the miners and the operators is immediately settled there will be considerable suffering, because many communities are practically without coal. The Minister of Labour has gone to the West in an effort to bring about a settlement; has the Government had any report from him as to the progress of the negotiations?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Telegrams received yesterday and the day before indicate that the men in some of the mines have returned to work. I think the men at the Blairmore mine had not returned to work, but were in session discussing the situation at that particular mine, according to the last report which I have received. I am not aware that we have had any direct report from the Minister of Labour. The reports to which I refer are those which have come to the officials of the Department of Labour from representatives of that department in the districts to which my hon. friend has referred.

HON. DR. BELAND, M.P.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MARCIL: The Prime Minister was kind enough to answer a question yesterday with regard to Dr. Beland. He told me that he would inquire still further about the allegation made by Quebec papers that certain Germans had been liberated from the internment camps, and that the matter would be referred to the Minister of Justice—especially the case of one Baron von Polence and one Muntine. I would like the right hon. gentleman to tell us if an exchange is generally made when these men are liberated from Canadian camps.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: With respect to this inquiry I took the same course as was taken with regard to the inquiry of the hon. member for South Renfrew; (Mr. Graham) I addressed a letter this morning to the Minister of Justice directing his attention to the remarks of my hon. friend and asking him to give the information as soon as possible.

Mr. GRAHAM: This letter-writing is a fatal gift.

RECRUITING IN QUEBEC.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask the Minister of Militia to answer a question that I asked him yesterday as to whether the raising of a French-Canadian brigade in the province of Quebec has been authorized?

Mr. KEMP: The department ha not authorized the raising of a brigade. The information which my hon. friend asks for is being inquired into.

$100,000,000 LOAN FOR PUBLIC SERVICE.

On motion of Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Rainville in the Chair:

That it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council to raise by way of loan, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable of the loans authorized by Parliament by any Act heretofore passed, such sum or sums of money, not to exceed in the whole the sum of one hundred million dollars ($100,000,000), as may be required for paying maturing loans and obligations of Canada, carrying on of public works authorized by Parliament and meeting expenditures for general purposes authorized by Parliament.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Chairman, His Excellency the Governor General has been made acquainted with the substance of this resolution, and has been pleased to commend it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is this the time to make known the consent of His Excellency the Governor General—when the resolution is in Committee. That information should be given when the Speaker is in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is correct. I had intended to make the statement, but the Speaker declared the motion carried before I got upon my feet. I hope that under the circumstances my hon. friend's sense of propriety will not be too greatly shocked. I appreciate fully the importance of the point that my hon. friend has made, but it was through inadvertence that I omitted to make the statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I assure my hon. friend that I did not mention the matter simply for the sake of raising a point of order. He must be aware that informing the Committee of the House has no greater effect than giving the information before an ordinary standing committee. It is desirable that the rule should be adhered to; perhaps my hon. friend might give the information to the House after the Committee rises, so that the matter may appear regularly in the minutes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure that the statement was not made last night by the Prime Minister. The proper time to give this information is when the motion is made that the House do resolve itself into committee on the day following for the purpose of considering the resolution. My hon. friend will pardon me if I have to correct even him. But I shall be glad to observe propriety in regard to a matter which is of great importance.

The object of this resolution is to replenish the borrowing powers of the Dominion upon general purpose account. It will be necessary for us during the coming year to raise very considerable sums by way of borrowing. Some of that money will be raised in Canada, and possibly some in the United States.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Why not all in Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will deal with that just in a moment. We have not in mind an immediate loan either in Canada or in the United States, but it will not be long before we shall have to consider the question of a further loan. My right hon. friend has very properly raised the question, why not borrow all the requirements in Canada? It is possible that we may be able to do so. That will depend entirely upon financial conditions prevailing in Canada, and the state of exchange between Canada and the United States, for example, let us assume that exchange as between Canada and the United States is unfavourable to Canada. We are at the present time buying very large amounts of raw material and other commodities from the United States. These enter into our domestic manufactures, and our manufactures for export. If it should transpire that on account of our large purchases from the United States for that purpose and for other purposes the balance of trade should prove unfavourable to Canada and be not offset otherwise, then if we borrowed in the United States market our exchange would be affected advantageously.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would reciprocity facilitate exchanges?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My right hon. friend and I have discussed reciprocity before. It is a subject which I should like to discuss with him, but the present does not seem to be an opportune time. However, once or twice since war broke out, exchanges have been unfavourable to Canada. At the present time they are rather favourable to Canada, and on the whole they have been extraordinarily well maintained. If, during the year, the exchanges should prove unfavourable, it would be our proper policy to borrow in the United States.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend borrows from the United States will he use the usual channel, through the Bank of Montreal?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall make no pronouncement upon that at the present time because I do not know what I shall do. I think it quite unwise to make any announcement in advance as to what one's course is to be. The object will be to get the best result. The Bank of Montreal has acted as financial agent for the Dominion Government most acceptably for many years. As to what I shall do if I am obliged to borrow in the United States, what course I shall adopt, that is a matter that will have to be determined in the light of prevailing conditions.

There is another contingency under which we might borrow in the United States: that is to say, if the financial condition in Canada was such that it would be a proper course for us to adopt. What I mean is that at the present time Canada has a very large agricultural and industrial production. Prices of commodities and products of all kinds are exceedingly high. That means that there are large demands upon our banking institutions in carrying the large volume of our production and consequently a situation might exist in which the Dominion Government might desire to raise $75,000,000 or $100,000,000, and in which it would not be in the public interest, having regard to financial stability in Canada, to raise that loan in Canada. It would then be more advantageous to seek the American market. Generally speaking, I should like to make all our loans in Canada. Canada will have a very large debt after the war is over, and it would make very much for national strength and financial stability if the greater amount of Canada's debt should be held by the Canadian people, because the position then would be that Canada, in her collective capacity, in her national capacity, would owe her debt to her own people. That would be a strong situation. It is very desirable we should aim at that, but the amounts which we may have to raise in order to finance our own interests on this side of the Atlantic, and to assist the United Kingdom in making purchases of munitions and supplies in Canada, are so large that I am not clear as to whether the Canadian market will be able to take the entire amount, and that is where judgment will be required as between the Canadian and the American market. I assure my hon. friend that I would much rather borrow in Canada than in the United States, for the reasons I have given.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I suppose it is inevitable that the Government must borrow during the current year in Canada or the United States, and, as the minister has stated, in all probability the loans will be of such an amount that he will be obliged for one reason or another to go to the United States.

In connection with loans made since the beginning of the war, on one occasion at least, I expressed in Parliament the regret that the loans had not been of the character of national loans to the extent which I had hoped for. That is, the minister, in selling his securities on the domestic market, did not make as broad an appeal to the people of Canada as I think he should have made. Primarily, of course, the object was attained; he secured the amount of money he, at the moment, desired for Canada. At the present time I notice the minister is encouraging a saving campaign in Canada with a view to increasing our banking reserves and savings so that they will be available for the commerce of the country and the purposes of the Government. The suggestion I would make is this, that the Minister of Finance will have an excellent opportunity of inculcating the value of national saving by asking the people of Canada to invest in the securities offered by the Government in the event of their desiring to make a domestic loan. The subscriptions to previous domestic loans and since the beginning of the war have been very satisfactory indeed, and very creditable to Canada. However, I think an investigation of the subscriptions made will show that the money so invested came largely from a class of people who are accustomed to invest in Government and municipal securities and other high grade securities. I suppose that in many instances the subscriptions came from banks and insurance companies who were making a substitution of securities. I have no doubt that the life insurance companies of Canada held very large amounts of United States securities, and that on the occasion of our domestic loans they replace them with our own war issue securities. Of course, that is not objectionable. The suggestion I would like to make, if the minister contemplates an early appeal to the public for subscriptions for another loan, is that he create some organization which will enable him to get to the people generally in support of that loan. I am sure that every member of Parliament, and every agency in this country is at the service of the minister if he desires to make the campaign as widespread as possible. It is not necessary for me to say to Parliament, or to the Minister of Finance, that it is very much in the interest of Canada at the present time, and for the future, that we engage in the strictest private and national economy, and that we educate our people to save and invest in our Government securities. I think that if the minister, in placing his contemplated loan before the public, were to endeavour to create some organization to carry out the proposal, it would be in the interests of the country and of the Government as well. I would ask the minister if any portion of the loans already authorized have not been exhausted.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have a balance, I think, on general purpose borrowing account of about $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. My hon. friend will observe that this borrowing is not for war purposes. I think I explained to my hon. friend last year, and it can do no harm to explain to the House now, that if we are obliged to borrow in the United States, it will facilitate our borrowing to do so on general purposes account rather than on war account. That is the reason why this $100,000,000

4 p.m. Borrowing Bill is to be introduced separately from the general War Appropriations Bill, to be introduced by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Would my hon. friend explain the reason why he borrows on general purposes account rather than on war purposes account? What is the difference?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are two reasons. Objection might possibly be raised —I hardly think it probable—in the United States to an issue for war purposes. But apart from that, in a neutral market, bonds issued on general purposes account will sell more widely than bonds issued on war account. That would seem to indicate that a part of the community may not be disposed to subscribe for bond issues on war account but might be quite ready to subscribe for bonds issued on general purposes account.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would ask the minister a question—perhaps he might answer it at this stage—for the general information of Parliament. I think we have advanced to the British Government the sum of $150,000,000 on account of munition contracts. That is in excess of the credit afforded by the Canadian chartered banks. I would like to know what the arrangements are between the Department of Finance and the British Government. Are British Treasury notes deposited with the Canadian Government for such financing, or has the minister had an open account up to the present?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Has my hon. friend concluded his remarks as to a better organization?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, possibly my hon. friend will permit me to take up that question first. I entirely agree with my hon. friend as to the desirability of having a widespread subscription for the war loans of the Dominion. It is good from a financial standpoint, and it is good from a patriotic standpoint. But I would submit to my hon. friend that that is precisely what we have been doing. The two loans which we have placed before the Canadian people, one for $50,000,000 in November, 1915, and the other for $100,000,000 in September of last year, were both doubly subscribed. I gave a very great deal of personal attention to both of these loans, four or five weeks of hard work in each case. Patriotism creates a favourable atmosphere, but loans will not float themselves without attention. The utmost care was taken to fix a price which was strictly in accord with market conditions, and which would likely insure the success of the loan. Until this war, no issues of any magnitude had been made in the Dominion, and it takes a very considerable time to educate the great body of the public to subscribe for public loans. There is a certain class in the financial community, as my hon. friend said, and a portion of the investing public, who subscribe freely to bonds and other securities. What we have sought to do is to enlist the interest of the small subscriber, and I think we have been very successful. We allowed in each case two weeks as the period during which subscriptions might be made. We advertised the loans in every paper, daily and weekly, morning and evening, religious and secular, Grit and Tory, in the Dominion of Canada; so that the advertising was of a very extensive character. In addition to that, we enlisted the editorial co-operation of the press, and the press responded, as it always has since the outbreak of the war, and did a great deal indeed to bring the loans to the favourable attention of the Canadian people. In addition to that, as my hon. friend knows, the brokers did magnificent work in connection with both loans, some of them spending almost as much money for advertising as they made in commissions. Besides, they sent their travellers throughout the country, and generally did everything possible to promote the success of the two issues. In addition, we have an instrument that I myself did not know could be made so powerful to accomplish the object we have in view, namely, some 3,500 branch banks. It is a wonderful system for the purpose of getting in subscriptions. The success of our loans was due in considerable measure to the fact that we have had the branch banks, the brokers and the press working for us in introducing the securities to the attention of the public.

In connection with the first loan, I think there were some 25,000 subscribers, and in the case of the last loan, some 30,000 subscribers. The lowest denomination was placed as low as $100, and there was a very large number of subscriptions for those $100 bonds. In making allotment, we cut down the larger subscriptions, because the loans were over-subscribed, alloting in full up to $25,000 only. It is a matter of great gratification to me that in connection with the important subject of allotment in regard to the last loan I heard absolutely no complaint whatsoever. It seemed to be entirely satisfactory to the community when we allotted fully up to $25,000 and beyond that cut down very substantially the higher subscriptions.

Since the last loan, in order to promote national savings, which I regard as of great importance at the present time both from the economic and patriotic standpoint, we created a short-term issue of three-year war savings certificates. It has been very gratifying to me to find that these certificates have met with a very considerable degree of public appreciation. We are, so to speak, pushing their sale. We are enlisting the co-operation of the press, the clergy, boards of trade and public bodies throughout the country. We are sending out literature to manufacturers and to labour organizations, and are communicating directly with the operatives themselves. In the last week or ten days, since the certificates have been out, something like 5,000 applications have been received, aggregating some $400,000. Of course, we do not expect to obtain very large sums in terms of Dominion finance; they are large sums but not relatively to our requirements, but it is of the greatest importance that the individual citizen should save his money by investing in these certificates. The matter has also, as my hon. friend knows, a patriotic aspect.

My hon. friend asked another question, when he rose the second time—about the British Government. When the war broke out the exchange was very much in favour of Great Britain as against this continent, and the result was that Canada borrowed her war expenditure in Great Britain up to about the spring of 1915. If we had not done that I think we should have lost considerable gold, because the exchanges were greatly against America. We borrowed at first therefore from the Imperial Treasury. As our situation improved we were able to take care of our own expenditure here. In 1915 the exchange was reversed and became unfavourable to Great Britain. It is very unfavourable now to Great Britain, although not nearly so unfavourable to Great Britain as to other European belligerents. The exchange situation to-day is such that Great Britain can only purchase on this side of the Atlantic if she is able to borrow on this side of the Atlantic. That is really an understatement of the fact, because she must not only borrow in order to buy here and in order to pay for her purchases on this side of the Atlantic, but she must also borrow for the purpose of sustaining sterling exchange and holding it at the figure of $4.76, which is about the gold export point. That is also of great importance, although this being a technical matter, its importance is not realized by the general public. Our position very much improved by reason of our great production in 1915, by reason of the large prices obtained for produce of all kinds and by reason of our great production of munitions. Canada has been able, out of her own revenue, and by her own borrowing in Canada, to help Great Britain in making her purchases in Canada. That, of course, is of great advantage to Great Britain and also of great advantage to Canada. Generally speaking, the policy which has been adopted is this: We made an arrangement to borrow from Great Britain for our expenditures in Great Britain and on the Continent, that is to say, we do not buy exchange on Great Britain to pay for the maintenance of our troops there or on the Continent, we borrow the amount necessary from the Imperial Government and they borrow from us here part of the amount that they require to pay for their munitions. That runs about $25,000,000 a month in this country. One way of dealing with the accounts would be to offset one against the other. But Great Britain has been obliged to borrow heavily in New York and she had been obliged to lodge collateral in New York as security for her borrowings. I think it is unfortunate that she has been so obliged, but it is the fact, and it is an object to her to find securities of a high quality which she can deposit as collateral. I went to New York a year ago last fall at the request of the Imperial Treasury to meet Lord Reading and the representatives of the Treasury. I thought that they would be obliged to give collateral later on and I made the proposition at that time that as we owed them, let us say, $100,000,000, and as they required collateral in New York, we should fund our debt of $100,000,000 to them by issuing them our securities for the same period and at the same rate as they had issued theirs in the London market, and that they should use that collateral to borrow against in New York, where our credit is about as high as that of any country in the world. Later that plan turned out to be of great advantage both to Great Britain and to us, as it gave them more than $100,000,000—I will give the figures in a few minutes—of high-class collateral which they put up with other securities against their $250,000,000 loan.

[Sir W. T. White.]

While it gave them collateral to the extent of $100,000,000 or more, it gave us also an advantage in that we funded our floating debt to Great Britain.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Did that simply refer to advances on account?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Advances on account. But it liquidated the open account in respect to these advances. The result is that we funded our debt—I have not the period of the issue precisely in my mind. It was not only an advantage to Canada to make an issue to pay off her indebtedness, but that issue was made without any expense to Canada and at precisely the same rate of interest as Great Britain had borrowed on the London market on the Imperial credit. We had the further advantage of the exchange situation, which for some time had been favourable to us, and in determining the amount of our indebtedness which should be cancelled over there by the issue of these securities we had regard to the exchange situation which existed between Great Britain and Canada at the time the advances were made. That, I may say, was at the suggestion of the Imperial Treasury, and it was altogether a good arrangement for both them and us. Altogether, we issued, or are about to issue, to the Imperial Treasury about $122,000,000, and to that extent liquidated our indebtedness for advances made by Great Britain to us in Great Britain.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Is this Government the guarantor of the credit afforded by the banks to the British Government?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No; I will speak of that in a moment. The Dominion Government has made advances to the Imperial Munitions Board at Ottawa of $116,000,000 to date, and we have agreed to advance them a further sum of $34,000,000, for which I have the money provided. That makes a total of $150,000,000 which the Government of Canada will have advanced to the Imperial Government for the purpose of buying munitions and supplies in Canada. We owe the Imperial Government in London about $97,000,000. So there is at present a balance owing us by the Imperial Government of about $18,000,000.

Mr. NESBITT: Is that $97,000,000 over and above the $122,000,000 just mentioned?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. With regard to that $97,000,000, we could either issue our securities, which they could pledge in New York in connection with further loans there, or we could set it off against this larger sum which they will owe us.

My hon. friend has asked me about the banks. The Dominion Government, as I have stated, has loaned or arranged to loan $150,000,000. We made arrangements with the banks to loan $100,000,000 direct to the Imperial Government. The Dominion Government is not guarantor of those loans, as it was not regarded as necessary that the Imperial credit should be fortified by the Dominion credit.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I did not mean that the guarantee was necessary, but that the banks might have desired it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. The first $75,000,000 loan was against the security of British treasury bills, and then there was a further loan of $24,000,000, making a total of $100,000,000. The last $50,000,000 which the Dominion Government advanced to the Imperial Government was borrowed by us from the banks. In that case it was loaned direct to us.

Mr. NESBITT: That last $50,000,000 borrowed from the banks was in connection with the $100,000,000 war loan recently issued?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: No. We borrowed the amount from the banks and loaned it to the Imperial Government.

Mr. CARVELL: Can the minister give us any idea of what the debt of the country will be at the end of the present fiscal year? I should like to know what we shall owe in Canada, and what in London.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I thought some hon. gentlemen might desire that information, and I have had a memorandum prepared.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: To what date does this memorandum go?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: From 1914 to the end of last month. This memorandum shows in round figures that the net national debt to March 31, 1914, was $335,000,000—that is, up to the end of the last fiscal period before the war broke out. The amount of the national debt to March 31, 1915, was $449,000,000; to March 31, 1915, $615,000,000; and to January 31, 1917, $745,000,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Does that include our liabilities to the British Government for munitions and other war supplies? I do not want to press this question if for any reason the minister might think it inadvisable to answer.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What I have given is a correct statement of the national debt to January 31, 1917, namely, $745,000,000; that represents the debt so far as ascertained. My hon. friend is aware that Great Britain supplies our troops on the continent with such equipment as they may require at the front, such as rations, munitions, and other supplies.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Has this liability been liquidated up to date?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The liability has not been ascertained up to date. Since the last session of Parliament an arrangement has been come to, whereby the British Government will be paid six shillings per day per man for rations, clothing and equipment of every kind whatsoever, munitions, small arms, artillery, etc., supplied to the Canadian forces at the front. In our view, that charge is quite fair and reasonable.

Mr. CARVELL: That includes rations and clothing?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Everything.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: When was the last settlement made on that basis?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The adjustment has not yet been made. I am speaking from memory. But I can get the information for my hon. friend, if desired.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Would there be any substantial amount due on that account?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It might be a matter of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. At all events the arrangement is so fair that the amount in terms of war finance is not large.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It looks very reasonable.

Mr. CARVELL: Am I to conclude from the statement the minister has just given, that the total debt of Canada up to January 31 will be, roughly speaking, $800,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think that is a fairly accurate estimate.

Mr. NESBITT: I understood the minister to say that the $745,000,000 does not include the open accounts between the two Governments; that is, the British Government owe us $150,000,000, we will say, and we owe them $97,000,000.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is the net debt. I think about $800,000,000 represents the situation.

Mr. NESBITT: That includes the $50,000,000 the minister just spoke of as being due under the new system of adjustment? But the net debt does not include the adjustment of the open accounts?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot say definitely as to that, but my opinion is this. They owe us more than we owe them on open account, and I think—I am not positive—that the principle of set-off has been applied, and that $745,000,000 represents the net debt.

Mr. NESBITT: That is, you have charged them with your open account and credited them with their open account?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. NESBITT: In view of our large revenue, I was rather surprised to hear the minister say that this proposed loan was for ordinary account. Does he not anticipate that the revenue will be large enough to pay the expenditures on current account? I should also like to know why the minister thinks that the last war loan would not have been subscribed on a straight five per cent basis, after paying one-quarter per cent commission to the brokers. The loan was issued at 97½. I have often wondered if it would not have been subscribed and more than subscribed on a straight five per cent and at par.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think not. My hon. friend knows that when an issue of securities is made, regard must be had to the price of other securities of a like character. When we used to make loans in London, if our securities were standing, let us say, at par, and we desired to sell £5,000,000 of a new loan, we would never attempt to put it out at par, we would put it out at, say 98. The reason is that the stock exchange quotation is for small lots, and if you want to sell £5,000,000 or £6,000,000, you have to make, so to speak, a wholesale price. What used to happen in cases like that was this: Suppose that the loan was a popular one and was taken up, then it would go to a premium, which was a very desirable thing in connection with the loan, because everybody felt happy over his investment. In all our financing, both here and in the United States, we have been affected in the price which we have been able to obtain by the price at which Great Britain has had to sell her securities in the American market. Just recently, the British Government was obliged to pay in the New York market a six per cent rate on two-year or three-year notes, which carried the option to the holder of subscribing for five and a half per cent United Kingdom bonds maturing in twenty years.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, I understood that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A year ago last fall the Imperial Government put out in the United States a five per cent five-year loan at 98, the underwriters taking a considerable portion of it at 96. That loan went down to 95, to 94, to 93. When Canada comes on the market with her securities, she is to a certain extent in competition with those Imperial securities and in competition with that market price. Canada's credit today is better on this continent than Great Britain's credit. We can sell our securities on a lower interest basis than Great Britain can sell her securities in the United States. Of course, Great Britain has offered no securities in Canada. Answering my hon. friend's question specifically: At the time that we made the loan last fall of $100,000,000, our fifteen year securities, payable in New York, were slightly under par; that is to say, that was the quotation for a market lot.

Mr. NESBITT: About 99½.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The five per cent fifteen-year securities which we had issued the previous March were about 99½. Now, if I had attempted to sell $100,000,000 to the public at par, of course, I could not have done it. You have to put your securities out at a lower rate than the stock exchange quotation, because you are selling wholesale, and it is of supreme importance that your loan should go to a premium. If your loan goes to a discount, you are not so welcome the next time you come along. There is such a thing as a prudent generosity in connection with loans, especially to your own people, and it is much better to put out a loan at 97½ and have it run up a point or a point and a half by reason of over-subscription, than to have it go to a discount a point or a point and a half, because that injures your credit. We have been very successful in regard to our loans, every loan put out in the United States by the Dominion of Canada having gone to a substantial premium. The last loan put out stands just about the issue price, but it did run up to 99 or a little over. The best proof of our financing is the market quotations for our loans after they were issued and subsequently our credit has been improved by our loans, because every time we have made a loan, it has been open to any subscriber to take a small profit if he has so desired. That has been by reason of the heavy over-subscription and the popular demand for the loans.

Mr. NESBITT: I thoroughly understood what the hon minister told us before, that it is necessary to issue a loan at a price a little lower than the market price. I quite appreciate that in connection with loans issued in the United States or Great Britain. This, however, was a loan to the people, and we are not told how much of that loan was taken up by the people and how much by the loan companies and the banks. The loan companies and the banks, of course, would want to get the security at a price at which they could resell it at a profit; but the ordinary man or woman who bought $1,000 or $2,000, was, so far as my knowledge goes, perfectly satisfied with the five per cent Government loan as he was getting only three per cent from the banks. But the price at which the loan could be sold afterwards would depend entirely on how much of the $100,000,000 was taken up by the loan companies and the banks and how much was taken up by the private investors. That was why I asked the question; it was not because I did not know that it was necessary for the minister to issue loans in the way described by him.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the case of a loan as large as $100,000,000, you have to rely on all classes of the community to contribute. The small investors could not subscribe nearly as much as the larger investors. It would take ten thousand $1,000 subscriptions to make $10,000,000. You get subscriptions from the small investor; you get subscriptions from the business man who can subscribe for $25,000 or $30,000; you get them from capitalists who will take $100,000 or $200,000 or even more; you get them from the life insurance companies who will subscribe for large amounts, according to the state of their finances, and you get subscriptions from other companies. The banks took none of the last issue, because my arrangement with them was that the public was to have the first call. My hon. friend has it in mind that if the public would take the loan on a five per cent basis, it should be put out on that basis. That is not quite sound, for this reason, that notwithstanding you are putting out a loan for patriotic purposes, such as the prosecution of the war, it is always wise to observe the financial or business conditions. The patriotic aspect of it creates a certain atmosphere which is favourable, but your loan must conform with market conditions or, even if immediately successful, it will go to a discount later on. In other words, it must conform with the prevailing financial conditions applicable to that class of security; otherwise, investors will subscribe for it under patriotic impulse, hold it for a little while, and then sell it out and buy something more attractive. I am quite clear that your loan must be such as, in the estimation of the investing public, makes it a desirable investment at the time when it is put out.

Mr. NESBITT: In regard to the three per cent certificates which have been issued, what rate do they pay and are they transferable to future loans?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The three-year war saving certificates are sold at the rate of $86 for $100 denominations, $43 for $50 denominations, and $21.50 for $25 denominations. The rate of interest is slightly over 5 per cent.

Mr. NESBITT: They do not bear interest, but are payable at par?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is correct.

Mr. A. K. MACDONALD: Are they in debenture form?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They are really like debenture stock. They are made out in the name of the party who buys them. He may surrender or transfer them according to the terms of the issue, but he cannot by losing his certificate be deprived of his property in it. One reason why we made them payable to the party purchasing is because most people of slender means have no safety-deposit boxes in which to place their securities.

Mr. BLAIN: Did I correctly understand the minister to say that in 1914, the national debt was $335,000,000 and that at the close of the present fiscal year it would be about $800,000,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: On January 31, 1917.

Mr. BLAIN: What proportion of that increase is due to the war expenditure?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot answer that off-hand, but it will be gratifying to my hon. friend to know that during the present fiscal year our revenues have been such as will enable us to pay all our ordinary and all our capital expenditure, and, I think, probaby $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 on account of the principal of our war expenditure. The first year after the war broke out there was a deficit on account of capital and ordinary account amounting to some $40,000,000 or $50,000,000. That was because our revenues were at once affected by the dislocation of business occasioned by the outbreak of war. Since that time our revenues have been such as to enable us to carry on our ordinary and capital expenditure and to pay a considerable amount on account of the principal of our war indebtedness.

Mr. MACDONALD: What was the cost of the flotation of the last loan?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should say about three-quarters of one per cent, or less.

Mr. MACDONALD: What would be the total amount?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: About $750,000.

