House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Speaker: The Honourable W. Ross Macdonald

Tuesday, January 30, 1951

FOURTH SESSION—TWENTY-FIRST PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the twenty-ninth day of January, 1951, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three o'clock on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that, when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

Since you met in special session in the autumn of last year, there has been a further deterioration in the international situation. The intervention of Chinese forces in active opposition to the United Nations forces in Korea has increased the danger of a general conflagration.

So far the efforts to achieve a peaceful settlement in the Far East have not succeeded. While aggression cannot be condoned and will continue to be resisted, it is the view of my ministers that the door to negotiation at any time a cessation of hostilities in Korea can be arranged must be kept open.

The increased menace in the Far East reinforces the mounting evidence that communist imperialism is determined to dominate the world by force or the fear of force, and that the only hope of maintaining peace with freedom lies in the rapid increase of the combined strength of the free nations. It is equally important that the free nations should make it abundantly clear that they have no aggressive designs and that they are resolved to aid in constructive endeavours to improve the standards of human welfare in underdeveloped countries.

My ministers have endeavoured to uphold these international objectives in the deliberations of the United Nations, at the recent meeting of the prime ministers of the commonwealth countries, and in our diplomatic relations with all nations and governments.

Units of the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force have shared from the outset in the United Nations action in Korea. One battalion of the Canadian Army special force is now in Korea, and the rest of the force is at Fort Lewis, Washington, where it is available for service in Korea or for other employment in discharge of our international obligations.

Progress has been made in the organization of an integrated force in Europe under the North Atlantic treaty organization. The Supreme Commander, General Eisenhower, has recently visited Canada to consult with the government and the chiefs of staff. You will be asked early in the session to authorize Canadian participation in this integrated force as part of our program for national defence and security. You will also be asked to approve substantially increased expenditures for defence.

The urgent need of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project in relation to the security of this continent is becoming increasingly apparent. It is the view of my ministers that the Canadian authorities should be kept in a position to co-operate promptly in undertaking construction of the project once affirmative action has been taken by the appropriate United States authorities.

Your approval will be sought for an appropriate Canadian participation in the Colombo plan and in technical assistance to underdeveloped areas.

The policies of the government are designed to prevent war, but the dangers of the international situation and the magnitude of the defence effort required as a deterrent have, in the opinion of my ministers, created an emergency situation. You will accordingly be asked to approve legislation vesting in the governor in council additional powers to ensure adequate defence preparations to meet the present emergency and to prevent economic dislocation resulting from defence preparations.

You will also be asked to approve a bill to establish a Department of Defence Production to act as a procurement agency for the defence forces of Canada and also for such defence requirements of our allies as may be met from Canadian production.

Amendments to legislation relating to the armed forces will also be submitted for your approval.

Legislation will be submitted respecting the application of the benefits of the veterans charter to members of the special force. Amendments will be introduced to legislation concerning pensions for veterans and their dependents to relieve difficulties being experienced by certain groups of pensioners provided for thereunder.

Appropriate amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act will be introduced to prevent the retention of Canadian citizenship by persons who have renounced their allegiance or shown by their conduct that they are not loyal to Canada.

The high level of employment and production within our country give our people increased capacity to meet the demands of national and international security.

The spirit of unity so happily reflected in the conferences between the federal and provincial governments is further evidence of our ability to make an effective national response to the emergency.

Proposals were laid before the provincial governments for new tax agreements and for a contributory old age pensions program along the lines recommended by the joint committee at the last regular session.

The provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals and to proposals for constitutional amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of the present session.

You will be asked to consider measures respecting federal grants to municipalities in lieu of taxation of crown property, the abolition of the requirement of the fiat in the case of petitions of right, and the bequests of Laurier House and Kingsmere.

You will also be asked to consider a complete revision of the Indian Act and the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

Other measures to be introduced will include amendments to the Immigration Act, the Post Office Act, the Central Mortgage and Housing Act, the Gold Mining Assistance Act and the Customs Act.

It is anticipated that the reports of the royal commissions on transportation and on national development in the arts, letters and sciences will become available during the course of the session.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make provision for national defence and the meeting of our obligations under the United Nations charter and the North Atlantic treaty, as well as for all essential services.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

May Divine Providence bless your deliberations and give to our people the fortitude and patience to sustain the trials of these troubled times.

MOTION FOR PRECEDENCE OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to move, seconded by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe):

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Wednesday next, and that, unless and until otherwise ordered, this order have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills and government notices of motions until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Fournier (Hull), Claxton, Casselman, Shaw and Weir.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council, appointing the Hon. Alphonse Fournier, Minister of Public Works, the Hon. D. C. Abbott, Minister of Finance, the Hon. J. J. McCann, Minister of National Revenue, and the Hon. F. G. Bradley, Secretary of State of Canada, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled: An act respecting the House of Commons.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved:

That Louis Rene Beaudoin, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Vaudreuil-Soulanges, be appointed deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Report of the joint librarians of parliament. —Mr. Speaker.

Report of the chief electoral officer on by-elections held during the year 1950.—Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent: Mr. Speaker, I move that the house do now adjourn until three o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

In view of the fact that under the standing orders there is only one sitting of the house on Wednesdays, and the further fact that, in accordance with the motion adopted a few minutes ago, the business tomorrow will be the consideration of His Excellency's speech to both houses of parliament, I suggest that after the motion for an address to His Excellency is made and seconded, we adjourn until Thursday, at which time, in accordance with tradition, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will be the first to be recognized; I might follow, and then the other leaders, in the order that has become traditional in this house.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 4 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 31, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

DUPLESSIS BRIDGE

INTERRUPTION OF COMMUNICATIONS BY COLLAPSE OF BRIDGE AT THREE RIVERS

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to direct the attention of the house to a tragedy which occurred this morning at Three Rivers through the collapse of the highway bridge. Communications have been disrupted, and I should like to know if it is possible for the Department of National Defence to provide for the temporary use of a Bailey bridge to serve the area.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I heard only a few minutes ago of this most regrettable tragedy. There has been no inquiry from the government of the province as to what aid we could render. My recollection of this bridge is that the river is too deep and too wide to permit the use of a Bailey bridge. However, I shall be glad to look into the matter and see what can be done.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table copies of correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) on my behalf and the premiers of the several provinces with respect to suggestions for constitutional amendments.

(For text of correspondence, see pages 43 to 47.)

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table the report of the Department of National Revenue for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1950; also the report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1950.

So far as export petroleum and pulpwood regulations are concerned, none having been promulgated since the last return was made, no report will be made regarding this item.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUPPLEMENT TO REPORT OF DEPARTMENT ON "CANADA AND THE KOREAN CRISIS"

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table copies, in English and in French, of a report entitled "Documents on the Korean Crisis." This report will supplement the material contained in the report "Canada and the Korean Crisis," which I tabled on September 1, 1950.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS, DEFENCE, COST OF LIVING AND INFLATION—ARRANGEMENTS FOR DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I wrote a letter to him which I know he has not had very much time to consider; I was informed that he was out of the office at the time of its arrival. In that letter I suggested that in view of the present situation the desirability should be considered of setting aside days for debates on the three major items that will obviously be before this house, and that the report on external affairs should be made immediately, with an opportunity to debate that as one subject, followed by national defence, and, after that, the cost of living and inflation.

Is the Prime Minister in a position to say whether he will comply with this suggestion? I believe it would provide the most orderly way of proceeding with the discussion, which may be unrelated to reality if we have no facts upon which to base our comments.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I received just as I was coming into the house, because up to that time I was engaged elsewhere, the letter referred to by the leader of the opposition, and I have just had time to look at it. I must confess that I was taken by surprise, because I had gathered from what took place yesterday that we would be following the traditional procedure; that after the mover and the seconder of the address had spoken today the leader of the opposition might wish to ask for an adjournment in order that he might speak to the address on Thursday

Traditionally the procedure would have been for me to reply and then for the other leaders to speak. We had intended to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to take part in the debate immediately after that, and make a statement about the present international situation as he views it. We had also expected that at an early time the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) might make a statement enlarging on what is set forth in the speech from the throne about defence preparations, and that there would also be an opportunity at an early day for a member of the government to make a statement about economic controls that may have to be contemplated. There would be an opportunity for those three subjects to be discussed in appropriate sequence in the debate on the address.

To my knowledge we have not followed the practice of the parliament at Westminster of setting aside a day for debating any particular subject. Without the introduction of a special motion or resolution, I should be at some loss to find an appropriate standing order under which these subjects might become debatable matters. On the other hand, in the debate on the speech from the throne all three can be fully considered, because they are all referred to therein. My understanding is that the adoption of the address at the parliament of Westminster is regarded almost as a formality and takes place practically without debate.

If it were the desire of the house to adopt the address at once, we could immediately move to set up the committee of supply. I would not want to give a formal opinion, but I would imagine that there might be an opportunity then for debating these three subjects in proper sequence. But I must confess that I have not had any opportunity of considering this matter with my colleagues. I trusted, and still trust, that it might be convenient to follow the traditional order. If the various leaders made their speeches on the address tomorrow I would undertake that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would follow on Friday with as complete a statement of the situation, as he views it, as it is within his province to make, and that very soon after that the Minister of National Defence would be prepared to enlarge upon the statements about defence preparations contained in the speech from the throne.

Of course it might make for dispatch if we adopted the speech from the throne right away and found another appropriate method to deal with the other matters, but I would not like to ask hon. members to forgo their right to discuss matters of public concern which they think it is necessary to bring before parliament in its opening days, unless that seemed to be almost the unanimous feeling of the house. If we followed the procedure suggested yesterday I would hope that we would get before the house, beginning on Friday with external affairs and perhaps following on Monday with national defence, full statements from the ministers concerned with respect to the policies of the government announced in such general terms in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Drew: Since the Prime Minister has indicated that he has received such short notice of this matter, and since admittedly this procedure has not been adopted before, for the purpose of seeking further consideration I should like to make a point with respect to what he has said. If we adopted the procedure followed at Westminster of naming a day for discussion of these major subjects, consideration of the speech from the throne could then proceed with all members possessed of the information essential to effective debate. If the usual course is followed it is obvious that those members who have already spoken will not then be able to take part in any such debate as might be arranged to deal with a particular subject. In the government and in the other parties there are certain members who deal particularly with certain subjects and they might lose the opportunity to deal with those particular subjects.

This matter can stand, but I would again urge consideration of the subject by the Prime Minister. As he has already pointed out, the speech from the throne is in very general terms, and I suggest that the very general terms in which we received the information make it extremely difficult at this time to discuss three of the most vital subjects which this house will be called upon to deal with, or in fact that it has ever been called upon to deal with. I am not suggesting this as a practice always to be followed in the future. I am not suggesting it as a practice that would in any way limit the opportunity of any member to deal with those subjects that arise in the debate on the speech from the throne. I am suggesting, however, that we are in a most unusual and critical period and that it would be extremely helpful, from the point of view of orderly debate and the attainment of that approximation to unanimity with regard to those matters on which we can agree, which will certainly be forthcoming, to have the essential information on these vital subjects before we proceed with the general debate.

I leave that suggestion with the Prime Minister. If it commends itself to him and his colleagues we can follow another course tomorrow. In view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is here, I should think that the house would undoubtedly accept a motion to proceed with a subject of that kind if it were presented by the government.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think considerable confusion has been caused in the past by intervention of other business in the course of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do not think it has facilitated the business of the house at all. Last year, I remember, there was considerable criticism on this side of the house—I think from all parties—because of the manner in which the traditional procedure was changed. I have great sympathy with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has said regarding these problems. Nevertheless I believe that the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne is the first, and indeed the main, opportunity for private members to express to the government what they, and through them their constituents, are thinking about the problems that have arisen.

While we should make every effort to shorten the debate as much as we possibly can—and it is a very difficult thing to do—nevertheless by continuing the debate we would facilitate the business of the house, the government would understand the views of private members and of the people of the country, and in the end we would be further ahead if we disposed of the address first and then took up these vital problems in the order that has been mentioned.

There is one other method that could be adopted by members of the opposition or members on the government side of the house if they so desired, if they felt these matters were of sufficient interest to justify a statement from the minister concerned. Amendments could be moved from time to time. It has been my experience in the past that when we have interrupted the debate on the address to do something else we have not facilitated the business of the house—indeed I think we have rather delayed it.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO FINAL PAYMENT ON FIVE-YEAR POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the wheat growers of the prairie provinces may expect the final payment under the five-year wheat pool, and whether the government has made up its mind what it will contribute toward making up the losses sustained by those farmers? If the amount has been determined, how much will it be?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not able at this time to make a statement regarding the five-year pool.

Mr. Wright: If I may ask a supplementary question, is the government still carrying on negotiations with the United Kingdom government with respect to any further payment under what is commonly known as the "have regard" clause in the four-year British contract?

Mr. Howe: I am not able to make a statement on that subject today.

Mr. Ross (Souris): If I may ask a further supplementary question, could the Prime Minister say whether negotiations have been reopened with the British government in regard to a final settlement of the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement and the five-year pool?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will not say that negotiations have been opened with the government of the United Kingdom in that regard, but representations were made as to what I thought was the view prevailing throughout the wheat-producing provinces of Canada in regard to the fulfilment of all obligations under the four-year contract.

CHINA

INQUIRY AS TO PROHIBITION OF EXPORT OF CANADIAN FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): In view of the communist blackmailing of friends and relatives of Canadians in China, has the government considered the prohibition of export of Canadian funds to communist China?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The matter has not been given consideration up to the present time.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION BY CANADA ALONE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): In view of certain government statements made during the recess, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the Canadian government to proceed alone with the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway if the United States congress does not, within a reasonable time, offer its co-operation in that regard.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The prospects of co-operation between the two governments in the construction of the project as a whole, both for navigation and for hydroelectric power development, appear quite good at the present time, and we are hopeful that within a short time there will be some constructive action in that regard.

Mr. Graydon: That is good news.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. W. H. MCMILLAN AND SECONDED BY MR. MAURICE BRETON

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton):

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Field Marshal the Right Honourable the Viscount Alexander of Tunis, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Companion of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, upon whom has been conferred the decoration of the Military Cross, Governor General and Commander in Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

I am well aware, sir, that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has conferred a high honour upon me in inviting me to move the address to His Excellency in reply to the speech from the throne. I do not view this as a personal tribute, because this is my first step into Canadian politics and I have yet to prove my fitness for this important undertaking. I consider it rather as a tribute to the good people of the county of Welland whom I have the honour to represent. It is also a tribute to the memory of my immediate predecessor as member for that county, the late Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, for many years minister of labour, whose untimely death was a shock to all the people of my county, as I am sure it was to all hon. members of this house. His untiring efforts on behalf of his constituents and the people of Canada generally will long be remembered. It is also a tribute to the medical profession of which I am a member. In this house there have been many distinguished members of that profession, in the past as there are at the present time. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) is a member of my profession, who quite recently received the honorary degree of doctor of laws from his and my alma mater, Queen's university.

In passing I cannot help paying tribute to an old friend and medical confrere, the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Blair). We graduated together from Queen's in medicine; we joined the Royal Canadian Army Medical Corps and spent three years in France. Then we came back and did post-graduate work together in New York. Now, after all these years, we are together again and yet apart, in this Canadian House of Commons.

On one occasion during the first world war it was my privilege to sit in the gallery at Westminster. At that time I heard the first sea lord, the late Sir John Fisher, answer critics of the Royal Navy, while trying to get some estimates passed. He was assisted by such illustrious parliamentarians as the late Right Hon. Bonar Law and the late Sir Arthur Balfour, afterward Lord Balfour. These were household names in the British empire and throughout the world at that time. I was impressed by the democratic processes at work that day. I have always looked upon the mother of parliaments as the ideal in democracy. There a freedom has been developed under which all men are equal, an ideal that has long since taken root wherever Britishers have gone.

Today a tyranny threatens that way of life. Our civilization has reached a point at which the destiny of our country, and perhaps in no small part that of the whole world, may well be in the hands of the hon. members of this house. We pray for courage, for resolution and for divine guidance during this critical period of our history. I feel that our chief consideration here should be for our own survival and the survival of democracy.

In his New Year's message to the Canadian people I heard His Excellency state that he would be pleased to remain in Canada throughout 1951. I am sure I express the sentiments of all hon. members of this house when I say we would be pleased to hear him repeat that message at the beginning of 1952. During the second world war Field Marshal Alexander won our admiration as an outstanding military leader. Since then His Excellency and Lady Alexander have done much travelling in Canada and have endeared themselves to the hearts of the Canadian people.

The counties of Welland and Lincoln are the most easterly in the Niagara peninsula. They are separated from the great empire state of New York by the Niagara river in its entire length. The Welland ship canal, which was built to overcome the rapids and the falls at Niagara, traverses both these counties. The canal connects lake Erie and lake Ontario, and its course runs parallel to the Niagara river at distances of from seven to twelve miles from that river. It can truly be said that in Niagara falls we have one of the natural wonders of the world, and in the Welland ship canal we have one of the man-made wonders of the world.

My home is at Thorold in the northern end of the county. It was here that the Welland ship canal was officially opened in August, 1931, by the late Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, then prime minister of Great Britain. At that time the late Hon. Dr. Manion was minister of railways and canals. In Thorold we say that the steamships climb the mountain, because the height of the whole Niagara escarpment is ascended in a distance of less than one mile.

In the early days industry settled along the canal in order to make use of the water for power purposes and for shipping facilities. Today the water power has been largely replaced by hydroelectric power, but many of the industries have remained and expanded. The Welland ship canal passes through the city of Welland, the county seat, and also the town of Port Colborne, which is situated on the lake Erie entrance to the canal. The county of Welland has two fast-growing cities in the cities of Niagara Falls and Welland. We also have near cities in Fort Erie, Port Colborne, Stamford and Thorold, and our rural areas are densely populated. Without a doubt we have one of the largest ridings by way of population in the Dominion of Canada. There are about 120,000 people in the county, with an electorate of about 70,000.

The earliest settlers consisted mainly of United Empire Loyalists who crossed the Niagara river from 1790 onward to carve out homes in the wilderness. Before them and later, many came from the British isles. Since world war I we have had a great influx of fine people from central and southern Europe. More recently many of our good neighbours from our sister province of Quebec have entered our county. Living as we do in close proximity to the great American cities of Niagara Falls and Buffalo, our people have daily contact with our friends in that country and thereby contribute to a greater mutual understanding between our peoples.

Our agriculture is varied between general farming, fruit farming, market gardening and grape growing. The Fonthill, Fenwick and Stamford areas are very productive and have several nurseries, fruit farms and vineyards.

In Welland county we have one of the most intensely industrialized areas in the Dominion of Canada. Today a $160 million hydroelectric development is getting under way at Niagara falls to add another 500,000 horsepower to the already large production of hydroelectric power in that area. Our county can boast of several steel, pulp and paper, abrasive, chemical and flour milling plants. It has several wineries, a nickel refinery, cement works, aircraft factory, a fertilizer and explosives plant, a plant for the manufacture of farm machinery, as well as a large number of smaller plants. All these industries make Welland an area vital to the welfare of all the people of Canada, both in time of peace and in time of war. In passing, I might mention that the people of the county of Welland subscribed slightly over $159 million in the various war loans.

Finally, our county is a mecca for tourists. Not only is it a gateway into Canada for our cousins from the United States, but the Ontario government maintains the beautiful Niagara parks, which consist of thirty-five miles of magnificent parklands bordering the Niagara river and include many well known and famous gardens, unusual floral displays, ancient fortifications, old battlefields and historic sites of interest and significance to the people of North America. More than one hon. member has admitted to me that he visited Niagara falls on the occasion of the celebration of his leaving the state of bachelorhood.

In the first half of this century, prior to the time of the late Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, Welland was represented by distinguished men in this house. These were the late William Manley German, the late A. B. Damude, the late Evan Fraser, and Mr. George Pettit, K.C., a well-known solicitor and distinguished citizen of the city of Welland.

Since the last meeting of parliament the arbitrator in the railway strike has made his report. The outcome was favourable to labour in that labour obtained most of its demands. This should dispel any idea that there was any unnecessary attempt on the part of the government to interfere with free collective bargaining. The conference between the premiers of our provinces and the federal government was marked in its evidence of good will and cordial relations, which we hope will continue to promote a united Canada. Certain constitutional amendments and tax agreements were submitted to the provinces and, of course, have to be considered by the various provincial governments. If the provinces accept the federal old age security proposal, Canada will have for her aged citizens a program that will stand comparison with any other such program in the world.

Among other items in the forecast of legislation, we are pleased to note that there is one to relieve the difficulties of veterans and their dependents.

We are pleased to note that the President of the United States, in his economic message to the eighty-second congress, again stressed that the United States should start immediately on the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. There was a report from his council of economic advisers which said:

> The project must be begun if imported ore is to become economically available in quantity in our inland steel centres by 1956, when the flow of Mesabi ore will almost certainly have begun to dwindle.

This work will be proceeded with in conjunction with our country when the legislation is finally adopted. When the navigation improvements are completed they will add greatly not only to the economic welfare of our newest province of Newfoundland, with its iron ore, but to many other parts of Canada as well. The power development part of the project will supply areas, particularly in Ontario, that have been short of electric power in recent years, and permit a greater industrial development of those areas.

It is the hope of our government to admit many new, carefully selected people, mostly from western Europe and the United Kingdom. Financial aid will be extended to help pay the fares of many of these people coming both by sea and by air. This tide of new people will strengthen the economy of our country, and they will be a valuable addition to our Canadian working force in helping us meet our obligations in preparation for defence.

Canada is a land of opportunity for these people. In the past many have been freely admitted. I agree that the few who have abused the privileges of citizenship granted them should be subject to further examination, followed by whatever action the government sees fit to take.

As a medical man, I am particularly interested in the health program which the federal government has made possible in recent years. I will enumerate what to my mind are some of the outstanding features of that program.

The national health program announced in May, 1948, was the most outstanding event in Canada's recent health history. In the past two and a half years plans have been made to spend $50 million out of the federal health grants to the provinces. With the assistance of these grants, health services in Canada are reaching new high levels. In all ten provinces careful surveys of existing facilities and services are being undertaken. Badly needed new hospitals and additions have provided 25,000 new beds. In various fields the government has helped to train 3,500 health workers; and staffs have been added to provincial and local health services. Medical research has been greatly advanced by federal grants. Finally, the federal government, through almost 3,000 individual projects, has assisted the provinces to intensify their preventive and treatment programs against such dreaded diseases as cancer, tuberculosis, mental illness, venereal disease and crippling conditions in children. I think this program is really the foundation of a national health scheme.

I am quite aware of the fact that most health measures come directly under provincial jurisdiction; but after practising medicine for over thirty years I realize that one of the main elements in connection with the insecurity of our people is the high cost of hospitalization and the expensive diagnostic, medical and surgical procedures so often necessary without warning. I have often seen life savings wiped out in a few weeks or months of unexpected sickness or accident. I cannot help but express the hope that we shall soon see the day when there will be available to all our people a contributory health plan to meet the cost of major sicknesses and accidents. We have many group plans that are fine so far as they go, but they are either not available or are not easily available to the large majority of our people. The statement of policy adopted by the general council of the Canadian Medical Association on June 14, 1949, reads in part as follows:

> The Canadian Medical Association hopes that the provincial surveys now being conducted will provide information likely to be of value in the elaboration of detailed schemes.
> The Canadian Medical Association will gladly co-operate in the preparation of detailed schemes which have as their object the removal of any barriers which exist between the people and the medical services they need, and which respect the essential principles of the profession.

Canada must immediately take her place in the program of increased rearming for defence, not only for our own security but for the collective security of all free nations. We commend the efforts of our land, sea and air transport forces in the Korean war. We are pleased to note that plans are under way to meet our obligations under the North Atlantic treaty by organizing an integrated force to serve under General Eisenhower in western Europe.

To meet our obligations our government must have adequate authority from parliament in order to proceed with the least possible delay. One of the steps necessary is the creation of a new department to procure defence supplies for ourselves and for our allies. We all realize that our defence program must be integrated with that of our good friend and neighbour, the United States of America. Our defence programs will obviously involve greatly increased spending and therefore an increase in taxes. Increased taxes are never easy to bear, but it will be the duty of hon. members to give consideration to a fair application of these taxes.

At the recent conference of the commonwealth prime ministers in London, our own Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) took an important part. These nine commonwealth leaders, who represent one-quarter of the world's population extending over all continents and oceans, agreed to strengthen their defences and to stand for peace. In order to promote real peace they urged that the wounds of the last war must be healed; that settlements with Germany and Japan should be made with speed; that any feasible arrangements for a frank exchange of views with Russia and China would be welcomed.

We are deeply grateful for the efforts put forth by the commonwealth members, and by our own Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in particular, directed towards obtaining a cessation of hostilities in Korea. They also stated that the peace and prosperity of the free world cannot be assured while millions live in poverty. Contribution on our part towards the Colombo plan is a practical evidence of our government's effort to remove one of the causes of war. Some of us may regard war as inevitable; but a determined and resolute rapidly-arming western world might well be a deterrent. At the same time we must try to achieve an honourable peace, and it is possible that it may only be achieved by the same zeal and energy that we put into our defence program.

Most of the western world has been prosperous. Canada, for instance, has enjoyed the most prosperous year in her history. We produced more, earned more and spent more than ever before. At the same time, in parts of Europe, Asia and Africa, people died of starvation and millions more barely eked out an existence. Here, to my mind, is the real threat to our security; for poverty, disease and want breed wars. So long as these conditions continue to exist, there can be no security for us; for they provide a fertile field for communism. We know that communism is not the answer; but people in dire need do not question the source of aid, however meagre or fraudulent.

If we accept our responsibilities towards the underprivileged people of the world and if we actively try to promote the brotherhood of man, we of the free nations may yet achieve the peace which now seems so far distant. War may not be inevitable unless we so regard it.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to extend congratulations to our Prime Minister, who tomorrow will celebrate his sixty-ninth birthday. Long may he be spared in good health to carry on in his high calling.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, it is a fearful privilege for a new member to be called upon to second the address in reply. I am going through that experience today and I must recognize that the tremor felt by my predecessors, under similar circumstances—as evidenced by Hansard—was not purely academic.

It gives me great pleasure, however, to second the address of my colleague, the new member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), in reply to the speech by His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament.

I wish, at the outset, to thank the Prime Minister and his colleagues for the honour they have bestowed both upon myself and upon the riding of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm in asking me to second the address, and I trust I may be able to perform my task as brilliantly as the hon. member for Welland. May I offer the latter my sincere congratulations both on his speech and on his recent election to parliament. I would like also to take this opportunity to thank my friends from my riding who came here today in such great number to support their new representative in his first endeavour.

In a statement to the press, following the adjournment of the house, the right hon. the Prime Minister used kind words with regard to my election by acclamation on October 3 in the riding of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. I am very pleased to point out that this result is an unequivocal tribute paid by the electors of my riding to the prestige of the right hon. the Prime Minister and to that of the present government as well as to the high reputation of the new leader of the Quebec provincial Liberal party, Mr. Georges-Emile Lapalme, who preceded me in this house.

(Text):

Since last session events have taken place to which I feel I must refer. Among others I wish to recall the appointment of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) to the cease-fire committee of the United Nations. His attitude in the Korean struggle, as it appears from his broadcast delivered at Lake Success on December 5, and from his other statements, conforms in the best possible manner to the general wishes of this country. May I offer my congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs upon the good work he is doing at Lake Success.

May I also extend my best wishes to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) on the occasion of his recent appointment. I am sure that every hon. member will rejoice at the news that the province of Alberta is now represented in the cabinet.

I also offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) who has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport; to the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) who has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare; to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) who has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Resources and Development, and also to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) who has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence.

(Translation):

I also congratulate the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) who has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). My congratulations are also extended to the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) who has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret).

(Text):

I also take this opportunity to express my sympathy to the family of Mr. J. L. Douglas, the ex-member for Queens, and to the family of Mr. J. E. Matthews, the ex-member for Brandon, whose recent deaths have deeply grieved this house.

(Translation):

I cannot let the appointment of my predecessor in this house, Mr. Georges-Emile Lapalme, as leader of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, pass unnoticed. I am happy at this time to pay tribute to Mr. Lapalme and to wish him all the success he deserves in the discharge of his new duties. The new provincial leader's campaigns in the constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, his deep knowledge of politics, his liking for work, his cultural attainments, his intellectual and moral integrity, his energy and his talents marked him out for a leading role in the administration of public affairs in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Lapalme acquired an excellent working knowledge of public affairs during his term of office in Ottawa and his experience as a member of parliament made him conscious of the urgency of social reforms necessary in the province of Quebec. I am confident that his policy of social justice, patterned upon the Liberal doctrine, will have a favourable effect on the trend in the province of Quebec.

Since the adjournment of the house, two dominion-provincial conferences were held, the first in Quebec on September 25 and the second in Ottawa on December 4 last. Their purpose was to discuss means of amending the Canadian constitution and to consider the renewal of tax agreements between governments, as well as problems of social security.

Every member of this house has, I am sure, noted with satisfaction that there is an ever increasing spirit of co-operation between the representatives of the various provinces and of the dominion government.

The mistrust which may have been present at first has given place to a growing desire to co-operate, and to the unanimous will to settle in a friendly manner some of the serious problems in the field of constitutional rights. Even though, so far, discussions dealt mainly with matters of procedure, it is to be hoped that once this important point has been clearly defined, settlement of the others will follow.

The government deserves, of course, to be commended by this house for the manner in which it has dealt with the constitutional problem, both as to form—amendment methods or procedure—and to substance, by placing particular emphasis on the necessity of broadening the scope of social security in this country, while at the same time respecting the autonomy of the provinces.

By thus classifying the constitutional problems, the government has led the way and, in every instance, has helped clear up what misunderstandings may have existed at the time.

Indeed it will be remembered that, in the fall of 1949, at the first session of this parliament, the government introduced its three-point program for constitutional reform:

1. Abolition of appeals to the privy council.

2. Right for the parliament of Canada to amend the constitution with respect to matters coming under its exclusive authority.

3. Consultation with the provinces for possible amendment of those matters involving both authorities.

This classification of the problems to be considered was adopted by the federal-provincial conferences and will probably lead to the settlement of the constitutional problem, by reducing, point by point, the causes of misunderstanding in so far as jurisdiction is concerned.

It may be said that one of the major barriers to constitutional reform has already been removed, for it is the unanimous wish of all the parties to this future agreement to safeguard provincial particularities in the matter of education, of language and of religion. This defence of certain essential rights is, in any event, greatly facilitated by a tradition of liberty and tolerance which is altogether in keeping with our democratic aspirations.

I am convinced that each and every member of this house will agree that Canada must not only have a constitution worthy of its political maturity, but that it must also possess legislative powers that will enable it, from time to time, to adopt, notwithstanding provincial particularities, social laws nationwide in their scope.

While I am on the subject of social security, I believe I may be allowed to state that, to my mind, it is nonsensical that problems of national health, of unemployment, of help to the disabled or the unfortunate of all kinds,—in other words problems of life itself,—should be so hard to solve because of legal difficulties or jurisdictional disputes. Allow me to express the hope that the future Canadian constitution will be flexible enough to enable all parties concerned to adopt, through both federal and provincial legislation, all the appropriate measures to help those who suffer and who, if they received no help, would bring shame on a nation such as ours which has been so greatly favoured by Providence.

During the last federal-provincial conference, held here in Ottawa last December, the representatives of the federal government set out proposals to grant the old age pension, without the means test, to all persons over seventy, and to lower the age limit to sixty-five for the needy, in accordance with the recommendations submitted by the joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on old age security.

The conference delegates deserve congratulations for bringing up this point, which is one of the urgent requirements of the debate on the revision of our constitution, that is the need for enlarging the scope of social security in order that the poor may take better advantage of it.

If I stress the importance of social security, it is because ever since I had the honour of being chosen to represent a riding in the House of Commons, I have met—and all members of this house have surely had the same experience—a great many needy and disabled persons, as well as poor widows and sick people who were unable to pay for medical care.

I am convinced that no man in political life who has his duty at heart would remain unconcerned in the face of such a social evil. Businessmen cannot ignore so distressing a social condition. As for us, who are here to draft bills for the benefit of the Canadian people as a whole, we cannot overlook so important a matter.

I recall these things not because I wish to be critical of what has been done up to now to alleviate suffering in our country. Tracing back the history of our social legislation for the past 30 or 40 years, we find that considerable progress has been made.

The magnificent outline given in Vancouver, on June 12 last, by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), of the work already done, is sufficient indication that politicians have considered the problem and endeavoured to solve it. This interest in social welfare has been reflected, these past few years, in various acts which have increased the amount voted for this purpose by one billion dollars. Indeed, while in 1913 our various governments spent a total of $15 million for social welfare purposes, today the federal and provincial governments are spending more than a billion.

I need not recall that the main architect of social security in our country was the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King.

I need not remind members of this house the attitude of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on this matter. Is he not the one who not long ago most appropriately said:

> We shall not be satisfied until we have attained on a national scale, and with the co-operation of the provincial governments, a degree of social security and human welfare that will ensure to all Canadians the greatest possible measure of social justice.

The numerous social measures to which I have referred may run up against certain constitutional obstacles, and we must admit that they do. It is therefore urgent to amend the texts in a spirit of mutual understanding, so as not to hinder the progress of this legislation.

Among the important events which took place since the adjournment of the last session in September, the last but not least was the Prime Minister's trip to London and Paris from the fourth to the thirteenth of this month. The importance of the matters discussed at the commonwealth conference attracted the attention of the whole country to the events which took place in London and Paris. The marked satisfaction evinced by the press, Canadian, French and English, over the Canadian Prime Minister's recent statements in Paris as well as in London, underlines the democratic peoples' desire to safeguard peace. We still do not know what results these efforts will bring. Whatever is in the offing, however, the Canadian people will recognize, I think, that Canada, while fulfilling her obligations towards her allies in the matter of defence, is doing everything in her power to avert war.

As this new session opens, free countries see one of the gravest hours in history approaching.

Whether we like it or not, our country is bound by the necessity to defend its freedom and its life against the greatest danger the modern world has known.

The alliance of Slavic and Mongolian peoples threatens our civilization with a dreadful menace. It recalls a similar hour which goes back exactly 1,500 years in time, since it was in March of the year 451 of the Christian era that Attila, known as the scourge of God, invaded Gaul and Italy.

The middle ages were never to forget the horrors of this invasion which, though it lasted but a short time, was the most cruel ever experienced in ancient times. A wave of Asiatic barbarians then swept over western civilization, with this difference that, in 1951, the danger is much greater.

For the second time in fifteen centuries, the West is being threatened by the East. The present era is again faced with a threat similar to that which horrified the world of yesteryear. This threat does not arise from the domination of one people by another, but from a conflict between two worlds, from the clash of two civilizations. The opposite poles of communism and of democracy are, on the one hand, ideological atheism and, on the other, belief in God.

Precisely because this is a serious hour, we must be grateful to the leader of the government for judging the international situation with all the calmness it requires. That quality of realism so appreciated in him, in London and in Paris and his suggestion, when many were giving way to fear, that explanations be sought from China about a text he considered equivocal, have raised new hopes for peace and for the possible settlement of the Asian problem.

Even though our Prime Minister is a good ambassador of peace, he still wishes to make this country secure against any possible war.

The speech from the throne reflects this preoccupation on the part of the government. It also announces legislation on federal-provincial fiscal agreements and the pursuance of the government's social security policy by the improvement of the Old Age Pensions Act.

Several security measures will be introduced in this house, with a particular view to speeding up our defence production, thanks to the abundant resources of this country.

I would point out, among other things, the adoption of certain measures that will give the governor in council the extra authority required to ensure adequate defence preparations, in order to face this emergency while preventing the economic disruption they could entail.

The setting up of a Department of Defence Production will help first of all to supply our defence forces and will provide such material aid to our allies as may be met from Canadian production.

This program of legislation is the answer to the communist ideology and to the attempts of Russia to gain world domination. If the leaders of the Moscow regime are trying to scare the world by centralizing all the resources of the countries under their domination, it is necessary that all free countries, without abandoning peace negotiations, pool their resources, create material and moral unity and combine their resistance efforts in the defence of liberty.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 4.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 1, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

DIPLOMATIC INSTRUMENTS

CANADA TREATY SERIES—AGREEMENTS, EXCHANGE OF NOTES, ETC.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table twenty-seven documents, which are agreements, exchanges of notes and other diplomatic instruments published in the Canada treaty series. Perhaps the list might appear in Votes and Proceedings, unless hon. members wish me to read it now. It is rather long.

STATUTORY HOLIDAYS

PROPOSED OBSERVANCE OF DOMINION DAY AND VICTORIA DAY ON MONDAYS FOLLOWING JUNE 30 AND MAY 23

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Dominion Day Act and the Victoria Day Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. MacDougall: Very little explanation is required on the introduction of this bill. No money is involved, naturally; otherwise I should not be able to introduce it. That, however, is not the main feature. The principal aim of the bill is that the ordinary man, with his wife and family, may have a better opportunity to celebrate statutory holidays by having those statutory holidays observed at the beginning of the week, wherever possible, rather than in the middle of the week, if and when they occur on such days. It is very easy for a man of affluence to take his holidays, either in Canada or abroad, at any time of the year that may suit him, but for the people generally, whom we all represent here, in my opinion it would be a distinct advantage to have this bill go through.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES—DISSEMINATION OF SUBVERSIVE PROPAGANDA

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to amend the Criminal Code (subversive activities.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. LaCroix: The purpose of this bill is to make it a criminal offence for any person to participate in subversive activities with a view to establishing in Canada a totalitarian dictatorship contrary to our democratic way of life.

Following numerous demands from other members and myself, according to the speech from the throne the government has decided to present a bill with an objective which may be similar. If that is done, of course, I much prefer that the government itself go through with it, in which event I might later withdraw my bill. Certainly I would favour deporting to Russia all the communists we have in Canada, in order to give them the opportunity of seeing for themselves what is going on over there.

Mr. Speaker: May I take this opportunity to point out that when an hon. member introducing a bill is asked to explain it, he should merely explain the provisions of the bill. He should not discuss the merits of the bill nor advance reasons why it should be supported.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISITORS IN GALLERY—PRINCIPAL, TEACHERS AND STUDENTS OF ST. CATHARINES COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. P. Cavers (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, hon. members of this house no doubt will be interested to learn that Principal Gordon E. Price, of the St. Catharines collegiate institute and vocational schools, five members of his teaching staff and one hundred students of that institution are in the galleries of this chamber today.

Under the auspices of Mr. Price, for the past few months a series of non-partisan addresses on various public matters have been delivered to the students of this school. On October 26 last the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke to those students. Last month the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell) addressed the student body, and I am informed that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) will speak there this month.

Today, in order to further their interest in citizenship, these students are attending in the galleries of this chamber. The visit is made also in appreciation of the fact that the leaders of the three major political parties have come or are to come to their school. Further, they wish by their presence to extend felicitations to the Prime Minister on the anniversary of his birthday, which he is celebrating today. We feel that visits of this kind do much to further an interest in public affairs on the part of the students of our collegiate institute, and that they in turn will be better citizens as a result of having attended here and having heard the leaders of the political parties in this country. We hope other cities will follow the lead of St. Catharines in carrying on activities of this kind.

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS

THE PRIME MINISTER—EXPRESSION OF GOOD WISHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to extend to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) our very best wishes on this, his birthday. I can assure him that whatever differences we may have in regard to the particular problems of the day in no way affect our sincerity when we say many happy returns.

BUTTER

INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF BAN ON IMPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce; since the Minister of Agriculture is not here I will direct it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On January 24, I believe it was, an order in council was passed requiring Canadian importers of butter to obtain permits before importing that product into Canada. It is my understanding that the order in council has been rescinded. Is that correct, and if so, what is the explanation for it?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the statement is correct. The order in council was passed and later rescinded. It was passed because it was believed that imports of butter substantially in excess of amounts required by the Canadian economy were contemplated. The order in council was cancelled when it was found there was no possibility of those imports being made in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Charlton: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is it not true a considerable amount of butter has been imported into this country since the first of the year? How much butter has been imported, and from what countries?

Mr. Howe: Without consulting my officers, I think I can give the information. There is a certain quantity of butter en route to Canada from New Zealand, amounting to approximately 2·5 million pounds, which is about two and a half days' supply for Canada. No other imports are contemplated.

TRANSPORT

CANADA-AUSTRALIA-NEW ZEALAND—QUESTION AS TO STEAMSHIP AND AIR SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. West coast press dispatches today indicate that during the visit of the Prime Minister of New Zealand in Ottawa earlier in the week there were discussions about continuation of shipping services by the Aorangi between Canada, New Zealand and Australia, as well as about landing rights for Canadian planes in New Zealand. Will the minister give the house a statement as to the possibility of early action on these two questions?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The Prime Minister of New Zealand did discuss, with some of my colleagues and myself, the two matters to which reference has just been made. So far as landing rights for Canadian Pacific Air Lines in New Zealand are concerned, it was requested on behalf of the Canadian government that C. P. A. be given stop-over rights in New Zealand. I am happy to say that the Prime Minister took a sympathetic and kindly view towards this request, and promised to discuss it with his cabinet colleagues.

With reference to the steamship subsidy for the Aorangi, I should like to be able to discuss this matter with my colleagues before making a statement.

PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

QUESTION AS TO DISBANDING OF PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Finance say whether the government is continuing, in view of recent price trends in Canada, its policy of disbanding the personnel of the wartime prices and trade board?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): The answer to the hon. member's question as put is in the affirmative; but perhaps I should add a word of explanation. As the house is aware, the powers of the wartime prices and trade board are derived from the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, and as such are subject to severe limitations. Control cannot be reimposed upon any article from which it has been removed. As indicated in the speech from the throne, the government is going to ask parliament to adopt special emergency legislation, and the controls which may be necessary in the future would, I assume, be imposed under that act.

At the moment the personnel of the wartime prices and trade board is down to skeleton proportions, and it is intended to proceed with the policy of disbanding the staff of the board.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Yesterday the Prime Minister tabled correspondence exchanged between the government and the premiers of several of the provinces with respect to suggestions for constitutional amendments. In connection with a similar matter last year the Prime Minister proposed to the house that the documents should be printed in Hansard. Will he, in view of the importance of these documents, propose a similar course in this instance, for the information of members?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): If it is the desire of members to have the correspondence printed as an appendix to Hansard, I think it might be in order for Your Honour so to direct.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the correspondence referred to be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(For text of correspondence, see appendix, pages 43 to 47.)

LABOUR CONDITIONS

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—HOTEL AND WATER TRANSPORT WORKERS—APPLICABILITY OF KELLOCK AWARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Has he received representations asking that the Kellock award be made applicable to hotel and water transport workers in the same way as to railway workers, as was believed to be the intention of parliament when the matter was dealt with last session? Can the Prime Minister say what consideration has been given to any such representations?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The leaders of the labour unions called upon me some time ago—I am not quite sure about the date, but it was after the award was made public—and requested that something be done about the fact that in the award there was a difference between the treatment of the employees in railway service and that accorded to those retained for hotel or water transportation services. My reply was that the government had carried out the terms of the legislation enacted by parliament; that it was not the intention of the government to ask parliament for any further legislation in that regard, and that without further legislation the award of the arbitrator would have to stand.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I first extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of this motion. They performed in a commendable manner the duty imposed upon them, and I am sure the manner in which they discharged that duty was such as to meet with acceptance on the part of members on both sides of the house.

We meet today at one of the most solemn hours in Canadian history. The immense gravity of the situation is not measured only by those military events which have impressed upon us the urgent need for building the ramparts of freedom with the utmost speed. Equally serious are the misunderstandings which have arisen among many of the nations which are partners in the common cause of saving freedom itself. Never was there more confusion of thought and uncertainty about the future. The remarkable scientific achievements which carry words and pictures instantly to every part of the world seem only to have added to that confusion.

At such a time, no voice, however humble, should add to that confusion and misunderstanding in any way which can be avoided. The supreme task confronting the free world is to restore with the utmost speed that measure of mutual confidence and good will upon which the effective co-operation of all the free nations must at all times depend. For us it is of the utmost importance that there be the most complete understanding and co-operation between Canada, Great Britain and the United States. To a very considerable extent the defence planning of the whole free world depends upon the closest possible integration of the efforts of these three nations.

Never did the friendly partnership of the British commonwealth mean more to us than it does in these extremely critical days. In addition to all its previous traditions and continuing strength, it stands as an example and demonstration to the whole world that sovereign nations can work together in the closest harmony with no stronger bond than a great and abiding belief in the value of that friendship. For us the starting point of all that co-operation is Great Britain, and for that reason geography has decided that we are not only destined to live side by side with the United States, but that we are also the contact point between the United States, Great Britain and the whole of the commonwealth, which by the complete freedom of its association has a great and impressive role to play in encouraging that close friendship and understanding among all nations which we now know so well to be the only hope of a firm and lasting peace.

It is equally imperative that we have the most effective and closest understanding between our own country and the United States. Although our population is relatively small, and although their vast productive power and national strength have made them the sheet anchor for the whole free world, we are in many ways their most important partner, because of the resources with which this very fortunate land has been endowed. For the sake of our own future and the wider partnership of all free nations, it is of primary importance that Canada make no move in the international field which might lead to any misunderstanding between these two nations, which stand before the whole world as a bright example of what international friendship can really be between nations lying side by side.

In saying this I am not suggesting that we should blindly follow either Great Britain or the United States. On the contrary I assert with the utmost emphasis my own belief that Canada should at all times have a distinctly Canadian policy which would have as its first and most compelling influence the future growth, prosperity and development of Canada itself. But at this time it seems to me that while we must at all times protect our own future and our own independence, we have no choice but to recognize the fact that, with a population which is less than one-tenth that of the United States and very much less than that of Britain, there are obvious reasons why the responsibility of international leadership falls mainly upon them, and why it is so important that we should at all times maintain the closest and most intimate relationships with them.

I do not intend to say any more at this time about international affairs, because I think we should first have from the government a statement which will review the events of the past few weeks and indicate the course which the government proposes to follow. In the speech from the throne the references to international affairs are in such general terms that they offer little help in considering this subject at the moment. For the reasons I have already indicated, I shall reserve my comments on the policies of the government in relation to external affairs until we have received the information which the Prime Minister has told us will be placed before us before the end of the week.

A careful examination of the speech from the throne offers little assistance in reaching a conclusion as to what the government really intends to do. The best evidence of this is the extent to which there is already widespread speculation in the press and elsewhere as to the interpretation of different phrases in that speech. We all agree that there is increased danger, as the speech tells us. We all knew that; it would be hard for anybody to escape that knowledge. We also knew that the Royal Canadian Navy and the Royal Canadian Air Force were carrying out certain duties in Korea, and that one battalion of the Canadian Army special force had arrived there for further training. We had also learned, with great satisfaction, of the appointment of General Eisenhower as the supreme commander of the integrated European forces. We also knew that the government had indicated on a number of occasions its willingness to proceed with the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway in co-operation with the appropriate authorities in the United States. The press and the radio had carried extensive reports about the setting up of a new department of defence production, and also about the intention to extend the powers of the government to deal with defence and economic problems. There is also reference to appropriate amendments to legislation affecting the members of the armed forces, which it was obvious would be required. Beyond that there is nothing new except the vague reference to withdrawing the rights of citizenship from those who have been disloyal to Canada. This hardly seems to be an effective way of dealing with disloyalty of the kind which would appear to be contemplated by that reference.

Surely there can never have been a less revealing speech from the throne than that which is now before us. While the word "emergency" is used, there is no sense of that urgency which is in keeping with the nature of the emergency with which we are confronted.

Except for the statement that the government will seek additional powers by order in council to "ensure adequate defence preparations . . . and to prevent economic dislocation," there is nothing whatever which tells us what the government really intends to do. We may have had some hint from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) this afternoon when he suggested that if controls were to come they would be dealt with under this power which the government will seek and to which this statement refers. My own impression was that the government had taken adequate powers for that purpose last September—powers which it has failed to exercise.

We all recognize that in the speech from the throne it is not intended to go into extensive detail as to legislation or as to other action that the government will take. It should, however, lay before us a clear indication of the course the government intends to follow in relation to those subjects which are of major concern. At a time when the members of this house and the people of Canada should know exactly what the government intends to do, we have before us a government statement skilfully drafted to give the appearance of recognizing the issues which are before us, while at the same time carefully withholding from us any real information as to what steps are to be taken to assure our survival as a free nation.

It was for that reason that I suggested in a letter to the Prime Minister yesterday that we should adopt the practice which has proved so satisfactory in the British House of Commons. I urged that there should be separate debates on external affairs, national defence, and the cost of living, so that we might receive statements from the government as to what they propose to do and might have an opportunity to present suggestions in an orderly way in relation to those particular subjects. Had this suggestion been acted upon we would all have known something about the plans of the government before proceeding with this debate. May I say that I for one have no desire to see an interruption of this debate. At this extremely critical time, when w are debating our approval or otherwise of the program of the government, we should have some idea of what the government actually intends to do. The vote on the motion to approve the speech from the throne is interpreted as a vote supporting the general proposals of the government for the session. That is why it is taken as the major test of confidence that the government faces in this and any similar parliament. The speech from the throne gives us no real information on which it would be possible to say whether those proposals are satisfactory or otherwise. The introduction into this debate by the various ministers of statements which cover such a wide field is not, I believe, a satisfactory way to lay a foundation for constructive discussion of issues upon the determination of which to a considerable degree our whole future will depend. Without that information it is impossible to discuss details at a time when all of us are anxious to come to grips with reality.

The chilling truth is that never since our civilization emerged from the dark ages has that civilization—and even freedom itself—been so gravely threatened with extinction as it is at this very hour. The people of Canada have never shown themselves unwilling to face reality, but they must be given that leadership which only a government, with all its channels of secret information and its large staffs of technical experts, is in a position to give. Individuals may express their opinions. In the end, however, there is naturally a tendency to think that the government, with its special sources of information in regard to international and domestic affairs, particularly in critical times such as these, is in a position to pass judgment upon the best available information—which may not be available to others who are expressing opinions which may be regarded as sincere but not completely informed.

The people of Canada are waiting to be told, in clear and challenging terms, the extent and nature of their duties. They will not fail to respond to a clear call to duty and an appeal to that spirit of service which has built a strong and vigorous young nation within so short a time.

I fully recognize the heavy responsibilities and burdens which the government carries at this time, as does every other free government which must be subjected to the ordinary tests of democratic discussion, criticism and exchange of ideas. In all that will advance the national interest the government will receive our full support, and I am confident it will receive the support of all hon. members where the issues are plain and where it is abundantly clear that what is proposed is for the continuing advantage of Canada in these very difficult days.

I sympathize with all my heart with the sentiments of the Prime Minister when he expresses his hope of peace. I greatly doubt, however, whether the firm resolve and spirit of sacrifice which is so greatly needed in this country at this time will be aroused by statements that we are talking too much about war and that he is still confident that there will be peace for his lifetime. I hope there will. But the people need to be told the full extent of the dreadful danger with which we are confronted. There is war—cruel, bloody and relentless war. There is a war which has already cost the United States more than 55,000 casualties in seven months. There is war which has brought to a whole nation of freedom-loving people destruction and atrocities of a kind that is not pleasant to contemplate. The people of Korea know what war means, and why all free nations today must take the steps that are necessary to halt aggression.

I am well aware that in making these statements the Prime Minister was referring to a general war. I share with him the hope that a general war can be avoided, and, with him, I believe that a general war still can be avoided if the free nations build up their strength with the speed and on the scale of which free men and women are capable when fully aroused to the urgency of the demands upon their efforts.

When I referred to the Prime Minister's emphasis on peace I was referring to it in its relationship to other statements. I do not think that the Prime Minister has helped to impress upon our young people the real nature of the threat we face, when great prominence is given in the press and over the radio to his opinion that the odds against war are fifty to one. I should like to think they are, but I do not believe they are, and I do not think any thoughtful person would give odds of that kind at this time. Young men and women are hardly encouraged to sacrifice their present jobs if they think the odds against war are as great as that. If free men and women everywhere put their whole heart into the tasks before them, with that compelling sense of danger which the facts demand, I am as hopeful as anyone can be that the United Nations may still become an effective instrument for dealing with aggression, and that a general war may still be avoided. But the odds against such a war are not too great, and they will rapidly diminish if the men in the Kremlin have any reason to believe that the free nations are failing to make full use of their immense productive capacity and skill and the driving power of which only free men and women are capable.

It is perhaps worthy of passing comment that Lloyd's never did bet fifty to one against the possibility of war. As I understand it, they entered into one of their ordinary contracts on the basis of fifty to one that a philatelic exhibition, which has been arranged in Toronto for next September, will not be prevented from meeting because of war. That is a very different thing. Contracts of that kind were taken out during the course of the last world war. In any event I do not think it helps to create that sense of compelling urgency which is so necessary at this time, when the Prime Minister, with the great prestige of his high office and his recognized sources of secret information, interprets his impression of the dangers we face in the terms of betting odds at Lloyd's.

I am not suggesting that the Prime Minister should seek to spread any atmosphere of gloom. On the contrary I hope that he will do all in his power to spread a spirit of confidence, which can only be justified and will only have some real foundation when a clarion call goes forth to the people of Canada that we are now engaged in a struggle for nothing less than the survival of our decent way of life, and that even the most remote possibility of defeat carries with it consequences too terrible for anyone to contemplate.

It is only when we are united in all our strength and vigour, with knowledge of the facts and faith in our cause, that we can have any reason for confidence. Then we can go forward with our heads erect and with light hearts, knowing that no matter what happens we shall have done our best.

I am well aware that because of their population the United States and Great Britain will play the leading role in guiding the course of military preparations. To a considerable extent we must accept the reality that we have no choice but to adjust our plans substantially to theirs. But the way in which we carry out our own part in that collective effort must be exclusively our own decision. Do not let us hear that we are being told by anyone else how we should do those jobs which are our own responsibility. What we do, and the way we do it, will have the most profound effect, not only upon our contribution to the joint defence of freedom, but upon the whole future of our country.

I propose, therefore, to deal with those two subjects which are exclusively within our own control and for which the parliament of Canada must assume full responsibility. National defence, and all the economic and financial consequences of the expenditures on defence, are the two most important subjects that will engage the attention of the members of this house during the present session.

I will refer first to national defence. On no single subject of importance is the Canadian public less accurately informed. On no single question is it so necessary that the public be fully informed, subject only to the strict demands of secrecy—and the real demands of secrecy cover a very limited part of our defence preparations.

We must examine defence not only from the point of view of the effectiveness of the defence forces themselves, both from the point of view of training and equipment, but we must also insist upon such detail as will make it possible for us to be sure that the huge sums of money which are to be spent on defence are to be spent in the best possible way.

It now appears that Canada is likely to spend as much in the year 1951 for national defence as was spent in the whole five years following the last world war.

I am sure there will be no tendency on the part of the members of this house to limit any expenditures that are actually necessary; but when it is probable that we shall be called upon to approve expenditures in excess of one and a half billion dollars in a single year, a duty is imposed upon every member in every part of this house to insist that we have the most complete information, and that we know that every dollar is being spent for the best possible purpose and that it will produce the greatest possible results at the earliest possible time.

Although the government had never been stinted by parliament in the money it asked for preparation for defence, the people of Canada learned with amazement and dismay last year, when the attack came on Korea, that we had no land forces ready to go into action. With all the millions that have been spent since that time, there is very great uncertainty that we have more than a very small number who are ready to go into action yet.

Many alarming details have come to light within the past few weeks. It was with astonishment that those who were aware of our shortage of weapons learned that a government arsenal, which could have been making modern weapons, was making shotguns to be sold for sporting purposes. It was with equal astonishment that we learned it was necessary to send Canadian forces to the United States to train, although we have been spending so much money on the many large military camps across Canada. But details of that kind are in themselves not nearly so alarming as the statement issued a few weeks ago by the conference of defence associations.

To appreciate the importance of their statement, we must recall that this annual conference of the defence associations brings together senior officers appointed by each of the military associations which represent all the different services of the Canadian army. These are the men who are actually serving in our reserve forces. These are the men who are in close contact with our permanent forces as well. These are the men who are largely responsible for interpreting the opinion of those who are in uniform. That conference represents the highest possible authority in regard to the actual state of training of our reserve forces, upon which the land defence of Canada or our participation in any collective plan must still in the main depend.

Recognizing the special position they occupy, and the absolute impartiality of the views they express, let me quote from the statement presented to the government less than a month ago by the conference of defence associations:

> We feel Canadians are prepared to pay such taxes in view of the issues involved, but we do not feel that Canadians are prepared to see moneys wasted. It is our considered and unanimous opinion that proper value is not being received for much of the public moneys now being spent on the reserve force.
> In spite of the existing shortages of facilities for the reserve force, in many places the strength of units does not absorb present facilities for training by a substantial margin. Far more men could be trained in the reserve force than are presently coming forward.
> The turnover of other ranks is such that the vast majority of men who appear from time to time on the nominal rolls of reserve force units receive no training worthy of the name. They do not stay with the unit long enough. To say that the reserve force is 40,000 strong, and to give the Canadian people the idea that it has 40,000 men who could quickly be ready for action, is a travesty of the facts. There are few, if any, reserve units in Canada that could be ready to function in action under a minimum period of six months. This includes AA—
> Anti-aircraft.
> —and other such units which should be ready for immediate action. The Canadian public, in spite of the moneys spent, cannot look to effective and efficient protection from internal sabotage or external aggression from its reserve force for a considerable period after war breaks out, and the active force is far too small to undertake the full burden of such duties.

That is the end of an extremely significant and illuminating quotation from the presentation made to the government by the conference of defence associations. Let me repeat that those who attended were all senior officers—officers appointed by the Canadian Infantry Association, the Canadian Artillery

Association and other organizations representing various branches of the army. These men not only serve with the reserve forces, but are also in constant contact with the active forces.

Surely at a time like this, recognizing the special qualifications of those who presented this report, not one of us has any right to ignore the full significance of the statement that some of the assurances we have been receiving are a travesty of the facts.

It is our duty to have the facts. We are not getting them. As representatives of the people of Canada, in these extremely critical times we have no right to accept anything less than the facts. We have no right to accept bland assurances that our defence forces are being fully manned, when we have before us the unqualified statement from those who know best that they are not, and that statements in regard to the strength of our reserve forces are a travesty of the facts.

We have repeatedly urged in the past that a special committee of the house be set up to consider national defence and to obtain the facts. We have no thought, and never have had any thought, that such a committee would supplant the responsibility of the government. A similar committee set up to deal with external affairs has never been charged with usurping that authority. And, after all, the Secretary of State for External Affairs deals with secret information, just as does the Minister of National Defence. At a time when national defence is the most important subject before us, we are told by a body of officers, whose words cannot be challenged, that some very important assurances are only a travesty of the facts. For that reason and for the many other obvious reasons why such a committee is desirable at this time, I do urge upon the Prime Minister that he assure us this afternoon that a committee on national defence will be set up immediately, so that the members of the House of Commons may be sure that defence preparations are proceeding with the utmost possible speed. In the face of a statement of this kind by those who know best, I submit that we have no right to accept the broad generalities of ministerial statements which we have been forced to accept in the past by majority votes in this house.

Now let me turn to the financial consequences of the expenditures on defence. What we have already spent is only a fraction of what we are going to be asked to spend. Nevertheless the people of this country are already feeling the serious consequences of this dislocation of our normal free economy. The cost of living continues to mount, and inflation is threatening the savings of our people as those savings have not been threatened at any previous time in the life of any one of us. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate what measures the government intends to adopt. Different expectations have been drawn from the very general terms used, and other expectations will be aroused by the comments made by the Minister of Finance this afternoon. This very uncertainty in itself is contributing tremendously to the rapidly mounting spiral of inflation in this country.

When we met last September the government took the widest possible powers to deal with this situation. It was pointed out that those powers were required to deal with the possible consequences of the efforts which were going to be made. The government has failed to exercise those powers. The very obvious fact, however, that people have come to expect controls of various kinds, with resulting shortages of various products, has in itself driven up prices by an artificial demand created by the uncertainty as to what will be available in the months ahead.

We all know that a very large contributing factor to inflation is a buying demand which absorbs available supplies and creates a shortage which encourages buyers to pay more than should be paid. The government is directly responsible for this artificial buying demand. From the day it obtained special powers last September there has been constant reference to controls of different kinds, which has in turn created the impression that sooner or later there will be such controls. I most earnestly impress upon the Prime Minister the desirability of a statement which will remove the uncertainty on this very important subject. I hope he will tell us this afternoon whether it is the intention of the government to introduce a plan of controls, as was hinted by the Minister of Finance this afternoon, and if so, what the nature and extent of those controls will be. If this is not done, the uncertainty which everyone knows is a very real factor in the present inflationary spiral will continue until the government has made its position clear one way or the other.

There are other ways in which the government is contributing to inflation. In spite of the statements which have been made, the government has not yet taken effective steps to cut down its expenditures on non-defence requirements. It has not yet taken the anti-inflationary action which it can take in its financial operations. It has greatly reduced available supplies of many kinds through large purchases for the Department of National Defence and defence production, without doing anything to restrain the consequences of that artificial pressure upon the remaining supplies of the same kind still available to the public.

One of the most important steps in checking inflation undoubtedly is the elimination of all unnecessary non-defence expenditure. We have urged before, and I urge again, that a royal commission be appointed, or a special committee with similar powers, for the purpose of going fully into the cost of government, with the idea of reducing all non-essential expenditure. I hope we shall not be told that such an inquiry cannot be conducted, or that it would not be effective. Such a commission did produce positive results in the United States. I am certain that we are not so different from them, and that the normal human frailties are not so remote from us, that a similar inquiry would not produce equally positive results here. I urge the Prime Minister to assure us that he will agree to the appointment of such a commission or committee. The findings of such an inquiry would be of great assistance to him and to the government generally at a time when such assistance is so greatly needed.

High though wages in Canada may be, the cost of living has already risen so high that our people are finding it most difficult to make ends meet. When we realize that taxes necessary to produce the money for national defence will have their impact upon every family, whether in the form of income taxes or other levies, the necessity for dealing promptly and effectively with this situation becomes increasingly urgent.

I wish to emphasize once again the very critical situation which is resulting from the steadily lessening value of our dollar. As inflation reduces its real value, now at a point little more than half what it was ten years ago, the consequences for those living on pensions, annuities of various kinds, or small fixed incomes, is truly heartbreaking. Inflation of this kind not only reduces the living standard of all those affected in this way, but tends to destroy confidence in the very system we are doing so much to preserve. It tends to raise questions about insurance, bank deposits and the savings which have been the very foundation of that measure of personal security which can be established by the initiative of our people.

Until we know what the government intends to do in the matter of national defence and the other problems before us, it is not possible to discuss this subject in further detail. I urge the Prime Minister to let us know what they have in mind, so that the doubts and uncertainties which are in themselves creating inflation may be stopped, for the purpose of giving some measure of confidence to those who are already in such great distress.

There is another aspect of this world struggle between the Soviet empire and the free nations which I think requires constant and the strongest possible emphasis. We are told, and with great truth, that poverty and low standards of living are in themselves an encouragement to communism. Most certainly it is part of this struggle to help in every way we can to build up the living standards and the social consciousness of those nations which need our help so much. I am confident that members of this house will support all practical measures which will bring hope and encouragement to those who are in such great distress in so many parts of the world.

There is more to this struggle, however, and particularly in the more prosperous nations, than the material advantages which life can offer. If democracy has nothing better to offer than a higher material standard of living, then it would seem that if tyranny, whether it be communism or otherwise, can offer equally high material advantages in any country, it will lose some of the apparent dangers associated with it, and the arguments against communism will lose some of their strength.

I am sure we all believe that freedom itself gives vigour to life and an encouragement to personal initiative which makes it an infinitely more efficient way of life than any form of tyranny can ever be. But we are trying to do something more than raise the material living standards of our people, important though that is to all of them. The fundamental difference between communism and our way of life is that our form of democracy is based upon religion and the equality of every human being before God. Once we disregard that concept of our society we disregard the great driving power which revived democracy out of the darkness of the middle ages, and which has given to our laws and to our standards of life those ethical principles which have made democracy the highest form of government known to mankind.

If there is one lesson which it seems to me we should have learned from the events of the past two months, it is this. The communist forces in Korea have shown themselves to be no dull, downtrodden slaves. On the contrary, every report from Korea speaks of the fanaticism with which they have fought. Granted they have been driven into battle under the threat of death, and that they have been given no choice but to fight, the fact remains that in the minds of all too many of them there is a real faith in the cruel, godless religion which has its centre in Moscow. Young people brought up under that regime, and under the other communist regimes, with no knowledge of the outside world and no understanding of how we live, are easy victims of communist propaganda that their way of life is best and that the people of the free world, whom they have never seen and with whom they have never had any real contact, are in fact living in fear and poverty.

It would be well for us to examine the pattern of communist leadership and the pattern of what they are teaching their young people. It would be well for us to try to understand what it is that inspires to such fanatical efforts so many of those young people who have been brought up under communist rule. They do not praise their system because it gives them more material advantages. They praise it because they believe it is leading them to victory. They praise it because they believe it is leading to the Soviet domination of the whole world. In the last great annual parade of armed forces across Red square, when the tanks were roaring across that parade ground in Moscow, the radio commentators, describing to their own people the power and glory of Soviet arms, burst into these ecstatic words:

> Spring has come. It has come here; it has come in China, in the new streets of Warsaw, in Prague, in the gardens of Bucharest, in the villages of Bulgaria. The banner of victory flies over us. The spring of humanity is with us. It is nearing the workers' suburbs of Paris; it is marching like a master upon the piazzas of Rome. In Calcutta, Karachi and Bombay, it sings of freedom. Our Stalin, whose hand guides the spring of humanity, is leading us to victory.

Those are stirring words to people who hear little else and have no chance to learn what our way of life means to us. This appeal to victory is the psychological appeal they are now employing with such effect, particularly in a country such as Russia, where during their entire lives the younger generation have known nothing else. Those who remember seeing demonstrations of nazi power in the years before the last war will remember the almost hypnotic effect when great masses of German people shouted together at the top of their voices, "Sieg Heil." "Hail Victory" they were shouting, in the firm belief that victory would soon be within their grasp. That was a very considerable part of the driving power that made the nazis so effective in the early days of the last world war, and that same psychological appeal is going out today to the youth of Russia and other communist countries. It goes out to those who have had withheld from them what freedom really means.

To meet this threat, not only of Soviet arms and manpower but also of Soviet propaganda, we must create in our own country and in the other free nations a still greater and more dynamic faith in a system which has everything to offer, both in this life and afterward. We too must create an abiding faith in victory, faith that the spirit of free peoples, joined in a great world partnership, can still preserve peace and those decent ideals which religion alone can give. The future of Canada and of every other country depends upon the character of its people. We must build that character in every way we can—in our homes, our churches and our schools; and we can do much here in parliament to advance this great cause.

In all earnestness I urge the government to give the people that faith and confidence which will come to them when they believe they are being given all the facts and are asked to share not only the responsibility but the knowledge the government has of the tasks before us. I urge the government to appeal to our people not merely to accept in a spirit of painful necessity the things they will be asked to do, but to accept what may be required of them as service in the greatest cause that has ever presented a challenge to free men and women in the long history of mankind. I urge the government in all earnestness to appeal to the highest motives of our people. Give them a clarion call to service. I am sure they will respond.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon):

> That the following words be added to the address: "We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed
> (1) to give this nation leadership in the face of the present grave danger; and
> (2) to bring into being forces necessary to enable Canada to defend itself and discharge its international obligations; and
> (3) to take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living."

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and in fact all my colleagues in the house for the good wishes they have expressed to me on the occasion of this, my birthday; though, like many others, the number of birthdays now is almost something to cause a little misgiving.

I should like also to join the leader of the opposition in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think a special word of congratulation is due them because, as newly elected members, they have delivered their maiden speeches. To speak for the first time in this house is a pretty trying experience under any circumstances. When such an event takes place upon one's arrival, after most of his colleagues have been here for a few sessions, the difficulties become even more serious. I am sure, however, that we are proud, and that the constituents of the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address are also proud, of the manner in which they acquitted themselves. They spoke with distinction and impressiveness, and they made constructive suggestions. I think it will be an advantage for us to hear from them quite frequently in the course of our debates.

The hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) has already served his country well. After graduating from Queen's university as a gold medallist in medicine, he spent three years overseas with his colleague, the hon. member for Lanark, to whom he referred in such gracious terms yesterday, in the Canadian army medical corps during world war I. Since 1920, following a year of medical work in New York, he has practised medicine at Thorold. He has been president of the Lincoln county medical association, and a member of the board of governors of the St. Catharines general hospital where he is now assistant chief surgeon and vice-chairman of the staff. His recent election to parliament was not the first time the hon. gentleman had been elected to public office. As mayor, and as a member of the public utilities commission of Thorold, he had already established for himself a reputation for service in public affairs. I am sure that his professional knowledge and practical experience will be of value to us in the consideration of many of the problems with which we shall have to deal in this house.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) is one of the younger members of the house, but those of us who were able to follow him in both languages heard, I think it is fair to say, an address of real merit. After completing his studies at the university of Montreal, the hon. member was admitted to the bar in 1932. He has since practised his profession in Joliette. He comes to the House of Commons with a sound reputation arising out of his achievements at the bar. I think we would all wish to say to him that he has added to that reputation by the manner in which he seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I believe it is fair to say that the achievements of both these hon. members will serve as a fine introduction to the consideration and discussion of the many questions with which we shall have to deal during the session. Their speeches were highly gratifying to us in their demonstration of the ability which these newly elected members have brought to parliament. I should like to extend to them very sincere congratulations.

As the house is aware, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is with us because his predecessor was chosen as a party leader in the provincial field. More recently another hon. member has been similarly honoured. I am sure all of us, regardless of party, will join in personal congratulations to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Thomson). This practice of moving from one field to the other is not new. In one of the provinces both the premier and the leader of the opposition went from this house to the positions they now occupy. While there is much to be gained by keeping federal and provincial politics apart, I do not believe any of us really complain about these federal-provincial interchanges, particularly since the traffic has not been all one way. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had been premiers of their provinces. The leader of the opposition had been the premier of the great province of Ontario before coming to this house. The premier of one of the maritime provinces came from the premiership to this house, and later went back to the premiership of his province. I believe these exchanges show that Canadians who have the ability and the will to serve their fellow citizens are willing to serve them in any capacity in which their fellow citizens think they will be of use to the community.

Mr. Speaker, the leader of the opposition has complained that the speech from the throne is not very revealing. I noticed while the hon. gentleman was speaking that there were three of the important announcements in the speech from the throne that did not seem to have caught his attention, or to which at least he did not see fit to refer in his criticism. One was the announcement that we are to be asked early in the session to authorize Canadian participation in the integrated force being organized under the North Atlantic treaty. The next was the announcement that we are to be asked to approve substantially increased expenditures for defence. The third, which is of importance and which bears upon one of the matters discussed by the leader of the opposition, was the announcement that our approval would be sought for appropriate Canadian participation in the Colombo plan, and in technical assistance to the underdeveloped areas. These are matters of some consequence, and I believe they indicate the manner in which the government intends to recommend to this house that the gravity of the present situation should be recognized.

I must admit that the leader of the opposition was quite fair in his reference to the rather glib remark I made on one occasion at a press conference that there had been issued a policy by Lloyd's against the probability of an international meeting in Toronto, planned for next September, being interfered with by war. He did suggest in his remarks that he did not think it was any choice of mine that so much had been made of it in the newspapers and over the radio. Hon. members know that my considered views about the world situation were expressed in the new year's message which was recorded for broadcasting to the people of Canada before I left on December 31 to attend the meeting of the commonwealth prime ministers in London.

My considered views were there expressed. They are still my views. I shall not read them into the record, but I think the substance can be put in just about four sentences. I said then, and I really believe, that the situation at the opening of 1951 was even more serious than it was at the opening of 1950. I stated then, and I firmly believe, that that is why we must increase our efforts to prevent a world war. In spite of the gravity of the situation I do not believe a world war is inevitable. I do not believe that a world war is inevitable because of my confidence in the willingness and ability of the peoples of the twelve nations grouped together under the North Atlantic treaty to build up their strength to a point where aggression will not be attempted against them.

I do not believe we can fold our arms and expect that we shall not have war. I believe, however, that the people of this nation and the people of the other eleven nations who have banded themselves together under the terms of the North Atlantic treaty are willing and able to do what will be necessary to constitute an effective deterrent against the probability of aggression. We knew that a supreme commander had been appointed. Although it was known to all the people of Canada, we believed nevertheless it was an event of sufficient importance to be mentioned in His Excellency's speech to us at the opening of parliament. We regarded it as one of those indications of the progress that was being made in organizing north Atlantic strength against the risk of aggression.

From our own experience prior to the appointment of a supreme commander, we knew that there had been much comparing of good things to do in an attempt to decide which were preferable; but up to the time a supreme commander was selected and recognized by the governments of the twelve nations, it was quite difficult to find anyone to take the responsibility of saying, "Among the good things that might be done, this is the one we are going to do and we are going to do it now." I think the choice of a supreme commander for the marshalling and organizing of the forces of the twelve nations banded together under that treaty will make for dispatch; and dispatch is required if we are to justify our faith, belief and trust that we shall soon have that strength required to make aggression unattractive to any who might be tempted to start it against us.

Not only has a supreme commander been chosen, but the supreme commander has visited the capitals of the twelve nations that are signatories of the North Atlantic treaty. He has reported to us here the impressions he gathered overseas and he has now reported to the congress of the United States the impressions he gathered in his visits to the twelve nations. Just as I came into the chamber I was handed a dispatch summarizing some of the statements the supreme commander had made in his report of an hour's duration to the United States congress:

> Eisenhower asked this question: "Why are we frightened of dictatorial governments?" He said the only thing such governments have is unity of purpose, but it is "enforced by a gun in the kidneys."

That is not the kind of unity of purpose that is going to prevail among the peoples of the twelve nations that are signatories to the North Atlantic treaty.

> Repeatedly Eisenhower emphasized that the proposed build-up of forces in Europe is aimed at keeping the peace.

It is because I believe that such is the real purpose of the free peoples of these twelve nations that I still venture to express the confident hope that we shall not have to indulge in a third catastrophic world war. I believe that the manpower, the know-how, the industrial potential and the natural resources available to the people of those twelve nations are such that if we had the misfortune to become involved in a third world war we would still win; but the cost of doing so would be so terrible that it is still my hope and my confident belief that it can be prevented. The price we shall have to pay to ensure its avoidance is going to be a heavy one and it is mounting constantly. The proposals the government will have to make in order to carry out the declarations contained in the speech from the throne will be brought to the attention of this house, Mr. Speaker, and they will, I am sure, justify the assertions that I am making that the cost is going to be a heavy one; it is one that is going to be felt by every one of us and by every one of the free men and women in the other eleven nations that are banded together to do their share in this joint undertaking. What we shall be asking parliament to authorize will not be aid or assistance to anybody else. It will be something required by ourselves for the purpose of doing our part in building up this joint strength which is required to fulfil an undertaking that no one of us alone could fulfil and one that can be fulfilled only by the full co-operative efforts of all of us.

Only within the last few hours we read the report of a similar statement made in the parliament of Britain by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom as to the extent and the acceleration of the military effort they are going to make as their part of this upbuilding of our united strength. We know what is being contemplated by our neighbours to the south and we know what has been placed before the supreme commander by the governments of the other Atlantic nations. I am sure that the people of our country wish us to do our part in the upbuilding of that united strength which we hope will be a sufficient deterrent to prevent the necessity of winning a third world war.

To some sincere, patriotic Canadians it would appear that the first and most important thing to do would be to have in force in this country some form of selective service, some form of conscription of manpower, to bring large numbers of armed forces in being and to place them in the field ready to meet an enemy. There are others who believe, with equal sincerity, that to resort, at the present time, to compulsory military service would be disastrous to the Canadian economy. The view of the government—and it is my own—does not coincide with either of those extreme points of view. My attitude in this respect has been, I realize, a source of some uneasiness to some good Canadians throughout this country because of my race, the part of Canada from which I come, my religious beliefs, and so forth. But I think I can assure them that they are quite mistaken, and that is something those who are not my friends or supporters in my own native province have long realized.

I do not know how many hon. members had brought to their attention an article which was published in Le Devoir on October 24, 1950, in which their readers were being warned against me because of the facts to which this article referred. The writer recalled that:

> Conscription is an issue one does not broach without distaste or even without disgust. For a quarter of a century, Quebec Liberals exploited it before making it a part of their program. Conservatives used it as an instrument of hatred to set other provinces against Quebec where so-called equality of sacrifice was not accepted.

