THE DESERTED HALL To a mortal heart he'w humbling ls a view of you old Hall, Into dust and darkness crumbling, While rude winds shake roof and wall. Mess is round the casement spreading, And no more alle windows blaze When the weary day is shedding His last rad and quivering rays.

Under the neglected arbor Foxes in the night-time back." And the bat and a lider harbor In its chambers drear and dark. Weeds, about the door stone growing, Whisper of decay and blight-On the hearth no ember glowing Sheds a warm and cheerful light.

Near the ruin is a river, And the waves schile flowing on. From their lips of crystal, ever Breathe that word of mourning-cour Round the place old poplars cluster, And the leaves give out strange tones" When the moon flings pallid lustre On the roof and basement stones.

Saddened and diserted dwelling Of a wronged and broken heart, While the dirge of hope is kneiling Oh ! a mournful type thou art Flowers of love untimely perished, In its barrou realm lie waste, Like thy garden grounds once cherished By thy woulding hand of taste.

Creatures that haunt places lonely In thy empty halls are bred, "And that HEART is peopled only By the shadows of the dead. As you moon, with look sudding, Lights the home of days gone by. In the teart - A NOSLES RUIN SAULY BLIMMERS MEDICKY.

THE SONG OF THE MOON.

When the sun's at rest, Fat away in the west, mount on my silver car, And slowly I rise. .. From the twilight skies, And ride o'er the earth afar.

In the midnight hour I clamber the tower Where the lowly captive lies; And I gladden his sight. With my pale moon light-The light of his native skies.

Far down in the deep My viglis I keep -And mirrored I shine In the caves of bruic Midst the seawerd drapery,

In the harvest night. I send forth my light-To the reapers a welcome boo As the joyous train. Midst the golden grain, Sing the song of the " Harvest Moon, "

Away, far away, Where true lovers stray-By wood, and by shady bowers-I guide their long walk, As they rapturously talk Of the bliss of coming hours.

When weary and wan, The wayfaring man In darkness is prone to stray, My friendly light, Like an angle bright, To his homestead points the way

I peep when I please, Through the opening trees Where the sporting children play; And I listen the song Of the mirthful throng, As they chaugt their roundelay

As at times I gaze On the comet's blaze. When the trembling stars grow dim Affrighted I shroud My form in a cloud. And sing my midnight hymn

As at times I gaze On the comet's blaze. When eclipses o'ershadows my face; But brighter I rise, In my home in the skies From the dark intruder's embrace