Mr. MACDONALD: I noticed in the Financial Times a discussion of what was said to be a warning by the minister to the investing public of Canada against investing in English securities. A quotation was made from the Toronto News, which spoke in the very strongest terms of the moral obliquity of the man who would venture to do that. The Financial Times rather questioned the right of the Finance Minister to take such a strong stand. Is it a fact that the Finance Minister has intimated, either directly or indirectly, that he does not think it wise for Canadians to take up any of the English loan?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no hesitation in saying that the Canadian investing public should reserve their funds for Dominion loans. In Great Britain no issues are allowed outside of Government issues except with the consent of the Treasury. Great Britain borrows money in the United States, where there is a plethora of money.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Rolling in gold, they say.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Great Britain uses that money to make purchases in the United States. If the Canadian public buy British securities issued in New York, Canadian money is being used for the purpose of making purchases in the United States. That in itself would not be objectionable if it were not for its possible effect upon our exchanges. International balances, as my hon. friend knows, are settled in gold and if the Canadian public invested largely in British or French loans made in New York for the purpose of buying goods in the United States, exchange would soon become unfavourable to Canada. Apart from that, when the Dominion Government would make its next war loan in Canada the money which would otherwise have been available to take up those issues would have been spent in the United States. What I have said is subject to this qualification: A considerable portion of the loans which we float in Canada find their way to the United States. If we put out a loan of $100,000,000 in Canada, $15,000,000, $20,000,000, or $25,000,000 of it may be sold in the United States by those who took it. That, of course, would be a set-off against $15,000,000, $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 that might be expended by Canadian people in purchasing securities in New York. As long as exchange is not seriously affected and as long as the loan fund in Canada is not depleted so that our loans are unlikely to be subscribed, no harm will be done. But on account of the large sums that we require for our own war expenditures and to finance Great Britain in her purchase of munitions in Canada, it is exceedingly desirable that the Canadian people should conserve their resources for the purpose of buying our war loans. That is not discriminating against Great Britain. The authorities in Great Britain would be the first to suggest that the Canadian people should not purchase those loans in the United States, because there is abundance of money there to take up those loans, and Great Britain is not in any way disadvantaged. I do not hesitate to say that I view those purchases as inadvisable. Answer might be made to me: If a Canadian buys a security in the American market and is able to sell it later at a profit, is that not a gain? It is a gain to the individual, and, in a sense, to the nation. But there is an overriding consideration, and that is that the money has been diverted from the issues which the Dominion Government may offer to the Canadian public. Although the individual may make a profit, the national power to finance itself is weakened.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister has talked all around the point. I merely wanted to know whether or not the hon. gentleman intimated to the investing public in Canada that they should not invest in the British War Loan?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not recollect precisely what I said, but I did give an intimation that I thought it exceedingly desirable that the Canadian investing public should conserve their funds for Dominion war loans and should not buy loans of any government issued in New York, because there is abundance of money in New York to take up those securities. In that I am in entire accord with the Imperial Government. No possible question arises as to the Imperial Treasury. They do not ask the Canadian people to buy loans which they are issuing in New York for the purpose of purchasing munitions in America, because they know perfectly well that we require to make our own war loans here and to supply money to pay for the munitions which they order here. If a situation arose in which the people of Canada were buying securities so extensively in the United States as to seriously affect the exchanges, or seriously affect our prospects of floating our loans in Canada, I should have no hesitation in saying that the Dominion Government should put a tax upon any securities so purchased. I must decline to commit myself as to whether we shall take that course or not; it depends on events.

Mr. DEVLIN: The minister said that our buoyant revenues would fully meet our ordinary expenditure and pay for the interest on some $40,000,000 of war loans. Can the minister inform us now what part of the revenue is formed by the war taxes imposed? That is, the business profits war tax and the stamps and so on?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot give it accurately. For this the first year the result of the business profits war tax will, I think, exceed $10,000,000. Next year the amount will be much larger, because profits for the past year have been very much greater than they were for 1915. The special tax upon the banks realizes about $1,000,000. As to what the stamp and other taxes realize, I am not prepared to say, because I did not know that this question would arise. Those matters are usually dealt with in the Budget.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does the minister intend to exercise any control over stock exchange operations in order to control our financial strength for domestic loans?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: All these questions have had a good deal of thought on my part. I need not say that they are very difficult questions to deal with. We have a boundary line of 3,600 miles between us and the United States. There are numerous financial transactions across that line every day. In my own opinion, the best way to deal with the situation is to watch the exchanges. If our Canadian exchange is maintained, then their purchases over here of our securities and commodities are equalling our purchases over there. If the exchange began to run against us, we might have to take drastic measures with regard to the purchase of securities on the other side. But the exchange at present is quite satisfactory.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the minister ever taken into consideration the question of the succession duty taxation imposed by the provinces? So far as Ontario is concerned, loans to the Ontario Government or securities sold by the Ontario Government are exempt from succession duty tax. If the provinces could see their way clear to applying the same thing to Dominion domestic loans, I think it would help the flotation of the war loans materially. A great many people buy provincial loans, having that object in view, knowing that whatever they have invested in these securities will not be liable to the succession duties which are fairly large. I know it would probably interfere to a considerable extent with the revenues of the provinces, but this is a time when we are all bending every energy to meet the war conditions, and the expenditure in connection with the war.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When our first loan was being floated I took up the question privately with the prime ministers of the several provinces, and they were not unanimous as to the advisability of this course. This was not through any lack of desire on their part to be patriotic and to do everything they could to facilitate the prosecution of the war; their objection was rather on this ground, that a province which has to depend for its revenues upon taxation should not make securities free of taxation to a greater extent than is absolutely necessary, because people will take advantage of such a condition and purchase those securities for the express purpose of evading the tax. If you had enough securities of one kind free of succession duty to absorb a considerable demand the province would be deprived of a large amount of its taxes. In England they are careful not to create a large class of securities that would be free of income tax.

Mr. CARVELL: I think there is a great deal in what the Finance Minister has said.

I would be very sorry, indeed, to see this Government embark on any scheme which would in any way relieve any portion of the community from its due share of taxation. I think the time has come in Canada when every person and every class of person should be taught that they must pay their share of taxation. I know that along the lines mentioned by the Minister of Finance a number of fairly large loans were issued by the province of New Brunswick in the last year and a half which were made tax-exempt in New Brunswick. The result was that there was an unprecedented rush for those bonds, and while they were on the market I think very few of the war bonds were absorbed. Those provincial bonds were all taken up six or eight months ago, and when the last loan was issued there was a very much more hearty response through the province of New Brunswick than in the previous case. I would suggest to the Finance Minister that he might take some steps to prevent, if possible, the floating of any other loans in Canada excepting war loans. I realize the difficulties.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: What could he do?

Mr. CARVELL: I realize that there are difficulties; I simply want to know whether he could not go into the matter and see if something could not be done. It might be done by a super-tax, or a tax of some kind. From the statement given to us to-day, it seems to me that before this war is over we are going to require all the money we can possibly raise in Canada to enable us to do our share.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The minister told us to-day that the public debt of Canada is $745,000,000 at this moment, and that at the end of the fiscal year it will be $800,000,000; and then we will start with this loan of $100,000,000 which we are authorizing. Is it premature to ask my hon. friend how much more he will have to borrow during the next fiscal year, $1917-18? Perhaps he cannot give us the answer to-day.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think I can tell my hon. friend approximately. We may need from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 for our own war expenditures on this side, and we should borrow considerable sums in addition to that for the purpose of establishing the credits here out of which Great Britain can pay for the munitions which she is ordering here.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. ROBB: To come back to the question of investment, if I understood the minister, the Government control the issues of new debentures or stocks that are issued to the public. It occurred to me that it might be a good thing for the Government to at least control some of the mining issues that have been offered and are still being offered to the Canadian public. I have never known a time when more literature came to a man's office, offering attractive prices for mines in a neighbouring province. We know that periodically there runs across this continent a mining boom, and there seems to be one on now. I think it is time for the Government to step in and stop these operators, who, I believe, are 5 p.m. largely people in the United States, gathering up Canadian money and selling what is really a hole in the ground. I think it would be well for the minister to look into that and, if possible, control that sort of investment in our country. There is another feature in connection with this, though perhaps it does not affect the Department of the Minister of Finance. These people are loading down the Canadian mails with circular letters that are carried for one cent a letter, whereas the people of Canada are paying three cents a letter to do legitimate business. I think it is time for the Government to step in and control this sort of work.

Mr. GRAHAM: Can the minister state the rate?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not advisable to state it, and there is no loan immediately in prospect. As things are, unless conditions radically change, it would be a five per cent security; but of course I cannot state at what price it would be issued. The price is never fixed until the time of issue. That is a matter for consideration, and, if it is sold in the United States, a matter for negotiation.

Mr. GRAHAM: The reason I ask that in conversation not long since with a party who was speaking of making some investment, it was pointed out to me that the short-term British loan, I think, is paying about six per cent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Nobody knows it better than I do.

Mr. GRAHAM: It puts the minister in a difficult position in competition with the British loan if it is issued at six per cent and we issue at only five per cent.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the minister tell us what the cost of the war has been up to date; and whether we have reached the maximum of expenditure for the coming year?

Mr. GRAHAM: I may say that the loan to which I referred is a short-term loan.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I explained when my hon. friend was out, that we are always in competition with the securities that are issued in the United States; but our credit is really higher on this continent than the credit of Great Britain, and consequently we are able to sell our securities on a lower interest basis than she is.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The minister has never been asked for collateral.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have never been asked for collateral, and I do not think that we shall be. Nevertheless, my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) is right. We are affected in our issues by the price at which Great Britain issues her securities.

My hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) has asked about the war expenditure. The war expenditure to January 31, 1917, in Canada and Great Britain is about $450,000,000. Then there is the adjusted situation on the Continent; I cannot say how much that will be at the present time.

Mr. MARCIL: Can the minister give us the probable expenditure for another twelve months?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I should not like to make an estimate.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are there any securities falling due this year on which this loan will be dependent?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There are two short-date loans, aggregating $50,000,000, due in April and May. We have a $25,000,000 loan maturing in New York on August 1, and then we are clear, I think, until past the end of the year. I may say that in our financing we are keeping free of short-date obligations as much as possible.

Mr. MARCIL: In inviting subscriptions for these loans, has the minister considered the advisability of using the post offices? There are many places where there are no branch banks, and if these notes were offered in small denominations at the various post offices throughout the country some money might be raised. It might be in small sums, but still it would be of value at a time like this.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They are on sale at post office savings branches.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have not seen the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I would ask whether these loan subscriptions have come from the post office savings banks, or whether they have come out of the current business of the country?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: They have come from both sources. I do not think the post office saving deposits have been seriously affected.

Resolution reported.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19 founded on the resolution.

He said: Mr. Speaker, to meet the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), I desire to say, now that you are in the Chair, that the assent of His Excellency the Governor General has been obtained to this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—INTERIM VOTE.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We will not go into any particular Estimates, but we will give you what you want; we will give you a quarter of the total amount in these Estimates.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: They are just the same as the usual Estimates.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: We have usually put through the vote for Civil Government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have no objection to your putting through the Estimates that you want to put through, but you know there is a rule that on Thursday and Friday the Speaker leaves the Chair without any motion, and the House can only take up such Supply as is to be taken into consideration. If we were to pass all the Estimates to-day, when we begin after the adjournment we could not take up any of the Estimates upon any day, and therefore we cannot consent to that. But if it is understood that the rule will not apply, then we will pass the Estimates.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I think that can easily be understood on both sides of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: All right; go on.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: There is very little that challenges criticism in the Civil Government Estimates.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No, but I want it to be understood that when we meet on Friday again it will not be said that these Estimates have been passed, but that we will proceed as if the Estimates had not been passed at all.

On the motion of Sir THOMAS WHITE, it was resolved:

That a sum not exceeding one-quarter of the amount set forth in the Main Estimates be granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the year ending 31st March, 1918.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, we agree to that.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: All right; let it go on that basis.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With reference to Item 321 of the Estimates, I beg to move that the words "Canadian Associated Press" be struck out and "Canadian Press, Limited" be substituted. This is for a subsidy for a national wire to the West. The press is very much interested in it.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is different from the Associated Press?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does that vote include capital as well as ordinary expenditure?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is one-quarter of the Estimates which have been brought down.

Resolution reported and read the first time.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

WAR LOAN—$500,000,000.

House in Committee to consider the following proposed Resolutions.—Mr. Rainville in the chair.

1. That it is expedient to provide that a sum not exceeding five hundred million dollars ($500,000,000) be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred by or under the authority of the Governor in Council during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1918, for:—

(a) The defence and security of Canada;

(b) The conduct of naval or military operations in and beyond Canada;

(c) Promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or otherwise;

(d) The carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the existence of a state of war; and

(e) Payments made for the said purposes during the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and seventeen in excess of the amounts authorized by The War Appropriation Act, 1916.

2. That the Governor in Council be empowered to raise by way of loan, temporary or otherwise, such sums of money as are required for the purpose of making any payment authorized by any Act founded on these Resolutions.

3. That the principal raised by way of loan under this Act and the interest thereon shall be chargeable on the Consolidated Revenue Fund.—Sir Robert Borden.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, in connection with this vote I need hardly observe that the expenditure for war purposes has grown to a figure which none of us could have anticipated when war first broke out. The figure which has been placed in the vote now under consideration is $500,000,000. It is hoped, however, that a very large amount out of that sum may be available for the purpose of assisting the British Government in financing payments for munitions produced in this country. The necessity for that was dwelt upon by myself and also by the Minister of Finance in a previous debate.

It is, however, desirable that the committee should be made acquainted with the expenditure, as submitted to me by the Department of Finance, which has been made for war purposes since the beginning of the war, and it might perhaps be convenient that I should give this information in the tabulated form in which it has been submitted to me. The statement shows the amounts that have been expended by each department of the Government in the several fiscal years, 1914-1915, 1915-1916 and 1916-1917, up to the 20th day of January:—

EXPENDITURE ON ACCOUNT OF WAR.

	1914-15.	1915-16.	1916-17. (To Jan. 20.)

	$60,750,476.01	$166,197,755.47	$216,901,822.68

The appropriation is based, of course, upon the contingency of the war continuing throughout the whole of the coming fiscal year. Further details as to the anticipated expenditure of the various departments are as follows:—

Militia and Defence	$196,171,000
Ministry of Overseas Military Forces	219,000,000	$415,171,000
Naval Service		17,500,000
Interior		75,000
Railways and Canals		300,000
Finance		60,000
Public Works		133,000
Labour		15,000
Agriculture		20,000
State		48,720
		$433,322,720

The provision which is being made for the Department of Militia and Defence, the principal spending department of the Government for war purposes, is for the following purposes, calculated on the basis of 400,000 troops actually under arms continually:

Separation allowances, rations and subsistence, clothing and necessaries equipment and general stores, ammunition, small arms, machine guns, forage remounts, medical services, ocean and railway transport engineer services, civil employees, printing, stationery, telegrams, cables, sundries, including recruiting expenses, pay of censors, customs dues, funeral expenses, fuel, etc.

Mr. NESBITT: Are the amounts carried out opposite the items?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, that is a general statement of the purposes of the expenditure. The following is a more definite statement with regard to those matters:

War Estimates 1917-18.

1.	Pay of 400,000 troops		$182,500,000
2.	Separation allowance to dependents		36,000,000
3.	Rations and subsistence		51,000,000
4.	Clothing and necessaries		48,000,000
5.	Equipment and general stores, including harness and saddlery, vehicles of all kinds, tents, blankets, accoutrements and all equipment except Ross rifle, machine guns, small arm ammunition and clothing		42,261,000
6.	Ammunition — Dominion and Lindsay Arsenals	$ 3,000,000
	Gun ammunition in France	11,000,000
	Small arm ammunition in France	2,750,000	16,750,000

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That, of course, would not be in addition to the arrangement made with the British Government for six shillings per man per diem.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My understanding is that it is included in that arrangement. Would my hon. friend like me to read what that arrangement is? It might be useful.

Mr. MACLEAN: I would be pleased if my right hon. friend would read it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That arrangement came about in this way. In connection with the organization of a huge army of two and a half million men at the front, it is absolutely impossible to have separate arrangements in respect of commissariat and ordnance stores and a variety of such matters; there can be only one organization for the purpose. Further than that, when articles are issued from the general stores which are maintained by Great Britain in France near the front or upon the lines of communication and at the bases near the coast, it is absolutely impossible to keep a detailed account of what is provided for the troops of the Overseas Dominions. Therefore, it was realized summer before last, when I was in Great Britain, that it would be necessary to make an arbitrary estimate, and I believe that the subject had been previously brought up in a formal way by New Zealand. A great deal of discussion took place between those representing the Overseas Dominions and the War Office as to what would be a fair basis, and I am bound to say that I think that the arrangement made is a very fair one, and, indeed, I think it may be regarded as a generous one on the part of the United Kingdom.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the arrangement of six shillings per man per day apply to the troops in England as well as to the troops in France?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, it applies to those in France. It applies not only to the Canadian troops, but to the Australian and the New Zealand troops.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: And not to those in England?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No, I do not understand it refers to those in England.

Mr. MACLEAN: We gathered from the Minister of Finance this afternoon that it applied to the troops in England.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I read the memorandum some time ago, and I am not sure that my recollection is absolutely correct, but I think it relates to the maintenance of the troops at the front, because in England we provide our own commissariat to a considerable extent. This is the memorandum:—

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 5th January, 1917, from the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to whom was referred a despatch, dated 20th November, 1916, from the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the colonies, on the subject of the arrangements respecting maintenance expenses of the Canadian Forces in the field,—recommending, with the concurrence of the Ministers of Finance and of Militia and Defence, that the Canadian Government agree to the proposals contained in the memorandum from the War Office, which accompanied Mr. Bonar Law's despatch.

The committee, concurring, recommend that Your Excellency may be pleased to forward a copy hereof to the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for the colonies for the information of His Majesty's Government.

All of which is respectfully submitted for approval.

The proposal is contained in the following letter from Mr. B. B. Cubitt, of the War Office, to the Under Secretary of State for the Colonial Office, and document which accompanies it:—

Downing Street, November 20, 1916.

My Lord Duke,—With reference to my despatch No. 820 of the 26th August, 1915, I have the honour to transmit to Your Excellency, to be laid before your Ministers, a copy of a letter from the War Office enclosing a memorandum with regard to the maintenance expenses of the Canadian forces in the field.

2. I should be glad to learn whether your ministers agree to the proposals submitted in this letter and the accompanying memorandum.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord Duke,
Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,
(Sgd.) A. Bonar Law.

Governor General,
His Excellency,
The Duke of Devonshire K.C., G.C.V.C., &c., &c.

War Office, London, S.W.,
4th November, 1916.

Sir,

I am commanded by the Army Council to send you for communication to the Government of Canada the enclosed memorandum dealing with the estimated expenses of the Dominion Forces in the field.

In the telegram of 27th April, 1915, of which a copy was enclosed with your letter 19536 of 30th April, 1915, the Dominion Government formally notified its desire to bear the whole cost of the Canadian contingents sent for service in the present war. It has been generally agreed that those services in the field which are carried out by the Imperial Government, and which cannot be directly charged to the Dominion Government, should be adjusted at an estimated rate per head based on the average cost of maintaining troops in the field. The scope and amount of the rate to be fixed have been discussed personally, between Mr. Secretary Bonar Law, Sir George Perley (on behalf of the Canadian Government) and Sir Charles Harris (on behalf of this department) and a rate of 6s. per head per diem arrived at.

The terms of the memorandum have been settled in consultation with Sir George Perley, and the Army Council have reason to believe that the arrangements it embodies will be accepted by the Canadian Government. It is suggested that the following explanations on points that have arisen in connection with its application should also be communicated.

As the estimate is based on the assumption that the Dominion troops take the field fully equipped and while there are maintained from Imperial sources, it follows (1) that the articles issued in the field to maintain or replace articles of the original equipment will be the property of the Dominion Government at the end of the war, and (2) that it will be open to the Dominion Government to raise a counter claim against the Imperial Government for any rifles or other articles covered by the rate, which may have been issued in the field out of Canadian stocks for maintenance or replacement.

As regards mechanical transport vehicles, the figures in the memorandum (which has been for some time under discussion) were based on the assumption that maintenance in the field would be met from Canadian sources. It is understood that this is no longer the case, and that issue of spare parts, etc., in the field are now generally made from Imperial stocks; but it has been agreed, after discussion with Sir George Perley, that such issues shall be covered by the 6s. rate.

It is proposed that the rate of 6s. per man per day shall apply from the first arrival of Dominion troops upon the Continent to the present time, and that it shall continue to apply unchanged in the future unless conditions should so alter as to make it clearly unfair either to the Imperial or the Dominion Government.

I am, etc.,
B. B. Cubitt.

Under Secretary of State,
Colonial Office, S.E.

The following is the War Office estimate of the maintenance expenses of the Canadian forces in the field:

1. Canada, Australia and New Zealand, at the outbreak of war signified a desire to bear the whole cost of their Expeditionary Forces.

2. The Dominions make their own issues of pay, cash allowances and pensions.

3. The expenses borne in the first instance by the Imperial Government for Canadian troops in England (rations, forage, clothing, stores, etc., etc.,) are recovered currently through the ordinary medium of accounts, with two exceptions:

(a) Accommodation provided by the War Office, for which in accordance with the undertaking already given by the Imperial Government no charge is made, whether accommodation is provided in hutments or in billets.

(b) Railway charges, the assessment of which in existing conditions offers special difficulties and will be dealt with separately.

4. As regards expenses in the field it is not practicable to keep account of actual issues, and it has always been the intention of the Imperial Government (subject to the concurrence of the Dominion Government) that payment should take some simple form such as an estimated rate per head. This method has been independently proposed by the Government of New Zealand.

5. In the field the Imperial Government provides:

(a) Out of army votes, rations, forage, fuel, clothing, stores of all kinds, such establishments as Ordnance, Supply and Remount Depots, railway transport in France, sea transport for men and material from this country, etc., etc.

(b) Out of civil votes, ammunition of all kinds and replacement of guns, wagons, small arms, etc., also stationery.

6. There are no accounts which show the cost of these supplies and services to Canadian troops in France and the figures can only be arrived at by estimate. Leaving munitions aside, the current rate of expenditure per head of the Army as a whole (excluding Indian troops) is about 9s. 6d. per day. Of this sum, about 4s. represents pay, cash allowances and pensions, the charges corresponding to which in the case of Canadian troops are paid by Canada direct; remounts, for which it has been found possible to make a separate settlement on the basis of actual transactions; and mechanical transport vehicles.

7. The remaining 5s. 6d. includes a certain number of large items which are supplied by the War Office to the Canadian troops in the field, and admit of being estimated with some approach to accuracy. These are rations, forage, fuel, clothing, equipment and general stores, drugs, stationery; and they account for a total of 4s. per day.

8. As regards munitions, the present rate of expenditure (12s. or more per day per man in the field) cannot be taken as affording any guide, as a very large portion of the expenditure represents manufacture of first equipments and the accumulation of stock of ammunition. Estimated on the basis of consumption, small arm ammunition accounts for about 3½d. per day, gun ammunition about 1s. per day and renewal of small arms, machine guns, artillery equipments and material generally for about 6d. per day per man in France.

(Note.—This was written in April, 1916.)

The possible alternative of estimating for munitions at monthly rates for the various natures and numbers of guns in use by the Canadian troops has been fully considered and discussed with the representative of the Canadian Government in London, and it has been agreed that it will be best to adopt the basis of a rate per head of troops in France, for these items also.

9. These charges, with the 4s. in paragraph 6, amount to about 5s. 9d. per day per man.

10. The remaining items of expenditure (about 1s. 6d. per man per day—see paragraph 7) are very various and include such items as the Air Service, Works Services, bridging and other engineer materials, etc., which cannot be regarded as supplied to the Canadian troops at all, while other services such as railway and sea transport, labour establishments at ports and base depots, though they cannot be appropriated to units of the army, are nevertheless properly distributable over all the troops in the field.

11. If 3d. per day is taken for these services, the total of 6s. per day will be an estimate of which it may confidently be said that while it carries out the intention of the Canadian Government to pay the whole of the cost of the Canadian troops, it does not involve any overcharge against the Dominion.

I shall now outline the purposes of the expenditures, due to the war, in the various departments. The expenditure in the Department of Naval Service involves the maintenance of ships and dockyards, the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, Overseas Division, new ships and maintenance, pension and separation allowances, headquarters salaries and expenses, disbursements recoverable for account of Imperial and Allied Governments. For example, it is necessary to keep up the bases at Halifax and Esquimalt so that they will afford sufficient provision not only for the Canadian Naval forces, which are relatively small, but also for the British navy, and for ships of the Allied nations.

The expenditure of the Department of the Interior represents salaries in respect of additional employees required because of enlistments.

The expenditure of the Department of Railways and Canals involves outlay for the guarding of bridges and canal structures, transporting goods for the Red Cross Society and the Belgium Relief Fund, salaries of substitutes for men enlisted.

The expenditure of the Department of Finance represents contributions to relief and patriotic funds, such as the Belgian Relief Fund and the Kitchener Memorial Fund, and extra clerks engaged because of the war.

The expenditure of the Department of Public Works represents the cost of office fittings and filing apparatus required by various departments on account of the war, such as Militia, Pensions Board, National Service Board; salaries and wages for extra employees engaged because of the war.

The expenditure in the Department of Labour represents clerical assistance, printing and stationery rendered necessary by activities connected with the war—for example, the administration of separation allowances for Canadian munition workers in England paid by the Imperial Government, and various matters of that kind.

Mr. GRAHAM: I presume that these expenditures outlined for each department are made by the departments, which are then recouped by the Finance Department out of the war fund.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Nothing is paid out of the war appropriation except by order in council, because it is a grant, not to any department of the Government, but to the Government as a whole. Therefore everything that is paid out is paid out on order in council approved on the recommendation of the minister of the department which makes the application.

Mr. GRAHAM: Each department is reimbursed for its expenditure? For instance the Intercolonial railway handles troops; it is paid for the handling of these troops?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suppose that expenditure would form part of the bill of the Railway Department, and the same with the Marine Department. May I ask the Prime Minister if the recruits that are being secured for the British navy are being paid by the Canadian Government or by the Imperial Government?

Mr. HAZEN: By the Canadian Government.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Canadian Government would bear the expense?

Mr. HAZEN: They are bearing it.

Mr. GRAHAM: What success is attending the appeal for naval recruits in Canada?

Mr. HAZEN: We get returns usually on Monday, and we had enlisted and sent overseas by Monday or Tuesday of this week somewhere between 1,200 and 1,300.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The object of the vote which is now asked is to cover three different items:

(a) The defence and security of Canada;
(b) The conduct of naval or military operations in and beyond Canada;
(c) Promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or otherwise;

The explanation given by my hon. friend has referred altogether to our share of the expenditures for military operations beyond Canada. I have not observed that anything has been expended or is in contemplation for the defence and security of Canada. I do not mean that this was an omission. I do not know that very much was needed for this purpose. We never were in danger of invasion, and therefore we have lived in security. But it must have been obvious to anybody that we have been exposed to raids on the part of German cruisers. As we all remember, at the opening of hostilities, we were seriously in danger on the Pacific coast owing to the presence of German cruisers in the Pacific ocean. The Government at the time very properly thought that they were bound to take precautions to protect our cities against raids by these cruisers. They purchased two submarines which, in addition to what we had, were expected to afford sufficient protection. As a matter of fact we were relieved from further anxiety when the last German cruiser was sunk by the warship Australia. On the Atlantic we have always been protected by the British navy, so strong and powerful as to afford security. But we know that German cruisers have succeeded in passing through the British blockade, and have inflicted very serious damage in some parts of the ocean. We are threatened today with further frightfulness on the part of the German navy. The cruisers are dangerous, but the submarines are still more dangerous. I have no doubt that the Government have had that in mind and have taken precautions against anything of the kind occurring on the Atlantic ocean. I do not ask for any details. The only thing I want to be assured of is that they have not forgotten their responsibility and have taken due precaution.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This subject has occasioned a good deal of correspondence in the shape of secret communications between the Admiralty and the Government of Canada during the past five or six weeks. It would not be proper for me——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN—to make any reference to the details. I can only say that I should be very glad indeed to show to my right hon. friend at any time the correspondence which has taken place and to make him acquainted with the measures which have been taken. I think that I did mention some of these matters rather briefly to him a day or two ago, and I should be very pleased indeed to make him fully acquainted with all that has been done, and with the difficulties that have had to be met.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not sure that I ought to say what is in my mind concerning a situation that may confront us in a very short time, and which has not hitherto existed. I would ask the Government whether they have considered, or will consider, the question of having a more complete defence of Canada, not only of our coasts, but of our land frontier as well. Conditions might arise which will concern Canada more deeply, and bring the war nearer home than it has been heretofore. We need every man that Canada can spare to go to the front where the conflict is raging, but, in my humble judgment, we ought not to neglect preparations to defend ourselves at home, if our friends across the border should be drawn into the conflict. It is possible, I think, to have a home defence service without interfering materially with the men we are sending abroad. That is what I have in mind. I do not know whether I should have suggested it at this time, but I have felt strongly about the matter for a few days, and the dispatches of to-day confirm my view.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We have in Canada a very large force under arms. I had a communication not long since with the Chief of the General Staff as to what provision was available in certain parts of the country in case any need should arise, as to the provision of field guns, machine guns, rifles, and ammunition; and the assurances given to me indicated that we would be pretty well prepared. I think we should have every possible regard for any contingency, however improbable and remote. I agree that we should keep in this country at all times during the war a large and well equipped force. I may say to my hon. friend that the very suggestion which he threw out this afternoon has been under consideration by the Minister of Militia and Defence and his officers for some two or three weeks, and it is not at all improbable that something along the line of my hon. friend's suggestion may eventually be carried out. I am not in a position to say anything more definite at the moment.