That is underscored in the article. Then it went on:

> The French Canadian Liberal leaders of 1939 had an anti-conscription record. Lapointe and Cardin had formally committed themselves hundreds of times in public. Mr. King had had to give them pledges. Today, the situation is altogether different. Mr. Louis St. Laurent was elected in 1942 without concealing his opinions. He has not changed since. His convictions are all the more dangerous for being more honest and generally more sincere. Mr. St. Laurent will resist a conscription measure only so long as he believes it will be inadvisable or ineffective. In principle he has no objection to it.

Then they go on and say:

> His policy leads straight in that direction.

Well, I was not at all offended at the terms of that article. So far as I am concerned, this is not a matter which can or should be decided on sentimental grounds. It is one which should be decided on its merits, and strictly on its merits, and with regard to what will make for the efficiency and the effectiveness of our contribution to the joint efforts that have to be put forth by the twelve nations banded together.

Though I do not go along with Le Devoir, I do not go along either with the Globe and Mail. The Globe and Mail on January 31, only yesterday, said that what was wanted was a declaration that parliament would be asked to give approval to a plan for national selective service. It said:

> Selective service probably will involve conscription for the fighting forces. If it does there will be a national sense of equity.

Then it goes on:

> Through two wars the people of Quebec, and on their account Roman Catholics generally, were blamed for the rejection of military conscription.

It continues:

> Religion can no longer be made the excuse for failing to do what must be done, and sharing as equitably as possible the burdens of the doing. Foremost among the organized foes of the communist conquest is the Roman Catholic church.

This is not a matter of religion, nor a matter to be decided on the basis of religion, and I deprecate appeals of that kind for or against national selective service from any quarter. Let us be men, and let us face realities and do what we think will be the most efficient and the most effective as our contribution to the upbuilding of those international forces. It will be for us to determine what is the total volume of the effort this nation can contribute to this pool of combined forces, and it will be for us and for our partners together to determine what is the best way in which each nation can make its most effective contribution to that pool of joint strength.

We know that the cost to us of maintaining one man on European soil, as part of the integrated army, is much more than the cost to the Europeans themselves of maintaining and equipping one man there. And we know that, in the production of equipment, we can get for every dollar expended as much as can be got from any dollar expended anywhere in the world, and perhaps more. We believe, as General Eisenhower is reported to have submitted in his report to congress today, that the big need of western Europe at this time is for arms rather than for troops.

For weeks we have been discussing the plans that would be put before you for your approval at this session of parliament, and we have been endeavouring to obtain the best possible information as to the most effective way in which our contribution can be made. So far there has been brought to my attention nothing that would indicate that the institution of national selective service at this time would be beneficial. On the contrary, the information we have obtained is that it would hamper what is being done at this moment. Now, that does not mean that the situation cannot change, and it does not mean that if and when it does change there will not be changes in the manner in which our resources will be contributed to this pool of international strength. But those changes will not be recommended by this government on any sentimental grounds because of any appeals on a racial or religious basis, but on their actual effective value to the joint strength of the combined forces of the North Atlantic alliance.

The leader of the opposition has said that he did not think the people of Canada would begrudge the expenditure of dollars provided that they believed they were being wisely expended; and with that I agree. And I fully agree with the hon. gentleman that no burden should be placed upon the Canadian people that is not represented by wise and efficient expenditures of the money that is produced from the burden itself. But I cannot bring myself to agree with the hon. gentleman that it would be wise at this time to set up a defence committee and to bring before it those who are engaged in the preparing and implementing of military plans that have to be carried out. I imagine the hon. member's views are still the same as those he expressed in the house on September 7 of last year, at which time he said, as reported at page 388 of Hansard:

> These highly trained officers, with long military experience in the different branches of the service, are men for whose opinions we have high regard, as we have for the officers under them. But has the Minister of National Defence followed the advice of the chiefs of staff? Has he? There is reason to believe he has not done so entirely, because I find, for instance, a press report in the Ottawa Journal—

And so on. And then, a little further on:

> We should like to hear from the chiefs of staff whether they were pointing out that we did not have adequate forces for the defence of Canada, that we needed more money for that purpose, and that we needed to step up our training. Unless we hear their statements to the contrary, I think that is a logical conclusion from these reports.

Well, I do not think that is the way in which constitutional government is carried out under traditional British practice. The government takes the responsibility, under that practice, of formulating policy and of exposing it to parliament. If parliament is not satisfied, then it is the privilege of parliament to dismiss that government and to get a different one. But it is not the privilege of parliament to get the chiefs of staff or any of the others who, at times, are described as bureaucrats by hon. members across the way, to disclose the advice to which the government is entitled in formulating policy.

There can be no objection to obtaining from the responsible ministers full information as to what they plan to do, what they are doing and how they are doing it, full information as to how every cent of every dollar appropriated for national defence is being expended. But we are not prepared to accept the urging of the leader of the opposition and to set up a committee before which the chiefs of staff or the other military advisers of the minister can be brought so as to ascertain from them whether all or only part of the recommendations made by them have been incorporated in the policy the minister takes the responsibility of submitting for the approval or disapproval of parliament.

The leader of the opposition has dealt with inflation. He is concerned—and so are we—for all those who have savings of one kind or another, whether from pensions or from income upon bonds they purchased either during the course of the last war or following it. However, in opening his speech the hon. member was very insistent in his statement that in our international policies we had to allow our great neighbour to the south to take the lead. That may be questionable. We hope—and up to the present time our hopes have been realized—that the ultimate decisions of our powerful neighbours to the south in international affairs will all be such that we shall be able to accept them on their merits, and not merely because they are their policies.

We have to examine those policies on their merits. We have to look at them from the angle of Canadian interests and from the angle of Canada's responsibility not only to its neighbour to the south but to the whole community of free men and women throughout the world.

The repercussions, willy-nilly, of the economic policies of our neighbour on this continent are felt very greatly in this country of ours. It is not easy, even though it might be desirable, to have greater certainty in that regard. It is not easy at any time to be certain of what will happen in the economic field among our population of between fourteen and fifteen millions as a consequence of what is happening just south of us in a country with a population of about 150 million. That is why we are constantly considering the situation as it develops, and why we feel it is not a course of despondency or despair to feel that we cannot prevent a degree of inflation here somewhat approaching that prevailing in the country to the south of us. To prevent it, we would have to try to enclose our economy in an impervious wall that, under present conditions, would not be accepted by a majority of the Canadian people.

In this connection hon. gentlemen opposite should remember the speeches they made about exchange control and other forms of control at a time when we found that, for the stability of the Canadian economy, it was necessary for us to maintain them, before suggesting that we are being too laggard in resorting, under present conditions, to other and no more acceptable forms of control.

The subject is one of grave concern to all of us. I am sure that we probably have lapses of memory such as those which I am indicating have been experienced by my hon. friends across the way. It may be that our thinking is not always strictly consistent with what we have preached and attempted to practise in the past. But I can assure the house that we are attempting, in good faith and without regard to any special class or any special interests, to do for the majority of the Canadian people that which that majority will feel justifies the confidence they are still extending to us in these difficult times.

We may make mistakes. If and when we do I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite will not fail to point them out. When they become sufficiently obvious to make a majority of the Canadian people feel that they are not justified in having further confidence in our ability to cope with difficult situations, then there will be an opportunity for others to implement different policies.

Though certainty in these matters would be very pleasant to achieve, we feel that it is wise to proceed cautiously so that we would not too often have to undo what has been recently done. As was mentioned this afternoon we provided import controls on a certain commodity and within a very short time we found that they were not really necessary and that, instead, they were embarrassing. We do not like to have to backtrack. Whenever it can be done we are going to endeavour to proceed with dispatch, but with sufficient caution, to discharge the responsibilities we feel we have towards the whole of the Canadian public. We will seek, by the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne, to secure powers additional to those the governor in council already has. By proclaiming the War Measures Act on the ground of apprehended war we could have all those powers, but we prefer to leave it to parliament to say whether there is a sufficient emergency to justify a departure from regular constitutional procedure and the regular constitutional distribution of powers between the federal and provincial authorities.

That legislation will be submitted to parliament at the earliest possible opportunity, and if and when it is passed there will then be the possibility of providing such controls as it may become apparent would be beneficial, and of providing for their proper administration and enforcement. I repeat, "enforcement". There cannot be enforcement in a country like ours against the feeling of a majority of the people of what is right and what is wrong. Perhaps we shall have to follow the advice of the leader of the opposition and make those clarion calls that will create in the population the realization of an urgency justifying measures that will push them around, because after all that is what controls amount to.

It is not easy to maintain the appropriate balance. The leader of the opposition, no more than I, would wish to make statements that would be frightening, that would work our people up to an unjustified pitch of anxiety and fervour. On the other hand, there must be a sober realization by all of us that we can prevent war only by doing our full share in that which is apparently going to be done in full share by each and every one of our associates. I still believe that the Canadian public will wish us to do what is required so that we may still have grounds for confident hopes that the necessity of waging and winning a third world war will not be forced upon this generation.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to associate myself with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and other members who have today congratulated the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon his sixty-ninth birthday. I notice that he thanked in advance some of us who did not have the opportunity previously to accord our congratulations. I am very happy to do so, and I hope he may long be spared, if not as Prime Minister, to enjoy a well deserved further span of years.

I should also like to say to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne that those of us who have been here a good many years can appreciate the difficulties under which they laboured yesterday. For two members coming into the house for the first time and rising in their places to make major speeches, I think they acquitted themselves exceptionally well. On behalf of myself and my colleagues I have great pleasure in congratulating them upon the excellent showing they made yesterday, and I hope they will often participate in the debates of the house.

The speech from the throne contains a great deal of material for thought, and foreshadows, I should think, a very important and interesting session of parliament. As we would expect it to do, it records a deterioration in the international situation. Unlike the leader of the opposition, I am going to devote some attention to the international situation largely because the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is going to speak tomorrow and I should like to place certain criticisms before him this afternoon. I am going to take this opportunity to express approval of the decision made last summer to invite opposition members to attend sessions of the general assembly. I think that is good for the members who go there. I think it is good for our respective parties in the house. Indeed I think it is good for the country generally. It gives to members of the house, through their party representatives who attend these conferences, a more intimate knowledge of the developments and important events that take place there and the policies that Canada follows at such conferences.

Indeed it does something else. It enables parliament and the country to achieve a considerable approach to unanimity regarding grave issues which may affect not only our own people but millions of other people all over the world. Of course there may arise differences in methods of achievement, differences in the immediate objectives; but I think I can say that, in spite of any differences that we may express or that I may express this afternoon, there is no difference in the determination of each and every one of us in the house to protect and preserve our people and our country from the present menace of totalitarianism. About that determination there must of necessity be unanimity. As I have already said, that unanimity should be obvious not only in this house but all over the country.

To get such unanimity something is required, and that is a knowledge of the events that are taking place and an understanding of what they involve. Here I think members of parliament, the government and all agencies of public information in this country and everywhere else have particular responsibilities. I do not think that members of parliament, either individually or collectively, or the government either, have given enough attention to informing public opinion in this country sufficiently of the events that are taking place, and of what we should be doing to meet the threats that are now so apparent in world affairs.

What is true of individual members of the house, or of members collectively and the government, I think is equally true of our public information agencies. In my opinion the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation did a first-class job in reporting all the major discussions at the United Nations. Their rebroadcasts of important speeches by our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and leading members of other delegations at the United Nations, the United Nations documentaries that we heard from the assembly from time to time, and so on, I think were exceptionally useful. If I may say so I think the commentaries by various commentators, by Mr. Peter Stursberg of the C.B.C., by Mr. Walter O'Hearn of the Montreal Star and others, were exceedingly valuable in helping the people of Canada understand some of the matters being discussed before the committees of the United Nations, and particularly before the first or political committee.

I regret that the news-gathering agencies of the Canadian newspapers generally were not adequately represented at the United Nations. From my observations the great co-operative news-gathering agency of the daily newspapers of Canada, the Canadian Press, had no representative there, at least for any length of time. The commercial organization, British United Press, as far as I know had no representative there. The result was that but for the agencies I have already mentioned, particularly the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the people of Canada had to rely almost entirely upon the commentaries and commentators and columnists who write from day to day in United States newspapers, many of whose articles are syndicated in some of our large Canadian newspapers. There were, of course, one or two notable exceptions as far as the daily newspapers were concerned. A moment ago I mentioned what I considered to be the valuable job done by Mr. Walter O'Hearn in commenting upon the work of the United Nations, and of course he was maintained there throughout by one of our great daily newspapers, the Montreal Star, to which he reported daily. As far as the great co-operative news-gathering agencies of Canada were concerned, however, their representatives were mostly conspicuous by their absence. I regard this as a reflection upon the press of Canada and indeed upon our country generally, because we have a right to expect better service than that from our national news agencies when such difficult and important matters are being considered by the United Nations.

I believe this led to the confusion which I found in the country concerning some of the matters before the United Nations; particularly to confusion in the early fall as to the considerations leading up to the decision by the United Nations to stop the aggression which occurred in Korea last June. Too little information was available to the Canadian people last autumn as these grave events developed. As I have said already, our news came mainly from United States sources. As the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has stated, the people of Canada hope that war is neither imminent nor inevitable; but if we should become involved in a major struggle in the months or years ahead I think it is important that our people should understand what has led up to that situation.

I am certain of this, that least of all do the Canadian people want war with the Chinese, whom I think most Canadians regard as a long-suffering, exploited people who are now groping for a better life. That leadership in China has come under communist control is, I think, a graver reflection upon the democracies who, had they taken time by the forelock and pursued essentially different policies a few years ago, might have had the leadership which has been seized by the representatives of the Soviet union in that great country of 450 million people.

For this reason I regret the adoption of the resolution that was passed by the first committee of the United Nations the day before yesterday, and which I believe is before the assembly today. I think a condemnatory resolution of that kind may interfere with the very worth-while further attempts to obtain an immediate cease-fire in Korea. I am also afraid that this resolution having been approved, it will be followed by intensified bitterness and demands for the institution of sanctions which, if approved, I fear will push China more and more into the orbit of the Soviet union.

From what I hear and have read I believe the Secretary of State for External Affairs very largely shares that view. At this point may I congratulate him on his part in endeavouring to continue negotiations, and the Prime Minister on his part in endeavouring to get a clarification of the more recent acceptance of proposals by Peking. At noon today I received my usual airmail copy of the Manchester Guardian Weekly, under date of January 25. Its very well informed correspondent in India discusses the situation in Asia and refers particularly to a rising bitterness even on the part of those who have sympathized and been more friendly with Britain and the rest of us in the past few years, because they feel that while we give underground—and I think that is the word that is used—support to India's attempts at further negotiations, we none the less adopt a different attitude in public when an important issue is to be resolved.

My view of the United Nations resolution regarding China, passed a couple of days ago, is pretty well stated in a resolution which was adopted by our C.C.F. national executive over last week end. Since it expresses my own view as well, I should like to put it on the record. It is not long, and reads as follows:

> The C.C.F. is opposed to any step at the UN or elsewhere which will place further obstacles in the way of a negotiated settlement in Korea and Asia generally. For this reason it urges the Canadian government—

This, of course, was before the resolution was passed.

> —to oppose the U.S. resolution now before the United Nations which would brand the Chinese people's government as an aggressor. The C.C.F. believe that if the UN passed this resolution it would be in danger of sacrificing the friendship of a large proportion of the people of Asia, and of disrupting the unity of the free world.
> The C.C.F. does not doubt that the invasion of Korea by the Chinese armies was unjustifiable and contrary to UN policy. But at this moment every effort must be made to prevent a general war. We must not give way to resentment or hysteria, or assume that war is inevitable.

Then it goes on, and I should like to put this on record because I wish to say something about it a little later.

> As a further indication of Canada's good will towards the people of Asia, the C.C.F. proposes that the Canadian government make a gift to India of as substantial a quantity of wheat to aid in the alleviation of her grievous famine as transportation facilities will allow.

We recognized it should be noted that there were difficulties in transportation facilities to India.

We believe that the United Nations resolution before the assembly today, and which will undoubtedly be adopted, will make—I do not say may—a negotiated settlement more difficult. Certainly, it will delay it. At its best it will merely delay it, and at its worst it will make a negotiated settlement impossible. I feel that heed should have been paid to the last warning given to a like effect by Sir Benegal Rau, whose country understands the Asiatic opinion, and whose efforts for a peaceful settlement have been entirely consistent throughout. When I heard his very tired voice over the radio the other night making one last plea, I thought that it carried rather deep conviction with it. At any rate I was deeply impressed with it. Let us remember this, that India joined with the rest of us in recognizing that the invasion of South Korea by North Korea was an act of aggression. Subsequently, India gave warning that any close approach to the borders of Manchuria and the Yalu river would invite Chinese participation. In that, of course, she proved prophetic.

The minister of external affairs (Mr. Pearson), in his speech before the United Nations last Friday, January 26, put the view which we share. I am going to quote from that speech, because I have a verbatim copy of it before me. After discussing the Canadian position rather frankly, he says on page 13:

> . . . we think the putting of such a resolution at this stage and in this form, when the possibilities of negotiation with the people's government of China are not, in our opinion, completely exhausted, to be premature and unwise.

In fairness to him I should like to continue and put the rest of the paragraph on the record, because I think I should.

> Why then is the Canadian delegation voting for the draft resolution as a whole? In the first place, we are doing so because the main purport of this resolution, as we understand it, and certainly as the public in our own country will understand it, is to condemn the Chinese people's government for the assistance they have given the aggressors in Korea. We think that there is no shadow of doubt about this participation in aggression and we believe that the action of the Chinese people's government in this matter has been morally wrong and is to be condemned. The United Nations cannot ignore such a defiance of the principles upon which it is founded.

I agree that the United Nations cannot overlook a defiance of the principles upon which it was founded, but on the other hand there might be a time and a place when condemnation for violation of those principles should be made. The question is, had we reached that time? The minister himself said he regarded the resolution as premature and unwise. He asked for further assurance, and Sir Benegal Rau obtained it. Coupled with it there was a warning, I understand, said to be from the highest sources in Peking. Whether or not this is correct, the story came over the air that Sir Benegal Rau had received that warning from none other than Mao Tse-tung, head of the Chinese government. The minister clearly counselled caution, and gave very good reasons for this caution.

Looking at his speech a little earlier, on page 12, we find he said this:

> . . . the free world as a whole is now under a menace far greater than anything offered by the Chinese regime in Peking, a menace which even that regime itself will, we hope, one day come to recognize and to resist, and that our main objective must be to hold ourselves prepared to meet that threat. We have certainly not accepted anything like the prospects of inevitable war with the Soviet union, and we are still ready to accept genuine conciliation with members of the Soviet union bloc. We cannot, however, close our eyes to the complicity of the Soviet union in the aggressive action of the North Koreans and the Chinese communists, their subjugation of neighbouring countries, their world-wide sabotage of peace, and the continuous instigation of a new war by their propaganda machines, disguised these days as propaganda for peace. It is for these reasons, for purely defensive reasons, that I feel we must remain on guard and not allow ourselves to be deliberately distracted into weakening skirmishes or open war with a country with which we have no basic grounds to quarrel.

I most thoroughly agree with that statement. It has seemed to me, and this view is shared by many of the people in this country and indeed across the world, that what we have actually done is to run into the grave danger of being distracted into weakening skirmishes or open war with a people with whom we have no basic grounds to quarrel. If it is true, and I believe it is, that "we cannot close our eyes to the complicity of the Soviet union in the aggressive action of the North Koreans and the Chinese communists," then on much the same grounds as the minister enunciated before the United Nations committee in regard to China, we could declare the Soviet union to be an aggressor; not an aggressor in precisely the same way but none the less an aggressor in provoking aggression by others on a much wider scale. Indeed such aggression is much more dangerous and much more widespread than the aggression committed by China. But be that as it may, even before the final vote was taken on Tuesday evening, January 30, the minister reiterated the same grave warning and the same opinion. After again outlining the considerations which had brought the Canadian delegation to vote "yes" on the resolution, he said this:

> . . . we still feel that it is premature and unwise to confront the committee with the necessity for a decision on these facts at this particular moment and, as we see it, the methods of peaceful negotiation before condemnation have not yet been completely exhausted.

We find that even the minister had considerable doubts as to the wisdom of pressing this issue at this time.

Again may I refer to what the Manchester Guardian said in the issue which came to my desk at noon today. It pointed out that this growing bitterness in India was due to the fact that India was taking the onus for the belief that was held by some other countries associated with India and that India was in danger of "taking the rap" for expressing those views and for voting in the manner in which she did. We have all noted in the press—and I think it was most regrettable—a suggestion made in the United States that because of India's attitude she should be denied the immediate granting of the large quantity of wheat for which she has been asking and which she needs in order to prevent widespread misery and famine as a result of crop failures in that land. Because we believe that the resolution which Canada supported was "both premature and unwise", and because we fear that it will result in driving China more completely into the Soviet orbit and will jeopardize the friendship of a large proportion of the 550 million or 600 million people in southeast Asia, I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that the following words be added to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew):

> We further regret that while Your Excellency's advisers have generally followed a constructive course in relation to the Korean dispute, they have in relation to the resolution branding China as an aggressor supported a course which is premature and unwise at this particular moment, and which should not have been pursued until the methods of peaceful negotiation had been completely exhausted.

As I said earlier, perhaps we can mitigate this danger of driving the Asiatic peoples into the arms of the Soviet union by endeavouring to send quantities of food to India and to do all that we can to promote the success of the plan to which the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) alluded a short time ago; I refer to the Colombo plan. I know that it has been said that we have not a sufficient amount of wheat of the right grade and in position. We have a good deal of frozen wheat, grade No. 5 and grade No. 6 which is used as feed. I am told that while it does not make the best of flour, grade No. 5 wheat will make flour; and for people who are starving, even grade No. 5 wheat would be most acceptable. If we cannot give a better grade of wheat, I think that this house and this country should give consideration to giving the best that we can give in order to show not only our friendship for India but also the desirability of stamping out the results of famine and of keeping close contact with this great Asiatic people.

We shall have an opportunity of saying more about the Colombo plan a little later, but right now I want to say that I think it is the most imaginative plan ever adopted by the commonwealth countries. It contemplates aid not only to the commonwealth countries in southeast Asia but to those countries that are outside of the commonwealth—I do not need to name them all, but I might name two or three such as Burma, Thailand and Indonesia—all of whose problems are similar to those facing the commonwealth countries in Asia.

As I said a moment ago, 570 million people or thereabouts—one-quarter of the world's population—are living in that part of the world outside of China. They have ancient cultures and philosophies and they provide a challenge to the democratic nations if we desire to prevent the spread of totalitarian communism and the influence of the Soviet union among them; for people are an easy prey to that kind of propaganda, whether it be of the communist or of the fascist type, when their stomachs are empty and their bodies are weak. Food and clothing, it seems to me, in this particular area are more important weapons of defence than guns, planes, and ships of war; although I am not saying for one moment that we must not also build up our defensive materiel as well. Today, after the destructive war with Japan, and if sanctions follow the naming of China as an aggressor, the suffering that already exists there will be intensified. May I say that, as far as China is concerned, sanctions will scarcely affect the main trade lines of China because China does not trade much with the west anyhow but trades largely with the Asian countries. If we attempt to bomb the centres in China, we must not forget that there is a Soviet-Chinese mutual assistance pact, and we may find ourselves faced with the effects of that pact. I am glad that the government is going to place before us proposals in conformity with the Colombo plan. I hope that the proposals, if they are sufficiently effective, will be supported by all parties in this house and, incidentally, by all the people throughout the country.

My time is limited but there are a few minutes left. I want to say this on the subject of defence which came up this afternoon. I was interested in what the Prime Minister said. I think his statement was a courageous one. It was probably in line with the needs of the country at this time; but I should like to add this to what he said this afternoon. Before we come to a conclusion on what we are going to do in regard to the raising of an army, in regard to industry, our resources, human and material, there should be a thorough appraisal of our resources, both human and material, in order that we might plan a really effective effort for our own defence, for the obligations that we have assumed in connection with other countries and for the defence of democracy across the world.

When we make such an appraisal we then can decide where our best contribution can be made. If war comes—and I do not think it is inevitable—it will be in Europe ultimately. Should we lose control of western Europe, which—if war came soon and with the defences that we are told are there—is a possibility, the industrial centres of Great Britain would be subjected to intense bombing and in all probability would be largely immobilized. Therefore, we have to consider what our best contribution would be under various circumstances that might arise.

We found of course that the raising of a large force suddenly in the autumn of 1939 was not very difficult, nor was the maintenance of industry, such as it was in 1939, difficult. Why? Because we had a very large amount of unemployment in the country. If my memory serves me, we had something like 400,000 people on relief at that time, and there was no strain on the economy at all in raising an army or in operating industry. As I believed then I believe now. I believed that a proper appraisal of our resources at that time would have guided us rather better than we were guided subsequently in the war that we declared in September, 1939. But in any event, whether one was right or wrong in that particular at that time, we are not at war at the moment. The government knows what obligations we are expected to assume; and it seems to me that the first step should be a thorough appraisal of our economic and human resources.

Because of the strain on the economy I want to say to the Prime Minister that I do not agree that the institution of price controls in the United States will be a sufficient safeguard for the standards of living of the Canadian people. The government will have to institute price controls.

The Prime Minister said that that could only be done if the people were in favour of it. Well, public opinion polls have shown in one instance that 75 per cent of the people interviewed were in favour of it. More recently, of course, rather smaller percentages have declared themselves in favour of the kind of controls suggested to them when they were asked the question a couple of months ago.

But again may I say—and I want to bring this to your attention before I close—if we are to have intelligent price controls the government should call together the representatives of the groups who are mainly interested in these controls, namely, representatives of the farmers—

Mr. Ferrie: They don't want it.

Mr. Coldwell: —representatives of the workers, representatives of business and representatives of some consumer organizations. When I say "representatives of these organizations", I mean people chosen by these organizations at least in a consultative committee, and endeavour to see whether we cannot relate to some degree at least prices and wages so that we may get some intelligent workable controls to which all our people would agree, and which will enable us to carry the people along without the difficulty that the Prime Minister apprehended when he was speaking a short time ago.

After all, if we are to have satisfactory controls the groups mainly interested in them are entitled to consultations, and not only consultations in separate groups, but consultation together in order that they may understand the viewpoints of one another.

Of course a great deal has been made of wage control. As a matter of fact you have wage control now to a very large extent, because in many of the great trades unions wages have been agreed upon for one year ahead and two years ahead, and yet prices continue to rise. You have control now of the farmer's returns to a very large degree in setting floor prices on some of the goods that he produces and ceilings in some of the arrangements that have been made. The only people who are free to do exactly what they like are the manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers. They have obviously increased prices over the last couple of months in order that they may circumvent price controls if they come into effect.

I am not going to give examples which have come to my knowledge over the last two or three months, but I have been told by retailers in this city, who have been buying goods that they were accustomed to buying from various wholesale concerns, that the prices have been pushed up, as they believed, to an unwarranted extent in anticipation that we may have some measure of price control and we might do what the United States did, although we did not know what the United States was going to do until a little while ago, namely, stabilize prices at the highest level. That will not do. We may have to use methods including subsidies to bring down real buying prices to some extent.

I have exceeded my time somewhat and therefore I must stop. If we can secure agreement among our people some other things will have to be done such as certain forms of taxation, excess profits taxes and so on. I am convinced that we can institute measures of control and we can organize our economy to benefit the Canadian people and to help us to do the job that we have to do and to take our share in defence of the democratic world.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, it is close to six o'clock, but I am not going to ask you to call it six o'clock because I feel that we should make use of every minute of our time.

Let me say at the outset that I appreciate this opportunity of joining with the other leaders on the opposition side of the house in extending to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) good wishes and felicitations on this the anniversary of his birthday. I did not rise on the orders of the day following the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) because I knew that this opportunity would be provided at some time today.

I find it a very pleasant duty today, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In my opinion both speeches were sensible, down-to-earth attainments, and although fluent as both speakers were and very easy to listen to, the emphasis in each case was placed quite properly on the content rather than on the refinements of oratory. That is as it should be, in days like these when we are facing grave realities. It is unfortunate—and I am sure when I say this I speak for every member in the house—that at this time parliament meets under a cloud of world confusion and the fear of war. But, because it does so meet, it seems to me that this must be a time of courage, of mental honesty, straight thinking and plain speaking, without too much acrimony or recrimination. I believe the atmosphere and the dangers of these days make it necessary, too, that each of us representing the people across this country must do some earnest soul-searching. I shall try to do my part in facing up to the formula I have just laid out.

His Excellency's speech reminded me of what the clergyman said to the young bridegroom. I attended the wedding of a young friend of mine and, after the clergyman had tied the knot and while congratulations were being offered, he said to the bridegroom, "I think it is my prerogative in all such cases to give some good advice to both young people." To the bridegroom he said, "Young man, if you intend to get along well you must always tell your wife the truth." Then, turning to the young bride he said, "But not necessarily all of it."

As I view the address I feel it is straightforward enough in what it does contain. However, at a time like this I do not think it is enough just to have carefully guarded allusions to the dangers that the people of Canada, in common with other free peoples of the world, are facing. At a time like this it seems to me that nothing less than the whole truth is good enough. The Canadian people must be roused to the fullest possible realization of the dangers they face from external sources as well as from those lurking within our borders here at home. It is only when they do fully realize those dangers that we can expect our people to rise to that effort they must make if this and the other free nations of the world are to survive.

It is my conviction that nothing less than survival is at stake today, the survival of free nations and free peoples. So that I may be perfectly fair, let me state that in two places in His Excellency's address references are made to the seriousness of the world situation. In the third paragraph we find these words:

> The increased menace in the Far East reinforces the mounting evidence that communist imperialism is determined to dominate the world by force or the fear of force, and that the only hope of maintaining peace with freedom lies in the rapid increase of the combined strength of the free nations.

And then at a later point we find this:

> The policies of the government are designed to prevent war, but the dangers of the international situation and the magnitude of the defence effort required as a deterrent have, in the opinion of my ministers, created an emergency situation.

Well, nothing is said in the address, nor can I read between the lines anything that would give us a clear picture of the state of preparedness or of unpreparedness of the free nations of the world, including our own country, to meet the challenge of these times.

Therefore, since no other speaker has done so this afternoon, I feel it my duty to place before hon. members and the people of Canada how I view the whole situation and what I think of the state of unpreparedness in which we and the world find ourselves today. When I continue speaking after the dinner recess I intend to go further than a mere examination of our physical, material and military state of preparation. These, of course, are important; but, important as they are, there are other phases which are vastly more important.

What about our moral and spiritual preparedness? Here is where the soul-searching I mentioned a while ago comes in. In the interests of all of us I think it is essential that we Canadians—and I include myself—take a right good look at the whole picture, even if that picture proves to be an ugly one.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I had referred to the fact that the speech from the throne mentioned the government's conviction that the increased menace in the Far East reinforces the mounting evidence that communist imperialism is determined to dominate the world by war or fear of war, and that the only hope of maintaining peace with freedom lies in the rapid increase of the combined strength of the free nations. Let me tell the government and this house that for the past fifteen years we Social Crediters have been convinced that communist imperialism was determined to dominate the world by force. We have been saying so in the plainest possible language for all of that time. In addition we have stated publicly on numerous occasions that we believed evil and perfidious men, many of whom were posing as our best friends, were devising communist imperialism and installing it in various countries as a definite policy for taking over economies and enslaving men simply to satisfy their own power hunger. We have not yet seen or heard anything that would cause us to change our minds in that regard. The blueprint has been there all along, and it has been clearly legible so that anybody could see and read it if they were interested in doing so.

Many of us are inclined to ask why it is that we are living under the shadow and the fear of war today. I think it is largely because we, the people of the world, either have been very busy sowing the seeds of war or have slept the months and years away refusing to see or to believe that some men and leaders of nations were sowing the same kind of seeds. Five years ago the United Nations organization was set up. At that time it was hailed far and wide as the great eradicator of war weeds in the gardens of the world. I was privileged to attend the session of the assembly of the United Nations in 1947, and again last autumn. I want to say to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that I was very grateful for that opportunity. I was not able to stay either time as long as I should have liked, but I was able to stay long enough to make a good many observations and, I think, to get the atmosphere pretty well.

I should like to mention a few of the impressions that I came away with, particularly with regard to the state of preparedness of the member nations of the United Nations organization to meet the dangers that were confronting them. I confess I became convinced that the member nations of the United Nations were very largely in a state of unpreparedness. They were unprepared to take even a look at the cost of survival, let alone to pay the price of peace. I saw at the assembly a good many sincere people who were making an obviously earnest effort to build a temple of peace, but my heart certainly sank within me when it became clear that they were trying to build their structure on foundations of sand and with rotten timbers.

The nations of the world say they want peace, and yet they persist in those practices that make peace impossible and war a certainty. In that respect they remind me of the poor fellow who was told by his doctor that he had arteriosclerosis and consequently he would have to give up smoking his usual quota of cigars if he were not to die within a matter of months instead of perhaps years. The patient said he would rather die than try to quit. It was evident to me at Lake Success that altogether too many nations still believe that might is right and they try to practise it. Too many of them still violate the rules of human decency. They continue to place a very low value upon the individual human soul and they show a callous indifference to human suffering.

I thought a good many times, amongst other things, of the plight of such people as the Puerto Ricans. They are a numerous people for such a small and poor country, and yet no other country wants to take their surplus population or to extend to them the help they need if they are to live in anything but squalor. Is it any wonder then that some of them would take extreme means to draw the attention of the world to their plight? You all know of the misguided souls who did plot and attempt to carry out the assassination of the President of the United States.

What some nations are doing to their people today is almost indescribable. Besides training as many of their citizens as they can to hate and envy, they are practising upon their youth especially the most diabolical form of indoctrination. While I was at Lake Success I had quite a long chat with the administrator of UNICEF in one of the countries behind the iron curtain. She indicated that the governments were literally unscrewing the souls of those young people and putting back into them something that makes them mere automata capable of doing only one thing, obeying their master's voice. How are the decent people of the world ever going to deal successfully with a generation like that, a generation that cannot listen to reason because they are not trained to reason, a generation that will not know right from wrong because they have never been taught to distinguish between them, a generation that cannot make up its own mind, that merely takes orders and executes them?

Then, Mr. Speaker, it must grieve the sincere and charitable people of the world, as it grieves me, to observe that some nations today will stoop to the use of hunger as a weapon to compel conformity to their own views and ideas. I know of no crime more grievous than to capitalize or attempt to capitalize upon the hunger and suffering of humanity in order to gain one's own ends. It must be clear to thinking people that such a practice is one of the rotten timbers that they would build into their temple of peace. If Canada ever becomes piqued because some other nation differs in opinion with us I hope we will be charitable and big enough not to refuse it that part of our surplus foods we can easily spare, especially if many of their people are going hungry.

Unfortunately the countries of the world persist in the same old trade practices. The creditor nations continue to show an insatiable appetite for favourable balances of trade, and then wonder why other people cannot pay their debts. Those nations show an unwillingness to balance their trade with the rest of the world, though that is the only way the other nations can get the wherewithal to pay their bills. Economic conquest through these favourable balances of trade continues apace. Too many nations think in terms of a good deal rather than in terms of what is fair and in the interests of humanity. The spirit of exploitation is still very much in evidence throughout the world, and from my observations tariff restrictions and restrictive customs practices still greatly impede the movement of goods across borders. And with all this there is an evident desire to get into the position where one country can export to other countries not only its surplus goods but its unemployment as well. It is true that the trade conferences of late years have made some attempts to get the world on a new footing in this regard, but they have merely tackled some of the inconsequentials, and have left strictly alone those most grievous, fundamentally iniquitous things such as the most-favoured-nation clauses of trade treaties, and so on.

At Lake Success I discovered the same old lack of faith in and suspicion of one another. There appeared to be the old determination, in many instances, to save face. There is still much secret diplomacy, as we used to call it, and shifting of alliances, though today we give them different names such as Atlantic union, Pacific pact, or something of the kind. It appears that some countries still foster the belief that the best way to achieve a prominent position in the world and get along is to lie and cheat and steal, to mislead, to enslave and murder, to turn God out of His heaven and put Mammon in His place. In those countries the aim appears to be to make themselves physically and materially powerful, but spiritually and morally impotent.

I do not want to weary the house with many more of these things, so let me simply ask, what chance have the free nations of the world to build a temple of peace out of such stuff and upon such foundations as that? It is perfectly clear to me that there must be widespread repentance and turning back to the principles of right, decency and justice before we can possibly lay the foundation for peace in the world and abolish fear of war. The United Nations has failed to achieve peace in the world, so now we are basing our faith upon regional pacts. We have on paper plans for an integrated military force for the defence of Europe and the Atlantic states. We have a supreme commander, though as yet of course he cannot be said to have a force. I join with the Prime Minister in the hope that the twelve Atlantic nations will make all speed toward the integration of their strength. I share with him also the belief that if they do, and if we have faith in one another, in our combined strength we can put an end to aggression.

Canada, of course, must do her full part if this effort is to be successful. It is certainly clear that the world as a whole is in a state of unpreparedness. What about Canada? Are we prepared? That is the question we have to consider. The speech from the throne expresses concern over the need for the St. Lawrence seaway in relation to our security. In fairness I know our government cannot be blamed for the failure to develop that seaway, so let us hope those forces, if I may put it that way, that have been responsible for blocking the project, will repent of their ways and come to see that the security of all North America depends to a great extent indeed upon the development of the St. Lawrence seaway.

That excuse, of course, cannot be given for the fact that as yet we have not a trans-Canada highway. As a consequence we are unprepared to move equipment and supplies quickly through our country from east to west to meet any threat that might develop to any part of it. It is likely that we will have to pay pretty dearly for our lack of vision and action in this respect. While I am speaking of highways and lack of vision, we have also neglected for far too long to provide highways and adequate means of communication in the great Canadian northwest. There we have metals, minerals and foodstuffs being produced, all of which are essential to our strength and our preparedness, but it is most difficult and costly under present circumstances to move them, and as a result any effort we may make to defend our country will not be as effective as it otherwise could be.

Canada continues to be largely dependent upon other countries for a good many of the essentials of life and of defence, things we could and should be producing for ourselves in the quantities we need. Here again it seems to me we have shown a lack of vision and of preparation for the future. It is perfectly true that since 1945 we have increased our steel production quite considerably, I believe to a fairly large extent through government assistance and leadership. But we are still far short of the production we need even in times of peace. One particular in which I think there was a sad lack of foresight was in the fact that the financial assistance provided by the government to the steel industry some time ago was extended only to the companies already producing steel. Apparently no assistance whatever was offered to induce the organization of new companies and help them finance these vast undertakings. I can see no valid reason why much of the iron ore presently going from the Steep Rock area to the United States should not be made into steel right at the coal beds of our own country, notably in southern Alberta. It is no further from western Ontario to the coal fields of southern Alberta than it is from Sweden to the Ruhr valley of Germany. I was there in 1948 and witnessed what had been going on for many years; that is, a very large, very successful steel industry based upon iron ore being carried clear from Sweden to the coal beds of the Ruhr valley. The physical possibilities are here in Canada, but we have neglected their development until now, of course, we are facing an emergency and we are not ready.

Neither have we developed our fuel industry. We still have to buy twenty-five or twenty-six million tons of coal from the United States with scarce American dollars, while forty-nine billion tons of perfectly good coal and great quantities of oil in Canada remain relatively untouched and undeveloped. A similar situation exists with respect to sugar, and right now there is evidence that considerable quantities of fats are going to waste simply because there is no place to put them. Yet, any moment fats can become so scarce that soaps and other essentials would have to be rationed. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the appropriate department of government could be exercising some leadership in attempting to save what we have and convert it into a form that could be stored against the day when it will be needed. Any program for successful defence will have to include a program of stepping up our production of all these essentials to the limit of Canada's ability to produce them.

Since I came here in 1945, Mr. Speaker, a good deal has been said in this house about the centralization of industrial activity in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Not much heed has been paid to the warning which has been issued frequently because there continues to be industrial centralization for the sake of—well, I do not know what.

Mr. Blackmore: Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. Low: Yes, perhaps for Ontario and Quebec. At a time too, when, for the sake of security, the greatest possible measure of decentralization ought to be taking place. In a country as vast and broad as Canada is, it is essential in the interests of our security to have strong regional industrial activity. There might be some excuse for this centralization of industry in the central provinces of Canada if the raw materials and sources of power were not available in other parts, but that is not so.

Again, a good many thinking people, Mr. Speaker, are going to realize that one of Canada's pressing problems, and one of our weaknesses today, is the continual and serious decline in the purchasing value of the Canadian dollar. During the last year the cost of living in Canada has risen by ten points. As a result our 1951 dollar is worth just a little more than half the value of our 1939 dollar. That fact is startling. Startling as it is, there are a good many thinkers who believe that the Canadian dollar will continue to decline in value until it reaches twenty or thirty cents lower than it is. Ask the housewife what she thinks about this cost of living and the declining value of the Canadian dollar. She knows that the beefsteak she bought in 1939 for 27½ cents a pound now costs her close to a dollar a pound. Furthermore, I think it is common knowledge that the housewife today has to pay 16 cents for the loaf of bread for which in 1939 she paid 6½ cents. Milk that cost 9 or 10 cents a quart in 1939, now costs 18 or 20 cents.

The other day I noted that some of the milk companies in this city announced they were jumping the price of skim milk—you know that blue, anaemic stuff that they used to pour down the drain—to 15 cents a quart. So it is with almost every necessity of living, as well as most of the things that are not essential.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And you require a doctor's prescription to get it.

Mr. Low: Yes, the increases in the cost of living do not matter too much to the people whose incomes have increased in the same proportion or better, but let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that those people whose incomes have not kept pace with the shrinking value of our money find themselves in a serious predicament today. The tragedy lies in the mistaken idea that there are only a few of these people. There are thousands of them. In addition to those, there are a good many thousands of people in Canada who are trying to eke out an existence on fixed incomes, such as pensions or annuities which they bought with dollars that would purchase twice as much as they do today or perhaps three or four times as much. Some people are trying to live on incomes from investments that were made some years ago. These people are suffering. They need to have some assistance.

There are a good many farmers also in this country, Mr. Speaker, who face the future with anything but optimism and confidence because of spiralling prices. The other day a farmer in Saskatchewan wrote to me, and this is what he said:

> I am just a poor Saskatchewan mixed farmer and these higher wage, higher price, higher tax spirals are pushing men like me into a chasm of despair. What started out as a small slide has turned into an avalanche overnight.

This is typical of the feeling of many farmers throughout Canada.

In a general way I think it is true to say that the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar is less than 56 cents, largely because neither the government, organized labour, the owners or managers of business, nor the consumers as such have been conscious of cost and what it means. We are all consumers, and we are just as guilty as anyone else. We are not cost-conscious. I think it is true to say also that this same unconsciousness of cost has allowed our dollar to shrink in the alarming way I have outlined, and that is going to destroy the spirit and basis of independence and individual freedom in Canada if we are not careful. With increased prices, taxes inevitably are made higher. They find their way into costs, and they create an upward pressure on prices and the cost of living. The reserves which individuals have saved for emergency and old age, sickness or disability, in many instances have been drained away. With the dwindling of those reserves, the freedom and independence of the people will go out the window. Consequently, more and more of our Canadian people will become little better than wards of the government.

I wish I had time to outline what I believe are three or four very bad practices that have been established in Canada, and which have contributed to this shrinking value of the Canadian dollar. I shall mention briefly one of them, and that is the stupid way in which the government has managed, or not managed, the supply of money in our country. Perhaps at another time I shall have an opportunity of dealing with that. At this stage let me just mention one factor contributing to the shrinking value of the dollar which I think it is essential to place on record for the Canadian people. In our country the mistaken idea has grown up that the way to stop inflation and bring our economy into balance is to fight blindly for higher wages and shorter hours of work. I am all in favour of wages and hours of work that are as just and as fair as possible, but it ought to have been clear to both labour and management that there is nothing either of them can do with wages to put sense back into the Canadian dollar or restore living standards in this country. Increased wages mean increased costs of production and increased taxes. All of these push prices up to the point where nothing at all is gained by wage increases.

Is it not tragic, Mr. Speaker, that we have all failed to keep our eye on output, prices, and the purchasing value of our currency? Instead of that we have kept our eye on wages and pushing them up. There is where our eye should have been, on prices, output, and the purchasing value of our Canadian currency. I have heard it said that the consumer, who is also a labourer, will literally go through hell to double his wages, but he will not turn over his hand to reduce consumer prices. Now, something must be done to put sense back into the Canadian dollar, to stabilize the value of the Canadian dollar at a reasonable level. Our people cannot feel like making the supreme effort they will be called upon to make if they have to go into the heavy days ahead overburdened by the high cost of living.

Let me warn the members of this house, Mr. Speaker, that whatever we do about it we must be sure that we preserve unimpaired the liberties of the Canadian people. A people without the maximum of individual liberty lack the incentive to become great, lack the ability to out-produce, out-invent and out-calculate those who are determined to take away our liberty and destroy us, in order that they might make themselves the dictators of the world. Upon preserving the liberties of our people certainly will depend the future greatness of our country.

Let me just mention one other thing before I come to the conclusion of my remarks, Mr. Speaker. It appears that in Canada the spirit of "gouge" is the spirit of the times. "Get all you can while you can get it" seems to be the slogan of all too many people. This spirit, if continued, will weaken our efforts to rise effectively to the defence of ourselves, of our great country and of the free countries of the world; and it will make it impossible to build a temple of peace that will really ensure peace.

I see, however, some bright things as well, of course. Canada has expressed her willingness to do her share in providing technical assistance to underprivileged areas of the world. I think that is good and it shows where our heart is. Canada also has indicated that she will take a part in the Colombo plan. These are some examples.

There is another thing I should like to mention at this time and that is the initiative that was shown by the Prime Minister when he set out by himself to seek clarification of the Red China note to the United Nations. I congratulate the Prime Minister on being so independent. I do not by any means share the views of those people who criticized him as having deserted his friends. I am convinced that his determination to resist any effort by other powers to push him into conformity with their views, if he is convinced within himself that that is not the way that Canada should go, will be supported fairly largely by the people of Canada.

In conclusion let me say this, Mr. Speaker. If the Canadian people really want to survive, they will face squarely the facts of our present situation. They will prepare themselves for the tasks that will have to be done. They will be prepared to sacrifice some of their comforts in the interests of an effective defence and co-operative effort to deter and prevent aggression. They will bend themselves to an all-out productive effort, and they will show a willingness to give a good day's work for a good day's pay. At the same time they will have to take measures to ensure that their government respects their rights and does not alienate their freedoms. They will have to repent of their errors and shortcomings; they will have to come to understand fully that our surest defence is going to be a change of heart, and that the price of peace is righteousness.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I take advantage of the looseness of our rules in connection with this debate because it is the last time that I shall have the privilege of addressing you as Mr. Speaker. I wish to conform with what has always been the practice and to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address. I did not hear their speeches but I read them with care, and I can say that they are in conformity with the best traditions of this House of Commons.

Some few weeks ago I announced to my constituents my intention of bringing to a close my life here in Ottawa. I did that because I have always thought my first duty was to them. I of course communicated with my whip and with my leader who have so generously given me their friendship and their guidance. I have no intention now of making a speech to you. I recall that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) once told me jokingly that I was an evangelical. I have since thought that he spoke much more truth than fiction when he made that remark; because on an occasion such as this there is a tremendous urge to tell the world what its troubles are and to advance cures for them. You will be glad to know that I have successfully put down that temptation. In fact, it seems to me that I have spent my whole life in putting down temptations, but not of that kind. This is no time for me to preach, and I have no intention of doing so.

My specific business this evening is to do one thing among others which I will mention in a moment. First, I want to thank the staff of this House of Commons; and by the staff, I mean everybody from the gentlemen at the table to the most humble and the newest page boy in the chamber. I must mention the protective staff; not that I have needed much protection, in a way, but I think if I have any championship in this house, it is in losing my stick, my hat, my coat, my keys and my files. The protective staff have always returned them, and done it with a smile. May I say that one of the impressions I carry with me from here is the kindliness with which all members of the staff—the dining room girls and everyone else—treat us members who are supposed to be little gods but who, after all, are just simple people dealing with other simple people. While speaking of the staff of the house, I want to say a word or two to the men of Hansard. Last summer when I had not much to do, I picked up a volume of Hansard and I read what I thought was a good speech. Then I found that it was attributed to me. You can imagine my shock on the discovery I then made. But I am indebted to Hansard for the excellent phrasing they used and which they attributed to me. I am inclined to think that I have been justified in one kind of pure laziness. I have stubbornly refused to correct my remarks in Hansard, and I am more than happy that I was sufficiently lazy not to do that because these people have done it much better than I possibly could have done it myself.

I now turn to another group of people with whom we are associated, namely, the members of the press gallery. I can only say one thing to them, namely, to thank them for their fairness, even generosity, to me in the time that I have been here. I also want to thank the press of Canada for the kindly things they have said about me. As one member of my family remarked—I think it was my daughter—"It is a wonderful thing to have these obituaries while you are still alive." That is pretty much what has taken place.

I now turn—and this is my business here—to this institution of the House of Commons and its members. There is practically nothing I can say except to wish each of them the best of good luck in this world. My prayer is, particularly in view of the difficulties with which they are confronted at the moment, that they may have God's guidance in their deliberations here.

I said I was not going to preach, and I will not except perhaps to say one thing. I have been doing a lot of thinking lately because I have had lots of time to think. I said to myself: "You have been there a few years"—I am in the seventh year now—"What did you come out with? What is your idea of the chief function or responsibility of the House of Commons?" I enumerated in my mind all the virtues that a man could have or a nation could have. I came to a very simple conclusion, a conclusion that I know to be right, namely, that perhaps the chief thing that rests upon us here is that within these four walls and in our hands rest the honour and conscience of the Dominion of Canada. You may differ about material things, but no nation ever yet made any mark in history over any length of time unless it did so with honour. When it lost that it went down, as those men in Russia will go down because they are without honour.

I borrow from the poet and say this, and this is the only thing that anyone can describe as an attempt at eloquence. I do not like that word, but I remember this couplet so well with respect to the conscience and honour of Canada. I say to you: Sirs, I charge you, keep it holy; keep it as a sacred thing. Without it everything we do will become dust and ashes even in our time.

Now I must go. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago I came through the door behind us. I know that I brought nothing with me. I think it was Omar Khayyam who said, as I shall say it in a moment:

> Myself when young did eagerly frequent
> Doctor and Saint, and heard great argument
> About it and about: but evermore
> Came out by the same door where in I went.

I am glad the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is in his place. Omar Khayyam talked about doctor and saint. He said he heard great arguments. I have heard great arguments, but I have not seen many doctors or saints. I am inclined to think that in Omar's day he was not referring to medical doctors. He must have been referring to the fellows who in these days would be a Ph.D. or something like that. I remember so well when I was young thinking that I would go to Chicago university in order to try to get a Ph.D. and be called a doctor, because in those days the fact was that you could get a Ph.D. while the train passed through just as you can buy a bottle of Coca-Cola today. As a matter of fact times have changed.

But I have not seen many doctors, I have seen only one saint. I am inclined to think that I have seen altogether too much of him and that saint is St. Laurent, who sits opposite.

I have already said, sir, that I have brought nothing with me. Before continuing I think I should say to the house that I am far from being incapacitated. I want to take this opportunity of correcting the false impressions that are very much abroad in this country, namely, that members of parliament are down here for a rather well-to-do holiday. In my own town I meet people whom I know quite well and they say: "Oh, you are on a short holiday, are you?" I had not been in the House of Commons for a while, but they did not know it. That did not make any difference. They think we are having a holiday. If fourteen hours a day is a holiday, sir, then I do not grasp at all the simple meaning of the word.

I do not claim that I worked fourteen hours a day. Nobody can. But there is a pull on your mind and a single trackness about this business which it is difficult to bear. That was particularly true last session when we worked fourteen hours a day six days a week. So far as I am concerned that put the climax on my position. The doctors—not the kind I spoke about a moment ago—are very fond of using the word "hypertension" these days. What it means, I do not know—but I think it is the father and the mother of high blood pressure, or something like that.

That is the position in which I find myself. It is not that I cannot work: I have been forbidden to go through this routine which, apparently, is likely to last for some considerable length of time. I have been told definitely that if I do attempt this, then they will not accept the responsibility for what may happen.

I interrupted myself, so to speak, a moment ago when I said that I brought nothing with me. In a moment—and not more than a moment—I shall be going through that same door. But I go out greatly enriched by what I have seen here. In this arm I hold an armful of memories; the other is overflowing with friendship.

I speak of memories. I do not intend to tell you about them—with perhaps one or two exceptions. I think I shall miss the magnificent rages of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and then, after having finished his speech, seeing him sit down wearing that broad, beaming smile, thus enhancing a not otherwise unhandsome countenance.

I am afraid I cannot help mentioning my old friend and colleague, the late Tommy Church. I am going to sail his seven seas—but not with him.

You know, Mr. Speaker, while the leader of the Social Credit party was speaking the thought occurred to me that, if I could stick it, if I could sit here and listen to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), who needs no provocation, expound the principles of social credit, ultimately I might understand the thing—which I do not at the present time.

I leave, Mr. Speaker, happy in the thought that there is not a member, not a person in this room, to whom I cannot bid "good morning"—and mean it. It may be that at times I may have unleashed the odd arrow. But I give you my word of honour, the tips were never dipped in the poison of hatred, or even of enmity.

And so I go. It is hard to realize that I go, not to return again. Tomorrow or next day I shall place in the hands of my whip those documents which are necessary for the carrying out of that intention which, sir, I have no doubt you have grasped, from what I have already said.

Years ago when friends parted the expression most commonly used was, "God be with you." That phrase has been abbreviated—corrupted, I think—until there remains just one thing to say, and that sincerely, "Good bye."

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: There is before the house a motion for the adjournment of the debate. Before the debate is adjourned may I say that the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) has left the chamber. Before going, however, he intimated that probably he will not return.

I cannot force him to return; if he tenders his resignation, then doubtless we shall be forced to accept it. I do feel, however, that I should express to him the feeling of all members here, and that is that while we have noticed that probably he is weak of limb, we have also noticed that he is still very strong in mind. We feel that, if at all possible, we would want him to continue to carry out the duties he owes to his constituents, and the service he could render to his country.

We realize, from what he has said, that his health is in danger. I believe I speak for all hon. members when I say that we hope he will consult his medical advisers again and that they may give him some encouragement. We would hope that it might be possible for him to reconsider the decision he has made. He may rest assured that if it is at all possible for him to return to the house, he will receive here a very warm welcome indeed.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. St. Laurent moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sure there are many members in the house who would like personally to convey to our beloved colleague from Calgary the sentiments you have just expressed. Therefore it might be agreeable if at this time we were to adjourn. It has already been intimated that tomorrow afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) will express his views about the international situation. I do not think we would be losing any time if we were to adjourn now, thus affording us the opportunity of conveying to our colleague the views you so eloquently expressed from the chair.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.02 p.m.

APPENDIX

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES

TEXT OF LETTER SENT TO THE PREMIERS OF ALL THE PROVINCES

Ottawa, January 2, 1951

Hon. J. W. Jones, M.A., B.Sc.A.,
Premier of Prince Edward Island,
Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Dear Mr. Jones:

The Prime Minister has directed me to submit to you for consideration by your government the two enclosed proposed amendments to the British North America Act respecting old age pensions and a provincial sales tax.

The Prime Minister has asked me to state that he would like to have your comments with respect to these proposals as soon as you could conveniently send them.

Yours very truly,

Stuart S. Garson

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO B.N.A. ACT

1. Add a new subsection to section 95 in the following terms:

"(2) Notwithstanding anything in this act, the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions."

2. Re-enact head 2 of section 92 to read as follows:

"2. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by

(a) direct taxation within the province, and

(b) indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the province and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province."

Premier's Office
Prince Edward Island

January 5, 1951

Hon. Stuart Garson,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Canada

Dear Mr. Garson:

The government of Prince Edward Island approves the two proposed amendments to the British North America Act respecting old age pensions and a provincial sales tax which were forwarded in your letter of January 2.

Very truly yours,

J. Walter Jones

The Premier
The Government of the Province of New Brunswick

Fredericton, January 6, 1951

Hon. Stuart Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Canada

Dear Mr. Garson:

I have your letter of January 2 which was accompanied by two proposed amendments to the British North America Act, one respecting old age pensions and the other a provincial sales tax.

We shall let you have our views thereon just as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,

John B. McNair

Office of the Prime Minister

Halifax, January 19, 1951

Hon. Stuart Garson,
Minister of Justice and Attorney General,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Garson:

I thank you for your letter of January 2, and in reply thereto, I beg to enclose comments on the proposed amendments, which for convenience are divided into comments on proposal No. 1, and comments on proposal No. 2. I assume that when you have heard from other provinces, and got an amendment in some more advanced form, we will again be furnished with a copy, so that we may have a chance of looking at it before it is introduced or passed.

Yours sincerely,
A. L. Macdonald

Comments Re Proposed Amendments To B.N.A. Act

Re Proposal 1:

1. Add a new subsection to section 95 in the following terms:

"(2) Notwithstanding anything in this act, the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions."

This amendment is treated differently from that relating to unemployment insurance, for the apparent reason that it is not intended or desired that the legislative power of the dominion parliament should be exclusive in relation to old age pensions. Therefore the amendment is not incorporated into section 91 because of the effect of the opening clause of that section, particularly the word "exclusive", and the effect of the closing clause of section 91.

It is doubted, however, that the proposed wording of the new subsection, even as a subsection of section 95, would avoid the effect of making the dominion's powers exclusive, or would result in concurrent powers being possessed by the provincial legislatures. While it may be desirable from the standpoint of the province that the dominion's power should be exclusive, that result would not appear to have been intended from discussions at the conference.

The phraseology of the amendment as proposed is quite similar to that of section 101, and attention is drawn to the interpretation placed on that section by the judicial committee in the privy council appeals reference (1947 A.C. 127). It will be recalled that the argument was advanced that section 101 could not give the dominion parliament power to create a final court of appeal, at least in respect of matters coming within the legislative powers of the provinces under section 92. This is dealt with by Lord Jowitt, who delivered the opinion of the judicial committee, at pages 151 to 153 of the report cited, and attention is drawn particularly to the following remarks found on pages 152 and 153 of the report:

"But in the opinion of Their Lordships the same considerations lead to the conclusion that the court so established must have not only 'final' or 'ultimate' but also exclusive appellate jurisdiction. They would emphasize that section 101 confers a legislative power on the dominion parliament which by its terms overrides any power conferred by section 92 on the provinces or preserved by section 129. 'Notwithstanding anything in this act' are words in section 101 which cannot be ignored. They vest in the dominion a plenary authority to legislate in regard to appellate jurisdiction, which is qualified only by that which lies outside the act, namely, the sovereign power of the imperial parliament."

It is suggested that if the intention is to grant concurrent legislative powers to the legislatures in the provinces, that might be accomplished by adding a subsection to section 95 paralleling the wording of the present section 95 somewhat as follows:

"(2) In each province the legislature may make laws in relation to old age pensions in the province; and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in any or all of the provinces."

Re Proposal 2:

2. Re-enact head 2 of section 92 to read as follows:

"2. The raising of revenue for provincial purposes by

(a) direct taxation within the province, and

(b) Indirect taxation within the province in respect of the sale of goods (except goods sold for shipment outside the province) to a buyer for purposes of consumption or use and not for resale, at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price, but not so as to discriminate between sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured within the province and sales of goods grown, produced or manufactured outside the province."

It is suggested that there is no good reason for changing the form of the existing head (2) of section 92 in any way. That head has been the subject of consideration in a great many cases and a considerable amount of jurisprudence has been built up on the basis of the wording exactly as it stands. At least some of the effect of the decisions would be lost even by a rearrangement in form or by such an apparently minor change as the omission of the indefinite article before the word "revenue". For instance, there is at least the question raised by Lord Phillimore in Caron v The King, but not decided, as to whether the dominion has a power of indirect taxation for provincial purposes, and the argument developed by Professors Kennedy and Wells in their work on the "Law of Taxation in Canada" to the effect that there may be a provincial power of indirect taxation for provincial purposes. Without suggesting that questions such as these are substantial or indeed have particular merit, none the less the existence of a considerable volume of case law and comment would seem to be a sufficient reason for retaining the head in its present form unless there is very good reason for a change, and no such reason seems to exist. The proposed provision with respect to indirect taxation might be included in section 92 as a new enumerated head (2A).

The amendment granting the power of indirect taxation will have to be very carefully drawn, as from it alone will the province derive its whole indirect taxation power and by it will that power be limited. Before suggesting any alternative, some comments in respect of the form suggested may be in order. With respect to the exception (in parentheses): in those provinces which now have a tax in the nature of a sales tax, an exception is made of goods sold for delivery outside the province. There are two apparent reasons for such an exception: first, as the tax is in theory and in form a direct tax on the purchaser, it would be ultra vires of the province to attempt to impose that tax on a purchaser outside the boundaries of the province; second, it is apparently considered desirable to avoid placing a vendor within the province in an unfavourable position as compared with his competitors outside the province. As it is proposed to confer the power of indirect taxation, the first reason would no longer exist, and the second would exist only if some provinces refrained from imposing an indirect tax or if the rate of tax imposed varied as between provinces.

It would seem that the exemption of goods sold for shipment outside the province should be in the discretion of the provincial legislature. If the exemption is in the provision authorizing the tax it would place a premium on interprovincial trade and offer wide scope for evasion as no province would be in a position to levy a tax in respect of interprovincial sales.

The interpretation to be attached to the word "goods" and to the phrase "consumption or use and not for resale" is of the utmost importance, since the enabling section will represent the sole source of the provincial taxing power and any taxation statute made under its authority will be strictly construed. Questions immediately arise as to whether "goods", as here used, would include services, such as medical services; combinations of services and materials, as automotive repairs; or intangibles, such as electricity or telephone service. Similarly, the question will arise as to whether materials purchased at retail and incorporated in and forming part of a substantially new product, later also sold at retail, are, in the first instance, consumed or used. For example, a small bakery establishment might purchase flour, sugar, shortening, etc., from a retailer at retail prices and, in the broad sense, use these materials in the ordinary course of the business of a baker. The product of the bakery would subsequently be sold at retail and there is at least the possibility of double taxation. Reference to the interpretation applied to the word "goods" as used in existing federal and provincial statutes is not of much value, inasmuch as the meaning given to the word can be and is expanded or restricted by definition within the statute or by supplemental regulations. It would not be possible to define the meaning to be attributed to goods in the enabling section by a definition in the taxing statute of the province. Similarly, no definition could be supplied in a provincial taxing statute as to the meaning to be given to the phrase "consumption or use and not for resale". It is very difficult to express a taxing power of limited scope in terms as brief as those proposed. The alternatives are to assure that the taxing power is sufficiently broad and to place the restrictions in the actual taxing statute, or to make the section conferring the taxing authority sufficiently comprehensive to cover the exact limitations for the taxing authority. If the latter course were followed it would perhaps be necessary to include within the enabling section definitions of the key words of the section after discussion had determined just what that meaning should be.

The final clause of the proposed amendment is apparently designed to prevent anything in the nature of a provincial customs duty. It is suggested that discrimination in favour of the goods of the enacting province as against those of other provinces would be ultra vires under section 121 of the act in any event, but if considered desirable for other reasons there is no particular objection to this clause.

As the basis of consideration and negotiation it might be suggested that head (2) of section 92 be left as it now stands and that a new head (2A) be added to section 92 in some such form as:

> "(2A) the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes by indirect taxation at a rate not exceeding three per centum of the sale price in respect of sales within the province to purchases for purposes other than resale."

TEXT OF LETTER SENT TO THE PREMIERS OF ALL THE PROVINCES

Ottawa, January 20, 1951

The Hon. A. L. Macdonald, P.C., K.C.,
Premier of Nova Scotia,
Halifax, N.S.

Dear Mr. Macdonald:

Since I wrote you on January 2 enclosing a suggested constitutional amendment to make it possible, inter alia, for provincial governments to impose an indirect sales tax at the retail level, it has become clear that such a proposal will be subject to the most powerful opposition of the retailing industry throughout the country. Apparently the attack will be made partly on the plausible ground that if provincial governments are allowed the right to levy indirect sales taxation, they may discriminate between different classes or types of retailers based on their residence, or their ownership, or their marketing methods, or what not—thus setting up effective trade barriers between different parts of the country. You will recall that it was on this general ground that a somewhat similar proposal was defeated in the Senate in 1936.

I think you will agree that it would be most unfortunate if, as a result of a similar attack based on similar grounds, we should fail to secure the enactment of a measure which provides for an extension of the taxing powers of the provincial governments. After very careful consideration, therefore, we would propose that there be added to the draft amendment already sent you, dealing with retail sales taxation, the following words:

> "and not so as to discriminate between sellers or classes of sellers of the same class of goods."

Yours very truly,

Stuart Garson

Dear Premier Macdonald:

Thank you very much indeed for your letter of January 19 and the exceedingly useful material enclosed in it, which will have our most earnest consideration.

You are right in your assumption that when we have heard from all of the other provinces and got an amendment in more advanced form, we will again send a copy to you so that you will have a chance of looking at it before it is introduced or passed. Indeed, there may be some intermediate correspondence concerning some of the points such as those raised by you in the above-mentioned material which you just sent to me.

May I express my appreciation of the careful attention which you have given to this matter. Your suggestions will be exceedingly helpful.

Yours sincerely,

Stuart S. Garson

Office of
The Prime Minister and President of the Council
Ontario

Toronto, Ontario, January 24, 1951

The Hon. Stuart S. Garson, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Ontario

Dear Mr. Garson:

Thank you for your letter of the 2nd instant with reference to constitutional amendments and enclosing draft amendments.

Concerning the amendment relating to old age pensions, the amendment you propose is as follows:

"(2) Notwithstanding anything in this act, the parliament of Canada may make laws in relation to old age pensions."

I have no hesitation in saying that this government is in favour of an amendment giving power to the federal parliament to deal with the matter of old age pensions. We regard this as very important and urgent and hope that there will be no delay in the enactment of an amendment. We are in hopes that it will be possible to have this matter settled so that necessary legislation can be brought forward at the coming session of parliament. We shall stand ready to implement our portion of the arrangement, and we are hopeful that it will be possible to deal with this matter at the coming session of the legislature, which convenes on February 1. Our legislation, of course, must necessarily follow yours. Therefore, the early action of parliament in this matter would be most helpful to us.

In commenting on the amendment which you have submitted, I have the following comments which come after a consultation with the attorney general.

You suggest that this amendment be added as subsection (2), section 95. The heading of section 95 is "Agriculture and Immigration," which might make it inappropriate to have this placed in this section. We suggest that it might be better to provide a new section, possibly to be called 95(a).

At the present time it is, I believe, conceded that legislation in relation to old age pensions is within the exclusive power of provincial legislatures under "Property and Civil Rights in the Province." As I understand the matter, it is now proposed that the federal government should be given jurisdiction concurrent with the provinces in relation to old age pensions. It is apparent that the provinces will need such jurisdiction in the proposed arrangements, as they will participate in pensions between sixty-five and sixty-nine inclusive, and probably in other ways. If the amendment is passed in its present form might it not subtract from the field of property and civil rights and place the power to deal with old age pensions exclusively within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada? That I do not think is intended. The jurisdiction is to be concurrent.

I therefore advance the suggestion that the best solution would be to follow the principle contained in section 95 which authorizes legislation by both legislatures and parliament in relation to agriculture and immigration. If this principle were adopted as to old age pensions, the section might appear somewhat as follows:

"In each province the legislature may make laws in respect to old age pensions and it is hereby declared that the parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pensions in all or any of the provinces, but no law passed by the parliament of Canada in relation to this subject shall affect the operation of any law in respect to old age pensions passed by a provincial legislature."

You might give consideration to the above matter. May I repeat that in principle we are in agreement. It is only the form of the amendment with which we are now concerned. The present proposal is that the federal government shall make universal pensions to persons seventy and over, but it is quite understood that the federal and provincial governments will remain in partnership in connection with pensions below that age, and perhaps in other matters relating to pensions. Therefore I think that the amendment should be clear that the jurisdiction is concurrent.

Very sincerely yours,

Leslie M. Frost

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 2, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

(Translation):

PRIME MINISTER OF FRANCE

VISIT OF MR. RENÉ PLEVEN AND HIS PARTY TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, amongst the first to follow upon your instructions of a moment ago, that the doors of the gallery be opened, we see His Excellency Monsieur René Pleven, president of the council of ministers of the French republic, and those who accompany him on a visit which does us honour, Their Excellencies ambassadors Parodi, Alphand and Guérin, the latter of whom is now in Canada, and Miss Sicard.

All our colleagues, I am sure, will wish to extend to them their most heartfelt greetings and to thank them for showing by their presence here the sincerity of the co-operation between European countries and those of North America in our common undertaking to build up a military force of sufficient strength, based on sound national economies, on economies so closely bound as to deter any aggressor.

(Text):

Mr. Rene Pleven, in common with many of us here, Mr. Speaker, boasts of an ancestry whose roots go deep in the soil of Brittany. He has all the qualities and qualifications which we value so highly, among them that of being perfectly bilingual. He is fluent in the two languages which are official in this house. I know from my own privileged experience in relations with them that those who are with him on this occasion are also bilingual. That can only add to the warmth of the welcome we extend to them on this occasion, because it will enable us to feel that, in whichever language the proceedings of our house are conducted in their presence, they will appreciate that our problems and our concerns are the same as theirs, and are the same as those of free men and women all over the world. Our own hopes for world peace are based on the prompt co-operative action of all of us, and the visit with which we are honoured at this time is concrete evidence that that action is being vigorously undertaken.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour to join with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in extending a most cordial welcome to the representative of a nation which is bound to Canada by so many ties of blood and affection. As the Prime Minister has pointed out already, it is perhaps a symbol of that understanding which means so much to all of us that Mr. Pleven comes from that part of France which gave to this country so many of its early settlers.

In joining in this welcome to Premier Pleven may I say also that there are reasons why thoughts of France are at all times in the hearts of the Canadian people. It is because in hundreds of thousands of Canadian minds there is always the memory that there is some part of France that is forever Canada. To all the friends and relatives of nearly 100,000 young Canadians who gave their lives in the common cause of freedom in two world wars, French soil is sacred soil, and the efforts of France to join with us and with the other free nations in preserving that freedom means not only the preservation of the proud soil of France, and all that it means to the people of France, but also, for us, the preservation of those bits of soil throughout that country which are so dear to many of us in Canada.

Mr. Pleven is a young man whom we welcome here not for the first time. We welcome him once again because at this time when there is the utmost understanding between France, Great Britain and Canada—in so many ways bound more closely together by ties of blood than any other nations—it is of maximum importance that in his high office as premier of France he should have a background of years of work in Canada and in Great Britain which gives to him a personal and working knowledge of the lives of the people of those countries, of their own problems, and also of their great strength and stability. Every one of us, not only here but throughout Canada, wishes him well in his high endeavours in this common cause, and we all trust that out of this time of peril and uncertainty France will carry forward into the years ahead her inspired traditions of freedom, industry and culture.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

SURVEYS OF IRON ORE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Will he make a statement at this time with regard to the proposals of his department dealing with surveys of iron ore in the province of British Columbia? I make this request because of a statement heard on a C.B.C. station last night concerning export.

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver South was kind enough to give me a few minutes' notice of his question, but I was not able to secure complete information. With your permission, sir, I should like to bring in a complete report at the next sitting of the house.

KOREA

REPORTED DECISION THAT UNITED NATIONS FORCES SHOULD STOP AT 38TH PARALLEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister indicate whether the report is correct that United States officials have decided that United Nations troops should stop at the 38th parallel? Is this not a decision which should be made by the general assembly of the United Nations?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member was kind enough to give me some notice of this question, which presumably refers to press reports in this morning's newspapers. I am not in a position to confirm the accuracy or otherwise of that report. The government has received no information, official or otherwise, concerning it.

As to the second question, Mr. Speaker, it is of course a hypothetical one. Under the circumstances which the hon. member contemplates, I would think it would be proper for the question to be discussed in the United Nations. The unified command is, of course, not precluded from deciding to hold the advance of the United Nations forces at any point which it deems advisable.

WHEAT

ARRANGEMENTS MADE BY INDIA FOR SUPPLIES FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the government of India made representations concerning the urgent need of that country for wheat? If so, to what extent have such requests been carried out?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The government of India has not made formal representations to the Canadian government, but has made arrangements with the Canadian wheat board for supplies of wheat. The Canadian wheat board has contracted to supply the government of India with 300,000 long tons of wheat, which is now in process of being shipped in accordance with the terms of the contract. Discussions have taken place within recent days between representatives of the government of India and the Canadian wheat board with regard to the supplying of some further quantities.

I may say that the quantities of wheat that are now available for sale are limited to grades that are not considered to be milling grades; that is, they are No. 5, No. 6, and feed wheat. Discussions are now in process to ascertain whether India can use any of these grades of wheat.

Mr. Graydon: Is this part of the commonwealth plan in which Canada is participating, or is it a collateral transaction between Canada and India?

Mr. Howe: Sales have been made directly between Canada and India under the international wheat agreement to which we are both parties.

REFERENCE TO "VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS" OF THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1

Mr. Speaker: It has been brought to my attention by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. MacLean) that on page 17 of yesterday's Votes and Proceedings it is recorded that Mr. MacLean (Cape Breton North and Victoria) seconded the motion of Mr. MacDougall for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Dominion Day Act and the Victoria Day Act. That is a mistake. The motion was seconded by the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. McLean). I can assure the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria that the record will be corrected accordingly.

INDIAN ACT

AMENDMENT AND CONSOLIDATION—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO BAND FUNDS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend, consolidate and clarify the Indian Act, and to provide, inter alia, for band funds and expenditures therefrom, and for other appropriations in case of deficiency or lack of band funds.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) yesterday that it is not the intention of the government to set up a committee on defence, may I return to the earlier suggestion that I made. In view of the primary importance of national defence in the discussions of this session and of the desirability of having an orderly debate on that subject without the intervention of other matters, may I again urge that a day or a number of days be set aside on which national defence can be debated following a statement by the Minister of National Defence.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I know of no standing order under which that can be done before the special order with respect to the speech from the throne has been complied with. I understand that it is the intention of the Minister of National Defence to make a full statement early in that debate and the minister's statement can be followed by discussion of everything contained therein; it would not be within the power of the government, however, even if it felt so inclined, to prevent any hon. member from raising any other question that he might think warranted the attention of the house and of the country.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In beginning, Mr. Speaker, may I congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne upon the way in which they performed their difficult duties. They did credit to themselves and honour to the constituencies they represent in this house. They made some constructive and practical suggestions. Their speeches were short and to the point. I hope that mine this afternoon will at least be to the point. In view of the ramifications of the subject which I am discussing, I am afraid it may not be as short as I should like it to be, and as I am sure other members would like it to be.

We all know that these are fateful days in the relations between nations. Those relations involve many complicated and indeed dangerous issues which at times divide even friends. In dealing with some of them today—and I certainly shall not be able to deal with all of them—there are certain general considerations which I think we should keep in mind.

The first consideration seems to me to be absolutely fundamental: Our belief that freedom is valuable and precious in itself, and that the loss of freedom anywhere in the world means an impairment and indeed the endangering of our own freedom. We may not always be in a position to defeat attempts to reduce the area in which men can breathe freely, but we should never voluntarily give our consent to that process, because we know that by so doing we would be betraying the principle which is one of the chief inspirations of all free men. Freedom cannot be cloistered in one country, in one continent, or indeed in one hemisphere. To the limit of our resources, therefore, we must try to maintain and even hope to extend the jurisdiction where the writ of freedom runs. Only in that way can we be true to ourselves and to the inheritance we have received.

The second general consideration which I should like to mention is our faith in the United Nations. The aggression against the republic of Korea has tested the United Nations in a searching way and has led to a reappraisal of its role in maintaining the peace, of what it can and cannot do in a divided world of two superstates around which all others tend to group, on the one side willingly and on the other side by compulsion. It has certainly been made clear by recent events that our world organization is not yet in a position where it can safely undertake all the tasks which may be imposed on it by resolutions, and I think it is dishonest to pretend that it can. Whatever may be the result of this re-examination, however, it is certain that the United Nations still fulfils a number of functions which are indispensable if peace is to be maintained on any tolerable basis. For one thing, it holds out the promise of freedom to all. Second, it provides a framework in which men of good will can work for their collective defence and for the coming of the day when the rule of law will replace the rule of force in international relations. Third, by reason of its universal character it keeps alive the idea of the human community.

I do not feel that it should be a reproach to the United Nations that its reach exceeds its grasp. None of us can have doubted that the effort to form a world community under the rule of law would be long and difficult and strewn with disappointments. If that were not the case, there would be neither need for faith nor any credit in cherishing it in bad times as well as in good. This is no time to give up on the United Nations. Indeed we would be betraying the United Nations forces fighting in Korea if we denied the loyalty and faith which we owe to the principles of our charter and our world organization.