With regard to the defence of Canada, of course my right hon. friend will remember that we have had a good deal to do with the defence of our harbours. We have closed some very important harbours in this country, leaving only a certain entrance; we have closed the main entrance in some cases, leaving a certain space for entrance which would be easily defended. All the protection and care approved by the admiralty have been given to the entrances of certain harbours. My hon. friend will also observe that in the appropriation there is a large increase for the naval service, and the measures to which he alludes have not been overlooked.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Chairman, as this will be the only opportunity, before the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) leaves for the Old Country, to consider matters affecting the war, and how it is being conducted, and in view of the fact that the attention of everybody in the country is being turned to the problem of recruiting and the carrying out of the promise of the right hon. gentleman that 500,000 men should be obtained and sent overseas, it would be interesting to have a further statement from my right hon. friend. Apparently, the policy of the Government in regard to that matter has been to follow the system of voluntary recruitment. It seems to me that in view of the interest taken by our people in this subject we might have some consideration of how best to devise methods which will enable us to get the required number of men. The system of billeting which was in existence throughout Canada over a year ago, was very effective. It produced a large number of men in various centres and although I know there are some objections to be urged against it, yet, as a matter of enlisting the interest of men and securing their attachment to the service, it was very successful indeed. I think the Government should tell us what their point of view is in regard to this question and how they expect to obtain the balance of the men whom the right hon. gentleman said a year ago he hoped to get.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What was done a year ago was to authorize the enlistment of 500,000 men. I have already stated what was accomplished in that regard. Something over 400,000 have been mobilized including the active militia called out, including the permanent force and the forces still in Canada. The total number of these last three classes is about 60,000. I stated before the House rose at six o'clock that the Government had under consideration at the present time some further measures with reference to the raising and maintaining in Canada of a suitable force for home defence having in mind the considerations which were pointed out by the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). I am afraid I cannot say anything more that would be of assistance just at the moment. We are in hopes that the 60,000 men now available for one purpose or another in Canada, or the major part of them, will be sent overseas in the immediate future.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am afraid my right hon. friend's answer to my suggestion does not indicate anything very much in the way of the fulfilment of the promise of 500,000 men for overseas. I quite agree with the statements made by my hon. friend from South Renfrew as to the wisdom and necessity of creating and maintaining in Canada a large force of men prepared for home service in case of necessity and as a matter of precaution. But assuming that that arrangement is made, and assuming that these men are obtained, we will yet have from 70,000 to 75,000 more men to secure before we can send the full quota across the ocean. After all, the determination of this conflict is to be on the western front and on the plains of France. The task of the British and French is to drive the Germans from their entrenchments back into Belgium and from there across the Rhine. The part that we as Canadians want to play in this war is to give to the fulfilment of that task every possible aid we can in the way of men. There has been slackness in recruiting. I think one of the reasons why there has been slackness is that there has been too little system in regard to the matter. There should have been an allocation, or certification, long ago of men whose employment was deemed to be necessary to the production of those things which are essential to the war. The failure to systematize the whole problem has been one of the great difficulties that has stood in the way of this realization of the expectations of my right hon. friend. We had the statement made this afternoon by the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin) that the National Service card was not issued for the purpose of securing men to go to the front.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He did not say that. He said that it did not mean coercion or conscription in itself.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think my hon. friend the Postmaster General went farther in declaring that the National Service cards were not intended for the purpose of obtaining men for military service.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not so understand it.

Mr. MACDONALD: I will wait for Hansard to see exactly what he did say but that is my impression. Either the National Service cards were intended for the purpose of getting men for military service or they were not. I do not think they were. I am inclined to agree with the statement of the Postmaster General. I do not see how you are going to get men as the result of the system which has been proposed by the National Service Commission and for the purpose of my argument I shall, in considering this question fairly and frankly as I desire to do, eliminate the National Service proposition as a means whereby the hon. gentleman's promise is to be implemented. Is the voluntary system to be continued, and if it is to be continued, does the Government intend to develop any new method on the voluntary basis for the purpose of encouraging recruitment and for the purpose of obtaining men? It is evident that the country, which is deeply interested in the war, looks for some action in that particular. I think the right hon. gentleman will agree with me when I say that his statement, in response to my inquiry as to what the Governments' policy is for the purpose of solving the matter, that they think of raising a number of men for home defence, is not a sufficient answer. Do the Government propose to find the 70,000 or 75,000 men necessary to go overseas, and if so, how do they propose to deal with the question?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There are more systematic methods under consideration now for the purpose I have mentioned and also for the purpose of securing men for overseas service. It is likely that if the methods to which I have alluded are employed and the system in that regard carried out there will be provision for obtaining men for overseas service. I agree as to the importance of selecting recruits for overseas service by some systematic method, but I do not agree with my hon. friend that the proposals in connection with the National Service will not be of assistance in that regard. If you are to have any system at all, you must know the age, the physique, the employment, and particulars of every kind respecting the available manhood of this country, and the National Service proposals were designed to obtain that information and have resulted in the very great amount of information which is now coming to hand and which is being tabulated.

Mr. OLIVER: In that connection, I might point out to the Prime Minister that the information received by way of the National Service cards must necessarily be incomplete and therefore misleading because a very large proportion of National Service cards are not being replied to. In so far as they are not being replied to, the Government has not derived any information from them. If they are depending on the information they derive from that source they must be misled by the replies and lack of replies to the National Service cards. That is a condition that must have been obvious to the Director of National Service before he issued his cards. Therefore, I am compelled to say that I cannot accept the suggestion that the National proposition has been directed and carried out with the intention of securing a knowledge of the possible available manhood of the country.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know on what authority my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) makes the statement that a very large proportion of the cards are not being filled in. That is not the information I have received from the Director General of the National Service.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am bound to say in all frankness that the right hon. gentleman is not giving the country the lead on this question which it expects from the Government at this juncture. Take, for instance, this most peculiar method of recruiting for the Naval Service. I do not know under whose auspices Captain Guinness came to the province of Nova Scotia. But he came to my county, and instead of going to the seaport towns, where he would have found men who have grown up by the sea and would have enlisted, he went to the city of Halifax, and addressed an audience not one of whom would by any possibility think of going on the sea. There is no evidence, so far as we can see, that he went where he ought to have gone, to such counties as Yarmouth, Shelburne and Lunenburg, and to the various harbours that are to be found in the county of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and in the counties of Guysborough and Richmond. Captain Guinness, who is most enthusiastic, and, I feel sure, a very able man, instead of going to these seaport places, went to the city of Halifax, the town of New Glasgow and the city of Sydney. Now my right hon. friend knows very well that these were not the centres where recruits were likely to be found for the deck of a battleship. He knows that when Captain Guinness went to New Glasgow, he went to a place which had furnished hundreds of men for service on land, and in addition to that, the people were completely absorbed in the production of munitions. I personally had no notice of the fact that this gentleman was to be in my constituency. Had I known, I should have been very glad, with my local knowledge, to have directed him to the places where he would have been likely to get recruits. I really cannot understand why, when he wanted recruits to fight on the ocean, he should go to munition plants, coal mines, and iron and steel industries, when thousands of men could have been got around the coasts.

My right hon. friend will agree with me that in the past there has been no system in regard to recruiting. Either the men who were working in the coal mines and iron and steel industries ought to be working there, or they ought to be at the front. Yet indiscriminately, and apparently without any system, an enthusiastic recruiter visited these particular districts, and left a great many other districts, where men could have been obtained, unvisited. The result of all that was a confusion of sentiment. Either the men who were working in those places were doing their full duty to their country, or they were not. It is considered by every one that those men ought to be engaged in those industries, and I think that under proper conditions they should be given certificates of exemption just as is done in England. But there was no attempt at that.

Then there has been a disregard altogether of the utilization of the Militia Act and of the militia organizations in the country. All over Canada there were men who, by virtue of their association in youth with militia organizations, were accustomed to dealing with problems of this kind, and in a great many places these men were disregarded; and I do not think they should have been. I think the old militia organizations should have been maintained. They were maintained in one or two cities, but generally all through the country they were disregarded altogether. The result of all this is—and I do not propose to indulge in recriminations—that to-day there is a feeling abroad in this land that somehow or other Canada has not done her duty in the way of sending enough men overseas. My right hon. friend tells us that he has under consideration the idea of recruiting an additional number of men for home defence. That is very laudable, I agree, but it does not meet the case. With regard to the National Service scheme, I believe with my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), that it will not reach the men we want to reach; it won't get the slackers Does any one suppose that the slackers will sign those cards? Everyone knows that it is the men who have not gone to the front, and are not doing their duty at home, that are not signing the cards. The responsibility of finding a solution to these problems rests upon my right hon. friend and his colleagues, for, to them has been committed the task of guiding this country through this great war. We have given them in the past without reserve, all the money that they asked for in order to carry out their idea. It is now proposed to give them this enormous sum, the largest amount that has been asked for yet. Surely on such an occasion we are entitled to information as to the lead the Government propose to give public opinion in this country, which unquestionably is along the line that we should send more men to the front until victory is won.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I notice that on two occasions my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has called the attention of the Minister of Militia to the fact that a brigade was being recruited in the province of Quebec. There is no question as to the truth of that fact, because I myself have seen large advertisements in the various papers in the province, and notably in the district from which I come, the district of Montreal. I understand that the recruiting is being done chiefly by Col. Mignault, who has distinguished himself in connection with the hospital organization at the front. I can assure the right hon. Prime Minister that if he will act on the suggestion I am going to make it will be of great benefit to the recruiting of that brigade. Last year I called his attention to the fact that General Lessard was considered by everyone, I think, as one of the best officers we have in the Canadian militia. Even the British authorities consider him an excellent officer. Now I do not wish to indulge in recriminations, but I cannot understand why General Lessard, who served so well in South Africa, has been overlooked since the beginning of the war. With the exception of a little mission on which he was sent to the other side, it is well known that his services have been practically discarded since the war broke out. I saw in one of the Toronto papers recently that at the present time he is a farmer, instead of being what he is by ability and training, a soldier. Let me say in all sincerity to the right hon. Prime Minister that if the Government announced that General Lessard would be given command of that brigade, it would be very easy in my opinion to raise the 5,000 men, which is the number, I think, required to fill a brigade. One great objection that people have to giving their sons for overseas service—and I have discussed this with several people—is the fact that we lack trained officers. Everybody knows, and I am not casting any slurs on the Canadian militia, that until the war broke out we had a very poor military organization in Canada. We had twelve days during the year in which to train our soldiers, and I heard an hon. member, who, I think, is now in command of a regiment on the other side, state to this House that we had but the skeleton of a skeleton of a militia. It is not throwing cold water on the enthusiasm of our officers and soldiers who belong to our Canadian militia to say that we had a very poor organization on the whole. There was enthusiasm; there was patriotism; but every one will concede that there was very little training, and when war was declared I know that some people refused to have their sons enlist because they said: We have no officers, and we do not trust the young men who will be at the head of the various companies or regiments. But now every one will admit that General Lessard does not belong to that class of officers; that he is possibly the best soldier we have to-day in Canada. Why not utilize his services? Why will the Government not make the announcement that this brigade which is being recruited at present in the province of Quebec will be under the command of General Lessard? If it does so it will be doing something that which will at once strike the popular imagination. I make this suggestion in all sincerity and in the hope that the right hon. gentleman will accept it in that spirit. Last year, when I mentioned the name of General Lessard to the right hon. gentleman I thought that he would take my suggestion in a good spirit. I hope he will not forget this time that a war is on us; that we want more men; that General Lessard is available; that we now have a new Minister of Militia, and that, as there is no friction between General Lessard and my hon. friend the new Minister of Militia, an opportunity should certainly be given to that distinguished officer to do something for his country and at the same time to stimulate recruiting in his native province, where he is simply idolized and trusted by the people.

Mr. BURNHAM: Every one, I suppose, who knows at least a little about this may contribute something, especially if it is a fact. Whilst every one will agree with the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) that General Lessard is a man of eminence and of the highest character, a man of the best possible training—and I myself cannot understand why his services are not utilized—the hon. member overlooks one fact, namely, that the testimony which would encourage or deter recruiting amongst our French-Canadians is that of the men at the front, and the French-Canadians at the front are, without any exception—and I say this, not only of those I have met, but of those I have heard of and of those I have come across indirectly—the most enthusiastic men possible. You could not find soldiers more devoted to the cause and more anxious that their compatriots should enlist. When they come back to Quebec, they say to other French-Canadian friends: Why do you not enlist? I am sure the hon. member will agree with me, therefore, that the allegation that there was a lack of training, a fear, or a suspicion, that would deter them from enlisting, falls absolutely to the ground, because the testimony upon which they must rely is that which is gathered at the front, and it is such as I speak of.

There are some other little things which deter people, I must confess. Sometimes it is a small thing which does it, and there may be an explanation; but I am not so saturated with politics that I cannot speak for the mass of the people as I understand it, and here is a small thing which I would contribute which, to my mind, would deter, perhaps not a great many, but at any rate some recruits. Suppose three people go into a chemist's shop; one is a poor man; the other two, we shall say, are evidently not poor. The poor man buys, because he has to buy, a bottle of patent medicine and pays four cents war tax on it. The second man buys a camera on which there is no war tax. The third man perhaps has a young lady with him and buys a two or three or four dollar box of sweets, on which there is also no war tax. Some one may say that the ingredients are taxed, but that is true of the three purchases. I am also told that the doctors of the present day sometimes prescribe patent medicines to the extent of probably twenty-five per cent of their prescriptions, and if any portion of the medicine is taken out of the patent medicine bottle, there has to be a corresponding amount of war tax paid upon it. I have never heard of any one except the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) wanting to buy a bottle of patent medicine because he regarded it as a luxury. This purchaser buys it because perhaps he has a little child at home who needs it. He sees the man come in and buy a camera and the other man come in and buy a box of sweets and neither of them has to pay a war tax. He is infuriated, and who can blame him?

An hon. MEMBER: No one at all.

Mr. BURNHAM: No one at all. I do not charge the Minister of Finance with doing this sort of thing willingly, because I think, when it is brought to his attention, as it certainly will be by the people, he will change it, because he is a man not only evidently skilled in finance, but of the finest character and the best heart, and I expect he will respond to the appeals of the people in this respect.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I hope my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) will not think that I am guilty of any discourtesy in not speaking more definitely than I have been able to do; but inasmuch as these matters are still under consideration and the plans have not been fully matured, he will realize that I cannot give a more definite answer than that which I have given just now. When the proposals come to be submitted, of course, they will be in the judgment of the House as to whether they will be effective, and the result will indicate as to whether they have been wisely adopted or not.

I did take into consideration what my hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) said to me last year, and I had at least two discussions with General Lessard last summer. I agree in the appreciation which has been expressed with regard to his ability and his services, and I have expressed that same opinion publicly on more than one occasion since the outbreak of war. I do not know that it would be appropriate for me to state the exact nature of the discussion which I had with General Lessard, but I did put before him the considerations which had been placed before me by my hon. friend the member for Rouville and I urged upon him that he should entertain them. I also put before him some other proposals which I do not care to mention just now, but which I would be quite willing to mention privately to my hon. friend the member for Rouville; and when I do mention them, I think he will concur with me that in making those proposals I certainly did not exhibit any lack of appreciation of the experience, military skill, and high qualities of General Lessard. I would be very happy if he could have seen his way clear to undertake certain duties of one character or another which I proposed to him at that time.

The impression seems to be still in the minds of some hon. gentlemen that the services of General Lessard have not been utilized in this war. As a matter of fact, he has discharged very important duties indeed. In the early months of the war it was decided that in view of the very large force under training in Canada we should have two inspectors general, one for the West and one for the East. In the first instance General Steele, if I remember correctly, was appointed inspector general in the West, and General Lessard in the East. Subsequently General Steele went overseas, and General John Hughes was appointed to succeed him. General Lessard, from the time that he was appointed inspector general of the troops in training in eastern Canada, has continued to discharge the duties of that very important office. At times he has had under his direction as many as 75,000 men; at the moment he has supervision over between 30,000 and 40,000 men. From time to time he visits every part of the eastern provinces, Ontario and Quebec; he is now on his way to the Maritime provinces for the purpose of making a visit of inspection. The services which he has given to the country in this way are of no mean order. Moreover, he obtained leave of absence to visit the front in order that he might make himself better acquainted with the character of training which we ought to give to our men in Canada. He went to Great Britain and France for that special purpose, and, as he told me, came back with ideas and knowledge which were of great service to him in directing the character of the training in the various camps. While he was on the other side of the ocean I took upon myself to request that he should make inspection of the Canadian troops in training in Great Britain. He did that, and brought back the results of the inspection. Although General Lessard has not been at the front, except under the circumstances that I have mentioned, nevertheless I feel that he has rendered a very important service to the country in this war. It is possible that a higher service may still be given by him; I should be very happy indeed if he could see his way clear to undertake that still more important service.

Mr. MURPHY: It is not my intention to intervene in this discussion so far as it relates to General Lessard beyond saying this. It is notorious that at the outset of the war General Lessard's services were not availed of because of the hostility of the late Minister of Militia to General Lessard. Every member of this House remembers the occurrence that took place in Toronto, in which the whole population of that city were ranged on the side of General Lessard and against the late Minister of Militia. I do not want to enlarge on that, but if the members will just keep that in mind they will have no difficulty in recalling what General Lessard's position was at the outset of the war. It is true that later he was given the position to which the right hon. gentleman has just referred, but that was after a number of men inferior in point of training, service and personal attainments had been given positions for any one of which General Lessard should have been selected. What General Lessard is at present doing I am not aware, but it is a lamentable fact that the services of the most accomplished professional soldier that we had in Canada at the time were not availed of by the Government. On the broader and general question raised by the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver)—that of recruiting generally—I wish to say a word and to invite a statement from the right hon. Prime Minister. He will recall that on Tuesday last, when the ex-Minister of Militia was making his statement in the House, he gave the House and the country certain information regarding recruiting which has had a very disquieting effect. In point of fact, he proceeded to explain to the House and the country why the 500,000 men promised had not been obtained. I am not going to quote from his speech; I shall allude to certain general statements that will illustrate what I want to bring to the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister. The ex-Minister of Militia asserted that he knew that recruiting had not gone on. He alleged that he could have raised 500,000 men by voluntary enlistment. He even enlarged that and said that he could have raised 600,000 men by voluntary enlistment without any trouble. Then he dwelt on a change that had been made in the method of recruiting and he illustrated the effect of that by saying that three months were lost, not in organizing battalions, but in getting the power to authorize them— this having reference to certain orders in council that were passed. Then he told us that he went to England, and he added that when he came back his officers stated that they had been directed to go slow in recruiting. That is a most serious statement, one which was not referred to by the hon. Minister of Finance when he replied to the ex-Minister of Militia, and which, so far as I know, has not been referred to since. As one member of the House who is sincerely desirous of assisting the right hon. Prime Minister and members of the Government in doing whatever they may deem necessary to help in carrying on this war to a successful conclusion, I invite the right hon. gentleman to make a statement here to-night as to this declaration by his late colleague.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as the orders in council are concerned, the matter is susceptible of the simplest of explanations. Under the order in council which was passed early in January, 1916, it was possible for the officers of the Department of Militia and Defence, by direction of the head of the department, to authorize the raising of battalions in all parts of the country without any further reference to council. It was thought desirable, by reason of the complaints made to me personally by recruiting associations and coming from other sources in various parts of the country, that some control should be exercised over the course that had been pursued. We were assured by delegations that it was undesirable that a very large number of battalions should be recruited at the same time in one particular locality. The point that I recall as having been pressed was that of the expense. It was said that when five, six or seven battalions were being recruited in one locality the officers of these battalions were paid by the country at great expense during a period which was greatly prolonged before all the battalions were recruited to full strength. The only change that was made was this: instead of these battalions being authorized merely by a direction issued in the Department of Militia and Defence, the amending order in council provided that thereafter they must be authorized by the Governor in Council, so that we might come to a conclusion as to whether in a given place it would be wise to authorize the raising of further battalions until those already authorized had been brought up to strength.

Mr. MURPHY: That is with reference to the battalions. What about the other statement, about the officers having been told to go slow in recruiting?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not aware of what the officers said or who the officers referred to may be. All I have to say is that there were no directions to go slow in recruiting, so far as I am aware, except by reason of what I have just detailed; that is, instead of a free hand being given to authorize battalions without any reference to the Governor in Council, the control was reserved to the Governor General in Council in order that an excessive expenditure of public money in the way indicated might not be incurred.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Can the First Minister give an instance where five, six, or seven battalions were being raised at one time in one place?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that there were that many in Toronto.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Nothing like that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not sure—

Sir SAM HUGHES: I am quite sure.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not so positive as my hon. friend. The representation was made to me by a recruiting association, many of whose members came from Toronto.

Sir SAM HUGHES: These regiments were raised in these centres on the basis of about one to every forty thousand or fifty thousand souls. In order to start a regiment the officers had first to be selected, trained and got ready, and to have raised only one battalion in a population of nearly 600,000 souls was simply nonsense when we were raising one in every 40,000 area all over Canada. Why should my county of Victoria and Haliburton, the county of Peterborough, the county of Ontario, the county of Durham, with their population of about 40,000 each, be raising one battalion each, while Toronto, with 500,000 or 600,000 population, raised only one battalion? The thing is absurd on the face of it. The basis of the whole thing was this agitation to pander to the cry of labour; the cry went up for men for munitions. That is what started the agitation and stopped the recruiting.

Sir ROBERT BCRDEN: The representations I allude to were not made by labouring men, or people interested in munitions, but by a delegation of recruiting organizations all over Canada, which came to have an interview with me in the month of April last, I think.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Was any representation made to the Minister of Militia at the time?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not remember whether the Minister of Militia was in Ottawa at the time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the ex-Minister of Militia allow me a question? I understand that what the ex-minister complains of is that the matter of recruiting was practically taken out of his hands.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I have never complained of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, that is the fault of my hon. friend, and still less does he complain of it latterly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The recruiting vanished, that is all.

Mr. PUGSLEY: As I understand the Prime Minister, the power was reserved to the Governor in Council to allow the recruiting of a certain number of battalions if they thought it desirable. That power was taken out of the hands of the minister. I want to know if the minister ever made a recommendation for the recruiting of additional battalions in Toronto or elsewhere, which recommendation was not acted upon by the Governor General in Council.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I made recommendations for three battalions in Winnipeg, and it took three or four months to get even authority to start them. In Toronto, fortunately, I had got them organized before the brakes were put on, and before the mental epilepsy got hold of people—I had got things going before that time.

Mr. OLIVER: For the information of the ex-minister and the Prime Minister, I want to say that at this time last year there were being recruited in Edmonton the following: the 51st, the 63rd, the 66th, the 138th, the 151st, the 194th, the 202nd and the 218th battalions. Since that time the 223rd has been authorized; and at the same time and following that period there were authorizations given by somebody for the establishment in Edmonton of some five to ten additional recruiting offices besides those of the battalions which I have mentioned, recruiting for units whose headquarters were outside the district of Northern Alberta, and many of them outside of Alberta altogether. I mention two battalions that are being recruited at the present moment whose headquarters are in Victoria or Vancouver, British Columbia, the Bantams of British Columbia and a Forestry battalion whose number I forget. Besides these the Maclean battalion of New Brunswick had a recruiting office in Edmonton. There had been recruiting offices for the engineers, for the foresters, for the pioneers, for the frontiersmen of Moosejaw, for the Canadian Naval Service—in fact I do not know any form of service that has not had a recruiting office at Edmonton during the past year. I think it is only fair that the committee should have that information in view of the rule so clearly laid down by the Prime Minister, which I beg to assure him was honoured in the breach and not in the observance so far as Edmonton and Northern Alberta are concerned.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the order in council was passed after my hon. friend raised this question. I think my hon. friend raised this question in the House last session.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: And I think the order in council alluded to, which made it necessary that the authorization of new battalions should come from the Governor in Council, was passed after that.

Mr. OLIVER: Then I may point out that, with this list of battalions still in Edmonton, the 223rd was authorized, I suppose under the order in council. At any rate, I am pointing out that aside from the battalions whose headquarters were in Edmontton, somebody authorized the recruiting of other units.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Would my hon. friend say when the 223rd was authorized?

Mr. OLIVER: I could not give the date, but I think after the 1st of January, 1916.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Authorized in Edmonton? The 223rd is a Manitoba battalion.

Mr. OLIVER: Anyway it is a French Canadian battalion.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who commands it?

Mr. OLIVER: Colonel Leprohon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The 223rd is a Scandinavian battalion.

Mr. OLIVER: That recruited in Edmonton too. There is no question that Colonel Leprohon was authorized to recruit a French Canadian battalion in Edmonton, I think after January, 1916, and after the order in council was passed. However that number of battalions were being recruited in Edmonton at the same time, and besides that, as I said, other units, having no connection with Edmonton and absolutely contrary to the letter and certainly to the spirit of the order in council, have been recruited in Edmonton and are being recruited in Edmonton to-day.

Mr. BRADBURY: How many local battalions?

Mr. OLIVER: I have mentioned the number.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. member has read a very nice list, but two-thirds of these were organized and some of them were at the front before the others were completed.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg the ex-minister's pardon.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The 51st and the 66th were both filled up, and another battalion was filled, having 1,500 men. The 66th had 3,000 men and then we authorized two other battalions to take them up straight along. These battalions were filled. Then we authorized more, because the cry went up that the men were coming in to Edmonton to recruit. Edmonton has furnished a fair show of men, but Edmonton does not own all these men, they come from all over the West to Edmonton to recruit.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh no.

Sir SAM HUGHES: And many of them had come from the Peace river, Vermilion and so on, and the cry was that these men had come in to enlist and that we must start new regiments. So, in place of putting new regiments at Vermilion and other places, we used Edmonton as a centre and we did not have regiments overlapping each other as my hon. friend has indicated to-night.

Mr. OLIVER: It would not be profitable to the House for the ex-minister and myself to discuss facts of which I have knowledge at first hand and of which he has knowledge only at second or forty-second hand. I wish to speak somewhat definitely, and I hope with due regard to courtesy, in regard to the proposals as to National Service. We are here to vote a credit of $500,000,000 to enable Canada to take that part which she ought to take in the war in Europe.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If the hon. member will excuse me I would like to return to a certain matter. Just as I came in, the hon. member for Russell was dilating on General Lessard. I did not catch the hon. gentleman's remarks further than that I heard him say that General Lessard was the first soldier in Canada. I regret exceedingly that I should have to discuss this matter in this House, but I have borne a good deal from the friends of that officer, and I do not purpose bearing any more. In the first place, General Lessard is not the first or in the first twenty officers in the Dominion, he is not so regarded by officers in this country. He has never distinguished himself more than any other officer; in fact, there are at least twenty other men in Canada who are just as good as he, some senior officers and some junior. He was a very excellent officer when I took charge of the department, and we managed to get along very nicely until the deputy minister, for certain reasons, requested that he be exchanged to Toronto. The horse association in Toronto were anxious to get him there to help them with their exhibitions. He went there, and as officer commanding the district he did very well until his health broke down. At the outbreak of the war General Lessard was not in a condition physically to take charge of a brigade, but even if he had been in the best physical condition I would not have been justified in putting him in command of a brigade. He had never commanded a brigade on active service anywhere; he had commanded a battalion, or rather a mounted corps, in South Africa.

But I may point out, what is not generally known, that General Lessard had merited dismissal from the service on two occasions. I am sorry to have to bring this up, but I have given General Lessard's friends every opportunity of keeping quiet, and they have not done so, and therefore I think I am justified in giving the facts. I will show that in two instances General Lessard acted in such a way that any other Minister of Militia in the world would have promptly dismissed him. The first occasion was before the war. The 36th Regiment was being recruited in the country districts around Dufferin, and officers came from the cities to take charge of the men. The men from the country would refer to those from the cities as wharf rats, and the boys would complain. The country fellows would come in and talk of the battalion being filled with wharf rats from the cities. There was a lot of ill-feeling in the old 36th Battalion about the matter, and I ordered a board of inquiry. General Lesard conducted the board of inquiry. I forget the details, but the the report was in favour of the country officers. The city officers were all good fellows. I was told that General Lessard had backed up the city officers, and I believed that, although the city officers, it seemed to me, did not know this. And so the trouble went on. General Lessard sent the report to me, and I read it. Some time later I was waited on by a deputation of the city officers, all very fine fellows, and they told me that they were anxious to have the recommendations of the report carried out. I said "the report backs the other side." They said, No, because General Lessard had read the report and it took their side. I sent for the report and showed it to them, and they said it was not the report which General Lessard had read to them. Then I sent for the Adjutant General, Colonel Williams. They had informed me that the report read to them had been addressed to Colonel Williams. I asked Williams if he had ever received such a report, and he said he had received a report marked "Private and confidential." I asked by what authority he, the adjutant general, presumed to receive a confidential report from the district officer commanding in Toronto. He got the report and it backed the side of the city fellows. General Lessard in the report said he did not know whether it would be carried out, but it stated that as the leader of the country fellows was a great Orange Lodge man, and as the minister was an Orangeman they would have to look out. I maintained that there is no minister except myself but would have dismissed General Lessard for writing such a report. However, I let him go on, and paid no further attention to it.

Later on, when the war was under way, I heard that there was some talk from Washington about a million Germans being ready to invade Canada from Buffalo. My own personal reports showed that there was no such danger, and that the Germans in Buffalo were attending to their business like gentlemen. However, I went and had a talk with a few friends from Buffalo and they told me the report was absolutely without foundation, that there was absolutely no need for a scare. There was also a report that there were thousands of Germans hidden in the cellars of houses in Toronto, who were going to rise at a certain hour, and all that sort of stuff. The whole country was in a panic. When I reached Welland on the Sunday I was told by Major Sharpe that two regiments had been ordered out, that they were to meet in Hamilton that afternoon and patrol the border. I had heard nothing about this when I left Ottawa. No orders for such a thing had been issued from Ottawa, but I thought that possibly instructions had been given and I had not been consulted. There were lots of things done in regard to which I was not consulted and upon which I should have been consulted. But I made enquiries by telephone, and I found that no such orders had emanated from Ottawa. I telephoned to Hamilton for those gentlemen who were turning out the troops, to meet me, and I told them that they were not to turn the men out, that it would be a waste of money to do so and that it would scare the people and stop recruiting. Already similar agitations had done much to hurt recruiting. I believed that these agitations were started by Germans in order to prevent our boys from recruiting, to divert our energies from the front and to keep them at home. When I arrived in Toronto that evening I was met at Sunnyside station by an officer—I may say he was not the colonel of the Queen's Own, he was not even connected with the Queen's Own, though that statement was made at the time—who told me that there was going to be a scare parade of the troops in Toronto on the following day, that the troops were to be called out. I said that it should not be done because it would startle the city. He said that General Lessard had arranged to turn out the troops and let the public believe there might be a German invasion or that the Germans in the cellars of Toronto might rise and loot the city, the object being to show how quickly the troops could be mobilized. I pointed out that we had only a few thousand troops in the city, and that it would be only an exhibition of our weakness. He said, "That is how I feel about it too, but I thought I would take the liberty of reporting the matter to you." When I got to Toronto, I found two officers waiting at the station, one a Queen's Own officer, and another officer, a colonel, one of them—not the Queen's Own officer—came to warn me about this fool movement that was to take place, and I immediately telephoned to General Lessard. I found he was in the Exhibition building, where he was holding a conclave with the Toronto Board of Control. I took him into a room and asked him what he meant by ordering a turn-out. He said it would be an experience. I said, "It will startle the people, a fool proposition like that; don't do it." He said he did not think it would. He promised me that he would put it in the papers in the morning and on the bulletin board making it plain that there was no surprise in the matter and that it was merely for training purposes. He begged me to allow him to go on and on a distinct understanding with General Lessard that he would have the purpose for which the troops were being called out announced on the bulletin boards and in the papers in the morning, and also on the understanding that the Dominion Government would not be responsible for any of the cost, I consented to his carrying his programme out to that extent. I made a mistake; I should have stopped it there and then but on the ground that they had pledged themselves in reference to it and that they would give warning to the people in the morning that it was only a scare which was being created, I permitted it to go on. I did so on the distinct understanding that I have mentioned. That distinct understanding was not carried out and it subsequently turned out that the object of the affair was to get the city into such a state of excitement that the council would be justified in voting $100,000 for the purchase of some rifles, clothing and that sort of thing for the home guards in Toronto. That was the purpose of the whole scheme and I do not think that General Lessard is entitled to much consideration from the Department of Militia and Defence. This talk about his being the best soldier in Canada is a decided insult to many very superior officers in Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Winnipeg and other points throughout Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: I was saying that when we are dealing with this tremendous subject of voting a credit of $500,000,000 for the further prosecution of Canada's part in the war, now is the time and this is the place——

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to say one more word?

Mr. OLIVER: Certainly.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Long ago General Lessard was requested to go to the province of Quebec where it was stated he had great influence, but I was assured from the province of Quebec that he had none and he himself admitted that he had none there.

Mr. OLIVER:—this is the time and place in which to have it thoroughly understood by the House and the country how far the pledge of Canada made one year ago has been implemented and how far the means which we have provided have been employed in implementing that promise. There was no reservation in the promise made. It was as distinct as words could make it. It was so accepted by the people of Canada, I think, without regard to locality or race. I believe it was so accepted by the Empire and by the Allies. Canada received a great deal of favourable publicity because of the pledge, but we are standing here to-day, more than one year after the pledge was given, and it has not been fulfilled yet. Is the money that we are voting here to-day for the fulfilment of the pledge, or is the pledge not to be fulfilled? That is the question that I think should be answered unequivocally. Some time ago the announcement was made that the Government had in mind certain proposals for what they called National Service, and it was assumed by the public, or at least by a large part of the public, that the National Service proposals had some relation—had indeed a very direct relation—to implementing the Premier's promise. They have been discussed and considered seriously in that sense by people in all parts of the country. The Prime Minister and the Director of National Service made a tour of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific ostensibly for the purpose of explaining these proposals. I hope it will not be discourteous if I say that no explanation was made, that no explanation has been made, and I think here and now is the time and place to make an explanation as to whether or not the National Service proposals are intended as a means of implementing the pledge of Canada to furnish 500,000 men to the Allied army. If that is the purpose, then the country has the right to know it, and if it is not the purpose the country ought to know it and should know it in unequivocal terms from the lips of the Prime Minister.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) that the purpose of the National Service proposals has not been explained to the people of the country. It was explained as fully as we were able to explain it at every meeting which was held. My hon. friend's ideas as to what constitutes an explanation may differ from my own. As to what an explanation is, I naturally must follow my own ideas and my own judgment as I am not fully acquainted with the ideas of my hon. friend in that regard. The idea was to ascertain the available manhood of Canada, their number, their ages, their residences, their employment, their physical condition, with the object of utilizing in the most effective way the human energy, the man power of Canada for the purpose of throwing the full weight of this country into the war. It was necessarily connected with the desire of securing the greatest number of men for service at the front. That is the most important duty of all. We must throw our energy into the proposal to bring the number of men up to the standard already indicated. We must throw our whole energies into that. In addition to that we want to find out what the entire man power of this country is in order that the energy of our people, in so far as it is not employed in service at the front, may be employed in this country for those purposes which are essentially necessary for the winning of the war. That was the double purpose which was embraced in the proposals for National Service. The information asked for on the cards which have been sent out ought to elicit information which would enable the Director General, and the directors of the National Service to place in the hands of the Government data of a most valuable character for that purpose.

Mr. OLIVER: I presume that it is in order at this time to discuss the merit of the proposal as explained by the Prime Minister. What I desire to point out is that if it was intended or expected that the issue of inquiry cards would secure the information that has been suggested as desired, it is obvious on the face of it that it is entirely, not to say absurdly, unsuited to the purpose.

If it was intended to use any degree of Governmental direction or compulsion, if you like, on the individual it was upon the individual who up to that time had not responded to what might be considered the call of duty. The man to whom compulsion was necessary in order that he should do his duty to his country was certainly the man who was not going to respond to the card of inquiry. If the Government's intention was to have knowledge of the manpower of the country, meaning to include those whose disposition did not favour the giving of their services voluntarily, they would necessarily have to use some directive or controlling authority in order to acquire the information. That is done when a census is taken, simply for the purpose of getting information for the general benefit of the country, and having no regard to the possibility of future compulsion applied to the individual. A census is taken under compulsion as to the information given, and that is done as it is the only way to get the information. Surely, when information is desired for the purpose of applying compulsion to the individual in regard to a matter to which he is opposed, compulsion is all the more necessary if you want to get the information. So I say that on the face of it, judged by any possible standard, the Government did not take adequate means to secure the information that the Prime Minister has said they desired to secure, and which the scheme was intended to give them. In that connection let me point out that a census of the three prairie provinces was taken during the past summer, and there was no reason, from the point of view of expense or otherwise, why that census should not have given all the information that it was possible to get, or that could be utilized for the purposes suggested, and without extra expense to the country. Therefore, again I say, although desiring beyond everything not to be discourteous, we in the western provinces who see this work being done as it is being done, when it might have been done, so far as we are concerned, so much more effectively, and at no expense, we will have to be pardoned if we doubt the good faith shown in the pursuance of this scheme. We are compelled by the circumstances to doubt that it was put forward in good faith. If it was not the intention to use for compulsory purposes the information that has been gathered or that it has been attempted to gather by the National Service inquiries—and we have the authority of two ministers of the Crown given directly to the electors that it was not the intention to use it for that purpose—then the Government was very ill-advised not to say so in so many words.

I am going to ask the Government—they have the knowledge, and I ask them to place it before the House—how many people have left this Dominion of Canada for the United States within the last two months, largely as the result of alarm at the possibility or expectation of the enforcement of compulsory service, indicated by the sending out of these cards and by the irresponsible suggestions that have been made from time to time by public speakers and through the newspaper press. I ask specifically for that information. Our immigration agents on the boundary must have the information, or should have it, and it would be very informing to have it placed before the House. I am compelled to say that it seems to me the Government did not appreciate the serious character of the course they were taking. They did not seem to realize that it was possible to alarm a portion of the public by irresponsible and ill-intended talk in regard to military compulsion, while at the same time drawing up a card of inquiry, which on its face, judged by any standard that you can apply from the English language, was not intended as a step towards compulsion or military service. The card was drawn deliberately, purposely, and cleverly for the purpose of not establishing a basis for compulsory military service. It was intended to be used in those parts of the country and with those people that are opposed to compulsory service, while an irresponsible assertion was permitted to be circulated in other parts of the country, where the people were favourable to compulsory service, that the National Service cards were the first step towards compulsory military service. Now the misfortune was, that the people who do not want to give military service are to be found in all parts of the country, and wherever they were found the effect was the same; they took the advice of the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Blondin), and departed in large numbers across the line. If it was the intention to mobilize the labour of the country for industrial purposes, particularly with a view to industries related especially to the war, I want to point out that, by reason of the fact that these people have gone across the line, our industrial efficiency has been considerably decreased, simply because the Government undertook to profess to do something that they had no intention whatsoever of doing. The government of this country in a time of war is a responsibility that does not admit of such executive action as is involved in the so-called National Service proposals.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend seems to look at the National Service proposals in two lights. One portion of his argument was devoted to showing that the proposals did not go far enough, and the conclusion of his argument was apparently based on the assumption that they went too far and therefore had the result of sending people out of this country for fear that the proposals were directly concerned with the idea of immediate compulsory military service. I do not know that a Government is to be held responsible for all the assertions that may be made in unauthorized quarters in regard to proposals of this character; I do not know how such assertions could very well be prevented, whether in the press or otherwise; but my hon. friend must surely know that before the National Service cards went to the people of this country at all, before the National Service Board was ever constituted, there were some people apparently leaving this country through dread of military service, and more than that, there were people apparently prevented from coming to this country as visitors and tourists through the fear of military service being imposed upon them if they happened to be in this country under such conditions. It is impossible to prevent ideas of that kind from getting abroad. When my hon. friend suggests that the census which was taken in the western provinces during the present year gives all the information that is asked for in the National Service card——

Mr. OLIVER: Pardon me, I said that at that time with the same expense the report could have been obtained. At least, that is what I wished to say.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not so understand my hon. friend, I simply wished to point out that information was asked for in the National Service card which was not included in the census and which is really necessary for the purpose of the Government if it purposes to devote its efforts towards utilizing the human energy of this country in the most effective way for the winning of this war. My hon. friend will understand, of course, that some of the questions to which he has alluded are surrounded with difficulties and complexities; that the course of a Government in such matters is not always free from difficulties. The one purpose that we have had in mind throughout the war from the beginning to the end, so long as we depend upon the voluntary good-will of the people of this country, was to have recruiting carried on under such conditions as would ensure the enlistment of the greatest possible number of men. Reference was made this evening by my hon. friend the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to the fact that, according to his view, there had not been a careful system in the selection of men; that recruiting had been carried on without due regard, as I understood him, for the service which the particular individual might, at the moment of his enlistment, be performing for the State.

Mr. MACDONALD: What I desired to indicate was that the whole system of recruiting was lax, and not merely in the particular matter to which my right hon. friend refers; that there was apparently no care nor judgment nor system displayed in the method by which recruits were sought

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot agree with that. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) explained the system which he inaugurated in the first instance. If anyone could have foreseen the length of this war and the very great number of men that eventually would be put into the field by Canada, possibly methods more effective might have been employed. I am not prepared to pass judgment on that at the moment. The recruiting proceeded with a great deal of vigour and earnestness, and the fact that we succeeded in the first three and a half months of the past year in recruiting a hundred thousand men or more is an indication that the work was carried on with a good deal of vigour and with a great deal of success. The criticism has been made that proper regard to selection was not made. I discussed that question with the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence more than a year ago—I think in the autumn of 1915 for the first time. The course which my colleague took in that regard was that he did not think at that time that any more systematic method was necessary, and he said that it would be possible, through instructions given to his recruiting officers, to prevent unwise selection, selection which might result in the closing up of industries essential for the prosecution of the war, when recruits might have been obtained from other classes whose work and service were not so essential. I was informed by General Hughes that instructions had been given in various instances to adopt methods which would give some system to that purpose.

Mr. OLIVER: About what time was that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it was in the autumn of 1915 or early in 1916.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Early in 1916.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Early in 1916, I think, and afterwards it was thought better that the purpose could be carried out in connection with other objects in a more comprehensive way by the proposals for National Service, and that is the explanation of the course which was taken. Before this appropriation has been voted, I shall endeavour to obtain some exact information as to the success which has attended the Director General and the Directors of National Service as to the number of cards that have been returned, and I think my hon. friend, the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will find that the movement has resulted in a much greater degree of success than that which he seemed to imagine from some remarks which he addressed to the committee before the House rose at six o'clock. The object of the proposals was precisely that which I have stated, namely, to find out the number, the name, the age, the physique, the employment, and all the other particulars with regard to the manhood of Canada which would be of service for the purpose of increasing the forces at the front, and also, as to those who may not go to the the front, to direct their energies into the activities which will be most essential for the winning of this war.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In the matter of asking certain localities to let up in recruiting, I was out of the Chamber and did not hear what the First Minister said just now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I merely said that a question has been raised as to whether selections for recruiting had been carried on with system—as to whether men had been taken whose services would be more valuable on accounut of their training and experience in the occupations which they then pursued than in the military service. Industries have made complaints that men whose training could not be effected in less than two, three or four years were being sent to the front, while men might have been selected from other classes whose absence could be readily provided for.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I would point out, as an instance of that kind, the case of young Rosamond, of Almonte, who was enlisted as a private or a lieutenant. When I found that he was in the service I realized that I could put a thousand men in as privates, but that it would be difficult to get another experienced dyer and cloth expert like Rosamond. I approached him five or six different times with a view to getting him back, because I knew that he would do more good in making cloth. Take one special instance in which I was asked to take definite steps along this line was when the Prime Minister brought up the matter of the Sydney Mines. I took occasion at the time to point out that when I was first acquainted with Sydney Mines they had a splendid, stalwart type of Highland Scotch workers there. The next time I had the privilege of visiting the mines, a lot of German, Austrian and Hungarian workmen were employed in them, these splendid stalwarts having been driven out. I am not blaming anybody, but it is a fact that these men gave place to foreigners. And then certain gentlemen wanted to fill the vacancies with good stalwart fellows that we thought should be given the privilege of becoming volunteers in Sydney. The Prime Minister will remember that I rubbed the delegation up a little about their treatment of these fellows in days gone by. However, I did ask some of the recruiting officers not to take specialists or men expert in certain lines if they could possibly get along without them, or, at any rate, not to bring much pressure to bear upon them. I was amazed to be asked inside of a month thereafter to give one of these very gentlemen who had been asking me to stop the recruiting in that locality the command of a battery so that he might take some of these very men away with him. His patriotism carried him away.

Mr. OLIVER: With regard to the Prime Minister's comparison between the people who left Canada at the beginning of the war and those who left within the last two or three months, I would point out that at the beginning of the war there were economic reasons which took people across the line, whereas no such economic reasons have existed within the last few months. Wages are high enough now and employment plentiful enough in Canada to hold all our people so far as economic reasons are concerned, whereas at the beginning of the war this was not the case. At this time, when there is great need for men, the policy of the Government is driving men out of the country.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Does my hon. friend think that if refusal to sign the card had been attended with fine or imprisonment the result would have been more satisfactory?

Mr. OLIVER: No, but I think that if the Government had a serious intention of enforcing compulsory service they would have taken compulsory means to that end. They have not taken means to establish compulsory service, yet they have taken such means as have alarmed those who are easily alarmed. The result has been that these people have gone out of the country and we have lost their productive labour. If the Government's proposal merely aimed at industrial results they have absolutely and directly defeated the very purpose they had in view, for they have driven labour away. If the purpose was a military one, they have made no success. I wish to bring forward another point in connection with this proposal which is not a proposal, if I may use the expression. We were depending on voluntary enlistment for the fulfillment of our pledge. As long as we depended absolutely upon voluntary enlistment the response, while it may have been decreasing to some extent, was still very creditable. But when the National Service cards were spoken of, and the idea was given out that the Government was going to take upon itself the responsibility of choosing whether an able-bodied young man should take up a five-dollar-a-day job at home or go into the trenches in France, risking his life and everything he had, naturally nobody was going to volunteer to go into the trenches when he had a fair chance of being selected to go into a munition plant at $5 a day. As a consequence recruiting, to all intents and purposes, absolutely stopped as soon as the National Service proposals were put forward. That is to say, as soon as the Government intimated to the young men who were eligible that it would take the responsibility upon its shoulders, it lifted the responsibility off their shoulders—and they simply sat back and waited. It is an established fact that recruiting has gone down to its very lowest ebb since the National Service proposals were brought in. Any person can establish for himself, by inquiring amongst the men who are affected, the fact that the proposals of National Service, so-called, are directly responsible for that drop in voluntary enlistment. I am quite aware that the Government had no intention of producing that result, any more than they had any intention of driving people across the line. But we should be doing much less than our duty if, having observed certain definite and unquestionable results from a certain course of action, we did not state the facts to the Government and to the country for their information.

Mr. BURNHAM: What remedy would the hon. gentleman suggest? For those conditions exist in France, England, Russia and Italy.

Mr. OLIVER: My suggestion would be that the Government follow its policy of 1911, "Let well enough alone." When we depend on voluntary enlistment we should improve the conditions for voluntary enlistment and not introduce other conditions and other considerations having the effect of absolutely killing voluntary enlistment.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The hon. gentleman said 1911; did he mean it?

Mr. OLIVER: I said 1911.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not think you meant it.

Mr. OLIVER: That was the policy of the Opposition of that day—let well enough alone. Let the Government stick to that policy now. When the people responded as they did respond under the system of voluntary enlistment, the thing to do would have been to find the weaknesses of that system and strengthen it—not abandon it and adopt some new idea.

Mr. BURNHAM: What other idea?

Mr. OLIVER: I cannot give my hon. friend ideas

Mr. BURNHAM: I thought not.

Mr. OLIVER: There are things beyond my possibilities. I say that the part of wisdom would have been to have carried on and bettered conditions for the voluntary system, rather than to have abandoned the reliance upon voluntary service and introduced the idea of compulsory service, without daring to introduce the fact.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend, I think, is overlooking some of the facts as to which he is enlightening the Government and the committee. As a matter of fact, the falling off in recruiting, if I recollect aright, was some months before the National Service cards went out. The recruiting proceeded at the rate of nearly one thousand a day from the 1st of January, 1916, till about the 15th of April; and then, when the spring opened and the seeding and work of preparation for the summer began, it fell off in a very marked degree. I would not like to trust my memory for the figures.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I understood there were 26,000 in the month of June, not a bad falling off.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think that in the middle of April there was a considerable falling off. I do not remember June, but I think it fell off about the middle of April and through May.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The falling off came in August.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think there was a marked falling off in the middle of April, with all deference to my hon. friend. I will find out about that and put the figures before the committee. I remember that my attention was directed to the fact that there were about one thousand recruits a day from the 1st of January until the 15th of April, and that after that recruiting did not proceed on anything like so large a scale. However, I will give the figures to the committee for the whole year, and my hon. friend will see whether or not his conclusions are justified by the facts, of which, at the moment, I am somewhat doubtful.

Sir SAM HUGHES: In regard to recruiting, the Prime Minister is correct in saying that in April we did let up. We had all our barracks and places where soldiers were kept in the distribution system pretty well filled, and when it came on towards spring I did not wish to incur any additional expense for buildings in the transition months between winter and the time when it would be possible to have the men go under canvas, so we left off for a couple of weeks. But I think my right hon. friend will find that the recruiting kept up well, and I know I could have kept it up longer only for this talk of the labour question and National Service, all this piffle about labour. That is what caused the men to stop going to the colours; they said: why should we go to the colours and be shot for $1.10 per day, when the Government may send us to a $10 job in a factory?

Mr. GRAHAM: The question of recruiting is one in which I have taken a good deal of interest ever since the war started. We first had recruiting speakers' leagues, and as many public men as were at liberty to do so placed their services at the disposal of these leagues or organizations. I think they did a good deal of useful work, and, with all humility, I am of the opinion that a good deal of the success of the recruiting in the early days was due to the efforts of men who had only one object in view, that of assisting the cause, and who, without any expense to any one, went from one end of the country to the other, wherever they were asked to go, wherever it was thought that their services would be of benefit, trying to educate, or rather inform the young men of Canada of the seriousness of the situation. At the beginning it was easy, comparatively, because we must admit that even in Ontario the great mass of our first enlistments were from the British-born. That is true, and all honour to them. They understood what it meant. Some of them had had military service before. They had been brought up in an atmosphere where war was, if not ever present, at least not very long absent from them in some degree. The fathers of most of them had seen military service. They enlisted at once without any hesitation, and we were able to send off our first contingent with amazing rapidity. But to our own young men, who had been educated along other lines and trained rather to the conquests of commerce and peace than those of the battlefield, it was a new idea and required a good deal of explanation on the part of public men, or private effort, to convince them that the situation was so serious that they ought to give up their employment and go to the front. The end of results from this effort seems to have arrived. I am free to admit, though I have been attending some of these meetings quite recently, that the apparent results from these efforts are now a bit discouraging. Whatever the reason may be I do not know; but the young men who ought to go but have not gone seem to find some reason or excuse for not going; argue as you will. They will agree with your argument, but will not carry it out in practice. Just what is the best step to take in order to renew activity, to give new life, call it new leadership if you like, I am not prepared to advise this House. Perhaps if I wished to raise a controversial question, I could give advice as to how I think new life could be infused into the whole thing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Go ahead.

Mr. GRAHAM: Some say it ought to be a national government. Well, it ought to be some other than the present Government anyway; I think that would help a good deal.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Did you say a Nationalist Government?

Mr. GRAHAM: No; they want to take the "ist" out of this present Government. Every other Government of the Allies has turned itself inside out in order to get out of the rut, to give new life and new vigour; but our Government seems to lag in that respect and rather hesitates to cease being a Government. But that is not what I intended to say along this line—I was diverted by the Prime Minister. At another time I will discuss that perhaps more fully.

Now as to the National Service: I am free to admit that I think a mistake was made in the way in which the selection of the National Service Board was gone about. I think that these men ought to have been selected irrespective of how they voted—so long as they were for the war—from the biggest men we could find in the Dominion of Canada. I think the second error was made in paying the men selected for this service. I was astonished the other day to find that most of these men were accepting $250 a month for being members of the National Service Board. The men that ought to be on that board, if results are to be obtained, are men whom you could not hire with five times $250 a month if you were paying them for their services. In Canada, I believe, there are at the present time thousands of men who would have been glad to do that for the great cause without any money. There are hundreds doing as much without any pay, and paying their own expenses all over the country. And the selection of these men and the payment to them of $250 a month for this bit of work, whatever they may accomplish, rightly or wrongly, has given the public the idea that there is a flavour of making jobs for party friends. That is not a National Service.

All that kind of thing should be cut out as far as possible. There are men, known for scores of miles from the point at which they reside who, I believe, would be willing and glad to undertake this work. I will not criticise the personnel of the board; I only wish to say that there are men on that board who are not known twenty miles from where they reside, who are not conversant with the conditions even in their own locality. These men do not bring the dynamic force to their work that the Government ought to have in this National Service scheme if it is to accomplish anything. I am not speaking disparagingly of these men, but it is a great cause in which we are engaged. The nation's life depends upon it, and personal feelings or personal regard must be set aside because that for which we are fighting is too great a thing to be influenced in any way by such considerations. I say again, without any wish to criticise the individuals themselves, that the National Service Board has not in some instances, men who command influence even in the districts in which they reside. I do not know what work the members of the board have to accomplish as members, but I do know that the Director General, full of energy, full of steam, has gone through the country, and up and down, expounding the National Service scheme, accompanying the Prime Minister. But so far as I can ascertain, and I am speaking as one acquainted with several localities in which there is one of these directors—I have a more intimate knowledge of the territories in Ontario in which some of these men are located than they themselves—they have not the influence, the far-reaching, strong, gripping influence that some big outstanding man in the locality would have who would be willing to serve his country gladly without being placed on the pay-list of the Government under the present circumstances.