There is another debt—and this is the third of the general considerations which I think we should bear in mind. We owe it to those men in Korea and to ourselves to make as cool and rational an appraisal as we can of the dangers which threaten the free world, not only in Korea but at many other points as well, and, in the light of that appraisal, to decide what is the proper policy for the United Nations to pursue in the Far East. For many weeks now the headlines have kept us vividly aware of the fighting in Korea. Unless, however, we are careful to cultivate and maintain a balanced judgment, we may forget that there are forces poised at many other points which could quickly strike against the free world. Only if we remember these other dangers can our policy toward China and Korea be soundly based. There is a depressingly large number of such danger spots, and I should like to mention only a few of them.

Moving westward from Korea we must, I think, take into account the danger that overshadows Indo-China. The Chinese guerrillas and volunteers—"volunteers", an ominous word—have long been assisting the Viet Minh in their attacks on the three new associated states of Viet Nam, Laos and Cambodia. Such indications as we had before June 25 of the possibility of an attack on the republic of Korea are now appearing in the case of Indo-China; and a full-scale attack on that country must be regarded as a real possibility. If the valiant efforts now being made by France to defend and complete the independence of Indo-China were to fail, the whole of southeast Asia, including Burma, Malaya and Indonesia, with their important resources of rubber, rice and tin, might well come under communist control, and the position of India and Pakistan in that event would in the long run, or in the not so long run, be precarious indeed.

Persia and the Middle East are also vulnerable. At the present time the armed forces of the Soviet union face this area and those vital oil fields, in strength sufficient, I think, to overrun it without too much difficulty.

Across the Mediterranean another country immediately threatened is Yugoslavia. Marshal Tito's government is facing great economic difficulties, partly as a result of the serious drought there last year, and partly as the result of the economic blockade imposed on that country by the cominform. Moreover, Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Albania are now, contrary to the provisions of the peace treaties, in possession of sufficient military forces to make them collectively powerful, as well as threatening and aggressive, neighbours.

But the danger to the free world, Mr. Speaker, is still greatest in western Europe itself. Recognition of that fact was the reason for the signing of the North Atlantic pact in the spring of 1949. Since that time progress has been made in increasing the military strength of the countries associated in that pact; but this progress, although it is being accelerated, has not been swift enough to remove anxiety. Western Europe is still relatively weak, and still stands open to Soviet conquest. It is a glittering prize. Its capture would put the Soviet union in possession not only of the source and centre of western civilization, but also of industrial capacity which would enable them to rival the productive resources of the whole of the western hemisphere. We over here would then be in a desperate position indeed.

It is therefore of the utmost importance that our involvement in other areas of the world should not prevent us from recognizing that western Europe is the key point for the defence of the whole of the free world—which includes, incidentally, India and Pakistan as well as Canada and the United States; and we should co-operate with our allies in the North Atlantic treaty in building up forces large enough to deter the Soviet union from launching an attack in that area.

We in Canada hope and believe that the North Atlantic treaty, founded as it is on the common values of our common civilization, will also grow into something far deeper than any military alliance—into an enduring association among nations which share the same aims and the same aspirations. We in Canada are making, and will make, the best contribution we can to that end, and we are encouraged, Mr. Speaker, in that resolve by developments of the last two or three months.

Hon. members will have had an opportunity of reading the statement of General Eisenhower before congress yesterday on the subject of north Atlantic preparedness, and the efforts which are being made, and still greater efforts which will be required, to build up our defensive alliance against any threat of aggression. So far as western Europe is concerned—and this, I repeat, is the most vital area in the front line of our defence—the effort required is partly military and partly, in the broader sense of the term, political. The free nations of Europe are profoundly aware that their future security and prosperity depend in large measure on the unity which they can achieve among themselves. In this development, Mr. Speaker, French statesmanship is playing a great part indeed, under the wise leadership of Prime Minister Pleven, whom we delight to honour in our assembly today.

If there were no other reasons for pressing ahead with these policies of European unification, the problem of Germany itself would make imperative the need for some form of European unity. If democratic Germany is to play her constructive part in a free Europe, it is essential that she should do so within the framework of a freely co-operative Europe coming closer together, economically, politically and militarily.

The present state of the European continent is, as we all know, one of tragic division. The lines which Soviet aggressive policies have drawn across the continent run contrary to the political, cultural and economic interests of the European peoples. This unnatural division, which may hold within it the seeds of future conflict, could be ended tomorrow if the Soviet government sincerely wished to bring it to an end. The three western occupying powers in Germany—the United Kingdom, the United States, and France—have now received from the Soviet government proposals for a four-power meeting on Germany. I do not intend on this occasion to discuss the character of the Soviet invitation, or the terms of the replies which the western occupying powers have returned to the Soviet government. Suffice it to say that if a satisfactory basis could be found for their talks—and it has not been found yet—the Canadian government, and, I am sure, the Canadian parliament, would welcome such a meeting. On the other hand I think it would be a very great mistake indeed to build great and optimistic hopes on the outcome of any such meeting. The truculence and falsehoods contained in the cominform declaration on Germany issued at Prague not long ago are not a foundation upon which any genuine negotiation can be founded. Nevertheless we believe that no occasion should be neglected to attempt to achieve an enduring and honourable settlement of differences with the Soviet union.

These western European dangers and developments must, then, never be forgotten in determining our Far Eastern policy. In formulating that policy—and this is another general consideration—I think we should bear in mind also that here is a new and great tidal movement of nationalism sweeping Asia. In some countries, China for example, it is mingled and confused with, and possibly it is at the moment dominated by, the aggressive forces of Soviet communism. But it is operative in other Asian countries besides China, and it has a vitality of its own. It is something which I believe is deeper and more lasting than communism. Indeed, nationalism—allied to a restless and insistent demand for a better life—is the most important political phenomenon in Asia today. Therefore, in framing our policies we must try to avoid offending the legitimate national and social aspirations of Asian peoples, or their desire to have a chief part in the determination of Asian affairs.

We must also do what we can to improve the economic conditions and human welfare in free Asia. We must try to work with rather than against the forces struggling for a better life in that part of the world. Such co-operation may in the long run become as important for the defence of freedom—and therefore for the defence of Canada—as sending an army to Europe, in the present immediate emergency. Economic and technical assistance is one form of such co-operation. Many members in the house will have read the Colombo plan for co-operative economic development in south and southeast Asia. This imaginative, and, I think, well-founded report, which was published last November as the result of the work of the commonwealth consultative committee, points the way to the kind of effective assistance which we in the west can offer to the free peoples of Asia. They stand in very great need of capital for economic development, and of technical assistance. For Canada to supply either the capital or the technical assistance in any substantial volume would mean considerable sacrifice, now that the demands of our defence program are imposing new strains on our economy.

On the other hand, I personally have been struck by the modesty and good sense with which such countries as India and Pakistan have shown in drawing up plans for their own development for the next six years. The countries of south and southeast Asia which have drawn up programs for inclusion in the report—with populations involved including nearly one-quarter of the population of the world—state that they require, over the six-year period, external finance to the amount of $3 billion, the greater part of which will be supplied by the release of sterling balances held in London. I believe that a Canadian contribution to those programs, even if it has to be smaller than we might be able to make if we were not bearing other and heavy burdens, would have a great effect, not only in doing something to improve the standard of living in that part of the world, but also in convincing the people there of our sympathy and our interest. It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that the government has decided to seek the approval of the house for an appropriate Canadian contribution to the Colombo plan.

In dealing with these Asian problems we sometimes run the risk of differences with tried and dependable allies. And that brings me to another of the cardinal considerations which I think we must keep in mind, the necessity of preserving solidarity with our friends in the west—above all, of preserving unity of purpose and action between the United States and Canada and the commonwealth of nations.

During the past few months we have had some differences of opinion with our friends in Washington on Far Eastern questions. While I do not gloss over these differences, I should like to warn against exaggerating their importance, because they have not weakened the basic good understanding between us, resting as it does upon a harmony of abiding interest, and on the recognition of common values and common rights, one of which is the right to disagree as friends with each other, and the other the obligation, again as friends, to resolve these disagreements peaceably.

In spite of certain differences there is complete agreement between the Canadian and the United States governments on, among other things, four fundamentals: we agree that peace is now in jeopardy; we agree that the extension of soviet imperialism must be opposed; we agree that the principle of collective resistance to aggression must be maintained; and we agree that the main front which must be defended is western Europe.

Those, then, Mr. Speaker, are the general considerations shaping our policy—unshaken faith in freedom and realistic faith in the United Nations; awareness of the world-wide scope of the danger threatening us; respect for Asian opinion, and a desire to help the Asian people achieve a better standard of life; solidarity with our partners in the commonwealth and in the north Atlantic alliance; the determination to do everything possible to maintain peace.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Now I come to our policy on certain specific matters concerned with Korea and the Far East.

Almost the first issue which arose in this field after the house adjourned last September concerned the question of Chinese representation in the United Nations. This presented itself in a concrete form at the general assembly on September 19 last. A draft resolution was presented that day by the Indian delegation calling upon the assembly to decide that the Chinese government in Peking should represent China at the United Nations assembly. Persuasive arguments could be adduced both for and against such action.

It could be maintained, and it was maintained, that the United Nations would have more chance of dealing effectively with the situation that then existed in the Far East if the Chinese government, which had effective control of the mainland of China, were represented in its deliberations. It was argued that the United Nations would be a healthier organization if dissenting views were stated within rather than without the organization. On the other hand, it was difficult for governments which had not recognized the Peking regime to see representatives of that regime seated in the United Nations. To seat representatives of the Chinese communists had also become far more difficult after the attack by North Korean forces on the republic of Korea had taken place. It was apparent that the Indian resolution, on which our delegation abstained from voting, would not command the required majority in the assembly, and it was suggested—the suggestion in fact came from the Canadian delegation—that the question of Chinese representation should be considered by a special committee. It was hoped that in this way the question could be deferred for a short time until a suitable solution could be reached.

It may be asked why, if our abstention on the Indian resolution showed that we did not actively object to China being represented in the United Nations by the people's government in Peking, we had not taken previous action in Canada to recognize that government. We had in fact, as the house knows, given serious consideration to such action. We had been impressed by the argument that recognition by Canada and other countries would facilitate the representation of China within the United Nations, and consequently might make easier the peaceful settlement of certain Far Eastern issues. We had nevertheless also been influenced by what still seem to me to be valid views about making such a change at that time, and by advice which we had received from many quarters, including many quarters in this house, to proceed very cautiously in this matter. Furthermore, a number of countries which had recognized the Chinese communists had had great difficulty in getting the Chinese communists to recognize them, at least to the point of entering into effective diplomatic relations with them. For example, the United Kingdom had recognized the regime in Peking but it was far from clear that that regime in any effective sense recognized the United Kingdom. Then came the attack on Korea in June. There was much evidence that that attack had been prepared with the approval, and indeed with the support, of the Chinese communists, and we did not feel justified in taking any action toward recognition until the circumstances surrounding the aggression in Korea had become clearer. I need hardly add that when late last year the Chinese government in Peking joined in the aggression in Korea, it was inconceivable that countries which had hitherto withheld recognition would at that time decide to change their policies.

I feel, however, that the Far Eastern problems could be more readily solved if diplomatic relations existed with the government of China, which has the whole of the mainland of China under its control. But the Peking government can hardly expect recognition now from those member states of the United Nations against whom they are fighting in Korea. The remedy for the situation now lies with the communists themselves. They should not think that they can bludgeon or blackmail their way into recognition or into the United Nations.

The next specific and controversial issue which arose at Lake Success on Far Eastern questions, and which I want to discuss, was whether or not General MacArthur should be authorized by the United Nations to extend military operations beyond the 38th parallel in Korea. The 38th parallel was not important from the military point of view, but it was obvious that its crossing would have political and symbolic significance, indeed as its recrossing would have even more significance. At this time I do not need to remind the house that it was never intended by the United Nations that Korea should be cut in two along the parallel. In resolutions of the general assembly of the United Nations the objective of a free, independent and united Korea had been clearly laid down. Nevertheless, in spite of those resolutions this line, which had originally been merely a line of military convenience, had become a Rubicon, the line which marked in that part of the world a division between the Soviet world and the free world. The decision to authorize the United Nations forces to cross that line could not be taken lightly, and it was not taken lightly.

There were strong reasons at that time for giving such authorization. Although the North Korean forces had been badly defeated by General MacArthur's skilful campaign, large elements had escaped, and those remnants could not be made harmless unless the United Nations commander had the opportunity of pursuing them into North Korea. If they were not overpowered, the risk would remain that after they had regrouped and been re-equipped they might once again fall on Southern Korea after the United Nations had been withdrawn. Moreover, as I have stated already on a number of occasions, the United Nations itself had passed resolutions in favour of a united and independent nation in Korea.

The members of the Canadian delegation were impressed by these arguments, and by certain military information given to us, and we agreed, along with a great many other delegations, with the resolution proposed in the United Nations assembly authorizing the United Nations forces to take any action which was necessary to unify the whole of Korea. We, along with others, realized that risks would be involved, and efforts were made in the United Nations to reduce those risks to the minimum. For that purpose we proposed sending a mission which would have been the last appeal to the North Korean government to give up the fight before the line had been crossed, but we were not successful in establishing communications for that purpose.

After that line had once been crossed, the possibility of an early settlement depended on the campaign in North Korea itself. During the discussions which were had on the crossing of the parallel we had reason to believe that it was not the intention of the unified command to pursue the North Korean forces right up to the Manchurian border. We had reason to believe that a defensive line could be established across the narrow waist of North Korea, and that the two northern provinces of Korea would be left, for the time being at least, as a kind of unoccupied frontier area. That scheme seemed sensible to us, and we hoped it could be carried out.

With many other delegations, including indeed the delegation of the United States of America, we felt that very great care should be taken to avoid offering any unnecessary provocation to the Chinese government at Peking. At the same time we realized, on this and on other occasions, that the unified command was responsible for the operations of a force which was very largely composed of soldiers of the United States. That command and those soldiers were bearing the brunt of the responsibility and of the fighting, and they had the full right to make the military decisions within the limits of the authority given them by the United Nations. When those decisions turned out well, we all rejoiced with them. When they were wrong, I think it would have been improper and ungrateful to be unfairly critical and emphasize our own lack of responsibility. However, all of us who supported the action of the United Nations in Korea had not only the right but the duty to make our views known to the unified command through the positions we took at Lake Success, and also through our contacts with the United States delegation there.

In this connection it will be recalled that on October 5 last the foreign minister of the Chinese people's government, Mr. Chou En-lai, stated that his government would not stand aside if the United Nations forces crossed the 38th parallel.

That warning came to us through the Indian ambassador at Peking. We ourselves did not think it a sufficient reason for refusing the United Nations commander permission to complete the task which had been assigned to him; but many delegations, including our own, considered it to be a good reason for conducting military operations in North Korea, with, shall I say, great circumspection. So when we began to receive indications that it was intended to carry the campaign to the Yalu river, we expressed our misgivings confidentially to the United States authorities in Washington as early as November 6. It may also be recalled that I publicly made clear the position of the government on this matter when I spoke in Windsor on November 15. On that occasion, after stating that the marches where the free world rubbed together with the soviet world were obviously the most critical points, I went on to voice this hope:

> Those primarily responsible for safeguarding the security of such areas of the world should carry out their mission in as steady and unprovocative a way as possible.

In keeping with this point of view we supported, in private discussions at the United Nations, the proposal that a buffer state should be left along the northern boundary of Korea in order to avoid giving any excuse for suspicion on the part of the Chinese government that its legitimate interests might be in danger.

Intervention by China in this war in North Korea on an increasing scale throughout the whole of November brought sharply into view the third of the critical issues with which we have been asked recently to deal. Should we at once condemn this as aggression, or should we enter into discussions, on certain conditions, with the Chinese communists in an effort to bring it to an end? It seemed pretty clear that a stable settlement in Korea could hardly be achieved without some agreement, even though a tacit one, with the people's government of China; but after the Chinese government at Peking had intervened in force and were driving back the outnumbered forces of the United Nations at the end of November, some voices—and this is quite natural—were immediately raised in favour of whatever United Nations military action against China itself might be necessary in order to end the war.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we opposed at that time and have continued to oppose any such action against Chinese territory which was not dictated by the most urgent considerations of immediate military necessity. Already such large forces have been committed in Korea that the risk of Soviet or Soviet-inspired attacks at other points, strategically far more important to the free world, is serious. For this and other reasons we have joined from the beginning those who urged that the conflict in Korea should be limited and localized as far as possible; and we still believe that the arguments in favour of that course are as strong as ever.

If, then, a war with China, in which a decision could hardly be achieved, had to be averted by every means possible, what alternative methods were there for reaching a settlement in Korea? Speaking over the air on December 5, I stated my own belief that nothing should be left undone which might conceivably result in an honourable and peaceful settlement in Korea. I went on to say:

> If, for example, provided the military situation is stabilized, there could be a cease-fire followed by negotiations—possibly covering more subjects than Korea—in which the Chinese communists would participate, there might still be hope of reaching such a settlement. At least we would have done our best and the responsibility for failure could be placed where it would belong.

In that same speech, however, I insisted that a cease-fire must precede and not follow peace negotiations, and that is the position from which we have never wavered. I believe we in this government, in this house and in this country are as anxious as anyone to secure a peaceful settlement in Korea, but I think we know that such a settlement would be bought at too high a cost if it denied and betrayed the obligations we as a member of the United Nations had already undertaken in respect to Korea.

In my view it would have been such a betrayal if we had entered into political negotiations, as distinct from cease-fire negotiations, with the Peking government while its troops were still attacking United Nations forces. We have been willing to have the United Nations discuss with the Chinese communists a settlement in Korea and throughout the Far East, but we have not been willing at any time to ask members of the United Nations to participate in such discussions under duress while their men were being killed in Korea. The point of principle here, and the practical consequences of abandoning it, I think are of such crucial importance that this is one issue on which we have never been prepared to compromise.

There are those in this country who assert, and do so quite often and quite vehemently, that our willingness to seek an arrangement on the issue of a cease-fire first and talks afterwards was dishonourable and, as they called it, "appeasement". Those who hold such views I think are mistaken about the character of our policy and about the nature of appeasement itself. What they have in mind, no doubt, is such action as was taken at Munich in 1938. Appeasement as defined by those events begins with illusions about the potential aggressor, and ends with the betrayal of a friend in response to pressure exercised by that aggressor in the hope that such yielding will give one immunity from attack. How different such a course is from the policy which has been advocated by this government in this matter may be seen by examining the same broadcast in which I suggested negotiations with the Chinese communists. Having made that suggestion I went on at once to say:

> We must not allow this process—or the situation which makes it necessary—to weaken our resolve or interfere with our plan to strengthen our defences. Above all, we must not allow it to weaken the unity or friendly co-operation of those countries in the free world who are now working together so closely for the good purpose of establishing conditions of stability and peace in the world.

In that, and in other statements made at the time, I stressed the danger in which we stood and the sacrifices which it demanded of us. Far from trying to lull our people into a sense of false security by a move which could rightly be interpreted as appeasement, I have said, and other members of the government have said time and again as I say now, that the free world is in the greatest possible danger. A cease-fire in Korea would not have removed that danger, but it would, however, have put us in a stronger position to meet it.

If those of us who have advocated negotiations of this kind with the Chinese communists are appeasers we are in very good company. It will not, I think, be argued in this house that Mr. Churchill is a man likely to truckle to or appease aggressors. What are his views on the present situation? Speaking in the House of Commons at Westminster on December 14, he said:

> The only prudent course open to the United States and ourselves is to stabilize the local military position . . .

That is in Korea.

> . . . and if the opportunity then occurs, to negotiate with the aggressors . . .

Later in the same speech he said:

> Appeasement in itself may be good or bad according to the circumstances. Appeasement from weakness and fear is alike futile and fatal. Appeasement from strength is magnanimous and noble, and might be the surest and perhaps the only path to world peace.

The United Nations in Korea, Mr. Speaker, as events have now shown is, thanks primarily to the magnificent effort of the United States, not weak or frightened, and it is getting stronger. From that strength I think it will always be wise to negotiate, to "appease," to use Mr. Churchill's words, in order to bring this diversionary and weakening struggle to an end on honourable terms as soon as possible.

One of the vehicles for this so-called appeasement, Mr. Speaker, was the United Nations cease-fire committee, on which I had the honour to be associated with the president of the assembly, Mr. Entezam of Iran and Sir Benegal Rau, the Indian delegate. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, in taking on that work I was no volunteer. I was the victim of conscription, because it was not a job which anyone would willingly choose. I do not intend today to go into the details of the work of that committee, but there are some things about this particular initiative which I should like to make clear.

In some quarters it has been assumed that this was a sterile, if not dangerous, exercise undertaken by naïve idealistic persons merely to placate Asian opinion. It is quite true that the Asian countries had taken the lead in suggesting that a committee should be set up to determine the basis upon which a satisfactory cease-fire could be arranged. It is also true that many other members of the United Nations, including Canada, had been anxious, whenever possible, to take advice from Asian countries as to the best method of restoring peace in the Far East.

I should like to point out, however, that the resolution to establish the cease-fire committee secured the support of all members of the United Nations with the exception of the Soviet bloc. The United States in particular actively assisted and encouraged the members of our committee in their work. The task of the committee was an uphill one, and often a frustrating one. In one article which I read not long ago we were referred to as three men in search of a cease-fire. Our search was not successful. After we had secured from the unified command in Washington a basis for stopping the fighting which we thought reasonable, we tried to enter into effective contact with the people's government at Peking. But for a long time our efforts were unavailing, and I must say we were not treated even with very great politeness.

However, on December 21, the Chinese foreign minister broadcast a reply to our approaches in which he claimed the cease-fire committee had been illegally constituted. He demanded that negotiations for a political settlement should precede rather than follow a cease-fire in Korea. Such a procedure, of course, was totally unacceptable to us, and to the United Nations. Nevertheless, in spite of this somewhat sharp rebuff it was felt by the United Nations that it might be worth while for the cease-fire committee to make another attempt to convince the regime at Peking of the genuineness of our offer, to which the United States completely subscribed, to enter into negotiations on a wide range of Far Eastern issues if a cease-fire could only be established. After considerable difficulty, we drew up a statement of principles which was presented to the political committee of the assembly on January 11. This statement combined proposals for ending the fighting in Korea with others for political negotiations of outstanding Far Eastern problems. The proposal secured the approval of fifty of the sixty member nations, including the United States and India.

A great deal of the credit for securing such widespread approval of the statement of principles must be ascribed to the fact that, at the time it was being prepared, the commonwealth prime ministers were meeting in London. This was an occasion on which the commonwealth association was extremely valuable in harmonizing the views of the free nations of the east and west. I hope I may be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that our own Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) played a central role in the discussions in London to reconcile the various points of view.

The first reply from Peking to our statement of principles was certainly ambiguous, though it seemed to be a rejection since it contained an apparent reaffirmation of the theory that a cease-fire must follow rather than precede negotiations. In order to try to remove what we thought might be ambiguity, and indeed turned out to be ambiguity, our Prime Minister suggested to the Prime Minister of India, in a message on January 18, that since the government of India maintained an embassy in Peking it would be helpful if clarification could be sought through Indian channels to certain points in the reply which the Chinese communists had returned to our statement of principles. It was in answer to this initiative on the part of our Prime Minister and Mr. Nehru that the Chinese government provided the clarification requested in their message of January 22. That clarification seemed more hopeful, since it stated for the first time in fairly clear language that a cease-fire could be agreed upon in the first meeting of a conference called to discuss Far Eastern issues and that this discussion of political issues would not take place until after the cease-fire had been agreed on. That reply was considerably encouraging to some of us.

During the time that these cease-fire discussions were going on, proposals to name the Chinese communists formally in the United Nations as aggressors had remained in abeyance. As soon as the first reply, that of January 17, was received from Peking, the United States, considering that reply to be wholly unsatisfactory, pressed the other members of the United Nations to proceed without delay with such condemnatory action. That presented our delegation with the fourth and final issue of critical importance about which I wish to say something, especially in view of the amendment to the address in reply submitted yesterday by the leader of the C.C.F. party. We felt at that time, as indeed the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said yesterday, that the passage of such a formal resolution of condemnation in the United Nations at that particular moment, when we had just received the second reply from Peking, would be both premature and unwise. If it were not followed by some action against China, it would throw into high relief the sharp limitations of United Nations' resolutions. On the other hand, if it were followed by the imposition of sanctions, however modest, against China, the risk of the west becoming involved in a war with China would be increased; and we were and are determined, along with other delegations, to do everything we can to prevent a war with China, whether limited or unlimited. We were all also loath at that moment to support a formal condemnation of China in the United Nations because we felt that the clarification which had come from Peking afforded some possibility of satisfactory negotiation with that regime. There was also a real danger at that time that a resolution of condemnation in the United Nations, in the terms of the United States' resolution as it stood at that time, would unnecessarily highlight and exaggerate differences of view between the Asian and the western members of the free world and indeed bring about a formal division between the members of the western world in the United Nations. Nevertheless there could be no doubt that the Chinese communists had engaged in aggression and had attacked the forces of the United Nations; and in the last resort we could not refuse, as I saw it, to recognize that situation in a resolution of condemnation if that resolution were pressed to a vote, if it stated the actual position fairly, if it were not couched in unnecessarily provocative terms, and if it included within it provision for negotiation. In all of my discussions with the Indian delegate at the United Nations—and I have had a great many with him in the last two or three weeks —I made that position perfectly clear to him; and he at no time was under any misunderstanding or misapprehension about the Canadian position.

Last week we had two resolutions before us at the United Nations and we were faced with a decision as to what we should do about them. We realized that that decision might indeed have far-reaching consequences. The first of these two resolutions was the Asian resolution providing for a seven-power conference in which both the U.S.S.R. and communist China would be represented, a seven-power conference not only for political discussions but for cease-fire discussions and a seven-power conference the terms of the invitation to which seemed to us to be couched in a form which might have made possible protracted discussion with Peking before the conference ever met. For that reason we did not find that resolution satisfactory, and in a speech last Friday we suggested certain points which we thought would remove the danger from the Asian resolution if those points could have been included in it, because they would have laid down in a resolution a concrete and definite program for talks without delay. In those points we even suggested a date for the convocation of a conference, a place where it might be held and a time limit after which, if Peking did not reply, we would assume that they would not accept it. In those points we tried to remove from the aegis of this seven-power conference—which included a good many states who were not joining in the police action in Korea, including the U.S.S.R., which had refused to support action from the beginning—the negotiations for a cease-fire and send them to a more appropriate body of three: the United Nations commission in Korea, the United States and the Peking government. If those points which we put forward and had discussed previously with the Indian delegation and the United States had been included in the Indian resolution, we would have voted for it. One of them was included. The others were not, I presume because it was felt that the inclusion of those other points might have made it more difficult for Peking to accept the resolution.

The United States' position with regard to our points was a simple one. They felt that the time for any further approach to Peking was over until the resolution of condemnation and setting up the good offices committee had been passed. So when the Asian resolution came to the vote, we could not vote for it, for the reasons which I have indicated. We could not vote against it because the principle of negotiation was one which we had stood for. Therefore we abstained from voting. In our attitude on this matter, so far as Canadian policy is concerned, I do not think anybody in India has any reason to feel that they were let down.

The second resolution was submitted by the United States. We had been unsuccessful in our efforts to secure postponement of that resolution. We had been successful in our efforts to get that resolution changed and also to get it clarified and interpreted by the United States delegate, which interpretation removed most of the doubts we had with regard to it at the beginning. Our first objective, postponement, was not successful. Our second objective, to get the proper kind of resolution voted on, I think was reasonably successful. We were anxious to make clear beyond any possibility of doubt that any resolution which the United Nations passed on this subject would be exceedingly clear indeed on the following points. We were anxious that it would not establish any new aggression but would emphasize that the Chinese government at Peking had merely participated in an old aggression and therefore was guilty of that but not of starting a new aggression in any other part of Korea. We were also anxious that the paragraph of condemnation should be couched in unprovocative terms, and it was. That paragraph does not brand anybody as an aggressor. It is a finding of fact that, by assisting the aggressors in Korea and by invading North Korea from China, the people's government in Peking had itself engaged in aggression. That was a finding of fact which we certainly could not deny. The third point we were anxious to make clear was that the collective measures committee set up by this resolution and as to which many delegations had grave doubts, would not be a vehicle for rash and unwise action but might indeed become a brake on such action; and that this collective measures committee, far from jumping into resolutions and reports on sanctions at once, should not even report to the United Nations general assembly as long as there was any possibility of the good offices committee completing its work satisfactorily. That was made clear by an amendment to the United States' resolution proposed by the delegate for Lebanon. Fourth, we were anxious to make it quite clear in this resolution that the work of mediation and conciliation could go on after the resolution passed, and indeed that that work would be given priority over any enforcement. We wanted to make it clear beyond doubt that, so far as the United Nations was concerned, we had not slammed any doors on anybody. And then finally we want to make it quite clear that this resolution did not give anybody any authority to take any action which he did not already possess. It certainly does not give the United Nations, or any agent of the United Nations in Asia, any power or right to use United Nations forces to liberate Asia from communism. The mandate of the United Nations in this operation remains the same, namely, to defeat aggression in Korea, and nothing else.

Well, having had these amendments put forward, and having received these clarifications from the United States delegation, which removed most of our doubts, we felt, Mr. Speaker, that to vote against this resolution, or to abstain in regard to it, would have been to refuse to accept as true the statement that the Chinese government had participated in aggression—something we had no right to do without denying the justice of United Nations action in Korea. Furthermore, it would have meant breaking the unity of the western nations on an issue of timing and tactics. We did not take that course. We voted for the resolution, and I think we were right in doing so. Forty-four other countries, including every member of the north Atlantic alliance, agreed with us.

But we have made our view abundantly clear that this resolution does not give anyone on one side any shadow of excuse for rash and adventurous courses, or anyone on the other any shadow of excuse for refusing to discuss an ending of hostilities or a peaceful solution of this problem. Why should it? It was said at Lake Success by the Indian delegate, and it was said yesterday by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell): "You have now branded them as aggressors. How can you expect them to talk to you?" Well, they have been branding us in the United Nations as aggressors steadily for the last two or three months, and they have shown no reluctance to talk with us on their terms, or any feeling that we should not talk with them because they have called us aggressors in very rude and uncivilized tones. So I am optimistic, and I hope my optimism is justified, Mr. Speaker, that the passing of our resolution will not be followed by the catastrophic consequences that some people sincerely believe it will.

We do not believe that by passing this resolution we are slamming the door to subsequent negotiation, or that the government in Peking would have any justification for interpreting our action in this way. I hope, Mr. Speaker, and I expressed this hope in my last statement at the United Nations before I came back to Ottawa, that whatever happened to this resolution—and it is now part of the law of the United Nations—the work of cease-fire, discussion and peaceful settlement, through the machinery provided in the resolution, will proceed with a view to ending the war in Korea and removing the causes of war in other areas of Asia.

That, Mr. Speaker, is our position. It is not one which, in my opinion, warrants support for the amendment of the C.C.F. party which is now before the house. To support that amendment, Mr. Speaker, would, I think, be to accept the despairing but sincere plea of that wise and saintly gentleman, Sir Benegal Rau, that by passing this resolution we had ended all hope of a peaceful solution of Far Eastern questions. I do not accept any such counsel of despair; and I hope that the Indian government, on second thought, will not do so either, and will continue to participate in the work of negotiation and conciliation, to which it has already made such a magnificent contribution. We in this government will do what we can, in any way open to us, to assist that work, and to prove that the prophets of impending calamity are wrong. And events may, I think, work in our favour along this course. I am even bold enough to think that the Chinese government in Peking will come to realize before long that the true interests of the Chinese people cannot be served now by an alliance with Russian communist imperialism, as they could not be served in the past by Russian czarist imperialism.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I return from Asia to our own western and north Atlantic world. Here we are now entering the period of greatest danger in the months ahead. Our hope of coming through this period without war lies in the growing collective strength, military, economic and moral, of the free world. If we increase that strength, and use it wisely, we do not need to fear. There are in the hearts and minds and souls of free men qualities which can never be matched by slaves. If we use them we shall accomplish our own salvation. If we do not, but give way to smug complacency on the one hand or unreasoning panic on the other, we shall become, and deserve to become, slaves ourselves.

May I end with a paragraph from a magazine often quoted in this house and elsewhere, namely, The Economist. Writing on January 20 last, the editor said:

> Nothing is certain about the course of events in 1951; and anyone who questions this should ask himself frankly what he was prophesying for 1950 just a year ago. The die is not cast for war or peace; events can still be controlled and minds influenced, but only if the leaders of the Kremlin can be convinced that they have equally little to hope from pressing an armed attack on the free world or to fear from withholding it. Neither strength alone nor peace alone is an adequate cry for the west—neither rearmament alone, which is the means of the one, nor negotiation alone which is the means of the other. The only hopeful policy is peace through strength, arms and diplomacy.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate sincerely the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on a very clear and straightforward statement of the situation today. I feel that we always get the facts from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to congratulate him on a clear address today.

Last June, when the Secretary of State for External Affairs returned from a meeting of the Atlantic pact nations, he outlined to this house the principle which had been accepted by that body. It was to the effect that in future member nations would not be permitted time to build up their defences behind the bulwarks of overrun nations. The understanding arrived at by the twelve member nations was that they would build up their armed forces now so that they would be able to come immediately to the aid of a member nation should that nation be attacked. That decision was roundly applauded by those in this house and throughout the country. It seemed that at last the free nations of the world were going to take practical steps to combat aggression.

Let us see what we have done during the intervening eight months to implement the decision arrived at at that time. Today our armed forces total 62,000, and the target we have set for ourselves is 69,000. How does this effort compare with that of our two closest and greatest allies, Great Britain and the United States? Our forces, compared to theirs, should be in direct proportion to population. In other words, because the population of Great Britain is three and one-half times that of Canada, the size of their armed forces should be approximately three and one-half times those of Canada. In the same way, because the population of the United States is eleven times our population, the size of their armed forces should be approximately eleven times greater than ours.

How do they actually compare?

First of all, I shall refer to Great Britain. Last October the armed forces of Great Britain totalled 1,023,000 men. On January 1 of this year our armed forces totalled 62,000. The armed forces of Great Britain are sixteen times greater than ours, instead of three and a half times greater, as they should be in proportion to population. Therefore their effort is four and one-half times greater than ours.

The target set in the United States for the end of June in this year is to have 3,500,000 men under arms. Our ceiling is 69,000. Therefore their target is fifty times that of Canada, instead of eleven times, as it should be in proportion to population. We see therefore that the effort of our two closest and greatest allies is in each case four and one-half times our effort, having taken full consideration of the difference in population of those two great countries and Canada.

Why is there such a great difference in national effort? The Prime Minister speaking in London on January 10 made the following statement:

> The north Atlantic countries must build up their military resources to prevent a world war by removing the prospect of successful aggression.

Is the performance I have just outlined the Prime Minister's idea of building up our military resources and playing our part to prevent a third world war? Great Britain and the United States face exactly the same problems we face in raising armed forces. All three countries must produce war materials both for themselves and for their allies, and in addition maintain the production of their civilian goods. In those two countries, as well as in Canada, they enjoy full employment. In those countries they have no extra men to put into their armed forces, any more than we have. Their problems are exactly the same as ours; and therefore there is absolutely no excuse for our not matching their efforts in proportion to population.

Does the government believe that we can enter into associations such as the United Nations and the Atlantic pact and not bear our share of the responsibilities involved? Judging by their action, or lack of action, apparently they do. A parasite has been aptly described as one who goes through a swinging door on somebody else's push. If the government believes that we can go through this period of preparedness, or a third world war, if one should come, on somebody else's push, it will be jeopardizing not only our national security but also our national honour.

If we continue to act like a poor relation we shall not be fooling the people of the United States or of Great Britain for one moment. We shall simply be making sure that in future we shall be treated not as a medium power but as a small power, because the people of Great Britain and the United States recognize the difference between talking big at international conferences and acting small when action is called for.

I believe it is about time the government realized that the only kind of action communists understand is strength and preparedness, and that the only chance this or any other free nation has of avoiding a third world war is by being ready to repel aggression when it strikes. I believe that if war should come it would be far better for us to have trained forces in proportion to population, ready to dispatch to other parts of the world to defeat aggression there, and to do so outside this country.

The alternative is to wait until our enemy gobbles up our allies one by one and then, with the industrial capacity of Europe and Japan and the oil of the Middle East at his disposal, to take on this continent with a war machine that has never yet been dreamed of. There may be those in the house who believe there is no obligation upon us to match the efforts of our two great allies, in proportion to population. If that is so, it will be interesting to hear their views to back up those feelings and beliefs.

I am convinced that the great majority of people in Canada feel we are morally obligated to match the efforts of our two great allies, in proportion to population. Without their strength, our position in the world today would be a precarious one indeed. The least we can do is to bear our share of the responsibility of the load. The forces we need to have in being today can be raised if the following conditions are met: First of all, the government must tell the people the true gravity of the situation and stop lulling them to sleep by quoting odds of fifty to one against our becoming involved in a general war. You simply cannot expect young men to take the situation seriously if they are continually being told that there is only one chance in fifty of their being needed. The truth is that this country has never faced a more serious situation than it does today. If the people are told, they will not fail to respond.

The second requirement is that the basis for raising the forces we need to have in being today must be our present reserve forces which have been training for the past five years for just such an eventuality. Units and formations can be chosen evenly across the country and they can recruit and basically train the men they need. Formation training can be carried out at the various training camps across the country. Incidentally this would give a tremendous boost to the morale of the reserve forces, of which they are greatly in need.

Third, during the training period the rates of pay and conditions of service would be the same as for the regular forces.

Fourth, if no national emergency should exist when training has been completed the units and formations could be returned to reserve status and the men to their civilian jobs. They would be subject to immediate recall in case of a national emergency.

Fifth, their training would continue on a reserve basis of one or two nights a week, with two weeks of formation training in the summertime.

Sixth, legislation should be re-enacted to protect those who enlist by ensuring their release for necessary training or service by their present employers without jeopardizing their jobs or seniority.

This plan would provide forces in being, ready for immediate call to duty, at a minimum cost to the taxpayers. It would also provide maximum manpower which would be available for both civilian and war production until such time as a national emergency would require their being called to active duty.

In conclusion I should like to say this: Let us for heaven's sake bear in mind that it takes a full year to recruit, train and equip a division, that it takes many months to train navy and air force personnel. Let us also bear in mind the size of the communist forces today and the speed with which they strike. Then let us get on with the job. Our national honour and our ultimate survival as a free nation demand it.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat that I always have great delight in representing the banner constituency of Canada, Fort William. This may be only a statement to some, but it is a fact to us and we can prove it. My first words will be of congratulation to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They did a fine job with dignity, respect and courtesy to the Chair and to every hon. member of this house.

I should like also to congratulate those hon. members who have been promoted and I especially thank the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for not leaving northern Ontario wanting. We sometimes blame the provincial government of Ontario for forgetting northern Ontario, for seeming to treat it as a place where only fishermen and tourists and wolves and wild beasts abound, but we believe that northern Ontario is the coming part of Canada in the future.

I want to congratulate the newly elected hon. members. Those of us who listened last night to the splendid speech of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) could not help but realize the responsibilities that rest upon anyone who is elected to represent a constituency. We cannot treat those responsibilities lightly.

In offering congratulations I do not want to pass over another group which is perhaps of equal importance, perhaps not because of its responsibilities but because of the service it renders. I am speaking of your staff, Mr. Speaker. I join with others in welcoming the new page boys. They do a good job and certainly they have a record to follow.

I appreciate the reference which has been made in the speech from the throne to old age pensioners and that it is likely, if there is co-operation by the provinces, that the means test will be removed as far as persons of seventy years and over are concerned and that those in need at sixty-five years will receive a pension. I note also that price controls will have consideration, whether in the way that a great many of us would expect or in another way that may be better.

There are those who think that Canada is treating with complacency the matter of military preparations, but I cannot agree with that. Anyone who listened to the speech just delivered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) must realize what the government has been doing, and what he has been doing. It is known in other quarters that I have been interested in the training of youth in athletics and our national games. I have learned a lot from the executives who plan these games. I am sure we were not too greatly surprised to hear that the leading executives of the great national game in the United States had picked out the minister of external affairs as being the man worthy of receiving $65,000 a year instead of his present salary. If he is suitable for that position and if the sportsmen all over the United States are willing to back up their vice-president, surely to goodness we must admit that he is doing a good job for the United Nations and especially for Canada.

I was pleased to note in the press last evening that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), backed up by his deputy, is planning to provide aid for those who are physically disabled. Pensions are provided for our older citizens and other help is provided for other citizens, but those who are incapacitated through no fault of their own receive nothing.

We were pleased to note that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) put considerable energy into his statement when he said that Canada would go ahead with our great lakes navigation development. This may have stimulated the United States, and we in Fort William are very hopeful that this great scheme will be put through this year.

It is my duty, I think, to say a word about my own constituency, because I know its possibilities. Any hon. member who regularly looks over his constituency will find many things that are good. We find that Fort William is a great place for a young father and mother to bring up their children. They will be looked after from their earliest days. I should just like to outline what has been done by our city council to take care of our youth, following the voluntary work of many of our citizens. We have organized centres for both summer and winter activities. We have nine parks where our boys and girls are looked after during the holiday months, under the supervision of twenty-one people who are paid by the city council. Once a week these boys and girls get a trip to Chippewa park, our tourist centre, in buses supplied free. There, under trained supervisors, they are taught swimming, games, and nature study. It has been my pleasure to see an officer of the mounted police, representing the youth department of that organization, spend a week each year helping these young people develop their bodies and minds, and giving an example of how they should conduct themselves. Every night there is a moving picture show in a cosy corner where, when the lights are all out, you can almost feel the spooks round about.

It is well said that Fort William is the bread basket of the world, with our thirty or more elevators and our splendid natural water works provided by Loch Lomond on mount McKay, from which the water is distributed all over the city practically without cost. We have a splendid hydro system, and we have great farms. I do not know of any district in Canada that is more progressive. The farmers have been encouraged to develop their land so that now many of them raise more than one hundred bushels of oats to the acre. We also have our potato club, and many of those farmers raise more than five hundred bushels to the acre. This encourages our farmers to cultivate properly and fertilize as they should.

Any tourist coming to Fort William and going to the tourist bureau will obtain information that will lead him to the most charming places: the sleeping giant; the sea lion of Silver island; the peeping squaw; the princess of the mist, and the three sisters, to say nothing about Kakabeka falls, which are higher than Niagara though they have less water.

When I consider the question of war, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am not afraid of Russia nor of communist China. It is not heads that count; it is wills that are consecrated to do what is right. I think back to the first time I read the story of how the children of Israel were enslaved by the Midianites. Gideon got his commission from the right source. He called Israel together, and 32,000 men rallied to the support of the old flag. But there were too many, and those who were fearful and afraid of the campaign were given a chance to go home. Twenty-two thousand went home, but there were still too many. They had to be tested; and the men who went down to the brook were not so anxious to get a good satisfying drink; they had their eye on the hills beyond, and wanted to get after the enemy. Finally only three hundred were left, but they put to rout the armies of the Midianites.

What happened to the nations of the past? What happened to Hitler? He left God out of it, and because of that he made outstanding mistakes. The greatest was when he attacked Russia. What about Napoleon? He had burning ambition, but he left God out. Any nation like Russia or China which treats God as a myth and follows the teaching of Karl Marx is bound to make mistakes, and sooner or later it will find itself down and out.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to pay my tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on his address yesterday and also to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), because he has some practical common sense. As to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) I can only say we are thankful that we have men like him; and baseball cannot buy him for $65,000 a year.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring this debate back to the realm of international affairs. Almost the concluding words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) were that this house should turn down the amendment offered by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), yesterday, which reads:

> We further regret that while Your Excellency's advisers have generally followed a constructive course in relation to the Korean dispute, they have in relation to the resolution branding China as an aggressor supported a course which is premature and unwise at this particular moment, and which should not have been pursued until the methods of peaceful negotiation had been completely exhausted.

[Mr. McIvor.]

Until a day or two ago I thought we had some quite good company in those sentiments. Those of us who listened to the C.B.C. broadcast on Tuesday night from Lake Success by Peter Stursberg heard Canada's Secretary of State for External Affairs, who spoke in a voice which was strained and tired. Unquestionably he spoke with sincerity, and he said he thought it was premature and unwise at this particular moment to pursue this policy, until the methods of peaceful negotiation had been completely exhausted. Not only did the minister believe those words to be true on Tuesday, before the vote; he believed them to be true last week, and since we believe his words are true today we have accepted them. Now we find it is he who has recanted.

I think it is a good thing that as far as possible there should be in this house a reasonable approximation to unanimity as to the foreign policy we pursue. That has been so in the past, and I think it will be so in the future. But when there exists such a major difference of opinion as we have we would be untrue to what we believe, untrue to those who agree with us, if we remained silent and uncritical, even although the times may be dangerous. What we have advocated in the past should be known. It is on the record.

We have said that our policy should be designed towards keeping China neutral. We were not convinced we could make an ally, let alone a friend, of China; nor were we convinced that China was yet in the orbit of Russia. Indeed, the differences between China and Russia even today are obvious. Unfortunately we have pushed these two countries closer together, although their differences may not be so clear as has been the case in the past or as will be in the future. It is not without significance that Russian influence in North Korea has practically disappeared, and its place has been taken by that of China. It is not without significance that the quarrels which have existed between China and Russia over Manchuria are not yet patched up, and may possibly break out again in 1952. It is not without significance that Chinese nationalism is today stronger than Chinese allegiance to communism. With a strongly nationalist China, I do not see much possibility of China becoming as subservient to the Kremlin as have other powers which could more accurately be described as satellite countries.

In other words, what we have asked for, what we have advocated, is patience. Since we desire peace and the improved welfare of the world, patience was demanded of us even in the face of extraordinary provocation. What did the minister say this afternoon? He said that we called China an aggressor, and why not? Have they not consistently called us aggressors? Is it wise to respond with a tu quoque in differences such as we have? I do not think it is.

I believe we were wrong in pursuing a policy which would have as its effect the forcing of China and Russia closer together. In so doing we are really pursuing Russian desires. We would be terribly wrong if we played still further into Russian hands and, following the logic of events, became embroiled in a war in Asia. We are wrong I think at this moment in following any policy which will add fuel to the flames of suspicion, and fear of the motives of the west which occupy so many Asian minds. Unhappily almost every day the fuel is being provided, and one of the most regrettable examples was that quoted by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), when he reminded the house that India had asked the United States for two million tons of wheat. One or two Americans in responsible public positions have been so ill advised as to say that unless India followed the policies laid down by the United States she should not get the wheat. I am certain that word has flown around Asia, that the Americans are prepared to use human starvation as a political weapon. I do not believe that is the sentiment of the United States, but unfortunately rash and loose tongues give that impression. It does nothing to bring the people of Asia nearer to us.

One other thing we have to realize is that, even were the relationship between the United States and the Soviet union the most friendly, the most amicable, we should still have revolution in Asia. The people there are determined to overthrow the domination of those under whom they have suffered so long. Today we see rising in Asia the same thing which we in the west are leaving, but it is new in Asia, and there it is the resurgence of a powerful nationalism. It is a force which we cannot ignore.

The minister laid down three general considerations in the opening part of his speech. They were the necessity for the maintenance of freedom, with which we all agree; the necessity for our continued support of the United Nations, to which we subscribe; and third, he asked for a cool and rational appraisal of the present crisis, as he is entitled to ask and as we should be prepared to grant. So, I am going to try to look as objectively as is possible at the situation, first of all from the point of view of China.

If I were to be asked that very stupid question, is China an aggressor, answer yes or no, I would find tremendous difficulty in answering. I believe that China was wrong in crossing into Korea. I believe, however, there are extenuating circumstances of which the minister himself was well aware in his speech, from which I shall yet quote several extracts, before the first committee of the United Nations on January 26. At page 11 he said:

> It may still be that the Chinese consider that they are engaged not in aggression, but in self-defence; and that they are so imprisoned by their own dogma and their isolation, so influenced by bad advice and misled by wrong information, that they do not understand the intentions of the United Nations in general and of the United States in particular.

I think that is generous. I think it may be correct. The Chinese are perhaps ignorant of the good intentions of the western world. We have to realize that they have always regarded Korea as a particularly Chinese sphere of influence. Their memories are not so short that they have forgotten that, on more than one occasion, Korea has been used as the gateway for aggression on China proper. China regards us with suspicion. They may have reason. They have seen the western world, and to them the western world appears to be the United States, tied in with the enemy of the present regime, Chiang Kai-shek. They see the United States going beyond its powers and declaring that it is going to defend Formosa, although by the Cairo agreement it was specifically mentioned that Formosa should revert to China.

And if we are entitled to assume there is a certain amount of ignorance on the part of the Chinese as to our intentions, is it not possible that the actions of General MacArthur may have raised in them a feeling of real fear? General MacArthur started his last big offensive when the Chinese delegate was leaving for the United Nations, and the timing of that offensive was most unhappy. I think that we in this country, and possibly the people in other countries, have become somewhat used by now to the braggart and bumptious communiqués which were coming out of Tokyo. We knew that what was really in our minds was being spoken in London, Washington and Ottawa where responsible ministers were trying to assure the Chinese that we did not have any intention of going into Manchuria or affecting Chinese rights so far as power sites on the Yalu river were concerned.

Nevertheless, here were the communiqués of MacArthur, and he added to them only last Sunday when he said he was going to free Asia from communist domination. Those statements were not guaranteed to make the Chinese feel we were as frank and sincere as we professed to be. At the same time there was another difficulty experienced by certain nations, ours amongst them. There was the difficulty we had in trying to talk to China when China was not a member of the United Nations. It was in refusing such recognition that the first blunder was committed. I agree that we have a right, perhaps even a duty, to be sceptical about the genuine nature of Peking's desire for peace. But the point we want to make is this, that so long as there were doubts and so long as those doubts were not resolved one way or the other, it was the responsibility of our leaders at the United Nations to do everything possible to try to arrive at some honourable agreement whereby the peace of the world could be preserved. That is our main argument. On the other hand, consider the position of the United States. We see a nation which is still young and virile, with perhaps all the faults of youth and virility; a nation which is not used to defeat, a nation which has not known, as others have, the necessity for withdrawal and retirement and which is unused to it; a nation which is smarting under the blows of those who were so contemptuously described as gooks and Chinks not only by soldiers of the United States but by soldiers of other nations who are in Korea just now. Once again we are displaying the arrogance of the whites which the people of Asia must find intolerable. Then the United States believes, and with great justification, that there has been such a long period of friendship between China and the United States that the Chinese ought to realize that fact. I think that American policy towards China, except in the last few years, has been generous. But unhappily, when the Chinese come to think of American friendship, what do they see? They see American bombs, in American planes with American markings, being used by Chiang Kai-shek to obliterate Chinese cities. What is regarded as friendship by the United States may be regarded as enmity by the Chinese.

I want there to be no mistake whatever as to where we stand. We yield to none, either collectively or individually, in our admiration for the people of the United States. They are capable of extraordinary generosity, and they have shown it. Just after the war ended the Americans had within their possession this most devastating weapon, the atomic bomb. Nowhere in recorded history has it ever been shown to me that a nation with a mighty weapon of destruction such as this in its own hands has said to the world "We are prepared to give it to you" on terms which the great majority of the countries of the world found highly acceptable indeed, only the Soviet union dissenting.

There are few examples of generosity such as that which has been shown by the people of the United States in the Marshall plan, in taxing themselves for funds to raise the standard of living in Europe, in order to bring Europe back to a high productive level and to conduct the fight against that misery which must inevitably lead to communism. That they are a friendly people, we know. That they are an idealistic people, we know. That the leadership they gave at the beginning of this crisis was most commendable, we know. That they are an emotional people, we know. But it is because we are so friendly with them that on occasion it is advisable that we speak to them frankly as friend to friend. They should have this knowledge by now if they do not possess it, namely that we in Canada—and, I think, the other members of the North Atlantic treaty group—will always be at the side of the United States. But that does not mean to say that we desire in any way to be subservient or to be placed in the position of apparent satellites. We wish to be treated with the degree of equality which free men expect. What the Americans feel today is that there should be expressed in the United Nations—and there has been expressed—a moral condemnation for this aggression of China; for they fear if it is not done, then the green light will be given for further aggression. As I say, it is most important that we try to understand the position and the feeling of the United States which almost unanimously is in favour of this decision to vote on Chinese aggression.

What about recent events in the United Nations themselves? One or two of the comments made by the minister were most interesting. I refer specifically to his comments about the resolution which was passed on October 7 and which gave the United Nations and General MacArthur the tacit right to cross the 38th parallel. It was not much more than tacit. In the Winnipeg Free Press of January 9—and the Free Press has been carrying on a bitter campaign against the policy of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) until the last day or two—Mr. Freedman, writing from Lake Success, said this in discussing the 38th parallel:

> Nowhere in the eight-power resolution adopted by the political committee and later confirmed by the general assembly in plenary session is there any mention of crossing the 38th parallel as such. But that was clearly implied in the resolution's numerous references to a unified Korea.

That is true. There was a tacit assurance given to General MacArthur that he should go ahead. But as the minister told us this afternoon, there was the strongest reason for believing that the troops of the United Nation would not go to the border of Manchuria, would not go to the Yalu river and thereby precipitate the situation in which we have found ourselves. In other words, I would be inclined to argue, if there was this tacit admission of the right to go ahead, there was also the tacit realization by a great number of the nations that we should go ahead only a certain number of miles and then stop. Unfortunately the United States saw fit to refuse the advice of colleagues and allies, which was offered in all sincerity. By doing that they may have altered the whole course of history. One of the things which some of us fear is that America's allies may be immolated on the altar of a policy which is a weird mixture of good intentions, the China lobby, offended pride, Time, Life and Fortune and the desires of presidential aspirants. These things form a bad basis on which to build a policy. Perhaps the United Nations has also been weak. We can learn and profit from what has happened. To my mind it is obvious that there has not been enough civilian control over the commander in chief of the allied forces; and as far as strategy goes I will always insist that the last word be left with the civilians. There was the mistake, despite the decision of the United Nations, of allowing Syngman Rhee back into North Korea. There was the mistake in giving Syngman Rhee sufficient power so that he could carry on mass executions of those with whom he disagreed and whom he called traitors. These efforts by Syngman Rhee are not the basis on which to build up the friendship which we desire to see between Asia and ourselves.

If as a result of the passing of this resolution the Chinese people's government still decide to go ahead, to negotiate, to have a cease-fire, to settle outstanding problems, none will be happier than I to find that my doubts are unfounded and that my fears are unrealized. But I share the fears of Sir Benegal Rau, namely, that the Chinese will accept this rebuff, as it is for all practical purposes, and decide not to negotiate further. In that case, what do we do? Again I come back to the logic of events. The United Nations has declared that China is an aggressor. No matter in what watered-down form, the declaration is there. The United Nations has declared that China is an outlaw. Outlaws must be punished. Otherwise we lose respect for law and order. What punishment do we administer? Collectively we administer punishment by means of economic sanctions. As the minister pointed out today, following upon economic sanctions there is the gravest danger that war may arise. Suppose, as a result of economic sanctions—if we go as far as that— Mao decides to retaliate in Formosa, what then does the United States do? Suppose, as a result of sanctions, Mao decides to retaliate on Hong Kong, what does the United Kingdom do? Suppose as a result of economic sanctions Mao decides to retaliate in Viet Nam, what do the French do? What do we do as a member of the United Nations? These things which I fear may conceivably be part of the logic of events.

There are groups in Canada which have been often more fervent even than the State department in their advocacy of moral condemnation of China. One of the groups concerned is in Winnipeg, an organization known as the Free Press, which I have followed with a certain interest through the years. The Free Press clings frequently to its moral principles, but I rather think that it regards them much as others regard their dentures, to be taken out, admired, washed and then replaced. The Free Press insists that China must be declared an aggressor, and anyone who disagrees with this point of view is automatically an appeaser à la Munich. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) answered them quite adequately today. He answered them also in that speech of his on January 26, when he said concerning Munich:

> The tragedy was in what was done there, and our statement of principles did not, I think, recommend doing anything that meant the betrayal of a people or a principle, nor was it a weak surrender to armed pressure or a naive misunderstanding of a political situation or of the dangers ahead if it were handled the wrong way.

The Free Press today does not appreciate the fact that the voice of a diplomat is only as loud as the calibre and the number of the guns behind him. Again I refer to the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because there is so much in it with which I agree. He said:

> The second draft resolution, proposed by the United States of America, finds that the people's government of China has engaged in aggression in Korea. If this resolution is pressed to a vote without further consideration of other measures, delegations will have to take a decision in regard to it, and that decision is not as easy or as simple for my delegation as it seems to be for some other delegations around this table.

Then he goes on:

> It may be right and necessary to pass a moral judgment on the aggressor, even if there exists a situation such as the possibility of another and far more dangerous aggressor which may affect the enforcement of that judgment; it may be right and necessary to do that providing we recognize the circumstances and state the position accordingly. That course is honest and straightforward. But we have, I think, on the other hand, no right to pass a judgment and at the same time give the impression that we can and will immediately and effectively enforce it no matter what the consequences may be, if we are not prepared to do that.

In other words, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was asking us not to repeat the error which we perpetrated in the league of nations with Italy. The Free Press does not yet accept that viewpoint. On January 26 it quoted from the London Times as follows:

Simply to dub China an aggressor without being able to take further, more decisive, measures would achieve nothing.

In other words, much the same as what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said. Then the Free Press went on to say:

Once the moral and legal position is established, the crime recorded and the criminal identified, what follows will inevitably be governed by strategic and military considerations.

I think this newspaper knows, as well as we do, that military considerations are such that they do not permit us to protect all the interests which we may have over the world. We have neither the troops nor the weapons. So that in effect what the Winnipeg Free Press is asking for is moral condemnation and no more, and yet if nothing is done beyond that—again I try to speak logically—if nothing is done beyond that, the United States may be happy at having had its own way, and the Free Press can wallow in its own moral rectitude, but the effect upon the United Nations may well be devastating; for as the United Nations may weaken, so will China be strengthened.

What we are doing is still to some extent playing the not very astute game asked us to be played by Russia. We are shoving China into Moscow's arms and we may have to fight a futile war in the Orient.

I now come to the position of the C.C.F. We do not think the real enemy in this world today is China. So far as we are concerned the threat to the world lies in the Soviet union. We believe that war in China means the wasting of human and material assets and a consequent weakening of our own position; and the position in which we are most engrossed, I imagine, is that of our membership and responsibilities in the North Atlantic treaty. But if our position there is weakened the North Atlantic grouping becomes weakened, and the green light is given to aggression, but not the aggression which the United States has in mind. Should we become sufficiently weak the green light is given to the Soviet union in western Europe.

I am convinced that the majority of Canadians know that, as I am convinced that the great majority of the people of Canada do not want war with China. The majority of the people of Canada do not want war—period. But if war has to come we realize with whom it is going to be. It is going to be with these men in the Kremlin, who have made a mockery of human dignity, a travesty of human liberty and a shambles of every hope we had for a peaceful world following the end of the war.

In our opinion our national interest demands that our strength be not frittered away. Our national interest demands that our determination to defend ourselves be not deflected by secondary events. Why then are we pursuing this policy which may conceivably land us into a morass from which I can see no way to extricate ourselves? I think there is only one answer. Again I am speaking bluntly because I think between friends we can speak with a degree of candour as long as it is recognized to be honest and sincere. The reason is American pressure. But what sort of American pressure could conceivably be exercised to persuade our delegate at the United Nations to support the course which he admitted to be premature and unwise at that particular time? The pressure was the fear that the United States would revert to isolation, and that we could no longer count upon the United States as an ally in our common fight to maintain our freedom and our ideals. The inference, which I do not take, but the inference which undoubtedly will be taken in certain areas in Europe unhappily, is that the United States is perhaps not so reliable an ally as many had hoped, but that in fact it can only be relied upon so long as it gets its own way. I am convinced that there are many Americans who would be horrified at such an interpretation of what has been done. My only hope is that time will not make them even more horrified by a realization that they may have won a battle and lost a war.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the debate was adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 5, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

VISITORS IN GALLERY—STUDENTS FROM GLEBE COLLEGIATE, OTTAWA

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call your attention and the attention of the house to the presence in the south gallery of a class of boys from Glebe collegiate in this city. I thank you, sir, for your provision for their attendance here today.

SURVEY OF IRON ORE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, at the last sitting of the house the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) asked me to make a statement with regard to the proposals of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to survey iron ore in the province of British Columbia.

The geological survey of Canada has already made considerable investigation of the British Columbia iron ore deposits. Investigations made prior to 1925 were compiled in a report by G. A. Young and W. L. Uglow, entitled "The Iron Ores of Canada, Volume 1, British Columbia and Yukon" (Economic Geology Series No. 3). This report indicates iron ore minerals at fifty-seven localities in British Columbia. These iron ore deposits are dealt with quite fully in this report, and a rough estimate given of the potential tonnage of ore containing more than fifty per cent iron.

In 1930 further geological field work was conducted in the Buttle lake area, Vancouver island.

In 1950 geological survey party, in charge of Dr. J. W. Hoadley, made extensive studies in the vicinity of Zeballos, Vancouver island.

The British Columbia department of mines published a report in 1942 by A. G. McKee and Company, engineers and contractors, of Cleveland, entitled "Report on Proposed Iron and Steel Works."

The geological survey of Canada has no new plans for 1951 dealing specifically with iron ore deposits in British Columbia. However, the field work of Dr. J. W. Hoadley in the Zeballos area will be continued, and this will include mapping and studies of potential iron deposits.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

STATEMENT AS TO LOANS TO HOME OWNERS, LOANS ON RENTAL PROPERTY AND RENTAL INSURANCE GUARANTEES

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): Mr. Speaker, the heavy demands the present international situation is imposing and will impose upon the economy of Canada for defence and other measures have made it necessary for the government to give new consideration to the problem of housing in Canada.

Through private endeavour, but also in large part owing to the assistance afforded by the government under the National Housing Act, house construction in Canada since the war has proceeded at an unprecedented rate. In 1947 the number of houses constructed was 79,359. In 1948 the number rose to 81,243. In 1949 the number of houses built was 91,000. In 1950 there was an unprecedented volume of loans under the National Housing Act, and a record number of housing starts. During the year approximately 87,000 housing units were completed but by the end of 1950 there were about 66,000 houses incomplete, which was approximately 8,000 more than were incomplete at the end of 1949.

The government is aware of the continuing need for housing accommodation in Canada, but starts at the 1950 rate are beyond the capacity of the house-building industry under present and foreseen circumstances. Building supply materials, and particularly products of steel, are in short supply, with the result that many builders and owners are unable to complete houses. One of the main problems is to complete houses now under construction, and what the government wishes most to avoid is the starting of a large number of houses which could not be completed.

Since September 1949, additional loans in the amount of one-sixth of the basic loan were being made, provided that the sale price to the home owner was fair and reasonable; but because of rising costs and the previously announced policy of maintaining January 1, 1950, lending values, this provision has become increasingly ineffective. It will be recalled that January, 1950, lending values have been maintained in an effort to curb price increases. Effective immediately, therefore, loans under the National Housing Act to home owners will be limited to 80 per cent of lending values prevailing in January, 1950. The effect of this action is that the additional one-sixth provision is suspended. This does not apply to existing commitments. Loans on rental property remain at 80 per cent. Rental insurance guarantees, now on an 85 per cent basis, will, effective immediately, also be computed on an 80 per cent basis.

Although the cost of construction rose about 10 per cent in 1950, the basis of valuation for National Housing Act purposes has not been correspondingly increased. As a result, down-payment requirements have increased in 1950 by the amount by which cost of construction has risen. Without the additional one-sixth, down-payment requirements are greater by about $1,000 on five-room houses and about $1,500 on six-room houses than they would be were this provision effective.

I would emphasize that the building supply situation in certain fields is expected to become more acute than at present, and would urge that builders and home owners consider carefully difficulties which they are likely to encounter on this score before they embark upon building operations. With respect to the current shortage of materials and the use to be made of available supplies, the government will continue to attach a high order of importance to housing and emphasize it to a degree second only to the direct defence program itself.

It is reasonable to expect that the demands for housing will be greatest in those centres where the defence program bears heaviest. With that in mind, the whole problem is being kept under constant review, and every effort within the scope of the National Housing Act will be made to see that, of the new housing in 1951, as much as possible will be built in areas where it is most urgently needed.

Mr. Fleming: May I direct a question to the minister arising out of his statement? In the first place, has there been any consultation with the provincial governments with regard to this change of policy? Second, will the new policy be applied to applications now pending?

Mr. Winters: As to the first question, there has been discussion with some of the provincial governments with respect to this policy. As to the second question, the new policy is not effective with respect to applications already approved; but where the applications have not been approved, the policy is effective.

Mr. Fleming: Even though the applications have been received?

Mr. Winters: Yes.

MANPOWER

STATEMENT AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I beg leave to table copies of order in council P.C. 567, dated 1st February, 1951, relating to the establishment of a national advisory council on manpower. In doing so, I wish to make an explanatory statement.

Plans related to the most effective utilization of Canada's present and potential working force, men and women, have been receiving the most careful consideration of the government.

As hon. members know, since the emergency of 1939 Canada has instituted widespread activities under the Unemployment Insurance Act, made possible through amendment to the British North America Act. The unemployment insurance commission now has throughout the country well-organized offices which have a double function—unemployment insurance on the one hand, and employment services on the other.

At the present time nearly every large community in Canada is served by one of these offices, of which there is a total of nearly two hundred. They keep constant and intimate contact with local working forces and employers in industry.

This is illustrated by the fact that the unemployment insurance commission records, kept up to date from week to week, were maintained for a total of over 2,800,000 Canadian workers who were insured under the unemployment insurance commission plan and who were in the labour force at the end of last October. Further, we have records for over four million workers who were insured at one time or another, including the 2,800,000 figure. The national employment offices during the past calendar year have been responsible for nearly 800,000 placements of workers in jobs. To do this, to provide the commission, our research branch in the department and the dominion bureau of statistics with a constant flow of vital information and statistics, these offices keep in the closest touch with their respective regions and communities.

To assist the national employment service and its regional and local offices in its work, the Unemployment Insurance Act provided for a national employment committee for head office, and similar committees for regional and local employment offices. These have representatives of labour, of employers and of other non-governmental bodies making up the social and the economic life of the nation. These committees have performed and will continue to perform most valuable services to Canada in this field.

Since becoming Minister of Labour I have made appraisal of the up-to-date information on Canada's working force, on the activities in which they work and on the industrial life of Canada generally that comes to the commission's head office, to the Department of Labour and to the bureau of statistics, through this well-integrated network that covers the whole country.

While the demand for workers was less than the supply in all categories, the objective of this machinery has been the mitigation of the hardships of unemployment on the one hand, and seeking to find work for applicants for jobs on the other.

Now, however, when the demand for workers for the armed forces, and for defence industries as well as normal industries, promises to exceed the supply in some categories, I believe the unemployment insurance commission-national employment service machinery I have outlined could continue its present role without interruption and at the same time provide the medium for arranging the maximum voluntary utilization of our manpower during the kind of emergency in which we now find ourselves.

There are many organizations, public bodies and departments of government vitally interested in all these matters, as well as the Minister of Labour, through whom the department and the unemployment insurance commission are responsible to the government: for example, the Department of National Defence, labour unions, defence industries, management, and so on. In this search for the maximum utilization of manpower now under the voluntary system, I believe the government should have available a joint clearing house for the prompt study of month-to-month manpower resources and needs, for the formulation of advice to the Minister of Labour or to the government with respect to these matters, and for the interpretation of resultant plans to workers, to management and indeed to all citizens.

The success of any plans, whether made under present voluntary methods or under more difficult conditions in the future, will depend upon how well they have been formulated in the light of all the facts, and upon how intelligently the opportunities to participate in them are presented to the people of Canada.

Therefore, with the authority of the government, there will be set up immediately, by the order I have just tabled, a national advisory council on manpower, the membership of which will consist of the clerk of the privy council and the deputy minister of labour, who shall be joint chairmen, and such other persons, including the following, as may be appointed, with the approval of the governor in council, by the Minister of Labour, after consultation with the appropriate national organizations:

Four representatives of labour; four representatives of employers; two representatives of agriculture; two representatives of the women of Canada; two representatives of the veterans of Canada; also representatives of the divisions of the government service responsible to the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Fisheries, the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Resources and Development, the Secretary of State, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

The council may, in the discharge of its duties, utilize the services of the unemployment insurance commission and its national employment services, as well as the national regional and local employment advisory committees now operating under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

I would like to state that a representative of this national advisory committee on unemployment will also be a member of the new council.

The duty of the council will be to consider various aspects of manpower questions; to advise on plans under review, and to suggest plans which should be developed so as to make for the most effective utilization in the national interest of the present and potential man and woman working force of Canada.

In organizing this council the government is determined that the greatest care shall be exercised in seeing to it that our available working personnel—particularly in the skilled trades—shall be distributed amongst the armed forces, defence production and civilian activities in the most effective manner possible.

I am informed by the joint chairmen, Mr. Norman Robertson and Mr. Arthur MacNamara, that it is their intention to call the first meeting of the council just as soon as all its members have been appointed, which I hope will be within a week.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a question? Will this committee also be able, if necessary, to advise the government on the material resources of this country, both industrial and financial? It seems to me that in order to appraise the manpower we have also to know something of our machinery, our industries and our financial resources.

Mr. Gregg: This council is intended to advise the minister, or the government, or both, on any question affecting manpower.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENT OF CHAPTER 54, STATUTES OF 1947-48—VOLUNTARY REVOCABLE CHECK-OFF OF UNION DUES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act (voluntary revocable check-off).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: The purpose of this bill is to add a new subsection to section 6 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, generally known as the national labour code. The effect of this new subsection is to provide for the voluntary revocable check-off of trade union dues.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

KURT MEYER

REPRESENTATIONS AS TO RELEASE FROM INCARCERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice? What representations, if any, have been received looking to the release from incarceration of General Kurt Meyer, and what action, if any, is the government taking on such representations?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The subject matter to which my hon. friend refers is properly referable to the Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The question of what disposition should be made of Kurt Meyer is receiving consideration.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister deal with the first part of my question? I asked what representations have been made, and from what sources.

Mr. Claxton: Representations have been made by him through legal counsel acting for him in the city of Halifax.

[Mr. Gregg.]

Mr. Fleming: None from the German government?

Mr. Claxton: None whatever.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION DURING THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister? In view of the apparent readiness of the provinces to agree to constitutional amendments in one form or another regarding old age pensions, will an effort be made, as soon as agreement has been obtained, to present those amendments to parliament in time so that legislation implementing last year's old age pension recommendations may be enacted at this session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would not like to confirm or to detract from the apparent optimism of the hon. member with respect to the readiness of the provincial governments to agree to constitutional amendments which would enable that to be dealt with.

As stated in the speech from the throne, the matter is before the provincial governments for their consideration, and it is and will be the policy of the government to avoid any possible delay when agreement has been reached to have that agreement implemented.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, my position as a parliamentary adviser to the Canadian delegation, which I have had the honour and privilege of occupying at the fifth general assembly of the United Nations at New York, makes it somewhat imperative that I commence my humble observations on foreign affairs with a word about the structure of the Canadian delegation itself. The multiple-party character and composition of our Canadian representation is a demonstration, in a sense, of the genuine desire of people of all parties in parliament to find, so far as humanly possible, a common voice for Canada at the peace tables of the world. It would be toying with the facts, of course, as this debate has already shown, to declare that all parties are agreed upon all aspects of Canadian foreign policy. It can properly be said, however, that the presence of representatives of all parties in parliament brings a serious sense of real responsibility to every political group sharing the stirring experience of these United Nations conclaves. Moreover, it provides all parties with the basic considerations and atmospheric background upon which governmental foreign policy is predicated and made.

Unlike our neighbours to the south, who have a type of bi-partisan delegation structure where the Republicans are full-fledged voting delegates, enunciating government policy along with their Democratic colleagues in the assembly deliberations, Canadian opposition representatives are not delegates in that sense of the term. We are parliamentary advisers only. We neither initiate nor assume responsibility for Canadian foreign policy, which, properly, is for the government of the day. Nevertheless we sit in on all delegation deliberations, and are free to participate as fully as we desire. In this way we are left free and unfettered in our constitutional position as critics of the government in both the domestic and the foreign field. It is by far the most sensible and practical arrangement I have seen in the four United Nations meetings in which I have been privileged to play a part.

It is common knowledge that the future of the United Nations organization has been hanging delicately in the balance and largely because it has been compelled to operate under well-nigh impossible conditions. Its failure to impose a durable collective security structure upon the post-war world recalls to our minds at once that it was originally instituted to function in a one-world structure and not in a world split down the centre by two challenging and violently competing ways of life. It was designed to discipline the fretful, the uneasy and the aggressively ambitious state with the collective weight of all the rest. It takes only a casual student of world affairs to see at once that any attempt by almost one-half of the world to discipline the other half under peaceful auspices raises the gravest kind of problems. When one adds to these factors the failure of the victor nations to agree among themselves upon suitable treaties of peace with the vanquished powers and the presence abroad of a poisonous cominform which aims to sap the vitals of and to plant treason behind the lines in all the free nations, and which plans to overthrow with terror, brute strength and hate the very governments which sit with the Soviets around the council tables of the world, it becomes unmistakably clear how far fear, division and distrust have combined with the abuse of the veto privilege to paralyse this adventure into the realm of lasting peace. Nevertheless it is all we have in the world on a global scale where nations can still present their cases, short of resort to arms, and the world is naturally reluctant to abandon it. Perhaps that accounts in part for the stubborn and obdurate fact that not a single one of the sixty nations in the organization has ever withdrawn from membership, while several are on the waiting list anxiously seeking admission. That, in itself, has, in my humble opinion, more than a little collective significance.

I think I must say, after attending United Nations gatherings in various capacities over the last six years, that there is sometimes a little too much stratospheric thinking and not enough of the down-to-earth approach to the problems of the world. For instance, there is a continuing need for realism in dealing with those past masters of realism from behind the iron curtain. They are tough, desperate power gamblers who call for peace on world forums, and, meanwhile, count heavily on the fertile soil of trouble, rebellion, disagreement and chaos to grow their soviet fruit elsewhere. Contrary to Russian professions, I am convinced that settlement of the outstanding inflammatory world issues on any widespread scale is not desired by the architects of Soviet imperialist policy at all. They believe imperial communism flourishes best with the world at the boiling point, and they are doing their best to keep it there. We should not be deluded into thinking that any substantial amount of Russian help is available to reduce the steadily rising global temperature. Their policy thrives on sore spots, and they intend to keep them open and festering. Let us never forget that the underlying policy of Soviet imperialism is world revolution, and its logical successor, world domination. It is hard to settle with people who do not want to settle and who do not think it pays them to settle. That is one of the major reasons why peace stands in jeopardy today.

Not many Canadians relish the prospect of a breach between the free nations and the Chinese people; but the Red leadership of that great power has been consistently waging a campaign of defiance and abuse which in my opinion has deeply injured the cause of peace. For centuries the name of China has stood high in the respect of the world. Her people, with their honest simplicity and pleasant philosophy of life, made friends everywhere. They became good law-abiding citizens wherever they went. These and other kindred considerations have made our diplomatic problems with the new Chinese government more trying than usual. No doubt the patience, and perhaps the hesitancy, of some powers to put China on the spot and brand her an aggressor and a breaker of the peace can be traced back to the reservoir of good will which exists for the Chinese themselves, but which their Red leaders have been rapidly dissipating. It is too bad that a people like the Chinese have to be judged by leadership of the type we experienced at the security council at Lake Success a few short weeks ago. I watched, as did other members of the Canadian delegation, the unpleasant and hostile demeanour of General Wu, the spokesman for the communist government of China, as he delivered what was virtually an ultimatum in terms of fire, brimstone and vitriol. It was a provocative, abusive and defiant effort. The texture of his entire argument paralleled closely the Muscovite line. It was clear for all to see that Moscow was making the balls and Wu was firing them.

It is probably safe to say that if, with one sweeping gesture made in good faith, the new government of China would throw off the yoke of Soviet imperialism and go it alone, speaking for China and the Chinese people and no one else, the outstanding differences between east and west could be resolved overnight. If the free powers encounter obstacles in finding common ground with China in the days ahead, the cunning and experienced hand of Soviet imperialism will be unable to escape a generous measure of the responsibility.

We in this party will be unable, when the vote is taken, to go along with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in the language of his subamendment, which reads as follows:

> We further regret that while Your Excellency's advisers have generally followed a constructive course in relation to the Korean dispute, they have in relation to the resolution branding China as an aggressor supported a course which is premature and unwise at this particular moment, and which should not have been pursued until the methods of peaceful negotiation had been completely exhausted.