Here are one or two little items that affect recruiting in detail.

10 p.m. One came before me just recently. A woman has three sons, two at the front, and the youngest boy ready to go. The two at the front are missing. It is the policy of the department, whether it be the law or not, to give to the person at home the pay assigned by a missing soldier for a period of three months after he is reported missing. This woman, who has two sons missing, received the assigned pay for December—I think it was for December, but the month is immaterial—for the month in which the son was reported missing, and she was told in a letter from the department, that she would receive it for the three months following. But before the next payment becaue due, she was notified from Ottawa that the paymaster had stopped the payment of the assigned pay. I have the correspondence in my possession. That poor woman has another son missing, and I submit in that particular locality, that one circumstance alone will injure recruiting more than anything else that could take place, because the mother is the one whose heart is torn most by seeing her boy go away. In this particular case she had sacrificed her three sons, two of whom were missing, and this is the condition with which she is confronted. Under what circumstances could the paymaster stop that assigned pay? I take the position that once that pay is assigned, it ceases to be the property of the soldier who assigns it, and that neither the department nor the paymaster has any right to violate the contract with the mother by stopping the assigned pay of that soldier.

Another little thing came to my notice—these matters may seem small, but you have to recruit men by individuals, and not by the hundred, and everything that tends to dishearten the mothers of these boys at the front will affect the recruiting of other mothers' sons more than anything else.

Mr. HAZEN: What reason was given in the correspondence for stopping the pay?

Mr. GRAHAM: No reason whatever; the letter simply stated that the paymaster had ordered the assigned pay to be stopped.

Mr. KEMP: There was surely some reason assigned.

Mr. GRAHAM: I assure my hon. friend that no reason was assigned.

Mr. KEMP: I would be glad to have the correspondence.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have the correspondence, and I have asked the department for an explanation, because none whatever was given. That is one case, and I suppose there are scores of cases in which not only is the mother's heart being broken but financial stress is being caused. These mothers are telling their story to everybody in that particular locality, with the result that recruiting is bound to be affected.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I may say that sometimes I have correspondence in regard to administrative matters where some mistake has been made, or some misunderstanding has arisen, and the course I take is to bring the matter at once to the attention of the minister in order to have it remedied.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister knows that I have bothered him considerably about these things. This matter is before the department now, but we are here discussing the question of recruiting, and it is a case which I think is of sufficient importance to bring to the attention of the House.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Usually, in the case of a missing soldier, the assigned pay is continued for three months, and the separation allowance for thirty weeks. At the end of thirty weeks, the man is officially declared dead, and the pension commences. Meantime the Patriotic Fund looks after the family.

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall come to that in a moment. I am not going to depart from the facts I have stated. I have the correspondence, and have talked the matter over with the family. I immediately took the case up with the branch of the department immediately concerned. I wrote for particulars, and am waiting for a reply. Nevertheless, the case is as I have stated it.

Another matter brought to my attention concerns what is known, I think, as work pay. I received a letter a day or two ago from a gentleman who said he had been waited on by several men who complained to him that as skilled mechanics—he named several callings, such as blacksmiths, and horseshoers—they had been given the pay of the ordinary private with an equal amount added which was called work pay. That was paid to them for quite a time, but without any preliminary notice they were told that the work pay would cease, and they were given the option of returning home, if they desired discharge, or of remaining in the service with the pay of a private. That was not the understanding on which these men joined the service, and they feel that they have a grievance. I am not arguing about the merits of the grievance; I am pointing out that such small matters affect recruiting, and that if these men have a grievance they tell it to their neighbours here, there and everywhere. We who are endeavouring to do our best to induce men to enlist meet these complaints, and it is not an easy thing for us, who are not in the inside, to explain why it is or how it is that such things are done. In short, Mr. Chairman, I think it ought to be, as possibly it is, the aim of the Government to err on the generous side, even if it costs a little more money, and to keep absolute faith with the men who go to the front. Furthermore, we must absolutely keep faith with the families whom the men leave behind; that is, perhaps, more important. We are discussing that question now, and we will be discussing it more and more as the soldiers return, but it is just as important at the present time and perhaps more important that we should take care that, as far at least as our contract is concerned, the family of the man whom we have induced to go to the front is not neglected.

As to the Patriotic Fund, my hon. friend from Montreal, St. Antoine (Sir Herbert Ames) deserves a good deal of credit for the work he has done in connection with it I am not going to criticise the Patriotic Fund but just let me express an opinion. They are making appeals now for the Patriotic Fund. I am glad I represent half a county that, I think, does as well as any county in Canada. Consequently, I will be excused for saying a few things. We have too many societies with good aims, with aims that are laudable but with results that are not satisfactory. There is not a day now in which any one of us, upon going down town, when we are at home, does not encounter some person who presents some method of contribution. No man who is a man objects to contributing to any fund that is going to help forward this cause; no man who is a man objects to contributing anything which will bring comfort or consolation or aid to the soldiers at the front. But there is a diffusion of effort that some force ought to grapple with so that we will not have that diversity that does injustice to those who are doing work without getting the desired results. I could bring to the mind of the committee many instances, but my experience is the experience of a great many members. Well-intentioned women of the best families in Canada undertake work laudable in its purpose but they do not accomplish the results that they ought to get for the effort or expenditure of cash, merely because there is no direction to all these things. Perhaps it would be a little awkward if one were to go so far as to say that no society ought to undertake work for the war, where the question of raising money is concerned, unless it was authorized by the Government so that it would have the official imprint.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Would my hon. friend apply that to proposals coming from abroad sometimes, such as the fund in aid of the sailors?

Mr. GRAHAM: The Government should approve of it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Make it general?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not suggesting that it should not be general.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have been met on the streets of one city by a poor woman who said that she was selling shoe laces on behalf of the soldiers. It was nonsense; she was not doing anything of the kind. But we have so many of these societies that if the Government would take them in hand and at least say to the public that any society that has not the authorization of the Government is not working along the lines upon which we wish to have it work, it might have a good effect. I started out to say that we have many splendid women whose energies are not being rewarded to the full merely because they are not properly directed.

Sir HERBERT AMES: While the hon. gentleman (Mr. Graham) is examining the documents I have sent to him, I want to put myself on record as most heartily agreeing in what has been expressed by him in reference to the necessity of some organization of charitable and patriotic enterprises in Canada. They have found it absolutely necessary in England and they have passed the War Charities Act, 1916, making it illegal for any so-called charity to collect money for patriotic purposes unless they have been examined, certificated and authorized by the Government. They realize in England that in every patriotic endeavour it is quite important to have proper supervision and not to have wasted effort, and I entirely agree with what has been said that something of the kind ought to be done here.

Mr. GRAHAM: I take strong exception to some of the methods that were adopted in distributing the Patriotic Fund and the funds of the various societies. I have a strong view that the wives and families of men who are at the front are not under any obligation to us. We are under obligation to them. They are making more sacrifices in affection than we are in money. No matter how good the disposition is, when either a man or a woman goes to the family of a soldier who is at the front and in some unpleasant way pretends to guide the affairs of the family, treats them as wards not knowing why they are getting this money and intimating that if they will be good they may get some more, it is a misuse of the purpose of these funds. It is all wrong. These families are entitled to all we can do for them, and it is not our business to be criticising the internal economy of their homes. I go that far. However, I am glad to say that as much of that is not being done now as was being done formerly.

Sir HERBERT AMES: It is being done much more tactfully now.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have had the wives of soldiers come to me quietly at meetings and make the complaint that while they were glad to receive the fund as they could not live without it, yet they were often humiliated by the acceptance of it. One lady put it to me in this way: I wish I could get along without it because every time they come to my house they treat me as if I were receiving some charity which was being doled out to me.

Sir SAM HUGHES: As if they owned the country.

Mr. GRAHAM: As if they owned the country and as if the men who were fighting for the country were of some inferior caste. I am saying this in the hope that the conditions to which I refer may be altered and that my words may be of some use. These are only a few of the things that have hampered our recruiting. I am anxious to go on and do anything I can along the line of trying to get our full quota of men. But I have come to the point where, unless the Government can give me some new idea, some new line, some way of getting up steam, some way of getting out of the rut, of putting the question in a new light, I am afraid that recruiting speeches are going to be futile. I do not intend to quit; I propose to keep going on so long as I can be of any assistance, but it is going to be slow work unless we can get some new impetus, some new dynamic force, by which the people can be aroused. But, in order that we may arouse the people, we must first arouse ourselves, and if we are in a rut, for Heaven's sake, let us get out of it and lead the people along the right path.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is a good deal of force in the suggestion of my hon. friend, that there should be some control over the creation of funds. It may not be very easy to deal with it, but it seems to me that, in view of the occurrences during the past two or three months, matters that have come under my own observation, it will be the duty of the Government to consider whether or not some measure should be proposed to Parliament, or action taken under the War Measures Act for that purpose. I agree also that such instances as my hon. friend has alluded to, where a mistake is made in the administration of some branch of the Department of Militia and Defence, possibly through the oversight of some official, create an unfortunate impression that may be detrimental to recruiting; but it is absolutely impossible to prevent these things happening sometimes. The only thing the Government can do is to remedy them in the most effective way when cases are brought to their attention.

I rose for the purpose of calling attention to the actual figures for recruiting for 1916. I have here a statement which has been handed me by an hon. gentleman in the House. I have not had the officers of the department verify it, but it is obviously in the form in which such official statements are sent out, and the figures given here correspond with my recollection. The figures are: January, 1916, 29,212; February, 26,658; March, 32,819; April, 23,289. I have seen the figures from the 1st to the 15th of April, and from the 15th to the 30th; I have not them here, but I will get them; but I am sure the recruiting began to fall off about the 15th of April. The figures for the rest of the year are: May, 15,090; June, 10,796—not 26,000 as my hon. friend (Sir Sam Hughes) seemed to imagine—July, 8,675; August, 7,267; September, 6,337; October, 6,005; November, 6,509; December, 5,796; making a total for the year of 178,453. I should be surprised if the figures for January, 1917, did not show a considerable increase over those of October, November, and December last year. in fact I should be disappointed if they did not.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Are not the figures for January this year largely made up of timbermen and railwaymen?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know precisely how the figures are made up, but I say that the figures for January this year will exceed those for October, November or December of last year. The figures I have quoted for last year include Construction, Labour and Forestry Battalions, so that if the figures for January this year do happen to include timber men and railway men, as my hon. friend suggests, they will include precisely what has been included in the figures for the past year.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is not the First Minister aware—he is well up in matters of this kind—that many more battalions of this kind are being raised now than formerly?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The battalions are being raised precisely in accordance with requests that have come from the British Government, and not otherwise. When they ask us to raise these battalions we endeavour to raise them, and unless they do ask us to raise battalions of this character we do not attempt to raise them. So the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) will see that the falling off in recruiting was not coincident with the sending out of the National Service cards. They were sent out about the end of December, I believe. The falling off in recruiting is, therefore, more coincident with certain demonstrations on the other side of the House in the early part of April last year. If we are to adopt the theory of post hoc ergo propter hoc we should have a different conclusion from that which my hon. friend from Edmonton has arrived at.

Mr. MACDONALD: When was it decided to abolish the system of obtaining recruits by billets?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not aware of the precise date.

Mr. MACDONALD: They stopped last spring.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the billeting system was designed altogether for winter months. In the summer the men are trained in camps. The falling off in recruiting, then, really began in the spring, at about the date I have mentioned, and it was obviously due to the conditions which began to prevail at that time in connection with preparing the land and getting ready for spring operations. Whether rightly or wrongly, I attribute it very largely to that cause.

Mr. LOGGIE: When I addressed the House last year, I appeared in the character of a doubting Thomas, because I intimated that in my opinion recruiting was falling off, and when the Prime Minister asked in what locality, I said all over the country. If I were to say that I am a doubting Thomas to-night regarding the effect of the National Service cards, I should simply be expressing the conviction of my own heart, that the results that were hoped for from the signing of these cards will not be obtained, because I believe in a great many districts the men that could go and ought to go will not sign the cards.

Mr. MACDONALD: The slackers will not sign.

Mr. LOGGIE: If a man is unwilling to do his whole duty to his home and country, he is not very likely to sign a card which may bring home to him that duty more effectually. So far as I am concerned, I had pleasure in sympathizing with and confirming the statement made by the right hon. the Prime Minister, that Canada should send at least 500,000 men to the field of battle. I am still more convinced that that number does not represent the full duty of the Canadian people to-day. Personally, I cannot see any difference between the duty of a Canadian living here in Canada to defend his home, and the duty of an Englishman, Scotchman or Irishman to defend his home in the United Kingdom. If 42,000,000 people have placed in the field of battle 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 men to defend the United Kingdom, equal to ten per cent of the population, are we doing our full duty when we say we will attempt to raise only five per cent? For 400,000 men is about five per cent of our population of 8,000,000. We are not doing one-half as much as they are doing in the old land, and the natural question arises, what can we do to better the situation? The Government of the day have undertaken to find out the number of available men fit, or probably fit, for the front, as well as the number of men available for the industrial work of the country. I take issue with hon. gentlemen who say that a man is fulfilling the same duty to his country whether he works in a munitions factory or works on a farm or whether he dons the khaki and takes his life in his hands in defence of home and country. The representatives of the people should make it clear to the people that the highest duty of any man who is fit is to don the khaki and fight. Whilst it is important to get men to work in munitions factories, I have no doubt that you can get many men who are unfit for going to the front who might very well be educated to work in munitions factories; and if young men are not available for such work, I am sure the women of Canada will come to the rescue and aid in that very important class of work.

Unless there is something behind the situation that we do not se at present, my opinion is that the Government of the day, instead of issuing the National Service cards —because they will certainly not get the names of a great many men who should go to the front—should enforce the Militia Act and call out the militia for home defence and train them and make them fit, and then, if the situation should become any more tense than it is at present, the Government could send them across the seas in defence of home and country. In that way I believe they would aid the Empire and give a greater impulse to recruiting throughout the land. Because if those young men don the khaki under the Militia Act and are trained and made ready for the front, other young men will be encouraged to enlist, perhaps not under the Militia Act, but under voluntary enlistment as it is carried on at present.

Some reference has been made to-night by hon. gentlemen, to the fact that the services of competent officers have not been utilized in the defence of our country. I can best illustrate that by an example. In my county, there is a gentleman who has been a militiaman practically all his life, who has, I think, attained to perhaps the highest standards and who has, I know, trained himself for the highest commands. I refer to Colonel McKenzie, and I know the ex-Minister of Militia is well acquainted with the gentleman to whom I refer. This gentleman, instead of being in khaki and commanding a battalion at the front, is doing his ordinary civil duties in the town of Chatham.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How old is Colonel McKenzie?

Mr. LOGGIE: I should think he is not quite as old as the commanding officer who recruited a battalion with headquarters on the north shore of New Brunswick.

Sir SAM HUGHES: How old was he?

Mr. LOGGIE: He was upwards of sixty years of age, and I understand the gentleman who recruited that battalion, took it over to England and is now coming back to Canada. I am sure, if it had been Col. McKenzie's good fortune to have given his services to the recruiting of that battalion, he would not be coming back to Canada but would be sent across the channel to take charge of his men on the field of battle.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did not his son go?

Mr. LOGGIE: One of his sons went, and perhaps the ex-minister has noticed in the papers within the last few days that he has received the D.S.O.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I think that one of my last official acts was to make him a colonel.

Mr. LOGGIE: That is very nice, but it does not make up the shortage in the other regard.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The trouble with Mercereau was that he had three sons fighting, but he was the best man of the lot. The other has two sons fighting and both of them claimed they were better than the old man.

Mr. LOGGIE: The fact is that the old gentleman is coming back on account of illness. After the battalion was practically completed, there was a desire in New Brunswick to recruit a Highland Battalion, and again this gentleman to whom I refer as a capable militiaman was overlooked, and the commanding officer was a returned soldier, Col. Guthrie. I have nothing to say against anyone, but the results are very discouraging at the present time. The battalion is known as the 236th McLean's Highlanders, and while recruiting has been going on since early last summer, only some 400 men have so far enlisted, and the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) tells me that men went all the way to Edmonton seeking recruits for that battalion. Now, there must be something wrong. The commanding officer apparently has not the drawing power that another commanding officer might have. At any rate, it is to be regretted that this Highland battalion now recruiting at Fredericton, N.B., is not getting more recruits, and I regret that the services of Col. McKenzie have not been utilized. This war has been going on now for over thirty months and Col. McKenzie's services have been offered to the Militia Department. Why they are turned down, gossip says one thing, and I would perhaps be getting into politics if I went into that.

Mr. CARVELL: You might find the true reason if you did.

Mr. LOGGIE: I might find the true reason, but I am timid.

I want to refer to another little matter that I think tends to discourage recruiting, and I ask the attention of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Kemp) whom I take very great pleasure in congratulating on his elevation to that high office. This letter is dated January 25, and refers to Sergeant Edward Bernard, formerly of my home town, who was killed in action in October last, leaving a wife and four or five little children. I will read a paragraph from the letter:

> As due to the fact that the Secretary of the Militia Council has not yet supplied Mrs. Bernard with the certificate of death, she has not been able to collect any of her husband's insurance, nor has she since his death had any pay or separation allowance. Mrs. Bernard is therefore in need of money and would like the matter of the pension quickly settled so that she may get her affairs somewhat straightened out. She has a family of small children depending on her and I trust this matter will receive your immediate attention.

I have taken this matter up with the secreary of the militia council, and I expect favourable action in the matter, because I fancy that there has been an omission on the part of an official or an employee of the department. An omission of this kind tends to discourage enlistment. I may say that I shall be delighted to aid the Government in any possible manner to encourage enlistment. I think that if they would put into force immediately that part of the Militia Act which provides for the calling out of men, they would help along the cause for which we are all striving. Then they could go on with the National Service idea and get out of it everything that there is in it. I hope that all persons whether they are fit for military service or not, will return their cards. Although I am above military age, I signed and returned my card for the sake of the example.

Mr. NICKLE: If the lady to whose case the member for Northumberland has directed attention will make application to the Pensions Board, by signing one of the forms supplied by the Pensions Commissioners and submitting her marriage certificate as well as the birth certificates of her children, her pension would automatically be granted. Before she can get the pension it is necessary that she should make application to the board. I understand that the hon. member does not suggest that she has directed the attention of the commissioners to the fact that she is deserving of a pension.

Mr. LOGGIE: Application was made for her, but the necessary form was not supplied.

Mr. NICKLE: If the hon. gentleman will be good enough to let me have to-morrow the name of the deceased soldier and of the widow, I promise him that attention will be directed to the matter at once. The regulations of the department provide that where a man is reported missing, as distinguished from dead—I am referring to the case of a private—the assigned pay is paid at the rate of $15 a month, separation allowance at the rate of $20 a month, and Patriotic Fund allowance at the rate of $5 a month. I am assuming that in this case there are no children. At the end of the first three months the assigned pay ceases, but the separation allowance and Patriotic Fund money continue. At the end of six months, if nothing has been heard of the man, the pension is granted. Then, from the eight months' pension payable—six months being the regular pension and two months gratuity—the sums paid as assigned pay, separation allowance and Patriotic Fund money are deducted, and the balance goes to the widow. In the case to which the member for South Renfrew directs attention, if the letter that he speaks of has been written there must be some misunderstanding or some fact of which he is not aware.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Pension is granted from the date of death.

Mr. NICKLE: Certainly.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Every branch and sub-branch of the Patriotic Fund in Canada voluntarily and gratuitously acts as agent for people who wish to apply for pensions. Every branch has the necessary blank forms and whenever a death occurs the widow is communicated with, is told that she can obtain the form and is instructed how to fill it out. The Patriotic Fund branch then endeavours to help her secure her pension, which she succeeds in getting within three or four weeks from the date of death.

Mr. PROULX: Is the Pensions Board bound to follow the rules laid down last year by the committee which dealt with the question of pensions? Last August a soldier from my county was killed. His foster-father is an invalid and unable to earn a living for himself and his family. The regulations provide for granting a pension to a de facto wife or to the children born of the de facto wife of a soldier. I think that the claim of a foster-father to a pension is as meritorious as that of a de facto wife.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The recommendations of the committee on pensions last session were put in force by order in council, but with the understanding that at this session a Bill should be introduced. That Bill has been prepared and will be introduced. Some question has arisen as to whether the recommendations of that committee might not need some addition or modification, and it is probable that when the Bill is introduced it will be again referred to a committee, presumably the same committee that dealt with the subject last year. The whole subject may then be taken into consideration and a conclusion arrived at as to whether the recommendations made last year should be modified or added to in any way. When that committee is constituted the suggestion which my hon. friend has made will be a matter for consideration.

Mr. PROULX: Will this committee be appointed before recess?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not sure whether the Bill is quite ready, but if it is there is no reason why it should not be read the first and second time and submitted to the committee at once. Possibly we may be able to overtake it.

Mr. COPP: Do I understand from the Prime Minister that it was recommended by the Pensions Committee that an invalid father whose son, his only support, had been killed at the front would receive a pension? For instance, in my county there is an elderly man who has been an invalid for years and unable to work. His two sons went to the front. One of them was his only support and looked after the father and mother. Both sons have been killed. I received a letter from this man to-day asking if there was any provision by which he would receive a pension under those conditions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My friends who are members of the committee inform me that it is a question as to whether the father was mainly dependent on the son who was killed.

Mr. COPP: Entirely dependent.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Then, as I understand, he would be entitled to a pension.

Mr. MICHAUD: In case that man were able to partially support his family and himself, would he receive a partial pension to supplement what he could earn himself?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I suppose it would depend on the question whether he comes under the expression "mainly dependent."

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to bring up a matter that may require an amendment to the existing legislation or orders in council. It is the case of a homesteader who has a son and daughter. The father and the son volunteered. The daughter is fifteen years of age and the father at the time of his enlistment secured a separation allowance for this dependent daughter of $20 a month. On that understanding he and the son enlisted. The farm is, of course, abandoned while the men are in the service of the country, and the daughter is dependent on the separation allowance and whatever pay her father and brother can let her have. Comparatively recently an order in council was passed to the effect that the child of a soldier could receive an allowance of only $12 a month, consequently this girl is now receiving only $12 a month instead of the $20 separation allowance which she did receive at the time her father and brother enlisted. I brought the matter to the attention of the department, and was simply told that the order in council provided that a child could get only $12 a month. I submit that is not encouragement to recruiting, that it is not fair play, and that the Government of Canada is not keeping faith with the men who are making sacrifices for the good of Canada and of the world.

Sir HERBERT AMES: A delegation from the Patriotic Fund had an interview with the minister himself as soon as he assumed office and went carefully over that matter. We are given to understand that there is under advisement a change which will be brought into effect shortly by which one child will be given $20 and two children $30 and so on, and that the allowance will also be graded up according to rank. That is now under consideration, and I have seen a draft form of what they expect to put through.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to say, as emphatically as I can, that when the Government of our country breaks faith with our soldiers—

Sir HERBERT AMES: You are quite right.

Mr. OLIVER—as faith was broken with this man and his son, damage is done to recruiting that nothing can repair.

Mr. MACDONALD: I should like to point out a case which has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction in a country district of my constituency. A young man enlisted and received an assurance from a clergyman who was one of the recruiting officers, that his sister, the only relative he had in the world, who lived on the farm with him and depended on him for support, would receive a separation allowance. The man went to the front, and is now in France with the 106th regiment. I received a letter from him complaining that his sister did not receive the separation allowance, and complaining bitterly of the bad faith of the recruiting officer who made the promise to him.

I wish to follow up what my hon. friend pointed out. On one occasion about a month ago four ladies came into my office, all of whom had relatives in the 106th regiment. Every one of these people was dependent upon the separation allowance and assigned pay from husband or son; every one of them had had trouble in regard to pay. The pay was coming irregularly, and in some cases had stopped altogether. I brought the matter to the attention of the Militia Department and one of the cases has been straightened out. But you can well understand that, where you have four ladies with grievances of that kind talking in the community in which they live, there will not be much enthusiasm amongst the wives and sisters of other men who ought to go. Only to-day I received a letter from a man who is an adjutant in the 185th. This man was a clergyman who gave up his church and went out in the ranks and is now an adjutant. His wife is living in my county and has not received for the last three months, since he went to England, a single dollar of assigned pay or separation allowance. These cases are not isolated. Every member has numerous cases, and they seem to have become more frequent of late. I know that they are due to faults of certain under officials, but it seems to me that, in regard to regiments that have been broken up and lost identity, the greatest possible care should be exercised in regard to the paymasters so that the identity of the men should not be lost track of. Some supervision should be given to the transfer of the pay so that there will not be an interim in which some poor soul away back home has to suffer, particularly in our Canadian winters, because she is not getting the little money she depends on. How can you expect enthusiasm among the plain people of the country when you have cases like this right under their noses? It is no wonder that recruiting falls off.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The instances to which my hon. friend refers are, of course, regrettable. He must remember that there is a great number of cases to be dealt with, and I imagine that the proportion of instances in which there has been any mistake is not very great.

Mr. MACDONALD: In almost every case the trouble occurred where regiments were broken up and the paymasters did not look after their own.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I agree that where a regiment is used as a draft or depot regiment there should be the greatest care, and I can understand how some cases may have occurred through the lack of that care.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

I suppose that my hon. friend has brought all these cases to the attention of the department?

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that every effort is being made to try and minimize that trouble as much as possible.

Sir HERBERT AMES: One word in connection with failures to receive assigned pay and separation allowance: Every member of this House has had cases of that kind brought to his attention and they seem a good many; but there is not a very large number compared with the immense number of men who have enlisted. We have had a great number of cases brought to our attention in the Patriotic Fund, so many, in fact, that we have had to keep one member of our staff here in the office entirely to deal with rectifications of those matters.

But complaints of that nature are becoming less and less all the time, and we are satisfied that the department is becoming more and more careful in dealing with assigned pay and separation allowances. A great many mistakes occurred at the outset through errors on the part of the paymasters. The paymasters of several regiments went to England, taking their pay rolls with them, and it was not until we had them cabled back that the office here could work on the assigned pay and separation allowances. In those cases the mistakes were due entirely to the ignorance of the paymasters who were new men. Then, a great many men who enlisted failed to fill out the necessary cards for their separation allowances and assigned pay. Quite a number enlisted as single men who were really married, but who were afraid to say that they were married because they thought they would not be accepted. These matters have occasioned some trouble, but we are getting things rectified. In a general way our fund exists to obviate hardship on part of the families. Where avoidable mistakes occur, as they do occur sometimes, and when it is brought to the attention of one of our branches that a woman is not getting her assigned pay or separation allowance through some reason not explained, she need not suffer, because the Patriotic Fund will give her all the money she needs until the rectification is made.

Mr. OLIVER: I see several members of the Pension Committee of last session in the House, particularly my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who is very active, and, I presume, is in close touch with the Government. I recall that that Committee discussed at some length a suggestion or arrangement that the succession of the pension to the service pay should be automatic; that is to say, that the service pay should continue until the pension began. If I remember rightly, that suggestion was discussed in the committee, but on representations being made that it would not be advisable to make such a hard-and-fast rule, and that the Pension Board would undoubtedly see that in fact that provision was left open, no recommendation was made by the committee in regard to it. That is my recollection of the case. My information is that there have been a great many cases in which the service pay has stopped and the pension has not begun for months and months, with the result that men have been left absolutely stranded, receiving neither service pay nor pension. I submit that in fairness and justice, and having regard to the views of the Pension Committee of last year, it is obligatory upon the Pension Board to see to it that that condition does not exist in any case. I submit that the suggestion that there are many difficulties in the way is not a sufficient answer in such a case as this. It is a matter in which the honour of Canada and the future of Canada are absolutely concerned, particularly the future of Canada's participation in the war, and I say that no excuse is acceptable for such a condition.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a matter that I would like to bring to the notice of the Minister of Militia so that he may be able to give us some information upon it to-morrow. In that part of the country from which I come there are a number of English miners employed in the mines, and from time to time many of them go back to England to visit their friends. When war broke out quite a number of these men happened to be in England, and instead of coming back to Canada to enlist, they enlisted in the Old Country, leaving their families in Canada. Some of these men were killed, but as they had enlisted in the Old Country there was no record of their enlistment in Canada, and there has been a great deal of difficulty in getting that provision made for their families which they would have received if they had enlisted in Canada.

Mr. KEMP: Did they join our forces in England?

Mr. McKENZIE: No, they joined English regiments, and they were killed while fighting with English regiments. What I desire to ask the minister is whether there is any working arrangement between the department and the authorities on the other side in connection with those men who were really Canadians, but who joined the English forces on the other side, so that provision may be made for their families. There was one case—I do not remember the name of the man—in connection with which I had some correspondence with the department. This man was killed and left a widow and two children. The British authorities have been sending a portion of the pension to the two children, but they have made no provision for the mother; and I propose to bring the circumstances of the case before the department to ascertain whether something cannot be done to put that family in the same position as they would have been in if the father had joined our own forces. To all intents and purposes, these men were Canadians, and their families are still in Canada. We should try to look after them, and see that they are placed at no disadvantage because the husband happened to join the forces on the other side. I hope the minister will be able to give us some information to-morrow or some other time on this point.

Mr. KEMP: There is no working arrangement to cover the situation to which my hon. friend refers. These men joined the British Army, though their relatives are in Canada. Notwithstanding that fact, we intend to take up these cases on behalf of the relatives in Canada, and to correspond with the War Office, or with whatever authority deals with such matters, with the view of having the cases straightened out. Whether a board will be established later on, such as was established in connection with the South African war, remains to be seen after the war is over.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11.07 p.m.

Friday, February 2, 1917.

The House met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

ARBITRARY FIXING OF PRICES.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 21, to amend the Criminal Code.

Mr. HAZEN: Explain.

Mr. KNOWLES: The purpose of this Bill is to make it an offence for a manufacturer, selling goods to a wholesaler, to enhance or dictate in any way, by agreement or contract, the price at which the goods shall be sold. If the Bill is favourably considered by the House, the result in my opinion will be an immediate reduction of from 5 per cent to 10 per cent in the cost of many of the foodstuffs we consume. I have in my hand quite a number of these price-maintenance agreements, commencing with the E. B. Eddy Company, which the wholesale men are compelled to sign. These agreements dictate and bind in the most ridiculous and heartless way the wholesaler as to the price and conditions under which he shall sell the goods he has purchased. The object of this Bill is to prevent the continuance of that condition, and to leave the wholesaler or retailer, when he has purchased the goods, free to call them his own, and sell them for what he pleases.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

GOVERNMENT GRAIN ELEVATORS.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 22, to amend the Grain Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Dominion Government has now gone into the elevator business, having elevators at Moosejaw, Saskatoon, Calgary and Vancouver. The business is carried on between the Government and the farmers; the Government is also an employer of labour. I am seeking legislation to the effect that any claims against the Government shall be adjusted in the ordinary courts of the province, and also that the Workmen's Compensation Act shall apply to these Dominion Government employees just as it applies to the employees of any ordinary elevator company. The present system of having the claims brought before the Exchequer Court is very inconvenient and expensive, and the object of this Bill is to bring His Majesty into the same relation to his employees as is the ordinary subject who is engaged in this business.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

[Mr. Knowles.]

SUPPLY—INTERIM VOTE.

On motion of Hon. Sir Thomas White (Minister of Finance), the resolutions adopted by Committee of Supply were read the second time and concurred in.

WAR LOAN—$500,000,000.

House again in Committee to consider the following proposed resolutions.—Mr. Rainville in the Chair.

1. That it is expedient to provide that a sum not exceeding five hundred million dollars ($500,000,000) be granted to His Majesty towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred by or under the authority of the Governor in Council during the year ending the 31st day of March, 1918, for:—

(a) The defence and security of Canada;

(b) The conduct of naval or military operations in and beyond Canada;

(c) Promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or otherwise;

(d) The carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the existence of a state of war; and

(e) Payments made for the said purposes during the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and seventeen, in excess of the amounts authorized by The War Appropriation Act, 1916.

2. That the Governor in Council be empowered to raise by way of loan, temporary or otherwise, such sums of money as are required for the purpose of making any payment authorized by any Act founded on these Resolutions.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I have just received a letter from the parish priest of Port Daniel East, the Rev. J. Philippe Cyr, in which he calls attention to the fact that one of his parishioners, a young man named Joseph Doiron, has enlisted, leaving at home a wife and six young children, the eldest of whom is ten years, and the youngest nine months. His wife receives only $20 a month separation allowance. The parish priest wants to know if anything can be done to relieve this woman, either under the law as it stands, or from the Patriotic Fund.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Has the soldier assigned say part of his pay to his wife?

Mr. MARCIL: According to this letter, all she gets is the separation allowance of $20 a month.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps it would be worth while finding out whether she receives any assigned pay.

Mr. MARCIL: In the meantime, if she is not receiving it, will this woman have to be content with $20 a month? The right hon. gentleman will understand that if he wants to stimulate recruiting he will have to be a little more generous than that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not quite clear at the moment whether there is any power to insist on a soldier assigning part of his pay to his family. I understand, however, that the Patriotic Fund makes provision in cases such as my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I would ask the hon. member for Bonaventure if that woman has applied to the Patriotic Fund at Riviere du Loup. If she belongs to the district from Montmagny down to Gaspé, and would apply to the branch of the Patriotic Fund at Riviere du Loup, of which I am president, she would receive $50 a month from the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that those along the coast of my constituency would come under the Restigouche branch of the Patriotic Fund, with headquarters at Campbellton. This soldier is named Joseph Doiron. His number is 889720. He enrolled on February 23, 1916, with the 189th Battalion at New Carlisle. He has since been transferred to the 22nd Battalion, which is now at the front. His wife's name is Elizabeth Langlois, and she has six children. These particulars are given in a letter I have received from the parish priest at Port Daniel East.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would appear that if pay were assigned and if the ordinary allowance were made from the Patriotic Fund, this woman would be receiving something over $50 a month, as my hon. friend says she is already receiving $20 a month separation allowance. I have some recollection that an order in council was passed, empowering us to deal with cases where a soldier at the front refuses to assign his pay. I am informed by the deputy minister that there is an order in council which provides that if a man is married and has a family, one-half of his pay will, on application, be retained and paid over to his family while the man is serving at the front. Perhaps the reason that has not been done in this case is that the woman has not brought the matter to the attention of the department. Will my hon. friend say whether that has been done or not?

Mr. MARCIL: On reading the letter a second time, I see that it says the only amounts she has received is the separation allowance. I will hand the letter to the right hon. gentleman or to the Minister of Militia so that the case may be investigated.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If the matter were brought to the attention of the proper officers of the department, and if the matter were also brought to the attention of the Patriotic Fund, it is perfectly obvious that the family in question would be receiving something over fifty dollars per month, instead of twenty dollars per month. That really would be a more effective way of dealing with the matter than bringing it to my attention in the House of Commons, because I never heard of it until my hon. friend mentioned it.

Mr. TURRIFF: Would the Prime Minister say as a matter of information if a soldier's wife who has six children dependent upon her receives the same separation allowance as the soldier's wife who has no children?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand that, so far as the separation allowance is concerned, no distinction is drawn, but so far as the Patriotic Fund is concerned, there is a distinction.

Mr. MACDONALD: I would suggest the desirability of having printed in short form for distribution amongst the members the rules regarding separation allowance. I put a question on the Order Paper to which I yesterday received a lengthy answer intimating that certain orders in council had been passed at different times; but it was impossible to gather any information from that answer without looking up the orders in council. It would facilitate matters if the department would have printed for members of this House a succinct statement of conditions in regard to separation allowances.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The hon. gentleman's suggestion is a very good one. I understand he does not want the printing of the orders in council, but the printing of their purport. The deputy minister informs me that the orders in council are being printed now, but it might be more convenient if the purport of them in simpler form were printed and distributed. The deputy minister informs me now that what I have just mentioned is also being done.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Militia another matter similar to the one which I brought up last night. I received this morning a letter in regard to a case affected by the order in council that I mentioned. A civil engineer, who sacrificed a valuable business to enlist, entered an Edmonton battalion as a lieutenant on July 3, 1915. He was promoted to be a captain in December, 1915. He was wounded at Pozières on September 13, 1916. He had a dependent and invalid mother and a young child; he had no wife. His sister kept the child and took care of the mother, receiving a captain's separation allowance of $40 per month up to the passing of this order in council, and since that time she has been receiving $12 per month only on account of the child. The writer says:

"My brother, Captain ————, has offered without hesitation his life and possessions and no doubt the country will deal generously with him in return."

I think it is hardly generosity to cut down the captain's separation allowance to an allowance of $12 per month under those circumstances.

Mr. KEMP: The large number of combinations that can occur in respect to separation allowance and similar matters is surprising. We are trying to consolidate them and the regulations are being printed not only in respect to separation allowance but in respect to other things. I am to-day having certain other regulations printed which I purpose having distributed amongst the members, in respect to requests for leave, which come under different headings and are being continually changed. Improvements are being made from time to time, and I hope that in time all these cases will be covered. That is all I can say to-day about the matter.

THE ROSS RIFLE—DISCUSSION IN COMMITTEE.

Mr. CARVELL: I notice from the report of yesterday's proceedings in this House that the Prime Minister, in giving the War Estimates for 1917-18, includes an amount of $2,660,000 for the Ross rifle. There should be some declaration on the part of the Government as to its policy on this question, and I want to review the matter very hurriedly. First of all, I desire to assure my right hon. friend that I do not intend to hark back to what has taken place regarding the Ross rifle. Some one has blundered and a great loss has resulted to Canada, I believe, in men, and we know, in money, but I do not desire to discuss that phase of the question. Before this session is over an opportunity should be given to discuss that phase, and I think an investigation should be held to find out who is actually responsible for the very unsatisfactory condition of affairs which existed.

It was with some surprise that I listened to the Prime Minister yesterday, and I wondered if I had heard him aright. I find I did, because there appears in Hansard this morning a proposed appropriation of sufficient money to purchase 80,000 Ross rifles during the coming fiscal year. In order to have a clear understanding of the situation as to the Ross rifle in Canada, as we understand it and as we are able to conclude from documents placed in our possession, I desire to refer hurriedly to some of the documents found in Sessional Paper No. 44, being a return laid on the table of the House regarding the Ross rifle.

We know that there was a great deal of discussion on this subject in the country, and in this House during the last session of Parliament. In discussing the Estimates in the month of March, 1916, I remember making the statement that I had been in favour from the beginning of the manufacture of rifles in Canada, and that until I had some absolute knowledge that the Ross rifle was not satisfactory, I did not feel like criticising it; but it was criticised by many hon. members, and there was a great deal of discussion about the matter both in the House of Commons and in the press. It seems that in the month of May there appeared in the Ottawa Citizen an article which I think must have led to the discussion in the House. While I was not here at the time, I find that the article appeared on the morning of the 15th of May, 1916, and that on the 15th, 16th and 17th days of May a great deal of discussion over the Ross rifle took place in Parliament. The substance of the statements was that there had been difficulties with the Ross rifle on account of jamming, but that as the chamber had been enlarged, it was hoped that that difficulty would cease to exist.

Then we find some correspondence which began some time in May, and finished about July 11, and which shows that the Canadian Government were asked to send no more Ross rifles to England. In this correspondence the first communication is a cablegram from the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies:

Ottawa, June 5th, 1916.

Secret. Following from Prime Minister for Sir William Robertson. By reason of rumoured dissatisfaction with Ross rifle I held consultation with General Hughes on 15th May and sent unofficial message to Commander in Chief that we were prepared to leave matter to his judgment after making all necessary tests of both rifles under such conditions as are experienced at the front. We suggested that men making tests should be of equal experience. Ross rifle is only arm we are equipped to produce in Canada at present and we believe it efficient if properly used, but are content to abide by judgment of Commander in Chief after thorough investigation and adequate tests. We realize absolute necessity of two conditions: first, that men shall be armed with thoroughly efficient rifle; second, that their confidence in such rifle shall be unshaken. Please let me have your judgment as to proper course to pursue.

On the same day there was a communication from the Prime Minister to the High Commissioner. It is somewhat along the same lines as the foregoing, but, as a new element is introduced, I wish to read it:

Ottawa, Ont., June 5th, 1916.

Perley, Dominion,
London.

Secret. Please ascertain whether British Government have finally and definitely decided on new rifle, or whether they propose before final action to study lessons obtained in present war. If new type of rifle has been finally adopted we are prepared after suitable investigation to adopt it if found satisfactory, so that our rifle in future will be of same type as British. In that case British order for Ross rifles might be cancelled and new order for one hundred thousand rifles new type given instead. Cost of machines and gauges for new type of rifle would approximate five hundred thousand dollars, and this cost might be equally divided between two governments. Am making this suggestion because of continued criticism of Ross rifle which undoubtedly creates lack of confidence. No rifle however efficient is useful unless it commands thorough confidence of men.

Borden.

The answer to the Prime Minister from the High Commissioner was as follows:

London, June 8th, 1916.

Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

War Office considers except trajectory the new Lee-Enfield now being made in United States is as good as any weapon that could be made with present experience and in present war apparently high trajectory no particular disadvantage. Lessons obtained in present war have evidently not brought any new experience so far as rifles are concerned. Not considered possible say definitely what rifle will be finally adopted by British Government after war. Hardly to be expected that War Office would under present circumstances definitely commit themselves regarding their future service rifle. Master General Ordnance considers rifle now being made for them in United States exceedingly good weapon and would be glad see you use same pattern. Question of money arrangements would have to be taken up officially, but personally should consider that of minor importance.

Perley.

So, it would seem that as early as the 8th of June, 1916, the War Office, through the acting High Commissioner in London, indicated pretty strongly to this Government that they would like the Government to manufacture the Lee-Enfield rifle then being manufactured in the United States. We have no evidence before us as to when the manufacture of this particular mark of the Lee-Enfield rifle was begun in the United States, but it must have been after war was declared. So it is plain that between August, 1914, and June, 1916, that is, within a period of less than two years, a rifle satisfactory to the British Government had been devised, the machines for its manufacture provided, and shops erected, and that they were actually turning out a rifle in the United States which met all the requirements of the British War Office. On the same day as the communication I have just quoted, there was this other cablegram from the High Commissioner to the Prime Minister:

London, June 8th, 1916.

Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

Confidential. Have shown and discussed with Aitken your secret cable to Chief General Staff. Question will now doubtless be settled by him. Have seen him personally today and impressed strongly as possible upon him your views regarding necessity thorough test and also that Canadian Government would need official documents giving full facts and statements which could be made public if thought desirable. Also impressed upon him that Ross rifle is only one which Canada can produce at present and that if our troops are re-armed at front it naturally would raise question whether Canada should continue manufacturing Ross rifle, and if not some alternative feasible plan would have to be suggested. Showed him copy your cable 5th regarding new type rifle which I answered this morning. Whole question will doubtless be thoroughly considered within next few days.

Perley.

There is a statement from the High Commissioner that the whole matter would be discussed and thoroughly considered within the next few days. The natural inference is that a decision would be arrived at within a few days after that date. I have only two more communications to read in order to lay before the House the complete record so far as this branch of the matter is concerned. Here is a cablegram from the High Commissioner to the Prime Minister:

London, June 5th, 1916.

Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

Your cable 24th ultimo. Have communication from War Office covering letters recently received from Commander in Chief Armies in France, who reports efficiency Ross rifle thoroughly tested by actual fighting in field, that he has again consulted General Officer Commanding Second Army in case fresh points have come to light during recent heavy fighting by Canadians near Ypres. Latter states his experience working Ross rifle during last fight has only confirmed his opinion that Canadians in Third Division have lost confidence in their rifle, and he recommends that rifles this Division be exchanged. Sir Douglas Haig remarks that although reports from Second Division not to same effect he is of opinion Lee-Enfield rifle should be issued to all three divisions Canadian Corps. Army Council agree with this opinion and have approved his proposal to exchange rifles second and third divisions for Lee-Enfield pattern and steps will be taken forthwith effect exchange. Army Council hope be able utilize Ross rifles released from France, also those in possession Canadian troops England, for other purposes connected with war. They would be glad if steps could be taken stop any more Ross rifles being brought to England, it being understood they thereby make themselves responsible for supplying necessary rifles to Canadian troops on arrival here, and they see no reason to doubt being able do this. Army Council add should Canadian Government be desirous undertaking manufacture rifle of different patterns suitable for use during present war, in their opinion rifle made same pattern as now produced in United States for British army, which is on lines Lee-Enfield, Mark III, embodying improvements, probably best one to adopt. Mailing copies correspondence. War Office wishes this matter regarded as secret until July 15th.

Perley.

Between 8th June and 5th July, the general commanding the forces in France, Sir Douglas Haig, had been asked by the authorities in England to make a report upon this rifle. The object was to put them in a position to give a satisfactory answer to the Canadian Government. I think that any hon. gentleman who reads the correspondence will come to the conclusion that this was the object. A report was made by Sir Douglas Haig, and evidently this must have been in the hands of the High Commissioner before he sent his communication to the Prime Minister.

This report is not very lengthy, and I purpose reading it. It is addressed to the Secretary of the War Office, London, and is as follows:

General Headquarters
British Army in the Field,
28th May, 1916.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that I have satisfied myself, after extensive inquiries carried out throughout the Canadian corps, that, as a service rifle, the Ross is less trustworthy than the Lee-Enfield, and that the majority of the men armed with the Ross rifle have not the confidence in it that is so essential they should possess. The inquiry on which these conclusions are based, was the outcome of an urgent application from a battalion of the third Canadian Division for re-armament with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, in consequence of a high percentage of jams experienced with their Ross rifles during a hostile atack on the 1st May, 1916.

2. I am accordingly of opinion that the second and third Canadian Divisions should be re-armed with the short Lee-Enfield rifle. It will be remembered that the first Canadian Division was so re-armed on the 12th June, 1915.

3. I am not in a position to effect this with the means at my disposal in France. I have the honour to inquire, therefore, whether the necessary number of rifles can be supplied from home sources, without interfering, or delaying, the arrival and arming of the divisions due from England and Egypt on which I am relying.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
(Sgd.) D. Haig, General,
Commanding-in-Chief.
British Armies in France.

Sir Douglas Haig, evidently on account of communications which had passed between the Canadian Prime Minister and the Acting High Commissioner for Canada, was called upon for a second report. This report, dated June 21, 1916, is as follows:

Sir,—In reply to your No. 77/15/5307 (M.G.O.) of 10th June 1916, forwarding a copy of a telegram dated 7th June, from the Governor General of Canada, I have the honour to inform you that the efficiency of the Ross rifle has been thoroughly tested by actual fighting in the field, and the application conveyed in my O. B. /174 of 28th May 1916, was made after very careful consideration of all the evidence available.

2. I have again consulted the General Officer Commanding Second Army in case any fresh points had come to light during the recent heavy fighting by the Canadians near Ypres. He tells me that his experience of the working of the Ross rifle during the last fight has only confirmed him in his opinion that the Canadians in the third Division, at all events, have lost confidence in their rifle and he recommends that the rifles in this division be exchanged.

3. Although the reports from the Second Division are not to the same effect, I am of opinion that the Lee-Enfield rifle should be issued to all three divisions of the Canadian Corps.

I must therefore adhere to my recommendation that the second and third Canadian divisions should be re-armed with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, and I would urge the necessary steps to give effect thereto be taken without delay.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
(Sgd.) D. Haig, General,
Commanding-in-Chief,
British Armies in France.

I wish to read also the following communication from Mr. Bonar Law to the Governor General of Canada, dated at London, July 11, 1916:

With reference to my telegram June 10th. Report from General Officer Commanding in Chief in France has now been received by Army Council recommending that second and third Canadian Divisions should be re-armed with short Lee-Enfield rifles and Army Council have approved this. They hope to be able to utilize Ross rifles released and also those now in possession of Canadian troops in England for other purposes connected with the war, but ask that no more Ross rifles should be brought to England. Army Council will be responsible for supplying necessary rifles to Canadian troops on arrival in England. If your Government desire to undertake manufacture of different rifles suitable for use during war, Army Council think that rifles now being produced in America for British Army on lines of Lee-Enfield Mark 111 but with improvements would be best.

(Sgd.) Bonar Law.

This correspondence from the official file shows that on July 11, 1916, the British Government had decided that no more Ross rifles should be used in the field, that they had all the Ross rifles in England that they required and that they specifically requested the Canadian Government to send no more of these rifles to England. There does not seem to be any intimation in the correspondence that the Ross rifle could be improved or changed so that it would meet the requirements of the War Office. I shall not go into the question of whether the chamber was too large or too small, or whether there was something wrong with the bolt, because probably every member has received or seen letters from soldiers at the front in which the defects were pointed out. In view of these facts, I think we have a right to ask the Government what course they intend to pursue. We have an army which, we are told, numbers about 400,000 men, and it is up to the Prime Minister and to every man in Canada to see that within the next six months that army shall number 500,000 men. These men will have to be armed. It is evident from the correspondence that since July 11, 1916, the British army has been looking after the arming of our troops in the field. The question arises: are we to continue to manufacture rifles in Canada, or not? In the month of July last a statement appeared in the press to the effect that the Government had made arrangements with the Ross Rifle Company for the manufacture of Lee-Enfield rifles, and up to the last three or four weeks I believed that the Ross Rifle factory had been employed in that work. I have no official information on the subject, but I am told that the Ross Rifle factory is not manufacturing Lee-Enfield rifles. Indeed, I am informed that no move has been made towards remodelling the Ross plant for the purpose of manufacturing Lee-Enfield rifles. According to the cablegram sent to the Prime Minister by the Acting High Commissioner, the remodelling of that plant for the manufacture of Lee-Enfields would involve an expenditure of only half a million dollars. In the United States they have been able to remodel a plant within a very few months, get all the necessary tools, and turn out Lee-Enfield rifles in large quantities. The Government were advised eight months ago that if they wanted to continue the manufacture of rifles they should manufacture Lee-Enfields such as are turned out in the United States. Unless my information is very much at fault—I do not think it is, but if it is my right hon. friend will correct me—no attempt has been made to manufacture anything but Ross rifles. We have the statement from the Prime Minister that the Government intend to continue manufacturing Ross rifles and an amount has been placed in the Estimates for the next year to provide for the manufacture of 80,000 of them. The time has arrived when the Government should take the members of the House, the people of the country and, above all, the Canadian soldiers, into their confidence respecting their intentions as to the arming of our army. This is a question much bigger than a matter of dollars and cents. It goes to the very root of recruiting and of national confidence in our ability to play properly our part in winning this war. It is the most important thing which is before the Canadian public to-day, and until the matter is cleaned up recruiting will not be as it should be. I shall not dwell upon what Canadian soldiers have said in letters from the front; I do not think it would be patriotic to do so. Besides, these letters would not look good in print. While it is true that the soldier may grumble over a very small matter and that the Ross rifle may have been a very good arm in many ways, yet a prejudice has sprung up against the further continuance of the Ross rifle as the national arm of Canada. If the Government are going to continue the manufacture of rifles, as I presume they are, they ought to tell us what they are going to do about it. Personally, I was not in Parliament when the contract with the Ross Rifle Company was made, but the matter came up on very many occasions in 1905, 1906, and 1907, when I was in Parliament. I was always in favour of manufacturing rifles in Canada, and I am just as strongly in favour of manufacturing rifles in Canada to-day as I was in 1905, 1906, 1907 and 1908. The very fact that we have a factory in Canada that has turned out the finest target and sporting rifles in the world is evidence that we can manufacture rifles in Canada. The fact that we have in the city of Quebec a factory that has turned out 1,000 rifles a day is all the evidence we want that we can manufacture rifles, and on a very large scale. The whole difficulty with regard to the Ross rifle seem to be in the breech mechanism, something regarding the bolt and the chamber. While that is a very important part of the rifle, when it comes to the question of manufacture, to the cost of manufacture and to the complications of manufacture I cannot see that it is at all an insurmountable difficulty. It seems to me that we have only to change over that portion of the chamber, and make a Lee-Enfield chamber, bolt and magazine, instead of a Ross bolt, chamber and magazine; and if we have the plant in which we can manufacture a rifle of any kind, surely we have a plant which, with a small additional expenditure, and with some application of brains and ability could manufacture the rifle which the British Government tell us they would like us to manufacture. They put it as plainly as the English language can make it. They would like this Government to enter into the manufacture of the improved Lee-Enfield rifle, the same as in the United States. We know that in twenty-four hours the British Government would furnish this Government with the sealed pattern, and with the standard rifle. I do not know how long it would take—I suppose it would take some months, but not very many months to convert our Ross factory into a Lee-Enfield factory. I ask, and I do not think I am asking anything that is confidential, have the Government taken any steps to manufacture any other rifle than the Ross rifle in Canada; have they taken any steps to convert the Ross rifle factory into a Lee-Enfield factory; have they done anything to get us out of the unfortunate position in which we find ourselves; or are they simply going to manufacture 80,000 more rifles in Canada and turn out an arm which, according to the official representations, does not inspire our troops with confidence, and which is not taken to England at the request of the British Government.

I hope the Prime Minister will appreciate that I approach this question in no controversial spirit. I have not tried to go into any of the difficulties that have existed heretofore. I am simply asking him, in the interests of Canada, and in the interests of the troops of Canada, whether he will take the country and the House into his confidence and tell us what the Government have done. I think I might go so far as to ask him to tell us what they propose to do, and whether they intend, in the first place, to carry on the manufacture of rifles in Canada, and if so, whether it is to be the Ross or the Lee-Enfield rifle.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the request of the hon. gentleman is a very reasonable one, and I entirely appreciate the spirit in which he has approached the subject, and the general tone of his remarks in regard to this very important matter. The merits of the Ross rifle have been a matter of discussion in this House on various occasions during the past ten years. I recollect very well when I was on the other side of the House—I think my hon. friend was not then in Parliament.

Mr. CARVELL: I was. I was not a member when the contract was signed, but I was here during all the discussions.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will recollect then the various reports that were placed before the country and their general character. I do not think there was any doubt in the minds of members that, as a marksman's rifle, there was no better rifle in the world than the Ross rifle. I recollect that the consideration which impressed me at the time was whether or not the rifle as then ordered was of a sufficiently strong type to endure successfully the wear and tear of active service. I believe that certain portions of the rifle, which were thought to be weak, were afterwards strengthened, and the contract was acted upon Rifles were ordered from time to time, and thus the situation presented itself to the present Administration at the outbreak of war.

It might be proper for a moment to advert to the contract which was made by the former Government and which had to be taken into account by the present Government when it came to deal with the question. I am not referring to this by way of reproach, but merely in order that the House may be possessed of the character of the contract that was made, and thus be enabled to understand what the contractual position was as between the Government, on the one hand, and the Ross Rifle Company on the other. The contract reads as follows:

Memorandum of Agreement made in duplicate this 27th day of March 1902.