When the North Korean communist forces began a full-scale invasion of South Korean territory last June, the conscience of the free world rebelled over such a high-handed and unprovoked act of hostility and armed aggression. The United Nations, very greatly to its credit, promptly took steps to save the South Koreans from disaster. When it became evident, despite the fraudulent attempts made by communist speakers from several nations, including China, to have an innocent world believe that the Chinese troops in Korea were mere volunteers, that the North Korean aggressors—so declared—were being joined by armies of Red China, there was little left for the United Nations to do but to declare them aggressors too. To have failed to do so would have set up different standards for determining aggression as between powerful nations and smaller powers.

A display of great courage when little nations are involved, and conversely, a demonstration of hesitancy and pussyfooting when big powers are implicated, would have meant that the United Nations was betraying the very principles for which it was instituted. Even-handed justice is a fundamental basis upon which any successful peace-keeping organization must work.

It is perfectly true that the resolution condemning the Chinese aggression in Korea will not necessarily solve either the military or the political problem which sticks out like a sore thumb in the Orient, but its adoption will at least put on record, with an overwhelming majority, the imprint of the conscience of a shocked and startled world which justly refused to tolerate in silence an armed attack on the United Nations forces themselves. To have scores of thousands of hard-fighting troops carrying the United Nations banner in Korea, with the assembly of that organization undecided whether to brand their attackers as aggressors, was a manifestly impossible position in which to leave casualty-stricken troops for any length of time. The air had to be cleared for them as well as for us. The passage of the resolution was delayed quite long enough as it was. The United Nations appears to have profited, at least to this extent, from the experiences gained from the Manchurian and Abyssinian incidents in the days of the old league.

I was suspicious from the start of the North Korean aggression last spring that the Mao government was in behind the scenes egging the North Koreans on, and I would have been surprised also had there not been some rather active encouragement from Russia as well. In plain street terms, all three of them were hoping to get away with it. They were all caught red-handed. What could they have expected as a reward for their planned and calculated attack, not only upon South Korea, but also upon the United Nations itself? The surprising part of the assembly's decision is not the decisive adoption of the resolution but the fact that the patience of the free world held on so long. The purport of the decision is that no nation may expect to have its aggression rewarded by vacillation, appeasement or indecision. Aggressors everywhere know now what they face. That in itself may prove to be a healthy sign for peace.

At a time when great emphasis seems to be laid upon the provocation of earlier days, which the Red Chinese are alleged to have suffered at the hands of the United States and other democratic powers, it is perhaps advisable for us to recall that the new Mao administration chose, immediately upon its ascent to power, to make its bed with imperialistic Red Russia, and seems content still to continue to lie in it. They treated Britain's gesture of diplomatic recognition with studied rudeness. They ignored the patient and peace-loving Indians and commenced to invade Tibet while negotiators of that country were travelling to a conclave to discuss Sino-Tibetan problems. While pleading their case before the United Nations in New York, their forces were bearing down on troops carrying the flag of that organization in the Korean peninsula. Their cool and enigmatic reception to the very moderate proposals of the cease-fire committee, amounting almost to a brush-off at certain stages, did not inspire confidence in the new Red Chinese government, even in circles where sympathy and understanding of China were latently waiting for a chance to be displayed in some tangible and helpful form.

Canadians will hope fervently that the free world will continue to leave no stone unturned to bring the Orient and the Occident into peaceful and harmonious relationships. The door to further negotiation must still be left open for an honourable and just settlement. If I were to underline any part of the speech I am making this afternoon, it would be those two sentences. We do not want a war with Asia; we do not want a war with anyone. We want to help Asia. But naturally we want to be certain that we are not assisting in the building of a giant Soviet empire designed to overthrow us and the rest of the world when we are offering the hand of genuine help to peoples who sorely need it. So we say to the Red Chinese government: Get rid of your Muscovite masters, and be your own. We can deal with Chinese as Chinese, but their membership in the imperial Soviet family puts unnecessarily high hurdles in front of free democratic assistance. Take those hurdles down and let us work together in peace, harmony and understanding. We all have much to contribute together, but less to contribute alone.

Despite the temptation to place heavy emphasis at the moment on the Korean campaign and the crisis in our relations with the Orient, the concern of the people of the free western world should not be diverted from the principal danger spot of all, Europe itself. There are powerful and convincing reasons why the Soviet imperialists would welcome a wholesale involvement of the free nations' military strength in the Far East. They are well aware that such involvement would drain the resources of the free powers and weaken their front against Kremlin pressure elsewhere.

Without ignoring here in Canada the strategic necessity of seeing to it that our own defences are adequate to protect our own people from both internal and external dangers, we should not be parties to weakening public opinion on this continent, although there seems to have been a desire to do so in certain quarters; we should not be a party to weakening public opinion as to the necessity, so well recognized when the North Atlantic treaty was signed, for our own defence, of our assisting in the defence of the free nations of western Europe against Soviet designs, pressure and attack. From the Truman declaration down to the Marshall plan for economic and financial aid, and on down to the North Atlantic alliance, the western world has been demonstrating beyond peradventure that it regards Europe as the ultimate strategic area so far as our plans for the containment of Soviet imperialism are concerned.

The safety and security of the central unit of our own commonwealth is inextricably related to such a policy. So is our own. Soviet imperial possession of western Europe would place the United Kingdom in a position of extreme danger—much greater danger than she faced when Hitler held the channel ports; for science has advanced materially since then in the field of rocket bombing and other forms of long-range destruction. The free powers in my opinion must never take their eyes off the Elbe. Better to stop them there than try to stop them at some point closer home. It takes no deep study of military strategy to determine at once what position Canada and the western world would find themselves in if freedom's boundaries were to become the North and South American shores of the Atlantic and Pacific. To use an Eisenhower term, which he used just a day or two ago, our freedom would inevitably wither and vanish. That means our most critical front of freedom is overseas, and we Canadians must fulfil our pledged North Atlantic obligations to the spirit and the letter of the pact, and we must be satisfied with nothing short of our maximum effort to ensure that we play our full part in this integrated challenge to further Soviet designs.

The free nations have talked a lot. They have done some blueprinting of plans, but there is still an uneasy feeling that somehow we have not come sufficiently to grips with the danger. They have made a start on defending themselves, but the day for all this must make way for the day of quick and effective action. At no stage in our national life did time count more than it does right now. We must all now get down to the grim, practical and costly business of preserving, at all costs, our way of life, which is threatened at every turn by evil forces eager to see the thumb-prints of a police state on the necks of us all. Not long ago no less an authority than General Dwight Eisenhower himself declared that "underpreparedness is as criminal as war itself".

Canada has a reputation to maintain in the campaign for freedom's preservation. She has her own safety and security to consider, as well as the maintenance of the free world in general. To fail to match our rather conspicuous declarations of intentions, made so frequently from international forums, with appropriate action to carry them out, would place us in a ridiculous position in the eyes of the world, and be grossly unfair to our friends and to ourselves. Parliament has a bounden duty to see that Canadian performances measure up to Canadian promises.

The tasks facing Canadians in the diplomatic field are made immeasurably easier when our two major friends, the United States of America and the United Kingdom, are pursuing parallel courses—and as I look at the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) I realize that no one recognizes that more fully than he. When their courses diverge, our troubles multiply. The recent diversity of views over the problems of the Far East makes it necessary that Canadians use that calm, collected and common sense judgment for which our Canadian people have come to be noted the world over. It should be easy for us to understand the genuine points of view of both, because we are closer to both than any other country in the world.

It is easy to see that Britain's position in the Far East is much more complicated than ours or than that of the United States of America. Her interests, as a people over there, are more intimate with the Orient than those of us over here. It is quite understandable that she wants, if possible, no involvement by the western powers in any widespread conflict between them and the Far East. Hong Kong has been frequently referred to as the New York of the Orient. Britain has it, and while there are unmistakable signs of a communist economic squeeze-play enveloping it, nevertheless the British still have a substantial economic and financial stake in that uneasy section of the globe. Sanctions which would cut off trade with Red China would take on a much more serious aspect for Britain than for any other major free power, and it is but natural that she wants to avoid them if other acceptable means can be found to penalize Red China for the crime of aggression. Like other nations in the European area, Britain fears the possible involvement of the United States and other free nations in a war with Red China which could conceivably dwindle, diminish and waste the strength of that great republic to the point where it might seriously affect her power to give dynamic and effective leadership to the North Atlantic treaty organization, whose principal emphasis is laid upon the job of containing communism in Europe—and no small job at that. These and other features of the oriental situation bear sympathetic consideration from the United Kingdom point of view.

Nor can we dismiss lightly the critical position of India and Pakistan, our sister members of the commonwealth. Let us make no mistake about that. Whatever may be said of India's judgment in connection with the present United Nations crisis and her relations with Red China, it can never be said that she lacks good faith or peaceful intentions in the pursuance of her policies. The Indian and Pakistani delegations at Lake Success were among the very best and most highly respected delegations there, although I was unable, as were many others, to follow at times some of the policies they advanced and advocated. Their perilous position in oriental politics must be understood and appreciated by all of us. Moreover, we must realize that they belong in the very nature of things to that non-communist world bloc of free nations who want no part of a Soviet imperialistic yoke. They are tied to the apron strings of nobody. We, obviously, cannot go along with them on all the issues that divide east and west, but in their desire to give leadership, in their own way, to a crusade for stability and peace in the Far East, they deserve our understanding and sympathy. It may well be that when the present crisis has been resolved and the cornerstone of true peace has been laid finally, the people of the subcontinent of India, which in a sense is the closest common ground between the Far East and ourselves, may be destined to play a part in world peace which will make us all glad of our association with them in that family of nations of which all British peoples are so proud.

Having put forward some features of the present world crisis as they appear to affect two sister members of the commonwealth, I desire to comment for a moment on our neighbour to the south, the United States of America. In the February issue of the Atlantic Monthly, published in the United States, there appears the following concluding paragraph of a commentary on the difficulties experienced by Canadians in their relationship with the United States:

> It is one thing for a small nation to follow the leadership of a great power when that leadership is incisive, intelligent, and informed. It is another when the follower begins to feel that the leadership is vacillating, inept, or uninformed. Ottawa has never been particularly awe-struck by General MacArthur. His pronunciamentos plus his something less than omniscient intelligence service has given Ottawa the creeps. Washington's almost cavalier dismissal as sheer bluff of Red China's warning that it would invade Korea if the UN forces invaded the north would not be remembered if it had not been wrong. But what Ottawa resents most of all is Washington's offhand treatment, which is new and strange after years of close co-operation with the Roosevelt administrations.

I have no doubt that some Canadians hold strong views as to how they think the Americans could improve their conduct in the field of world politics. On the other hand some Americans may not see eye to eye with Canadians in their handling of international relations. It seems to me, however, that any widespread surrender on either side of the border to wholesale criticism of each other at the moment could only result in the fouling of our own nest and in giving comfort to an enemy whose cleverness in laying false emphasis has become a feature of its enslaved propaganda.

The headlines of this week end have heralded the observation of Foreign Minister Chou En-lai of China that the United States wants war. We know she doesn't. We know that the prayers of people everywhere on this continent, as elsewhere, are going up nightly that casualty lists on a world scale shall never be published again. No continent has more to gain by peace and more to lose by war than this. That is why peace is our most precious treasure and one we shall not easily give up.

It is no exaggeration to say that the patience of the American people, as well as other peace-seeking nations, has been nearing exhaustion in recent days. They feel that they, along with other free nations, have been bullied and defied by the Reds on varying occasions since the close of the last war. Vivid in their minds are the compulsory absorption of Poland, Roumania, Bulgaria, Albania, Czechoslovakia, Hungary and East Germany into the Soviet orbit. They have not forgotten the Berlin blockade, the indirect attempt to throttle freedom in Italy, and fishing expeditions of the Russians in every troubled political stream in the Orient, together with the ominous stepping-up of the activities of the dreaded cominform all over the world. Just how long a peaceful nation should take, lying down, these defiant and undisguised steps towards world domination has raised a special question for the United States, ourselves and others. We have answered that question in the only way we could answer it, and that is by meeting fire with fire. Whatever may be the criticism of United States foreign policy, at least it can properly be said that American influence has materially stiffened the backs and the determination of free nations everywhere to stop these stealthy aggressors in their tracks. Before the last war, the free nations ignored aggression until it was too late to stop it short of war. This time that lesson is sinking in, and we see that the way to settle outstanding world issues peacefully is to be able to talk on terms of equality in strength and might with those whose language reeks of force and power.

In the international field, Canada must always make her own decisions. They cannot be made to order for us in some other capital, no matter how friendly that capital may be. Nevertheless in the formulation of our policy we must continue to be guided by the cardinal fact that in a world shrunken as this, where we are all on the doorsteps of every other nation and where our very freedom and liberty are being challenged, we have to work closely integrated with others in the common cause. Canada could not hope to stand alone, but she could fall alone.

In view of the importance attached to an effective pooling of free power strength in the shortest possible time, the screaming need of putting an end, once and for all, to the harmful and dangerous divisions which occur much too frequently between some of the major free nations cannot be too emphatically stressed. Our problems on the military and economic fronts do not appear to offer as many opportunities for division as our problems on the political front. Somehow this area of disagreement must be reduced and more effective policy-making machinery set up by which high-level problems in the political field can be more rapidly and confidently cleared and decided among the government chiefs of the free powers involved.

When I returned from the United Nations general assembly I was flooded with inquiries, particularly from people in my own part of Canada, who anxiously asked: "Does this all mean war, or is there some chance still of peace?". I fancy this question is asked of every member of this house. It is regrettable that so many qualifications must go into the reply. It is possible, I am glad to say, to agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), that "war is not inevitable". But it would be describing the situation with less than candour if one were to say that peace can come without our doing anything about it. We can only have peace in this disjointed, power-drunk world if this nation and others are prepared to do something about it. A static, negative approach to peace today will only lead to inevitable war.

The evil forces arrayed against us do not and will not understand pleas for peaceful settlement of the outstanding world issues unless those pleas are supported by columns of might and power. The hope I have for peace—and it is by no means a forlorn hope—lies in the possibility that when two worlds finally face each other, both possessing the weapons and the capacity to destroy each other, whatever common sense is still then left in mankind will prevail and that both of them will sit down to a conference table, both of them speaking on equal terms of strength and might, and call quits before they loose upon mankind and themselves the tortures of possible and final annihilation.

The weakness of the free powers is an open invitation to war today, and despite the terrors which new destructive forces of atomic power have struck into the hearts of the masses of the world, it may well be that had this powerful psychological as well as military weapon not been possessed by one of the free powers, there would have been nothing standing between the free nations and the realization of the Soviet dream of empire and domination over us all. It will be our hope, and a prayerful one, that atomic power will always remain in the psychological rather than the military domain. Imperial sovietism has it in its hands to keep it there, and has that responsibility the same as the rest of us.

In my concluding remarks I desire to turn for a moment to the long-range aspect of this determined fight of the free peoples for peace. It concerns our relationship with those hundreds of millions of men, women and children whose life and development have been dwarfed by conditions about which none of us can fail to be deeply concerned. Today they are on the move, and we face the bold, blunt fact that Asia is in the throes of a giant revolution involving well over a third of the world's population. Many of these people have just experienced the travail and pangs of national birth and national independence. They are sensitive, and are feeling their way through a maze of internal and external entanglements. To guide them, Soviet imperialism had held a Red lantern to light their way. They have been told by the cominform that most of their troubles can be traced directly back to a western colonial policy of selfish aggrandizement and economic piracy. With this communist stock-in-trade argument, every effort is made by the Reds to put us in the international doghouse with the people of the Orient.

The Colombo commonwealth plan of economic help for the Far East, and the Truman Point Four program, are both steps in the right direction towards a better understanding, and while some Orientals may still prefer to regard our assistance as a deathbed repentance, we should not give up or despair in a genuine effort to help the free Orient to get on its economic feet. I was convinced as early as the time of the San Francisco conference, and have said it many times in parliament and privately since, that in the long run this country and others similarly privileged cannot hope to remain forever an island of good times, high standards of living and prosperity, in the midst of a raging sea of international backwardness, distress, poverty and suffering. In common parlance, no matter how you look at it, it just doesn't add up.

Moreover, it is crystal clear that the crushing of Soviet imperialism and ultimate victory by the free powers will not necessarily mean that communism itself will have been destroyed. Far from it. Wherever there are swamps and marshes of frustration, misery, social and economic injustice, greed and intolerance, communism will grow, flourish and multiply, in spite of navies, armies, air forces or science's most elaborate gifts to the means of mass destruction. In the final chapter of the struggle between freedom and imperial communism, the scales of victory may well be turned, not by force and power alone, but by a humanitarian approach to our own fellow men of different colour, creed, nationality, philosophy and outlook in the farthest recesses of the globe. It is a basis of permanent peace which, after the current clash has been resolved, must be seriously considered by us all if the free way of life is to survive.

Mr. J. M. Dechene (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, in asking you for the privilege of the floor this afternoon, I do not do so with the conviction that I have a solution to offer for every problem that we face in Canada. I do not do so because of the ability with which I might convey my thoughts to this house, which has just listened to a great address by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). I do so rather because of the conviction that it is my duty once more to bring to you and to this house a message from the part of Canada from which I come, and to express some of the views and ideas I hold on problems the solution of which is so vital to the people of Canada.

I assure you that the thoughts which I express to you this afternoon are my own. In nearly fifty years of public life I have always made it a point to say what I think. If sometimes the style has suffered, I hope that sincerity has not been lacking.

In these momentous times I am impressed by the fortunate position of our country in that we have such an able leader with such able colleagues to help us meet the situation which faces us. In the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) we have one who in the last few years has proved himself to be the equal of the greatest statesmen in the world; and I say that advisedly. At his side we have men who took part in the last struggle; they are men of experience who have shown what can be accomplished. If unfortunately this country is again faced with the calamitous events of war, I have full confidence in the leadership we shall have in this country, and I know that confidence is shared by the people of Canada generally.

If I speak mostly of Alberta and of Athabaska in the remarks which I intend to address to you, it is because I do not quite agree—and I hope I do not get into trouble with you, Mr. Speaker—with the interpretation of the parliamentary rules which we have been following in this country. We mention the name of Bourinot, of May, and of our own Beauchesne. They refer us to Westminster and tell us that once a member is elected for the far-flung constituency of Athabaska, for instance, he is supposed to cease to be a member for that constituency and to become a statesman and a legislator; he is supposed, as a statesman, to consider everything that comes before this house as it affects the whole of the people of this country. But these rules, sir, which are in effect at Westminster apply to a country about the size of my own constituency, and in which 45 million or 50 million people live. They can get together in a short time. It takes only a few hours to travel from one end of the country to the other. How can I, with the best of good will, do that? How can you expect the member for Athabaska, a pioneer himself in that western country, representing a population of pioneer farmers, ranchers, trappers, fishermen and lumbermen, to come down here and call himself a statesman in order to offer solutions to the problems of Canada and of the whole world? No, sir. I deem it my duty to represent, first, the people of my riding of every political faith. I know the house will not object to my doing so. I want to say one thing more. I will say this to the Prime Minister, repeating what I said a few moments ago. Should war again threaten our country, should you and I, sir, again have to face that awful threat, I have full confidence in the policies and the politics of the Prime Minister and the government of this country.

May I say another word along the same line? I have listened once more with great care to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and once more I was struck with the strength and the ability displayed by the men who have joined the Liberal party from year to year and from election to election.

The other day, picking up a newspaper, I saw that Lionel Conacher had been declared by a committee, well informed and appointed for that purpose, to be the greatest athlete of the past half century. He is a Liberal and a member of this house for Toronto-Trinity. I turn to my left sometimes and I see the smiling countenance of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. McDonald), a tough man to meet at any time and in any line of sport, and also a member of the Liberal party. But there are some sentiments of sorrow in the remarks I have to make. In the seat occupied by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) sat an old old friend of mine. In this country we have no aristocracy except that of the mind and of the heart. We are all equal; there are no classes. But he was one of God's aristocracy. I refer to the late member for Brandon, Mr. Matthews. A gentleman to his fingertips, he had a heart of gold. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, how much of this world's goods he left his family—it is not this world's goods, because the state takes it all today—but I know that he has left them, sir, the greatest heritage of all, the memorial of a fine Canadian and a fine reputation.

I was not as well acquainted with the late member for Queens, Mr. Douglas; but we had a lot of contact because of some personal friends who used to live out west about whom we used to sit and talk. I had accepted an invitation to visit him this coming summer. That is now impossible, but I hope we shall meet in a place where we can talk about all our old friends.

A year ago I sat listening to an address, and sometimes addresses are dreary things to listen to. I relieved the tension by reading a magazine, and there leapt to my eyes a poem, of which I sent a copy to Mr. Matthews, and one to the hon. member for Timiskaming. Today I want to read it to you, and I want to dedicate it to all of my old friends in this house who have passed the allotted span of three score years and ten. For instance, I dedicate it to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), the dean of the house; to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. Carroll); to my deskmate, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch); to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Little); to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black); and to the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Bonnier). I am sure you will enjoy it, sir, and I ask your permission to place it on record. It reads as follows:

> Before we met and you became my friend,
> Age was to me a terrible abyss
> In which all hope, all loveliness, all bliss
> Were lost forever. Nothing could defend
> The old from this grim fate. Now, knowing you,
> Age wears for me a glory and a light;
> It is a silvered pinnacle, whose height,
> Courageously attained, presents a view
> Which youth nor middle age has looked upon.
> You have no words to tell me what you see,
> But what you are is proof enough for me
> That sunset may be lovelier than dawn.
> Since I met you, age is a promised land
> Where hope and faith and love walk hand in hand.

The reason I take up your time this afternoon is that on the day that the news of the death of Mr. Matthews came over the radio I had a letter from him. By that time he was gone, but we all recall the generous and kind man that he was. In his letter he said to me:

> My dear old friend:
> I trust this will find you and your good wife enjoying all that is best. I was just doing some filing today and came across something that again appealed to me most strongly. It was your very delightful note sent across the house to me one day containing a little gem of poetry, and it is a gem, entitled, "To an aged friend." Believe me when I say that the poem and the kind thoughtfulness that prompted your sending it over to me is one of my very cherished memories.

I hope, sir, that I can leave this world with the same kind of obituary that I am so pleased to give to my old friend, Matthews.

The other day—I can call him Art Smith now—the hon. member for Calgary West made a memorable address. You heard it, sir. I have known him for many many years. We used to walk the same paths. I think we parted in 1917. What a wonderful man he is. What a loss to the Conservative party; what a loss to Alberta; what a loss to the whole country that he has found it necessary to resign. Art Smith came from a city which has given many great men to this country, and some others not so good. It was the city of Dr. Brett, later lieutenant governor, the city of A. L. Sifton, the city of Uncle James Reilly, the city of R. C. Edwards of the Calgary Eye Opener, of James Emmett Reilly, of Richard Bedford Bennett, of P. J. Nolan, Pat Burns, and many others. And now here is the last of a great generation leaving our midst. As an Albertan, Mr. Speaker, may I express the sincere hope that Art Smith will regain his former health and remain with us for a long, long time.

Mr. Speaker, today we have been throwing bouquets; and before the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) leaves the chamber I should like to make reference to him. On behalf of the people of all parties in Alberta, may I take this opportunity to thank the Prime Minister for having seen fit to give that province representation in his cabinet. It was a generous move, and we so recognize it because we in Alberta have not always been so generous to the Liberal party.

I am the only one left of that little group that stepped out of office in Alberta in 1921. The rest are all gone. The fact that I am the only survivor illustrates the frailty of matters connected with politics. When the Prime Minister now takes into his cabinet a representative from Alberta I know that he is giving proper thought to the people of Alberta, and I have no doubt that in future, because of this recognition, those people will be more generous with him than they have been in the past.

The Prime Minister, in his wisdom, knows well how much the people of my province have contributed to Canada. He knows, too, about our great resources. He knows that in a short time vast quantities of oil will be flowing to the head of the lakes.

A report has been made only recently which indicates that there are vast possibilities in the bituminous tar sands of my constituency. In that area is the greatest reserve of oil and gas to be found anywhere in the world, without exception—and it is right in the middle of that great constituency of Athabaska. I have no doubt that is why the Prime Minister appointed to his cabinet from my province a man with technical training, and one experienced in business. I am sure that he will prove to be a first-class representative for Alberta, as well as a credit to his province and to the government of which he now forms a part.

May I offer one further word. I would express the view that even in a state of apprehended war we must continue to develop the resources of the country, and particularly the oil resources of Alberta. We must not restrict unduly any activities in the development of our oil reserves, which are so vital in peace, and so much more so in war. No matter what the cost may be, we must go ahead with the development of these great tar sands fields of Alberta. If the provincial government is unable to do so, then I think it is safe to say that the government of Canada will come to the rescue, so that this great field of power may be developed.

Engineers have shown that these sands can be developed. Only recently an outstanding engineer from New York gave the estimate that at least 250 billion barrels of oil can be taken from the oil-bearing sands of Athabaska.

On one occasion I stated in the house that if either the Kaiser or Hitler had had resources of this kind in Germany, they would not have been permitted to remain undeveloped. Can we believe that they would be left undeveloped in Russia today? All the more reason why we in Canada should carry out the development of these great resources so as to ensure that we and our allies will have this vast supply of motive power, with which any nation can make itself more safe either in time of peace or in war.

It is fitting, sir, that you should now grace the chair of the house. Perhaps it is within your knowledge that I was born in that part of the country you represent. My family were pioneers in the lake St. John area, at a time when the nearest town was seventy-five miles away. But that proved too close when the railway came and they moved to a place in Alberta where the nearest town was one hundred and seventy-five miles away. Before my father died he took advantage of opportunity offered by the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, took over a second homestead, and improved and earned title to it in the Peace river country when he was almost eighty years of age.

In my remarks I make special reference to my constituency of Athabaska, because in the last few years nature has not been too kind to us. There have been crop failures. Last year the condition was calamitous. Our crop was frozen, and whatever we had cut remains under the snows of winter today. It was most fortunate, however, that legislation had been passed in the House of Commons, on recommendation of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), which permitted some relief for our farmers under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Then, only a few days ago they were made happy by the Prime Minister's declaration resulting from his interview with the Prime Minister of Great Britain, when it was recommended that in connection with the final payment the "have regard" clause be reopened, and that further consideration be given to it by the British cabinet. Knowing the Prime Minister of Canada as we do, we cannot help feeling convinced that he will win his point. I repeat that at this time I am not speaking for the Liberal party, but that I do speak on behalf of my constituency in saying that I believe the British government will play the game—to use the expression commonly used out in the west—and that our farmers will receive generous treatment, in consideration of the prices they have accepted for their wheat during the first two years of the contract. I am fully confident that we shall be treated fairly. As an old-timer, with some experience, I believe the people of western Canada may feel confident that reasonable payments will be forthcoming from the operations of the last two years, as a result of the reconsideration to be given by the British government.

I am not going to discuss external affairs. Twice in my life I had to take home to my wife and to my mother telegrams bearing bad news. I hope this will not happen again. Let us not permit a condition to develop again under which horrible instruments of destruction can flourish. We recall having seen pictures of thousands of refugees, including orphans and women. They had nothing to protect them, and were left homeless because of invasions by their neighbour, bringing about suffering beyond human description.

An old friend from Belgium, who lived near me in Alberta, died recently. He had lived just outside Brussels, in Belgium, in 1914 when the German army marched through—a million and a half of them. He said you could hear the tramp, tramp of their feet, stretching over a week or ten days or two weeks, and that the marching went on ceaselessly. They destroyed everything on their way, ruining the work of ages and generations. This man said that he heard it all the time until he died. The tramping of those soldiers were trampings upon his soul; they tramped on everything he cherished. They tramped on the flag he adored and destroyed everything for which his nation and people had stood for centuries. I hope we shall never see such things again.

I realize that my remarks today may not be very interesting, but as an old man I have confidence in the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he says that we shall have peace. God is still in His heaven and He will be there when all the Stalins and Molotovs and Vishinskys have become only memories. He will be there just as He was after the great autocrats and conquerors of history had lain under the dust of centuries. I say to the government that I am convinced that they have behind them the support and backing of the people of this country, that they have the confidence of the people and whatever they believe they may have to do shall be done.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like first of all to compliment the hon. member who has just resumed his seat upon a very excellent speech. I want to say to him that I agree wholeheartedly in the respects he has paid to deceased members of this house and to the hon. member who has just resigned. Although I number among my friends many hon. members on the other side of the house I still do not think they are sprouting the wings the hon. member seems to indicate they are, any more than I see wings sprouting on hon. members on this side of the house.

With respect to the excellent speech just made by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), I should like to say to him that I agree one hundred per cent on one point, that the real aggressor in the world today is Russia, on whom we should be keeping our eyes. Perhaps in voting for the resolution which was recently passed by the United Nations many delegates failed to realize just who the real aggressor is.

I do not think there has ever been a time since I have been a member of this house when so many people have come to see me in the two weeks before leaving for Ottawa. These people had questions to ask as to the government's intentions with respect to many problems and I should like to name a few of them. One question which was asked quite frequently was: What are the government's intentions with regard to our Korean forces presently training at Fort Lewis in the United States? What forces have we in Canada for our own protection and to take care of our commitments throughout other areas of the world?

I come from an agricultural constituency in western Canada and another question which I was asked practically every time I went down the street in the little town in which I live was: What are the government's intentions with regard to the five-year pool? When are they going to make the payments? These people were told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) last fall that payments would be made before the first of the year. Later they were told that they would be made immediately after the first of the year. Now they are told that they may be made in time to provide funds for putting in the crops. Another question asked is: How much is the payment going to be? Is it going to be 25 cents a bushel, 15 cents a bushel or five cents a bushel? We do not seem able to get any idea from the government and I think it is time we had some information.

Another question which was asked practically every time I went into a store was this: What is the government going to do about the cost of living? A man would say, "Look at this sweater. It is costing me $17.50. Four years ago I was able to buy it for $10. Five years before that I could purchase it for $8. The storekeeper tells me that the next shipment will cost $2.50 more, or $20." What is the government going to do to prevent the rising cost of living?

Our old age pensioners want to know the government's intentions with respect to old age pensions. I am glad the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made the statement he did in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and indicated that it is the intention of the government, immediately the provinces have cleared the way, to bring in the necessary legislation to make old age pensions universal. But that is not going to solve the problem of a great many old age pensioners because it will not increase the basic pension of $40, $42.50 or $50 which the old age pensioners in some provinces are receiving at the present time. It is only by taking action in respect to the cost of living that we are going to be able to solve some of these problems.

I could go on enumerating the questions that were asked. There is one vital matter that concerns western Canada: the intention of the government in connection with freight rates. Are they going to allow another overall increase or is there to be some adjustment of the iniquitous freight rate structure there is at the present time in Canada?

These are questions which the government should have answered in the speech from the throne. When I was asked these questions the only answer I could give was that probably the government would indicate its intentions in the speech from the throne. But in the speech from the throne we found again just a lot of generalities, with very few definite answers to the questions which are in the minds of our people today.

I believe it is time that these questions were answered. If we are to maintain the morale and initiative necessary for an all-out effort at this time, the people must have answers to these questions.

I should like to point out four reasons why we in this group believe that there should be support in the house for the C.C.F. amendment. Just before the vote was taken in the United Nations the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) spoke as follows:

> . . . we think the putting of such a resolution at this stage and in this form, when the possibilities of negotiation with the people's government of China are not, in our opinion, completely exhausted, to be premature and unwise.

Yet, despite that statement, a few minutes later the delegation voted for the United States resolution. It seems to me that there must have been some other reason why that action was taken, and in talking with people I find that there seems to be a general opinion that there probably were three reasons why our government and other governments supported the United States resolution. First, it is thought that there was apprehension in the minds of a great many delegates that if the United States amendment was not supported the United States might withdraw from the United Nations. Second, it was thought that there was a possibility that the United States might be lukewarm in its support of the Atlantic pact unless her wishes were met with regard to this resolution.

Third, I think there was a fear that unless support were given at this time it would encourage isolationism in the United States. I do not think these are sound reasons. I think we should have more confidence in the sound judgment and intelligence of our good neighbours to the south than to think that they would have done any of these things if the resolution had not been supported. As a matter of fact I should like to give the house an opinion which I believe was fairly general in the United States a week or ten days before the vote was taken, at a time when it appeared that the United States was not going to be able to obtain support for its resolution. This opinion has to do with the purposes of the United Nations. It is found in the Christian Science Monitor and reads:

> Its inability to coerce a major power was even written into its basic structure in the form of the big power veto which, a fact frequently overlooked in discussions, was insisted upon by the American delegation at Dumbarton Oaks and San Francisco just as much as by the Soviet delegation. We ourselves participated in making the United Nations an organization which could not coerce or effectively punish a major power. The demand that it coerce communist China is therefore a demand that it do something which it is not constitutionally built to accomplish. It is a limited instrument. We helped to make it a limited instrument. It is hardly accurate therefore to say that it has failed. It has only failed to do what it never was given the power to do.

I think that is a true statement. It is a statement of fact, and if the United States had had any idea that they would fail to accomplish their purpose in this way I think that other steps would have been taken. Further on in the article it states that the United Nations is not an always available instrument for American purposes.

I think that is a point and one that we should have emphasized by voting against the U.S. resolution. Any time that the United Nations becomes an available instrument of any one of the larger powers then the United Nations is due for extinction. That is the main point of our objections to the Canadian delegation voting for the United States resolution. By so doing, we are playing right into Russia's hands. This is the idea that they have been trying to spread. They have been trying to tell the rest of the world that the United Nations is simply an instrument made available for United States purposes. That fact is one of the main arguments that the Soviet union is using to destroy the United Nations and yet we give them that opportunity.

The second reason why I believe we should not have supported the United States resolution is that we are convinced that the real threat to freedom at this time is not in China but in Russia, and that there is nothing that would please the real aggressor more than to see the western world embroiled in a general conflict in Asia. Look at the position in which the western world finds itself today. Great Britain has twenty-five to thirty per cent of her forces engaged in Malaya or stationed at Hong Kong and Singapore. We find the French with probably fifty per cent of their available forces engaged in Indo-China. The United States and other members of the United Nations have a large proportion of their available forces already engaged in Korea. That is exactly what the real aggressor wants today. He wants to see the forces of the free people of the world engaged in other areas, engaged in the Asiatic area so that they will not be available in Europe where the real threat is.

The third reason why we feel that our amendment should have the support of the house is that it is of little value to declare a nation or an individual an aggressor unless we are prepared to contain or punish them. Indeed it may even encourage them to further acts of violence. There are three types of sanctions: diplomatic, economic and military. Unless we are prepared to go the whole way, unless we are prepared to institute some type of sanction against a nation which we have called an aggressor, it seems to me we are only encouraging aggression in the world.

Can we institute sanctions without becoming further embroiled in Asia? I doubt it. Any form of economic sanction will require some form of military aid to maintain it. Immediately we send ships or other forces to the east to maintain economic sanctions we are in danger of becoming definitely embroiled in a war with China itself.

The fourth reason why I think our amendment should be supported is that there is a strong tide of nationalism sweeping the Asiatic countries at the present time. Action by the United Nations, a majority of whom belong to the western world, against an Asiatic country before every avenue of possible settlement has been explored, can and will have serious repercussions. In my estimation China and Russia are not natural allies. They have several thousand miles of common border. Along that border much of the area is not clearly defined as belonging to either of them. I refer to Outer Mongolia, Manchuria and the islands north of Japan. Given time, it seems to me that an alliance between China and Russia would become very difficult. In moving the resolution at the time that it was moved in the United Nations it seems to me we are doing the one thing that will drive those two countries together and give them what they may consider to be a common enemy.

I am sure that anyone who listened yesterday to the radio report from Lake Success could not but be impressed by the fact that it is now admitted there that any committee set up under the United States resolution to try to negotiate a peaceful settlement of the present dispute has very little chance of success. As a matter of fact there is talk already of setting up an independent committee outside the United Nations to try to negotiate a settlement. It seems to me that is not good. It seems to me that we were premature in our support of the resolution at Lake Success.

I was very pleased to note that reference is made in the speech from the throne to the Colombo conference, and that at that conference discussions and negotiations have taken place with respect to economic aid to the Far East. I am sure it is long overdue. As a matter of fact we should have instituted some form of economic aid to the eastern countries immediately the last war ended. If we had done so we would be in a much stronger position than we are today. When speaking in the house last year, I made two suggestions. I suggested that one of the ways in which we could obtain the good will of the eastern countries was to bring young people from those countries to our universities and to our industries, to give them some training in the methods of the democratic world. I still believe that is a good idea. I still believe that we would obtain more good will in those countries if we were to bring these young people to the North American continent to enter our colleges, our industrial life, our civil service, our co-operatives, to gain a knowledge of all the functions of a democratic society. It would enable them to see the advantages of a democracy. Little is known about these advantages in those eastern areas.

When these young people returned to their own countries they would be messengers of good will from the western world. They would be able to assist the people we may send to those countries as a result of the Colombo conference, to institute the reforms which are necessary if the people are to enjoy a better standard of living in that part of the world. I am glad to know there are others who believe in this idea. At the first of this session I believe all the members of the house received an editorial which was published on January 15 in Maclean's magazine. I do not intend to read the whole of the editorial, although it was a good editorial, but I should like to read one paragraph. It states:

> For every dollar we must spend to train and maintain our special Korea brigade, we could spend another dollar to train and maintain a special brigade of several thousand doctors. We could send these doctors, at our expense, to fight disease in the parts of the world where many millions live and die without knowing a single day of freedom from disease.
> For every shell and bomb we shall create if there is a third world war we could create with greater ultimate profit to ourselves a meal for the mouth of a starving child.

I believe that editorial expresses the sentiments of this group and a great many other people in Canada agree with those sentiments. We should be doing the practical thing by training people to serve in those parts of the world.

That brings me to the second point which I tried to emphasize at the last session, and that is that Canada should be prepared to make an immediate contribution of food to India to aid in alleviating the famine which is now sweeping that country. I have in my hand a copy of the Economic Annalist in which it states:

> Total supplies of Canadian wheat for the 1950-51 crop year are 575 million bushels. Exports in 1950-51 may reach 275 million bushels, while about 155 million will be required for domestic use. The 1950 western wheat crop contains abnormally large quantities of low-grade wheat, slightly more than half of the total deliveries being expected to grade No. 5 and lower. Fortunately, the carry-over at July 31, 1950, included a large proportion of high quality wheat and as a result, enough of the millable grades should be available to satisfy domestic requirements and to meet this crop year's allocation (approximately 219 million bushels) under the international wheat agreement with a small margin left over for sale outside the agreement. Both the domestic and export markets are expected to absorb significant quantities of low-grade wheat. If these estimates are realized, some 145 million bushels of wheat (mostly low grade) will remain for carry-over at July 31, 1951.

In my opinion that is a conservative estimate of what our wheat carry-over will be next August. What excuse can we have for watching people starve when we have upwards of 145 million bushels of surplus wheat in this country? It is true that this 145 million or 150 million bushels which we may have as a surplus has a large proportion of low-grade wheat in it—probably over half of it will be No. 5 or No. 6. However, No. 5 or No. 6 wheat will still make a flour that will keep the people from starving. It does not make a first-class loaf of bread, but it does make a loaf which the people of India would be glad to have in this emergency. I see no just reason why we should not immediately make this available to India.

There are three ways in which this could be done. First, it could be made available directly by Canada to India. Second, it could be made available through agreements or understandings reached at the Colombo conference. Third, it might be made available through the food and agricultural organization.

I should like to say a word about the food and agricultural organization. At a meeting in Washington a little over a year ago it was suggested that food banks should be set up by this international organization in order to have supplies available for just such an emergency as we find in India. I was sorry that at that conference our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) did not see fit to support the setting up of these world food banks. They have been requested by the Canadian federation of agriculture and by the international federation of agricultural organization, known as the IFAO. They have been asked for by a great many other organizations in the world.

There are three main food grains: wheat, rice and soybeans. It seems to me that if we are to carry out our obligations to the eastern world, if we are to carry out the promises which we sometimes make, then some international food bank such as was proposed by the food and agriculture organization of the United Nations should be set up. We have not that instrument available to us now. Our Canadian government should therefore immediately offer the government of India at least 50 million bushels of our wheat to be shipped just as quickly as possible, under the difficult situation which exists with regard to transportation and drying of these lower grades of grain.

There is an editorial in Saturday Night which I believe illustrates the point very well. It states:

> At the instance of Senator Tom Connally, the request . . .

That is the request of India for two million tons of wheat, not as a gift, but at a favourable price.

> . . . has been pigeonholed, and no secret has been made of the reason for ignoring it: It is that India's views on China are different from those of the United States. Fortunately, the Indians possess a remarkable calm in these matters. They don't explode with indignation: They say "how childish."
> It would be nice if Canada were in a position to feel superior about Senator Connally's attitude . But this country has done nothing yet to justify feeling smug. India's need has been explained to the government at Ottawa. Our exportable surplus of high-grade wheat this year is smaller than usual. Most of it has already been contracted for. But we have large quantities of low-grade wheat, so much that we hardly know what to do with it. India is not making fussy distinctions between grades. People with empty bellies are more concerned about nutritional value than about baking qualities.
> Within its limited dollar resources the Indian government is prepared to pay some sort of price for the wheat. The Canadian government should be quick and eager to meet them halfway. But we don't feel much confidence that it will.

Now, here is an opportunity for our government to do something that they have been talking about for a long time. I hope it will seize the opportunity to make this wheat available just as quickly as possible. As I have stated before, the fact that it is low grade does not necessarily mean it is not good for human consumption, and will not save many lives in India. It could be shipped through the Pacific ports. It does not have to go out through the great lakes, over which shipment is, of course, impossible at this time. It would mean that our cars that are available in western Canada could be used to advantage in taking that wheat to the Pacific coast from which it could in all likelihood be shipped. It also would provide work for our Canadian mills. Much of this wheat could be crushed in the mills in western Canada and at the Pacific coast and made available in the form of flour to the Indian people at this time.

I want to say a few words with respect to the situation in which we in western Canada find ourselves today. I do not think the government fully appreciates just what happened in western Canada last fall, and I am certain that hon. members from the east do not. In July we had the prospect of one of the best crops ever harvested in western Canada. Had nothing happened, in all probability we would have harvested a crop of from 550 million to 600 million bushels of wheat last year. But in the latter part of July we had severe frosts. Immediately after those frosts it was announced by the people who made a survey of the situation that our crop was probably reduced by some 65 million bushels. Later that estimate was raised by another 20 million bushels.

But that was not the worst of the situation. Not only was the yield reduced but the grade of the grain was seriously affected. In the west our average grade is usually No. 2. This year it will be No. 4 and No. 5. On top of that we had about one week of good harvesting weather. Then the weather broke and as a result a large share of the western crop, probably 50 per cent of it, was threshed either tough or damp, and much of it was not threshed at all. In my own area—and I think this applies on an average throughout western Canada—15 per cent of the crop is still lying out under a foot of snow, not cut at all, or if it is cut, it is lying in the stook or in the swath. Whether this grain will be harvested or not will depend entirely upon weather conditions next spring.

As to the grain that we were able to thresh, owing to transportation difficulties we have not been able to move it to market. This year a much smaller amount of grain has been moved to market than in any other year. The harvest was late to begin with. Then we found that many of our freight cars were down in the United States although they were needed here for the moving of our harvest. On top of that, we found that we had great difficulty on the great lakes in securing boat space for the movement of grain from Fort William to eastern terminals. The boats were being used mostly by the United States at that time in moving strategic materials. As a result, we had a congestion at the head of the lakes. Consequently probably 50 per cent of our crop is not in a position where any money can be realized on it. If there ever was a time when the farmer in western Canada needed money, it is right now. He needs the final payment on that five-year pool a great deal more now than he needed the 20-cent interim payment which was made before the 1949 election. I can assure the government of that. I do not remember a year in the last several when there have been as many debts left unpaid at the local store and to the local implement dealers as there are today in western Canada. We just have not been able to deliver enough grain to meet our running expenses.

I think the government were wise when they made a further interim payment on this year's crop with respect to wheat and coarse grains. That was a wise move and one that will be appreciated by the farmers in western Canada. Nevertheless, that is not enough. Because of the fact that we have not been able to make our usual deliveries, it is not enough to enable the average farmer to meet the debts which are owed right at the present time to our local people. I would urge on the government that, as soon as possible, they make a substantial final payment on the five-year pool. It is needed now more than it has ever been needed before.

These are things in which we are vitally interested in western Canada. They are matters to which the government should give immediate attention. Unless they do, we are going to find the position extremely difficult next spring. As to the movement of grain, according to press reports at the present time we are going to have approximately 200 cars a day available from now until navigation opens next spring. What do 200 cars amount to when there are approximately 2,800 delivery points in western Canada? It simply means that we shall get only 2 cars a week at the average delivery point in western Canada for the shipment of grain between now and next spring. That is not enough to meet even the movement of the damp grain that we find in our bins and in the fields in western Canada; because a great deal of that damp grain that has been threshed has simply been left in the fields. The farmers have not even put it into a granary because they were afraid that if they did so it would heat.

I know that there are difficulties in this matter. I know that the drying facilities at the head of the lakes are being used twenty-four hours a day and that in many cases damp grain, with 20 per cent to 30 per cent moisture content, must be dried not once but two or three times before it can be permanently binned. It seems to me that those drying facilities should be increased or that we should try to see if we cannot obtain some means of using United States drying facilities that might be available south of the line for the purpose of drying some of our grain that we are selling down there. It might be moved down there even when it is tough or damp, dried by means of the United States drying facilities and distributed in the United States market. Every endeavour should be made to get as much as possible of this damp grain moved before the middle of March. Otherwise it is going to spoil in the granaries and on the farms of western Canada, and we shall find that not only shall we have the tremendous losses we have had to date with respect to this year's crop but we shall have further losses owing to the deterioration and the heating of this grain when spring comes.

These are matters which require immediate attention. They are matters which have been brought to the attention of the government by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, through the farmers' unions and other bodies in western Canada. At their annual meeting in Calgary just recently the Canadian Federation of Agriculture passed a number of resolutions which they have forwarded to the government with the request that they take some action. Among the resolutions was one expressing some dissatisfaction with the working of the federal price support policy. The meeting voted solidly for a resolution asking the federation to try to secure from Ottawa an adequate statement of policy and implementation of such policy which would assure more active and more general use of the existing price support powers under the Agricultural Prices Support Act which we passed here at the last session. It seems to me that this is action which we should take at this session. We should see that there is some parity price guaranteed to agriculture in western Canada, and throughout the whole of Canada, for the products which we produce on the farm.

I was disappointed in the speech from the throne because there was nothing in it which indicated that the wheat board act might be amended at this session. Along with a great many other people in western Canada, I feel that the wheat board act should be amended at this session to allow the government to take over whatever remains of this year's crop on the 1st of August in 1951 and to make a final settlement with the farmer. If this is not done, and we have a carry-over, such as is suggested in the Economic Annalist, of some 145 million bushels of low-grade wheat it will mean that we shall not be able to dispose of it for probably twelve to eighteen months, and no final settlement can be made on this year's wheat pool until all the crop is disposed of.

If our wheat board act were amended to allow the wheat board to take over what quantities remain on the 1st of August 1951 at a nominal figure, say the average price at which they have been able to sell that wheat during the course of the year, and make a final settlement, I am sure it would be appreciated by western agriculture, and it would mean that the wheat board method of handling the grain would be more popular than it will be if they have to wait for from twelve to eighteen months before a final settlement can be made on the crop.

It is not my intention today to go into other matters mentioned in the speech from the throne. If I had time I should like to discuss the matter of the national mobilization of our resources, and many other matters which are dealt with in the speech from the throne, but opportunity will be provided for that during the session when these matters are under consideration.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I greatly enjoyed the speech of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), and I was much interested in the remarks of the speaker who has just taken his seat as regards the assistance which we should have been giving to less favoured lands.

One of the things which always impress me, while projects of this kind are up for discussion, is that never a word is said about where the money should come from to pay for all these acts of generosity which we all realize we should be performing toward other countries. I wish that somehow or other it would get into the minds of the responsible people of today that there is the general problem of finding money to do these things that everybody knows could be and ought to be done.

It is my purpose today to devote some attention to price controls. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, price controls should be applied immediately. Everyone at all familiar with the problem of prices realizes that, involved in that problem, are numerous and baffling difficulties. I have no severe criticism to offer the government. I realize they are in an extremely difficult position, harassed by considerations on every hand which make it extremely hard to make the wise decision. Nevertheless I believe that the policy which I have already suggested is sound.

Those who favoured the removal of controls—and our Conservative friends were among the leaders in that noble task at the close of the war—believed that production would overtake consumption. It was quite logical to expect that. For some reason or other matters did not work out the way they should have.

Those who now resist the re-imposition of controls believe as well that production will overtake consumption in Canada, and force prices down. That may occur. If the war in Korea fails to expand, as there are some dangers it might expand, then conceivably we might be faced with depressed conditions in this country, if production goes forward as rapidly as it could.

But while we are learning what is going to happen something must be done for the ordinary person right now. There must be relief until production can catch up with consumption.

Even after production catches up with consumption we shall very likely have to have for a time floors and other help to prevent ruinous depression falls in prices of all those commodities the producers of which are not able to defend their prices through limiting production or by price understandings or by some other means. This country faces that grim consideration also, so that merely to break the price structure, with overproduction widespread, is not to find a solution to the problem which confronts us.

The Social Credit proposals for stabilizing of our prices in a war economy may be summarized as follows: Over-all prices and wages control should be introduced. But at the same time there should be adjustment of prices to provide a fair profit, and an adjustment of wages to conform with the adjustment in the price level.

Farm prices should be adjusted to provide for a parity with this adjusted price level to which I have already referred.

Every possible encouragement should be given to increase production of all required goods.

There should be adoption of measures such as consumer subsidies to maintain the purchasing power of low income groups so as to enable them to buy the necessities of life.

Rationing of commodities should be introduced wherever the supply of those commodities cannot be increased to satisfy consumer demands.

As a larger and larger percentage of the production of the nation is diverted to war purposes, thereby making for a scarcity of consumer goods and at the same time requiring an increase in government expenditures, adoption of the following policies is recommended: (1), holding income tax exemptions at present levels; (2), institution of compulsory savings; (3), in the event of an unavoidable increase in taxation, it shall be in the form of direct taxation; (4), any change in indirect taxation should be downward, and any sales tax that remains should be converted to a direct sales tax and advertised as such; (5), if the government is unable to raise sufficient revenue by the above means and finds it desirable to adopt a policy of monetary expansion, then the government should effect that monetary expansion by utilizing the Bank of Canada rather than the chartered banks. In order to deal with a problem such as that of the inflation which now confronts us, it is of the greatest importance to analyse carefully the cause of that inflation. Otherwise we may be advocating remedies which would aggravate rather than remedy the situation.

There are several causes of inflation, all of which I do not at this time need to mention. For a few moments may I concentrate on one of them? The one important cause to which, I believe, we must give careful thought is the increases in the cost of production. We find people advocating far greater taxation in order to draw off purchasing power. I do not see that greater taxation would be of very great value. My fear is that such greater taxation would actually increase costs, and probably do more harm than good.

As an example of how prices have increased through increased production costs, let us consider that in April 1946 the prices board permitted an increase in the price of pig iron. That was an increase of $5 a ton. I believe that on that occasion I pointed out that it was a dangerous move owing to the fact that iron entered into the construction of so many commodities of great importance. As I recall it, I advocated at that time that, if it were found necessary to give an increase of $5 a ton by way of remuneration to the steel companies, such increase should take the form of a government subsidy, the money to be drawn from the consolidated revenue fund. I am still of the opinion that that procedure should have been adopted.

Just let us think of the vast number of commodities in Canada the production costs of which are directly affected by an increase in the cost of iron and steel. It would be a most impressive list, if it were detailed before the house.

Because of the tremendous number of commodities, the cost of production of which was forced up by the increase in the price of steel, there was both a direct and an indirect effect upon the price of a vastly greater number of commodities. To make matters worse there was a strike of steelworkers in 1946. They said, in effect, "Well, if the steel companies are going to have more money, then we are going to get our share of it." They struck and, if my memory is correct, they remained on strike for eighty-two days, during which time there was tremendous loss of production in the country. This might have been the factor which determined finally that production would not keep pace with or catch up with consumption in this country. At any rate the steelworkers' strike set an example to other workers all across Canada, and a standard from which they could judge their incomes. Either through strikes or through threats of strikes wage increases became impressive, and were made almost all across the board.

I fear these movements were the factors which put the price structure of Canada on the skids. As everyone knows today we see price increases taking place throughout the nation in a completely bewildering fashion. Let us consider for instance the recent increase in the price of bread. Already at this time today some of the bread companies have increased the price of a loaf of bread by one cent, and many others are expecting to follow this example.

I am told by one who I believe is qualified to judge that, even after this present increase is made by the bread companies, they will not be in as favourable a position as they were when they made a similar advance of one cent per loaf during the summer of 1950.

As a result of the advance in 1950, Miss Jean I. Hamilton, corresponding secretary of the Canadian association of consumers in Toronto, wrote to Arthur May, executive secretary of the national council of the baking industry, protesting against that one-cent increase, and expressing the opinion that it was something of an outrage, for which no justification could be shown.

On September 7, 1950, Mr. May wrote a letter in reply to Miss Hamilton. I think the people throughout the country would be interested in reading certain passages from that letter—one which I believe every member of parliament received. It is addressed to Miss Hamilton at 32 Alvin avenue, Toronto, and states:

"I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 29 on the subject of increased prices for ingredients going into the manufacture of bread.

The baking industry has been experiencing cost increases on a continuing and cumulative basis since the beginning of this year. The selling price for one product is, of course, the cost price for those using the product in question, and the increased costs which bakers have experienced reflect in a general way the widespread increases that have occurred in the cost of living.

It is not possible for me to give you details of these cost increases for all the many raw materials and services which bakers employ, but the following represent a few of the more important items:

Lard—The wholesale price of lard has increased since June from 12½ cents per pound to 22½ cents.

Shortening—The wholesale price of shortening has increased from 26 cents to 32½ cents per pound.

Sugar—Wholesale prices have increased from $8.40 to $9.86 per 100 pounds.

Milk powder—Roller process has increased from 8½ cents per pound to 13-14 cents.

Spray process has increased from 10 to 16 cents per pound.

Malt products have increased about one cent per pound.

Raisins have increased from $11.76 per 100 pounds to $14.50.

Salt has increased 33 cents per 100 pounds (arising out of the last freight rate increase).

Shipping cartons have increased (on September 4) by approximately 10 per cent.

Waxed paper has increased in August by approximately 3 per cent."

Today I was speaking with a man prominent in the baking industry who said that since the time that letter was written, September 7, 1950, the increases in costs of these various commodities affecting the cost have been even more striking than they had been up to that time. The letter continues, in another passage:

Further, labour costs have been climbing. It is a fact that those bakers whose shops are unionized invariably experience hourly wage increases and company paid benefits on every contract re-negotiation. Apart from this, bakers are increasing wages and salaries on an individual employee basis continuously. It is difficult to arrive at an estimate for increased labour costs, but it is very substantial and certainly not less than the rate of increase which has occurred for raw materials. Nor is the end in sight. I think it is reasonable to assume that there is absolutely no prospect for lower labour costs in the baking industry, and every probability that labour costs will continue to climb.

Finally, mention should be made of the cost increases which are manifold and which have occurred for the variety of miscellaneous goods and services which the baking industry require in the manufacture and distribution of their products. Fuel costs are up—both coal and oil have again risen in recent months. Truck replacement and maintenance are up sharply. Truck tires, for example, have been subject to the following increase: December 7½ per cent, May 15 per cent, July 7½ per cent and August 20 per cent. A list of all such cost increases would be endless but these two examples are typical.

I should like to quote the final paragraph of the letter, which reads:

I wish I could give the members of your organization assurance that even after the recent increases bread prices would go no higher. Unfortunately, I cannot. If the present inflationary trends continue for raw materials and labour which bakers employ, further price increases will become inevitable. And no one will deplore this more than the baker. The record shows that the sale of bakery products is extremely sensitive to the law of diminishing returns. Higher prices invariably result in lowered sales volume. But bakers are not magicians, and it is beyond their power to continue long to exist if they do not adjust their prices consistent with their costs. Certainly their profit margins have always been, and are today, so small that they simply cannot absorb any substantial measure of further cost increases.

Yours very truly,

National Council of Baking Industry
(Signed) Arthur May

For any government agency, any banker, any financier or any economist in Canada to indulge in propaganda in order to try to convince the people of Canada that the cause of these rises in the cost of living is the fact that there is too much money in circulation is for that person to manifest either ignorance or dishonesty.

This is the first thing we have to face. This increase in cost of living has been the result of action by this government right here in Canada in permitting freight rate and other increases. This government has allowed freight rate increases which have resulted in a wide variety of annoying increases in the cost of living and the cost of producing all over Canada—outside of Ontario and Quebec. For the government to pretend that these advances in cost are the result of too much money in circulation I say is to insult the Canadian people and is a downright shame. If we face the facts we will not be talking about the laying on of taxation to draw off surplus purchasing power which is said to be the cause of these enormous increases in prices.

I will not argue that increased purchasing power in the hands of the people does not have something to do with it.

I do not think it would be wise to go into this matter any further at the present time. Sufficient is contained in that letter to cause us to think. I have given the Social Credit proposals and now I should like to summarize them. We urge that there should be an increase in production to make our country more and more self-supporting. That suggestion has been urged upon the government by a number of agencies, and I think every hon. member knows that such is the case. For example, we have the Canadian Bank of Commerce monthly commercial letter for November, 1950, urging greater production. We have organizations such as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association urging increases in production. Therefore we Social Crediters are not unique in urging this increase in production.

My own feeling has been, and it was during the war, that there are altogether too many annoying taxes and restrictions of various kinds that are interfering with production in the country. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has indicated that he is aware of this and is apparently prepared to clear all such regressive taxation from the statute books of the future. I hope he will be able to do that and not have to yield to the importunities of some group within the cabinet or elsewhere who might urge a different course.

We in Canada are capable of producing many more of the things we need; in fact we are capable of producing sufficient of most things for our needs. All we have to do is to give our producers encouragement and the guarantee that they will not be destroyed by some change in regulation which will render it impossible for them to sell their product in Canada at a remunerative price. The more nearly we can become independent in the matter of production, the safer we are going to be in the days now coming along.

Second, the Social Credit group urge that little if any increased taxation shall be used to draw off surplus purchasing power. Both of the points I have mentioned are clearly indicated in the list of proposals which I gave at the outset of my speech. There is no need to go into them further.

I repeat, third, we urge that there should be over-all price control with continuous adjustments to make for equity toward all groups, both of producers and consumers.

It is of the first importance in this critical time in our history that every group in this nation shall realize that there is a definite responsibility on every individual to produce all that can possibly be produced and do everything possible to prevent increased prices. If we cannot get our people to realize the gravity of this fact, then we face perilous times indeed. If we can pull together as a great co-operative union, if we each agree to do our part to make this nation the great powerful factor for stabilization in the world that it is capable of being, then I believe that we have no need for fear of the future supplies of goods and services at prices we all can afford, or with respect to the part we are to play in the powerful dramas which appear about to be enacted all over the world. I hope that all our people, producers and labourers, can come to realize that the more we force up the cost of living the more we endanger this wonderful Canada, so dear to us all.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) have given us the government's view of the present situation and set out the objectives of our country and the prospects for peace. In their endeavours in this connection, as well as in their statements, I feel sure that I voice the views of all hon. members of this house, of all the people of this country as well as a great number of peoples of other countries, when I say that in all those endeavours they made to maintain and preserve peace they had our strong united support.

Our purpose is peace, and it is for this purpose only that the government thinks it right to recommend to this house and to the country these further measures to increase the state of preparedness of ourselves and our allies.

The Canadian government's defence program put before you tonight results directly from the world situation. That program is intended to provide, as Canada's part of an effective deterrent against aggression, what is considered necessary at this time for the defence of Canada against attack and to carry out Canada's undertakings under the charter of the United Nations and the North Atlantic treaty to the full.

Put together, these plans are intended to provide for nearly one hundred ships in the navy, manned and equipped, forty regular and auxiliary squadrons in the air force, the equivalent of over a division in the army, and in all three services, administrative and training establishments and equipment and stores which with current production will enable us to meet the shock of mobilization, and all this in addition to furnishing our allies with hundreds of millions of dollars worth of equipment to strengthen their forces in our common defence.

This is a three-year program to involve the expenditure during that period of some $5 billion.

Many times it has been said that war is not inevitable. Neither is peace certain. This large expenditure, almost four times as great as the expenditure voted last year, is felt to be justified as the increased premium to ensure peace. The Canadian government's view is that the chance of maintaining peace will increase as the forces opposed to aggression become stronger. That belief is shared by our eleven allies under the North Atlantic treaty.

Since parliament adjourned on September 15, a great deal has happened to affect the international climate. These developments have been dealt with by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. While no one can clearly penetrate the dark curtain of the uncertain future, most people assume that the risk of a general war is greater than it was when we last met five months ago.

Because of that view, all of the North Atlantic treaty countries have separately and together re-examined the position of their defences.

Canada's defence objectives.—While the situation has changed, the objectives of our foreign policy and of our defence program remain the same.

The object of our foreign policy is to preserve peace and to build up the broad foundations of security which are essential to the prosperity, the welfare and the happiness of our own and other people. In dealing with foreign or defence policy it must never be forgotten that the ultimate object of all our efforts is human welfare. In so far as we can do so consistently with national and international security, we must press forward with everything that will build up the good society here and everywhere else.

The objectives of our national defence are simple and clear. They are: (1) The immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack; (2) the implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations, or under the North Atlantic treaty or other agreement for collective security; (3) the organization to build up our strength in a total war.

Let us examine each of these in turn.

Defence of Canada against direct attack.—As has been said many times, if a war should come, the government believes that the best place to defend Canada would be as far away from our shores as possible. Consequently, everything we do for the collective defence is done for the defence of Canada herself. But to make that possible, we must do what is feasible to make this continent secure from attack.

Russian medium bombers of the B-29 type could reach pretty well any part of North America on a one-way trip and, under certain conditions, reach some parts of North America and return. This being the case, it is quite likely that in a general war Russia would launch bombing attacks against North America either with atomic or conventional weapons.

There is no way of making a continent of seven million square miles impregnable or impenetrable with a kind of aerial Maginot line. Radar and fighters, combined in a heroic team, won the battle of Britain; but despite the heavy concentration of air defences in that small area, many enemy aircraft got through.

To meet the possibility of air attack, our services are working in close co-operation with the United States. A screen of stations with the latest and most powerful radar apparatus is being built, connected with a network of communications and backed up by squadrons of fighters. The American and Canadian chains will be linked together to form a single system, of which about one-quarter will be in Canada.

If the question is asked why this radar and fighter defence is not already fully operational, it is because the radar, the type of communications selected and the aircraft—the F-86 Sabre and the CF-100 Canuck—have only recently been developed and have not yet been produced in the numbers required. As fast as aircraft can be produced, regular and auxiliary fighter squadrons will be manned and equipped to war strength. In the interim, the R.C.A.F. has mobile radar sets and Vampire and Mustang fighters.

To supplement these air defences the army has a large stock of heavy anti-aircraft guns to be manned by active and reserve force personnel.

In addition to attack by air, it might be possible for an enemy to land airborne troops by a surprise attack on an airfield or by parachute. To meet this possibility the Canadian army has a specially-trained airborne brigade group. For much the same purpose the United States has similar but larger formations. It is noteworthy that none of these formations was moved to Korea because they were specially trained and earmarked for this particular type of continental defence

In support of the regular forces and to take action to prevent sabotage are the reserve forces as well as the R.C.M.P. and other police.

In continental defence the navy is respon sible for the protection of coastal sea lanes and shipping against enemy action, including mines, and for the vital task of keeping our harbours and approaches open. Ships and installations are being constructed to discharge this role. The R.C.A.F. is building up a number of maritime squadrons for anti-submarine work.

Civil defence.—Because of the possibility of direct attack, it is necessary for us to take precautions for civil defence. Military defence has as its objective the defeat of the enemy and the defence of the country against direct attack. The object of civil defence is to reduce the consequences of enemy action upon civilian population and property.

Because of the immense area of Canada and because of its constitutional structure, civil defence is a matter calling for the close co-operation of federal, provincial and municipal authorities. A large part of civil defence is the result of organizing the manpower and material resources already existing in each community. In the very nature of things the agency for action in civil defence, here as in other countries, must be the local municipal authority. That position was agreed to by the representatives of all the provinces at a conference held here last September.

Following that conference a pamphlet on civil defence organization was issued. It incorporates the main conclusions of our discussions as well as suggestions made by provincial representatives. Civil defence organizations have been set up by most of the provincial governments and many municipalities are taking action. The first staff course is now in progress in Hull. That is a nation-wide staff course attended by representatives of all ten provinces. We are arranging for co-ordination of civil defence activities with the United States. Orders are being placed for equipment of various types.

One question of concern is the division of financial responsibility for this special equipment and to deal with this and other matters relating to civil defence co-ordination, the representatives of the provincial governments have been asked to meet here on February 20 if that date is convenient to them.

I come now to the support of the United Nations and North Atlantic treaty. This is the second objective of our national defence.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Action taken by the Canadian armed forces to carry out the objectives of the charter of the United Nations and the North Atlantic treaty must be regarded as action taken for the defence of Canada.

To assist the United Nations forces in Korea Canada sent three destroyers and they have given a good account of themselves. They are being successively replaced by other destroyers.

The 426 heavy transport squadron gave great assistance in the arduous airlift to the Far East.

The Canadian army enlisted 10,000 men for an eighteen months term for the special purpose of carrying out any undertaking by Canada under the charter of the United Nations and the North Atlantic treaty. With 900 men posted from the regular active force they form the Canadian Army special force. Appropriate arrangements will be made for officers and men who wish to do so to become part of the regular force.

One unit of the special force, the second battalion of the Princess Patricias, is in Korea.

The remainder of the special force is continuing its training at Fort Lewis and will be available for service where required.

Western Europe.—Without minimizing the significance of the character of the fighting in Korea, it is the view of this and the other allied governments that the vital centre of our global defence is in western Europe. It was in recognition of this strategic necessity that the North Atlantic treaty was entered into by twelve nations less than two years ago.

North Atlantic treaty organization.—Because of its importance to Canada, it is necessary to deal for a few minutes with the development of the North Atlantic treaty organization.

People are apt to overlook how rapid has been the acceleration that has taken place in the march of events. It was only at the meeting of the council of the North Atlantic treaty organization, held at New York as recently as last September, that the United States gave great leadership in suggesting the establishment in western Europe of an integrated force under a supreme commander. The United States representatives stated that if such a force were created the United States would add substantially to the number of American troops in Europe. This proposal for the first time created the possibility of having in Europe forces strong enough to deter aggression. That was barely five months ago.

You will remember that in the treaty the member nations agreed that an act of aggression against any of them would be an act of aggression against all, to be resisted by all.

To effect co-ordination under the treaty there was the council of foreign ministers. There were also set up a committee of defence ministers, a committee of finance ministers, a military production and supply board, with numerous subordinate committees, and a committee of deputies of the council. This organization was elaborate enough on the civilian side but it was duplicated on the military side by the military committee of the chiefs of staff of all twelve nations with an executive standing group representing the chiefs of staff of Britain, France and the United States. In addition, there were five regional groups each with corresponding military set-ups. It is not surprising that there has been criticism of this organization as over-elaborate, but progress is being made in its simplification.

NATO progress.—At its September meeting the council approved the American suggestions and referred them to the defence ministers.

At Washington in October the defence committee approved a plan for the defence of the five regions of NATO. These are the western European, northern European, southern European, north Atlantic ocean and Canada-United States regions.

The defence plan for the first time set out particulars of the requirements for defence; it showed to what extent those requirements could be met; it also showed the allocations of forces that might be contributed by each of the member nations.

At that meeting agreement was not reached as to the participation of western Germany and this question as well as the creation of the integrated force and the appointment of a supreme commander which were considered to be in part dependent upon it were left to be decided by the defence committee when it reconvened.

Meanwhile, at the request of the defence committee, the rearmament of western Germany was considered by the deputies of the council and the military committee of chiefs of staff at their meeting in London.

These London meetings resulted in agreement, which was approved by the defence committee at a meeting held in Brussels on Monday, December 18. This was followed by a joint meeting of the defence committee and council, and the next day by a meeting of the council. It was a privilege to attend these meetings in a dual capacity, both as Minister of National Defence and as representing my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson).

At the Brussels meeting Canada again raised proposals for streamlining the organization of NATO. The defence production board was set up with more definite terms of reference to replace the military supply and production board and several other committees.

The terms of reference of the standing group were clarified. There was also established a committee of military representatives of the chiefs of staff of all twelve nations to permit continuous consultation between the standing group and representatives of the chiefs of staff of all the NATO countries.

Canada's remaining proposal that the three ministerial committees be consolidated into a single council, in which the appropriate ministers will represent their governments, is being actively considered.

When criticism is expressed of the organization of NATO it should be remembered that the first meetings to organize the twelve countries for joint defence took place just fifteen months ago.

The accomplishments of the North Atlantic treaty organization to date have been substantial:

(1) The twelve nations have agreed to act together in their common defence; (2) they have set up the organization necessary to combine their common efforts; (3) they have set up an integrated force; (4) they have appointed a supreme commander, who has already visited all the twelve countries, as well as western Germany. Our meeting here a week ago was most satisfactory with that great leader, General Eisenhower, who is now one-twelfth our general; (5) they have prepared plans of joint defence and also requirements of men and materials have been estimated and resources examined; (6) each country has indicated what it will do towards meeting these requirements.

Canada's participation in NATO.—Against this background of the organization established under the North Atlantic treaty, let us look at what Canada is doing.

Following the meeting of the defence committee at Paris in November, 1949, a Canadian offer to train army officers and aircrew for the forces of the other NATO countries was well received and arrangements were worked out under which army officers and aircrew for Belgium, France, Italy, The Netherlands and Norway are now being trained in Canada. Later the United Kingdom expressed a need for such assistance and vacancies having been made available the first British trainees arrived in Canada last month.

A further offering is being made through NATO to increase training facilities considerably.

These facilities, together with those for training our own aircrew, will provide training for over 3,000 aircrew per year.

This operation will require the opening of additional air stations and recommencing the manufacture in Canada of large numbers of Harvard trainer aircraft and the production of aeroplane engines in this country.

The expense of training aircrew for North Atlantic treaty nations during the fiscal year 1951-52 is estimated at $64,500,000, to apply against the mutual aid appropriation made at the special session.

In addition to training aircrew officers in the numbers mentioned, we have here, now, attending the various staff colleges and other courses in this country officers from Australia, Belgium, France, India, Italy, the Netherlands, Pakistan, Portugal, the United Kingdom and the United States.

Last August Canada offered to NATO the armament and ammunition of U.K. type for a division. In November we were advised by NATO that this equipment should be supplied to the Netherlands. The equipment was overhauled, reconditioned, crated, shipped and delivered before the middle of December.

Negotiations with the United States for the purchase of corresponding American equipment have been completed and we have now offered the equipment for another division in western Europe.

The Canadian army—and I do not think this is realized—has in store or on issue most of the equipment for four divisions, even more of some weapons, and as arrangements are completed for replacement, we propose to offer successively the equipment for several more divisions.

Since there are men trained in Europe waiting for equipment, each division's equipment sent to Europe virtually adds a division's strength of equipped forces to the common deterrent force.

When he was here, General Eisenhower asked if we had 25-pounders we could put in the hands of the Luxembourg artillery regiment which was being raised. The following day the cabinet authorized the offer and by Monday evening arrangements had been completed both with Luxembourg and the North Atlantic treaty organization and the guns are waiting for shipment.

Speaking to an informal meeting of congress concerning the result of his tour, General Eisenhower said:

> In little Luxembourg I had an unusual experience. I think you would like to hear about it as illustrating the readiness of the nations today to try to cooperate. They are very small. There are only 300,000 people there. But they set their jaws and said: "We will have universal military service, with no exemptions." They said, "We are very badly handicapped. We have equipment for one battalion only. What we particularly need is more artillery equipment."

And then General Eisenhower went on to say:

> When I stopped in Ottawa I told the Canadians about this trouble, and the Canadians said, "Why, we have some artillery; we can ship it tomorrow." When I got to West Point a few hours later I was greeted with the information that the Canadian government had approved of the transfer, and just left the red tape to me and my staff to look after.

Apparently on this occasion we did not have any red tape here—or at least we gave him that impression.

We are placing an order here in Canada for 50,000 platoon walkie-talkie wireless sets designed in Canada to specifications agreed upon with the United Kingdom and United States and likely to be adopted as standard for all North Atlantic treaty nations. This would be the first article of standard equipment to be so adopted for all twelve nations. The Canadian forces plan to use 5,000, the other 45,000 sets being supplied to the other nations.

Canada is also manufacturing a large number of radar sets for supply to our allies. We expect to be making 155 mm. guns of U.S. pattern. We are at work today on the 3-inch 50-calibre U.S. pattern guns for the U.S. and Canadian navies.

In his statement last week General Eisenhower stressed the importance of equipment. He said this, in his broadcast:

> For this purpose the most immediate need of Europe is munitions and equipment.
> Every one of the continental nations I visited can rapidly and markedly increase its resistance power if it can be promptly furnished additional supplies of this kind. To fill this need, our loyal neighbour, Canada, with Britain and others, is shouldering part of the load.

We feel, however, that equipment without men is even less useful than men without equipment. For obvious reasons, it is important that all the countries concerned in our collective defence should contribute men as well as equipment to the defence of western Europe. Accordingly we propose, if parliament approves, to place in the integrated force elements of the Canadian army.

The force we propose to send will initially be a brigade group or regimental combat team, and we hope that it may arrive at about the same time as the additional U.S. forces, but this may depend on events in Korea.

Material considerations alone might suggest that there might be greater military value in spending the same amount on equipment for forces already on the spot rather than on Canadian ground forces; but we and our allies believe that the fact of participation by the Canadian army will show more emphatically than any amount of equipment, welcome though that may be, that we stand together with our allies.

It is hoped that arrangements under discussion will permit us to rotate the men serving abroad at reasonable intervals. It is also planned to keep the numbers of supporting personnel as small as possible. How the tail often outgrows the body is well known to everyone with military experience.

In addition to whatever army forces we have in Europe, our army role in NATO is to provide a strategic reserve.

Canada's most substantial contribution to the planned force in being will be our air force participation. Air power is especially needed. One squadron is already undergoing operational training in England. This squadron is to be joined by two others to form a wing and these squadrons will be made available to the supreme commander.

We plan to have in the integrated force an air division of eleven squadrons at full fighting strength, equipped with F-86E and Canuck aircraft. To support them there will have to be a supply line of reserve aircraft, depots, training establishments, and so on. You can see that the air force participation in the integrated force will require a very large portion of our total defence budget.

The Royal Canadian Navy has an important role in the North Atlantic treaty defence plans. In addition to the defence of our harbours and coasts, the R.C.N. will participate with Britain and the United States in anti-submarine and escort work across the North Atlantic. Plans for the navy will provide the necessary ships of the latest types now under construction or those that we now have in commission or reserve, all rearmed, refitted and recommissioned. In this way we expect to be able to carry out our allotted share of North Atlantic defence with nearly 100 ships equipped and manned.

NATO prospects.—The role of Canada in the North Atlantic treaty organization has now been determined in consultation with the other eleven nations. Canada intends to do everything necessary to carry out that role. The program put forward here includes everything necessary to do that.

We are approaching this common effort in the same spirit as our other partners. We believe that if we all do as much as we can we will be able to build up the strength necessary to deter aggression or defeat an enemy. In ground forces or in the air this strength has still to be built up, but there are other important factors which count in the balance when nations come to weigh their chances, including the atomic bomb and the ability to deliver it.

General Eisenhower had this to say:

> In military potential, the free nations have everything they need—natural resources, industrial genius, productive capacity, and great reservoirs of leadership ability. Given the ingredient of morale—the determination to combine for mutual protection—the military strength necessary will be produced at a speedy pace. With every increase in strength, there will be an upward thrust in morale, an evermounting spiral of confidence and security.

The third objective of our defence efforts is to have the administrative staff, the training establishments, the nucleus of trained officers and N.C.O.'s, the supply depots and everything else needed for mobilization.

Because this has been set down as one of the objectives of our national defence, there have been references to what others have called "the nuclear theory of defence". There isn't any such theory. In every country, the full potential fighting strength of the nation is developed only if war begins.

The Canadian forces have today mobilization plans and administrative and training staffs, supply depots, arms and a good many of the things needed for rapid mobilization.

Equipment.—This report indicates something of the size of the equipment program now under way and gaining momentum from day to day.

To meet these requirements a new department of the government, the Department of Defence Production, is being proposed. In the first nine months of the present fiscal year, which ended on December 31, 1950, 80,000 orders were actually placed with industry. During this period orders have been placed with trade and commerce for the sum of $701 million.