Between

Sir Charles Ross, Bart., of Balnagowan, hereinafter called the Contractor, of the first part.

and

His Majesty the King, represented by Honourable F. W. Borden, Minister of Militia and Defence for the Dominion of Canada, hereinafter called the minister, which expression as herein used includes also the successors in office of the said Minister of Militia and Defence, His Majesty so represented being hereinafter referred to as the Government, of the second part.

Whereas it is considered in the general interests of Canada that the rifles required by the Government for the purposes of Militia and Defence should be manufactured in Canada and whereas the contractor has proposed by himself or his assigns to undertake the establishment and operation of a suitable factory in Canada for the manufacture of such rifles, and to supply the Government with the rifles so required manufactured at said factory and delivered at a cost to the Government, not exceeding that which the Government would have to pay for similar rifles purchased by or for the Government as heretofore in the English market.

This agreement therefore witnesseth, and it is agreed by and between the Contractor and the Government, as follows:—

1. The contractor is to establish at or near the city of Quebec in Canada a factory for the manufacture of rifles, with the necessary plant.

2. The contractor undertakes to deliver to the Government between the first day of January, 1903, and the first day of January 1904, 12,000 rifles manufactured at the said factory corresponding and equal in every respect to a standard sample rifle which is to be approved by the minister, such rifles to be delivered by monthly even quantities, as nearly as may be of 1,000.

3. The Government shall be bound and entitled to purchase from the contractor all rifles required for the use of the Government during the continuance of this contract. The contractor agrees that if the Government so desires and signifies its desire in writing on or before the 30th day of September in any year after the year now current, the contractor will deliver to the Government within the year following the next succeeding first day of January a number of rifles not less than 10,000 manufactured at the said factory, such rifles to be delivered by monthly even quantities, as nearly as may be, of not less than 800. If during the year the Government shall require any number of rifles in excess of the number hereinbefore specified for that year, the Government shall immediately notify the contractor of the additional number required, and the contractor shall do his utmost to manufacture at the said factory and to deliver to the Government all such rifles as may be reasonably required, and if need be he shall operate the factory at any time twenty four hours per day, and he shall if required, furnish the total output of the said factory to the government; provided however, that in case of war, actual or threatened, or any national emergency, requiring in the opinion of the Government, the immediate supply of additional arms, the contractor upon receiving any notice or demand from the Government for any number of rifles specified to be urgently required in view of this proviso shall, within thirty days after receiving such notice or demand notify the Government in writing of the number of rifles which he will undertake to furnish in accordance with such notice or demand, and the Government shall not under any circumstances be bound to purchase from the contractor in respect of any such notice or demand, any number of rifles in excess of the number which the contractor so notifies the Government that he will be able to supply.

4. All the said rifles hereby contracted for are previous to delivery to be inspected by the Inspector of Small Arms of the Government of Canada, and upon such inspection the same rifles being found up to sample as aforesaid, delivery shall be taken as complete at the factory.

5. If at any time or from time to time, the Government should desire to have any changes in or modification of the rifle to be manufactured and supplied by the contractor, the Government may give to the contractor at least twelve months notice in writing, specifying such changes or modification, and requiring the contractor at the expiration of the period of such notice to manufacture and deliver rifles so changed or modified, and the contractor shall therupon be bound upon and after the expiration of the said period, to manufacture and deliver the rifles subject to such changes and modifications, and the said standard sample rifle so furnished as aforesaid shall in respect of all rifles to be delivered after the expiration of the said period be deemed to have been altered or modified in accordance with the changes or modification specified by the said notice.

6. If a new rifle shall be invented which the Government shall desire to adopt or use the Government may furnish to the contractor a standard sample of such new rifle, and give the contractor twelve months notice in writing, requiring that the rifles to be delivered by the contractor upon and after the expiration of the period of such last mentioned notice shall correspond to the standard sample of such new rifle so furnished, the Government to protect the contractor against any actions for infringements of patents so far as such new rifles supplied to the Government are concerned, and upon and after the expiration of the said period all rifles to be delivered by the contractor shall accordingly correspond to such substituted standard sample, and the contractor agrees to originally lay out and adapt his plant, machinery etc., so as to provide the best facilities which can reasonably be foreseen to enable him to apply the same to the manufacture of any such new rifle which may be desired.

7. The Government shall furnish to the contractor, a standard sample rifle mentioned in the second clause of this contract, on or before the 10th day of April, 1902. If for any reason such standard rifle should not be furnished until after the said date, the said contractor shall, if he so desires, be entitled to equivalent extension of the time herein provided for manufacture and delivery.

8. The Government shall pay for the said 12,000 rifles mentioned in the second clause of this contract at the rate of $25 for each such rifle. The Government shall pay out of the moneys to be appropriated by Parliament for the purpose for all rifles subsequently ordered as herein stipulated the same price of $25 for each of such rifles, unless one of the parties hereto shall upon the occasion of any such demand for further rifles notify the other of such parties that the price of such rifles in similar quantities in the markets of Great Britain has relatively to the present time increased or diminished, in which case the aforesaid price of $25 shall no longer govern, but the price for the rifles so ordered and to be thereafter ordered shall depend upon a further agreement of the parties, and in default of agreement the price to be fixed as provided in the 9th clause hereof. The price of all rifles herein contracted for or to be supplied pursuant to the provisions of this agreement shall be payable upon delivery; provided however, that after the establishment of the said factory and supplying of the plant for the running of the same, the contractor shall be entitled to payment in advance of delivery of moneys actually expended upon the rifles or parts thereof or fixtures therefor, to be delivered in that year upon a statement certified by him of the amount so spent upon establishing the fact of such expenditures to the satisfaction, testified by his signature of such statement, of the Government Inspector of Small Arms, such payments in no case to exceed 75 per cent. of the price of such rifles, the contractor undertaking whenever such advances are made, to insure and keep insured said rifles, parts and fixtures against loss or damage by fire for the benefit of the Government to the extent of such advances.

9. Provided, however, that in case of any changes in or modification of the rifle to be manufactured by the contractor, hereunder, pursuant to any such notice as aforesaid, or in case of the adoption by the Government of a new rifle to be invented as aforesaid, the price to be paid shall be the price above named, or such price increased or diminished by a sum to be agreed upon between the Government and the contractor, having regard to the question as to whether such changes or modification increase or diminish the cost of production, or in the case of the adoption of a new rifle, a price to be agreed upon between the Government and the contractor; provided, further, that in default of agreement, the amount of such increase or diminution of the price, as the case may be, shall be settled by two experts, one of whom shall be chosen by the Government, and the other by the contractor, whose decision, if unanimous, shall be final, while in the event of a difference between them the two experts so named shall name a third, and the decision of any two of the three shall be binding; it being the intention of this agreement that the price of the rifles furnished hereunder shall so far as is possible be the same as that of similar rifles in like quantities purchased by or for the Government from the British manufacturers in the open market in England and delivered in Ottawa.

10. The contractor shall be permitted to import into Canada all tools and machinery not manufactured in Canada up to the required standard necessary for the said factory, and also all material, or parts in the rough, unfinished, to be used in rifles to be manufactured by him for the Government free of duty, or in the case of payment by the contractor of any duty on any such tools, machinery or material or parts aforesaid, the contractor shall be entitled to a drawback or remission of the amount so paid; provided, also, that the contractor shall be entitled to import free of duty or shall be entitled to drawback or remission of duty paid in respect of the finished parts to be used in any such rifles, consisting of screws, nuts, bands and springs; and provided, further, that if at any time during the continuance of this contract the demand of the Government for rifles shall be such as to make it necessary for the contractor to enlarge the capacity of his factory then the machinery plant and material imported by him for that purpose, not manufactured in Canada up to the required standard, shall similarly be entitled to free entry, drawback or remission of duty.

11. The contractor shall not be bound to deliver at the time specified in the case of strike or in the event of unforeseen occurrences beyond his control preventing manufacture, but in such cases the contractor shall have an equivalent extension of time, he hereby undertaking to resume work as soon as possible.

12. The standard sample rifle to be approved by the minister, as provided in paragraph 2 of this agreement, and all standard samples substituted therefor pursuant to this agreement shall remain in the custody of the minister.

13. Any notice to the contractor, hereunder, shall be deemed to be well and sufficiently given if the same be left at the contractor's office or mailed in any post office to the contractor at the said factory.

14. This contract is hereby, pursuant to the provisions of the 16th section of chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, made subject to the express condition that no member of the House of Commons of Canada shall be admitted to any share or part of such contract or to any benefit to be derived therefrom.

15. This contract shall enure to the benefit of and shall be binding on the executors, administrators and assigns of the contractor, and where the context admits any reference, therein to the contractor shall be taken to extend equally to his executors, administrators and assigns.

16. The wages to be paid in the execution of this contract shall be those generally accepted as current in each trade for competent working men and working women in the district where the work is carried out.

In witness whereof the contractor and the minister have hereunder set their hands and seals at Ottawa aforesaid the day and year first above written.

Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of Minister of Militia and Defence.

The contract, after it was made, was assigned with the sanction of the Government to the Ross Rifle Company, and at the present time it is therefore a contract between the Ross Rifle Company, the assignee of Sir Charles Ross, and the Government of Canada. I have read the contract in order that it might be known from its terms that no period was fixed for its termination. The Government is advised that the contract therefore continues indefinitely, the Government having no power to bring it to a conclusion.

I appreciate the fact, and I do not want to minimize it, that the contractor, Sir Charles Ross, and the company which he afterwards organized, were required to incur a very considerable expenditure in establishing a rifle plant in Canada, and it was therefore necessary to give them a contract of long duration, as otherwise no person could be expected to invest his capital in this country for such a purpose, considering that the company would have to depend, outside of its contract with the Government, upon such orders as they might be able to obtain for sporting and other rifles not designed for military purposes. The rifle has gone through various stages of development. First of all there was the Mark 1, as to which some criticism was made, and there were suggestions as to its improvement by expert officers of the Government. The defects, whatever they may have been, pointed out in that way, were supposed to be remedied by the adoption of the rifle known as Mark II. Criticism having also arisen of that rifle, and certain defects having been found, an endeavour was made to eliminate them by the adoption of the Mark III, which is the rifle mentioned in the correspondence that my hon. friend the member from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has read.

Now, the Ross rifle factory was the only factory in Canada capable of producing rifles for military purposes when the war began. As a matter of fact this should be said, and it is to the credit of Sir Charles Ross and of the Ross Rifle Company that it can be said, that, after the outbreak of war, I understand that factory was more successful in greatly increasing its output than any other factory on this continent. I believe that the increased output which that factory developed in at least the first year and a half of the war was very much greater than the increase in output which was shown by any of the great rifle factories in the United States.

With regard to the extent of orders given by the Government, I might as well clear that point up at once, and the House is certainly entitled to the information. The Government of Canada have ordered since the outbreak of the war 290,000 rifles, and the Ross Rifle Company has delivered to the Government of Canada since the outbreak of the war 218,547 rifles. There remains to be delivered 97,590 rifles, upon orders already given.

Mr. CARVELL: There seems some discrepancy there.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes, there is an explanation here. The discrepancy in the figures is due to an order for 30,000 rifles which was placed before the war, and of these 26,137 were delivered after the outbreak of the war.

Let me refer for a moment to the situation as it presented itself to the Government in the summer of 1915. My hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen have referred to the criticism which Sir John French made of the rifle, and I think it is just as well at this stage that I should allude specifically to Sir John French's report, because in the light of that report the House and the country must judge of the steps which the Government took when that report had been communicated to them, and when, in consequence of it, the first Canadian division was armed with the Lee-Enfield instead of the Ross rifle.

I want to emphasise that point right here; I do not want hon. members in this House or any one in the country to forget it. Whenever we were told by the competent authorities at the front that it was in the interest of the Canadian soldiers that the Lee-Enfield rifle should be substituted for the Ross rifle on any occasion, the Government of Canada have always assented and placed themselves within the judgment of the military authorities at the front who ought to know better in respect of such matters than we, sitting around a council board at Ottawa, could possibly know. So, when it was proposed in the summer of 1915 that the First Division should be re-armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle, for the reasons stated in Sir John French's report, we, of course, interposed no objection, and the First Division was re-armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle. Let us see what Sir John French said about the rifle. His report which has been brought down and laid on the table of the House is as follows:

Confidential.

From the Field Marshal, Commanding in Chief, British Army in the Field, to the Secretary, War Office, London, S.W., General Headquarters, June 19, 1915.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of War Office letter No. 77-15-5209 (A.5), dated 16-6-1915, regarding the action taken by me in the matter of the Ross rifles of the Canadian Division.

2. The circumstances are as follows:—

I had heard rumours that there was a growing want of confidence in this rifle, as evidenced by the fact that the infantry of the Canadian Division were taking every opportunity of exchanging their rifles with those of the Lee-Enfield pattern from casualties on the battlefield.

3. To satisfy myself whether there was any real justification for this state of affairs, without at the same time lending encouragement to the idea that the Ross rifle was unsatisfactory, such as might have resulted from an investigation by the divisional authorities, I gave instructions for the assembly of a small committee at my general headquarters to test the rifle with the various natures of ammunition in use, including ammunition of Canadian manufacture, of which a small supply was obtained from England for the purpose, none having been sent out to this country for use with rifle.

4. The proceedings of this committee were laid before me on the eve of a serious offensive operation in which the Canadian Division was to take part, and I was at the same time informed that over 3,000, or more than one-third of the infantry, of this division had already succeeded in re-arming themselves with the Lee-Enfield rifle without any authority having been given for them to do so.

Looking:

(1) To the unanimous opinion of my committee that the Ross rifle could not be relied upon to work smoothly and efficiently in rapid fire with any ammunition other than that of Canadian manufacture;

(2) to the fact that no ammunition of this nature was available in this country, and that sufficient supplies could not be obtained from England, and,

(3) to the want of confidence in the rifle which a large number of the infantry evidently felt, as evidenced by the fact that over 3,000 had, without authority, exchanged their rifles for those used by their British comrades, and taken from casualties on the battlefield.

I did not feel justified in sending this Division into battle with the Ross rifle, and ordered the re-arming of the infantry of the Division with the Lee-Enfield rifle, which was carried out before they went into action on the 15th instant;

5. As regards the suggestion made by the Army Council that the opinion of one or two selected Canadian officers should be obtained, I submit that this is a difficult and complicated question which can only be satisfactorily settled by the best expert opinion, and that the views of a few selected Canadian officers, who may or may not be prejudiced in the matter, will not be of any material assistance.

6. I would, therefore, suggest that the Army Council should send to this country one or more of the most highly qualified experts obtainable to make the necessary tests under service conditions and report whether ammunition of British manufacture is or is not suitable for use with the Ross rifle. For this purpose a supply of ammunition of Canadian manufacture should be brought out for comparison.

The Army Council can then decide whether, looking to all the circumstances, it is advisable to restore the Ross rifle to the Canadian Divisions.

7. In conclusion, I would observe that in my reports I have never condemned the Ross rifle, nor have I any sufficient data to justify me in doing so.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

I have expressed and acted on my opinion, that, so far as I can judge, the ammunition of British manufacture is not suitable for use with Ross rifles, and that there is a large and growing feeling of want of confidence in their rifle on the part of the men in the Canadian Division, which is amply justified by the report of the committee.

8. Owing to the difficulty at present experienced in turning out rifles in sufficient numbers for our requirements, I shall most heartily welcome an authoritative statement which will carry conviction to the men that their apprehensions are unfounded, or what may possibly be found more easy of attainment, viz.: a slight alteration to the chamber of the rifle which will better adapt it for use with our British ammunition.

I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

(Signed) J. D. P. French.

Mr. CARVELL: Before the right hon. gentleman goes any further on that point, I would like to ask if the Government was ever furnished with the report of the experts whom General French stated he intended to bring over from Great Britain?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am under the impression—I shall obtain accurate information on that—that we did not receive the report to which my hon. friend has alluded.

Mr. CARVELL: The article that appeared in the newspaper in the month of May last has, I think, been referred to as the Alderson report. Was that report in the hands of the Government, and would that possibly be the experts' report to which General French referred to?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As I understand it, the communication to which my hon. friend alludes was a private letter from General Alderson to General Gwatkin; it was not an official document at all. In some mysterious way, which has never been explained, and without the authority or knowledge of General Gwatkin, a copy was taken and was given or sold to some person outside of the department altogether, and was made public. I did not know anything about it, so far as my recollection goes, until I saw it in the newspapers. No copy was ever furnished to me, and I do not know whether a copy was ever furnished to the ex-Minister of Militia.

Mr. OLIVER: My memory is that at a certain time during last session when a discussion in regard to the Ross rifle was going on, I asked the Prime Minister if he would lay on the table an official report by a board of inquiry made in England which was mentioned at the time. He declined to do so on the ground of military disadvantage if it were done.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In so far as my hon. friend's questions do not have immediate reference to the subject we are discussing, if he will kindly make a note of them and permit me to continue the thread of my remarks, I shall be grateful. It is difficult to deal with interruptions that are not precisely relevant.

The situation which confronted the Government in the summer of 1915 was this: We knew that Sir John French had concluded that the First Canadian Division ought to be re-armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle. He based that conclusion very largely upon the consideration that the men of the First Division, or a considerable number of them, had lost confidence in the Ross rifle. He took the view, in which I am sure we all concur, that no rifle, however effective, would be useful to the men if they had lost confidence in it. He said, in that same report, that he did not condemn the Ross rifle—that he had no data upon which he could condemn it; and he said further that the difficulty had arisen by reason of the fact that the ammunition supplied in this country, which might have made the rifle useful, could not be supplied in sufficient quantities. We also knew that the chief difficulty at the front was from the jamming of the cartridges, and that is alluded to by Sir John French in the concluding paragraph of his report when he himself makes the suggestion that if other rifles cannot be provided a remedy might be found by altering the chamber of the rifle, enlarging it so that the cartridge would not stick. We were also confronted with the fact that we did not then know of any other source from which we could procure rifles for the arming of our troops. It may be suggested that we should have given notice to manufacture the Lee-Enfield rifle. Well, it took something more than three months, according to my recollection, to get a sealed sample of the rifle that, as I shall point out later on, was suggested by the War Office as the new standard rifle for this country. I first asked in September, 1916, that a sample rifle for the purpose of making the change should be furnished. We did not receive it until January. We were confronted with the further consideration that under the terms of the contract the contractors were permitted the full period of one year before they could be called upon to produce rifles of a different type. We also had information from the British Government, whom we consulted on the subject, that a period of considerably more than a year would undoubtedly elapse, in their opinion, before the Ross rifle factory could be changed and the new plant acquired to enable them to produce a rifle of another type. In connection with that we had to take into account, of course, the extreme demands which were being made upon all the resources of this continent for plant and machinery of every kind, the lack of suitable steel, the great delay attending the filling of orders for machinery of any kind, and the fact that the machinery for turning out rifles is of a highly varied and complex character. So that, even if a contract were undertaken to deliver at a certain time, no one could be absolutely sure that it would be delivered within the period mentioned. And the war would not wait for these people, whoever they might be, to perfect their arrangements and secure their plant and machinery.

We must bear in mind, further, that in June and July, 1915, people in this country were not as thoroughly impressed with the possible duration of this war as they are to-day. I have already stated publicly that when I came back from Great Britain and communicated to some of my colleagues and to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) my belief that the British Empire would not be able to throw its full strength into this struggle before June, 1916, every one of them was greatly surprised, and some could hardly credit the accuracy of the impression I had thus formed. We were looking forward then to a conclusion of the war some time in 1916; and as matters lay before us then, it did not seem possible that we could produce rifles of the Lee-Enfield type before the probable date of the conclusion of the war.

But then, further, the jamming difficulty was not confined to the Ross rifle, it affected the Lee-Enfield rifle as well. I do not know whether it affected the Lee-Enfield to the same degree as it affected the Ross, but of this I am perfectly confident, on information communicated to me by my late colleague the ex-Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Sam Hughes) and others, that there was serious difficulty with the Lee-Enfield rifle itself in using the ammunition that was furnished. We came to the conclusion that the only course for us to pursue was to enlarge the chamber of the Ross rifle with a view to preventing the cartridge from jamming. The size of the chamber, as I am informed, had been fixed originally at ·463. If I am not mistaken, that was done in 1908. Afterwards, in 1910, it was reduced to ·457, and about January, 1911, it was fixed at .460. Now, the British ammunition is precisely the same—.460. So, you had a cartridge which fitted tightly in the chamber of the rifle, and if the least bit of dirt should adhere to the cartridge before it went into the chamber, the jamming of the cartridge was inevitable.

What did we do? In view of what Sir John French had said, and in view of the experience of the men at the front, we decided that our only course was to enlarge the chamber of the Ross rifle. In July, 1915, it was decided to enlarge the chamber to ·462, which is the diameter of the chamber of the Lee-Enfield rifle. But the then Minister of Militia and Defence, on looking into the matter more carefully, came to the conclusion that, for the purpose of absolutely preventing if possible, any danger of jamming, he had better go a little further; and so, in August, 1915, he directed that the chamber should be enlarged to ·464. That was done, and, as I understand it, the Second Division, when it went to the front, was armed with the Ross rifle with the enlarged chamber.

Mr. MACDONALD: Did the Small Arms Commission recommend the last change to ·462?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed by the deputy minister that the Small Arms Commission did recommend that change.

Mr. CARVELL: Did the Small Arms Commission recommend the change from ·462 to ·457?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I really could not tell my hon. friend that. I obtained the information not from the department, but from what I regarded as a reliable source. I had not time to verify it, but I will do so and see whether I am correct.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Where was the last enlargement made?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The enlargement was carried on in Great Britain. I have fairly full reports as to all that took place with regard to that, but I will not deal with that phase of the matter just at the moment. I shall be prepared, however, to do so later if my right hon. friend desires it.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

Mr. MACDONALD: Was the question considered of making ammunition in Canada which would fit the chamber?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend will realize that at the beginning of the war the only ammunition production that we could rely upon was that of the Dominion Arsenal, which, of course, was trivial as compared with the need. Afterwards we made contracts. The ammunition that was produced in this country was, as I am informed by the Deputy Minister of Militia, sent forward and pooled with the British ammunition, this country being given credit for it. Then the troops at the front were supplied by the general ordnance organization, as there could not be a separate ordnance arrangement for the Canadian troops in France. Unless, therefore, we attempted to carry out an apparently impracticable project, that of having a separate Canadian ordnance department for the Canadian troops at the front, we could not rely upon Canadian ammunition being served out to the Canadian troops. It seemed impossible to make that arrangement.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will the Prime Minister state what was the result of enlarging the bore of the rifle in England?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The result was supposed to be satisfactory, so far as the jamming was concerned. My hon. friend has before him the report of Sir Douglas Haig, to which I will refer in a moment. The Second Division went to the front on September 13, 1915, and as the enlargement of the chambers of the Ross rifle had not proceeded to a sufficient extent to enable the men of that Division to be armed with the Ross, they went to the front, as I am informed, armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle. The Third Division began to go to the front in January, 1916. By the end of February, 1916, nearly the whole division was at the front; the Engineer and Artillery units, however, went later. The whole division was in France at the end of June.

In February, 1916, the question arose as to whether further orders should be given for the Ross rifle and, if so, to what extent. The Government had before them a recommendation from the Master-General of the Ordnance for 200,000 Ross rifles, if I remember correctly. We did not accede to that in the whole; we gave an order for 100,000 Ross rifles with the enlarged chambers. In March, 1916, when the question came up as to the remaining portion of the order, I sent a despatch to Sir George Perley, dated March 30, which has already been brought down, and which was as follows:

We have ordered * * Ross rifles of which * * * have been delivered and delivery of balance will not be completed before * * * We are considering giving an order for an additional * * * but before deciding we desire to obtain any available information and advice from British Government. It is said that they have an order for * * * rifles placed with an organization controlled by * * at * * * visited these works and was greatly impressed with progress made. Possibly these rifles would cover our requirements if war should continue for more than a year.

To which on April 26, nearly a month afterwards, we received the following reply:

Your cable 30th ultimo. Minister Munitions presumes firm referred to is * * * with whom Imperial Government have contract for * * * rifles. Deliveries not yet commenced and probability is contract will not be completed by * * * Minister adds there will be no surplus from British orders other than that already allotted * * * Regrets therefore not in position to allocate from British orders any rifles to Canadian Government. Desirable not place contract with * * * in view work for Imperial Government.

We were looking around at that time, in view of an earlier termination of the war than now seems probable, to see whether or not provision could be made by which further very large orders for the Ross rifle should not be necessary. We realized that with the orders already outstanding a very large supply of rifles would be in the hands of the Government at the end of the war. Having regard to the fact that during the previous summer the question of jamming had arisen, and also to some further rumours that came to our attention, we considered that it might be better, if it were possible, to make provision that the Canadian troops be supplied with standard British rifles to which no objection had been taken. We were, however, informed at that time, April 26, that no such provision could be made; therefore we had to consider the situation from that standpoint.

These rumours, to which I have alluded, began to assume more definite shape, and I saw a telegram on the 12th May, 1916, from Sir Max Aitken to General Hughes, a portion of which has been brought down, and which was as follows:

Serious situation has arisen regarding Ross rifle * * * I request that you will show this telegram to Prime Minister.

To this I replied on the 15th of May, two days, I think, before the Alderson report, so-called, had made its appearance in the press. That report appeared on the 17th of May, but on the 15th of May I had sent to Sir Max Aitken the following telegram:

Have consulted with General Hughes and we are prepared to leave matter to judgment of Commander in Chief after he has had all necessary tests of both rifles under such conditions as are experienced at front. Men making tests should be of like experience. * * * It is only arm we are equipped to produce in Canada at present and we believe it effective if properly used. Minister informs me that reports just received of recent official tests in England thoroughly demonstrate efficiency of our rifle.

I had discussed the subject with General Hughes, and he had given me that assurance and expressed very great confidence in the efficiency of the rifle, if properly used. I may say here that the test to which the Ross rifle was subjected was one of very great severity. It was a longer rifle than the Lee-Enfield, and that interfered, perhaps, to some extent with its use in the trenches. No one before the outbreak of the war, or in the early months of the war, could have foreseen that trench warfare would dominate the situation to the extent which it did. Further than that, the use of rifles in trench warfare, with the mud a foot, or two or three feet deep, with rifles falling into the mud and becoming dirty—all that was a particularly severe test of the Ross rifle which was of higher quality in many respects than the Lee-Enfield rifle. It was put to a further severe test in this way: It was placed in the hands of men who were not trained soldiers, men as gallant and splendid as the world ever produced, but men who were not trained soldiers, who naturally were not trained as efficiently as the men of a regular army would be in the care of their weapons. Therefore, the conditions of the test to which the Ross rifle was subjected were of an unusually severe character. I am not at all sure that with an enlarged chamber, and under ordinary conditions of warfare, the Ross rifle would not be found a thoroughly efficient weapon. But the question with which we were always confronted was whether the men had confidence in it. Once we were convinced that they had not confidence in it, we agreed immediately that they must be armed with a rifle in which they had confidence, or they could not be effective.

In pursuance of these communications, I sent on the 5th day of June, 1916, a telegram to Sir William Robertson, Chief of the General Staff. It was sent through the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. That telegram read:

Secret. Following from the Prime Minister for Sir William Robertson. By reason of rumoured dissatisfaction with Ross rifle I held consultation with General Hughes on May 15 and sent unofficial message to Commander in Chief that we were prepared to leave matter to his judgment after making all necessary tests of both rifles under such conditions as are experienced at the front. We suggested that men making tests should be of equal experience. Ross rifle is only arm we are equipped to produce in Canada at present and we believe it efficient if properly used but are content to abide by judgment of Commander in Chief after thorough investigation and adequate tests. We realize absolute necessity of two conditions: first, that men shall be armed with thoroughly efficient rifle; second, that their confidence in such rifle shall be unshaken Please let me have your judgment as to proper course to pursue

On the same day I sent to Sir George Perley, who had taken a very keen and active interest in the matter, this telegram:

Confidential. Please ask Colonial Secretary to show you my secret cable to-day for Chief General Staff respecting Ross rifle and confer with Aitken to whom you may disclose terms of that message.

On the 5th day of June, I also sent to Sir George Perley the following telegram:

Secret. Please ascertain whether British Government have finally and definitely decided on new rifle, or whether they propose before final action to study lessons obtained in present war. If new type of rifle has been finally adopted we are prepared after suitable investigation to adopt it if found satisfactory, so that our rifle in future will be of same type as British. In that case British order for Ross rifles might be cancelled and new order for one hundred thousand rifles new type given instead. Cost of machines and gauges for new type of rifle would approximate five hundred thousand dollars and this cost might be equally divided between two governments. Am making this suggestion because of continued criticism of Ross rifle which undoubtedly creates lack of confidence. No rifle however efficient is useful unless it commands thorough confidence of men.

Mr. MACDONALD: I notice that in the communication which my right hon. friend has just read, he referred to the fact that the British Government had given an order for Ross rifles.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am coming to that now.

Mr. MACDONALD: Perhaps my right hon. friend could tell us whether that order is still in existence.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I shall go into that fully. In the early months of this war we had a good deal of communication with the British Government as to the supply of rifles. The question was surrounded with much difficulty, and some of the calculations made at that time were not justified by subsequent events. The British Government took up the question of obtaining rifles in Canada, and in the autumn of 1914 they ordered 100,000 Ross rifles. I have asked for and obtained a memorandum as to what has been accomplished by the Ross Rifle Company in supplying rifles under that order. The memorandum which has been given to me by the Department of Militia and Defence is as follows:

Number ordered for the War Office, 100,000; number delivered to 20th January, 1917, 48,800; number still to be delivered, 51,200.

The Ross Rifle Company is still engaged in the production of those rifles for the British Government. It will be observed from the telegram which I have just read that I made a certain suggestion to the British Government in that regard. I suggested to them in effect this: There has been criticism of the Ross rifle; we are told that the men have lost confidence in it; you have an outstanding contract for the Ross rifle; we have outstanding contracts for the Ross rifle; the cost of the new machinery to make the necessary changes will be $500,000 (as a matter of fact, I think it would have been a great deal more than that); would it not be better for the two Governments to arrange with the Ross Rifle Company to cease the production of Ross rifles, and to change the orders, in so far as they have not been fulfilled, to the Lee-Enfield rifle, or the type of new rifle which is now being produced for you in the United States? That was the suggestion, which, however, the British Government did not accept.

Mr. CARVELL: What was the date of that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The 5th day of June, 1916.

Mr. CARVELL: Did the Government, or any of its officials, ever receive from the British Government an offer of machinery and the different tools necessary to re-equip the Ross Rifle factory for the purpose of manufacturing Lee-Enfields?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We asked them about experts. They said that in so far as some dies, machinery and plant were concerned, they would be procured and placed at our service for use in the production of a new rifle.

Mr. CARVELL: When?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I cannot recall that but I will find out. Sir George Perley advised us on the 8th of June:

London, June 8th, 1916.

War Office considers except trajectory the new Lee-Enfield now being made in United States is as good as any weapon that could be made with present experience and in present war; apparently high trajectory no particular disadvantage. Lessons obtained in present war have evidently not brought any new experience so far as rifles are concerned. Not considered possible say definitely what rifle will be finally adopted by British Government after war. Hardly to be expected that War Office would under present circumstances definitely commit themselves regarding their future service rifle. Master General Ordnance considers rifle now being made for them in United States exceedingly good weapon and would be glad see you use same pattern. Question of money arrangements would have to be taken up officially but personally should consider that of minor importance.

Then, in reply to a previous telegram as to the test of the Ross rifle, I had from Sir George Perley, on the 8th June, 1916, this telegram already laid on the table of the House:

London, June 8th, 1916.

Confidential. Have shown and discussed with Aitken your secret cable to Chief General Staff.

—that is the telegram to Sir William Robertson which I have already read—

Question will now doubtless be settled by him. Have seen him personally to-day and impressed strongly as possible upon him your views regarding necessity thorough test and also that Canadian Government would need official documents giving full facts and statements which could be made public if thought desirable. Also impressed upon him that Ross rifle is only one which Canada can produce at present and that if our troops are re-armed at front it naturally would raise question whether Canada should continue manufacturing Ross rifle and if not some alternative feasible plan would have to be suggested. Showed him copy your cable 5th regarding new type rifle which I answered this morning. Whole question will doubtless be thoroughly considered within next few days.

Then, on the 10th of June, in reply to my telegram to Sir William Robertson, I had this communication through the Secretary of State for the Colonies. It is a telegram addressed to the Governor General:

The following, from the Chief of the Imperial General Staff. Begins:

I am much obliged for your telegram 6th June. It has been referred to Sir Douglas Haig and his reply is awaited before any opinion can be given.

On the 24th June I sent this telegram to Sir George Perley:

Most confidential, Secret. We have had under consideration since January last an order for one hundred thousand additional Ross rifles, none of which can be delivered before April, 1917. If we decide to order the additional one hundred thousand company requires nearly a year's notice before commencement of delivery in order to secure necessary material of various kinds for which there is great demand at present. Several months ago the Master General of Ordnance strongly recommended immediate action, but we have delayed by reason of doubts raised as to efficiency of rifle. Time has now arrived when immediate decision should be made. To this end it is important that we should have a definite, reliable and thorough report upon the merits of rifle. If it is so defective as to forbid its use at the front, or if confidence in its efficiency has been undermined in our troops, it would be a waste of public money to give further orders. Please consult Aitken, with whom I have had much correspondence on this subject and advise me whether any such report as above mentioned exists. If not, it should be made immediately for our guidance.

On the 5th of July I received from Sir George Perley a telegram as follows:

London, July 5th, 1916.

Your cable 24th ultimo. Have communication from War Office covering letters recently received from commander in chief armies in France who reports efficiency Ross rifle thoroughly tested by actual fighting in field, that he has again consulted general officer commanding second army in case fresh points have come to light during recent heavy fighting by Canadians near Ypres. Latter states his experience working Ross rifle during last fight has only confirmed his opinion that Canadians in Third Division have lost confidence in their rifle and he reccommends that rifles this Division be exchanged. Sir Douglas Haig remarks that although reports from Second Division not to same effect he is of opinion Lee-Enfield rifle should be issued to all three Divisions Canadian corps. Army Council agree with this opinion and have approved his proposal to exchange rifles Second and Third Divisions for Lee-Enfield pattern and steps will be taken forthwith effect exchange. Army Council hope be able utilize Ross rifles released from France, also those in possession Canadian troops England, for other purposes connected with war. They would be glad if steps could be taken stop any more Ross rifles being brought to England, it being understood they thereby make themselves responsible for supplying necessary rifles to Canadian troops on arrival here and they see no reason to doubt being able do this. Army Council add should Canadian Government be desirous undertaking manufacture rifle of different pattern suitable for use during present war, in their opinion rifle made same pattern as now produced in United States for British Army, which is on lines Lee-Enfield Mark III embodying improvements, probably best one to adopt. Mailing copies correspondence. War Office wishes this matter regarded as secret until July 15th.

It will be observed that the improved British rifle, what is known as the Enfield 1914 rifle, was not being produced in Great Britain; it was only being produced in the United States. The standard Lee-Enfield rifle was being produced in Great Britain.

but in the United States a new plant and a new organization had to be created. The improved type of rifle could be produced as quickly as the old type. The Enfield 1914 rifle had a ·276 bore instead of ·303 bore; it was impossible to adhere to the ·276 bore, for the reason that the ammunition being produced in England would not be suitable for that rifle; therefore, they took the new improved type, the 1914 Enfield rifle, and adapted the barrel to a ·303 calibre and that is the rifle for which they have made contracts in the United States.

Mr. CARVELL: Would that not require a new chamber?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The chamber, as I understand, is included in the barrel. At all events, that is what I am informed by the technical officer. The improvements effected in the new type, called the Enfield 1914, which was practically, but not formally, adopted before war broke out, were utilized and adopted in the orders given in the United States, but the barrel was of a ·303 calibre and not a ·276 calibre.

Then follow in order certain documents which my hon. friend has referred to, and which I should like again to place before the House. I need not read Mr. Cubitt's letter. I will read Sir Douglas Haig's report, dated May 28, 1916:

May 28, 1916.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that I have satisfied myself, after extensive inquiries carried out throughout the Canadian Corps, that, as a service rifle, the Ross is less trustworthy than the Lee-Enfield, and that the majority of the men armed with the Ross rifle have not the confidence in it that it is so essential that they should possess. The inquiry on which these conclusions are based, was the outcome of an urgent application from a battalion of the 3rd Canadian Division for rearmament with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, in consequence of a high percentage of jams experienced with their Ross rifles during a hostile attack on May 1, 1916.

2. I am accordingly of opinion that the 2nd and 3rd Canadian Divisions should be re-armed with the short Lee-Enfield rifle. It will be remembered that the 1st Canadian Division was so re-armed on June 12, 1915.

3. I am not in a position to effect this with the means at my disposal in France. I have the honour to inquire therefore, whether the necessary number of rifles can be supplied from home sources, without interfering with, or delaying the arrival and arming of the divisions due from England and Egypt on which I am relying.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) D. Haig, General,
Commanding in Chief,
British Armies in France.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

There is a further report from Sir Douglas Haig, dated June 21, 1916, which is also significant. It is addressed to the Secretary of the War Office in London, and reads as follows:

June 21, 1916.

Sir,—In reply to your No. 77/15/5307 (M.G.O.) of June 10, 1916, forwarding a copy of a telegram dated June 7, from the Governor General of Canada, I have the honour to inform you that the efficiency of the Ross rifle has been thoroughly tested by actual fighting in the field, and the application conveyed in my O.B./174 of May 28, 1916, was made after very careful consideration of all the evidences available.

2. I have again consulted the General Officer Commanding Second Army in case any fresh points have come to light during the recent heavy fighting by the Canadians near Ypres. He tells me that his experience of the working of the Ross rifle during the last fight has only confirmed him in his opinion that the Canadians, in the 3rd division at all events, have lost confidence in their rifle and he recommends that the rifles in this division be exchanged.

3. Although the reports from the 2nd division are not to the same effect, I am of opinion that the Lee-Enfield rifle should be issued to all three divisions of the Canadian Corps.

I must therefore adhere to my recommendation that the 2nd and 3rd Canadian divisions should be re-armed with the short Lee-Enfield rifle, and I would urge that the necessary steps to give effect thereto be taken without delay.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
D Haig, General,
Commanding in Chief,
British Armies in France.

It is well to remember, in justice to the Ross Rifle Company, that Sir Douglas Haig states in his report that the opinion which seems to have been pretty general in the Third Division was not shared by the men of the Second Division; but he thought it desirable and wise to arm all three divisions with the Lee-Enfield, in order that all the British forces at the front should be equipped with the same rifle. On the 11th day of July the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in consequence of these reports, sent us the following telegram, addressed to the Governor General:

July 11, 1916

With reference to my telegram, June 10, report from General Officer Commanding in Chief in France has now been received by Army Council recommending that second and third Canadian divisions should be re-armed with short Lee-Enfield rifles and Army Council have approved this. They hope to be able to utilize Ross rifles released and also those now in possession of Canadian troops in England for other purposes connected with the war, but ask that no more Ross rifles should be brought to England. Army Council will be responsible for supplying necessary rifles to Canadian troops on arrival in England. If your Government desire to undertake manufacture of different rifles suitable for use during war, Army Council think that rifles now being produced in America for British Army on lines of Lee-Enfield Mark III, but with improvements would be best.

Hon. members will observe that on the 26th of April, 1916, we had been informed that the British Government had no supply of rifles which would be available for rearming the Canadian troops. But conditions as regards supply and production evidently improved, because on the 11th day of July they entered into a clear and distinct engagement with us that they would hold themselves responsible for arming all the Canadian troops with the Lee-Enfield rifle, and they have carried out that engagement up to the present, and I have no doubt they will carry it out in the future. So that from the 11th day of July up to the present all the Canadian troops at the front have been armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle, and the British Government have undertaken on their part to see to it that all the Canadian troops sent to the front shall be armed with that rifle.

Mr. CARVELL: Might I ask why, after that date, the Fourth Division went over armed with the Ross rifle?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is an explanation of that in the correspondence which I shall come to in a little while, and it seems to have been very much misunderstood by an hon. gentleman opposite who addressed a very fervent speech to the House. I had an informal communication with the Secretary of State for War, as a result of which I received the following telegram from Sir Max Aitken on the 11th day of July, 1916. I might say that this telegram is due to the expression of the desire on my part, which is repeated in the later correspondence, that the British Government and the governments of the Overseas Dominions should get together and select a uniform type of rifle, which would be the standard type of rifle for the British, the Canadian, the South African, the New Zealand, and the Australian troops, so that we might have one uniform type of rifle for the whole Empire, because, if we are to fight side by side in defense of the Empire or any part of it, it is highly important that there should be one type of rifle used by the armies of the Mother Country, and of the Overseas Dominions. More than that, it should be produced not only in the United Kingdom, but in each of the Overseas Dominions as well. The telegram to which I have alluded, containing a message from the Secretary of State for War, now the Prime Minister, reads:

July 11, 1916.

Sir Robert Borden,
Ottawa.

I am authorized by the Secretary of State for War to inform you as follows: 'Since outbreak of war improved type of Lee-Enfield rifle has been adopted and manufactured under orders of the British Government. With a view to uniformity, the Lee-Enfield rifle has been offered to Canadian Government for Canadian troops at the front. It is expected that negotiations will be carried on in immediate future between British Government and Governments of Dominions with a view to securing for all His Majesty's forces throughout the Empire a uniform type of service rifle. Doubtless all existing facilities for production of rifle in overseas Dominions will be utilized for manufacture of new service rifle when adopted.'

(Signed) Aitken.

I regret that I am obliged to occupy the attention of the committee at such length; but it is necessary, in view of certain misconceptions with regard to the course taken by the Government in the matter, that the whole correspondence, so far as it is relevant, should be placed before the committee and before the country.

My hon. friend (Mr. Carvell) has alluded to the fact that the Fourth Canadian Division went to the front armed with the Ross rifle. We saw a statement in the press to that effect, and in the correspondence brought down there is a telegram and a reply on that subject which were occasioned by the following considerations. The Government of Canada had made an announcement, following the correspondence which I have read, that the Canadian troops at the front would be armed with the Lee-Enfield rifle. Therefore, when it appeared that the Fourth Canadian Division had gone to the front armed, not with the Lee-Enfield rifle but with the Ross rifle, we were placed in a peculiar position, because, apparently there was either a lack of knowledge on our part of what was being done or a misrepresentation to the public. Therefore when the matter came to my attention, I addressed on the 30th day of August last a cable message through the Governor General to the Colonial Secretary, in these terms:

Secret. In pursuance of your cable message of July 11, my advisers announced that Canadian troops at front would in future be armed with Lee-Enfield rifles. They are confident that no departure from this decision has been made without their knowledge, but they desire to be informed as to report which has reached them that Fourth Canadian Division was armed with Ross rifle when recently despatched to France.

To which, on the 7th day of September, 1916, the following reply was received from Mr. Bonar Law in a cable message to the Governor General:

Your telegram of the 31st Fourth Division were sent to France armed with Ross rifles, but Lee-Enfields have since been sent to France for purpose of re-arming. Re-arming should be completely performed by now.

From this I understand that although the Fourth Division went to France armed with the Ross rifle, the British Government, in pursuance of their engagement with us, re-armed them with Lee-Enfield rifles before they were actually at the front.

That is the situation up to that time, the net result of it being this: In the summer of 1911, when the Canadian Government were made acquainted with the view of Sir John French that, for the reasons expressed in his report, it was advisable to re-arm the First Canadian Division with the Lee-Enfield rifle, we assented at once that this should be done, because it appeared that there had been jamming of the Ross rifle; that the ammunition was unsuitable; that the men had lost confidence in the rifle, and that a change was absolutely necessary. Then, having regard to the suggestion of Sir John French that the rifle might be made right by enlargement of the chamber; having regard to the fact that there was no other source from which rifles could be obtained; having regard also to the fact that, according to the best judgment we could procure, it would occupy at least a year before rifles of any other type could be turned out by the Ross company, we concluded, following the lines of Sir John French's suggestion, that the only course was to enlarge the chamber of the Ross rifle. Accordingly the Minister of Militia in July, 1915, determined to enlarge it from .460 to .462, and in August, 1915, he determined still further to enlarge it to .464, with the expectation that the enlarged chamber would prevent jamming. When the question of further provision of rifles came rather urgently before us in the winter of 1916, after giving an order for 100,000 rifles with the enlarged chamber, we made inquiry of the British Government on the 30th day of May, 1916, whether out of the supply of rifles which they had ordered, it would be possible to supply Lee-Enfield rifles to us, and what number; and on the 26th of April, 1916, we received a reply that no rifles out of those ordered by them would be available for our use.

Later on, when further difficulty arose with regard to the rifles, we sent a communication first to Sir Max Aitken and afterwards to Sir William Robertson, suggesting that tests should be made, pointing out that according to our view the rifle was efficient if properly used, and desiring, after those tests had been made, that the result should be communicated to us. In June, 1916, we left the whole question of the re-arming of the Canadian troops at the front to the absolute judgment of the Chief of the Imperial General Staff and the Commander in Chief of the British army in the field; and when they determined, having regard to all consideration, that although some of the Canadian units were perfectly satisfied with the Ross rifle, it would be advisable that all the forces should be re-armed we assented to that conclusion at once, accompanied as it was by the condition and undertaking that the British Government in the future would make themselves responsible for the arming of all the Canadian troops at the front with the Lee-Enfield rifle to which no exception seemed to have been taken, and in which at all events the troops seemed to have confidence, so far as we could learn from the reports available.

Now, that is the situation as it presents itself to my mind. I have endeavoured to give the whole facts to the House so far as they can be disclosed with the consent of the War Office. My hon. friend, however, goes on and puts before us another question: What do we propose to do about the production of rifles in Canada? I want to point out in the first place that, so far as the arming of Canadian troops is concerned, we have the definite engagement of the British Government that our troops shall be armed, when they go to the front, with the Lee-Enfield rifle. That engagement has been lived up to, as I understand it. For, although the Fourth Division went to France armed with the Ross rifle, they were immediately afterwards armed with the Lee-Enfield, and are so armed today. The question of the production of rifles in Canada ceased to have the immediate urgency that it would have had if that engagement had not been given to us by the British Government. With this in mind, we come back to the question of what the Government has done with respect to the production of rifles in this country in the future.

Certain negotiations are going on as to the disposition in Great Britain of our supply of Ross rifles, the most of which have been in use either by the British Government or by ourselves. We require a considerable number in Canada of course for the training of our own troops—though I entirely agree that would be better, if it were possible, that our troops should be trained with the rifles they are to use at the front. In considering the question of what should be done, there are a couple of telegrams which have not yet been brought down and which it might be well that I should communicate to the House. In the telegram from which I am about to read there are some portions that, from considerations of public interest, I cannot disclose to the House:

Ottawa, September 5, 1916.

My advisers consider it important for purposes of common defence that adequate facilities for production of rifles should be maintained in Canada. They are impressed with the view that a standard rifle to be called Imperial Service Rifle should be adopted by Mother Country and all Dominions of Empire. If British Government can give them assurance that rifle known as Enfield .276 pattern adapted for .303 ammunition will be definitely adopted by British Government as standard service rifle my advisers would proceed to necessary examination for its adoption and preparation for adequate production here. If on the other hand British Government have reached no definite conclusion as to type of rifle to be ultimately adopted my advisers would naturally desire to limit as far as possible expenditure for this purpose as it would have to be repeated in case another type should be adopted in early future. They would be grateful for full and prompt expression of views of His Majesty's Government as to situation which must be considered with regard to needs of whole Empire.

I have stated that the date of that telegram is 5th September. In order to prevent misapprehension as to dates of telegrams, I may explain that when we send a telegram dated, for instance, 5th September, that telegram is received by the British Government on the 6th September. There is a difference of five hours in the time. Telegrams are thus referred to by the British authorities as of the following day—in the case I speak of this telegram is referred to as of 6th September. The reply is as follows:

Paraphrase of cypher telegram from Mr. Bonar Law to the Governor General.

London, September 19, 1916.

With reference to your telegram September 6th it is regretted by Army Council that it is impossible for them at present to give definite assurance as to the pattern of service rifle to be adopted after the war. Further experience may modify views now held, while the large stock of rifles which will have accumulated by the end of the war may render the adoption of any new pattern unlikely for some years to come. As regards the present manufacture of rifles suitable for use during the war the Army Council adhere to their opinion conveyed to you in the penultimate sentence of my telegram of July 11th.

Bonar Law.

As the telegram of July 11 may not be clearly recalled by hon. members, because of the mass of this correspondence, I will refer to it again in order that the allusion in the document just quoted may be understood. The penultimate sentence of the telegram of July 11th is as follows:

If your Government undertake the manufacture of different rifles suitable for use during war, Army Council think that rifles now being produced in America for British Army on lines of Lee-Enfield Mark III, but with improvements would be best.

That is the same rifle described in a somewhat different way in my telegram of 5th September. In that telegram I referred to it as "the rifle known as Enfield, .276-pattern, adapted for .303 ammunition." I used that expression because I was informed by the Master General of the Ordnance that it would be understood by the War Office, being the technical description of that rifle. I think it was in September, 1916, that we asked the Government to furnish us with a sealed pattern of that particular rifle in order that we might take steps, under the contract with the Ross Rifle Company, for its production in this country. On November 14 I made a recommendation to Council with regard to it, and that recommendation was approved by His Excellency on November 15. It is proper that I should read that order in council, as it adopts for the purpose of future production in Canada the approved Lee-Enfield rifle which is being produced for the British Government in the United States, but which, as I understand, is not yet being produced in Great Britain, for the reason which I have already mentioned. The order in council is as follows:

November 15, 1916.

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report dated 14th November, 1916, from the Right Hon. the Prime Minister, stating that on the 27th day of March, 1902, His Majesty the King, represented by the Hon. F. W. Borden, then Minister of Militia and Defence, entered into an agreement with Sir Charles Ross, Bart., of Balnagowan, copy of which is appended, whereby the Government of Canada agreed with the said Sir Charles Ross to purchase from the said Charles Ross or his assigns all rifles required for the use of the Government. The said contract fixes no limit as to the time for which it shall remain in force.

That the said contract provided for the manufacture and delivery by the contractor in each year of such number of rifles not less than 10,000, as might be desired and signified by the Government in writing on or before the 30th day of September of the year preceding the year in which delivery was to be made, each to correspond to a standard sample rifle to be provided by the said minister.

That the said contract further provided that should a new rifle be invented which the Government should desire to adopt or use the Government might furnish the contractor with a standard sample of such new rifle and give the contractor twelve months' notice in writing requiring that the rifles to be delivered by the contractor upon and after the expiration of the period of such last-mentioned notice should correspond to the standard sample of such new rifle so furnished, the Government to protect the contractor against any actions for infringements of patents so far as such new rifles supplied to the Government were concerned and upon and after the expiration of the said period all rifles to be delivered by the contractor should accordingly correspond to such substituted standard sample, and the contractor agreed to originally lay out and adapt his plant, machinery, etc., so as to provide the best facilities which could be reasonably foreseen to enable him to apply the same to the manufacture of any such new rifle which might so be desired.

That the said contract further provided for the fixing of the price to be paid for the rifles to be manufactured and delivered thereunder from time to time.

That from the date of the said contract all rifles required and used by the Government were, in accordance with the terms of the said contract, purchased from the contractor named therein, or from his assigns, the Ross Rifle Company, and the standard sample rifle furnished by the Minister of Militia and Defence as provided for in the said contract in 1902 with certain improvements and modifications made from time to time has been the rifle produced by the contractor up to the present time.

That much difference of opinion and much controversy has arisen as to the merits of the rifle so purchased and its usefulness as an active service weapon compared with other standard rifles adopted by the British Government. As a consequence repeated inquiries have been made and varying opinions given as to the desirability of substituting a new standard rifle for the rifle so manufactured. Concurrently with these inquiries, information was sought as to the possibility of procuring other standard rifles for the use of the Canadian forces. The readjustment of the contractor's factory for the production of a new standard rifle would involve great delay, and adequate provision for arming the Canadian forces in the meantime is necessary. Since the outbreak of war, however, the Government was not able, until very recently, to procure any other rifle in Great Britain or elsewhere for that purpose. On April 26, 1916, in response to an inquiry made on March 30, 1916, the Imperial Government stated that even up to June, 1917, there would be no surplus from British orders other than that already allotted to the Allied Governments, and that it was impossible to allocate from such orders any rifles to this Government. Early in July, however, the British Army Council, to whose decision the matter had been left by the Canadian Government, concluded that the Canadian Expeditionary Force should be armed with the Lee-Enfield rifles, and the Army Council undertook to make themselves responsible for supplying the necessary rifles to the troops from Canada on arrival in England. This arrangement was accepted, and it has been carried out. On the 5th September, 1916, the Imperial Government informed this Government that the condition indicated in their communication of the 26th April had changed, and that it would be possible to arrange for the transfer of a certain number of standard rifles to Canada from existing British orders.

Further correspondence took place with regard to the type of rifle which should be adopted in Canada. The Imperial Government, since the beginning of the war, has commenced, and is now carrying on the production of an improved rifle known as the Enfield 1914, or .276, adapted for .303 ammunition. The minister is informed that this rifle, as it is produced from time to time, will be issued by the Imperial Government to the British army, and the Army Council have advised that if this Government desire to undertake the manufacture of a new standard rifle the said improved rifle is considered the best.

In view, therefore, of the fact that other standard rifles are now available, the minister recommends that no further orders be given for the manufacture of the standard Ross rifle heretofore supplied to the Government under the said contract.

In view of the information obtained from the Army Council and of the very great desirability that the rifle to be issued to the Canadian forces should be the same in every respect as that to be supplied to the other forces of the British Empire, the minister further recommends that a new standard sample rifle be provided by the Minister of Militia and Defence, the same to be in every respect the rifle so to be supplied by the Imperial Government, namely, the Enfield, 1914, or .276, adapted for .303 ammunition, and be furnished to the contractor and his assignee, The Ross Rifle Company, in accordance with clause 6 of the said contract, and that the contractor and the said company be required, on and after the first day of December, 1917, to make all rifles supplied under the said contract to correspond to such last mentioned substituted standard sample rifle the Government undertaking to protect the contractor and his assignee against any actions for infringement of patents as stipulated by the contract, and, moreover, that the Minister of Militia and Defence be authorized to give a notice in the form hereto annexed to the said Sir Charles Ross and his assignee, The Ross Rifle Company.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

(Signed) Rodolphe Boudreau,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

It is necessary, for the purpose of giving the notice, referred to in the order in council, that it should be accompanied by the standard rifle itself. We were not able to procure a standard rifle in the time limited; therefore the order in council had to be amended as to the date at which the contractor should be called upon to undertake the production of the new standard rifle. As the new standard rifle was not supplied to us by the British Government until the 15th or 20th of January last, an amending order in council was passed by which the notice given to the contractor requires him to produce the new rifle on and after the 1st day of February, 1918, it being necessary under the terms of the contract that he should have a year's notice.

The matter stands in that way at pre-