The main items are:

Aircraft, $331 million; ships, $96 million; radar and wireless, $50 million; clothing and textiles, $35 million; motor vehicles, $50 million; armament, $26 million; construction, $113 million.

In the year before the second world war the Department of National Defence spent $34,432,839, and even during 1939-40 only $125 million. It has been suggested that the position of defence industry today corresponds to what it was about two years after the beginning of the last war but with much greater potential capacity.

Additional orders are being placed for ships, seaward defences, electronic devices and wireless, for army equipment of U.S. pattern, for aircraft, including Harvard trainers and engines.

As hon. members who visit the plant at Canadair Limited will see tomorrow, new aircraft are beginning to roll off the production lines.

These large expenditures on equipment are brought about by the staggering cost of modern equipment. Some figures about these costs have already been made public.

A new anti-submarine vessel costs over $8 million; a two-engine fighter, $750,000; a single engine jet interceptor, over $400,000; a new airfield with runways, buildings and equipment, $20 million; a radar station with buildings and equipment, from $3 million to $6 million.

Reference has been made to the equipment we are producing and the men we are training for the North Atlantic treaty nations out of the appropriation of $300 million voted last year. Most of this appropriation has either been already committed or is covered by orders for equipment and plans for services now being arranged for.

Part of our equipment program will be to replace the equipment we are sending to Europe by equipment of U.S. pattern.

Canada has had greater reason than any country to feel strongly about the need for standardization. One obstacle was the large quantities of U.K.-type equipment we already have on issue or in mobilization stores—most of the armament for four divisions.

This equipment was of the kind needed to strengthen the defences of Europe, where there were trained men with empty hands.

It occurred to us that Canada could make a very substantial contribution to collective defence by shipping this equipment to them. This also was the only practical way for us to standardize on U.S. pattern. As related above, the armament for a division has already been shipped. Our offer of 25-pounders to Luxembourg has been accepted. Our offer of another division's equipment is under consideration. The rest will be supplied, including probably a large number of anti-aircraft guns, as arrangements are made to replace the equipment by purchase in the United States or production in Canada.

By this means we hope to, first, strengthen the defences of Europe immediately; second, help to keep these forces standardized on U.K.-type equipment; third, expedite standardization of our own forces on U.S. type and, finally, tool up Canadian industry for the production of further equipment of U.S. pattern.

This in itself will do much to co-ordinate our defence production with the United States. We expect, however, that there will be further development of this character all along the line.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Defence research.—Defence research activity is to be correspondingly increased both to meet the increased needs of the forces and to expedite programs which had been planned for a longer period.

Like all our defence activities, defence research and development is planned and carried out in close co-operation with our allies, including particularly Britain and the United States. Except in so far as it may be required by actual operations, there is no duplication between the work done in the three countries.

Defence research in Canada gives particular emphasis to anti-submarine equipment, anti-tank weapons, wireless equipment and similar fields in which Canada made a notable contribution during the second world war and in which Canadian scientists and industry have special qualifications.

Construction.—We have already placed orders this year for $113 million worth of construction.

Next year the figure will be more than twice as much, made necessary both for additional operational buildings and living accommodation for the expanding forces.

Today the accommodation for men living in barracks is full to overflowing at every place where accommodation is needed. For every man joining the forces today, additional construction is required. That means about $2,000 per man for construction.

Manpower.—Turning to the vital question of manpower, and womanpower too, three years ago there were in the department and services working full time either as service or civilian personnel a total of 54,000. Today that figure is just short of 90,000, an increase of 67 per cent.

To carry through these plans during the next three years the strengths of the three services should be increased to about 115,000 full-time active service personnel and about 33,000 civilians, the civilians being largely employed in work in the dockyards and shops and on construction. This will be an increase of about the same amount, about 67 per cent above present strength.

Because of the large requirements of the R.C.A.F. not only in building up to its total of 40 regular and auxiliary squadrons, but also in the training services, the R.C.A.F. will, we expect, have more men than the army has today and will be spending nearly as much as the other two services put together.

The strength of the navy will be doubled.

The army will show substantial increases.

During the last six months of 1950 the active forces enlisted, including the special force, a total of 17,772 officers and men. Through retirement and discharge there was a total of 2,879, making a net increase of 14,893, an average of 2,482 per month.

During the month of January 1951, officers and men joining totalled 3,354; there was a decrease by retirement or discharges of 830, making a net increase of 2,524.

With a rate anything like that, the over-all requirements of this program should be met by the planned dates with men provided to man the ships, the guns and the aircraft as these are produced.

However, there will be some shortages, which will call for great efforts to overcome.

Meeting these manpower requirements is going to require a big effort and the whole-hearted support of all sections of the population.

Summary of program.—Now let me draw together in the most summary form what this program is for each of the three services.

The program envisaged by the government calls for its completion within three years but the job is intended to be carried through just as fast as it can be done.

The program has fifteen main points.

In the navy.—

1. Nearly 100 ships and many small craft, either new or refitted and newly armed.

2. Permanent seaward defences of vital harbours.

3. The shipbuilding industry geared to produce additional ships rapidly.

4. Administrative and training staffs, depots and stores, for all-out mobilization.

In the army.—

5. An airborne striking force, anti-aircraft artillery and other units for the defence of Canada against direct attack.

6. Part of the active army with integrated force under General Eisenhower.

7. Part of the Canadian forces continuing in the Far East as long as that is necessary.

8. The administrative staff, training establishments, depots, stores, clothing and equipment to provide for rapid mobilization in a total effort.

9. Replacement of equipment on issue to active or reserve forces, or in stores, by latest type United States equipment purchased from the United States or made in Canada and our industry in Canada tooled up to make a considerable part of this equipment.

In the air force.—

10. Forty regular and reserve squadrons with more than 3,000 aircraft additional to those we now have of the types suitable for the purposes intended.

11. Radar equipment manned and located to provide radar defence integrated with a corresponding United States chain of stations, connected by the necessary communication system and backed by fighters.

12. In Europe an air division of 11 fighter squadrons, included in the 40.

13. Airfields, men and equipment to train large numbers of aircrew for ourselves and other countries.

14. Industry in a position to produce large numbers of the latest types of aircraft needed by the forces of ourselves and others.

15. Production of quantities of equipment for NATO and training of large numbers of officers to strengthen our common defence by assisting our allies.

If time permitted, sir, I might deal with a number of the other parts of the program which will be put forward during the course of this session, including of course the necessary and proper emphasis on the work of our reserve forces. Tonight I felt it would be the wish of this house, and of the country, that the main lines of the whole program should be set out in a broad way.

This whole program involves an increase in the number of service and civilian personnel employed full time on defence from the present figure of about 90,000 to a total of about 148,000.

That is the program, a large one for a country of 14 million people still involved in developing its natural resources and also facing the task of maintaining essential services over an area of 3½ million square miles.

Should it be required, there will be the capacity to expand further rapidly because of the emphasis on training establishments, depots and other essential services.

The cost.—Now, finally, what is the cost?

It is not usual under our system to announce the figures of any estimates before the estimates are tabled by the Minister of Finance, which is usually done after the conclusion of the debate on the address.

But this is not a usual time.

Defence expenditures four years ago were $194 million. This year we appropriated in the original estimate $425 million, and then added in the supplementary estimates $142,200,000, making a total appropriated this year of $567 million, which we expect to spend. Then there was in addition part of the $300 million voted for mutual aid. Next year defence, including mutual aid, will require about $1,600 million.

The three-year program outlined will involve the expenditure, in all matters of the defence of Canada, and our participation in the common effort, of over $5 billion.

One point I want to emphasize. The program and the plans I have outlined are all subject to change as the world situation changes.

We in Canada cannot control that situation; all the nations of the free world cannot control it. We cannot hope to have security unless we are free to adapt our plans and our programs to meet new situations which can —and may—be created at any time by the potential aggressor.

Korea created a new situation and we changed our plans to meet it. It is of vital importance to keep our minds free to make further changes and different plans whenever they are needed.

This report of the government's program should make it clear to every one of the Canadian people that its accomplishment is not going to be an easy task. It means a greatly increased call, indeed a demand, on the armed services themselves and on all the human and material resources of the country. But Canada has always met every challenge and the confident determination to meet the threat of communist expansion will be, and here I am sure I express the feeling of everyone in this house, the dominant feeling of the Canadian people.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, the fact that there were a certain number of seats vacant on this side of the house when the minister started to make his speech was no indication that there was any lack of interest on the part of members of the official opposition in the subject under discussion nor was it intended in any way as a token of disrespect to the minister. This was the last opportunity we had of saying goodby to a comrade who has meant so much to us and whose advice has been invaluable to the party in which he was such an ornament and to the constituency which he represented. I of course refer to the departure of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), who leaves this city this evening.

Like the majority of Canadian citizens, I suppose, I am somewhat mystified and bewildered by the statements which have been made by the ministers of the crown with respect to the international situation. As one reads those statements, one cannot help feeling that here is some conflict of ideas and some uncertainty, even amongst the cabinet ministers, as to the gravity of the present international situation. Speaking for myself, coming as I do from the Pacific coast, from probably the most exposed and the most vulnerable province at the present time and one in which there is probably less preparation than elsewhere to resist enemy aggression, I am impressed with the gravity and the seriousness of the situation.

Living in British Columbia are a great many retired army men and civil servants who have had long experience with the administration of British affairs in Asian countries. They are familiar with the background of what has been going on in India, in Malaya and in China, and they realize that there is a new awakening of the peoples of Asia such as has not happened for centuries. In the new China they see a nationalism coupled with an imperialistic spirit, a demand amongst the peasants of China, for the first time in centuries, that something be done for China. They realize that there is growing up in that continent a feeling of confidence and a feeling which can perhaps be described as almost a disregard of the powers and principles of the western countries. The feeling of the young Chinese of today, in their communist armies and in their positions of government, is one of great arrogance; and it is of little use talking about the western powers losing face in China today. It would seem that they have lost face, at least temporarily.

But we are not so greatly impressed by the dangers in Asia as to lose sight of the paramount importance of western Europe. It was only a couple of weeks ago that I had the great privilege of spending several hours with Mr. Paul Henri Spaak, the former premier of Belgium. He certainly impressed upon me the dangers in which the people of northwest Europe are living. He also impressed upon me the difficulties that they have of selling to their people the need of having a strong heart and of being prepared to resist communist aggression. One point he stressed was that while the people of France, Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg were prepared to hold the gun and the bayonet, they would do so with much greater heart if they saw United States and Canadian soldiers alongside them.

Judging from the remarks made by the minister tonight, it is obvious that he visualizes Canada's having three objectives in so far as her defence forces are concerned, the first being that of the defence of Canada; the second being that of providing assistance to the United Nations and particularly to the North Atlantic treaty countries; and the third being that of the preparation for total war. For one who has risen in this house, year after year, and stressed the importance of Canada's being ready to defend her own shores, it was encouraging to hear the minister recognize the importance of that task for our defence forces. In the past we have heard that the only danger facing Canada is that of some diversionary raid. I have never subscribed to that theory. I have always believed it was possible for enemy bombers—we have a range of forty-five hundred miles—to carry out upon the cities of this country raids of a far more substantial nature than those that might be classed as diversionary. I am encouraged to hear the minister admit that such a danger does exist and that he places as the number one requisite for our defence forces the need of protecting the cities of this country against such raids. As he said, the B-29's of the Russian air force are capable of attacking the majority of the cities of Canada, particularly if they are prepared to carry out refuelling operations in the air en route, which it is perfectly possible for them to do.

The second requirement that he mentioned was that of supplying forces to the North Atlantic treaty nations. He mentioned a modest contribution of armed forces; in so far as the army is concerned a brigade group or regimental combat team. As he said, they might be sent to Europe in the immediate future. Then he just touched upon the steps which would be taken to prepare for the total war if in our lifetime we are to be faced with a third world war.

To meet all these requirements it will be necessary, as the minister said, to provide a great deal of money, and to provide a very considerable expansion of the actual number of serving soldiers, sailors and airmen. The minister adroitly skated around the question as to how he was going to raise the men to provide for this necessary expansion. The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) told us how he was not going to raise these forces at the present time. I suppose if the Prime Minister was in a generous mood he would probably describe me as being one of those sincere and patriotic personages who might advocate other and more positive methods of raising those particular forces to meet the requirements.

I realize that the government is responsible for the method that it adopts in order to meet this situation. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe I am sincere and patriotic; and because the responsibility rests upon the government, and even though I might hold different views as to the methods by which these forces should be raised, I think it would be detrimental at this time to advocate strongly methods which the government is not prepared to follow, because I believe it is of paramount importance that the government raise the men that it requires, and the government alone will say by what method it will raise those men. I for one would be loath to utter a word which would discourage any man from joining those forces, or in any way put any hindrance in the way of the national effort carried out by the methods recommended by the government to meet what I consider to be a grave situation.

It would, however, seem to me only common prudence that the government should at this time set up the machinery which may be necessary to accelerate its method of enlistment, its method of assigning the manpower of the country to the various services and to industry, agriculture, transport and all the rest of it. If these steps are left to the eleventh hour I feel that it will not be possible to take full advantage of the resources of this country, both in manpower and in materials. Therefore I feel there is no time to be lost in carrying out a review both of our assets and of our deficiencies. I feel that that review should be carried out at once so that the government will be in a position to change its present method of providing for the expansion which has been indicated, should the methods that it proposes to follow immediately fail, or should the situation deteriorate to such an extent that other methods would have to be followed. There is no time to be lost in making the preparations and in setting up the machinery so that a more vigorous system of supplying the material and the personnel for expansion can be followed, and to set up this machinery there are many requirements. For instance, during this winter we have seen the necessity of sending the brigade which is being organized for Korea to a foreign country, to the United States, in order to carry out its training. That brigade has gone to Fort Lewis in Washington, chiefly I understand because no camps were available in this country where 10,000 men could be trained.

The camp at Fort Lewis was vacated only a very short time before the Canadian troops arrived there. It was vacated by the second United States division which had gone overseas to Korea, and so this camp was available. It is essentially a staging camp. It could hardly be described as an ideal training camp. It is certainly not an ideal training camp for a theatre of war such as Korea. It is a flat gravel plain, heavily wooded, having an extent of some 100,000 acres. There is no opportunity for the troops to train in mountain warfare, and the Korean theatre of war is one in which there are mountain ranges and barren hills, no heavily wooded flat plains.

There is no opportunity at Fort Lewis for combined training to the extent that companies or battalions would be able to carry out field firing exercises with all the supporting arms such as anti-tank weapons and field artillery. Actually the field artillery of that brigade group had to go to Yakima, 180 miles away from Fort Lewis, in order to carry out their firing practices. They have just returned. They can carry out exercises with their infantry only of a most elementary nature, firing down what might be described as a rifle range, so that their own artillery mounted on a rise can fire in a very restricted area.

I believe therefore that the provision of camps is one of the most essential features in any plan to take care of the expansion of our army. The need for more instructors is of paramount importance. Second battalions of the Royal Canadian regiment, the Princess Patricias and the Royal 22nd regiment were trained and supplied with instructors, in the main, from their first battalions. The third battalions of those regiments, which are also in training at Fort Lewis, had to obtain their instructors from the A. & T. staffs of the reserve army. Today they are very short of instructors.

Then, there are more elementary things, such as uniform attestation papers among the three services, and all the need for co-ordinating the manpower effort between those. Finally there is the urgent need of impressing upon all services the importance of thorough medical examination before the men are enlisted. Anyone who has had any experience with veterans' affairs in the last few years will realize how many men there are who are receiving a pension today on account of pre-enlistment disabilities aggravated by war service in the last world war. Today Canada is paying pensions to thousands of men who had pre-enlistment conditions which were aggravated by their service overseas. In the recruitment of the Korean force there was the same urge to bring units up to strength, and the same lack of facilities for medical examination which was so clearly marked at the beginning of the second world war.

I am not suggesting for one moment that all those pensioners who today draw pensions for pre-enlistment conditions aggravated by service would not have been taken. Of course you would have taken a chance with some of them. Yet, there are a great many who would never have been taken into the Canadian army in the early days of the second world war had there been proper facilities for carrying out more thorough medical examination.

If we are visualizing further expansion, such as the minister has told us we may expect—and such as it is quite obvious we must expect—then I urge upon him that we should take the preliminary step necessary to ensure that these conditions can be carried out most effectively.

So far as the Korean force is concerned, there are today hundreds of men who were enlisted but who have since been discharged because it has been found that they did not measure up to the physical standards required, although they had been originally accepted.

I said earlier that I realize it is the government's responsibility to apply the methods it endorses in order to bring about the expansion indicated, and that I had no intention whatever of trying to put forward alternative means, and of stressing those means. I believe that in so doing we might retard the national effort. However, I intend to make one or two suggestions which I trust may be of some help to the minister who has to bear this grave responsibility.

I am encouraged in this because in the past I have made certain suggestions in the house. I could not help noticing that, perhaps after a lapse of many months, they have been adopted. One of the most recent was that of appointing an over-all chief of staff, a procedure I advocated with some force in the house some two years ago. I have already mentioned that I had called attention to the fact that some of our cities were in danger. Also at one time I stressed the fact that it was regrettable that we had allowed our women's division to cease functioning, and that there was an opportunity to utilize it.

All these things are now being put into effect. While I am not naïve enough to believe that I was the only one who recommended those steps, or that I am the only person advocating those points I shall mention from now on, I take courage from the results which have been achieved in the past.

It was my good fortune to be in the state of Washington on January 25 and 26, just a few days before the opening of the session. I took the opportunity at that time of asking the commander of the Canadian special brigade if he would permit me to see the progress the troops were making, and to get some idea as to the efficiency of those units, and the state of their training. I received a most cordial invitation from Brigadier Rockingham, and received every courtesy from him and his staff, and from the commanding officers of the various units at Fort Lewis.

I want to say, without the slightest doubt or uncertainty in the matter, that in the person of the commander of that brigade Canada has a man in whom we can place great confidence, and one who is supported by a group of young staff officers who are well educated in the military art, who are keen and conscientious; that he has commanding officers of the five battalions and supporting units that I saw who have great personalities and powers of command; and that the Canadian people have there units which are a first-class cross-section of young Canadian manhood, who are physically content, who are interested in their work and who can be entirely relied upon to do a first-class job, no matter where ultimately they may be sent.

The special Korean brigade is one of which I feel Canada might well be proud. As a "has been" soldier I would say that they are making excellent progress in their training and have taken every advantage of the opportunities that are available to them to weld together men who before enlistment had few interests in common and who were not necessarily drawn from any particular area of Canada or from any particular class. Essentially they were Canadians who were inspired by a spirit of adventure and who were determined to do the job for which the Canadian taxpayer was paying them.

There were United States troops under training in that same camp. They were replacements, or as we would say reinforcements, for the United States second division. They were reservists, men from the National Guard. When those men took their discharge after world war II they volunteered to have their names placed on the reserve list and if opportunity presented to do a certain amount of training which would be comparable to the training carried on in our reserve units.

These United States replacements were being put through an eighteen-day intensive refresher course and then, because of the need for men, were being sent direct to Korea. I hope the day will never come when Canadians will have to be sent into a theatre of war with only an eighteen-day refresher course. The one thing which impressed itself upon my mind more than anything else was that the United States because of unpreparedness was forced to send replacements to a division which had suffered heavy casualties with only an eighteen-day refresher course.

This refresher course was carried on in a mass production style with an instructor standing up on a platform and giving the details of some drill to hundreds of men. There was no personal instruction, or very little, given during those courses. If at times some people in Canada are apt to criticize the tactics or strategy of General MacArthur I ask them to remember the picture that I saw of those United States soldiers, ex-G.I.'s of five years ago, being sent to join their units in Korea after being given only eighteen days of training.

If we say that certain elements of the United States army have not fought to the bitter end in Korea, if we say that they have given ground too quickly, let us remember that the tactics of today are different from the tactics of the Ypres salient or the Somme or Passchendaele, when we contested, rightly or wrongly, every yard of ground. It is a broad question whether it would be wise to fight to the death for each barren hill in Korea. Let us remember the mixed forces that General MacArthur has under his command and that many of the soldiers of his own United States army have had very little training and that units of his army have been rather hastily collected together.

Now let us look at the other side of the camp where our Canadian brigade had been in training. That brigade had been fortunate enough to have many weeks available for training. I saw fire and movement exercises being carried out by infantry battalions. I saw the second battalion of the Royal 22nd regiment carrying out exercises from a bivouac camp. I saw anti-tank units on manoeuvres. It struck me that those units were following the pattern which had been drawn up by British armies and adhered to for centuries.

It seemed to me that the main difference between the Canadian and United States method was that the United States taught their men in the shortest possible time how to fire the particular weapon with which they were to be armed while the Canadian commanders were teaching their soldiers how to fire their weapons from the most advantageous piece of ground available so that their lives might be saved, so that they would not be expended in the first battle in which they were engaged.

It seemed to me that that was in accordance with the British tradition. All through the centuries British armies have been relatively small and British commanders have had to emphasize the importance of preserving the lives of their men. I hope that that will be the tradition of Canadian commanders in the future.

We might say, therefore, that on one side of the camp there was the urgent need of sending men into a theatre of war no matter how little training they had while on the other side there was thorough training going on which would enable the Canadian units to give a good account of themselves in battle at the least expense as far as lives were concerned.

At the present time we are in the position of having to change our armament from the British to United States type. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) told us this afternoon that we were sending great quantities of arms to the armies of western Europe. Obviously those guns and rifles must be replaced by arms and equipment manufactured on this continent. I do not think that anybody will quarrel with that policy. However, I plead most earnestly at this time that we do not follow slavishly the organization of the United States armed forces, that we do not adopt, lock, stock and barrel, the United States staff organization and the organization of their armies.

I think that any attempt to Americanize the Canadian army one hundred per cent would be viewed with dismay by the Canadian people as a whole. I am disturbed by statements that have appeared in the press within the last ten days indicating that there is a tendency to go further than is necessary in Americanizing our Canadian forces. A wholesale change at the present time would disrupt the Canadian army. So far as the infantry is concerned, it would mean that battalions of old historic regiments would lose their identity. We would have to make a complete change in our supply system. The Royal Canadian Army Service Corps would have to assume the functions of a transportation corps and quartermaster's corps in order to conform with the organization of the United States army. The Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps and the R.C.E.M.E. would be changed beyond all recognition.

Within our divisions we should have to adopt the United States system of medical services, and I think that few who have had any experience with the two systems would question that the Canadian system is superior within divisions so far as medical services are concerned. Surely the care of the wounded is one of the prime considerations of any army organization. So far as staff is concerned, we should have to adopt the United States G-1, G-2, G-3 and G-4 system instead of having a division between our general staff and administrative staff.

Coming to the higher level, in the United States army the corps has very little administrative authority over the division. If it so happened that a Canadian corps was serving with the United States army and we were organized according to their system you would find that our Canadian divisions would be administered directly from United States army headquarters. I emphasize this point because of the reports that have been circulated, and I say that any sweeping changes in our organization would be unwise and detrimental at the present time.

There will have to be minor changes. It is necessary that we accept United States arms and equipment. If we carry United States arms then it is necessary to modify our tactics in order to make the fullest use of such arms; but with the exception of the fact that we are to be supplied by a United States pipe line I feel that no other changes should be necessary.

Finally, in comparing the two methods of training, while I realize how unacceptable it would be to the Canadian people to have our soldiers trained in eighteen days and then sent overseas, I feel that if we are to face up to the conditions of modern warfare somehow or other we must devise a system of training which will make men fit for service in a shorter period than is now allowed. I presume that the majority of commanders would say that they require at least twelve months in order to place a brigade in the field ready for action. There must be some halfway mark between the eighteen-day and the twelve-month systems of training. The way modern war is fought we may not be masters of our own destiny. As a matter of fact Russia is calling the shots and we may not have twelve months to prepare our troops of war. Therefore I suggest to the minister that he instruct his staff to consider most seriously some method of speeding up the training of our troops.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) referred to civil defence and the fact that a staff course was being conducted at the present time. He also referred to the difficulty of defining where the financial responsibility should rest so far as the dominion, provincial and municipal governments are concerned. We shall never make any real progress until that is settled and the provinces and municipalities know exactly how much of the burden is going to be borne by the federal government and what their share will be.

I throw out a final suggestion, and I do not know whether the minister will like it. In preparing for the active defence of this country he is carrying such a burden that I think he might be well advised to place civil defence under another minister.

(Translation):

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister most sincerely for his statement of February 1, 1951, on conscription. I quote:

> We know that the cost to us of maintaining one man on European soil, as part of the integrated army, is much more than the cost to the Europeans themselves of maintaining and equipping one man there. And we know that, in the production of equipment, we can get for every dollar expended as much as can be got from any dollar expended anywhere in the world, and perhaps more. We believe, as General Eisenhower is reported to have submitted in his report to congress today, that the big need of western Europe at this time is for arms rather than for troops.

The Prime Minister did not commit himself for the future and, to me, his frank and sincere way of dealing with a question is far better than what we had been accustomed to in the recent past.

In my opinion, it would be much wiser to organize our own territorial defence and to let Europe raise a European army. We could however undertake to make maximum use of our natural resources and of the productive capacity of our industry to supply the equipment necessary for the efficient operation of the army shortly to be set up in Europe under the command of General Eisenhower.

I even think it might be advisable not to send any troops to Europe or to Korea, so as to ensure the maximum amount of productive capacity of our farms and industry. Our country has only a small population of some 15 million scattered over a territory as large as Europe. If we want to transform Canada into an arsenal and a bread-basket to supply the necessary munitions and foodstuffs to the European army, it would seem foolish to deprive ourselves of a part of our people, especially if we compare our population with that of the United States or of European countries party to the North Atlantic pact. Indeed, the government itself has admitted our shortage of manpower by stating its willingness to supply funds to bring some 150,000 European immigrants to this country. Obviously, Canadians do not like to be compelled to go to the defence of Europe while their places are being taken here by Europeans. It therefore seems unwise to send Canadian soldiers to Europe—at a cost which even the government considers excessive—in order that they might replace those immigrants.

Furthermore a force such as that made up of volunteers would necessarily find itself compelled, in case of war, to replace its casualties with conscripts. I may state with the utmost assurance that if public opinion is prepared for any sacrifice for the defence of our territory, it surely would not accept conscription for overseas service because it bears in mind the tremendous number of people in France, England, Belgium, Spain, Germany, Holland and Italy who, I am sure, want only the necessary weapons to raise their own forces in order to be able to fight communists in Europe. Besides, any other course would tend to lower the efficiency of the very limited population of Canada in the development of our vast natural resources, which we could put at the disposal of this European army.

Those who launched a campaign in favour of compulsory military service are being less helpful than they think to the defence of Canada against communist aggression. Canada today can be of much greater service to her allies by helping to set up a tremendous military machine, through the work of her farmers and her workers, than by sending forces to Europe, Korea or elsewhere. Campaigns in favour of conscription for service overseas can only be detrimental to the organization of our own defence. Let us not forget that, if war breaks out, our own country will at once be attacked from the Pacific and we shall certainly not be able to bring back our soldiers from Europe or Korea in time to face the music.

The campaign in favour of conscription for overseas service is bound to hurt our country by causing internal dissensions at a time when all our efforts, both military and diplomatic, must be combined if we are to face that dictator from Moscow.

Fortunately, in these dark and trying days, Canada's affairs are directed by a man, the Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, whose characteristics of honesty, courage, and vision, vitally important for the safety of our nation, are acknowledged the world over. For goodness' sake, let us not play into the hands of our enemy by dividing our country.

Another point I wish to raise in connection with our domestic policy is the steadily rising cost of living. The government hinted in the speech from the throne that price controls are going to be established in the near future. Of course, there are serious disadvantages to this method of fighting inflation, but it is of indisputable value, when compared with the profit motive of certain monopolies that, in this country more than in any other, control the purchase, the distribution and the sale of daily essentials. Those monopolies strangely help the propaganda of communists, who turn them to account in order to convince the popular masses that in no other country in the world is wealth more unevenly distributed than in Canada and the United States.

In France, and in Europe in general, there are innumerable small shopkeepers and small manufacturers, the inevitable consequence of wise legislation; whereas in our country, we have to put up with a monopoly that controls the distribution of milk and its by-products, a monopoly of meat, directed by Canada Packers and Swift's; we have to pay the prices set by chain stores, those of milled feed set by the large milling companies, to say nothing of the monopolies controlling essential public utilities such as telephone, transportation, power companies, et cetera. In other words our legislation is admirably suited to the organization of cartels.

I might, while I am on the subject, thank the government for having recently instituted a commission to recommend such changes as are necessary in our legislation to deal with trusts. I hope this will finally prevent these exploiters of human suffering from causing further harm.

I insist upon the re-establishment of price control since it has been established beyond all doubt that, between 1941 and 1946, the cost of living index only rose five points while, on the other hand, after controls had been lifted, that is between 1946 and November 1950, it rose fifty points.

May I suggest however that the government change the practice it followed in 1941 to 1946 of appointing as price controllers officers of those big companies that constitute the monopolies I just mentioned. Those men, who were being handsomely paid by their companies could surely not serve two masters at the same time. Could we not establish a more flexible organization, one better adapted to special conditions and able to consider particular cases? I sincerely believe that an arbitration commission on prices, with no representatives from the monopolies controlling our economic activities, would be in a position to give to the public sufficient garantees of honesty and disinterestedness. This formula, indeed, is one that is advocated by trade unions. Labour would surely approve of it.

To show the control exerted by monopolies on our economic system, let me mention the case of the Bell Telephone, which has just been allowed by the board of transport commissioners to increase rates up to 135 per cent in the district of Quebec. I now quote the following excerpt from section 52 of the Railway Act, chapter 170 of the Revised Statutes of Canada:

The Governor in Council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the board, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope or application; and any order which the Governor in Council with respect thereto shall be binding upon the board and upon all parties.

In view of this section, after the board's decision, I wrote to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) on November 20, 1950 the letter which I now quote:

My dear Minister,

The people of the district of Quebec have taken due note of the board of transport commissioners' decision which, according to the statement of its deputy chief commissioner, Mr. A. Sylvestre, authorizes an increase of up to 135 per cent in telephone rates applying to the district of Quebec.

As you know, parliament has the right to appeal from this decision to the cabinet. I strongly protest against this judgment of the board of transport commissioners because, throughout the examination of the Bell Telephone Company's application, that body refused to accept any evidence showing the relation that might exist between the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and the Northern Electric Company Limited from which the former firm buys all its equipment without even asking for tenders.

If the board of transport commissioners had allowed the evidence of financial ties between the Bell Telephone and the Northern Electric Co., it would have been easy to prove that part of the Bell Telephone profits, through the channel of equipment purchases, go to the Northern Electric Co., Ltd. whose shares, were they quoted on the market, would reach an astronomical figure.

I have already proven in the House of Commons that the ten or so shareholders of the Northern Electric Co. are also the principal directors and shareholders of the Bell Telephone, and as far as I know, that proof I have given parliament has never been challenged.

That siphoning of Bell Telephone profits into the Northern Electric Co.'s till deprives the Bell shareholders of profits that belong to them and the customers of rates that would be set according to the company's real profits.

To establish the cost of the equipment provided by the Northern Electric Co., it would have been necessary for the commissioners to allow as evidence the profits made by that company. But all such evidence was entirely rejected by the board of transport commissioners.

You know as well as I do, sir, that the Bell Telephone in this country is a monopoly of this indispensable service called the "telephone apparatus" and I feel it is my duty to ask you to reconsider this decision of the board of transport commissioners which affects particularly the electors of the Quebec district who are represented in Ottawa by the Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent. The matter will no doubt crop up again during the next session and as the increase is announced for January 1, 1951, and the session will not begin before February, it seems to me that the cabinet should reconsider this matter immediately.

I am enclosing herewith an editorial published in L'Evenement, November 17 issue, and in the Soleil of November 19. The Soleil calls itself the "Liberal organ" in Quebec. Therefore you should not brush aside their views which, besides, are shared by the whole population of the Quebec district.

I am sending today a copy of this letter to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent and I rely on your kindness, since the board of transport commissioners are responsible to you, to take the necessary steps to defer the enforcement of that ruling and leave it to parliament to decide.

On December 4, 1950, the Minister of Transport replied as follows:

My attention was called, upon my return, to your letter of November 20 about the decision of the board of transport commissioners approving the revision of certain rates of the Bell Telephone Company in the district of Quebec.

As you know, the Bell Company's request for a general increase of their rates was considered by the board of transport commissioners during an investigation which began on March 8, 1950, and was completed on June 2 last. Following that investigation, the board ruled in favour of granting the company's request.

In your communication you ask me to "take the necessary steps to defer the enforcement of that ruling." In this respect, I wish to call to your attention the provisions of sections 51 and 52 of the Railway Act which grants to the board of transport commissioners, to the governor in council or to the Supreme Court of Canada, as the case may be, the exclusive right to vary or rescind a decision of the board of transport commissioners.

In other words, the board is a court of justice against whose decision an appeal may be lodged, the procedure of which is clearly established by the Railway Act. You will note that the act does not authorize the Minister of Transport to intervene in the way you suggest.

If therefore any of the parties concerned in this investigation wishes to lodge an appeal against the board's decision, it can do so by complying with the above-mentioned provisions of the Railway Act.

As for your commentaries concerning the commercial relationship between the Northern Electric Company and the Bell Telephone Company, I would refer you to the findings of the board of transport commissioners. From page 36 to page 46 of the mimeographed French version, you will find set out in detail the terms of the contract for services between these two companies. You will notice more particularly on page 46 the following statement: "Reading of the agreement, of the documentary evidence and of the minutes of proceedings proves to my satisfaction that the company pays the Northern Electric Co. prices which are not unreasonable."

In view of the fact that I have not sufficient authority to grant your request, I feel I must reject it.

I am sorry not to be able to give you a more favourable reply and I thank you for obliging me with your views in this matter.

To the above letter from the Minister of Transport, I replied as follows on December 11, 1950:

My dear Minister,

I acknowledge your letter of December 4 concerning the decision of the board of transport commissioners approving the revision of some of the Bell Telephone Company's rates in the district of Quebec.

You draw to my attention the provisions of sections 51 and 52 of the Railway Act which grants to the board of transport commissioners, the governor in council or the Supreme Court of Canada, as the case may be, the exclusive right to vary or rescind a decision of the board of transport commissioners. That is exactly what I did when I wrote to you on November 20 since I asked you in your capacity as Minister of Transport to be so good as to appeal to the governor in council of which you are part.

I understand and I have always understood that parliament has the right to appeal to the governor in council; this will probably be done shortly since you will receive petitions from every town concerned as well as from chambers of commerce begging the governor in council to intervene in this matter.

With respect to the business relationship between the Northern Electric Co. and the Bell Telephone Co., you refer me to pages 36 and 46 of the French copy of the board of transport commissioners' judgment, which deals in detail with the contract for services between these two companies. From page 46 you draw the following statement: "Reading of the agreement, of the documentary evidence and of the minutes of proceedings proves to my satisfaction that the company pays the Northern Electric Co. prices which are not unreasonable."

How then could the board of transport commissioners have reached this conclusion if they have not permitted that evidence be based on the aggregate profits made by the Northern Electric which, as you know, belongs to and is controlled by the Bell Telephone?

You know as well as I do that the Bell Telephone Company controls the Northern Electric Co. and that it is paid but a very small dividend on its shares, compared to the profits made. Investigation of the Northern Electric's operations could have easily established the exorbitant figure for depreciation, for salaries paid to officials, under various guises. In addition, you could have discovered that the Bell Telephone Company has erected a building and leased it to the Northern Electric which, in turn, sublets parts of it to the Bell Telephone.

You might also have noticed that all the equipment manufactured by the Northern Electric Company and suitable for construction purposes is entirely turned over to the Bell Telephone Company for use in its new buildings and installations.

I understand that the board of transport commissioners refused to admit any evidence concerning the operations of the Northern Electric Company in general. It seems hardly credible that the conclusion should be reached that the price asked by the Northern Electric Company for its equipment is not unreasonable, since absolutely no account is taken of profits made by this wholly-owned subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company. After all, these profits should augment the latter company's revenue in all fairness to its shareholders and to the public who pay the rates established on the basis of profits made by the Bell Co. The board of transport commissioners used the expression "not unreasonable prices", in its report, because it was afraid to say "reasonable prices".

Consequently, Mr. Minister, you should not be too surprised if this question is raised once more at the next session of parliament, several members having expressed the opinion that parliament should appeal in this case to the cabinet itself. If you look into the increase in rates, as it particularly affects the Quebec district, you will agree with me that we are right.

I would be very grateful to you if you could intervene in this connection before the governor in council."

As you can see, in my letters of November 20 and December 11, 1950, I made very grave accusations and on the basis of this decision I have doubts about the competence of the members of the board. Besides, these gentlemen have had many opportunities of changing their minds in the past, for instance in the matter of freight rates. Here is an example of the telephone rates charged in Quebec. I quote:

	Former rate	Final rate	Per cent Increase over Former rate
Residence service
Single line, hand telephone ..	$3.35	$4.25	21·2
Double line, hand telephone ..	2.85	3.50	22·8
Rural line, hand telephone ..	2.60	3.00	15·4
Extension, hand telephone	1.15	1.25	8·7
Business service
Single line, hand telephone ..	5.10	9.50	86·3
Rural line, hand telephone ..	3.10	4.75	53·2
Extension, hand telephone	1.40	1.65	17·8
Exchange line (connecting with switchboard)	5.95	14.00	135·0
Local hand telephone (connecting with switchboard)	1.85	1.85

The house will realize from the rates I have just mentioned the shameful exploiting which was allowed through an increase of the telephone rates in the Quebec district. I deeply regret that the Minister of Transport took no action to implement my request.

I wish to inform the house of these facts so that it may take action and also because I believe they are essential to the campaign now in progress against the exploiting of the mass of the people by those who enjoy special privileges.

One of the best ways to fight communism is to prevent the setting up of trusts and to operate the public or commercial services in the interest of all.

[Mr. LaCroix.]

In addition, to promote private enterprise, legislation will be required to break up combines and ensure a better distribution of public wealth.

Before resuming my seat, I wish to mention another matter which, in my opinion, should be called to the government's attention.

In these troubled times, there is someone who can lead us into the path of understanding and avoid a third world war. I refer to the Vatican, the heart of Christendom, where, following the example set by Great Britain and several other countries, we should have an ambassador.

Many diplomats, even those who object to such relationships on purely religious grounds, admit, in private, that in no other place is it possible to obtain so much accurate and detailed information. From every corner of the globe some 2,000 reports reach the Vatican weekly. They are forwarded by some 3,000 archbishops and bishops and 300,000 priests. Such reports, especially those coming from eastern Europe by secret channels, are the best source of information to be found anywhere.

The church uses this source of information to defend itself against communism and to foster the growth of catholicism the world over. On the basis of such data the Vatican radio is able to furnish its listeners with day and night highly interesting broadcasts in 16 different languages. Russia, Czechoslovakia, Poland and other communist countries favour the Vatican radio with as much attention as the "Voice of America" by jamming the messages sent by the church to its faithful.

A large number of those reports are not published, but diplomats accredited to the Holy See have access to them in certain circumstances.

May I therefore express the hope that, following the lead set by other countries, our leaders will send an ambassador to the Vatican.

I wish to point out too that the people of my constituency were disappointed when they noted that the speech from the throne makes no reference to the adoption of a national flag. At a time when our part in the international sphere takes on added importance from day to day, it is regrettable for our fellow countrymen abroad and for ourselves that we should still be without that symbol around which we could rally and which would do a great deal to maintain our patriotism and the national unity so necessary to its full expression.

I dare hope that the government will very shortly review its policy in this respect.

(Text):

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): First of all I want to join with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in expressing my appreciation of the opportunity of having attended the United Nations as parliamentary adviser from one of the opposition groups. I want to endorse what the hon. member for Peel has said regarding the opportunity that was afforded to us as members of the opposition groups to participate with the Canadian delegation in the daily discussions of the program which was to come before the various committees of the United Nations during that session.

I am confident that the practice followed by this government in giving the opposition groups those privileges will help to win support and unity in this house for our policy against any aggressor nations. I should point out, however, that our appreciation is none the less sincere because in our subamendment, moved by the leader of this group, we take issue with government policy regarding the United Nations aggressor resolution.

One of the glories of a democracy as distinguished from totalitarianism is that we have the right and privilege to disagree with the government, or the party in power, according to our conscience and our light. I think that what the hon. member for Peel said regarding the fact that we were free as opposition members to approve or to disapprove of government policy during the discussion periods is exemplified in the fact that some of us who were members of that delegation are now taking issue with the government.

Quite rightly, Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne indicates that our chief concern in this session must be directed to the international crisis with which Canada, along with the rest of the free world, is faced, and with matters that are closely related to that crisis. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) gave us a review of that crisis which faces the free nations of the world, and he laid down certain general principles which, in his opinion, we should follow in meeting that crisis. On the whole I am confident that hon. members, and the country generally, will agree with these general principles which were laid down by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We all appreciate his awareness of that crisis and his intelligent understanding of it. I might add, we have to await pronouncements from other departments of the government before we can assume that all departments of the government, and the government as a whole, are as fully aware of the crisis as is the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

This evening the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) outlined to us the government's policy of preparedness for meeting that crisis. So far as I was able to follow the minister, I assume that the government policy is as follows. First of all, we are to prepare to defend our own shores in case of an attack. We are to prepare to go to the assistance of our allies of the Atlantic treaty in case they are attacked. We are to prepare to go to the assistance of the United Nations when called upon, to stop aggression anywhere. Finally we are to prepare for the eventuality of a total war. That policy I am confident will have the fullest possible support of every member in the house, and of every political party here represented. Moreover, I am confident it will have the support of every loyal Canadian who wishes to see democracy survive in our country.

The question uppermost in the minds of Canadians today is whether or not we can contain communism without a global atomic war. Canadians do not want to find this country overrun by communists. Canadians do not want to be obliged to live in a communist-controlled world. They do however want to avoid war, if that is possible. It is the hope and prayer of millions of Canadians that communism can be halted without having recourse to such a war. It is the achievement of that objective which is the primary responsibility of governments and diplomats of the free countries of the world. To achieve that objective these governments and diplomats will need the support of the peoples of the countries they represent.

I think we dare not accept the inevitability of war. The mere acceptance of the inevitability of war may very well make war itself inevitable. We are living today in a revolutionary period—probably the greatest revolutionary period in all human history. Tides of revolution are sweeping across the world today. They can no more be stopped than can the tides of the ocean. Nor are those tides of revolution caused necessarily by communism. Without communism, without the threat of Russian imperialism, we would still be faced with these revolutions throughout the world.

The world order as we have known it for the last century is being swept away. A new world order is in process of being born. Whether that new world order is to be communism, or whether we can adjust our democratic society to meet the needs of the peoples of the world, and thereby avert conquest of the world by communists, depends I think upon how speedily democracy can adjust itself, and whether it can adjust itself to meet those needs speedily enough to stop the march of communism.

Eventually we may be forced to have recourse to war—even to atomic war. I cannot for one moment believe that the democratic nations will forgo their freedom and surrender to totalitarianism any more than they were willing to surrender to totalitarian fascism and nazism, without fighting to the bitter end with every weapon at their disposal.

If there is one rallying call that should ring throughout the free world today I would say it should be, "Free peoples of the world, unite! You have nothing to lose but your freedom." Free peoples everywhere will rally to the cause of democracy and, if necessary, fight for it. If the newly freed peoples of Asia, and those who have not yet received their freedom, are to line up on the side of the western nations in the conflict, then democracy as we know it today must do a good deal of housecleaning. In fact, our one hope of saving democracy, either with or without war, lies in the speed with which democracy can bring about those necessary reforms within itself to meet the growing needs of the people of the world today.

Certainly communism is not the answer to those crying needs. Communism is not that good life for which the peoples of the world down through the ages have been seeking. It is not the answer to the revolutionary cries of Asia, Africa and other parts of the east. If communism is not the answer, neither is capitalism. When I refer to capitalism I mean capitalism as it exists on this continent, capitalism as the peoples of Asia have known it for almost two hundred years.

If some of the free nations today which are prepared to spend billions of dollars and millions of lives in defence of democracy would cease to confuse democracy with capitalism as it existed in the past, and be concerned more with democracy per se, in my opinion their task would be easier and their success more assured. Today there are millions of people in Asia and elsewhere who could be induced to fight for democracy. Millions of those people have very little incentive to fight for the type of capitalist democracy they have known over the past centuries.

All parties in the house are agreed that in this crisis the free nations must arm themselves. They must be prepared to fight in defence of their freedom, if that becomes the only alternative. While we all accept that premise, I believe we are agreed that it would be preferable to avoid war if at all possible, on the theory that communism can be contained without war, and that, given time, democracy may be able to demonstrate its advantages over communism as a way of life, not only to those who live in the non-communist world but to many of those who live in parts of the world now dominated by communism.

That leads us to consider the question of negotiation with Russia. I do not believe for one moment that a general peace agreement, implying agreement on all outstanding problems, is possible with Russia. As far as I know, only one man in history has ever succeeded in making an agreement of that kind with Russia, and that was Hitler. Hitler was able to do so because he shared Russia's taste for dividing the world into spheres of influence. I cannot conceive that the United States or other countries in the United Nations will ever be willing to participate in such a horse-trading deal.

While negotiation for general peace may be impossible, that does not rule out the possibility of negotiation for peace or of agreement within limited areas. It does not rule out the possibility of maintaining an armed peace or armed truce with Russia. The idea of an armed peace is not new in history. Europe lived under an armed peace for forty years between the time of the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 and 1914. Granted such a truce is unstable: we know that the armed truce to which I referred eventually led to war in 1914 and any armed truce that we may achieve with Russia may eventually lead to war.

But our best chance of survival is to secure time in which the free countries of the world may not only equip themselves to withstand Russian aggression but be able to adapt themselves to the needs of the people and win support from these millions of Asiatics. Today we are engulfed in a cold war that may last for a generation. Armed peace is not war; it is not necessarily a cold war. It implies a settlement of differences in limited spheres by negotiation, even though the negotiators may parley with atom bombs in their hands. It does not imply commercial or cultural boycotts of nations; it is possible with intense trade and cultural contacts.

I think we are getting on dangerous ground if we accept and become guided by the belief that an atomic war is inevitable, that because communism is our enemy, communism must be blasted from the earth here and now by atomic bombs and the sooner we undertake it the better. That school of thought has a great many supporters in this country and in the United States, in fact far too many supporters. The adoption of that philosophy must lead eventually to a war of annihilation that will set civilization back on its heels for centuries. Those hon. members who received and read copies of the editorial that appeared in Maclean's magazine of January 15 will recall what was said about the possible results of a world war against communism at the present time. Whether we lose such a war, whether we win it or whether it draws to a stalemate, at the conclusion of that war we shall be looking straight down the gun-barrels of world war IV.

War will not wipe communism off the earth; it will no more solve our problems than did world war I or world war II solve the problems of those days. It is on that account that today millions of people are praying that our government and our diplomats may be able to guide us through this period of crisis, may be able to help us withstand the onslaught of communism, may be able to help us to contain communism or to defeat aggression without having recourse to such a world war.

Nevertheless, as I have indicated before, I think as a free people we must be prepared to meet force with force. Above all we must not permit ourselves to be pushed into such a war until we have exhausted every intelligent and honourable means of averting it. Because of the shift in world power which resulted from world war II there has been created a great power vacuum in Europe. Today we find Russia and the United States, two great world powers, vying with each other to occupy that vacuum. Capitalist America and communist Russia are fast dividing the world into two camps and each is seeking allies wherever it can.

The most potential allies that either side can find will be the Asiatic countries. Possibly not from the standpoint of military power, but in the long conflict between communism and democracy, whichever side the 800 million people in Asia choose to throw their weight toward, that side will eventually win. In the struggle for the alliance of Asiatic countries Russia has a great advantage over the western world. For two hundred years these countries have experienced life under western rule. The history of western nations in Asia does very little to win them friends there at this particular time. On the contrary, Russia was not a colonizing country during the nineteenth century. So far as colonies in Asia and Africa are concerned, Russia has no past. She finds it much easier to appeal to the imagination and the needs of the Asiatic people than do the western countries today. As a matter of fact I think we can agree that today the sins of capitalism in Asia are coming home to roost. Today we are paying for the sins of the past.

Faced with a revolutionary Asia, we have Russia, a great imperialist power, always on the alert, always ready to avail herself of any opportunity to foment trouble, to make the road of the democratic countries difficult and to undermine their influence. As the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said this afternoon, they are always on the alert to put the nations of the free world in the international doghouse. That, taken together with the fact that Russia has not the past that the western nations have in Asia, enables us to realize the colossal task facing the western world today if it is to win the support and allegiance of those countries.

I mentioned the fact that democracy must do some housecleaning. We have in Canada a very great degree of political democracy. It has been won for us throughout the centuries by our forebears. We appreciate the freedom of our democratic institutions. We have achieved a considerable degree of economic democracy. The sphere of economic democracy has been widening and increasing with the years. We have in this country and on this continent a considerable degree of industrial democracy. Trade unions are able to participate through collective bargaining in the planning and determining of the policies which industry shall follow. Most of the countries of Asia have very little knowledge of political, economic or industrial democracy. In addition to political, economic and industrial democracy we need to take ethnic democracy to them. The day when the white race can consider itself master of the universe, master of the world, is past. If democracy can reform itself, if we can be given time, we may well be able to avoid global warfare, and we may be able to retain and improve democracy in this country and in other countries of the world.

On motion of Mr. Noseworthy the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 6, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

EMERGENCY POWERS ACT

PROVISION FOR ORDERS AND REGULATIONS DEEMED ADVISABLE FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to empower the governor in council to do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the existing international emergency deem necessary or advisable for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada subject to the restrictions enumerated in the said measure.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

KOREA—INVITATION TO MR. PEARSON TO SERVE ON GOOD OFFICES COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he made a final decision with respect to acceptance or rejection of the invitation extended to him by the president of the general assembly of the United Nations to serve on the good offices committee with respect to oriental problems?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Along with the delegate for India at the United Nations, Sir Benegal Rau, I was asked by the president of the general assembly if I would serve on that committee. The president, Sir Benegal and I had constituted, as hon. members know, the cease-fire committee. I believe Sir Benegal Rau has indicated that he would be unable to serve on the good offices committee. Therefore I informed the president that in view of Sir Benegal Rau's inability to serve possibly it would be better for him if he selected two new persons. However, he has asked me to reconsider the matter, and at the present time I am reconsidering it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUESTION AS TO OPPORTUNITY FOR EXAMINATION OF EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say whether members of the house, particularly opposition members, will have an opportunity to examine in detail during this session the defence expenditures which he enumerated last night, either in the public accounts committee or in any other parliamentary committee?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I think I should probably answer the hon. member's question. There will be an opportunity for hon. members, including the members of the opposition, to examine in the public accounts committee all the expenditures that have been made. If the question refers to the estimates for future expenditures, there will be opportunity in the committee of supply to discuss these in detail.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, so many avenues of information, which are available to members of the cabinet, and particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), are closed to private members of this house that it is with some diffidence that they approach the question of foreign affairs. But it is no mean thing to be a free member in a free parliament, and to be able to exercise the freedom of speech which we enjoy. So far as I am concerned, my wish is that we may long cherish and preserve it.

Now, sir, it has occurred to me that every day the world grows smaller. As nations we live upon one another's doorstep, and we have not yet learned to do it in amity and in mutual understanding. The very closeness of contact which makes that difficult makes war global and the more disastrous. Its instruments can reach us without warning, overnight.

In our lifetime we have seen two wars, and many hon. members of this house have taken part in one or both of them. I think most of us have seen our sons—and some have lost their sons—in one of them. But even at that, we on this continent have no experience of the horrors of war as they have come to certain European nations: the horrors suffered by countries like Germany, France, Britain, Korea, or Russia—just to mention a few. We cannot hope for such immunity in another war. Thus it is the belief of every member of this house that the greatest problem of our day is the preservation of world peace. We wish for it devoutly, and indeed I think the peoples of every nation wish for it devoutly; but in spite of that we seem unable to settle our differences, and we drift and drift to what may be ultimate self-destruction. Indeed, the very instruments we create for the settlement of disputes appear to emphasize the differences rather than the agreements in the opinions of men.

I think the greatest deterrent to a condition of peace is the present division of the world into two and only two camps, built around two powerful nations—two great magnetic poles, as it were, attracting into their orbit all other nations, for ideological, economic or merely geographical reasons. Between the two is a great gulf fixed, and there seems no middle road. The fact that one of these powers has retired in surly reticence behind what we call the iron curtain, and does not permit its own people free intercourse with the western world, has added to the mutual fear and suspicion, as indeed have some of the ebullient and boastful statements of certain irresponsible people in the other.

In the state system which used to obtain in Europe, when a number of strong nations were divided into two camps, Great Britain, then a great world power, often achieved the preservation of peace through exercising what was commonly called the balance of power. The last war relegated Britain to a sphere of comparative unimportance, the status of a weak nation in comparison with either the United States or the U.S.S.R. Her voice at worst has been hushed by economic conditions, and at best has lost some of its authority; alone she cannot be a restraining influence. But in association with the other members of the commonwealth, Britain could be again a potent force in the preservation of world peace. Could she rally about her, as she did of old, the other component parts of what was known as the British empire—Canada, India, Australia, New Zealand and the other countries which comprised that empire—then the strength which would be in such unity might yet be a sobering influence upon any nation which, drunk with its own power, might contemplate disturbing the peace of the world.

I come now to the question which has been disturbing us of late, namely, Korea and the Chinese intervention there. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) said the other day, and better than I could have hoped to do, many of the things which have exercised my mind.

We as Canadians have had little experience in dealing with the people of Asia. We must remember that a revolution is taking place, not only in Korea, not only in China, but in all the countries of Asia. There is an intense desire on the part of these people to get rid of the exploiter, or foreigner—so far as many of them are concerned the terms are synonymous. While Americans are apt to blame the communists for all these troubles, the fact is that the ideological issue means little to the masses of those people. The demand is for bread, for equality, for a place in the sun, for a better way of life, for self-determination. The day will come, and perhaps before long, when the Asiatics will decide to run their own affairs and foreigners will have to give up their control or be forced out. We who fought a war in 1914-18 for self-determination of small nations and for democracy in general would find ourselves at a loss for good arguments against such a course.

The Labour government of Britain, a country old and wise in the ways of diplomacy, picked the psychological moment for retirement from India, and in such a way as to leave behind mutual esteem and good feeling. It is to be hoped that the present difficult negotiations will in no way interfere with that happy state of affairs.

The happy facility of the British in diplomacy does not appear to extend to our American friends. They are a fine and friendly people; they are splendid neighbours, as we have good reason to know; they are generous to a fault; they believe, as we do, in political freedom, but having said that, I must say that in my humble opinion they have made mistake after mistake in their dealings with Korea and China. It is easy for Asiatics to misinterpret their good intentions.

Since I am speaking in support of our amendment, which declares that the action of the Canadian government in declaring China an aggressor was premature and unwise, I shall give as background a record of some of the mistakes.

For example, the Chinese people think of the United States as the nation which opposed their emancipation from the dictatorial and corrupt regime of Chiang Kai-shek, supplying him with arms which prolonged the civil war and resulted in thousands of deaths and in untold hardship to the Chinese, including their women and their children. They think of the United States as the nation which protected that leader in Formosa, the declaration of Cairo notwithstanding—a declaration to which, incidentally, the United States was a signatory.

The United States has consistently refused to recognize China and allow her to be seated in the council of the nations. That is a responsibility which the government of Canada must share, but one which this C.C.F. party does not share, since it has consistently advocated recognition, while repudiating the communist philosophy of the Chinese government.

One might argue that our present quarrel with China might never have arisen if she had been so seated in the United Nations, but the time to prove that is now past. When we consider the Korean sphere, the failure of the United Nations forces to halt at the 38th parallel would certainly be misinterpreted by many Chinese. The other day the minister simply and aptly described that line as the Rubicon. History tells us that while the crossing of the Rubicon was to the immediate advantage of Julius Caesar, it was the cause of his ultimate downfall. While it might have appeared necessary from the military viewpoint that General MacArthur should not stop at the 38th parallel, we thought that certainly he should have stopped very soon thereafter. That would have been a good time to call a cease-fire; that would have been an opportunity for what the Secretary of State for External Affairs quoted Mr. Churchill as describing as magnanimous appeasements, and a gesture of conciliation based on strength rather than upon weakness.

Apparently the minister was as much surprised as the rest of us, and as much surprised as were the Chinese, when the American general, on whose responsibility we have not learned, ordered that victory march right up to the Manchurian border. Can hon. members put themselves for a moment in the position of the Chinese on that occasion, crouching on the banks of the Yalu river? Most of those people are not learned in diplomacy. They know little or nothing about foreign affairs. I am sure most of them know nothing about the cause for which they are fighting, but they do know what it means to protect their homes. I ask hon. members to put themselves in the position of those common men of China, crouching there on the muddy banks of the Yalu, and watching the approach of that vast foreign army. What must they have thought? What would hon. members have thought had they been in that position?

Well, if we do not know what they were thinking, at least we know what they did. Even as they drove us toward the sea, we still refused to admit them to the only council in which we could talk with them as equals. Rather it stiffened our resistance, and we demanded that they appear not for consultation but for condemnation before a court to which we had consistently refused their admission on equal terms. Simultaneously we asked them for a cease-fire. What would hon. members have answered, had they been the Chinese, in the light of the background I have just described?

I have mentioned foolish and irresponsible statements on the part of Americans, which did not make for reassurance in the minds of the Chinese. There were:

1. The famous Truman statement, later qualified, but undoubtedly expressed, to drop the bomb on China.

2. The home-for-Christmas declaration of MacArthur, and the drive for the Manchurian line.

3. The speech by an individual American in a responsible position about wiping communism out of all Asia.

4. The threat to withhold United States wheat from the starving people of India, because of a difference of opinion between the United States and India on a phase of the Korean situation.

5. The general tendency for the United States to allow certain prominent American military men to make political statements, if, indeed, not to dictate American foreign policy.

A casual observer might be tempted to think, from all these things, that the United States was deliberately trying to provoke a war with China. I do not believe that for one moment, but I do believe the American foreign policy is panicky and vacillating. We in Canada must be no mere satellite to anyone. I am aware of the coincidence of our opinion in many things with that of our American friends. I am aware the time may come when we may be very dependent upon their good will and very thankful for their strength and assistance. But I believe that at this time any blind subservience to their foreign policy on those accounts would negate the whole principle upon which the United Nations is based.

We should—we must—have an independent foreign policy. We must not be dragged into a war against China, where our forces would be dissipated and we would be left helpless to defend our country, if that need should arise.

I do not believe that this upsurge of Chinese nationalism is necessarily favourable to Russian-Chinese alliances. There are many points of difference. They have totally different cultures. But we have done much to cement such an alliance. We have thrown the Chinese people into Stalin's arms; we have provided him with a great propaganda weapon by slapping the Chinese, not on one cheek but on two. At least in words, Stalin has befriended them and in my opinion we have played right into his hands.

Someone will say that some of the statements I have made today have been made before by Canadian communists. That may be so. Those people have spoiled many good causes by their very advocacy of them. They have certainly hurt the cause of peace in this country, to the extent that their screaming for it has rendered it unpopular. But I shall not fall into the trap of deviating from my beliefs, or my expression of them, because of what communists may think or say or do. That method has been only too successful in certain quarters in the past.

On the whole question I have come to certain conclusions, among which are the following:

First, the restoration and preservation of peace by agreement among the nations is at the moment the important thing. The saving of face is not the important thing. I am mindful of what war has done to the Korean civilian population. Liberation has been expensive for them, and it could happen to other populations. Let us get on with the negotiations.

Second, I do not believe that attack upon us is inevitable or, indeed, likely; but machinery, preferably under the United Nations, to prevent aggression, will have to be maintained. As long as part of the world is shut off from us and there is consequent darkness and mutual suspicion, we shall have to build our defences, lest our very helplessness may provoke such attack upon us. In the meantime it must be part of our task to allay the suspicion and fear that now exists, so that disarmament, the ideal condition, may at least become possible in our time.

Third, eventually, and soon, we shall have to abandon intolerance and ideas of racial superiority. We shall have to admit the equality of human beings as such; we shall have to admit the right of Asiatics—nay, of people everywhere—to control their own destinies.

Fourth, just as a loss of freedom in one part of the world is a threat to freedom as a whole, so hunger and poverty and injustice anywhere should be the concern of all.

Fifth, to this end we cannot expect forever to maintain our high standard of living while there are millions who have never had enough to eat. We shall have to learn to give, and to give without hope of return. We shall win friends, and we shall only win friends when to our gifts there are no strings attached, either political or military.

Finally, the opinion that I expressed before, that a third force in the world might have a moderating and restraining influence on world affairs, indicates that by mutual aid and co-operation we can strengthen the ties of friendship that exist between the members of the commonwealth.

I have not resisted the temptation, as did the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) in his touching address the other day, of prescribing for the ills of the world. What I have said has been a background for my support of the C.C.F. amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. I believe that the condemnation of China as an aggressor at this time is a mistake. It is without meaning; nay, it makes a laughing-stock of the United Nations, unless it is followed by sanctions or other punitive measures, which could lead only to retaliation and then to open war with China.

As it is, I believe that public condemnation at this time is a mistake in that it may close the door on negotiations, may keep China indefinitely out of the United Nations, and may widen the already existing breach with Asia. The C.C.F. amendment suggests that the Canadian government made one mistake in branding China as an aggressor at this time. I urge that it do not now make a second mistake in agreeing that sanctions be applied against the same nation. That course may be the next step that the United States may advocate, but in my opinion it would close the door to peace with China and might lead, in progressive steps, to the world war which we all wish to prevent.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in the few months since we last met, many things have happened, some inspiring and some discouraging. As tension grows between east and west we in Canada seem to find ourselves in a perpetual crisis. On every side we are beset by dangers and obstacles which are not of our own making, and about which even we can do very little. In the midst of this dark and confused picture I feel that the highest tribute should be paid to the Canadian people for their calmness, their good sense and the unity they have displayed under all circumstances. By comparison with other countries, the people of Canada have borne themselves admirably.

By the understanding and patience of the people, the government's contribution to world peace has been made effective. We are not a house divided. I feel that the government is entitled to a full measure of support because of the manner in which it has handled international problems. If any one man is to be singled out for special attention he is the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Time and again he and his assistants have shown a faculty for doing the right thing when Britain and the United States have differed on questions of policy. Too few understand his difficult position. He is trusted by both the United States and Britain. He has to explain one to the other. He has to help compose their differences. He has always been the bridge between the United States and the commonwealth—and I do not mean a Duplessis bridge.

Canada's contribution to the cause of world peace has been a significant one. For that, as I have already said, the government is entitled to full credit. I heard it said the other day, by a man who should know what he is talking about, that we have in Canada 14 million of the most influential people in the world. The minister of external affairs, as Mr. Canada, is making this country's voice heard and influence felt at the council tables of the world. I think this house will fully agree with me when I say that he is doing a superb job, and that he has in large measure captured the imagination of the Canadian people.

I think we have reached our present position in Korea because the United States in particular has refused to permit the actual government of China to take its place in the assembly. I have felt that for a long time, but there is nothing we can do about it at the moment. The criticism has been made in this house that, by voting for the United States resolution branding China as an aggressor, Canada helped to shut the door on a peaceful settlement of the Korean war. An examination of the cold facts indicates that there is no validity in that argument. The door to understanding has not been slammed; it has not been shut; the door is wide open today, and there is a welcome mat on the doorstep inviting China to come in whenever she so desires.

There is no doubt that Canada did not welcome this kind of resolution, feeling that the prospects of settling not only the war in Korea but other important Far Eastern problems would be increased by exploring all other avenues before naming an aggressor. But once the resolution came before the United Nations this country could not do anything else in good conscience; we could not vote against the resolution. We merely called truth as our witness and acted accordingly.

There can be no denial that there was aggression. These volunteers came fully equipped with jet planes and tanks. There was a definite act of aggression, and Canada voted accordingly. But what the minister of external affairs did before the first political committee of the general assembly has been to some extent neglected by this house and has been hardly understood in the country. He understood full well that a tough United States resolution would result in a splitting of the unity of the free world. He bent his efforts toward achieving two objectives: First, the softening of the United States resolution to emphasize negotiation and place the punitive aspect in a secondary position; second, to persuade the United Kingdom and other nations that if this modification took place it would remove the barriers in the way of a yes vote. How successful the minister was is shown by the vote in favour of a greatly modified resolution.

If the United Nations is to serve the high purpose for which it was created, it is of vital importance that unity be shown in the face of a world threat to freedom. What else could Canada do? This country did not, as some suggest, play along with the United States because there was nothing else we could do. In his powerful address before the United Nations the minister described the resolution as premature and unwise. But, having said that, he did not depart from consistency when he said that Canada would vote for the resolution because this country could not disagree with the paragraph thereof which condemned communist China as an aggressor.

Let us not fall into the fatal error of believing that aggression will become more widespread because we face the realities of the world situation. If all our problems and confusions are to be resolved not by negotiation of differences but by force against force, then we must equip ourselves to the full, not only in a military sense but also in a spiritual and moral sense. We have made our position very clear to the Chinese communist government. We have left no doubt in their minds and in the minds of the Russians that the days of appeasement have disappeared with the realization that appeasement breeds the very aggression it seeks to halt. In future we intend to lead from strength.

If the Chinese government reacts to this resolution as Chinese rather than as communists, they will regard the condemnation as involving loss of face. It will be a blow to their pride. This is serious, but it is not insurmountable. They can be made to understand that the very basis of the United Nations made necessary such action by the sixty nations represented therein. On the other hand, if they react as communists—and it appears that is what is happening—then they will shout and bluster; they will threaten one day and change their tune the next, as may suit their particular purpose.

It must be becoming very clear to the Chinese communists that they are not going to attain their ends by force. If they want to be given a seat in the United Nations—and that is what they desire above everything else; if they want to replace the pigmy nationalist segment that is there at the present time, then that can come to pass only by the settlement of the Korean and other Far Eastern problems on a basis acceptable to them and to the democratic world. When the time comes to revoke the resolution of censure and admit China to the comity of nations, we shall of course act accordingly.

We in this house are in a fortunate position in that we can second-guess the government and play Monday morning quarterback. After the government has made a decision we are in a position to pass judgment on it. I said earlier that our great strength was our unity. We have had a full discussion of this matter. It has been complete, and it seems to me that discussion is one thing and voting is another. After all, the differences among members of the house with respect to the particular policy expressed in the amendment is a trivial one. I think it should not be exaggerated or magnified in order to indicate that our differences are greater than they actually are. When the time comes I hope that we can avoid a vote on the amendment.

I should like to deal with another matter, arising out of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). It was a clear, concise and convincing statement of what the world of tomorrow may be like from Canada's point of view. He emphasized that we are committed under the North Atlantic treaty to do our share in the common cause; that we will stand together. Then he went on to translate that to mean that we shall be sending Canadian troops to serve in the European army to be commanded by General Dwight Eisenhower. In that adventure we shall be full partners. Therefore it will become our duty to apply ourselves with others to the most perplexing question of Germany and German rearmament. Today for the first time Canada will be asked to help to find the answer to the German problem. It is a very old problem, and one which apparently must be answered by each generation in turn. During all my adult life we have been either arming Germany or fighting Germany.

All these decisions need to be taken in the light of the east-west cleavage, which is a real one. It is deplorable, but it is a fact and all our international thinking must be predicated on that fact. There are two important aspects of the question of German rearmament; there is the need, and there is the danger. First let me deal for a few moments with the need.

A good case may be made out for German rearmament. From a military point of view it may be a regrettable necessity. Nevertheless we must approach with the greatest caution the whole question of rearming Germany, and with the memory still vivid of what an armed Germany cost the world in blood and tears not so many years ago.

In girding ourselves against the threat of communism let us remember that not so long ago we regarded fascism as just as deadly a threat to our freedom. Therefore in putting arms into the hands of a people who still regard Hitler as having been unlucky rather than a scoundrel, let us take care that we do not create a Frankenstein as evil as the one hovering over the free world today from behind the iron curtain.

The existence of an armed east German force has doubtless been a factor in the decision of the Atlantic powers to consider the creation of a west German army as a part of an integrated European army. We may have to permit the rearming of western Germany precisely to the extent that the Russians arm eastern Germany. However, if we must rearm Germany on the advice of our military commanders, then there must not be moral disarmament. The west has already lost more than half the continent—a good deal of it by default, some by delay, but far more by appeasement. If we are to hold what little is left of Europe, as I believe we shall, we must make up our minds on certain fundamental issues. If Europe will defend itself, then we must be prepared to extend a very large measure of support when and as required. In his report General Eisenhower says there is a will and a desire on the part of western Europe to defend itself, and we are joining with them in this common undertaking. I see no reason why we should not accept his assurance; but the statement he made on his visit to Germany, in which he suggested that we "let bygones be bygones," is not so reassuring. It seems to me that statement could well be construed as an apology for fighting against them the last time, or as an apology for the defeat we inflicted upon them. That sort of talk encourages the worst elements in Germany.

If it is decided that under the circumstances there is need for a strong Germany, that brings up the question of the danger of a strong Germany. History is too fresh in our minds for us to forget what happens when Germany becomes strong. Can we afford to chance it again without adequate precautionary measures? It is all very well to say that we are dealing with a different Germany, but are we? I believe we are still dealing with a people who are undemocratic and unrepentant, who consider themselves unfortunate, and whose chief object at the present time is to figure out the winning side and get on it. They think they can make a deal on rearmament, to the point of getting themselves out of the doghouse, and they believe we must agree on their terms. I remind the house that the west built up a democratic Germany in the twenties, only to find itself with Hitler's Germany on its hands in the thirties.

We are fighting communism today on a world-wide scale, with all our strength and resources. In doing so, however, we must make sure we do not bring back a form of fascism. I am not concerned with the question whether communism and fascism are the same or different. One thing basic to both is that they are living denials of human freedom and decency, and we are unalterably opposed to both. That decision must be irrevocable. Let me remind the house of a declaration made just five years and two days ago at Yalta:

> "It is our inflexible purpose to destroy German militarism and nazism, and to ensure that Germany will never again be able to disturb the peace of the world . . ."
> Germany was to be permitted no armed forces, no general staff, no military equipment; nazi and military elements were to be "removed from public offices and from the economic life of the German people"; German industry that could be adapted to war production was to be dismantled or placed under international control. "Only when nazism and militarism have been extirpated" would Germany be received into the comity of nations.

As I have already indicated, I am content to leave the handling of external affairs to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs who have shown themselves to be statesmen in the broadest sense of the word. However, I do say that in approaching the German problem we must not let the need to rebuild and rearm Germany blind us to the inherent danger involved. Nor are our fears allayed when we read of the reappearance on the present scene of left-over and warmed-over nazi generals, and some of the manifestations of fascism. Ex-German generals, former nazi leaders and war criminals are starting to roll off the allied amnesty assembly lines like Fords in Windsor. The recent action of the United States and British military in releasing large numbers of convicted criminals makes the war trials appear a farce, almost a scandal. The French, who know the Germans best, have not done any releasing. They know full well that when you give a German a gun he immediately starts marching towards the French border.

A report in the Montreal Gazette of February 1 indicated that the Americans and British had made a general release of various convicted persons. The Americans had set free thirty-three, had shortened the sentences of thirty-six, and were reviewing the sentences of more than four hundred others. The British were reviewing the sentences of some two hundred and forty. For reasons of their own the French confirmed the sentences of all their prisoners, and were not reviewing any.

One of the men released was Alfred Krupp. I wonder if the Germans will rejoice at his release, so that he can start again to make munitions for them. It is interesting to see the British reaction. The pro-Labour Sunday Pictorial had this to say, as quoted in the Globe and Mail of February 5:

> They opened the gates of a German prison yesterday, and they turned loose a man with blood on his hands . . . the blood of British soldiers, of Russians, of Americans and Frenchmen, of Poles and Dutchmen and Belgians; the blood of millions . . .
> Who can believe that Alfred Krupp has any contribution to make to the problems of the present-day world?
> It is a slap on the face for human decency that he is free today . . .

The Laborite Reynolds News also had something to say:

> Times have apparently changed. Does murder cease to be murder when political circumstances change? Is Krupp, who starved and ill-treated in his factories thousands of helpless victims drawn from prisoner-of-war camps or seized as slaves . . . less guilty in 1951 than in 1948?

Then Lord Beaverbrook's Sunday Express carried a cartoon showing monstrous-looking war criminals filing out of prison. A sign on the wall said, "Please collect your weapons and cash on the way out." A British soldier is telling an American: "Now I suppose they will have us in court for wrongful imprisonment." Another newspaper carried an even more cutting cartoon showing two United States military policemen translating for a cringing nazi general, and one of them says, "He wants to know if he'll get his gas chamber back."

We in this country are having a little problem of our own. I notice from the press that Major General Kurt Meyer now wants to get out. He is tired of his confinement in Dorchester penitentiary. An article appearing in the Globe and Mail says that Meyer was originally sentenced to be shot, but the sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment. He was convicted in December, 1945, of responsibility for the deaths of eighteen Canadian prisoners of war at his headquarters in Normandy in June, 1944. The article goes on to say:

> The youthful general was said at the time of his conviction to be the personification of German national socialism.

I picked up an editorial in the Windsor Star of February 1. It has this heading: "Meyer wants out," and reads in part as follows:

> If it were not for counter-excesses allegedly committed by Canadian troops, S.S. Major General Kurt Meyer would now be dead, instead of appealing for clemency from Dorchester penitentiary . . .
> Public opinion will not take kindly to the idea of releasing him, although that would not be a reason to hold him if he could establish his innocence. It would be easier to argue that a man so dangerous potentially, as a rallying point for the worst German elements, should be kept in protective custody until that danger is past.

For our own safety, and in the interests of the west as against the east, we may decide that it is necessary and advisable to rearm Germany. But it must be on our terms. I make this further point. It is one thing to put arms into the hands of Germans to fight on our side and to be disciplined by us, but it is another matter to arm Germany in the way that she wants to be armed. I for one am not prepared to give Germany carte blanche in this matter. Either Germany is with us in the west wholeheartedly, or she is not in our camp at all. This is certainly no time for mental reservations, either on a personal or a national level. If we have any doubts about Germany's good faith, then the time to correct those doubts is now, before the wheels start moving; because once they start, I am not so sure that we shall be able to stop them again.

It is a mistaken view, held, I think, widely in this country, that the safety of the west depends upon German divisions. I would point out that the Germans are not the only virile people in Europe. Let me point out to this house some inherent dangers which must be considered by the government. It is possible that in rearming Germany we may start the Russians marching. The Russians have threatened that course on many occasions. It is a calculated risk, and it may be worth taking; I do not know. It is also possible that if we rearm Germany, and if she is confident of herself, she may well try the military adventure of conquering eastern Germany in order to bring about the unification of Germany. That is understandable. She may well commit us to a course of action for which we have no stomach and no desire. There is also the possibility, unless we are in full control of the situation, that she may decide, after being rearmed, that she will join up with Russia; then our boys would be facing the very weapons that we sent over there. This is not a fanciful suggestion, because twice within the last twenty-five years Germany has done just that. I think we must make sure, so far as we are able to do so, whether Germans will fight for French, American and British people against their own countrymen in eastern Germany. In this possibility another risk is involved. If we build up a German army under the guidance of people such as General Guderian or General Speidel, we shall be getting the only kind of army those people know, namely a replica of Hitler's army. Surely we should have no use for those shoddy, left-over German generals. In Europe the Germans are still distrusted and feared. There is great danger in the policy of supporting anything so long as it is not communistic. What is bad, rotten, outworn and hateful should be tagged as unworthy of our support.

There is in this country much anxiety and uneasiness over the talk of revival of German military nationalism. The German generals have a great responsibility to history. They supported Hitler in his endeavour to destroy democracy in Europe, and in the unspeakable massacre of millions of innocent men, women and children. They have in the past shown themselves to be congenitally untrustworthy. German rearmament is a matter that will be subject to negotiation at a high level. I plead with the government to go slowly in this dangerous German adventure.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): In rising to take part in this throne speech debate, Mr. Speaker, may I first of all congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) upon the able manner in which they performed in making their maiden speeches in this house.

As to the speech from the throne itself, as has already been said it is rather vague and ambiguous but it does point out the grave danger of the international situation and the magnitude of the defence effort which necessarily has created an emergency situation. As to external affairs, we heard a detailed account of events given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson); and with respect to the amendment before this house as to external affairs, my colleague the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) I thought did an excellent job and made our position clear in that respect. Last evening we had a lengthy discourse from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), in which he pointed out the objective of a three-year program. He stated that it was the desire to have at the end of three years 148,000 personnel in the services. That was a real challenge both to the human and the material resources of this country. As to the program announced last evening by the Minister of National Defence, forecasting 148,000 men in the services at the end of the next three years, I should like to point out that, on a per capita basis, that is less than half of the effort already put forth by the United States of America or by Britain. The United States of America, with a population eleven times that of Canada, has a target for June of this year of 3,500,000 men in the services. To match the United States, on a population basis, Canada's program should be 318,000 men. Great Britain, with a population three and a half times that of Canada, had 1,023,000 men in her armed forces last October. To match Britain, on a per capita basis, Canada's program should be over 285,000 men in the services. I think it is well that we should keep that fact in mind, because throughout this country it is difficult at this time to get information.

I agree with the remark just made by the previous speaker, when he began his address, in which he said that the people of Canada were to be congratulated on their level-headed thinking in these times. I can tell you that throughout the province from which I come the people are wondering what this is all about. The men and women whom I have met in the streets in the cities and towns and the farmers have been extremely anxious as to just what is taking place in Canada and are wondering what this is all about. They think they should have been receiving from the government much more detailed information than they have been receiving with regard to the expenditure of so much of the taxpayer's money, as to what it is spent for and as to what is required for the armed services.

The other day I received a copy of a newspaper article from a friend out on the west coast. It was taken from the Daily Colonist of January 14, and points out that the reserve army of Victoria is tragically undermanned. The city has only 580 men to defend it from attack. The article goes on to say that after a detailed investigation over 3,000 personnel are required for the units there. That picture is very true of the reserve forces of the province from which I come. I know it is true of the many organizations in this province of Ontario today. I would be surprised if it is not the situation with respect to the reserve forces in every province throughout Canada at this particular time. With respect to both the United Nations and the defence of this country, it is very unsatisfactory at this particular time.

Turning to another matter which has been mentioned in the speech from the throne, with respect to production, I wish to deal with the matter of the five-year wheat pool following the last world war, 1945-50, and the contribution made by the farmers to the consumers of Canada and of Great Britain, and the money now owing to these wheat producers by the government of the day.

If you will bear with me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring the record up to date, because again these people find it very difficult to know just what the score is.

In discussing the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had this to say on August 14, 1946, as appears at page 4810 of Hansard:

> When we are at the end of the four-year period, if in the last six or twelve months we find ourselves in the position that world markets, so-called, are not offering as much for wheat as we are getting for it, I hope people will still stand behind us to the extent they are standing behind us now. Even if wheat stays above $1.55 during the whole period, I hope people will still feel that it was worth while trying. If we are successful in this experiment, then we can talk to the grain trade people with some assurance. If they are able to show us at the end of the five-year period that we were all wrong, that over that length of time the farmer got less than he ever got before under similar circumstances and that the other system would have brought him more, then we shall be in a position to discuss the matter with them on an even footing. I am sure anyone who has taken this position and finds himself wrong will be quite prepared to discuss it from that point of view. In the meantime we are convinced that this is the best thing for the farmer. As long as we are convinced of that, and having another four years in which to try it out, we can put the policy into effect in a way that will at least help us to determine how this long argument between farmer and grain trade in western Canada ought to be settled in the interests of the great masses of the people.

Then on August 15, 1946, as reported at page 4848 of Hansard, the minister put on record the details and terms of the contract. In one of the articles there is this statement:

> In determining the prices for these two crop years, 1948-49 and 1949-50, the United Kingdom government will have regard to any difference between the prices paid under this agreement in the 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years and the world prices for wheat in the 1946-47 and 1947-48 crop years.

It is understood, of course, that the Minister of Agriculture received credit for having negotiated the deal at that time on behalf of the then minister of trade and commerce, the Hon. James MacKinnon. Then the Minister of Agriculture is reported at page 569 of Hansard of March 8, 1950, as follows:

What I wish to say to this house, and through the house to the country, is that the Prime Minister stated to the farmers that it was decided during the first discussion that every dollar the wheat pool was entitled to as a result of the British agreement would be paid into the pool by the end of this crop year, on the basis on which the British agreement called for the deliveries, and that therefore there would be no possibility whatsoever of any loss being taken by the farmers of western Canada as a result of that exchange. The money will be paid into the pool by the government of Canada and any loss which is taken—if any loss is taken; and we do not expect that there will be any—would naturally be taken by the treasury or by a settlement that we get from the British under the "have regard to" clause rather than by the farmers themselves. I thought it was necessary that that matter should be cleared away at this time in order that we may avoid discussion of the idea in the future.

And remember, the end of that crop year referred to was July 31, 1950.

In discussing the amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act on June 5, 1950, as appears at page 3221 of Hansard, I am reported as follows:

The Minister of Agriculture and the then Prime Minister repeatedly stated that the farmers who were making these sacrifices would have that taken into account for many years following the war. However, I take it there is to be no further settlement expected from Britain under that contract?

Mr. Howe: That is correct.

Then, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press, and other daily papers, of January 24, 1951, just the past month, the following appeared:

Gardiner at federation of agriculture meeting in Calgary announced reopening of wheat payment negotiations.

He said before he left Ottawa he and Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent had agreed that he should make the statement at this time.

Under clause 2 (b) of the four-year wheat contract now terminated Britain had agreed that there should be an adjustment.

During the parliamentary session last summer Right Hon. C. D. Howe said that Britain considered the matter closed.

Well, since then we have had some questions asked on the floor of this house. On January 31 the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the following question, as reported on page 7 of Hansard:

May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the wheat growers of the prairie provinces may expect the final payment under the five-year wheat pool, and whether the government has made up its mind what it will contribute toward making up the losses sustained by those farmers? If the amount has been determined, how much will it be?

[Mr. Ross (Souris).]

The Minister of Trade and Commerce replied as follows:

I am not able at this time to make a statement regarding the five-year pool.

Then the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) asked a question and the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied as follows:

I am not able to make a statement on that subject today.

I then asked the Prime Minister the following question:

If I may ask a further supplementary question, could the Prime Minister say whether negotiations have been reopened with the British government in regard to a final settlement of the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement and the five-year pool?

The Prime Minister replied as follows:

I will not say that negotiations have been opened with the government of the United Kingdom in that regard, but representations were made as to what I thought was the view prevailing throughout the wheat-producing provinces of Canada, in regard to the fulfilment of all obligations under the four-year contract.

It would be interesting for us to know what representations have been made because I would imagine that the head of the Saskatchewan pool is pretty close to the federal Minister of Agriculture. They have asked that a final payment of at least 15 cents a bushel be made. They do not give any formula; they refuse to set forth any argument as to why it should be at least 15 cents a bushel. The Alberta pool has always asked for at least 25 cents a bushel; so have the united farmers and other organizations of the three prairie provinces. Therefore it would be interesting to know just what representations the Prime Minister may have made to the authorities in Great Britain. However, that does bring this case fairly well up to date.

Then, when the chairman and members of the Canadian wheat board, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is the responsible minister for the operations of the wheat board, appeared before the standing committee of the House of Commons on agriculture and colonization during the session of 1950—that is, the past year—some of us requested that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) be asked to appear and explain the "have regard" clause in the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement. That is set forth in the minutes of proceedings of the committee. It was pointed out however by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that a minister could not be summoned to appear before a committee, with the result that we did not hear from the minister at that time in the committee.

This is set out in the proceedings at page 150. I shall not read it all, but I believe I have given the gist of it—and, if I am wrong, the minister is in his seat and can correct me. On the next page, under the heading of appendix "A", we find the following information given by Mr. McIvor, in answer to a question:

Grain exchange dues appearing in Exhibit XVI (Report C.W.B.) amounting to $1,900, consists of the following payments paid to the Winnipeg grain exchange:

1. Annual dues on 4 memberships owned by the Canadian wheat board at $250 each	1,000
2. Annual dues on 3 memberships owned by employees of the board and used in conducting board business at $250 each	750
3. Transfer fee of 1 membership	50
	$1,800
4. Annual dues on 1 membership owned by the Canadian wheat board in the Vancouver grain exchange	100
Total	$1,900

That is interesting, in the light of the speeches one hears across the country, and the poison thrown around across the country about the grain exchange. I have always made it clear that I believe in the Canadian wheat board myself. However, I think people should be fair about the arguments they use, and not at times try to misrepresent the facts, as is done by some when they appear on the hustings.

The five-year wheat pool ended on July 31, 1950. During those five years the wheat producers delivered to the Canadian wheat board slightly in excess of 1,400 million bushels of wheat, at a loss, to date, of approximately 50 cents a bushel. That is the difference between the class II wheat quotations averaged over this period, and the price actually received by the farmers to date. Last year, according to the evidence, the board were deliberately underselling United States wheat, basis seaboard, by an average of 35 cents a bushel. This is all set out in the minutes of proceedings of the committee on agriculture.

Hon. members will understand that the international boundary line divides North Portal. American grain is marketed on one side, and Canadian on the other. On January 23 of this year while the Canadian farmer was receiving $1.23½ per bushel for No. 1 wheat, his neighbour across the line in the United States was receiving $2.21. True, since then there has been added the 20-cent payment announced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, thus leaving a difference at the present time, after that payment, of 77½ cents.

The Canadian farmer has taken that trimming for five years. He is taking a trimming today; and I can tell the house that many farmers in the prairie provinces, through no fault of their own—and I am not blaming the government for this—have suffered heavy loss because of weather conditions. A great deal of the crop was frozen before being fully matured. Then the harvest season was wet, with the result that in many sections of the country the grain was not and has not yet been harvested. In other places, where it was harvested, it is still lying on the ground. This has meant great hardship for the farmers affected. At this stage many of them are not able to meet their obligations with the local storekeepers or merchants.

I urge the government immediately to assume its responsibility and to announce the final settlement of the five-year wheat pool at a rate of 25 cents per bushel. This amount would represent appproximately one-half the loss suffered by the wheat producers in marketing their grain under the compulsory system set up by the government. Those producers have no other alternative, and I say therefore that it is the responsibility of the government to help out. Even in the face of this I believe the western producer would be willing to assume half the loss. The government, which has the responsibility, should announce a final payment assuming the other half. As has been pointed out, it is essential to many of those farmers that the announcement be made and the payments made before seeding commences in the spring. There is great hardship in some sections of the country, as was pointed out in the debate yesterday.

I should like now to discuss the marketing, grading and transportation of the present 1950-51 grain crop in western Canada. As I said earlier, weather conditions for the harvesting and marketing of the crop were very bad. However, the grading and marketing of grain in many sections of the country was most unfair. In many cases a person having good grain was unduly penalized.

The distribution of box cars for the movement of grain was handled most unfairly throughout many districts of the west. There was and still is a very great shortage of box cars. As of January 1, 1951, the total of Canadian cars in the United States was 28,915, as against 13,873 United States-owned cars in Canada, or a difference of approximately 15,500 cars. One can imagine what that would do, even in the matter of storing grain on the tracks, let alone moving it.

On the day I left home an embargo was placed upon the movement of dried grain, including wheat, oats and barley, in western Canada. It was the wish of the board to move out the damp and tough grain in an effort to bring it to the head of the lakes to have it dried. This has created hardship for the producer.

Western Canadian hard wheat is recognized as the best in the world. I have often heard people who should know make that statement. Our present members of the Canadian grain commission—and I would ask hon. members not to confuse that with the wheat board—claim that we have the best grading system. Well, the Canadian producer receives a great deal less for his wheat than do the producers in other countries—and it is the net return that usually counts with the producer.

I do not believe we have the best grading system in the world, and I am supported in my view by Dr. J. Ansel Anderson of Winnipeg, chief chemist of the board of grain commissioners. In this connection I should like to quote a portion of his remarks before a gathering in western Canada, as they are set out in the Western Producer of January 18—and his observations were reported also in many other papers:

Grain Commission's Chief Chemist Suggests How It Could Be Done

A carefully-planned system for protein grading No. 1 and No. 2 Northern wheat was presented to western farmers last week by the chief chemist of the board of grain commissioners, Dr. J. Ansel Anderson of Winnipeg. Dr. Anderson introduced his plan at the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan Field Husbandry Association at Saskatoon. He described it as a "proposal" for grading wheat according to protein content and added that, in his opinion, protein grading in Canada was "strictly inevitable."

He went on to point out how this could be handled, and stated also that there was a higher market value for the product with the greater protein content. As I have said, this whole system unduly penalizes the man who produces a top-grade product, and that is a matter of some importance to the people of this country.

Referring again to the difficulties connected with the marketing of this year's crop, I would point out that I have never known such a variation in the prices of top grades. These have been totally unwarranted and most unfair. I do not wish to take the time of the house to read this long article, but hon. members who are interested will find it set out in the Grain Growers Guide and also in the Western Producer. It is of some importance and worth reading.

May I add further that there is wide variation in the protein content in different districts. In this connection the evidence of Dr. Geddes is to be found at page 115 of the report of the Turgeon grain commission, and it indicates that the protein content may vary from 8 to 20 per cent. This is a wide variation, indeed. I believe it will be recognized by all that in the past fifteen or twenty years research has developed highly improved types of cereals. Great strides have been made in Canada for the benefit of the producers and for all other people in the nation.

I believe that this government should appoint a royal grain inquiry commission to investigate the grading, marketing and transportation of grain both in Canada and abroad. That is most essential in the interest of both the producers and the people of this country. The Sirois commission report points out that during the difficult 1930's, about which we have heard so much in this house, the production, storage, transportation and financing of wheat in Canada played a great part in supporting our economic system. I do not think there is any argument about that right across the nation.

Last year one-third of the value of Canadian exports was made up of agricultural products, and a great part of that was grain. That is most important to all parts of this country, and it is vitally important to the livelihood of those engaged either in production or in business generally throughout the three prairie provinces.

There exists today great discrimination in our income tax law which reflects upon the farmers of this country. I urge the government to permit capital depreciation for farmers on the same basis as that allowed to industry. I cannot understand why they are not allowed to operate on the same basis. During 1950 the farmers of Canada suffered a loss of over twelve per cent on income as compared with the previous year while the cost of everything entering into production was greatly increased and is yet increasing. During the same year of 1950 the cost-of-living index increased 11·5 points and is now at an all time high of 172·5.

In conclusion I urge the government, first, to eliminate the extravagant and wasteful expenditure of the taxpayers' money. There is so much of that today. This has been pointed out during the last two sessions of this house and I think that, at a time like this when we are to have increased expenditures, all possible waste should be eliminated.

Second, I urge the government to recognize their responsibility with respect to the five-year wheat pool 1945-50 and announce a final settlement to producers of 25 cents per bushel.

Third, I urge the government to appoint a royal grain inquiry commission to investigate the grading, marketing, transportation and storage of grain.

Fourth, I urge that in connection with income tax capital cost allowances for farmers shall be on the same basis as is allowed to industry.

I will support the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), which reads:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed
> (1) to give this nation leadership in the face of the present grave danger; and
> (2) to bring into being forces necessary to enable Canada to defend itself and discharge its international obligations; and
> (3) to take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living.

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, although the house has been in session for only one week quite a number of topics have been discussed and before our deliberations have been completed some time in the summer I expect that a greater number will have been dealt with. I was not happy coming to Ottawa to attend this session and I have found that same opinion expressed by many other hon. members. They feel that many important matters will have to be decided without the necessary information having been given to the members. I am fully aware that it is not possible to give us all the information, but it places those of us who have responsibilities to our constituents in a rather tough position when we have to make decisions without having all the necessary information.

As usual, the speech from the throne does not give us much detail of the matters to be brought before us although it does indicate that a number of important measures will be brought down during the session. Apparently most of our troubles are caused by the international situation and I think it is agreed by all hon. members that communism has a lot to do with the terrible international situation that exists today. Because I have not been privileged to get much of the information which has been given to other hon. members, particularly those who have been attending the sessions of the United Nations, I do not intend to discuss that matter. I shall leave it to those members of my group who have attended the sessions in New York.

I believe that one of the best things we can do to combat the disease of communism is to place our own house in order and keep it that way. While we have a democratic form of government there are still a number of iniquitous conditions existing in the country. The first thing we should do is to straighten out those injustices and give everybody a chance to live. Government policy as announced recently indicates that it is expected to bring 150,000 immigrants into the country during the present year. It would be good business on the part of the government to see that those immigrants are carefully screened and to see that no more of that disease which apparently is prevalent in our country is brought in by these people. In the case of those already here who are suffering from the communist disease I suggest that action be taken to cure their disease.

In connection with preparedness, which is causing some little concern throughout the country, many requests have been made by various branches of the Canadian Legion as well as by the dominion command to have something done. I believe most hon. members will support those requests. In fact, I think some of us would like to deal with other matters not mentioned in the requests made by the Canadian Legion.

I have particular reference to our financial set-up as it exists today. To a great extent our financial set-up is the lifeblood of our commerce and I submit that that is the first thing that should be effectively controlled and used by the government.

Yesterday afternoon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) made an announcement that a national advisory council on manpower would be set up. That is a move in the right direction. Last night the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) made a statement in connection with defence. He told us what is to be done by the three branches of the service and also that the program would involve an expenditure of $5,000 million. That program looks good on paper, but many of us would like it better if the program were actually in operation. If the other fellow who has been preparing ever since the end of the second great war has time to play his part then I am sure it will be too late for us to get out and do things that should have been done before now. I am firmly convinced that only when the great masses of the people of Canada understand the basis of our prosperity and freedom, and understand and accept the fundamental truths in which we believe, will we have a secure foundation for peace, unity and prosperity. That statement applies to external affairs and particularly to conditions within our country.

As to the cost of living. Before coming to Ottawa for this session more people asked me about it than any other question. I am not at all surprised because I am quite well aware of the hardships being endured by many of our people. The physically incapacitated were having a tough time even before the cost of living rose to where it is today. Then there are the old age pensioners for whom the dominion government has provided 75 per cent of a basic pension of $40 per month. In my own province, and some others, certain other benefits are being provided. In Alberta we are providing an additional $10 per month without any means test as well as the services of all licensed practitioners within the province, and hospital care. It is estimated that this amounts to approximately $3.50 per pensioner per month. I believe Alberta is taking the lead over all other provinces in that regard.

There is another group of people between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine for whom something must be done in the very near future. The dominion civil service, and I believe the civil services of all the provinces, are compelling civil servants to retire when they reach the age of sixty-five. Many people working for the different governments are not in a position to draw superannuation. That means that just as soon as they reach the age of sixty-five they are thrown out in the gutter, and it is a case of "root hog or die". The health of many of these people has been broken down by work and the suffering to which they have been subjected in getting along so far in life.

On the question of old age pensions I have a quotation which may be fitting at this time. Hon. members should not be compelled to quote such things but I believe it fits the situation quite well. It reads:

> In heathen tribes, where skulls were thick, did primal passions rage,
> They had a system sure and quick, to cure the blight of age,
> If one's native youth had fled, and time had sapped his vim,
> They simply popped him on the head, and that was the last of him.
> But in this, our enlightened age, we're made of finer stuff,
> And so we look with righteous rage on methods so crude and tough,
> So when our man grows old and gray, and bent and short of breath,
> We simply take his job away, and let him starve to death.

It has been suggested that is Liberal policy, and I do not think any Liberal will try to get away from it because ever since I came here some 15 years ago we have tried to have something more suitable done for the old age pensioners. On one occasion a few years ago the question of increased pensions for the aged was under discussion, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) said that the pension was never intended to take full care of our old people. With many of them without any financial resources I wonder how he expected them to provide for that part of the cost of their living not covered by the pension.

[Mr. Fair.]

In addition to the old age pensioners and prospective old age pensioners, there are a number of others receiving small amounts by way of superannuation or pension as well as a number of people who are in the low income brackets. For instance, many of our store clerks start to work for as low as $14 per week. I think hon. members will have quite a difficult mathematical problem to solve if they try to figure out how such people are going to buy their food and clothing, pay room rent and so on. These matters should be dealt with.

Here in Ottawa, as in all other parts of the country, we have our civil servants. Many of them are still receiving low salaries. Many of them are married men or married women with families. How are they expected to carry on? Many people believe that the farmer is to blame. I want to deny that with all the power at my command. In the November-December issue of the Labour Review there is an article at page 247 by Mr. Zénon David, president of the Canadian Federation of Labour. At the bottom of the second column he has this to say:

> The government is in the grain business, the government is in rent control, the government is in marketing control. The government is in the gasoline business, and today, in some provinces, the tax is as high as half the price of the gas. The worker goes to buy honey; there is a support price. He tries to buy butter; there is a support price. The cost of living is up because of the subsidies, or support prices.

I want to deny that because it is not correct. If this gentleman would take the trouble to ascertain the facts I think he would realize that butter and honey have not cost the government anything for the past number of years. It is true there are support prices for those commodities but the advantages other occupational groups enjoy by way of tariffs and other devices are much greater than those enjoyed by agriculture. Continuing he says:

> This is to keep the farmers happy. Maybe these things do. But everybody has to pay for these subsidies, including the farmers themselves, who seem to like robbing Peter to pay Paul.

In this morning's Citizen there is a report of an address by Mr. McMillan of Huntingdon, Quebec, to the Rotary club meeting at the Chateau Laurier yesterday. Mr. McMillan is the president of the dairy farmers of Canada. He is reported as saying:

> Since 1939 many of the things that enter into the cost of living index have increased one to two hundred per cent and yet there is less outcry against these. Wages for an hour's labour will buy more milk today than ever it did before.

The article continues:

> Declaring that milk production per capita in 1950 was 20 per cent less than in 1942, Mr. McMillan told his hearers, "In an area not far from Ottawa a government survey has shown that the average producer faced a loss of $174 on his milk production after allowing him only 50 cents per hour for his labour."

What other occupational group today is working for 50 cents per hour? When a person works on a dairy farm, believe me he is not playing around as many of our workers are today and by so doing causing the price of our goods to rise and thus the cost of living. In many cities across Canada there has been an increase in the price of bread. I have an article here showing that out of a 13 cent loaf of bread the farmer's average share in 1949 was only 2·3 cents, or 17·9 per cent of the retail price. Taking the average of 1935 to 1949, the farmer's share of the retail price of certain commodities was as follows:

	Per cent
Potatoes	57·3
Eggs	73·7
Fluid milk	43·4
Creamery butter	68·9
Cheese	31·2
Beef	60·3
Wheat flour	36·0
Canned tomatoes	17·0

I believe anyone looking at these figures will readily realize that someone between the farmer and the ultimate consumer is getting the rake-off, and I hope to have a little more to say about that before I conclude. To show that conditions are exactly the same across the line we have a statement by Mr. John W. Sims, general manager of the Farm Bureau Co-operative Association of Columbus, Ohio, who states that in 1950, out of an average 14½ cent loaf of bread, the farmers received only 2.4 cents, while the year before they had received 3 cents from the average 13 cent loaf. At the present time producers are getting only 47 cents out of the consumer's dollar, whereas a year ago they were collecting 55 cents.

According to the Edmonton Bulletin of January 5, only a month ago, during November the nation-wide cost of living index rose by .4 to a new high of 171.1. The statistics agency said that the Canadian cost of living rose a total of 10 points during the first eleven months of 1950, and that it had climbed by 69.7 per cent since August, 1939. That did not take into account a statement published on January 4 in the same newspaper that the price of eggs had dropped by 18 cents per dozen. That was not mentioned by our friend Mr. David. Then, before we had time to more than turn around, in the Ottawa Citizen of February 2 we were told that living costs had zipped yet higher, and that during the month of December living costs had increased by another 1.4 points to an all-time high of 172.5. Prices were higher for meat, butter, vegetables, fruits, men's wear, furniture, blankets, carpets, telephone rates, laundry, coal, health care and barbers' fees. Before I leave that matter, I believe there should be some adjustment in those fees. As we look around this house and many other places we find that a number of the clients of the barber shops have only a little fringe left to clip, but still have to pay the rate of 75 cents. I believe there should be an excess profits tax in those cases. The article goes on to say that there were also increases in the prices of gasoline, streetcar fares and newspapers. The general trend today seems to be to boost prices. It would almost seem that some high officials here in Ottawa have said, "We are going to have a freeze on prices one of these days. The sooner you get your prices up, the better able you will be to take advantage of that increase."

As far as farm living costs are concerned, I have an article from the wheat pool Budget of October 13 last, which states that since 1939 farm living costs have increased by 77 per cent, farm wage rates by 245 per cent, farm machinery by 60 per cent, binder twine by 227 per cent, gasoline and oil by 51 per cent, fertilizer by 46.7 per cent, equipment and materials by 100 per cent, building materials by 128 per cent, and hardware by 65 per cent. The index for farm living costs as at August, 1950, was 180.7, while urban living costs were 168.5. Farm equipment and materials stood at 194.3 and farm labour at 215.7. I had intended to deal further with this matter, but since time is slipping by I shall let it go for now and perhaps deal with it a little later on.

In my opinion high labour costs, exorbitant dominion government taxation and excessive mark-ups are mainly responsible for our high cost of living today, and until these things are remedied we will have to put up with what we have suffered in the past. Most people, including myself, resent price and wage control in peacetime, but present conditions demand that action be taken if our people in the lower income brackets are to survive. And as I have already indicated, a freeze of prices at today's levels will not entirely overcome the difficulty. We find that in the United States they froze prices but a few days later commenced to fix certain margins for the different people who handle goods all down the line, and I believe something like that will have to be done if we are to overcome the problem in this country.

In the speech from the throne we are told that we will be asked to approve substantially increased expenditures for defence. That means, of course, that we shall also be asked to approve higher taxation. In my opinion, under no circumstances should the present income tax exemptions be lowered, or the levy increased on those in the low income brackets. That, I believe, can readily be understood by anyone doing even a little thinking. People must eat and they must have a place to live. In that connection I say the present inequitable rental levels should be investigated. Some places are being rented for perhaps less than they are worth today; some are being rented at depression levels, but many others are being rented for twice what they are worth. Those things should be looked into and levelled off.

During the last war taxation caused a great deal of absenteeism, and since the war many of our farmers have been easing up on production. During the war the farmers worked all the hours they could in order to produce food for Canadians and send some overseas to our allies. They entered the fighting forces; they sent men and women into the factories, and at the same time paid their full share of the war costs. Then the income tax branch sent their police into the field, and many of our farmers are not yet back to normal after the grilling they were given. By that method the government collected hundreds of thousands of dollars from farmers which in my estimation they never should have been asked to pay. The men sent into the field were bookkeepers, trained in that work. In most cases farmers are not bookkeepers. Rather than go to court and assume expenses they were unable to pay, many of them went to the bank and borrowed the money with which to pay the amounts they were charged.

An example of the lowering of production can be found in the case of hogs in my own province. Last year our hog marketings amounted to less than one million head, whereas during the peak years we marketed more than three million head. We are all aware, also, that we did not even begin to fill our contract with Britain last year for 70,000,000 pounds of bacon. So I believe the government will have to reconsider its high taxation policy if we are to get the production we expect will soon be necessary in this country.

Last year in my part of the country we had one of the toughest crop years in history, to begin with. There was no subsoil moisture in the spring, and for a couple of months there was not even a shower of rain in many districts. In June we did have some showers, and the crop made an almost miraculous recovery. As a result, by the middle of July the farmers felt they were going to reap one of the biggest crops they had harvested for many years. Then they went to bed one night; when they woke up in the morning they found their crops had been frozen. Such are the fortunes of the farmers in the prairie provinces. That did not occur only on one night. We had three successive frosts within ten days. By the time the frost had completed its job, the farmers found their yield cut by several bushels per acre, possibly by 25 per cent or 30 per cent, and the grade cut down from what normally would be No. 1 northern or No. 2 northern to No. 5, No. 6 or feed in many cases. That is the condition. I might say that while the initial price of No. 1 wheat was set at $1.40 per bushel, the initial price of feed was only $1 per bushel, netting the farmers in my part of the country 82 cents at the elevator. That will give the people some idea of the things that our wheat growers and the farmers in general are up against.

Then they were just beginning to get accustomed to the frost conditions, many of them adjusting their anticipated returns in order to pay off a little bit here and there. They had just barely started harvesting when, on September 25, we had a break in the weather, after one week of decent harvesting weather; and since that time there has not been one day that was fit for either harvesting or threshing. In my part of the country we have at least 50 per cent of the crop lying under the snow today, either in the stook, in the swath or, in many cases, not even touched. People have commenced to use the combine there, and the conditions that I have described have made an extremely tough year for our farmers.

I had intended to deal at some length with the initial payment on last year's crop. When this cut was made from $1.75 down to $1.40, I felt that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had made quite a mistake. We tried here on one occasion to have that initial payment increased to $1.75; but with the help of its supporters the government was able to turn back our attempt. Perhaps they will not be quite so well satisfied now when they find that in spite of their judgment, and in spite of the government's judgment, the Minister of Trade and Commerce recently announced an interim payment of 20 cents a bushel on wheat, 10 cents a bushel on oats and 20 cents a bushel on barley. That interim payment will help to some extent. But in spite of the fact that the cost of living and the cost of practically everything we buy is going up, we find that the international wheat agreement, which is in effect for another two-year period, helps to reduce our farmers' returns. We are compelled to take a decreasing price for our wheat; and if the people who have contracted to buy our wheat do not feel like taking it, the agreement is only a gentleman's agreement anyway, and they can go elsewhere—to Russia, Argentina or somewhere else—and buy their supplies of wheat.

The interim payment that I spoke of a moment ago will be quite a help to those farmers who were able to thresh and to deliver some of their grain. But for those who have not been able to thresh or combine grain and deliver it, there is little comfort in that payment. It leaves those people who did not have any grain threshed badly in need of the final payment on the five-year pool, 1945 to 1949, both years inclusive.

Many people still seem at a loss to understand why the farmers claim some compensation under that agreement. It must be readily understood that out of the 1946 crop, according to an agreement made between the Canadian government and the British government, Canada was to supply to Britain 160 million bushels of wheat at a price of $1.55. During that crop year the wheat board—for which I have the highest regard and which I shall support as long as I am here, knowing the difficulties and the losses that the grain exchange got us into in the past—was able to sell grain to countries other than Britain, for which they received $2.43 per bushel, which made a net loss of 88 cents a bushel on wheat that was sent to Britain. That means that any farmer who delivered 1,000 bushels for delivery to Britain had an immediate loss of $880. If he delivered 2,000 bushels, his loss directly on account of the agreement was $1,760. If he delivered 3,000 bushels, as many farmers did, he accepted a loss of $2,640.

In the next year we were again expected to deliver and did deliver 160 million bushels at $1.55 a bushel, according to the agreement. That year the wheat board sold class II wheat again to countries other than Britain, at an average price of $2.88 per bushel; so that the farmers again had to suffer a loss of $1.33 per bushel. To bring this situation nearer home, it means that the farmer who delivered 1,000 bushels for delivery to Britain suffered a loss of $1,330 right off the bat. If he delivered 2,000 bushels, his loss was $2,660; and if he delivered 3,000 bushels —and many of them delivered far more than that—his loss was $3,990. Yet many people ask us why the farmers are coming to the government begging for some more money. Mr. Speaker, I do not want anyone in this house or in Canada to feel that the farmers have ever begged the government for anything. But if by various methods they had not been robbed—and I use the word "robbed" advisedly—of the things they produced in this country, they would not be in the financial position in which they find themselves today in many parts of the country.

In 1948 we had agreed to deliver 140 million bushels, and the same in 1949, at a price of $2 per bushel. In 1948 the price for class II wheat was $2.23 a bushel. I am not able to give any figures in connection with the 1949 crop because those figures were not available the last time I asked for them, but I hope to get them in the near future. In addition to that, while by government contract we subsidized the people of Britain, we also subsidized the people of Canada in order that they could eat cheap bread for several years past. The loss sustained on that account and the loss sustained under the British wheat agreement in my opinion runs up fairly close to $600 million.

In speaking to the Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates in Regina a couple of months ago, the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that it would cost $14 million to pay one cent a bushel on the wheat during the five-year period. That is quite a good deal of money. But he did not say that payment of that amount would be borne by all of the people of Canada. He also neglected to point out the loss that the few thousand wheat growers in the prairie provinces will have to suffer as the result of that subsidizing of the British people and of the Canadian people.

Apparently the government is still negotiating with Britain. Earlier this afternoon the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) mentioned questions that I had asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce, questions that the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) had asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce and questions that he himself had asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); but with respect to which we were unable to get any particular information. In my opinion we should not, under the terms of the agreement, have asked Britain to pay a great deal. As for myself and those with whom I am associated here in the house, we believe that the job of making up those losses belongs to the people of Canada. At the time the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking to the Saskatchewan wheat pool delegates, or during that week anyway, a Liberal convention was held in Saskatoon, another city in Saskatchewan. At that time the leader of the Liberal party in that province, Mr. Walter Tucker, who was at one time the member for Rosthern, suggested to the convention that negotiations be reopened with Britain with respect to the "have regard" clause; and later in the convention a resolution was passed demanding that, and saying that if Britain did not make good, then the responsibility fell upon the Canadian government. Therefore I feel that we are in the company of at least the Saskatchewan Liberals in demanding the repayment of the losses that we are pleading for here today.

At our convention held in Regina on October 18, 19 and 20—the convention of the Social Credit Association of Canada—a resolution was passed demanding that every dollar of this loss be made good out of the Canadian consolidated revenue fund.

I have read in the papers about the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), either or both of them, addressing delegates to the Alberta wheat pool convention in Calgary, the farmers' union of Alberta in Calgary, and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture also in Calgary; but in every instance not much information was given. Before I leave this perhaps I had better state that I believe our farm leaders—I do not like to use this language—were just a little bit easy in dealing with this whole question of making up the losses. This is a business proposition, and the welfare, in fact the security, of a lot of the farmers in the prairie provinces is dependent upon the payments that will be made in this instance.

Facts that are not frankly faced have a habit of stabbing us in the back. That may possibly be worth thinking over. Conditions at the present time would indicate that in the very near future farmers may again be called upon to supply sons to fight Canada's battles on the battlefields of the world. They may also be called upon to supply sons and daughters to work in our munitions factories; they may be called upon to supply daughters to enlist in the three services, as was done in the last war. We may be asked to produce more and more food for ourselves and for our allies overseas. The conditions that have existed in agriculture up to the present time have been responsible for driving, and otherwise getting, 84,000 of our farm workers into the industrial centres during the past year. Perhaps this is worth thinking over also, because we should not have such a condition as that in agriculture in this country at the present time.

In connection with this final settlement on wheat in the 1945-49 wheat board pool, unless the farmers are treated properly they will not be so ready to respond to the government's request as they did in the last war. I am not suggesting that the farmers are going to do that, but do not forget that the farmers have a conscience. They demand a proper share of the production for which they are responsible in this country. Only during the years from 1915 to 1919 have the farmers ever received a proper share of the national income.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I feel that in entering this debate there are certain aspects of our defence situation which possibly have not been touched upon previously and that at the present time are not thoroughly understood by the Canadian people from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

For a long time during the second world war different Canadians had occasion to say: "Well, it can't happen here." Consequently when today they are pondering in their minds the rather staggering figures that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) presented to this house in such an able manner last evening, they may be wondering just why this great expenditure of the taxpayers' money.

As I rise to take part in this debate I have two ideas in mind, one dealing with the question: "It can't happen here," and the other with the economics of our defence-spending program. It is quite easy for a great number of people to understand what happens to their pocketbooks when taxation becomes heavy. That is a more understandable proposition with the great mass of Canadians than to say that our expenditure for, say, the construction of a certain type of aeroplane is $400,000; because to many of those within the range of my voice that is an astronomical figure.

Before I go further with the points that I have outlined I should like to say how pleased I was that the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) was batting substantially on our side yesterday.

I should also like to pay my respects to the remarks made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) who, as hon. members know, has a most distinguished war record. He was a colonel when I was a rear rank buck private in the first world war. At that time my highest ambition would have been reached if I could have attained half the number of medals that General Pearkes had. If I could have obtained them I would have been satisfied, but I never obtained any of them. I trust I may be excused, sir, if I refer specifically to his remarks about the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry. I might also be pardoned if I make this statement: I was one of five brothers who served all during the first world war. One of them was more or less a poet. He was then living in the United States of America, which at that time had not entered the war. He composed a little poem, of which I shall quote only one verse. I do so, sir, not only in honour of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, but in honour of all our armed services who were serving and have served in all parts of the world.

That little verse went something like this:

Tell me, Canucks, who are these Pats?
Who are these boys in the broad-brimmed hats?
Who are these soldier lads off to the front
Eager to bear and share in the brunt?
Quick to respond to Canada's call
Smarting to fight and ready to fall?
Why, those are the boys of the regiment that Is Canada's glory—the Princess Pats.

My reference a few minutes ago to the statement, "It can't happen here" was prompted by a document I have before me which, with the permission of the house, I should like to place on record. It is an exact copy of the Hitlerian edict that eliminated the independent non-state church in Germany in 1933.

Dictators, whether of today, fifty years ago or a thousand years ago, are ostensibly one and the same thing. A definition, the author of which I cannot name, states that a dictator is any man who claims to have power over the conscience of man and, having that power, if he could, would usurp the kingdom of God. We have today in the world the type of individual we had in the years immediately preceding and subsequent to the termination of the second world war.

It is because of this fact that I wish to place this document on record, so that it may give an insight, in the minds of those who hear and read, to the fact that what happened in 1933 with respect to Christian tenets of faith in Germany can happen here, provided we are not prepared to spend our dollars in defence of our freedom and our belief in the Christian faith.

This document is in these words:

The Program of the National Church (Reichskirche) of Germany

1. The national church (Reichskirche) of Germany claims with all clearness the exclusive right and the exclusive power on all churches within the boundaries of the German empire. These churches will be nominated "national churches of the German Reich."

2. The German people is not supposed to serve the national church of the German Reich, the national church of the German Reich has to serve exclusively and solely to one doctrine "people and race."

3. The territory for working and activity of the national church of the German Reich will be marked by the territorial empire and colonial frontiers of Germany.

4. The national church of the German Reich will not force any German individual, to join, she is, however, willing to do everything within her might, to get hold even of the last German soul. Other churches or similar institutions and associations may and will not be tolerated in Germany, especially if they are internationally bound or directed.

5. The national church of the German Reich has decided to eradicate unalterably and with all necessary means the Christian faith, which was imported in the disastrous year 800 into Germany, which was pressed on the German people, although it was against its nature and not identical to its character.

6. There will be not allowed any fundamental changement in the construction of the existing church buildings because they represent German national property, German culture and a part of the historical growing of our German people. They will not only have the value of the German national property, but they also must be preserved.

7. In the national church of the German Reich there will be no scribers, ministers, chaplains and clergymen, but only public speakers of the national church of the German Reich.

8. The celebrations of the national church of the German Reich will take place at night and not in the morning, that is to say on Saturdays, at splendid illumination.

9. In the national church of the German Reich men and women, boys and girls will acknowledge unanimous God and His immortal works.

10. The national church of the German Reich insists firmly upon her unfailing fusion with the state. She has to subordinate herself to the state as a serving member.

11. On the strength of this fusion she demands an immediate delivery of all territorial property of all churches and confessions to the state. She interdicts, also, that in future the churches will not be allowed to own the smallest part of the earth, or that such a part will be given to them, for the churches do not conquer, defend and build the German estate and soil, but only the German people: "The State".

12. The national church speakers will never be chosen among those who constantly talk today with malice and tricks in words and writing about the absolute necessity and maintenance of the Christian doctrine in Germany, for they not only deceive themselves but also the German people and only on account of their position and their "sugar bread".

13. The national church speakers will officiate as German state officials after the law and state-officials.

14. The national church of the German Reich demands the immediate stoppage of the printing and publishing of the bible within the boundary of Germany as well as some more publishing of Sunday papers, writing, readings of church-similar character.

15. The national church of the German Reich has to superintend with all severity at that, and she has to take strictest measures that the holy bible and other Christian religious scriptures cannot be imported to Germany.

I believe it is well that the people of Canada should have this authentic record of what dictatorship has done in one of the former great states of the world. That should be some indication to the people of Canada, whether within or without the halls of parliament, that what has happened in Germany can, save by the grace of God, happen to the people of Canada. I am sure, sir, none of us wishes to see that occur in this beautiful land. It has been our good fortune that the Almighty has placed us geographically whereby, in two world holocausts, we have avoided the actual bombings and carnage of war, and have suffered only the loss of our dear ones on the fields of battle.

I believe it was Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, many years ago, in describing the geographical boundaries of Canada, said: "It is bounded on the north by gold; on the west by the east; on the south by friends and on the east by history." Certainly that describes our geographical position. How fortunate we are. Right here I should like to say that I believe earnestly the countenances of our Canadian people should be a great deal more smiling than they are today. So many people that we meet seem to think that we are being hard done by. Our cup is running over and yet we are not satisfied. In this time of world chaotic conditions it would seem to me that we individually and collectively would profit ourselves by the recognition of the fact that we have been favoured under Providence and that a smile on our lips would be a great national emblem for us to bear no matter where we may be, whether at home or abroad. Certainly sugar draws more flies than vinegar. I think we should all practise for ourselves and preach among our neighbours that the happy heart is a treasure to possess and also a treasure with which to associate.

Coming now to the scope of our national program and its economic problems I should like to quote, something which I do not like to do but which I have done quite consistently today, an editorial that appeared in a small British Columbia publication known as the B.C. Financial Times. I do not suppose that many easterners have heard of that publication. In its issue of January it had what to me was a very sound and sensible article with respect to our national defence spending. I should like to quote this as it will take only a matter of five or six minutes. It reads:

> The essence of the economic problem is the release of heavy and sustained government expenditure of an unproductive character on a situation where factors of inflation are already active. This has to be recognized as a continuing state of affairs, though quite unlike the intensive effort of 1940-45 when every normal activity was subordinated to winning the war. Open war may come; but if it can be avoided, these conditions will probably go on for years and we have to decide how we can live with them and survive them most advantageously. It has been well said that one of democracy's difficulties is that the future has no vote, so that the national interest is too easily identified with what the majority of people want here and now. Our problem is that most people are going to want things that cannot be provided in these circumstances.
> Objectives of Policy
> The policy required to meet this situation must embrace two objectives: (1) increased production; and (2) economic stability.

I am happy to say that the government has recognized that fundamental fact.

> These are inseparable. Stability means an underlying balance between spending and supply. Defence supply will certainly get priority. Consequently, civilian supply may or may not be reduced long-term, but civilian demand will be much augmented by transfusion of government expenditure and this will happen at once. Two lines of approach are therefore necessary.

The government is also cognizant of this.

> The first is to continue to increase the production of civilian goods. The second is to channel excess purchasing power out of the market by taxation and saving.
> Inflation is our opponent's secret weapon. It was Lenin who invented the slogan, "Debauch the currency first." Our defence therefore has two fronts. If we ignore the internal front of production and stability, the external front will prove to be another Maginot line.
> At first sight there may seem to be a choice of two methods. One is to impose direct controls over prices and wages, and to allocate resources by government direction. The other is to encourage the vitality of an open economy, relying on its productive power and allowing the price system to do its work properly, protecting it from inflation and distortion by means of the indirect methods of fiscal and monetary control.
> There is really no choice. Comprehensive direct controls would defeat the purpose in the following ways: They would drive the economy into a regime of black markets and administrative paralysis; would destroy public morale and the incentive to produce, and would conceal inflation without preventing it. They would in any event require crushing taxation to be practical at all.
> The method of control, is, of course, necessary in order to allocate scarce materials to direct defence production. Its use in Canada will depend largely on what is done in the United States, in view of our joint supply arrangements with them. But there may be little need of formal apparatus in this country, provided that we succeed in the main object of controlling inflation at the source and can impress the American authorities with the vigour of our determination.
> The second course indicated above spells control in an entirely different sense. It means that we can have a free economy so long as it does not run out of control. More particularly, it means that the government must conduct its budgetary operations in such a way that they add the least amount of fuel to the inflation process and exert a stabilizing influence upon it as far as possible. The indirect method of fiscal and monetary policy is therefore not only the right prescription, but it also offers the only assurance that the alternative of full "controls" can be avoided.

I should like in a word or two to express my opinion of the soundness of that editorial. If I may, I should also like to add my commendation of the government for the sane practical manner in which they have dealt with the present crisis while in some other countries hysteria has run rampant. We have heard a considerable amount of criticism of our reserve forces. I do not think that even the minister would say that he was entirely satisfied with the situation with respect to the reserve forces. We can and must continue to attract a greater number of our men and women throughout the country to the ranks of the reserve army.

There is something more I might add with respect to this matter. No one in this house, no one on the North American continent or in any of the other free countries of the world knows when Uncle Joe may pull the trigger. The best that can be said for all our planning is that we may, by good fortune, be ready with our maximum endeavour at the time that is most emergent. I do not know whether he might pull the trigger in 1952, 1954 or 1956. That is in the lap of the gods. But I do know that, if this twilight cool war should not break into a flaming, open, shooting war, in all probability some time will elapse before the emergency becomes completely and utterly emergent in its fullest sense. Therefore if a period of years should be given to us to strengthen ourselves so that the potential aggressor will be rather shy of putting out his jaw for a haymaker it would seem to me that we could utilize most advantageously Canada's three services, the army, navy and air force, and additional endeavours could be made with respect to the recruitment of cadets in these various services.

As in the first world war, modern war is a young man's game. That is an accepted fact in practically all the countries of the world. When that is realized I think it is correct to assume that any additional enticement that we and the government of Canada may be able to offer for increased enlistment in cadet training will eventually pay off most handsomely for all the people of this country in a dire emergency.

Many of you within the range of my voice knew and loved as I did the old padre of the first world war, Canon Scott. The third time that I was wounded, I remember, Canon Scott came to my bedside on his horse over shell holes for a distance of twelve miles, not particularly to see me but to see three of us who were lying in a dressing station. One was a Protestant, one was a Roman Catholic, and one was a Jew. They were members of my battalion which we jokingly referred to at reunions as the fighting 46th that never took a trench and never lost one.

Since those days Canon Scott has passed to his last reward. I thought I should like to pay my tribute to that great Christian gentleman in ending my dissertation by utilizing a little verse that he wrote. In it he used the word "rest" but I am going to substitute the word "peace". I think this verse is a fine motto for us in these troublesome times and that we should think of the things that are beyond dollars and cents. On that note I wish to conclude by quoting Canon Scott's verse, which is as follows:

> To labour not for place or power,
> Nor wealth which lasts a paltry hour,
> But only that when peace is won,
> A kindly God may say "Well done."

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make my humble contribution to the debate on the address in reply. I should indeed be remiss in my duty if I failed to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address for their excellent speeches, as did others who spoke before me. I am sure their constituents will be proud of their new representatives.

The top question in the speech from the throne is, of course, that of international relations and the position of the various delegates at the United Nations.

The American representatives at the UNO, amongst others, have shown a feverish eagerness. One would think that they have hastened to create conditions which are apt to bring about a general war.

What is their purpose? Did they ever state it clearly? Obviously, like everybody else, they are anxious to fight communism. Why then did they ostracize General Franco for so long?

Why did we not help nationalist China to the end? Why did we, only recently, side with Tito of Yugoslavia, a communist as dangerous as Stalin, to whom we shall have, sooner or later, to make compromising concessions, similar to those from which Stalin benefited at the end of the last war?

The American government undoubtedly wishes to maintain peace and order in the world under the aegis of the United Nations. At the time of the Korean incident, on June 27, 1950, why did the leaders of that country adopt a definite policy, even before the security council had taken a decision, and why did the latter, faced with a fait accompli, simply give its approval and blessing?

Yet in the case of Formosa, for example, the American government does not seem to mind risking widespread warfare, through its uncompromising attitude. In fact, we all know that Washington's assistant delegate to Lake Success asserted, on January 20 last, that the attitude of the United States would be dictated by the needs of their national security.

What explains the stubborn hurry with which American diplomats replied to China's counter-proposals during the past few weeks when the special committee of three, of which our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) was a member, very commendably tried to temporize and to continue discussions in an attempt to find grounds for agreement.

I also believe it my duty to congratulate Canada's representative to the United Nations on the most acceptable and commendable stand he took on that occasion. It would be unfair not to offer the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the tribute of my personal approval of his attitude in inviting India's president to intervene and ask China to clarify her reply.

I have no illusions, knowing full well that by praising or censuring these hon. gentlemen I neither add to nor take away from their personal merit nor from the prestige they enjoy in the world. As an independent member of the house, I am duty bound to adopt such an attitude.

For the moment, it would seem that the intervention of our representatives was not effective, but no one is willing to believe that their devotion and their efforts, especially those of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will remain fruitless. Even if the effect of his plans is not yet generally felt, sooner or later we will realize that our Secretary of State for External Affairs meant well when, particularly the last few months, he sought peaceful settlement of this burning question. However, I am sorry that, by his vote on the American proposal to brand China an aggressor, our representative went back on the splendid work he had done for some months past. I also express the hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will agree to be a member of the new committee now being planned to discuss the situation with the Peking government.

Why then should the United States representatives be so anxious to have China called an aggressor, knowing that this will, in effect, make further negotiation impossible, whatever may be said and whatever the house may think to the contrary, as has been proven in the past few days?

And now, to be logical, our behaviour towards China, an aggressive power, should be the same as our behaviour towards North Korea, also an aggressive power. Otherwise it will be thought that the United Nations' attitude towards smaller countries is not the same as towards great powers. It is easy to see the impossible situation into which we have been thrust by the warlike ardour of our neighbours. Their intentions may be pure, but they want to drag us along with them, in good fortune or ill.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, while she plays an important part in world affairs England is not prepared to rush matters. She evidently wants to protect her interests, her assets and her crown colonies in Asia.

Indeed her history shows that England has no friends; she has only interests. She knows, however, that she must look after them herself and trust to no one to do it for her. Be that as it may, what has been the result of this policy? England continues to avoid war and, to that end, strives to prevent interventions in Asia.

Besides, except for the great influence exerted by Washington on the decisions taken at the United Nations, it must necessarily be admitted that the large majority of countries want no part in an adventure that may lead to a general war.

Forces were sent to save Korea, and now we know how many unforgiveable blunders were made in this adventure on behalf of free nations. Shall we conitnue risking a war with China, a country that the United States will never be able to conquer or subdue? What Japan could not do within range of its cannons, western nations cannot do from thousands of miles away.

Moreover it must not be forgotten that under the present circumstances communism in China is perhaps but the manifestation of her nationalism, and that in order to get that country out of Moscow's orbit, shelling with butter would be much more effective than with guns.

China is now a communist country, not on principle or from conviction, but rather on grounds of expediency, out of necessity, because she cannot live otherwise. Let us give her a chance to recover, to rehabilitate herself, to find her lost freedom. Let us grant her a seat at the United Nations and we may have the great satisfaction of witnessing a change of attitude on her part. She will not become an ally of the western nations. On the contrary, she will no longer be the unwilling ally of Russian imperialism. She will be once again a nationalist and traditionalist country. What could be better for peace in Asia and in the world than the materializing of such a possibility?

The policy followed by the United Nations, and especially Washington, is leading to a world war by the reaction it draws from the Russians who, obviously, in their own interest, help communist China. One would even think that war is being prepared.

The monstrous war budget of $87 billion introduced by the American government and Canada's defence plan calling for an expenditure of $5 billion lead us strongly to believe that a general war is in the offing. These fabulous expenditures, I will be told, are designed to prevent war. As was done last September, the old saying si vis pacem, para bellum, if you want peace, prepare for war, will be invoked. But history proves this saying to be false; conquerors have always used it as a sham to hide their infamous designs for conquest. History is repeating itself once more. Besides, we all know that this saying was coined by these same people, these same imperialists who preached a preventive war of conquest with these words: delenda est Carthago, Carthage must be destroyed.

The Roman empire then wanted, in the name of peace, to cross the Mediterranean and destroy the very foundations of the African empire. Today the American empire is picking up the torch from the failing hands of the British empire and wants to cross not only the Mediterranean but the seven seas and use guns, tanks and flame throwers to make the Asiatic people benefit from the blessings of peace. And they want to drag Canada into the venture: we are already taking part in the undertaking as members of the Atlantic pact organization that has been set up.

We are asked to defend Europe or to defend ourselves in Europe. The speech from the throne suggests—and this was confirmed Monday by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton)—that the house will be called upon to vote billions of dollars for war or defence preparations.

In addition, Canada is being asked to send troops to the eventual battlefield of Europe. What shall we do in Canada? How shall we defend ourselves? Who will defend us and with what weapons?

We are told that the European continent is, at present, hard to defend against a mass Russian attack. In the event of such an attack and of the possible fall of Europe, the American continent would become vulnerable. That, in my humble opinion, means that we should get ready to defend our own country. We should keep in Canada all the men available. We should also use the millions and the billions of dollars that will be voted by this house to organize our own protection.

I am neither a military man nor a tactician; when the first world war was declared, I was too young to take part in it and when the last one ended, I was no longer young enough to serve. I shall however be allowed to form a personal opinion, especially since I compel no one to concur in it. I do not share the view of those who claim we can defend Europe any more than I agree with those who would have us believe Canada can eventually be invaded, even if I admit that she can be attacked.

However, to save our country from such a disaster we must keep in this country the forces at our disposal and which we would need in case of attack, instead of sending them to Europe, where they probably would be destroyed without any tangible result. For, in the final analysis, results are what count.

In 1939, we fought a war to save Poland and thus keep a promise made to one of our allies. What were the results of our intervention? We have won the war, yet Poland is now subject to the worst kind of slavery she has ever known throughout the whole of her extremely tragic history.

We know now what our intervention in foreign wars can lead to. Already, from various districts across Canada come suggestions, urgent appeals for the conscription of our manpower for compulsory military service. This concerted pressure will go on increasing and well do we know what happened in the past under similar conditions: the government, whether Conservative or Liberal, finally yielded.

We will send to Europe or to Asia as many men as we will be able to recruit. When at last our country finds itself face to face with imminent danger—which heaven forbid—we will be told that conscription is necessary since we lack soldiers for our own defence.

Let us keep the soldiers at home that we can raise through voluntary enlistment. Let us not send them abroad to die probably in vain. And, after that, if the danger should grow greater and more pressing, so that we would need more men for our own defence, there is not a single man worthy of the name—and that would include the humble representative from the constituency of Beauce—who would refuse to serve or to lay down his life in defence of his country!

The speech from the throne announces our continued participation in the Colombo plan for aid to underdeveloped countries. That is a very laudable plan which should not provoke too much discussion, as far as the principle is concerned, at any rate. For my part, I am entirely in favour of it.

If we are to fight communism, and I think we must fight it, I know of no better way of doing it successfully. Let us raise the standards of living in underdeveloped countries and their citizens will be much more inclined to shun communistic theories than if we resorted to bombing.

However, it should be borne in mind that, according to the gospel, "Man shall not live by bread alone." We should do our best to develop learning, education and religion among those peoples, all of them being free to improve their standards according to and along the lines of their national aspirations. Let us not try to change them into occidentals, because it would be useless; besides we would thus encourage their present tendency to turn towards Russia, which could be easily understood as a natural move of caution on their part. And above all, let us not make the colossal blunder of providing these populations with arms and munitions that they might very well turn against us.

Besides, those nations should be deeply impressed with the fact that western civilization is based more on fundamental principles and truths to liberate the mind than on weapons to enslave the body. Briefly, let us strive to make them love constructive peace rather than destructive war.

For some weeks past, I have endeavoured to poll the opinion of the constituents of Beauce with respect to the Canadian military budget.

I am convinced that the great majority of them have been startled by the announcement of a $5 billion budget.

I trust that in the future the supporters of an all-out effort will be satisfied and that a certain Montreal newspaper will stop showing the Minister of National Defence with a wooden sword and a straw cap.

[Mr. Poulin.]

On February 1, the leader of the official opposition moved an amendment to the speech from the throne. I cannot accept paragraphs 1 and 2 because, in my humble opinion, they are couched in terms too vague. Had it not been for the last paragraph, I would certainly have voted against the amendment. However, that last paragraph warrants my full and spontaneous support. It reads as follows:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living.

Mr. Speaker, when one thinks of the high cost of living, when one notices that the rise in the cost of living is proportionately much higher for the poor man than for the rich, because of the very fact that it affects consumer goods that the poor cannot do without, such as food and clothing, let us also stop and think that the government may be planning to bring in controls that would freeze prices at their present level while salaries, which have not increased at the same rate, will also be frozen at a relatively low level. In view of all these considerations, I cannot help supporting and voting for the amendment even though the first two paragraphs do not suit me.

The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) recognizes that the government has followed a constructive course in relation to the Korean dispute. I do not share this view and I said so emphatically in the house on September 2 last. With this qualification, however, I shall vote for this subamendment because it censures the government, and with good reason I believe, for having supported a course which is premature and unwise in relation to the resolution branding China as an aggressor.

Before concluding my remarks I wish to add a word about the national flag which Canada, like all self-respecting countries, should have.

On November 17 and 18 last I attended two beautiful ceremonies at St. George and St. Joseph de Beauce in commemoration of the Canadians who gave their lives in the two world wars, among whom were many men from the county of Beauce. At both places the ceremonies were moving and well carried out and I wish to congratulate the organizers.

At one of those places a scene was enacted in which some distinguished veterans of Beauce county mounted guard around the body of a Canadian soldier who had fallen on the field of honour. This Canadian soldier who had died for his country and who was surrounded by some of his compatriots who had generously offered their lives was wrapped up in a shroud which seemed to me like a flag but on which I looked in vain for something recalling the country for which this Canadian had given up his life. For once in my life I admit I was ashamed of my country, for having failed so far to give those who die for their fatherland a shroud which would not be an insult to the greatness of their sacrifice. And all those who were there took advantage of that occasion to request the government of Canada to give its citizens at last a national flag.

(Text):

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my congratulations to the mover of the address to be presented to His Excellency for the speech with which this session was opened. May I thank the hon. member, first, for the reference he made to the Labrador iron ore mines. Like him, I hope that it may not be long before we shall see, as one speaker said last year, "the giant iron ore carriers moving up the St. Lawrence loaded with iron ore from the Labrador ore fields."

Tonight I do not think I should make any apology for drawing the discussion away from the subject that has been followed generally thus far by speakers in the debate. For a few minutes I shall deal with conditions in Newfoundland. So many people have asked me what things are like in Newfoundland that I think I should make some remarks in this connection.

A few days ago we had the pleasure of learning that the board of transport commissioners had given a decision in favour of Newfoundland's case, stating that the freight rates that had been charged since April 1, 1949, had been excessive, and that they had been contrary to the terms of union between the two countries. This decision however was not made retroactive. The effect of it was to make Newfoundlanders think that during almost two years excessive rates had been charged, and that moneys at the rate of $4 million a year had been collected by the Canadian National Railways in excess of what should have been collected. The excess amounted to almost $7 million.

I would suggest to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) that justice requires retribution in such a case. A good opportunity is now open to the minister to make such retribution. I believe he has been in receipt of correspondence from the board of trade in St. John's, Newfoundland, requesting that, in the construction of the ferry now being planned to carry passengers, goods and motor vehicles across the Cabot strait from North Sydney to Port aux Basques, there should be provision for carrying goods by freight cars as was done in connection with the ferry from the mainland to Prince Edward Island.

At the present time I understand there is a wide-gauge track on Prince Edward Island. In Newfoundland we have a narrow-gauge track of three feet six inches, while the mainland gauge is over four feet six inches. In the early days of Prince Edward Island it was the custom to carry the freight cars across on the ferry, lay the freight car with the wide-gauge alongside the freight car with the narrow-gauge, and transfer the goods from one car to the other. Let us see what happens at the present time—and this is one place where the traffic is almost entirely in one direction, with Newfoundland purchasing $100 million worth of goods from the other nine provinces, and the other nine provinces purchasing not more than about $10 million worth from Newfoundland.

The freight goes down in the freight cars to North Sydney. It has to be taken ou of the freight cars and put into sheds. Then it has to be taken out of the sheds and put on steamers so that it can be brought to Port aux Basques. There it is taken out of steamers and put into sheds, following which it is taken out of sheds and put into the freight cars. Would it not be very much better, when the minister is arranging the design of the ferry boat, to have it so that freight cars can be placed on it, travelling across from North Sydney to Port aux Basques, so that when reaching Port aux Basques the goods could be placed directly from the freight cars with the wide gauge to the freight cars with the narrow gauge.

I understand from the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield), who has a great deal of interest in matters of transport, as the minister knows, that this is a practical proposition. I trust the minister may see his way clear to kill two birds with one stone so as to do justice to Newfoundland, following the excessive rates which have been taken from that province in the last twenty months. I believe justice could be done by providing us with a service which will be satisfactory for many years to come. If trade with the other provinces of Canada is to flourish and grow, as I hope it will, he will have to make such provision, or he will be left with a boat he will not know what to do with—because I do not think the trade would grow so fast that he could use two boats at the same time. He is going to invest a certain amount of money in this ferry boat. I believe there has been mention of the sum of $8 million. If that is so, then very careful consideration should be given to the question before a final decision is made.

What are the conditions in Newfoundland at the present time? Apart from our fishing industry we have a pulp and paper industry, with the largest pulp and paper mill in the world, located at Corner Brook. We have another large paper mill at Grand Falls. We have a composite ore mine at Buchan's owned, I believe, by the American Smelting and Mining Company. We have a great iron ore hematite mine at Bell island, in Conception bay. I am very glad to be able to say that, although unfortunately it is on account of war conditions, an extra order for a million tons of ore has been received by the Dominion Steel Company for the export of iron ore from Bell island, which will give much employment in the district represented by my hon. friend from St. John's East (Mr. Higgins). I am very glad that he has that prosperity in his district, and I am sure that my district, too, will benefit to some extent from it. The paper mills are working to capacity. In addition to that, orders have been received from the United Kingdom for the export of large quantities of pulpwood.

In addition to these industries we receive, due to confederation, the benefits of family allowances, old age pensions, and unemployment insurance, and we also have the benefits introduced by the provincial government in the form of mothers' allowances and dependents' allowances on a scale which we did not have before.

But, sir, making due allowance for all these sources of revenue, and for the prosperity that must ensue from the extension of the industries I have mentioned, there still remains the great fishing industry which, for centuries, has been the staple industry of my country. If the fisheries in Newfoundland prosper, then the whole of the country is prosperous. If the fisheries are not prosperous, then the province cannot be said to be prosperous, and people cannot be said to be happy. They become discontented, critical and discouraged.

What has been the experience in the last year? Perhaps hon. members would like tc know. Some may recall that it was necessary for the Canadian government to give a subsidy in respect of the fish left over and not sold from the 1949 catch. The industry started the year 1950 with that quantity of fish on hand, which the government bought. I do not think they bought much, because they did not take what was in the hands of the merchants, and accepted only what was in the hands of the fishermen. I do not think the subsidy came to a great amount of money. But here is what the fisherman had to face after he had reluctantly decided to take part in the 1950 fishing season at the urging of the provincial premier.

In the first place the fisherman had to face a reduction of almost $3.50 per quintal of fish, or from $13.95 down to $10.50, with prices for the lower grades in proportion. That was a drop of over three cents per pound in the price of fish. These prices were paid in September in the early season, but as the season advanced the price began to drop lower, and dropped fast. Some of the merchants did not wish to buy Labrador fish. I do not know whether it was because of the representations made by the provincial government or because we have a Newfoundlander as a member of the government, but the federal government came forward and guaranteed a price of $7 per quintal for the Labrador catch. People were discouraged last year from going to Labrador. Others had sold their vessels, but the total catch was only about 150,000 quintals.

What about the shore fishery, which is the principal part of our fisheries? The catch there amounted to about 800,000 quintals. What was the attitude of the government in reference to that? The government did not give any guarantee but simply said they would keep the matter under review, would keep a close watch on it. But the government has done nothing about it. The fisherman of Newfoundland could not afford to wait for weeks or months until the government made up its mind and so perforce he had to sell his fish at depressed prices.

Not only was the normal price $3.50 a quintal lower, but the fish were culled in such a way by the merchants as to give much lower prices. If a merchant did not want to buy fish he would say it was poor quality and would put it in a lower grade. If a fisherman was sufficiently disgruntled or angry he might persuade the merchant to cull his fish a little higher. I was told by an outport planter that one fisherman had brought thirty quintals of fish to a merchant and these were first culled as being 25 quintals low-grade fish and five quintals of what we call madeira, for which the price was about $10.50 per quintal. He became angry and threatened to take the matter up with the inspectors in St. John's and the merchant changed his mind and made a second cull which turned out at 15 quintals of good quality fish and 15 quintals of lower quality. The fisherman still was not satisfied. He cursed and swore and said he was going to St. John's to get someone to come over to see what was being done. His fish was culled the third time and this time the result was 25 quintals of good fish with only five quintals of lower quality.

This outport planter said to me that he had written to the fisheries board in St. John's, which is the representative of the Department of Fisheries, and asked what they were going to do. He wanted to know if there were three different ways of culling or grading fish. He has not yet received an answer. I fear there are more than three ways of culling fish. A lot depends upon the attitude taken by the merchant.

I have seen many receipts given by merchants for the 1949 and 1950 catches. I know that in 1949 almost all the fish was culled as being high grade and the top price paid was $13.95 per quintal. But in 1950 most of the fish was culled as being of an inferior grade. I have here copies of receipts that were passed over to me by fishermen. One fisherman said to me, "Why is the federal government guaranteeing the price of Labrador fish and not guaranteeing the price of shore fish? Don't you think that the people who fish from the shores of Newfoundland deserve as much consideration as those who fish in Labrador waters? What is the difference between the two?"

I have no complaint to make about the Labrador fishermen receiving a guaranteed price, but what about these shore fishermen? I do not suppose there are many hon. members outside of those who come from Newfoundland who understand the difference between the two types of fishing. Labrador fishing is normally carried on from a vessel and the fishermen are not able to dry the fish so well. It therefore contains more moisture. The shore fisherman is able to dry his fish more carefully and it has a higher value. Generally shore fish are worth from $3 to $5 more per quintal than the Labrador fish.

The guaranteed price for Labrador fish was $7 per quintal and you would therefore expect that the price received by the shore fisherman would be in the neighbourhood of $10 per quintal. What did he receive? As I said a moment ago the fishermen were asking why they did not have a guarantee for their fish. I sat down and wrote to the minister and the minister wrote back saying that he was informed that the price being received by the fishermen ranged between $9 and $10.50 per quintal. He was surprised to hear the figures which I quoted. I have in my hand receipts of the same date that the minister wrote, November 21, and also some of the same date on which I received his letter, November 27. As I say, the minister was quite surprised at the figures I had quoted in my letter, namely, $5.30 and $4 per quintal.

As I said a moment ago, the price which the minister thought was being paid was between $9 and $10.50 per quintal. He had received that information from the St John's fisheries board. I called up the fisheries board and found that that was also their impression. As a result I do not think very much of the fisheries board. I do not think they talk to the fishermen at all; I think they talk only to the merchants. They take what the merchants have set as the price for fish, not what is actually paid. Anyway, that was the information given to the minister by the fisheries board.

I have one receipt here averaging $8.10 which is the highest price paid. That was on September 9, at the beginning of the season. Here is one for September 19 averaging $6.50. Here is one for October 17 for $3.75. Here is one November 27, the date I received the letter from the minister, for $5.90. The average for all this man's fish is $6.20, which is over $3 below the lowest price the minister thought was being paid, and 80 cents below the guaranteed price for Labrador fish.

I have another lot of receipts, one for November 13 and one for November 17, the date on which I wrote to the minister. The receipt for November 13 shows a price of $4.90, and the one for November 17, $5.42. This is an average of $5.16 a quintal or $4 below the price the minister thought the fishermen were receiving. Here is another lot of receipts showing an average price of $5.50 per quintal; here is another lot showing an average price of $5.50. The gentleman who gave me these told me that the same fish would have fetched $13 per quintal in 1949. He said that 448 quintals had been sold by him at an approximate average of $5.50 per quintal. I took this matter very seriously because I wanted to bring the matter up in the house when I came here for it is a matter of the greatest consequence to the fishermen of Newfoundland. I got in touch with some fishermen on whose judgment and opinion I thought I could rely. I talked to several and asked them to give me their candid opinions, and one man in particular wrote. Here are the prices that he gives: $7 for the large madeira, which is the best quality that is being sold this year; $6 50 for the small; $5 for the large West India and $4.50 for the small West India. He said the fish was sold at an average of approximately $6 per quintal, which is $1 per quintal less than the price paid by the government for Labrador fish, and as much as $4.50 less than the price which the minister thought was being paid as the top price for shore fish.

The fishermen were very discouraged and disheartened this year, and they said to me that they were not going to fish next year. They were persuaded to do so this year against their better judgment because they felt if there was not a guarantee given them they would lose money on what they were doing. This one man said to me in his letter:

I might add this price is no good for fish and unless something is done for this year to guarantee at least $9 or $10 per quintal for dried shore fish I do not see that there will be many fishing. For my own part I operate cod traps and unless there is a price set I cannot see how I can go fishing, and this goes for a great many.

I do not want to read any more of the letter. That represents the general opinion. Several fishermen have told me that they have burned their flakes. We have heard the expression "burned their boats". These men have burned their flakes. It amounts to the same thing because it means they have no place where they can dry their fish. There is no industry in Newfoundland which is more important for the prosperity of the country than fishing. That is generally recognized because, while you may have one Bell island, one Buchan's, one Grand Falls and one Corner Brook, where thousands of men are employed, there are in Newfoundland another thousand settlements at least where men are fishing, and only a comparatively small proportion of them are engaged in fishing and selling their fish fresh. The majority of them are dependent on the sale of salt codfish.

You might be interested to know what happened to that fish; and every fisherman in my riding and in Newfoundland generally would like to know what happens to the fish after it has been sold to the merchant. One man came into my office and said he did not know what he was going to do with his fish. He had 80 quintals of fish. He sold it and it netted him $5.30. As we say, it was bought sight unseen. What was the average price of that fish when it was sent to the markets abroad? Our fish goes to Puerto Rico, Jamaica, the Barbados, Spain, Portugal and Italy. I was glad to see that the other day UNICEF, a United Nations organization, bought 500 tons of fish for Yugoslavia and Greece. I should like to know how much they paid for it.

Today I got in touch with the dominion bureau of statistics and found out the average price paid for all fish exported from Canada in October, November and December, and if the averages are fair and just in one particular, they ought to be fair and just in the other. For October the average price was 14·6 cents per pound. For November the average price was 12·7 cents per pound, and for December 16 cents per pound. The best part of our fish goes to Puerto Rico, a larger proportion than to any other foreign market, and the average price in December for fish that went to that country was 15 cents per pound.

A great deal of that fish came from Newfoundland because Newfoundland is the greatest salt codfish exporting province in Canada. In contrast to the 14·6 cents received in October, 3½-7½ cents was paid to the fishermen. In contrast with the 12·7 cents in November, less than 6 cents was paid to the fishermen, and in contrast to the 16 cents in December, on December 8 the average price paid to some fishermen was less than 5 cents a pound when the average export price going through customs, as recorded by the dominion bureau of statistics, was 16 cents a pound.

It needs no great imagination to see that between 5 or 6 or 7 cents a pound and 16 cents a pound there is a great gap. I am sorry the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) is not present. I know he would like to hear what I am saying, and I hope he will find time to read it in Hansard tomorrow. I believe the fishermen have been cheated this year on a wholesale scale and some recompense or rebate ought to be given to the fishermen if the merchants have made the exorbitant profit which the fishermen think, and which I think, they have made on the sale of much of the fish. The fishermen had to sell their fish quickly and when they did so they did it at a great sacrifice. It is not right that the merchants should be able to profit by the great difference between the price which the fishermen received in many cases and which the bureau of statistics shows was received.

In 1929 the maritime provinces were in a great state of depression. The government appointed a commission under the late Judge MacLean, I believe, to go through the Gaspe peninsula and the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to investigate the poverty and the generally bad conditions that prevailed amongst fishermen. As a result a report was brought in and one of the recommendations contained therein was that it was time for fishermen to be organized in co-operative societies. It was recommended that the federal government should appoint an organizer to go down there, carry on educational work and organize the fishermen into co-operative societies. I have a copy of that report and I shall read a few sentences from it to show you what they recommended. They are:

> We recommend, therefore, that the establishment of co-operative organizations of fishermen be assisted by the department as soon as possible, and that an organizer, experienced in co-operative methods, be appointed and paid by the federal government for the required period to initiate and complete this work. A preliminary study and survey of the entire maritime provinces should be made to determine the localities where such organizations are possible or feasible. We do not conceive such an undertaking to be beyond the scope of departmental responsibility or government aid. The fisheries are a basic industry and are reasonably entitled to assistance and encouragement. A similar venture has already been aided for agriculture, in part at least. We are far from suggesting that the government should enter into the business of buying and selling fish products; we merely suggest, rather, that it should help fishermen through their organizations to buy and sell for themselves to better advantage.

Then they go on to say that if they may judge from the success of similar undertakings in Canada, they feel that in a very short time these suggested co-operative undertakings will give good results. That was done; that recommendation was implemented, and the greatest expert on co-operatives on this continent, Right Rev. Dr. Moses Coady of Antigonish, was sent around the maritime provinces to organize the fishermen. As a result of his work the united maritime fishermen's association was established, and is functioning today.

What is to prevent the government doing the same thing in 1951 for Newfoundland? All that is necessary is for the minister to appoint a man to go to Newfoundland and organize the fishermen; and it should be done quickly, before the 1951 season begins. I am sure all the members here from Newfoundland and the maritime provinces will realize that unless the fishermen are organized they are defenceless against the merchants, especially when they come to sell their catch. I trust, therefore, that the minister will give serious consideration to what I have suggested, remembering that, as I have said previously in this house, what counts in the fishing industry is the fisherman. He is the one who must be benefited. If he is not, the system is a failure. If the fisherman is going to be disgruntled and dissatisfied, as he is this year, selling off his equipment, selling his vessels, stuck on the rocks, as they say at home, for the fishing season, then we would have been better off under our own government, because we never would have allowed the fishermen to suffer as they have been suffering for the past year. I saw men with reputations as great fish killers at home on the rocks in Newfoundland, their beautiful vessels lying in the harbour, because they could not get supplies to go fishing. Even then they were not as badly off as those who did go fishing. Many of those who brought in catches had to sell them at depressed prices, as I have attempted to show.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister will consider what the fisherman has to say, and not listen only to the fisheries board, or the salt cod export board, or the Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters Limited. As I say, the first thing to do is send someone down there to organize them, and they could very easily be amalgamated with the fishermen of Nova Scotia. The advantages of co-operation are well known in Newfoundland today, because many of the bankers from the maritime provinces come into the harbour of St. John's and other harbours along the coast and tell the fishermen in Newfoundland what they are being paid for fish in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In almost every case we have found that the price being paid in Nova Scotia is better than the price the Newfoundland fisherman is receiving, and I say that is largely the result of the organization of the fishermen.

Now, sir, for the remainder of my time I propose to deal with the international situation. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) on his excellent speech in seconding the motion for an address in reply. I am sorry that I do not know French well enough to have the courage to address these remarks to him in his own language, but I may tell him I have read his speech with interest and noted his emphasis on the provincial and federal arrangements mentioned in the speech from the throne. I also noted with interest his historical reference to the fact that this year represents the fifteenth centenary of the invasion of the civilized world by the unholy alliance of the Slavs and Mongols. Everyone here acquainted with ancient history knows what destruction the ancient Roman empire suffered when those terrible races overran Italy and Gaul, as the hon. member said; and he pointed out that today the danger is much greater.

Then I should like to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) on his very interesting speech. Whatever we may think of his decisions I believe we agree that the hon. gentleman makes a very interesting speech, not merely one that you delight to listen to at the time it is given but one you can pick up later and enjoy not only the phraseology but the fine distinctions he draws. I was particularly struck with the fine distinctions he made in his speech the other day. I do not believe the ordinary citizen of this country is able to follow those fine distinctions, however; nor do I believe the ordinary citizen of this country is able to follow the complicated debates that have been taking place in the United Nations assembly for the past few months. The ordinary citizen is not able to appreciate the niceties of the thing at all. Therefore he becomes disinterested and a little impatient with what is going on. He can see the broad issues, but I suppose the finer ones must be left to the experts. The ordinary citizen therefore is dependent to a large extent upon those propounders of public opinion, the ministers of the government and the editors of the newspapers.

In listening to the Secretary of State for External Affairs it seemed to me there was a lack of realism about his speech. He said, as is true, that the free world is in the greatest possible danger; and I commend this to my hon. friend who preceded me. If words mean anything, that meant we ought to be almost frightened to death. The free world is in the greatest possible danger; nothing could be greater than the greatest possible danger. How long has that situation existed? How long did it take the members of the United Nations to determine how the conduct of the Chinese should be designated? Let us compare the time it took to determine what name should be applied to the conduct of North Korea. We remember the special session, at which we were presented with a white paper entitled "Canada and the Korean Crisis". Let me direct the attention of the house to page 7 of that publication:

> . . . the United States government informed the secretary general of the United Nations on June 25 that it considered the attack of the North Korean forces on the republic of Korea constituted "a breach of the peace and an act of aggression" and urgently requested the calling of an immediate meeting of the security council, the whole machinery and the first purpose of the United Nations was put to the test.

A meeting was called for that very day; before the day was over North Korea was declared to be an aggressor, and an immediate request went out to the member governments of the United Nations for assistance. Because the United States was the only country on hand with forces to repel this North Korean attack, the government of the United States sent those forces immediately.

On the other hand, how long did it take to decide that China was an aggressor? We were told that this action by the United Nations was something new, something historic, something we should all remember; that a new era was dawning for the world. More than once we were told, by ministers in this house and by people in other countries, that this was police action. Well, having been a magistrate for a number of years I am familiar with what is meant by police action. Let me contrast the ordinary procedure in a police action with what has taken place in regard to Korea and China. If a citizen is assaulted on the street, what does he do? He cries for help; if there is a policeman within a block or two someone will say, "You had better get down there; a man is being attacked," and the policeman gets there as quickly as he can. Or someone telephones the police station and the black maria, as we call it at home, or the police wagon is sent out and if possible the attacker is arrested. In other words the police go into action as quickly as possible. What happened in Korea? The call went out that the South Korean territory was invaded and that the North Koreans had attacked an unprepared and unsuspecting country. The United Nations was the magistrate that was appealed to and that asked for the police to come. The first police to arrive on the scene were the United States forces. Other policemen came up after a while. Through the skilful manoeuvres of the chief of that police force, General MacArthur, the assault was quelled and it looked as if the whole thing was over. However, it was not over. We were wrong.

Suppose that, when the police went to assist an ordinary citizen, the bystanders took a part in the affair; what would happen then? They would be arrested also, and the bystanders who assaulted the police would be liable to a second charge, they would be liable not merely to one charge but to two charges. Whereas the original aggressors or assailants would be charged with assault and battery, the second assailants would be charged with interfering with the police in the performance of their duty and would be liable to another two years' imprisonment in addition to the three years for which they would be liable for assault.

What happened as to the police action in Korea when the bystanders, who were well prepared to attack, came in? With the intervention of the Chinese communist army, did the United Nations immediately take action against them and lay a further charge? No, they did not. But in my humble opinion, and I believe in the opinion of a great many people, there was a great deal of shilly-shallying and beating about the bush; it was said that we did not know this and that we did not know that. In my opinion the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has added a new conundrum to the puzzle book. What he has done is this. He has found an answer to the question: When is an aggressor not an aggressor? The answer, as I conceive it to be from his remarks, is: When the aggression is an old one. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the old aggression was finished and done with and that there was a new aggression. I will admit that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was perhaps placed in a difficult position; but for the life of me I do not see how he can call it an old aggression when an army that has been poised on the Manchurian border attacked the police force of the United Nations, the hope of the civilized world, and caused them so many hundreds and even thousands of casualties.

In this subamendment we are asked to condemn the action of the United Nations in declaring that communist China was an aggressor. It seems to me that if we accept that subamendment, what it amounts to is that the members of this house are declaring that the United Nations are aggressors, because where two people are into a fight, one of them must be an aggressor. I repeat that statement: If we accept that subamendment of the C.C.F. party, it amounts to an acknowledgment that the United Nations themselves were the aggressors in this matter.

I have here another document, a white paper distributed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. On pages 9 and 10 of it are listed the different dates and the events that took place on those dates which justified the United Nations in deciding that communist China was an aggressor. I notice here an extraordinary thing—I do not know whether other hon. members have noticed it —and I do not know what significance it has. I notice on October 30:

> Interrogation of 19 Chinese prisoners of war identified two additional regiments of 124 CCF division . . .

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): What a fighting unit!

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I do not know whether my hon. friends to my left formed part of that force. I notice that on November 2 mention is made of the 112, 113 and 114 divisions of the 38 CCF army; and so on for the other dates. I am not making any suggestions at all. There are the facts and there is the document presented by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At page 55 of Hansard the Secretary of State for External Affairs is reported to have said:

> I feel, however, that the Far Eastern problems could be more readily solved if diplomatic relations existed with the government of China, which has the whole of the mainland of China under its control.

He made that statement of his feelings, but he did not back it up with any facts. I should like to know from the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can give us any illustration in history which justifies him in saying that diplomatic relations with Russia or with any of the satellite countries have solved any problems whatsoever. Let me mention a few. Has the existence of diplomatic relations with Russia solved the question of Russia's foreign debt? Has it been able to give Christians living in Russia due respect for their religious beliefs and protection of their religion? Has it facilitated investigation of complaints against the Russian government or the question of the marriage of Russians with non-Russians? Has it solved the question of the disappearance of the 10,000 Polish officers who disappeared after they had been taken prisoners by Russia in 1939? Has it solved the question of the repatriation of the hundreds of thousands of German and Japanese prisoners of war, of whom no trace has been found since they were taken prisoners in the second world war? Has the existence of diplomatic relations with the friendly communist Yugoslavs enabled justice to be done as we should like to see it done, in accordance with the fundamental freedoms that we hear so much about, in the case of the arrest, the persecution, the trial and the imprisonment of Archbishop Stepinac? Has the existence of diplomatic relations with these communist dictatorships and totalitarian regimes helped in any way to prevent espionage, sabotage and underground revolutionary activities in all the other countries?

We all recognize that there are fundamental differences of outlook and differences in belief between the governments of communist countries and our own. The chief difference is that communism is materialistic and atheistic. It recognizes neither the divine origin of the universe nor the divine destiny of man. It is built on hate rather than on love. We were told many years ago—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I just have a couple of minutes to go.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Pouliot: Make it snappy.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Thank you very much.

In 1920 the Independent Labour party of Great Britain sent a questionnaire to the Soviet government in Moscow containing twelve questions. The eighth question in that list was as follows:

> In what respect does the third international consider that communism differs from other forms of socialism?

That is a very important question and was recognized as the principal question in the list submitted by the Labour party. The answer came back:

> There are no other forms, there is only communism. Whatever else goes under the name of socialism is either wilful deception by the lackeys of the bourgeoisie—

And they were referring to the socialist members in Great Britain. I continue:

> —or self-delusion of persons or groups who hesitate to choose between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie; who hesitate between a life-and-death struggle and the role of assistants to the expiring bourgeoisie.

Now, sir, the effect of voting for this sub-amendment would be, as I have said, to brand the United Nations organization as aggressors.

The aim of communism is world domination. That has been so often stated by the Russians themselves that we are fools to think otherwise. The general opinion that prevails today is that the greatest danger lies in the west, and I believe that opinion to be sound. Because of long civil wars in China and the war of attrition with Japan, China cannot be in a position to make war on any great scale.

If there is a surrender to aggression and the use of force, it will be not only a military defeat but a moral defeat, the results of which may be catastrophic.

Today in Japan there are 84 million people watching anxiously what is taking place. It seems to me, unless Korea is re-established at least in the position it was before June 25, with compensation, if possible, from the North Koreans, the United Nations is not able to fulfil its task.

In conclusion, sir, I should like to draw your attention to a press dispatch that appeared in a St. John's, Newfoundland, paper on January 21. I am not sure that it appeared in other papers. It came from Berlin and it said:

> An 18-year-old German's defiant cry that he would rather die than bow to communist rule stirred his countrymen today on both sides of the iron curtain.
> "I love my freedom more than my life," Herman Joseph Flade shouted to a communist court in Russian-controlled Dresden.

That was courage, Mr. Speaker. Does not that outburst of that condemned but courageous German represent the feelings of us all?

Hon. C. G. Power (Quebec South): Some hon. gentleman earlier in this debate made the statement that in his opinion this session of the House of Commons would be devoted largely to the discussion of international affairs. To some extent I agree with him; but I think his attention should be called to the fact that there are many weighty matters of domestic concern which will have to be debated and discussed during the present session.

To some extent I am inclined to agree with him because it is impossible to get a true picture of the over-all situation of Canada at the present time unless one gives at least some consideration to the relationship of Canada to the United Nations organization and to world affairs.

Just over 30 years ago in this house I opposed the subscription of Canada to the covenant of the league of nations; and some years later, in 1923, I introduced a resolution calling upon Canada to withdraw from the league of nations. Nevertheless I cannot claim the prescience of having opposed the entry of Canada into the United Nations organization because at that time the wave of idealism for the brotherhood of man and of enthusiasm swept the world and encompassed Canada itself. But permit me to say, sir, as one who has never made any claim to an extensive or intensive study of external affairs, and who knows no more of the proceedings of the United Nations than that which he gleaned from the headlines in newspapers or from the radio commentators, that in my humble opinion, whatever may be said in favour of the United Nations organization —and much can be said and has been said by its supporters and apologists—certainly we can no longer say that it will bring about peace in this world. Nor can it be said that the United Nations of itself can prevent aggression by a major power or its satellites.

In order to endeavour to assure ourselves of a somewhat uneasy peace we are obliged perhaps not to disregard the United Nations organization but at least to set it aside in favour of the Atlantic treaty. Let me say at the outset of my remarks on this subject that I favour the Atlantic treaty; but let me also say that in placing most of our faith and confidence on what can be accomplished out of that pact and that treaty we are returning to that which we have condemned and reviled in the past, namely, power politics.

I can see little or no difference between the state of the world as it exists at the present time and the state of the world as it was immediately prior to and during the seven years war, the Napoleonic wars and the first world war. Now as then, nations, desiring to preserve their autonomy and their liberty against the encroachment of monarchial or dictatorial tyrants, had been obliged to band themselves together in combinations or coalitions; now, as in that time, the weaker nations are obliged to call on the stronger ones for subsidies for arms, and for the furnishing of armed forces.

Now, as in former times, there are satellite wars and undeclared wars. Prior to the seven years war the English were fighting the French in America, and the French were fighting the English in India for months and perhaps years, long before their governments and courts declared that a state of war existed. So that if my conjecture is the right one, and we are dependent almost entirely, for the preservation of peace in the world and for the prevention of aggression, upon the construction of a wall of peace against Russian aggression in Europe, then we have returned to the realm of world politics and of power politics.

As I said before, I am not opposing the Atlantic pact; but I would like it to be placed in its true light before the people of this country, and before the members of the house. I believe that at the present time the combination of the Atlantic nations is probably the only thing which will save the liberties of the European nations, at any rate, and probably save their hides.

I realize, as every member realizes, that the Atlantic nations, particularly those in Europe, in banding themselves together to resist aggression are taking upon themselves a very grave risk. But it is what Mr. Churchill called in the last war a calculated risk. It is a calculation that fear of the atomic bomb may deter Russia for a sufficient length of time to enable the Atlantic nations to rearm. And, less probably, it is a risk calculated on the fact that perhaps Russia, with the diverse elements of nations and races which compose it, has not as yet formed herself into a nation so well integrated as to permit of undertaking a global war. The Atlantic nations, those who subscribe to the pact, and who live on this side of the Atlantic, have come to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that they cannot afford to allow Russia to sweep over Europe, and to become possessed of the manpower and industrial potential which is on that continent. As a result of that, these nations have decided to extend their frontiers to the other side of the Atlantic, by extending assistance in the way of armament and equipment, and by rearming the peoples of Europe.

The policy and program laid down last evening by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) is that, as a nation, we shall give our utmost support to the Atlantic pact nations, that we shall do so by supplying arms and equipment, by placing our industrial potential at their disposal, and by sending armed forces to Europe.

With respect to the program which was so well explained by the minister himself last night, it seems to me that the first reaction of the house and of the Canadian people must have been one of astonishment at the magnitude and cost of the program he unfolded. It drove home to us, and I think to the people of Canada, that in order even to prepare for war we must spend almost astronomical sums. If that be the case, if the preparation in order to deter the enemy from attacking us runs us into five billions of dollars, then it is difficult to imagine what a real war would cost.

The next reaction—and this is the one which struck me—is that it behooves us to have a certain note of caution. We should—and I gather the government has given consideration to these things—endeavour to ascertain for ourselves, as Canadians, how we may be of the most assistance to our partners in the Atlantic pact, if we are to play fully the role we propose to play. And the note of caution I would wish to sound would be this: Having decided on the course of action and on the program which we should follow in order best to render assistance, let us be careful not to waste our energies and our resources by an over-diversification of those energies and resources.

I take it for granted, indeed I think the minister so stated, that the decisions arrived at as to the kind of assistance we propose to render to our partners were decisions which had been approved of and agreed upon—subject of course to confirmation by parliament—by our partners in the Atlantic pact. Canada, by agreement with the Atlantic pact nations, apparently has decided to give preponderance in its assistance to air power. It will do this, firstly, by training the air crews of its associates, and secondly by furnishing squadrons to Europe. Apparently our allies are satisfied with this proposed contribution. The question I ask myself is whether the people of Canada will be satisfied with this contribution of a preponderance in air forces. I say that because, during world war II, there were persons in the country and even in the House of Commons who, notwithstanding the glamour and the glory of the achievements of the air force, and notwithstanding that, in proportion to the number of their men actively engaged, they suffered greater casualties than any other arm of the service, were not convinced that Canada was doing its part in that war, until such time as casualty reports came rolling in from Italy.

I am not saying I blame those people. There are in Canada a number of men who are battery-minded, battalion-minded, division-minded; and they have as much right to their opinions as anyone else. Then there are other hon. members of the house and other men in this country who believe in a big navy.

I expect to be accused of being prejudiced, but I put myself on the side of the angels, geographically speaking—I favour the Royal Canadian Air Force. Since we are now laying down government policy for the next three years, a policy which presumably will be followed should we be so unfortunate as to be drawn into a shooting war, it should be part of the duty of every hon. member of this parliament, before allowing this program to pass unchallenged, to explain his views and state whether he considers it to be in the interests of Canada to have a greater proportion of the strength of Canada devoted to an air force than to any other force.

I say that advisedly because I well remember at the beginning of world war II when the delegates from Great Britain came here to propose that we embark upon a great air training scheme. The then minister of finance, my late chief, a leader and patriot whose like has rarely been seen in this house, Layton Ralston, said to the delegates that we should be careful to be sure that Canada could afford this large amount of money and, secondly, that Canada should not be bled white right at the start of the war. He pointed out further to the delegates that we were likely to have other commitments, that we were likely to have to furnish ground forces. The reply was made that the primary duty of Canada was to undertake this great air training scheme.

As time went on we all know how that air training scheme was developed, but other efforts were put forth paralleling that scheme. Not only did they cost enormous sums of money, but in the long run it led to serious difficulties.

I mention these things in order that we in this house, as well as the people in the country, may thoroughly understand this program. As I said before, I strongly favour a preponderance of assistance by way of an air force. Since I am asking other hon. members to give their reasons why they would favour a big navy, a big army, a big tank brigade or preference for other components of an army, perhaps I should give some of the reasons I have for suggesting that an air program should be adopted. I say this notwithstanding what may appear to have been a setback at the beginning of the Korean war. Perhaps the supporters of a great air force held exaggerated views and possibly the effectiveness of air strength did not come up to their expectations, but I do believe, and I think this is admitted, that supremacy in the air will go a long way toward settling any future war.

The reasons I have for supporting an air program are that Canadians for some reason or other have a great reputation as air warriors; that Canada has earned a reputation for its capacity to train air crew; that the program calls for Canadian squadrons, manned by Canadians and supplied with Canadian equipment from Canadian factories.

Perhaps I am treading on dangerous ground when I contend that there is less danger of deterioration of morale among air force personnel stationed in a foreign country than there is on the part of, let us say, army personnel. I think it will be confirmed by those who were fortunate to be in England during the first two and a half or three years of the war that it was extremely difficult to keep up the morale of the ground troops no matter how well the manœuvres simulated actual conditions of warfare. There is always the danger of boredom with a consequent loss of morale.

But as far as the air force are concerned, the ground crew will be doing exactly the same work they would be doing in wartime. They will be preparing aircraft for troops. Perhaps the danger will not be so great as if an enemy were shooting at them, but they must be ever alert to any deficiency in the machinery or equipment. The air crew are engaged in a hazardous occupation. Every young man who makes up part of an air crew has the pleasure of having under his hand a fast, swiftly moving machine. For these reasons I believe there is less danger of deterioration in their morale.

Undoubtedly there would be an easier interchange of squadrons. Those which are trained here in Canada could more readily, more efficiently and more expeditiously be exchanged with squadrons being trained on the other side. With respect to the psychological effect on our allies and on our enemies, which is given as one of the great reasons why we should send forces to Europe, the greater mobility of the air arm and the fact that there will be a large number of men engaged in servicing and in flying eleven squadrons would result in their making their presence felt equally with and perhaps more than an equivalent or similar number of the other arms of the services. Perhaps I should not say this as a last reason, but if the worst comes to the worst the air force has half a chance of getting out and coming back again.

I assume that the division—which is a new term to me in air force jargon—mentioned by the minister will be composed of fighters, interceptors, reconnaissance and transport. It is a matter of regret to me that it will be almost impossible to add squadrons or wings or groups of bombers. Although I have not gone to any authoritative source, I am informed that to have in Great Britain or on the continent of Europe a group similar in size and equipment to No. 6 Canadian bomber group in the last war would cost in initial equipment alone anything from $1,500 million to $2 billion. Therefore we are precluded by the very thought and consideration of the cost of any such contribution of heavy bombers.

I am told that an individual heavy bomber costs anywhere from $5 million to $6 million. Therefore a squadron composed of twenty bombers would cost in equipment alone $100 million. Therefore the task of strategic bombing of the enemy will, as I understand it, be left largely to the air force of the United States of America just as the task of supplying ground forces will apparently be placed to a considerable extent on the shoulders of the republic of France.

There is one other matter that I should like to mention, and since it is one that has aroused some controversy in this house and outside I approach it with considerable diffidence. It is the question of whether or not a committee of this house should be set up to discuss the expenditure on national defence. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has set forth his views on the matter eloquently and cogently. Members of the government have replied equally eloquently and in terms which merit consideration. I am inclined to think that there is a middle course between the views of the government and those of some of the members of the opposition.

With respect to the constitutional aspect, I believe that matters relating to policies and strategy are the responsibility of the government and the government alone. Recently I was reading the life of William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, by Brian Tunstall, and I found this passage in reference to the government of William Pitt:

> In a country such as England, governed by a constitutional monarchy, it is neither desirable nor practical for war to be conducted either jointly or independently by the heads of the fighting services. On all major issues they must receive express direction from the crown constitutional advisers, responsible to parliament. Admirals and generals are the commanders-in-chief of the sea and land forces, but the crown and ministerial advisers are the commanders-in-chief of the whole nation.

I believe it will be found that Lloyd George in world war I and Winston Churchill in world war II kept within their own hands all decisions with respect to policy and strategy, and I can conceive of nothing worse for the morale and discipline of the various armed forces than for their chiefs of staffs to be called before a parliamentary committee to give evidence either for or against the policies laid down by the government. I will give one instance. I myself, although I was a member of the government when the project was initiated, have always had serious doubts as to the value to this country of the creation of a fleet air arm and of the acquisition of the Magnificent.

I hold those views and I believe that in all probability a great many of the superior officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force hold similar views, although I have not communicated with them for over five years, but I would not think it either fair to the forces or fair to the minister to call the chiefs of staff of the Royal Canadian Air Force before a parliamentary committee and to place them in contradiction with the policy of the government. I would go one step further. In my time there were in the Royal Canadian Air Force earnest, conscientious and devoted men who had strong views as to certain types of equipment. Those views were fought over and discussed in air council and sometimes went as far as defence council, but once the policy was settled, once the chiefs of staff and the officers concerned had decided that such a type of equipment should be that which would be acquired and no other kind, then the matter rested there.

I think it would be unfair to place officers of different arms of the services in contradiction with each other with respect to such matters. That is only a personal view acquired from some little experience in dealing with this department.

On the other hand it seems to me that since we are embarking upon a program calling for the expenditure of $5 billion, this House of Commons of Canada has a duty to scrutinize and supervise that expenditure. It is extremely difficult for that scrutiny and supervision to be carried out in a house composed of as many members as we have here; and I believe that if a committee on expenditure were set up, with an appropriate reference which could be agreed upon by the leaders of the government and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), much good would result. Members of parliament would be in a better position to analyse and understand why certain moneys were being expended.

I would not propose to curtail in any way the right of every member of parliament to talk on any subject arising out of this expenditure; nor would I implement the rule, if it ever was a rule, that was brought into effect some years ago to prevent questions being placed on the order paper with respect to a department whose affairs were under the scrutiny of a committee of this house. Either by arrangement among the members of this house or by the order of reference I would safeguard in every possible way the rights of members of parliament to discuss anything arising out of the estimates of the Department of National Defence. At the same time I believe that a more careful scrutiny of these expenditures, having in mind the complexities which are bound to arise in connection with an expenditure of this size, could be made by setting up such a committee. This I believe would maintain the traditions of parliament and at the same time would be a benefit to the members and to the people of this country.

Mr. Henri A. Gosselin (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I join other hon. members of the house in extending my congratulations to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, who performed their duties so well. I am sure the counties they represent will be highly pleased by the way they carried out their task.

In my first remarks I do not intend to deal at length with the matter of national defence, but I believe it is my duty to express my views with respect to the most important matters with which this government will be called upon to deal during the present session. I have listened carefully to the various speeches that have been made since the opening of the session and the statements by the different ministers, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and others. From the very first Canada has been developed on certain principles and traditions, and we wish to continue under those principles. Canada has a small population, but we have always known freedom and good understanding, and we intend to maintain our freedom against any aggressors who would destroy it.

I believe it is our duty to treat this matter in a non-political way. I believe it is the responsibility of every member of this house to deal with these matters sincerely and honestly. On various occasions our representatives at the United Nations have stated that these principles should be advanced throughout the world, and we have felt it our duty to join with other countries to find ways and means of making sure that communist principles shall not be introduced here. From what I have read in the newspapers and learned in other ways I want to congratulate those members of the government who have had the responsibility of expressing the principles in which our country believes. It is our duty to give them our entire support day by day, so they may be in a position to act immediately if at any time they feel the welfare of the country is threatened.

As I say, we have only a small population compared with other members of the United Nations, but in the last two wars we have shown the world that when the Canadian people undertake a task they fulfil it one hundred per cent. We intend to carry on in the same tradition if there should be a third world war, but I believe we should be prepared to assist the United Nations in every possible way so that the danger of a third world war may be averted.

It is our duty, Mr. Speaker, as these matters are presented to the house to scrutinize and examine them, but in the most sincere way, so that no errors may be committed; and with our experience in the last war I believe we should strike an average of almost one hundred per cent in our endeavours with the United Nations. We have an energetic population which is ready to make all possible sacrifices in order that our liberties and our way of life may be preserved. The efforts of our people, with all our natural resources, will be offered to the United Nations, if necessary, so that success may be achieved. We must endeavour to make every possible sacrifice in our way of living so that we shall be able to meet the expenditures necessary to carry on the fight to preserve our principles. I shall not endeavour to go into the ways and means of administering the various departments, for I have not the necessary knowledge or experience. Nevertheless, I feel that those who have the knowledge of these matters should be supported one hundred per cent, in order that success may be achieved.

Our sister country on this side of the ocean, with a large population, has up to the present time taken measures to protect freedom and liberty, so that the principles of the communists who desire to rule the world will not be accepted amongst the free nations. Knowing our obligations, we in Canada for several months past have followed the contribution which Canada has proposed to make to ensure the success of the United Nations. In this I believe we have the support of the entire population of Canada. They feel that it is the duty of the government, through their representatives, to follow every move which is necessary and to give the necessary financial support regardless of politics; because liberty cannot be bought with dollars but can be obtained only by defending the principles which we are endeavouring to preserve.

Along with the measures we take for our defence, it is our duty to carry on under our social laws which have been on the statute books for several years past, so our people will be assured that, during their lives, they will be protected by social laws designed to help those who have not been so fortunate as to accumulate wealth and who are most in need. By so doing we shall establish in this country of ours the basis of the principles which we have for many years been supporting.

It is our duty, Mr. Speaker, to base our policies on the development of our natural resources. This development will be necessary in our efforts in connection with national defence. It is necessary for us to create in the minds of our younger generation the feeling that the policy which this government is bound to follow is one looking to their protection in the future. It is our duty to see that our natural resources are developed as fast as possible so that our growing population will feel convinced that there is for them a living in this country.

It is also our duty to encourage in every way possible the principles of labour. With regard to those principles of labour, may I say a few words of thanks to this government for the action taken by them with regard to the railroad strike. I am a railway employee and I confess that I was a striker. We have obtained entire satisfaction, and I am speaking in the name of a large number of railroad employees who have said that they were entirely satisfied with the way in which this government acted. The railroad men had the right, and they exercised it, to tie up the transportation system of Canada; and I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for ordering the railroad men to go back to work. We had the right to tie up the transportation of the Canadian people, and the government has given us the right to negotiate further, and we have obtained satisfactory results. I wish to thank the entire membership of this house for granting us the privilege of continuing those negotiations.

Furthermore, I think it is my duty as a farmer to offer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) my congratulations on the way he is carrying on in the interests of the Canadian people. Whether you are from the east or from the west, the interests of agriculture are intimately connected. We are working for the interests of the Canadian people. It is the duty of the Minister of Agriculture and of this government to establish markets so that our products can be sold as they are grown. Agricultural products cannot be preserved from year to year. They must be sold after the crop has been harvested. It is necessary for the farmers to obtain immediate payment. It is necessary for the farmers to be protected, as they are the fundamental basis of the prosperity of the country. It is necessary that the farmers obtain all the encouragement possible so that they may enjoy the comforts they deserve for the hours of work they perform.

I would not say that the farmers are not prosperous at the present time, but I will say that we need further protection having regard to the preservation of our products. I have all confidence that the Minister of Agriculture will give his full support to obtaining refrigerating processes so that our pork, our eggs, our poultry products and so on may be displayed and sold at the proper time, and at a reasonable price, to the benefit of the labouring population.

I believe it is the duty of the Department of Agriculture to study ways and means of increasing production. If we can do this, we shall be able to reduce the cost of living. It is necessary that production be increased, and this can only be done by giving credit to the farmers, as has already been done in many different ways by the Department of Agriculture. I feel that additional ways should be found of giving further protection to our farmers. May I repeat that it was a great pleasure to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture, who is a farmer himself, upon handling our agricultural matters in such a way that we can produce with confidence and that prices will be well protected. The farming industry faces great problems. If our farmers are not given the necessary encouragement to induce the younger element to remain on the soil, they will not do so. Our younger population are deserting the soil because they are not receiving sufficient remuneration for the work they perform. That difficulty could be overcome by giving our farmers a guaranteed price for their products. A guaranteed price would bring about such results as would encourage them to continue farming. Regardless of what the amount of subsidies may be, we must encourage the younger element to remain on the farms; otherwise it will be a disaster for our Canadian population.

Agriculture is still the basic industry of the country. We must be prepared for an increase in population, but we must also be in a position to produce the necessary supplies for the population whom we shall be called upon to support. If our farmers receive fair prices for their products, ways and means will be found to take care of the amounts required for national defence.

Before closing my remarks I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether it will not be possible to grant subsidies to the eastern parts of the country to enable the farmers to buy fertilizer. Our farms in the east require fertilizer. They require substances to destroy the acid which is gradually appearing in our soil. If the farmers could buy fertilizer at a cheaper rate, it would assist in increasing the productivity of the soil, and enable them to sell their produce at lower prices, because with the greater production the return for the work performed would be proportionately greater. At the same time our labour population would be able to buy produce at a lower price, and one more in keeping with the salaries they receive.

May I address a few words to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), who is carrying on a great work in the improvement of the health of our people. Canada, like other countries, has to suffer from diseases amongst our population. It is necessary to call attention to this problem and to that of education. An unhealthy and an uneducated population is a detriment to any country. The policies which the department and the government are carrying out will help to maintain good understanding amongst the people of our country, and I am sure we are all glad to support them.

I believe every Canadian is willing to support the principle of taxation when necessary, and is willing to do all that is necessary so that we may maintain the principles under which the United Nations was formed and bring about good understanding and harmony amongst the nations of the world.

Mr. F. H. Larson (Kindersley): In this debate, which hinges chiefly upon defence and on the diplomatic side of our national activities, I rise not because one so new as myself can attempt to advise the people who have had long experience in these things, but the speech from the throne and the remarks of the mover of the address in reply touched on a topic which was very interesting to me and, I feel, very vital to the future conduct of world policy.

I understand that when the first atomic explosion was carried out in Nevada a large staff of men was there to try to stop any reaction which might have occurred from the explosion of the bomb. That did not happen. The atomic bomb was developed. Scientists very soon decided that possibly they could use that atomic bomb to start reaction in some less volatile substance. Possibly the hydrogen bomb is a fact. I do not know. It has never been officially declared a fact.

Is it impossible that some day scientists may figure out a method of using the same sort of knowledge to start some inert substance such as the air we breathe, or the soil we walk on, and end the whole course of human development on this planet? Trusting, however, that things will not be quite as serious as that, we can look forward in this country to the possibility of atomic attack.

There are some people in this country who say that we are totally unprepared to meet any attack in force. Today quite a few members of parliament went down to Montreal, and there they saw something which I am sure convinced them that we are not totally unprepared, but on the contrary we are doing everything possible, and we are doing it effectively, to protect ourselves and our friends in the Atlantic pact.

War today is a pretty terrible thing. Centuries ago Athens and Sparta, the one a democratic country and the other a military-minded country, fought it out. I suppose people a few hundred miles away from what was going on, and who were not involved, did not even realize that there was a war on; but in this day and age a major conflict between two major nations is a thing which should be absolutely unthinkable. I for one still believe and hope that the eventuality of a war, chiefly with atomic weapons, is a thing which we shall never see. What the solution is I do not know. There are a lot of people who talk about a world federation. We have some sort of world federation in the United Nations, but it has no sovereign authority. It has not a police force which is completely under the control of that body. The next thing to that we have is the Atlantic pact. That organization is in a somewhat different position, because we have recently appointed a supreme commander who will have armies and forces of various kinds under his control. Then if any nation—and probably this is unthinkable—within the Atlantic pact were to start any form of aggression, police action would be taken immediately.

If that type of thing could be developed to encompass most of the nations of the world we would have some chance of having a federation of world nations. All this may look difficult, and appear to be impossible; but I presume that the problems that beset the founders of the United States federation, and the Canadian confederation must have appeared to them to be almost insurmountable.

These matters are more or less academic. I feel that Russia, or the international cominform is using a weapon against us which is as old as humanity itself. It is a weapon of which we do not realize the full import—and we have good reason for not doing so. They are using this weapon chiefly in Asia at the moment, and making very good use of it indeed. The reason we do not understand it is that as a nation on this continent we have never been hungry. The cost of living is high—certainly it is high. But practically every family on the continent can set a good table and buy the clothes they need. They can house themselves, and on top of that enjoy some of the amenities of life. To the average Asiatic, the cost of living is probably beyond his earning capacity.

In the conclusions reached at the Colombo conference it was found that the average amount of food upon which the average Asiatic exists for a day is about the same as the normal adult on this side of the water would eat at any one normal meal. The amount of clothing the average Asiatic gets is far from adequate. I do not propose to go into the merits or demerits of the Colombo plan at this time. That plan is set out in a journal on trade and commerce, and it is available to all. The only comment I would make is that the purpose is to give technical assistance so as to increase food production in Asia. Possibly that plan should be extended to provide actual foodstuffs when there are surpluses on this hemisphere. At the present time we have in Canada among other surpluses large stocks of low-grade wheat. It is difficult to make standard milling flour out of such wheat and I am sure that probably within the next year and a half it will be sold for the consumption of livestock. With the situation in India today, I am sure the people there would be happy to have some of that wheat, even though it is not of a top milling grade. It would still provide nourishment.

In Canada we have been bothered by food surpluses from time to time. We have always felt that large surpluses on hand depressed the market and tended to bring about a recession in agriculture. The Americans have had that same difficulty, but it would seem to me that they are somewhat more advanced in their thinking. I believe they are going into the next crop year with several hundred million bushels of wheat in surplus. However, rather than consider it a surplus which would depress the market, they consider it as a strategic war material, and one absolutely vital if an emergency arises.

We could allow Asiatic countries to carry on as best they can, as we have done in the past. We could allow situations to develop in China, as indeed they have developed, and take no responsibility for them. We can even watch the Chinese in vast numbers joining the communist armies, perhaps as a result of having been bribed to enter those armies, with the threat of starvation if they did not come in and promise of adequate food supplies if they did. With our supremacy in technical knowledge and industrial capacity we could probably defeat those huge armies; but to organize the military strength to fight and, when the time comes, to wipe out the hordes of people in those armies would cost us vast sums of money and a great deal of hardship through having to see our people go to war.

If we want to get right down to considering this matter from a business standpoint, even if we wanted to ignore the fact that possibly we are our brothers' keeper, we could say that it would be cheaper to feed them than to fight them. That is my belief; and in that position I do not think we have any choice. I believe it is cheaper to feed them than to fight them, and I doubt if there will ever be peace until the threat of famine has been wiped from the face of the earth.

We might say we have done something in the past to provide foodstuffs for China when it was needed, and when we have had surpluses; but our tendency has been to deal through normal channels, with the big businessmen of China. I doubt very much if the average coolie has ever felt any beneficial effects from what we have done.

It is apparent that the communists have gone into China and stirred up the masses against the land owners and the wealthy people. They have given support to taking over the property of those people. There may have been enough food produced from those activities, so that the communists have not had to send very much from their own countries into China to keep the people satisfied thus far. Indeed, they have had the Chinese fighting their battles, with the only cost to Russia being that of perhaps a few aircraft and tanks. We are now in a position where, even though for a long time the Chinese have been considered our friends, we do not feel we can talk with them. However, we are still on good terms with India and with Pakistan. We are still on speaking terms with a good many other countries in southeast Asia.

In the near future it seems to me it would be to our advantage politically to give some practical indication that we are on the side of those people, that we are people of good will, and that we are prepared to help them in their troubles. It could be said that this continent simply has not the ability to feed Asia. I agree. But there is no doubt in my mind that we could vastly increase production on this continent. In fact, there are several projects we could construct which would have the effect of increasing production. There is development work we could do. There are lands in northern British Columbia, in the Peace River district where the rainfall is adequate and where the soil is suitable, but where at the present time there are no settlers. If that were not sufficient we could go ahead with the South Saskatchewan river project and 400,000 acres of submarginal land could be brought into production to produce a lot of food.

Industrial skill can do a tremendous lot to make our position more secure, but well-fed people normally do not want to join armies to fight. We should not rest in our endeavours as a highly developed civilization until we see the world completely inhabited with well-fed people. With the international situation being as it is I do not see how we can afford not to do everything possible with our industrial ability to see that our friends have what is necessary for them to fight in defence of our way of life.

But there is a danger that if we place too much strain on our internal economy and spread ourselves too thin we will not be effective in international affairs. That great Canadian, the late W. L. Mackenzie King, said once that rather than making tours of the war fronts his job was to stay in Canada to see to it that our internal economy was operating to the fullest extent in order to produce things for our friends. He felt that our great strength lay in no hitches developing in this country.

At the risk of boring you I am going to say how pleased I am that the British government has considered fulfilling the "have regard to" clause in the five year wheat pool contract. I know that when that clause has been fulfilled to the satisfaction of the western farmers, and I do not think their requests are unreasonable, those same western farmers will be much happier at having to pay heavy taxes in order to supply aeroplanes to Great Britain and to train air crew and do those other things which will cost much in excess of what they are asking from the British at the moment. They will be ready to do all that most willingly.

I am not going to mention any alternatives because I am confident the British government is sound and fair enough to see that justice is done. There are no other alternatives that could be mentioned at this time.

From November 20 of last year to January 13 of this year my information indicates that some $39,900,000 of defence contracts were issued in Canada. I have not the Alberta figures but the contracts in Manitoba amounted to $1,200,000 with only $60,000 in Saskatchewan. Saskatchewan does not worry about defence contracts to any great degree because the people do not feel that that is their role. They feel that their place in the national economy is the providing of that strategic material, food. If that material is not supplied everything else breaks down.

I have heard it said that the Saskatchewan farmers are making so much money that they do not know what to do with it. I have heard it said in high places that prosperity is judged by income tax collections. It must be realized that Saskatchewan is primarily an agricultural province and its primary production is wheat which is sold to the wheat board. The wheat board is an agency of government and the income tax department is a department of government. It is reasonable to expect that information passes back and forth and the experts are able by means of mathematical calculations to tell what it costs to run a farm. With that factor in mind it is easy for those who collect income taxes to assess and collect all that is coming to the federal government in these taxes.

Another fact to be remembered is that those who pay large income taxes farm large tracts of land. They have been fortunate enough to obtain those tracts of land and are thus able to produce more economically than the small farmer. Consequently most of the income tax is paid by a small group of people in Saskatchewan. The great majority of the people in Saskatchewan fall into that other class which do not enjoy the same prosperity.

In closing I want to say that I support the policy of the government as laid down last night by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in his speech during this debate. I feel that with the lead given by those two men and their associates we will have the best possible guarantee we could get that we will have a smooth-working, well-integrated internal economy which will allow this country to produce the way we saw it producing today in Montreal. I have great faith that with a smoothly integrated economy and with large defence production we can do our part to carry out our obligations in connection with affairs that lie ahead. But I wish to stress that we must keep our own internal affairs solid so that it will be possible for us to give the most to our friends.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Those against the amendment to the amendment will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the amendment to the amendment negatived.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) negatived on division.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I think at this time the Canadian people are concerned about two serious problems. The first is the very serious international situation and the second is the constantly rising cost of living. Before I proceed to deal with my main topic this evening I wish to say that I heartily endorse the remarks made by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) concerning the present international situation. I also endorse the excellent and incisive speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) in connection with the same question. In 1941 it had become apparent to the government of the day that something had to be done to curb the pressures on the economy due to the rapid expansion which had taken place at that time, and the gradual absorption of formerly unemployed resources into the stream of production. For various reasons the government decided that monetary and fiscal policies alone were insufficient to curb inflationary tendencies. Two alternatives faced the government at that time. The first was selective controls confined to a few basic commodities and the second was an over-all price ceiling on all goods and services with accompanying production and distribution controls.

The minister of finance of that day stated in the house on November 6, 1941, that the government had chosen the latter alternative. The introduction of the over-all price ceiling was announced by the prime minister of that day on October 18, 1941, and came into effect on December 1, 1941. As we all know, price ceilings were based on prices in the period from September 15 to October 11, 1941.

There is no question that at the conclusion of the war the Canadian people realized the advantages of price control legislation and the advantages of certain necessary subsidies to equalize and stabilize the cost of living. Canadians realized that price control was effective. They realized it was successful, and I think that generally speaking the Canadian people fully appreciated the value of that policy. In addition to the people, the Liberal government of that day realized that the Canadian people were in favour of price controls and had realized their effectiveness, their successful operation, and their advantage to the large majority of working people of this country.

They realized that to such an extent that they based their election appeal of 1945 to some extent upon the value of the price control policy to the Canadian people prior to that date.

An hon. Member: And nearly got beat.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. member who interrupted me is not going to massage his ego by constant inane, innocuous and inconsequential interruptions. I should like to quote a few statements made by leaders of the Liberal party and by the Liberal party itself just prior to the election of 1945, realizing as they did the opinion of the Canadian people with respect to the Liberal party price control policy during the war, which we all admit was excellent. The late prime minister, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, in an article in Maclean's magazine of February 1, 1945, had this to say:

> Immediately after the war the dangers of inflation may be even greater than they are now. The Canadian people cannot afford to sacrifice the benefits of wartime stabilization by relaxing controls too soon.

In the Halifax Herald and other dailies of June 5, 1945, nation-wide Liberal advertising contained the following:

> Consumer goods soon to be available at 1941 prices.

Again in the Halifax Herald and other dailies of June 5, 1945, Liberal advertising contained the following:

> Price ceiling—the purchasing power of your dollars maintained by the price ceiling under careful Liberal management.

Again nation-wide Liberal advertising in the dailies throughout this country on June 5, 1945, contained the following:

> New low-cost housing . . . instalments as low as $9.58 per month under the new national housing plan.

My point in commenting on the advertisements of that date is to illustrate the fact that the government was fully aware of the opinion of the Canadian people with respect to their policy of price control and necessary subsidies that was in effect during the war. We find that, although election advertising and election literature of that time indicated the continuance of the price control policy, that policy was changed some seven months later. On January 31, 1946, the Prime Minister announced the government's decontrol policy and on February 1, 1946, the first actual decontrol of prices took place on a long list of items, although few were necessities of life. This action continued until well on in the summer. Wage controls were eliminated by the end of the year. From that time on, the Canadian people have been subjected to constantly rising prices.

As we all know, the cost of living has gone up and up. By the end of 1948 complete decontrol had practically been accomplished. Under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, originally passed in 1945, the dominion government had been enabled to retain authority over prices, production, distribution and rental controls, but at each successive session of parliament this power was restricted until today the only powers remaining with the government under this act are those over rents.

Rising prices between the early part of 1946 and the latter part of 1948 created such a disturbance and such protests throughout the country that the government was forced to give some consideration to public opinion in that regard. In February, 1948, when, as the result of decontrol, prohibition of certain imports from the United States and other factors, prices were soaring, there was a great outcry for the reinstitution of price control legislation. The government's answer was to set up a House of Commons committee to study the question. We all remember the lengthy sittings of that committee and the report it made. Then a royal commission was established to find out why prices were going up. I remember sitting in this house and hearing the then member for Cariboo, Mr. William Irvine, saying when the commission was being established that it was like the government witnessing someone drowning. Instead of trying to prevent the tragedy they appointed a committee to find out where the water came from.

The royal commission reported on March 18, 1949, after investigating a number of industries. Although the investigation of the commission did not bring prices down by so much as a cent, they did come to some significant conclusions. Before proceeding with my brief remarks this evening I want to quote from their report to indicate some of the conclusions which, as I said before, are most significant for the Canadian people. In volume I, pages 27 and 28, dealing with monopolistic conditions, the commission reported as follows:

> The tendency appears to be for monopolistic enterprises to try to protect themselves from the "peaks and valleys" of the business cycle by obtaining for themselves a stable price over a period of time, the net result of which is generally to place the average price of their goods in the long run above what would be the average competitive level.

That is an example of the operation of the free enterprise system. Then the section dealing with mark-ups is very interesting for those interested in studying this important subject. Again I quote from volume 1, page 26:

> In our investigations we found that it was general for the distributive trades to maintain the same fixed percentage mark-ups on their various lines of merchandise as their costs rose, and that the effect of this practice was to increase prices to the consumer much more than a dollar and cent mark-up would. Where a fixed percentage mark-up is used by the manufacturer, wholesaler and retailer, an initial cost increase at the manufacturing level is pyramided through the entire price structure . . .

I could give much lengthier quotations, but I am just giving a few to illustrate my point. Dealing with bread the report had this to say at page 29 of volume 1:

> The margins now being established appear to be out of proportion with the margins that would exist under competitive conditions on a fast moving packaged food such as bread.

There again the obvious implication is that under this so-called free enterprise system we have a monopoly control avoiding the effects of even proper competition. Then, dealing with the situation concerning livestock, the report has this to say at page 31 of volume 1:

> The very heavy capital investment required, together with decreasing cost ratio as the scale of the business expands, tends to keep additional competitors from entering the field . . .

Again there is the implication of monopolistic control in order to maintain prices; yet we are told repeatedly that members on the government side and members on the opposition side support a free enterprise economy. I have a few other references before I go on. The report of the commission dealing with monopolies in textiles has this to say, at page 33 of volume 1:

> The returns on capital for the nylon producers and the second mentioned rayon manufacturer were, by any standard, very high indeed.

You must remember, Mr. Speaker, that this was the standard established by the royal commission. Again I quote from the report of the commission dealing with fertilizer monopolies, at page 33 of volume 1:

> One firm, following decontrol, raised its domestic prices to export levels and more than tripled its percentage of net profits to capital employed between 1946 and early in 1948.

Mr. Gibson: How did they compete with you?

Mr. Herridge: I thought I had finished with the hon. member, but apparently I have not. The point is that these advantages were taken of the Canadian people immediately following the abolition of price control and the dropping of necessary subsidies. I could give many other references to show the advantage taken by many firms in this country of that policy of decontrol, but let us see what happened after the change of policy on the part of the government of the day. To illustrate, while the general wholesale price index went up 52 per cent between July, 1946, and July, 1950, the index of the wholesale prices of farm products went up only 35 per cent. This fact was also discovered by the royal commission on prices and led them to state in the report of March 18, 1949, at page 25 of volume 1:

> Since the end of the war, farm products prices have risen less than prices of most other groups in the wholesale index. Yet, because the cost of foods has risen so sharply during this period, this fact is often overlooked. The chief explanation for the apparent anomaly is to be found in the removal of food subsidies which kept food prices down during the war.

Price control is a policy to which this party has been advocating that the government return since the change in 1946. I think there is no question as to which party in this house has been correct since that time with respect to price controls and necessary subsidies. Now I want to quote a short table to illustrate the effect of this policy of decontrol upon the farmers of this country, because sometimes we hear it said that the policy of price control and subsidies is urged largely by industrial groups or workers in urban centres. Let us see what effect it has had upon the farmers. This table shows the increases in percentages between July, 1946, and July, 1950:

	Per cent
Gasoline	18·3
Mower, 5-foot	22·4
Grain binder, 8-foot, 4-horse	29·0
2-furrow plow	36·8
Combine, 6-foot	40·1
Tractor, 4-cylinder, 4-ply tires	44·7
Electrical fixtures and equipment	56·3
Hardware	56·5
Binder twine	135·8

What further argument is necessary for the reimposition of certain subsidies and necessary price controls?

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call it eleven o'clock; and I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 7, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

HIGH COMMISSIONERS

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT AS TO CHANGE OF STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? According to the press, it has been suggested in London that the diplomatic status of commonwealth high commissioners is likely to be altered. Would the Prime Minister care to indicate to the house whether this matter was under discussion at the recent commonwealth prime ministers' conference? If so, have any arrangements of the kind been made?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The question was not raised at the recent meeting in London.

HEALTH INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE DURING THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Will the government consider the setting up, at this session, of a special committee, similar to last year's committee on old age security, to study and report on the whole question of health insurance for the Canadian people?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): It is not the intention of the government to recommend the setting up of such a committee at the present time.

PULPWOOD

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—SHORTAGE OF BOX CARS FOR SHIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. This is not a question about reefer cars, but it is not unrelated to that subject. In connection with what is practically a new industry in Prince Edward Island, namely, the exporting of pulpwood, I have been informed by shippers from Kings county that there is a large quantity of pulpwood cut, ready and awaiting shipment. While the Prince Edward Island Railway, through the superintendent and the divisional freight agent, is endeavouring to assist shippers in the export of pulpwood, there is a considerable shortage of box cars. Will the Minister of Transport endeavour to assist the divisional freight agent at Charlottetown in getting a satisfactory number of box cars for the shipment of pulpwood from Prince Edward Island to the mainland?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I shall be glad to look into the matter.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, last night at the adjournment I was attempting to show the effects of decontrol—or a few of them—on the farming population of this country. I should like now to point out briefly some of the effects on the general consuming public and the industrial population. I can give only a few illustrations, because my time is limited and I am sure there are other speakers who will be pleased to give fuller information.

By way of illustration, taking the cost of living index in September of 1939 at 100·8, in February of 1946, when decontrol began, it was 119·9. At the present time, according to the latest figures, it is 172·5. This indicates a continuous rise. Since last June there has been a rise in the cost of living of about seven points.

Not only do we in this group believe that that increase in the cost of living is raised by, shall I say, the greed of certain corporations in this country, but it is also stimulated to a certain extent by some of the remarks made by ministers in connection with the possibility of imposing price control. We all know that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) have on occasions expressed the belief that price controls may be necessary, although not at the present time. I believe that has caused many firms to increase their prices, because they are afraid that, at some time in the future, price controls will be put into effect.

I think this is indicated by the resolution passed by the Canadian Consumers Association and addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I shall quote only one part of it, because it indicates that they, who represent consumers in this country, believe that ministerial statements had some effect. Their resolution states in part:

> Whereas the C.A.C. feels that many prices have been advanced in anticipation of the imposition of price controls, rather than because of necessity . . .

I believe that feeling has been developed. I believe it is safe to say also that prices have increased rapidly, particularly since the beginning of the fighting in Korea, because of the greed of certain corporations, and because of certain ministerial statements. While prices have continued to rise, profits have continued to soar. We in this group have said that if decontrol became effective, without doubt corporations in this country would take increasing profits. That is exactly what they have done.

For instance, the total corporate profit, after taxes, for all companies in Canada rose from $468 million in 1939 to $751 million in 1946. That was during a period of high production and of price controls. After the war, profits rose in 1949 to $1,241 million.

To illustrate the validity of our argument I should like to place on record figures showing the profits of a few of the major corporations in Canada. These are net profits after taxes for several Canadian companies:

Name of Company	Net profits after taxes, 1946	Net profits after taxes, 1950
Aluminum Company of Canada	$11,581,237	$24,485,448
Imperial Oil Limited	17,326,112	23,932,986
Dominion Steel & Coal Corporation	847,034	5,252,063
Canada Packers Limited	1,816,781	3,480,212
Dominion Textile Company	2,119,770	3,108,995
Loblaw Groceterias Company	1,093,321	2,185,915
Zellers Limited	374,043	1,169,552
B.C. Packers	508,546	1,078,781

I would draw particular attention to the figures for the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation.

The table I have placed on record is a clear indication of the relationship of decontrol, rising prices and soaring profits. The source of the figures for 1946 is the Financial Post survey of corporate securities for 1947; those for 1950 are from issues of the Financial Post from April 22, 1950 to September 2, 1950.

The record of profits clearly indicates the soundness of the argument that has been put forward throughout the years by members of this group. What has been the position of the C.C.F. in that time? For the sake of my good friends to my right and my friends immediately opposite, who are listening to me with considerable interest, I should like to make this point clear. Price controls, and the necessary subsidies, do not constitute socialism. They are an attempt, under capitalism, consciously to regulate the system so that it will work for the greater advantage of the greater number. There is nothing very frightening about that, and nothing radical about it. It is just an attempt to bring order out of chaos and to bring stability to our financial and economic system, so that the people of this country will have a cost of living that is reasonably stable, and so that we shall have a wage structure that is necessarily more stable because of that price structure.

Since decontrol the C.C.F. have advocated continuously the reimposition of certain controls and subsidies. We offered amendments in the house in 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, and 1950. Accompanying those amendments from this group were urgent requests that the government recognize the rising cost of living and do something about it by reimposing price controls and, where necessary, providing for subsidies. Even as late as September 2 of last year the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of this group, in his speech in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, moved an amendment protesting against the failure of the government to impose price controls and subsidies. That amendment, even after prices had risen to the height they had reached last fall, was defeated by a vote of 93 to 18, the C.C.F. being supported only by members of the Social Credit party.

We have always maintained that the removal of controls would mean the skyrocketing of prices, and that it would make it more difficult for Canadians to meet household requirements and maintain themselves in decency and dignity. We have been told repeatedly by government spokesmen that once price controls were removed, prices would level off and adjust themselves. Further we have been told repeatedly by our friends to the right, members of the Progressive Conservative party, that once decontrol was put into effect, increased production would bring about reductions in prices.

The effectiveness of control measures is well illustrated by the government's own figures. During the war, under controls the cost of living index rose only about five points. Since April of 1946, when controls were removed, the cost of living index shot up from 120.8 to 173 or thereabouts. We have been agitating the adoption of a control policy in this house since 1946. What is the state of public opinion at this time? I do not think there is any question about it. On October 7 the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion released the results of a survey on what people in Canada thought of price control. The question they asked was: "As things are right now, do you think we should have price controls again, or do you think the government should not interfere in prices?" On the basis of the answers they received, this is their estimate of how the people of Canada feel on the subject:

Should have price control	75 per cent
Should not have price control	14 per cent
Qualified	7 per cent
No opinion	4 per cent

No doubt that majority opinion has been increased owing to the rapid increase in prices since the date of that public opinion poll. In addition to that, we have the four large labour bodies, the Canadian Congress of Labour, the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour, and the dominion legislative committee of the railway transportation brotherhoods, meeting in conference in Ottawa on January 3, 1950, and outlining labour's demand for the imposition of price controls. We welcome the campaign that is being waged in this country by the labour organizations. We welcome their support and co-operation in this most important matter. In addition to the major labour organizations, there are other labour organizations throughout this country which are expressing their views in exactly the same way.

As I said before, the farmers of this country want parity prices. If the farmers are to have parity prices, we must have some general regulation over our economy. We must have a system of price controls that will ensure satisfactory prices to consumers. We must have a system of price controls and subsidies that will assure satisfactory payments to agricultural producers.

The Saskatchewan Farmers Union and the Alberta Farmers Union met on September 25 last with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and the chairman of the wheat board and urged price controls on all goods, services, and rents, including the prices of agricultural products. I know that the farmers in my own constituency heartily endorse our appeals for price control. They are suffering from the increased cost of fertilizers, sprays, boxes, wrapping paper and all those things that are necessary to place fruit and other commodities on the market. They are heartily in favour of the reimposition of price controls and necessary subsidies.

Some interesting developments have taken place in recent months. Lately I received a letter from the city council of Nelson, one of the larger cities in my constituency, urging that I ask the government in the House of Commons to reimpose price controls. These men are in close touch with the people whom they represent. It is true that in 1946 some of them were in favour of decontrol, in the belief that that would lower prices and free the economy. They were acting according to their best judgment, but today they realize that because of the unstable nature of prices and our whole economic structure, some form of regulation is necessary. I repeat that I have been asked by that city council to urge the reimposition of price controls.

We all know the attitude of members of the Canadian Legion. They have heartily supported the reimposition of price controls in order to protect the living standards of the working people. In addition to that, along with other hon. members I have received hundreds of letters, cards and other communications since coming to Ottawa urging support for price and rent controls.

I remember from my reading of history that Marie Antoinette, when she was informed that the people could not afford to buy bread, said, "Let them eat cake". Surely the government is not treating this important matter of bread, in the sense that bread is the lifeblood of the people, in the superficial way in which Marie Antoinette treated it. If there is any truth in the statement that history repeats itself I would direct the attention of members of the cabinet to the fact that Marie Antoinette lost her head.

The value of price control legislation has been proved by experience. The need for price control legislation is obvious and urgent. The demand for price control legislation without question is overwhelming. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight):

> That the following words be added to the amendment, immediately after the words "rising cost of living" in the last line thereof:
> "such as the immediate reimposition of price controls, and the payment of subsidies where necessary, so as to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people."

In order to make clear the effect of this subamendment I shall read in full the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition

(Mr. Drew), and then add to it the subamendment I have just moved. The amendment as amended will read:

We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed

(1) to give this nation leadership in the face of the present great danger; and

(2) to bring into being forces necessary to enable Canada to defend itself and discharge its international obligations; and

(3) to take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living, such as the immediate reimposition of price controls, and the payment of subsidies where necessary, so as to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people.

I have just one more point to make before sitting down. I should like to indicate to hon. members the situation that prevails in Canada and in other countries. I have heard members of the government party say that we in Canada are a lot better off than most other people so far as increases in the cost of living are concerned. I have heard that argument many times, and I should like to present some figures to indicate how prices have risen in ten countries since 1945. The sources of this information are the Canadian Statistical Review, United Kingdom Ministry of Labour Gazette and the International Labour Review for July, 1950. The cost of living index is taken to equal 100 as of 1945, and on that basis we have the following result:

Canada	137
Australia	136
Netherlands	135
United States	131
New Zealand	119
United Kingdom	114
Sweden	112
Denmark	110
Norway	107

With all our enormous productive capacity, with our great wealth of natural resources, with the ability of our people, with our industrial technique, the fact remains that Canada has had the second highest increase in the cost of living of the ten countries referred to. I think we can do better than that. This government should take advantage of its powers, should take advantage of the experience of legislation in previous years and reimpose price control legislation.

In conclusion I ask hon. members, when voting on this subamendment, to think first of the mothers with children to feed and clothe; second of the young married couples trying to establish homes; third, of the old age pensioners attempting to survive under an avalanche of rising costs and, fourth, of the large numbers living on fixed incomes. I ask members of the house to recognize, on this question at least, the wishes of the great majority of the Canadian people by voting for this amendment, and in so doing to demonstrate that on this occasion the House of Commons reflects the will of the Canadian people.

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to refer to the bereavement suffered last evening by our colleague, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the death of his wife. She was prominent in the group of ladies who annually came here, and she will be sorely missed by all who are associated with the Canadian parliament. I understand that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is going west on Friday, and I hope he will convey to her family the regret that is felt by every member of the House of Commons.

I want to express my congratulations—and this is no perfunctory duty—to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. My memory remains sufficiently vivid of the occasion when, in association with my colleague, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Boisvert), this duty fell upon us. I have told many of my friends that I found it the most difficult thing I had ever done. In our country there has been a most successful development by reason of the competitive political party system. It has done a good job for us, and I was particularly delighted with the speeches of the mover and the seconder of the motion now before the house, because they were both good Liberal speeches.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Explain.

Mr. Laing: To my good friends who interrupt may I say that I do not think that there was ever a more important time than the present for political parties to hold to and express themselves along the lines of the faith which they have built up in their parties.

In the debate thus far there has been a good deal of emphasis on defence. In the great speech made last night by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) he intimated that there were many domestic matters which would attract the attention of the commoners, and I thoroughly agree with him. I should like to deal with one or two of them today. With all the attention that the ministry is paying to the battles in Korea and those that may occur elsewhere, I hope they will give considerable attention to the battles that are going on in Canadian kitchens every day.

At the same time—and I do not think I need to counsel the ministry in this regard—I hope they will not pay too much attention to the suggestions made by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I think we should be hesitant about jumping into a series of cures that might be immeasurably worse than the disease, and that might well happen if the proposals the hon. member has put before the house were implemented. I have canvassed the people of my riding very thoroughly, and none of them want controls unless they do not apply to them. I think that is the situation pretty well all across Canada. If under the present circumstances we were to compound the controls that we had in the last war, the effects of some of which are still apparent in the country, with another full and complete set of controls, I think it could well be the end of enterprise in Canada. The more we read of the continuing calamitous conditions in countries where socialism has held sway over a period of years, the more apparent it is that it is vitally important to retain enterprise.

Canada has been extremely fortunate in recent years in its ministers of finance. We have a Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) who need take second place to none in all the western democracies today. I sincerely hope and expect that, when he brings down the budget, in addition to going after the revenue which he will require, he will not be unmindful of the living standards of the people, particularly those in the lower income brackets.

I was especially delighted with the offer as to old age pensions made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) when he met the representatives of the provinces. I had the great honour of being a member of the old age security committee of the house. I was extremely proud of the work done by it—and not merely because I was a member; they probably did an excellent job in spite of that. Their report was unanimous, and it was accepted with a degree of unanimity that has not accompanied many reports made to the House of Commons by those who would be the recipients as well as those who would have to do the paying. I devoutly hope that the offer which the Prime Minister made to the provinces will be accepted by them, but if it is necessary to review the situation along the lines of a suitable amendment to our constitution I hope that the ministry will do so.

Inevitably in these affairs we get down to a discussion of whether we can afford guns or butter. In our difficult and complex economy I think that is an oversimplification of the argument, but if we have to discuss it on that basis I would say that we on our side of the world will have half defeated communism when we can display to the world that the fantastic production of free men can provide more of guns and butter than any slave state at any time.

I am going to address the remainder of my remarks today to one of our comparatively new departments, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. This is the first opportunity I have had in the house to extend my congratulations to the minister. I believe his was a very popular appointment. If at that time the Prime Minister had not chosen to exercise his prerogative of calling the minister to wider councils but had left it to a ballot of members in all parts of the house, then I am sure the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) would still be the minister.

The nineteenth century was the century of migration; people were moving from one part of the world to another. In that century no fewer than seventy-eight million people moved from Europe to the new world. What causes people to uproot themselves and go to another country I know not. Perhaps the European peasants did not want to emulate their fathers; perhaps it was the hope of financial improvement; perhaps it was a desire to enjoy new freedoms that were denied in the old country. In the main, however, I think it was the desire to go to a vast, new, and, they hoped, wonderful country.

Things are not so easy today so far as immigration is concerned; people cannot move about so readily. We find most of the nations of the world determined as far as possible to retain their own people. We have financial difficulties that were never encountered in the past. Seemingly every possible obstacle is put in the way of the easy movement of people from one country to another. Since the inauguration of this department we have done a positive and very good job so far as immigration is concerned. I am not going to offer any suggestions to the minister, because in the main I think he has done a magnificent job in getting our immigration department under way; but we may well ask what are the sources from which we seek immigration. Well, I do not think we can do better than get it from the sources which created the present population of Canada, because up to the present we have done a pretty good job, as is proved by the nation as it stands today.

I should like to address myself more directly to the fundamentals of the entire problem, and I am going to be as frank as I can in pointing out some of the opposition that exists within our own country. I am quite confident that if I were to ask the individual members of this house, "Are you in favour of immigration?" they would say yes. If I were to go to the people outside this house most of them would say of course they were in favour of immigration. But I have spoken to responsible labour leaders who say, "Well, you should not bring in too many people, or you will break down wage rates in Canada." I have spoken to industrialists in my province who do not want too many industrialists brought in from other countries because some of them do not like the competition. I have spoken to members of the professions, and some of them say, "Well, we had better go easy in this matter; we do not want too many brought in"—again a matter of competition. I have spoken to some small businessmen, and to be absolutely frank they have said, "Sure, bring in people, but don't bring in any Jews."

If we are to have an immigration policy hedged about with all these qualifications, Mr. Speaker, we shall have no policy at all. We find the odd individual who says, "Oh, yes; it is all right if you bring a man from Nijmegen in Holland and put him in Gravelbourg, Saskatchewan, but don't bring him near me." I believe we have to widen our viewpoint as to the advantages of immigration, and we have to widen our viewpoint in regard to our acceptance of the people whom we are bringing here. In my own province I have seen the magnificent work being done by some of the religious organizations with the people coming to this country. I believe our own department could do a better job than it is doing at the present time. It is all right to meet people at the train, but I think we should organize in such a way that we visit them on their farms, or in their little businesses, or at their homes, six months, nine months and twelve months after they have arrived.

Now let me say a word or two concerning the new policy in respect to the oriental races. I believe in our province the Chinese and Indians would be the first to admit that we cannot open the doors wide. We have opened the doors somewhat in respect to Chinese. I think I know as many Chinese in British Columbia as anyone else in that province. Throughout every campaign during the war, whether it was selling bonds, for the Red Cross or anything else, one group had its job done the very first day of the campaign; that was the Chinese. I appreciate the effect of the new regulations in respect to these people, and I am sure they realize that the number admitted must be limited. I believe there are a few things wrong in Hong Kong, through which we steer them. At the present time they have no appeal from the decision of the board which meets them there. I have advised the minister that I am not so sure you can determine the age of a person within five years by taking an X-ray of his bone structure over there and forwarding it to Ottawa for review.

These are small things. My point is that we are bringing some of those people into our country. I was delighted to learn the other day that we are to bring in annually 150 citizens of our great sister dominion India. I was only a youth at the time, but I vividly remember the incident which occurred in 1913 in Vancouver in connection with the Komagata Maru, having to do with citizens of that country. Perhaps this will help make amends for what at that time was considered by the people and government of India to be a great wrong. With so many people to choose from, I warn the minister that we shall expect him to get the very best when he brings in those 150 annually.

There has been some discussion and criticism of statements attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), by people who have asked, "Are we going too far in order to avoid war?" I hope this country always is headed by a prime minister who will do anything compatible with national honour and the safety of this nation to avoid war. Only the other day I was reading a book, entitled "The Aftermath", written by Winston Churchill in 1926. It is a review of the devastation of the first war, not the second war. As you will recall, he pointed out that all the knowledge of the medical world was brought to bear to return men again and again to the shambles. There are men in this house today who will have a vivid recollection of what I am talking about when I bring up those words of Mr. Churchill. He finally said that nothing was wasted that could conceivably contribute to waste.

Let us look at it from a more shrewdly practical angle. We may assume that the other western democracies are spending like sums, in relation to their total ability to spend, as we are in Canada. With the prodigious sum indicated to us the other night, I would think that if there were one thing we would wish less than a war at any time it would be a war now. I was particularly delighted, and with this observation I am going to close, with the statement made by the Prime Minister not very long ago. He said:

> We want to act in such a manner that the other nations will not look down upon us, and we shall not look down upon them.

I think there is in that observation a great sermon for all of us, indeed much more than a sermon. I think this is a statement of the faith of a government, a statement which promulgates to the rest of the world that in the eyes of Canadians there are no longer any inferior peoples.

I am going to suggest that we should have a live and active immigration policy. There should be a statement from the people of Canada that we will welcome immigrants to this country of opportunity as long as they are good citizens when they come here. I am very serious about this. I believe it constitutes today one of the greatest weapons against international communism. I doubt very much if General Eisenhower's greatest problem in Europe is going to be the procurement of military materiel. I think his problem will be the difficulty of convincing the people of that continent of the measure of danger under which they live today, and to bring about a determination on their part to preserve their lives and retain their beliefs.

One of the greatest responsibilities we have here is, first of all, to know fully the nature of the enemy we are confronting and then to develop within ourselves a sense of responsibility, a sense of discipline—an appreciation of national backbone, if you like. If we do that, then I believe we shall have accomplished one of the most important jobs in repelling this world-wide threat which is facing the free nations today. I believe we are doing exceptionally well in Canada. One of the most important statements was that made by the Prime Minister in respect to other nations in the world, and other peoples, and I think we can reflect that statement in such a way that the other nations of the world will say, "Here is a country that is prepared to accept people on the basis of one qualification only, and that is human integrity and the preservation of human dignity." If we act in that way in this country we shall continue, as we have in recent years, to give leadership beyond the relative population in this country.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, as the deskmate of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) I should like to thank the member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing), who has just spoken, for his timely and very thoughtful remarks about the passing of Mrs. Diefenbaker. In this house the members of all parties form a large family circle. That is true to a degree quite unrealized by the Canadian public at large. In that family circle we not only come to know all the members, but also become acquainted with their wives and families. In my time here there has not been a more friendly, kindly, lovable soul than the late Edna Diefenbaker. She will be sorely missed by everyone in this chamber. I am quite sure that when our mutual friend the member for Lake Centre returns to resume his duties he will have the sympathetic understanding of all the members of the house. He has already made a great contribution to the public life of this country, but he has an even greater contribution to make in the future. I know that everyone will help him when he returns to this chamber.

I have been greatly impressed during the last few weeks by the degree to which the people of the city of Vancouver are worried over the situation in which they find themselves today. I have never known such a general feeling of concern in my home city. Probably other members of the house have found that same attitude prevailing in their respective ridings. I believe that this worry stems largely from the world situation, from the tragic and disturbing events which are taking place beyond our boundaries, but it is caused also by the rising cost of living and the fear of inflation. I believe that as never before our people, regardless of party, are looking to this parliament for some definite leadership to help them face these problems.

That is certainly true on the Pacific coast of Canada, possibly because there we look out to the Pacific and that great continent of Asia. For over seven months now a bitter war has been going on in Korea. Canadian warships have sailed from our ports. Hon. members will have noticed just this week reports of the return to Esquimalt of His Majesty's Canadian ship Sioux. That destroyer was welcomed by thousands of people upon her return to our shores. Canadian transport planes have been flying out from the airport at Vancouver across to Japan; Canadian and American personnel have been carried across the ocean in that way.

And today in Korea, perhaps going into action at this very moment, we have a western battalion, the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry—the Princess Pats as we all know them; that regiment which was the first into battle in the first war; which has made a marvellous reputation since its formation in 1914. Several hundred men from British Columbia are serving in Korea with that regiment. Just a few miles away to the south of Vancouver we have the remainder of the special service force in the United States camp at Fort Lewis. Above all, we realize on Canada's Pacific slope that we are in the direct line of attack from Siberia; that if this war should spread it is very likely that western Canada will be under enemy attack.

Therefore today, believing that the Canadian people are crying out for a definite plan of action, I make bold to offer several suggestions; but before doing so I intend to sketch briefly the broad background of the world situation, because we must always keep it in mind in deciding what steps should be taken by Canada.

The world is in its present condition because of the failure of Russia and her satellites to adopt a policy of co-operation at the end of the second great war; also by the activities of the communists in the free nations, for example, right here in Canada, and finally by the open aggression in Korea. These events have forced the free countries to the conclusion that the Soviet and its satellites aim at world domination; and have driven the free nations to a policy of being united, and also of being strong.

I think the situation is very accurately summed up in one of the paragraphs of the speech from the throne which reads as follows:

> The increased menace in the Far East reinforces the mounting evidence that communist imperialism is determined to dominate the world by force or the fear of force, and that the only hope of maintaining peace with freedom lies in the rapid increase of the combined strength of the free nations. It is equally important that the free nations should make it abundantly clear that they have no aggressive designs and that they are resolved to aid in constructive endeavours to improve the standards of human welfare in underdeveloped countries.

In other words, the free nations are making themselves strong not to attack, not to start a third world war. You and I know, Mr. Speaker, that the free nations could not start a third world war if they wished to do so; because any leaders, here in Canada for example, who tried to advocate a policy of that kind would very quickly find that they had no support. Our hope of course is that Russian leaders, because of the strength of the free nations, will eventually come to see that the only policy for them to pursue is one of co-operation. At that time effective disarmament should be possible and the establishment of a world police force under the United Nations. May I point out that such a result will be far better for the free nations than any world war, because no matter who wins a third world war, all parties taking part in it will suffer terribly.

In any event the policy of the free nations today, including Canada, is to become strong and to continue strong until there is no longer a threat of war. That means continuing strong perhaps for years, perhaps for generations, perhaps for the lifetime of everyone in this chamber today; and yet, during the whole of that time, facing the possibility of war overnight.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs put that possibility quite neatly the other day when he said, as reported at page 57 of Hansard:

> I say now, that the free world is in the greatest possible danger.

That condition will continue. Such a policy is very difficult for Canada, perhaps the most difficult sort of policy we could undertake, because it means staying power, it means a lot of determination; and our experience with wars and preparation for war has been so completely different. In each of the world wars we were thrown in suddenly, we had to mobilize in a hurry. There was intense patriotic fervour, a great will to win, and the nation was able to develop a very strong war effort. Today we do not face that situation. We face an entirely different kind of problem. It is no wonder that the Canadian people are perplexed and are calling for leadership. So I come to my five suggestions.

First, we must not forget that there is a war to be won in Korea. There is fighting to be done there. If the broad policy adopted by the free nations is the proper policy and can be made to work, there will probably be no fighting anywhere else in the world but in Korea, and we all devoutly hope that such will be the case. However, there is still a war going on in Korea and it must be brought to an end.

The other day the Secretary of State for External Affairs dealt with that, too. He was referring to the Korean war, and described it as a diversionary and weakening struggle which should be brought to an end as soon as possible.

Let Canada step in and do her best to help end that war. She has not done her share, to date. This Korean war was started by an aggressor. We have called that aggressor North Korea; but there is little doubt in the mind of anyone that the real aggressor was Red China or, in any event, that she was associated with that aggression and had Soviet backing.

Action was taken by the United Nations to meet the aggression, and Canada was associated with such action. Canada authorized action to be taken to meet that aggression. It quickly became apparent that the key to the whole situation was the supplying of ground troops. I would remind hon. members that in the telegram from the Secretary General of the United Nations on July 14, 1950, there was an urgent appeal to Canada for ground forces. That message read in part as follows:

I have been advised that there is an urgent need for additional effective assistance. I should be grateful therefore if your government would examine its capacity to provide an increased volume of combat forces, particularly ground forces.

Canada sent out three destroyers and has provided certain air transport, both of which steps are to be commended. I believe the men who have manned the ships and who have flown the planes have rendered a wonderful service for Canada and the United Nations. Great credit is due also to the young men of this nation who have volunteered for the ground forces.

But there was delay. I do not intend to outline in detail the delays which took place. We do know however that there was delay after delay in respect to ground forces, while all the time Canada could have sent one of her regular battalions to Korea promptly. Eventually a brigade was raised for service in Korea, which became known across the country as the Korean brigade. The house met last summer and approved the dispatch of that brigade to Korea. An advance party was sent across the Pacific ocean; then the Princess Pats were sent over; but then the advance party, with the exception of that portion attached to the Princess Pats, was recalled; and recalled at a time when United Nations forces in Korea were suffering very heavy defeats and were being compelled to retreat.

These acts, these delays, these different actions have caused talk south of the border. The people in Vancouver frequently go across to the United States because the distance is short. They are being told by their American friends that it is hard to understand the attitude Canada has been taking in the Korean struggle.

I have before me an article which appeared in Fortune, one of the outstanding American publications, and from which I shall quote. This is the edition for November, 1950; and, under the heading, "Comfortable Canada", it says:

In part, Canada's latest burst of prosperity can be traced to a belief that the free world's post-Korean rearmament will make heavy demands on Canada's raw materials, but need not make heavy demands of Canadians in taxes or manpower. In the bluntest terms, the question that arises is this: Is Canada doing her share?

There has been very little in the events of the last six months about which Canadians can be proud. The handling by the government of Canada's activities in the Korean crisis has been one of the most disgraceful episodes in Canada's history. Let us now do our share to finish this war in Korea. Let us send the other two battalions to Korea, with their supporting troops. Do not leave the Princess Pats to be the forgotten heroes of Canada.

There is a lesson in this for Canada, and it is that we must stand beside the United States when she is in trouble. I would be the first to insist that Canada must not become subservient to the United States in any respect; and I do not believe Americans want to have us subservient neighbours. But we must stand beside them when they are in trouble.

Let us look at the situation today. Because of the second world war, against her wishes the United States was thrown into world leadership. Americans did not want to be worried with the leadership of the world. Yet they took on that difficult job, and I think have handled it extremely well. They are a brave people, a proud people, an idealistic people, and a very friendly people. They are our friends. Over Korea Canada should have stood out as the friend of the United States. That would have been remembered for all time—because it is what one does when one's friends are in trouble that really counts. If a person or a nation cannot stand behind a friend in time of trouble then that person or nation will never be considered such a good friend in the future.

We had a great opportunity, but we failed to take advantage of it; and events in the United Nations in the last week or two have not helped. They have made that position worse. All this quibbling and wavering with Canada hesitating, questioning and appearing to be dubious as to whether she should support the American resolution, and not opposing the Asian resolution, is not going to help our relationship with the United States. Yet, right today we expect Americans to defend us in the north. The minister says that if there were an attack in the north Canada could not defend herself, would have to have American help; we also expect them to defend us on the sea and in the air.

Let us remember what happened just a few years ago—in 1938—when at Kingston that great American president, Franklin D. Roosevelt, made this statement about Canada:

The Dominion of Canada is part of the sisterhood of the British empire. I give to you assurance that the people of the United States will not stand idly by if domination of Canadian soil is threatened by any other empire.

In 1940 he took the same attitude when the Ogdensburg agreement was negotiated and a joint permanent defence board for North America set up; the same attitude was again adopted in connection with the Hyde Park declaration in 1941. I repeat that Canada should have been beside the United States in Korea. Fortunately there is still time for her to be there.

My second suggestion is to urge once more that Canada press for a Pacific defence pact, for a common policy by all friendly nations in the Pacific. Canada is vitally concerned in this, as has been shown by Korea. As I mentioned a few moments ago, if there is ever an invasion of this country it will come from Asia. We must consider also the possibilities of trade across the Pacific ocean which is of the utmost importance to this country.

Today the Pacific area is in a state of flux. We are still worrying about a fire that might start at the front door in Europe while we are letting the house burn down merrily at the back door in Asia. The Pacific area must be stabilized. A Japanese peace treaty is to be negotiated shortly and in this connection the United States are now considering favourably the setting up or negotiating of a Pacific defence pact. I have here a press dispatch dated January 22 which reads:

> Pact on Pacific U.S. envoy's aim in Jap peace talk.
> The biggest unsolved problem facing Ambassador John Foster Dulles on the eve of leaving for the Far East is how to meet the desire of such countries as Australia and New Zealand for security against a rebirth of aggressive Japanese militarism.
> There has been some thought in the U.S. government here that the best solution might be a Pacific security pact, somewhat like the Atlantic pact.

I urge the minister again to have Canada press for a defence pact in the Pacific. Perhaps it could be done by extending the coverage of the North Atlantic pact or perhaps an entirely new pact should be negotiated. But something must be done. Mind you, I give the government credit for the aid that has been provided to southeast Asia under the Colombo plan and to countries under the plan to aid undeveloped countries. I was pleased to see in the speech from the throne the promise that such aid is to be continued during the next year. But a great deal remains to be done in the Pacific and it is vital that there be a defence pact covering that area.

My third suggestion is that action must be taken at once to strengthen Canada's reserve army. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) did not deal with the reserve army when he spoke the other night. In my view he painted only half the picture. He dealt with the active forces and said that he would be talking about the reserve army on some future occasion.

I do not believe that we can divide the forces in that way. This house must keep in mind the picture of the whole defence force. The place of the reserve army—the same would be true of the air force reserve and possibly to a degree also of the naval reserve—in Canada's defence activities, both at home and abroad, is of the utmost importance. Here at home we have one airborne brigade for the defence of Canada; that is all we shall have when the special service forces have gone either to Europe or to Korea, or both. Over and above that one airborne brigade we shall be dependent upon our reserve army. The Minister of National Defence explained this when he spoke in Vancouver on November 22 of last year and said:

> Reserve forces are the only practical instrument for the long-term defence of Canada.
> In a country as large and thinly populated as Canada our plans must be based on a small nuclear full-time force and a large reserve.
> Our full-time forces are a highly-trained core which is second to none. But we will always have to depend on reserves.

In the event of a third world war and Canada having to send troops abroad practically all of those troops will have to come from the reserve forces. It takes so long under our present conditions to prepare reserve troops for action. The general officer commanding western command, Major General Penhale, who has either retired or is about to retire, made a statement on this point less than a month ago. He stated in Vancouver that it would take at least a year to train an effective fighting force in Canada. The article continued:

> General Penhale, who is retiring as g.o.c., western command, was commenting on the necessity for increased interest in the Canadian army reserve force.
> "The reserve force is soundly organized, but we need more manpower," he said. "We can't turn over from peace to war in twenty-four hours. It takes time."

Some of these reserve units are expected to defend us in the event of attack from the air. In Vancouver we have a reserve anti-aircraft regiment whose job it is to protect us from air raids. Those men should be ready to go into action practically at a moment's notice. The Minister of National Defence has been telling the municipalities throughout Canada that they must get busy and prepare for civilian defence. It is even more important that the anti-aircraft defences of Canada should be ready. The Minister of National Defence said last week—he makes so many speeches that it is not hard to find something to quote and I think sometimes he needs a walkie-talkie—that the probability of air attack is a very real one indeed.

What is the present position? Here is the situation with regard to this anti-aircraft regiment as reported in a newspaper article on January 22 quoting Brigadier W. J. Megill, reserve army commander in British Columbia, and other officers as follows:

> The 65th Light Anti-Aircraft Regiment, Irish Fusiliers, has 200 officers and men, 700 below its full complement, said its officer commanding, Lieutenant Colonel G. E. Ryan.

Brigadier Megill said that the British Columbia reserve army units were short 9,000 men and that they had only approximately 3,000 men at the present time. We can verify that situation in the advertisements published by the Department of National Defence in the daily papers. In the Ottawa papers of January 31 an advertisement appeared headed, "You can do more than talk about freedom." It reads in part:

> Today . . . from coast to coast every unit of the Canadian army reserve force needs more men who are willing to devote part of their spare time to our country's security.

Another advertisement reads in part:

> From Newfoundland to British Columbia Canada is calling men from every walk of life—men who are willing to devote part of their time to serving Canada. Canada's need for more men in the reserve force was never greater.

This is the reason why the Canadian Legion are conducting at the present time what they call "operation preparedness," a campaign designed to put the reserve force in a position where it can carry out its function. Splendid leadership is being given by the Canadian Legion right across the country in this campaign. Similar leadership is being given by other veterans organizations such as the Army, Navy, and Air Force Veterans Association. This house would be well advised to listen to the pleas for action by these bodies of Canadian veterans. If the reserve army is not made efficient Canada may very well face disaster in the years ahead, and possibly even in the days or months that lie ahead.

My fourth suggestion is that there must be prompt action to deal with the increase in the cost of living and with inflation. Sometimes I think that this problem is just as serious as the problem brought on by the war menace. Certainly it is affecting every family in Canada today. War, old age and other pensioners, war veterans allowance recipients, annuitants and Canadian men and women with modest savings scraped together by a whole lifetime of toil, find themselves without enough to live decently. That is what the loss of value of our money is doing. That is what the rising cost of living and inflation are doing. Take the salaried groups, clerks, teachers, government employees, all those groups that are not in a position to do very much about getting their salaries increased. Take the wage earners of Canada, whose wages are always behind the cost of living, who can never catch up with the rising cost of living. That is the situation in Canada today, and it must be faced.

It is caused of course in the main by the diversion of our production to wartime materials; by the steps we are taking to build our war strength. It is an abnormal situation and is going to get worse. We must be strong, perhaps for years to come, and the situation with which I am dealing is not going to improve. It is bound to grow worse. I suggest it must be faced.

I believe that price controls should be placed on key commodities without further delay. The government has announced that it is going to introduce stand-by legislation which will enable it, if it so decides, to impose price controls. What was the result of that action? The result of a statement of that kind was simply to force prices up higher. Men in the retail, distribution and wholesale trades have come to me within the last two or three weeks saying that something must be done about prices because they are going up every day. One man said that his prices have risen by 80 per cent in the last three months. These men say that the situation is simply intolerable and that something must be done to remedy it. They were not consumers; they were men in a position to be able to increase their prices.

I also believe that it would be most opportune if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) were to make a full and frank statement in this debate on ways to prevent inflation. I realize that price controls are not a cure-all, but I believe it is the duty of the Minister of Finance to tell the house, and through us the Canadian people everything that can be done. There is little understanding throughout the country of the underlying causes of inflation or of the best remedies. We hear, for example, such recommendations as these: that individuals should increase their personal savings, that the government should cut out every unnecessary expenditure, that there should be heavier taxation, that there should be restriction of credit, that there should be an allocation of scarce materials, that interest rates should be raised so that persons having savings accounts, for example, would receive a higher rate of interest and thus would be encouraged to save rather than spend; we hear that there should be increased individual production. These are some of the cures that are being mentioned. I suggest that we should have a statement from the Minister of Finance. Everyone in Canada is being hurt no matter how poor or how wealthy he or she may be, and I believe that the Canadian people would co-operate voluntarily in a scheme to curb inflation if they were given leadership from the House of Commons.

My final suggestion is related to the fact that great interest is still being taken throughout Canada in contributory pensions and the removal of the means test. The Canadian people—in British Columbia at any rate—are thoroughly sold on the need for a policy which will result in the introduction of contributory pensions and the removal of the means test. They are expecting action. I take it from the throne speech, and from statements that have been made in the house and outside by ministers and parliamentary assistants, that there is very little likelihood of legislation at this session which will establish contributory pensions or remove the means test. I regret that such is the case, and I believe the failure to take such steps will cause great disappointment.

I urge upon the government that this period of high employment is a good time to start a contributory scheme in Canada. During the second world war we were able to establish unemployment insurance on a firm foundation because at that time there was high employment and it was possible to build up large reserves. The same thing could be done now to establish a contributory pension scheme. Furthermore much of the money which might be spent by the people could be drained off to provide some at least of the funds for a contributory scheme. I do hope that even yet the government will decide there can be legislation along this line at this session.

Those are my five suggestions. I urge them upon the government in all sincerity, and I hope it may be possible to get action along at least some of these lines. In conclusion may I say that while there is great concern across the country; while the members of this house are looking and feeling very blue, and everyone seems to believe that though the world has not yet come to an end it may do so very shortly; yet let me point out that we are not the first generation of Canadians who have had serious problems to face, and we are not going to be the last. Personally I believe that we are very fortunate to live in such an interesting, exciting and challenging time. Certainly no one could call this a dull era. I believe, further, that Canadians still have the wisdom, courage and determination to surmount all obstacles, no matter what they may be.

[Mr. Green.]

I propose to support the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), which I want to place on record again:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed
> (1) to give this nation leadership in the face of the present grave danger; and
> (2) to bring into being forces necessary to enable Canada to defend itself and discharge its international obligations; and
> (3) to take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, before participating in this debate I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the manner in which they performed a very arduous task and the credit they have brought upon themselves and the ridings they represent in the House of Commons. May I note also the visit of our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to England to attend the conference of commonwealth prime ministers. His wonderful participation, his most helpful suggestions and the way he dealt with the difficult problems submitted to that conference have earned for him our great admiration. The deliberations in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has taken part at the United Nations assembly, his splendid way of dealing with the most delicate questions and with a not too loyal opponent, his unending efforts, his great sense of justice as well as his gentlemanly attitude at the council table have undoubtedly brought him to the fore and wholly justify the esteem we all hold for him. The detailed and precise exposé recently given in this house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) of the way Canada intends to co-operate with and help the North Atlantic nations in their common effort to wipe communism from the face of the globe gives us great hope for the future.

When very recently in the other place we heard the speech from the throne we received that message with mixed feelings of satisfaction and apprehension. It was indeed gratifying to be entrusted with a mandate by a free people in a free country, where it is possible for us as free men to debate in this house legislation we believe capable of providing a solution to the present situation, and to feel that in this way it is possible for us to co-operate in helping, we hope before long, a people now living under fear to express themselves through a free government of their own choice. But there was also, sir, a feeling of apprehension because of the seriousness of the task with which we are confronted and the grave responsibilities arising from it.

In order to implement our program of co-operation with the Atlantic charter nations we will be asked to authorize Canadian participation in the integrated force. Having the security of Canada in mind I am sure no hon. member of this house will oppose this policy of preparedness; and I am one of those who believe that if we are to fight the enemy it is preferable to do so away from our shores. In connection with this defence program I should like to remind the minister, in view of his speech a few days ago in which he offered all available facilities to the North Atlantic pact nations to train their air forces in our country, that in the riding of Prescott we have two large airports, at Pendleton and St. Eugene, which served the very same purpose during the last war under the commonwealth air training plan, but which unfortunately are now idle. We also have a landing field at Hawkesbury which at present is used by a private flying club. Just here I must say that this club has trained many efficient pilots, and I hope that in the very near future it may be possible to provide them with a beacon so they may go on with their night training.

So it will be seen that the riding of Prescott has much to offer in the matter of air training. Its ideal location between the capital city of Ottawa and the metropolis of Montreal undoubtedly constitutes a determining factor in bringing those airports into the tremendous air training plan which the minister intends to implement during the next three years. Therefore I strongly urge that immediate steps be taken to study the possibility of putting some of these airfields to use.

In the same speech from the throne we were told that we will be asked to approve substantially increased expenditures for defence. I am aware of the need for the expenditures, but I am sure that in his coming budget the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will not tax incomes too heavily. With the present costs of living I fear it would be disastrous if we were to ask too great a sacrifice of our people. There are other expedients, I am sure, to which we can have recourse to obtain the necessary money with which to put our defence program on a sound basis.

Now I come to price control, a subject of great interest to the members of the party immediately opposite me, that is, the C.C.F. I am at a loss to understand the subamendment proposed today by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). That amendment reads:

> That the following words be added to the amendment, immediately after the words "rising cost of living" in the last line thereof:
> "such as the immediate reimposition of price controls, and the payment of subsidies where necessary, so as to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people."

With regard to the hon. member who seconded the subamendment, there was an interesting article in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, dated January 23, 1951, entitled "Opposed to Price, Wage Freeze Now". It states:

> R. R. Knight, member of parliament for Saskatoon, said on Thursday he opposed price and wage controls now. He said that to freeze prices and wages now would permit industry to continue to enjoy exorbitant profits. Mr. Knight addressed nineteen unionists representing the C.C.L., the T.L.C., and the Railway Brotherhoods in the Farmer-Labour Hall.
> Workers should be free to bargain and whittle those profits down to size, he said. Wage controls would be sound in a war economy provided a proper relationship between prices and costs of production could be reached first.

That was about a fortnight ago, yet today the same hon. member seconds this subamendment.

Mr. Knowles: Surely the hon. member knows that is not a correct report.

Mr. Bruneau: I am happy to note that amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act are to be introduced to prevent the retention of Canadian citizenship by persons who have renounced their allegiance, or shown by their conduct that they are not loyal, to Canada. I am wholly of the opinion that such amendments are most important and urgent, since it is imperative that citizenship in a free country should not be shared by those who are endeavouring to destroy the very essence of our liberty. There should be a thorough screening of those suspected of subversive activity. Those who made the supreme sacrifice at Vimy during the first world war, on the shores of Dieppe during the second world war, and today in the hills of Korea, paid too great a price for the freedom of a free democratic country to allow saboteurs and communists at large to enjoy it.

Another cheerful feature of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General is the mention of the fact that the high level of employment and production within our country will give our people increased capacity to meet the demands of national security.

Before long I should like to see a bill introduced in this house granting a pension to invalids. Since my entry into politics in June, 1949, most of the cases that have been brought to my attention concern invalids. We owe it to those who cannot help themselves to bring them assistance. I am happy also to notice the mention of a contributory old age pensions program along the lines recommended by the joint committee at the last regular session, and that proposals to that effect were laid before the provincial governments for new tax agreements. Our old people will certainly rejoice at the thought that, during this session, legislation will be introduced concerning their welfare. There is not a single member in this house who will not do his utmost to see that the twilight of life is made a little more cheerful and bright for our aged citizens.

The spirit of unity so happily reflected in the conferences between the federal and provincial governments, which is an assurance that the program of social security will operate smoothly, we owe in a great measure to the masterly hand and tactfulness of our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

I hope that the amendments to be introduced to the Central Mortgage and Housing Act will make it possible for our people with meagre incomes to build a home which they will own and cherish.

Another measure which I should like to see introduced is one concerning the decentralization of industry. Should we be attacked from the air, and this is not an improbability, it would be preferable for our industry as a whole to be spread across the dominion rather than concentrated in two or three cities. In this way our productive capacity would not be impaired.

Let us hope that the report of the royal commission on the arts, letters, and sciences will become available during the course of this session. I add here, sir, that I intend to table a resolution regarding the introduction of a bill to create a youth department. This department would not overlap the provincial departments of education, as once alleged by the premier of Quebec during a press conference. This department would establish a vocational guidance school for our young people who have the ability but lack the money to develop their talents. On a national scale we could guide our young people in the liberal arts, sciences, the different fields of knowledge and agriculture, thus enabling us to find better trained citizens at home and avoid the necessity of importing skilled or specialized labour from abroad.

[Mr. Bruneau.]

In conclusion, sir, it is most comforting for the legislators in this House of Commons to be able to debate as free men upon a legislative program prepared by a cabinet whose prime aim is to achieve security and prosperity for the people by whom they were given a mandate, and in this way to bring freedom to other people now living behind iron curtains.

(Translation):

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should be remiss in my duty if I failed to offer my wholehearted congratulations to the mover of the address in reply, (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) for the ideas they expressed in their speeches and the manner in which they acquitted themselves.

Mr. Speaker, although for the past decades our country has experienced an unprecedented development in the political, social and economic fields, the numerous and complicated problems that arise in the international sphere seem to baffle our leaders. Already we feel it deeply in our daily lives. However, unless those problems are solved quickly, they will jeopardize our way of life, our very existence as a nation, during the present generation and perhaps that of tomorrow.

Every Canadian citizen no doubt realizes the seriousness of the situation. The events unfolding before his eyes summon the ghastly spectre of a third world war.

Canada, however, does not want war, any more than other countries in the association of free nations. Yet rearmament is progressing; there is a sort of confusion, and the latest discussions of the United Nations all seem to lead to the same question: What will cause the spark that will ignite the powder keg?

Such is the present state of affairs and it seems that the Communists have no intention of ending their struggle for world domination.

Karl Marx introduced his doctrine about a hundred years ago and I remember having read in a certain manifesto: "A dream, the communist dream, is spreading over Europe." Now, a hundred years later, we have to admit that the dream has given way to tragic reality.

Russia is expressing the most brutal forms of that dream. Her treacherous doctrine, under the guise of a protective political system, of promised social reforms, of a utopian economic policy, implied the destruction of humanity's most sacred possession, the spiritual nature of man.

Considering the way of life of nations still living under freedom, a way of life mirrored in our religious beliefs, in our discerning liberties, in our democratic governments, how can we imagine that this global ideology, which affects all human activities and tends to spread by every possible means, by enslaving the minds of people and by armed force, will at any given time stop its victorious march against free countries dedicated to utterly opposite ideals?

At the present time, nobody can deny that the communist ideology is spreading at an alarming rate.

The bait tendered the world by Russia varies according to the quarry for which she is angling. At times, she resorts to the cry of the people, promising less fortunate masses equality and security as was done in some Asiatic countries, while at other times she pits the colonial spirit against alleged imperialism, as happened in Indo-China, for instance. Elsewhere, in pacifist countries, she uses peace crusades such as the one we witnessed in Canada not so long ago. Today, she denounces war profiteering capitalists, and so on. That is perhaps what prompted a great leader of industry, Mr. Rhys Sale, president of the Ford Company of Canada, to say: Communists depict leaders of trade and industry as greedy cowards who hide behind the firing-line while the workers, fathers and sons serve as cannon fodder.

Unfortunately, such appeals sometimes bear a faint resemblance to the truth; but that is not the whole truth. Today, how many peoples behind the iron curtain have bitterly tasted this false social security, this imaginary paradise that no one ever sees.

This cold war, which can hardly last much longer as such, seems to take a more concrete shape. Already we can see the Russian strategy seeking, on the one hand, the balance of power among the nations and, on the other hand, trying by vile propaganda to dominate the world by enslaving the minds. This thought was again expressed by Mr. Sale and I quote:

> The rulers of the Kremlin believe they have perfected a technique that will enable them to rule the world. This technique is based on the principle that it is easier to enslave men by seizing their minds than by tying their hands.
> Hungary, Roumania, Poland, Czechoslovakia, North Korea and China have been the victims of this technique which is a more powerful weapon than the hydrogen bomb.

This balance of power I just spoke of is at stake in various places. Europe, exhausted by two wars and faced with enormous problems, barely has the strength to recover. Nobody can deny that potential resources of the free part of Europe could help communist Russia tremendously.

We know, too, that China, Russia's ally in any world war, would become an important factor, fraught with the gravest consequences for the United Nations. On the other hand, Asia remains a very vulnerable point.

Such are, in my opinion, the factors at work in the balance of power. The North Atlantic treaty nations will, we believe, stand firm and, with the immense assistance they will receive from other countries, the peoples concerned will be able to present a solid enough front to deter aggression.

On the other hand, we cannot say as much of the Chinese people. The disastrous Korean war has added to difficulties which already existed.

Knowing that a Russo-Chinese alliance would constitute, in the event of war, an extremely powerful association of forces, I hope that the United Nations will find a way to prevent war with this satellite country. Though we must not seek peace at any price, thus jeopardizing our national security, no door must remain closed, no stone left unturned by the United Nations in order to solve this situation by peaceful means.

I need not remind this house once more of the sane and cautious attitude of the government in seeking a solution to this problem.

The speech from the throne refers to the Colombo plan in connection with the underprivileged populations of Asia. Some time ago I read in the press a statement from India's prime minister, Mr. Nehru, to the effect that the struggle for supremacy between Russian communism and the free nations' democratic system will not be determined by war, but by what those systems have to offer.

That statement is very true. Armed conflict has seldom led to lasting solutions. The war that broke out in 1914 was meant to destroy German imperialism for ever. Twenty years later, the same German imperialism caused another war, because we were then called upon to defend Poland. I need not ask you how long Poland enjoyed freedom.

But Mr. Speaker, before discussing further the issue of this cold war between Christian countries and the forces of evil, I pause a moment to examine the position of Canada in the face of the international situation..

Following the speech from the throne and the brilliant statement of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), the attention of all Canadians should centre on our defence. Since we intend to spend some $5 billion for defence, it is obvious that Canada will shortly be on a war footing.

Canada's population is only about 14 million and she is barely recovering from the dire effects of another war. Any honest Canadian will admit that our contribution to our common defence is second to that of no other country. However, I wish to draw the attention of the government to the dangers entailed by such a large scale effort. As a result of the program which is under way, a shortage of manpower is already predicted for the summer of 1951. By recruiting volunteers, the army will absorb a large proportion of our youth and war industries, an ever-increasing number of workers. Our economy has already been disturbingly jolted. The cost of living is skyrocketing and the slightest increase in prices would so upset the balance of many a family budget that our war effort might be seriously impaired.

Conscription of manpower under present conditions would be harmful to our economy and to the free effort of the nation, to the defence of our country and to the help we must give our allies, but uncontrolled inflation would risk slowing down the steps taken to preserve our liberty in the face of the communist peril.

Some time ago, General Eisenhower said:

(Text):

A nation's defence must spring from its own soul, and the soul cannot be imported.

Owing to the wise administration of the present government, Mr. Speaker, and the prudent measures which have been laid down so far in this house, the soul of the nation today looks to its leaders with confidence.

The Canadian nation has historically inherited the civilization of two great races: the Anglo-Saxon civilization that I have learned to like, the Latin civilization that I love. The Canadian nation, I daresay, has moral values that it is determined to keep and defend.

Canadian unity is a fact in this country and over the years our forefathers had to fight and make great sacrifices in order that we might enjoy today the heritage of which we are so proud.

If sometimes, owing to the diversity of our culture and our languages, it has been onerous for us all, we have, nevertheless, learned to know one another better and to respect each other. Let us thank Providence that through all those years we have acquired above all in this land of ours the right to be called Christian Canadians and democrats forming a nation with a soul conscious of its values and of its responsibilities.

This nation has a soul and a history, young maybe, but I hope from the bottom of my heart that the government will soon consider giving to the people of Canada an emblem which will symbolize in our public places, and in foreign lands, the reason why we are proud to be Canadians and united in the defence of this country—a national flag.

Mr. R. R. Knight (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in entering the debate at this time is this: a few moments ago, not in my hearing but in the hearing of hon. members in the house, the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bruneau) assumed, and stated —and from the evidence he had in his hand I do not blame him for so stating—that I had at a certain meeting, where I met certain members of trade unions in Saskatoon, namely on the night before I caught the train to come to Ottawa, made certain statements. His statement was that I am reported in the Star-Phoenix as having said that I was opposed to the freezing of wages and prices now.

The hon. member has been most friendly about it, and has shown me the clipping. While I have found that, generally speaking, the reporters serving my home-town paper, the Star-Phoenix of Saskatoon, are very accurate, this is one occasion where they made a most distinct error. I did notice at the meeting at which I spoke that the young lad who had been sent to report the meeting was just that. He was a young lad; and I did hope that, in the light of the somewhat technical manner in which I discussed the subject, he would get the facts straight.

Until today I had neglected to renew my usual request that the Star-Phoenix be supplied to me here. The result is that I have had no opportunity to see that newspaper. I could have seen it of course if I had gone down to the reading room; but I did not do so. The result is that its being brought to my attention by the hon. member for Prescott was the first intimation, with one exception, concerning the mistake that had been made. One of the people who, of late, have been sending us cards in regard to price controls—and some of these are friends of mine—wrote to me telling me about this mistake in the Star-Phoenix. I have on my desk the copy of the letter in that regard.

Let me add that at that meeting were represented I believe every trade and industry in Saskatoon, including the two great labour congresses, the packing-house workers and others. People from nearly all the trade unions in Saskatoon were represented. There was not one of the thirty or so men who met me who had any doubt whatever as to where I stand in the matter of price controls.

I spoke for forty minutes at the meeting, and I spoke in favour of price controls—just as I had spoken to forty-two meetings in various parts of this country during the last month or two, and spoken in favour of price controls. Many of those meetings were in the maritime provinces. I think therefore that I am thoroughly on record as to where I stand in respect of the control of prices. I am in favour of price control—and now. What I have said ought to straighten the matter out, so far as the house is concerned.

Then, so far as the hon. member for Prescott and the Star-Phoenix are concerned, I shall have something further to say. I have the highest regard for the Star-Phoenix, as a good newspaper. May I say in all kindness to the hon. member for Prescott that I do not see how he could have sat in the house since he was elected, whatever the date may have been—a year or two ago, I believe—and have listened to me speak in debate, along with other members of the group with which I am associated, and then in all sincerity accuse me of ever having made a speech of this sort. That I cannot fathom.

I am prepared however to give him the benefit of the doubt. I will not say that someone in his own party supplied him with a juicy item which purported to show that I, who only today seconded the amendment of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) in favour of price controls, had within the last two weeks addressed a meeting of trade union members in Saskatoon at which I had opposed the same thing.

I believe, sir, that I have made myself clear. As a matter of fact, I have penned a letter to the Star-Phoenix over my own name protesting this quotation. Then, in case hon. members are curious as to what I did say, may I offer an explanation? I said—and I would ask hon. members to listen carefully; my Liberal friends opposite would perhaps like to quote it to me on some other occasion—that "if you at this moment combine"—and note the word "combine"—"wage and price controls, and put them both now into effect that, in the present disparity which exists, that would be unfair and unthinkable, and would make permanent the high scale of profits now being enjoyed."

As I have said, there was no doubt in the minds of all those trade unionists as to where I stood. We met there in a meeting held in favour of price controls, and I said to them what I have said to the house now.

I am sure now that the hon. member for Prescott will accept my assurance that I never at any time opposed price controls either in the house or out of it. Since I have become tantalized to the point where I have to make a speech, I shall proceed to put myself on record by giving some of the reasons why I believe price controls would be a good thing for this country, and why I think the lack of such controls bears heavily upon many people in Canada.

In the first place there is a demand for price controls from all parts of the country. I need not say here that the cost of living index has risen rapidly. Taking a base of 100 for 1939, we find that it has crept up to about the 170 mark. This simply means that anyone wishing to buy goods now must take $1.70 with which to purchase goods which would have cost $1 in 1939. That, may I say, is the figure for the general price index. That index covers commodities such as carpets, organs, electric refrigerators, and other items which are comparative luxuries for many people.

What is the price index for food? The last time I saw it the figure was 218. What does that mean to the people of Canada? What does it mean to the housewives? It means this, that when you or your wife go down town you must take $2.18 to buy that which formerly cost $1. One does not need a very large pocket in his overcoat to be able to carry home with him $2.18 worth of groceries.

That is what I have to say about price controls. It is not too bad for you and for me. It is not too bad for the man whose wages have been increased to a comparatively decent level; but it plays havoc with the old people in our country. How would you like to be living in a garret, as I saw people living in garrets in the slums of Saint John. I wish the hon. member from that city were here so that he could hear me say it. People were living there like rats—old people living up in third-storey garrets, with only $40 to spend in a month. Those people are not buying goods rated in the 170 price index; they are buying only one thing, food—and not too much of that.

After having seen those things, if I could come back here, stand in my place in the house and say I was not in favour of price controls, under present conditions, then I would have, like many other members in this house must have, something pretty deadly on my conscience.

That is my stand on price controls. I could go on of course to deal in more detail with the matter. I did not know that I was going to make a speech when I came down here and found that the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bruneau) had made the statement he had. If there is any question in anyone's mind in regard to my attitude on this matter, that question has now been answered. I do not think I have a reputation for inconsistency in this house or outside. I say the things that I believe. I do not pussyfoot. I do not change my mind after a couple of weeks as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) and to urge this house to vote for that amendment, asking as it does for the immediate reimposition of price controls. If some of my friends on the other side of the house feel that for some reason—merely because they feel they have to support the government—they cannot do so, I hope that all hon. members on this side of the house will support it and that there will be a few Liberals independent enough to express what I am sure they know are the views of the people of this country.

Before I go further into that may I say that inevitably a good deal of the discussion during this debate has been with reference to the international situation. That matter has been well covered by the leader of this group and by other hon. members so I do not need to elaborate further. I should simply like to say that in my view the Canadian people, now as always, can be counted on to measure up to any challenge with which they may be confronted, but I think it is also the case—and this is the point we have been trying to press upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the government as a whole—that the Canadian people want their leaders to take every possible step, consistent with honour and basic principles, to avoid getting involved in war. If war comes, that is another story; the people of this country will meet that challenge if they have to; but first of all they want their leaders to do their best to avoid our getting into a general war, the extent of which could not but be catastrophic.

Other members of this group, including the hon. member for Saskatoon who has just resumed his seat, have endeavoured to impress upon the house and the government the seriousness of this problem of rising prices and inflation. Various answers have been given by the government as to why they are not prepared to embark upon a program of price controls. One of the reasons put forward is that to do so would put the government and the officials of various departments up against very difficult problems in connection with administration, enforcement and so on.

Let it be said right away that no one denies that there are difficulties involved in administering and enforcing a program of price controls. But we ask the government to set against the difficulties that they would have to deal with, and which are not insurmountable, the much greater difficulties that are facing the Canadian people from coast to coast. In almost every home in this country the problem of making both ends meet is becoming an impossible one, carrying with it a terrible sense of frustration. Surely the Canadian people have the right to expect their government and their parliament to take steps to help to alleviate that serious difficulty.

The argument that there are difficulties in the way comes with particular ill grace from the Canadian government in view of the proud boast that they have made, a boast they were justified in making, about the good job that they did in the field of price controls during world war II. I strongly urge that that argument be dropped and that the government face up to the problems confronting our people and bring in a program of price controls, and subsidies if necessary, with the least possible delay.

The hon. member for Saskatoon just referred to the fact that the cost of living index, which now stands at 172·5, is the over-all index and does not give the picture so far as individual items are concerned. He indicated that the last figure he had for the food index was 218. I telephoned the dominion bureau of statistics about two o'clock today to inquire as to the present food index and was told that the last figure they had was 220·2. In other words, the cost of food, already sky high, is still rising. We simply cannot get away from what this means in terms of difficulties and problems, in terms of lowered health and living standards for our Canadian people.

I had something to say during the session last fall about this, with particular reference to our old age pensioners. On that occasion I took some time in an attempt to turn the cost of living index as it was then into dollars in order to indicate the dollar value of the money we are now paying old age pensioners in terms of the 1935-39 dollar. I even prognosticated as to what might happen in the event of the cost of living index going over 170 by the time we got back here in January. I regret to say that my prediction was correct because the cost of living index has gone up past that mark and is still rising.

The result is that in terms of the over-all figure, let alone the special figure for food which is the most important one to our old age pensioners, the $40 maximum old age pension now being paid under federal legislation is worth only about $23 in terms of the 1935-39 dollar value. When you consider that the first Old Age Pensions Act provided a pension of $20 and that we are paying now only $23 in terms of the 1935-39 dollar value, surely it is time we did something for these despised and forgotten elder citizens of this country.

If you consider the food index of 220·2 and figure out how much of an old age pension is spent on food you will realize that we are probably giving our old age pensioners today less in the goods and services that they must purchase than was the case with the original pension. I want to say something more about this subject in a moment but at this juncture I simply refer to our old age pensioners as being one group who feel most stringently the effect of a rising cost of living, which seems to be in danger of continuing to rise until it gets completely out of sight.

The government tells us what other measures it proposes to rely on, such as its general fiscal policy. We are told that the government is going to wait and see what happens as a result of the controls being introduced in the United States. All these pronouncements are no help to our people. Pronouncements and theories do not help. What they want is the kind of legislation which this government demonstrated during the last war it could administer, and which it could bring in now to protect the health and living standards of our Canadian people.

I know that every once in a while when we press for price control someone raises the question of wage control. It has already been said in reply to that question, and correctly so, that we have a form of wage control right now. Remember that a great many workers of this country have their wages determined by collective bargaining. When a collective agreement is arrived at it must hold for a minimum of one year, and in some cases the term of the agreement is even longer. During that period of time wages are fixed, wages are frozen, but prices continue to go up month by month putting our workers in an impossible position.

In fact I will draw it to your attention that this very House of Commons passed a wage freezing measure last fall when we were dealing with the railway strike. We passed a measure which fixed a ceiling beyond which the arbitrator of the railway dispute could not go. I should not say "we". Parliament passed it. I opposed it and so did all members of this group, but Bill 1 of last session fixed a ceiling of 7 cents beyond which the arbitrator could not go in adjusting the wages of the railway workers. It also fixed a floor of 4 cents below which he could not go, but that turned out to have no significance.

I wonder how many members of the house are aware of the fact that when Mr. Justice Kellock made his report and awarded 7 cents, for which the hon. member over here was expressing appreciation last night, he said in the report that if it had not been for the ceiling fixed by Bill 1 consideration would have had to be given to the possibility of awarding the workers 10 cents. Why did he say that? Because the agreement was to run for two years, and inevitably in that two-year period the increase in the cost of living would cut out the value of the increase that the arbitrator was awarding to them.

There is a case of a great band of workers who had their wages frozen by an act of parliament last fall for a two-year period, and yet we have members of the house unwilling to consider price controls to protect the standard of living given to those railway workers by the bill passed by this parliament. I submit the time has come when some members have got to get over just sticking to a position because that position is one that has been taken. We have got to face this matter and deal with it on its merits.

I am glad to note that our friends of the Progressive Conservative party are now supporting measures to combat inflation and the rising cost of living. I hope they will support our amendment which specifies one particular effective measure of doing that very thing. I cannot help but remember occasions in 1945, 1946 and 1947, during the parliament that was elected in 1945, when the government was getting rid of controls, we of this group were trying to have price controls retained, and our friends of the Progressive Conservative party were trying to get the government to get rid of controls even faster than the government was doing it. They have something on their conscience but I shall not berate them too much about it now. I am glad to see that they want parliament and the government to do something about the rising cost of living, and I hope there are a few Liberals at least who will also represent faithfully the views of their people back home.

Just in passing, because I have referred to the Kellock report, I want to say how disappointed I was that that award discriminated between the railway workers on the one hand and the hotel and water transport workers on the other hand. Some hon. members may recall that last fall, when that matter was under discussion, I tangled with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) about it. I was not satisfied with the wording in the bill but the Prime Minister assured me and the house that it was the intention of the government and of parliament that no group of workers should be asked to accept any legislation that would discriminate between one group and another.

The workers thought that meant that any award would apply across the board to all those involved in the dispute, but when Mr. Justice Kellock, who has shown his readiness to deal most fairly with the whole situation, read the terms of the act he did not find it that way. He found it necessary to make a different award giving a lesser increase of only 4 cents an hour, a different term of contract, and other differences to the hotel and water transport workers, to their disadvantage. The other day when I asked the Prime Minister about this matter I was sorry that he passed the buck to parliament. After all, the bill that parliament passed last fall was the bill that the government brought in, and it was passed, so far as this phase of the matter was concerned, on the assurance given by the Prime Minister on the floor of the house.

The hotel and water transport workers are deeply disappointed that they were not given the same award given to other workers involved in the dispute. There again it was a case where this parliament, by a bill that was enacted here, actually took the step of freezing the wages of certain workers at a certain level. If we can do that, if members of the house apart from this group have it on their conscience, as they ought to, that they did that job of wage freezing, the time has come when they should support the move for price controls to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people.

I turn now to another subject to which I have already made passing reference, namely, the question of implementing the report of last year's committee on old age security. I noted that when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) spoke today he was not very hopeful that we would get such legislation this year. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) on the other side of the house seemed to be a little more optimistic. I dare to hope that we will get that legislation this year. In fact, we must. One of the reasons that I hope for it is because of the reception that the house and the government gave to our report when the committee brought it in last year. Another reason is because of the terrific pressure for such action throughout the country. Another reason why I think it may be coming this year is because surely the government realizes that if it delays much longer the $40 a month plan is not going to be acceptable, is not going to be good enough. As a matter of fact time has already run out when that report seems as satisfactory as it did last June.

Mr. Martin: The government is not delaying at all.

Mr. Knowles: Another reason why I am hopeful that we are going to get action this year is because of what the Prime Minister said to me on February 5 in reply to a question which I put to him on the orders of the day, as recorded in Hansard on page 72. I am sure the reason for my question was quite clear. The speech from the throne says that amendments to the constitution relating to old age pensions may require to be laid before us at this session of parliament if the provinces agree to those amendments. So far so good. Personally I am not convinced that a constitutional amendment is necessary for the plan we recommended last year but if the authorities think we have to have a constitutional amendment let us get it and get on with the job of bringing in the legislation.

What worried me about the speech from the throne was that it stopped there. It said that the necessary constitutional amendments might be presented at this session. Well, we can get the constitutional amendments and go on home, and still not have the plan. We need one further step after the constitutional amendments have been enacted; that is, that the legislation implementing last year's recommendations be brought in. So I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) this question, and I will read his reply as well:

> In view of the apparent readiness of the provinces to agree to constitutional amendments in one form or another regarding old age pensions, will an effort be made, as soon as agreement has been obtained, to present those amendments to parliament in time so that legislation implementing last year's old age pensions recommendations may be enacted at this session?
> Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would not like to confirm or to detract from the apparent optimism of the hon. member with respect to the readiness of the provincial governments to agree to constitutional amendments which would enable that to be dealt with.

As stated in the speech from the throne, the matter is before the provincial governments for their consideration, and it is and will be the policy of the government to avoid any possible delay when agreement has been reached to have that agreement implemented.

When I suggested that there was apparent readiness on the part of the provinces to agree to these amendments, I did so because I had read the correspondence between the government and the provinces tabled in this house on February 1 and included in an appendix to Hansard. That correspondence reads pretty well; I do not think anyone could feel any discouragement from any of those letters. The worst you find is one or two premiers saying the matter will be studied and considered. But in addition to that correspondence a number of legislatures have been called into session and speeches from the throne have been read. In every instance it has been indicated that the provincial government concerned proposes to bring in legislation or resolutions asking the authority of the legislature to agree to the whole plan under consideration. Well, Mr. Speaker, the provincial legislatures will all conclude their sessions and prorogue long before this session is finished; in fact a number of them will be through a couple of months from now or sooner. That means that six weeks or two months from now there is every likelihood that we will know whether or not the provinces do agree to the plan and to any constitutional amendments which may be necessary, and I am hopeful that they will agree, and that we will know it soon. I now have the Prime Minister's word, as I read it from page 72 of Hansard, that if and when that agreement is indicated there will be no delay in having it implemented.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if at the end of March or early in April we know that the provinces agree, there will be plenty of time before this session ends to take both steps, that is, to amend the constitution and then bring in legislation implementing the old age pension plan recommended to parliament last year by the committee. I strongly urge, in the words of the Prime Minister, that there be no unnecessary delay. I hope the provinces and the public generally will continue to press for speed in this matter, and that this legislation will not be put off until just before the next election, but that we will get it into effect this year.

As the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) and other members of the committee know, just as soon as this plan is put into effect some of us will start a campaign to have it improved. That $40 is not enough. That means test from 65 to 69 should not be there. But at the moment our job is to get that plan, which has unanimous support, into effect, and none of us should say anything to jeopardize the success of that effort. On the other hand I ask the government to act in good faith and see to it that these constitutional amendments are not unnecessarily delayed, which could have the effect of putting off this necessary legislation until next session. The time for the old age pension legislation itself is as soon as possible, certainly at this session of parliament.

On the orders of the day this afternoon I put another question to a minister, this time to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I must say that his answer was at least forthright and categorical, even though not satisfactory. I asked him whether the government would consider setting up at this session of parliament a special committee similar to the committee of last year on old age security, to study and report on the whole question of health insurance for the Canadian people. As I say, I was sorry the minister found it necessary to say it was not the intention of the government to set up such a committee this session. I think it is fair to say that at the end of the sittings of the committee last year those of us who were members were pretty well agreed that a committee such as I asked for today would be a good idea. I am free to confess that when it was first proposed to set up an old age security committee last session I criticized the proposal as a delaying move. Well, we still have not had the legislation, which we should have had last year, but at least I will say that the committee did a good job. We collected a great deal of material; we publicized that material, and members of the House of Commons and the public generally are better educated on the subject of old age pensions because that committee met. Also as a result of the work of that committee there is hope that we will get this better legislation this year and from there we can fight on for something better still.

During the course of our discussions in that committee we frequently moved over into the field of health and time and again we faced the fact that something needed to be done in that field as well. So I say that at the end of our sittings there was pretty general agreement, even if it was informal and off the record, that at another session it would be a good idea to have a similar committee which would make a similarly exhaustive and worth-while study of the question of health insurance for our Canadian people. I hope the international situation is not being used by the government as an excuse for not setting up such a committee.

As a matter of fact I see the international situation as a reason for taking steps of this kind. If we are heading into any kind of international difficulty it will be all the more necessary to integrate and rationalize our health and medical set-up in this country, and all the more necessary to give our people an assurance of security in the field of health as well as the field of old age pensions.

The other day I was pleased when the new hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne, spoke from his own experience as a doctor and asked for health insurance because of the many cases he knew of where people had their life savings wiped out or their entire future mortgaged because of unexpected and heavy hospital or medical bills. This is something that really concerns a great many of our people and makes for a great deal of insecurity and unhappiness. This government and this parliament could do something about it, and I would hope that reconsideration will be given the proposal I put to the minister today in the form of a question, which unfortunately he answered in the negative. Let us at least have a committee, and get started at this important job.

There is just one other matter to which I should like to address a few remarks. Many of us were very disappointed with the announcement made the other day by the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), when he indicated that the amount of the down payment on new houses under the National Housing Act was to be increased as from the day he made the announcement. We all know that in a time like this there are shortages and that because of those shortages, in steel products and other building materials, there may have to be some cutting back of building of one kind or another. But surely the course to follow is decide on the basis of what is needed, and first of all to decide as between business and recreational buildings and homes. Surely, when it comes to homes, the decision should be made as between high-priced homes and medium or lower priced homes which are needed by more of our people. Surely, some formula could have been worked out which would have conserved materials intelligently, and in such a way as to make materials available where they are most needed. But no; the government simply announces, through the Minister of Resources and Development, that it is going to attack this problem by increasing the amount of the down payment, starting with the little fellow who can build a new house only if he can get a fairly substantial mortgage, particularly under today's high prices. Mr. Speaker, I do not like that kind of legislation. There is one word that fits it that members of this house do not like, but that is what it is. It is class legislation. It is not dealing with a serious problem in a reasonable and proper way, and I object most strenuously to it.

A day or so ago I happened to meet a friend of mine who is connected with the building of houses. It was just after that announcement, and I asked him what the effect would be. I went on to suggest to him that it might slow down the building of new homes. His reply was, "Slow it down? It will stop it altogether." The great mass of the people who need homes have to be able to raise a substantial mortgage in order to build a house at all. If that is the result, to cut back the building of homes at a time when rent controls are coming off, just look at the additional problems that will be thrown on the shoulders of our people. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that such actions do not coincide with the responsibility that the government of a country owes to its people.

It is true that our people are absorbed in the international problem. It is true the government is absorbed in that problem, and we would criticize them if they were not giving very close consideration to all that is involved in the world situation. But I strongly urge that they must not let their absorption with international affairs blind them to the necessity of dealing intelligently and fairly with problems at home. I most strongly urge that this house support the amendment which is now before it requesting the immediate reimposition of price controls. I urge that there be no delay in bringing in not only the constitutional amendments but legislation implementing at least the terms of last year's old age security plan. I urge reconsideration of the proposal for a committee on health insurance, and I hope that we will yet get a more intelligent way of dealing with shortages of building materials, because our people still need homes. Homes, health, and security are important all the time. It is particularly important that attention be paid to these things at this critical time in the history of our nation and our world.

On motion of Mr. Howe the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 8, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Report of the proceedings of the commissioners of internal economy for 1950.—Mr. Speaker.

MILITARY EQUIPMENT

DELIVERY BY CANADA TO BELGIUM—ARRANGEMENTS FOR REPLACEMENT

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, Canada supplied the equipment, largely armament and ammunition, for a division to The Netherlands, and this was delivered last December.

Monday night in the house I stated that, arrangements having been completed for replacement by equipment of U.S. pattern, we had indicated to the council deputies under the North Atlantic treaty our willingness to supply the equipment for another division, and we asked advice as to its disposition.

Word was received today that the standing group had recommended that this equipment be delivered to Belgium. I am glad to report that this action was approved by the cabinet this afternoon.

As soon as shipping instructions are received, the equipment will be shipped from the ordnance depot at Longue Pointe, Montreal, where it is ready and in good condition.

By this action we will help to strengthen the defences of freedom in western Europe, promote standardization on each side of the Atlantic, and strengthen the ties which already exist between the forces and peoples of Belgium and our own country.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, arising out of the statement the minister has just made, may I ask if he can indicate when the equipment which is being sent to Belgium will be replaced—I presume from some other country—for Canadian purposes?

Mr. Claxton: Arrangements have already been made for the replacement of the equipment for the first division, which was shipped to The Netherlands, by purchases from the United States. Delivery of that equipment will be commenced at an early day and completed in a few months. We expect with confidence that that will be followed by similar arrangements to be made with the United States for replacements. Whether or not we shall offer equipment for a third division until the replacement of the equipment for the first division has been completed, is a matter still under consideration.

[Later:]

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): With the permission of the house, Mr. Speaker, I should like to revert to motions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Has the minister leave of the house to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Claxton: I should like to give the house the text of a telegram received from our ambassador in Brussels this afternoon. In this telegram he states that Colonel De Greefs said:

> On recommendation of the standing group of the North Atlantic treaty organization the Canadian government has decided to offer Belgium the armament of an infantry division. His Excellency Lieutenant General Maurice Pope, ambassador of Canada, has today informed foreign affairs minister Paul Van Zeeland of this decision. Belgium is glad to accept this offer and sees in it a new expression of the active sympathy Canada has always expressed towards Belgium.

JUDGES

DISTRICT COURTS, NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. As he is aware, provision was made last year for the appointment of five district court judges in Newfoundland. Have any been appointed? If not, how much longer shall we have to wait until they are appointed?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The matter to which the hon. member refers is under consideration by the attorney general of Newfoundland and by our department.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ROYAL COMMISSIONS

TRANSPORTATION—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Transport give the house any information as to when the report of the royal commission on transportation will be ready for tabling?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I expect to have the report from the chairman of the royal commission on transportation within the next few days. When I do receive it, some time will be required before it can be printed. As soon as that can be done—possibly within two or three weeks—it will be tabled in the house.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Prime Minister when the report of the Massey royal commission on arts, letters and sciences will be available?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The last information I had a few days ago was that the report was being printed under the direction of the commissioners themselves. I promise my hon. friend that as soon as it is available there will be no delay in bringing it to the attention of the house.

Mr. Fleming: May I ask if the government has received this report?

Mr. St. Laurent: The government has not yet received it. The chairman of the royal commission suggested that he would not present the report to the government until it had been printed in a form in which it could be made public.

KOREA

QUESTION AS TO REINFORCEMENTS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence concerning the Princess Pats. A press dispatch from the forces in Korea as published in the Ottawa Journal of last evening indicates that, when the battalion was informed that there were to be reinforcements of seventy-five other ranks and five officers each month, the battalion was wondering whether or not the move to combat duty would find it under strength. Apparently the battalion is now under strength. Can the minister make a statement in that regard?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): This battalion, like all battalions, is changing its strength continuously from day to day. There are available at Fort Lewis ample reinforcements for this battalion for an indefinite period. There is at McChord field, close to Fort Lewis, a squadron of twelve R.C.A.F. heavy aircraft of the 426 transport squadron which has lifted a good many thousand troops to Japan. There is no difficulty whatever in getting men from Fort Lewis to Korea within a period of about forty-eight hours if that is necessary. We are counting on having in good time in Korea ample reinforcements under ordinary battle practice standards of the British, United States and Canadian forces.

Mr. Green: Can the minister assure the house that when the Pats go into action they will be at full strength?

Mr. Claxton: I cannot give any such assurance. I cannot think of any unit that has ever gone into action at full strength.

Mr. Pearkes: Will those reinforcements be drawn from the third battalion of the Princess Patricias, or will they be drawn from some other unit of that special brigade?

Mr. Claxton: I shall have to look into that. The reports I have with regard to the situation at Fort Lewis are several days old, and I shall have to give my hon. friend an answer later.

WHEAT

QUESTION AS TO FINAL PAYMENT ON FIVE-YEAR POOL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he will endeavour to have the final payment on the five-year pool made in time to assist farmers in their seeding operation.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to promise to use my best efforts to that end.

SEARCH AND RESCUE SERVICES

RESPONSIBILITY FOR OPERATIONS ON THE ATLANTIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is the responsibility of the search and rescue services on the Atlantic coast that of the Department of Fisheries, the R.C.M.P. or the R.C.A.F., or do these three organizations act as a unit in providing these services?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Perhaps I could answer that question. These services are carried on jointly but under the direction of the R.C.A.F.

HONG KONG

POSITION OF CANADIAN CITIZENS—IMMIGRATION STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if the Canadian government, following the action of the United States government in directing its people to leave Hong Kong, has issued a similar order in regard to Canadian people?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No direction of that kind has gone out to Canadians in Hong Kong, nor do I think such a direction would be necessary at the present time.

Mr. Graydon: Has the minister any information about the number of Canadians in Hong Kong?

Mr. Pearson: I have not, but I think the number would be quite small. I shall be glad to make inquiry as to just how many there are.

Mr. Fraser: Has the staff of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration at Hong Kong been increased?

Mr. Pearson: My colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris), would be the minister to reply to that question. I shall bring it to his attention.

CHINA

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS OFFICIALS STILL ON THE MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate whether there are any officials of his department on the mainland of China?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have officials of the Department of External Affairs still on the mainland. I speak subject to correction, but I understand that our representative who has been in Nanking is on his way home on leave.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Herridge.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have two main purposes in taking part in this debate. The first is to outline the measures that are being taken to clear the way for and to speed up the progress of defence production. The second is to outline the present economic situation and to discuss the impact of defence purchasing upon the Canadian economy.

I should like to join with earlier speakers in congratulating the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It seemed to me that both speakers made addresses that were in the best traditions of parliamentary procedure; they were very fine efforts indeed.

Since parliament met last autumn, world events have moved swiftly. Canada, with the rest of the free world, has had to revise its schedule of preparedness. The challenge of aggressive communism leaves no choice but to move ahead at once, and quickly, with defence preparations planned on a scale never before contemplated except in time of all-out war.

My colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), has outlined to you the equipment program of the armed services. Hon. members are aware that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, making use of the agency of the Canadian Commercial Corporation, is responsible for the procurement of that equipment. This is a responsibility that entails a volume of work that is being rapidly accelerated. To illustrate the rate of growth, I may tell you that, during 1950, contracts for military equipment, supplies and construction projects were placed on behalf of national defence to a value of $629 million. This is in addition to approximately $31 million spent on married service quarters and related projects by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. It is interesting to observe that, in the first quarter, contracts for defence materials placed totalled $56 million; in the second quarter, $88 million; in the third quarter $132 million and in the fourth quarter, $318 million. The rate of awarding contracts will be higher again in the first quarter of the present year.

This increased volume of purchasing has placed a heavy and growing burden on the staff of Canadian Commercial Corporation. To lighten the burden, all defence construction projects have been turned over to a new crown company, under the same minister, named Defence Construction Limited. This new crown company is successor to Wartime Housing Limited, the functions of which had long since been taken over by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, but the charter for which had not been surrendered. An application to the Secretary of State resulted in a change of name from wartime housing to Defence Construction. The new crown company has made an arrangement with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation by which the organization of Central Mortgage provides engineering and other services as called upon. Central Mortgage has in being a decentralized engineering staff that can hardly be duplicated under present-day conditions, and is thus able to serve Defence Construction Limited in all parts of Canada. My colleague, the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), who is charged with responsibility for Central Mortgage, has made this arrangement possible, and in doing so has contributed greatly to the efficiency of defence construction work.

However, further expansion of our defence procurement organization will be necessary. For that purpose, the speech from the throne announces the formation of a new department, to be named Defence Production, the duties of which will parallel those of the former department of munitions and supply. The intention is that this new department will take over from Trade and Commerce the functions having to do with war production that were moved into Trade and Commerce when the munitions and supply department was disbanded.

In anticipation of the new department, men from industry have been invited to head up branches having to do with steel, base metals, chemicals and explosives production, priorities, and finance, and these branches are now functioning within the Department of Trade and Commerce.

To date, it has been possible to place defence contracts without any material expansion of industrial facilities. It is now obvious that growing requirements will make it necessary to expand Canada's present industrial capacity. It is hoped that this expansion can be financed privately. A plan for accelerated depreciation is being worked out, to apply to that type of expansion required for war that will have a greatly diminished peacetime value. In addition, and as a last resort, it may be necessary to provide capital assistance for a few types of expansion. Where capital assistance is used, the facilities so created will remain the property of His Majesty.

Certain expansion of sources of basic materials is already under way. Our steel industry has in progress a vast expansion program involving new investment of close to $100 million. Canadian production of copper, zinc, lead, nickel, and tungsten is being expanded as rapidly as possible, and an aggressive search is being made for cobalt, antimony, molybdenum and chrome. All these metals are now in short supply. Although Canada is the world's largest producer of aluminum, a vast expansion of this highly-strategic war material is being contemplated. Shortages of raw materials are the greatest handicap under which defence production is labouring, and by furnishing greater quantities of these strategic basic materials, Canada can make an outstanding contribution to north Atlantic defence.

To give the house an idea of the present impact of defence purchasing upon civilian production, I have grouped the contracts already placed under some broad headings, as follows:

Aircraft	$267
Armament, ammunition and military vehicles	116
Shipbuilding	74
General stores	41
Electronics and communication equipment	37
Textiles and clothing	24
Industrial equipment, scientific, medical and testing apparatus and miscellaneous	35
Defence construction	35

To avoid misunderstanding, it should be noted that defence contracts awarded are not equivalent as to timing to defence spending. Some contracts are speedily fulfilled; others take a year or more to be completed.

Contracts for aircraft comprised 42 per cent of the total of defence contracts awarded last year. This is one of the fields in which Canada is making substantial progress, and a notable contribution to the joint defence effort. A Canadian firm has designed, built and successfully tested the most powerful jet engine yet to be developed in North America, the Orenda; and this engine will shortly be in quantity production. We are producing, in quantity, airframes for the most modern short-range jet fighters. We are getting ready to manufacture a long-range, jet-propelled, all-weather pursuit ship, designed and successfully flight tested in Canada. Quantity production of small aircraft of the Harvard trainer type is being undertaken, in part for Canadian account, and in part to meet United States requirements.

Canadian government contracts let for naval shipbuilding include 7 escort vessels, 14 minesweepers, 5 trawlers which will be used as gate vessels, and an icebreaker. Construction of these vessels is taking place on both coasts and in the great lakes area, and work is being pushed ahead as rapidly as steel and skilled manpower makes this possible.

In the electronics field, Canada is producing a great quantity of radar equipment, some for use in this country and other for transfer to European countries within the North Atlantic treaty organization. Canadian ingenuity has created certain types of electronic and related equipment which, in quality and performance, are not surpassed by similar equipment produced elsewhere. For example, a Canadian-developed portable radio set has proven so satisfactory that large-scale production is being undertaken for use both by our own forces and by those of our allies.

Canadian Arsenals Limited, which operates the government-owned arsenals for producing munitions and military equipment, has been turning out increasing quantities of weapons with its existing facilities. The company is also retooling to produce a variety of small arms, ammunition, artillery and other weapons of the United States type. The first production of United States type munitions by Canadian Arsenals will be available in the near future, and preparations are being made for volume production of a wide variety of both weapons and ammunition.

Anticipating that defence preparations would in due course require control over certain critical materials, parliament at the last session passed the Essential Materials (Defence) Act. In November of 1950, steel was declared an essential material, and two orders have been issued under that authority. A third will be issued this week. The first prohibited the use of steel for certain types of less essential construction, such as theatres, bowling alleys and amusement structures generally. The first order, while different in form, had much the same effect as the prohibition in the United States upon the construction of similar types of buildings. Controls on imports were imposed at the same time to ensure compliance with the order.

The second order established a formal system of priorities for defence orders and defence-supporting projects.

These orders, the voluntary arrangements made by the steel mills to distribute supplies equitably among their established customers, and our various arrangements with the United States, have so far been broadly sufficient from the standpoint of defence production and civilian production. I think it well to add a warning, however, that further orders may soon have to be issued to assure supplies of structural steel for essential construction projects.

I give this warning so that those who contemplate construction projects which do not relate closely to our defence effort should not commit themselves to building operations unless they have the steel and other building materials, or know where they can be obtained. It would be unfortunate for those concerned, and a waste of valuable labour and materials, for projects to be started and then held up indefinitely for lack of some vital material.

One other point about steel is worth noting. The controls that are now in effect, and that may be forthcoming in the near future, are not solely and primarily for the purpose of assuring steel supplies for the fulfilment of defence contracts. In fact, defence contracts by themselves do not require a particularly large proportion of available steel supplies. The impact comes rather from the defence-supporting projects, such as the building of railway cars, locomotives and ore carriers to move essential materials and supplies. While technically not defence orders, these are no less essential at the present time than the production of guns.

Under the Export and Import Permits Act the government has restricted the export of a number of essential materials in order to conserve domestic supplies. It also requires permits for a wide variety of strategic materials and commodities, the export of which might be risky from a security point of view. In this we are co-operating with the United States by including all items which are under export control from that country to all destinations except Canada. United States export controls have never been applied against Canada, and I do not think that there will ever be any reason why they should.

Before leaving this subject of strategic materials, I might refer briefly to stockpiling, and advance production of defence materials. Orders placed for important key materials include substantial supplies of explosives, to ensure that shell and munitions programs will not be delayed after our arsenals are in production of U.S. type of ammunition. Materials for uniforms are being acquired. We have continued a modest but adequate program covering the acquisition of strategic materials which are not readily available in Canada. In the case of synthetic rubber, the government-owned Polymer Corporation has embarked on an important expansion program in Sarnia. This will involve a capital outlay of some $7 million, and should enable the company to raise its current output of between 55,000 and 60,000 tons of synthetic rubber annually to between 70,000 and 75,000 tons, an increase of about twenty-five per cent. Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited is also expanding its facilities for the production of uranium in the Goldfields area in northern Saskatchewan.

The national research council, which made so important a contribution to munitions production in world war II, is preparing to make another similar contribution. Under the direction of the council a new and larger atomic pile is being constructed to produce commercial quantities of plutonium.

Canadian defence production is being worked out in close co-operation with all North Atlantic treaty countries, and particularly with the United States. The decision of the armed forces to standardize on U.S. types of equipment has thrown added importance on our co-operation with that country. Incidentally, I can announce that the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Canada have been constituted a committee of the North Atlantic treaty organization to decide on standard types of weapons that will be recognized as such by all NATO countries.

Hon. members will recall the remarkable and highly successful arrangements which were made to achieve economic co-operation between the United States and Canada during world war II. These arrangements stand as a monument to the farsighted statesmanship of two great men: President Franklin Roosevelt and Prime Minister Mackenzie King.

Faced again with a common danger, and joined in a common cause, our two governments, on October 26 of last year, agreed to a statement of principles for economic co-operation. Hon. members are no doubt familiar with the general tenor of that statement, but it is of such historic importance that I think it fitting to read the full text into the record. It is as follows:

Statement of Principles for Economic Co-operation

The United States and Canada have achieved a high degree of co-operation in the field of industrial mobilization during and since world war II through the operation of the principles embodied in the Hyde Park agreement of 1941, through the extension of its concepts in the post-war period, and more recently through the work of the joint industrial mobilization planning committee. In the interests of mutual security, and to assist both governments to discharge their obligations under the United Nations charter and the North Atlantic treaty, it is believed that this field of common action should be further extended. It is agreed, therefore, that our two governments shall co-operate in all respects practicable, and to the extent of their respective executive powers, to the end that the economic efforts of the two countries be co-ordinated for the common defence and that the production and resources of both countries be used for the best combined results.

The following principles are established for the purpose of facilitating these objectives:

1. In order to achieve an optimum production of goods essential for the common defence, the two countries shall develop a co-ordinated program of requirements, production and procurement.

2. To this end, the two countries shall, as it becomes necessary, institute co-ordinated controls over the distribution of scarce raw materials and supplies.

3. Such United States and Canadian emergency controls shall be mutually consistent in their objectives, and shall be so designed and administered as to achieve comparable effects in each country. To the extent possible, there shall be consultation to this end prior to the institution of any system of controls in either country which affects the other.

4. In order to facilitate essential production, the technical knowledge and productive skills involved in such production within both countries shall, where feasible, be freely exchanged.

5. Barriers which impede the flow between Canada and the United States of goods essential for the common defence effort should be removed as far as possible.

6. The two governments, through their appropriate agencies, will consult concerning any financial or foreign exchange problems which may arise as a result of the implementation of this agreement.

I cannot, without trespassing too much upon the patience of hon. members, spend time elaborating upon the practical significance of this statement of principles. Two or three important developments, however, are worth noting.

By mutual arrangement, we are buying substantial quantities of war equipment in the United States, and that country is reciprocating by placing substantial war contracts in Canada. We are informed that the United States authorities have set a program objective for purchases of military equipment and supplies in Canada amounting to $100 million for the fiscal year 1951. The largest order placed to date is one for 3-inch naval guns for Sorel Industries Limited. A number of other substantial orders are now in the discussion stage. These orders are being placed in Canada through the agency of the Canadian Commercial Corporation.

Important arrangements have been made with the United States in the field of allocation of scarce materials, and particularly steel. Each country is extending to the other a similar priority to that extended for its own defence orders. I cannot think of a better example of mutual confidence between two countries.

Canada has been included in United States allocations of steel for essential programs, such as the building of railway cars, ships, locomotives, and for the steel warehouse trade. Other programs which both countries agree to be essential for the mutual defence effort are being studied.

New problems are arising every day in our relations with the United States, and I do not wish to leave the impression that all will be plain sailing because we have agreed upon a statement of principles. There are bound to be differences as to the best way to proceed; in fact, the statement of principles recognizes that there may be differences in approach, even though there is consistency of aim. However, I can report that differences are being resolved by friendly discussion as they arise.

I turn now to another aspect of our general defence planning, the North Atlantic treaty organization. Co-operation for defence production in this field is developing slowly but steadily. The basic principle of NATO production calls for the most efficient producers to contribute as fully as possible to the requirements of member governments. Member governments are also required, before entering into any large-scale production, to confer with the military authorities of NATO, to the end that its products shall be acceptable, from a military viewpoint. NATO is doing everything possible to encourage standardization between allies, in order to facilitate production programs. Canada's decision to standardize on American-type military equipment has made it possible for Canada to make available to Europe British-type equipment which we have been using up to the present. Equipment for one division valued at $57 million has already been supplied to The Netherlands, and further material will be made available as rapidly as arrangements for replacements can be completed.

For Canada, preparedness is a many-sided problem. We are increasing our military establishment and our civil defence. We are supplying arms and equipment to countries that have joined with us under the North Atlantic treaty for common defence. Equally important, but often overlooked, we are endeavouring to build up productive facilities and to increase the supplies of many of the vital raw materials, upon which the whole defence effort of the democratic world depends.

This is a complex undertaking requiring the most careful use of resources. Were we presently involved in all-out war, certain questions of priority would not arise. The emphasis in that event would be upon producing the maximum quantities of arms and equipment, with the productive facilities and the materials immediately available. But we are not now engaged in all-out war and may not be for many years, if ever. It is necessary, therefore, to give due weight to the long pull, to enlarging our capacity to produce as well as our immediate output, so that if and when world war III does come, Canada will be in a position to make a maximum contribution. Moreover, it may be necessary at short notice to alter the approach and to shift the emphasis.

I could illustrate the problem by many specific instances. It appears most clearly perhaps in the case of strategic minerals and hydroelectric power, which are the very lifeblood of industrial mobilization. For example, how much of the limited supplies of steel should be used to enlarge steel-making capacity? Is it in the interests of the common defence effort to use steel to construct pipe lines for the transmission of oil and gas, or to build new dams and power plants? What will be the impact of early action on the St. Lawrence seaway? There will be other opportunities to discuss questions of this kind, but it is important that the house should appreciate the nature of problems that are now being encountered, and that will be encountered in even greater degree, in the course of the preparedness effort.

Economic aspects of defence preparedness. I will now turn to the economic aspects of the defence program that has just been outlined. Hon. members will appreciate that we are imposing our defence production program upon an economy that is already operating close to full capacity. To illustrate, I will outline the economic position of Canada during the year 1950.

It is now estimated that the value of all goods and services produced in Canada during 1950 was about $17,700 million, an increase of about eight per cent over 1949. About half the increase was due to volume of output, and the other half to higher prices. If I may venture a prediction—and of course there are always risks in anticipating developments a year ahead—there is reason to expect that the gross national product will rise to approximately $20 billion in 1951.

The high level of world and domestic demand is reflected in our foreign trade. The year 1950 established a new point, in the total volume of exports and imports, of $6,300 million. Canadian exports rose from about $3 billion in 1949 to $3·1 billion in 1950. A substantial rise in exports to the United States more than offset a general decline in sales to overseas countries. I am very glad to be able to report that while nearly all overseas countries, and particularly those of the sterling area, found it necessary to continue to impose restrictions against the dollar area, these restrictions are now being relaxed rather than increased. The rate of relaxation may not be as rapid as we in Canada might wish, or think justified, but at least we have reason to believe that the dollar problem is on its way to solution.

Imports rose even more rapidly than exports, from $2·8 billion in 1949 to $3·2 billion in 1950. Most of the increased imports came from overseas countries, contributing to their dollar earnings and thus helping to restore normal trade relationships. For the first time since 1931 imports exceeded exports.

I might point out that the small adverse trade balance reported above is an indication of increased internal activity, and particularly of increased domestic investment in productive facilities. It is traditional with us that adverse trade balances occur in periods of our greatest prosperity and that our highest favourable trade balances coincide with our periods of depression.

While on the subject of trade, it is appropriate that I should refer briefly to the efforts that are being made by the government to promote trade and a freer exchange of goods between nations. Hon. members will recall that, during 1950, restrictions upon imports under the Emergency Exchange Conservation Act were progressively relaxed and finally removed, which accounts in part for the higher level of imports.

The Canadian government is actively participating in the tariff negotiations and other trade discussions which have been under way at Torquay since last September. During the latter part of 1950, a trade delegation was sent to Latin America and succeeded in signing agreements with Venezuela, Ecuador and Costa Rica, providing for the exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment. A special mission visited European markets to promote sales of Canadian wheat and flour, with most encouraging results. We were able to arrange with the British government for a trade liberalization plan for our exporters to the British West Indies market, which arrangement came into force at the beginning of this year. Finally, I might mention the very successful international trade fair held in Toronto last year, and which will be held again in 1951.

The outlook for Canada's external trade during the present year is excellent, and the record levels of 1950 will probably be exceeded. The limiting factors will be those of supply. We are again in a seller's market for the goods normally exported by Canada. There are not likely to be burdensome unsold surpluses of any of our normal export products.

I will now turn to the other important dynamic element in our economy, the volume of our investment in productive facilities. Here again a record was established during 1950. The total value of private and public capital expenditures rose by eight per cent over 1949. An interesting point is that businessmen altered their intentions within the year. Our early information was that investment in new machinery and equipment would be substantially down during 1950. Instead, this type of investment actually increased by five per cent, reflecting a change in the outlook during the year.

At the end of these remarks I shall, with the permission of the house, put on the record two tables which summarize investment expenditures, present and intended, and similar data on production of strategic basic and selected building materials. These two tables are advance statements of the two white papers on the investment outlook, 1951, and the building material outlook, 1951, which will be tabled as soon as they become available in printed form.

Expenditures on new construction increased by ten per cent in 1950, the increase being accounted for by industrial, commercial, institutional and government construction. Housing expenditures were up slightly in value, but down slightly in number of units, when compared with those of 1949. The number of houses started and completed in 1950 is estimated at 91,000 and 86,000 units, or two and six per cent respectively below the 1949 figure. This is reflected in the increase in the number of uncompleted houses at the end of last year, from 58,000 units at the end of 1949 to 62,000 units at the end of 1950.

Looking to the future, it is only too clear that during 1951 the limiting factor upon new civilian construction and upon the purchase of machinery and equipment will be that of supply. There is no lack of demand, no lack of confidence. A preliminary survey of investment intentions would indicate that private industry and governments are aiming at a capital investment program of $4,260 million, or thirteen per cent greater than in 1950. In view of physical limitations upon supplies, and the probable diversion of scarce materials and skilled manpower into high-priority defence and related production, it is unlikely that this objective can be attained in volume terms. Already, it has been necessary to prohibit the use of steel for certain types of non-essential construction, and restrictions on the use of steel and other strategic materials are likely to be extended from time to time.

The full impact of the defence program is yet to come. In the past twelve months, defence expenditures accounted for about five per cent of our gross national product. This proportion will rise to eight or nine per cent during the coming year and will probably be taking an even greater part of current output by the end of the year. It should be borne in mind, however, that the impact of defence spending has, in large measure, been anticipated. For example, world markets for commodities such as rubber, tin, wool and cotton probably reflect anticipated demand, as well as present demand. I need hardly point out that there has probably been some spending in anticipation of shortages, which is producing present shortages where no present shortage need exist.

However, it must be recognized that the greater effort on the part of the free peoples of the world to prevent all-out war must inevitably cause increasing disturbance to usual living. There will be shortages. We must all learn to conserve scarce materials, and to exercise our ingenuity in the use of substitutes. Some plans for expansion and improvement will have to be postponed. Consumers may not have the wide variety of choice to which they are accustomed. These are inevitable consequences of military and economic preparedness, and I am sure that Canadians will take them in their stride.

In closing, I would like to say a few words about price control. The speech from the throne indicates the intention of the government to introduce a bill which will, if approved, confer upon the executive powers to impose price controls and other related controls for the purpose of maintaining economic stability.

These broad powers are being introduced to the end that the government will be in a position to take whatever action appears to be necessary from time to time. Introduction of this legislation does not mean that the present intention is to impose over-all price and wage controls, although there is always the possibility that events will develop in such a way that general price and wage ceilings are appropriate and workable. However, it should not be assumed, either, that a price ceiling is imminent, or that, if controls become more extensive, they will follow the pattern of those imposed during world war II.

The over-all ceiling worked in world war II. But it worked for very definite reasons and it cannot be assumed that history will repeat itself. Circumstances today are very different from what they were in 1941.

One of the secrets of the success of the over-all price ceiling was that we put it into effect overnight and without warning. It caught nearly everyone by surprise. This time many people expect the reimposition of the same kind of controls and are governing themselves accordingly.

The upward pressure on prices, both in Canada and abroad, was much less severe in 1941 than it is now. True, prices were rising during 1941 but they were still relatively low when the ceiling came into effect. Today, to pick a few examples, prices for wool, rubber, tin, cotton and other imported commodities are at the highest prices in history, and there is very little that Canadians can do about it.

Finally, we have to recognize that there would be a very different attitude towards over-all controls now from that which prevailed in 1941 when we were engaged in all-out war. In formulating plans for price controls, if we have to have controls, it cannot be assumed that the people of Canada will accept with the same willingness as they did in wartime the vast bureaucracy, the irksome restrictions and the other controls, for example, of wages, that go with an over-all price ceiling. I think it is significant, in this connection, that organized labour, while favouring price ceilings, does not look with equal favour on a wage ceiling.

I am not ruling out the possibility that sweeping price control measures will be needed, should the developing situation make action necessary, but it may well be that these measures should be different in form from those that were applied during the last war. Alternative measures are now under active study by the government.

At its last session, parliament enacted a measure authorizing the government to control prices of materials where shortage is caused by defence purchases. Up to the present time, defence purchases have not been of sufficient volume to be in themselves responsible for shortages, although prices of steel and other war materials have been kept under close observation. Obviously a more comprehensive price control bill is needed for any effective control of the Canadian economy, and it is such a bill that you will be asked to consider.

A few days ago the United States government applied a system of general controls to prices and wages. In some respects the action taken resembled the over-all price ceiling applied by the Canadian government towards the end of 1941. In other respects the U.S. controls are very different; for they do not apply, for example, to a great many foodstuffs which by the Defence Production Act cannot be controlled until they reach higher price levels.

We are watching with intense interest these efforts to control prices in the United States. We earnestly hope our American neighbours will succeed in attaining a reasonable measure of stability; for only if that happens can we in Canada hope to avoid serious trouble. Dependent as we are to a large extent upon the United States as a source of supply and as a market for our exports, it would be extremely difficult, even if it were wise, for us to insulate our prices from theirs.

I do not suggest for a moment that we can relax and let the United States solve our economic problems for us. That has never been our attitude, and, as long as this government is in power, that will not be our attitude. We must continue to pursue fundamental anti-inflationary policies as vigorously as ever. All I say is that if the United States succeeds in its efforts to stabilize prices, one of the most powerful external pressures toward rising prices in Canada will be relieved. At the present time, fiscal and monetary measures can be more effective than price control in keeping internal inflationary pressures under control. With such measures in effect, there will be less need for direct controls of prices and wages, and if we do have to have more extensive direct controls, such controls should have a better chance of success.

Perhaps I should add, too, that even if we in Canada do not follow precisely the pattern of controls adopted in the United States, there will continue to be close co-operation between our two countries for the attainment of common goals. If we differ in method, we do not differ in objectives.

Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say in conclusion. It is most important that we should neither exaggerate nor underrate the magnitude of the task with which we on the production front are faced. We have to wage the battle of production against the enemies of freedom. We cannot hope to win that battle under the banner of "business as usual". There is much more than usual to be done, and I think that by united effort we can do it.

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with hon. members who have preceded me in the debate in complimenting the mover and seconder of the address. In view of what the minister has just said in regard to capital expenditures in connection with the Polymer Corporation at Sarnia, I should like again to express the hope that the government will give additional consideration to the protection of that very important area.

In his statement the minister said that the increase in the Polymer extension would amount to some $7 million. I speak for that riding when I say to the house that in addition to that we have an increase from the Imperial Oil Company to the extent of some $14 million, representing an increase in their refining capacity from about 65,000 up to around 80,000 barrels a day. We also have now under construction by Canadian Oil Refineries extensions valued at between $18 million and $20 million, and by the Dow Chemical Company extensions valued at about $3 million to $5 million.

One or two other industries have obtained properties to conduct operations essential to the war effort. It is unnecessary for me to remind the house how those various industries contributed at the time of the last war toward our war effort, and how this increased expansion is going to further the protection which is so essential at this time.

Last session when I raised this particular question the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) stated that we were relying in that area upon air protection from Detroit and London. I say in all sincerity that because of the importance of these industries to our war effort it is my hope that the minister will give further consideration to air protection for those very vital industries. In my view we should have not only an airport in that immediate vicinity, but some part of a fighter squadron.

The Minister of National Defence has outlined for Canada a defence program which will cost this country $5 billion in three years. Speaking as a layman in military matters, speaking as an ordinary taxpaying Canadian citizen, the situation as I see it today contains a tremendous element of tragedy. The tragedy simply is that this country will have one hundred ships to guard her coasts, and forty squadrons of aircraft to protect Canada and assist in the defence of Europe—but only $5 billion worth, and three years from now.

Meantime Canada has on the minister's desk a paper army, a paper navy and a paper air force. Of necessity the Canadian people will accept the minister's program and will bear with determination the burden of a defence scheme that will cost them $1,600 million this coming year. But I would hazard that the people of Canada would accept that burden with a great deal more grace were they not so acutely aware that this government has failed them on so many scores in the post-war period. They would accept it in a better frame of mind if they were not now so conscious of the fact that the government has frittered away millions of defence dollars this last four or five years which could have been utilized to build so much of the equipment and so much of the strength that Canada's armed services need so urgently now.

Most of all they would accept it with greater equanimity if they could but be certain that Soviet Russia will permit Canada those three years in which to reconstruct and rearm. This is the real tragedy of the defence situation today as I see it, and I am sure as the man in the street sees it. The threat of communism, the threat of Russia's imperialism, have not been sudden developments.

The menace of communist encroachment had become so apparent two years ago that it led to the formation of the north Atlantic alliance. That alliance has been functioning now for fifteen months, as the minister has noted. Surely fifteen months ago the Minister of National Defence was aware of the deficiencies in Canada's three armed services, aware that in entering a regional defensive alliance the country would be called upon for something more than comforting ministerial speeches to the effect that no power would dare attack twelve nations united in their determination to resist aggression.

I will readily concede that the organizational details had to be worked out, that discussions on national contributions to the pact consumed time. But the fact remains that this country, as did some of the others, entered the alliance with empty hands. Only the Korean conflict stirred the government to the point where it became aware that entering alliances and making commitments meant forces in being, meant troops trained and equipped, meant ships and guns and planes.

The explanation that it is difficult to prod democracies into defensive preparations while peace remains is one that is given altogether too much currency. It is one that even now is being debunked—has been debunked. The Canadian people have been concerned, indeed alarmed, by the complacency of their own government, in preparing this country to defend itself from the menace that has been altogether too apparent, not for weeks, not for months, but for years.

In matters of defence and defence responsibilities, the government has lagged far behind Canadian public opinion. Instead of leading the Canadian people, it has been led. Or rather, it has been compelled to face the international situation and to decide that it is high time that Canada looked to her own security and the security of her allies.

It was only a session or two ago that the Minister of National Defence told the house that the defence forces of Canada were quite able to meet any initial attack or raid on this country. How fatuous such a statement must appear now.

Canada is to have a five billion dollar three-year program of rearmament. Canadians can only hope and pray that Russia will sit back and wait for Canada and her north Atlantic alliance partners to prepare for war, before she ignites the powder-keg that will touch off global conflict.

Canadians can do nothing but accept the rearmament drive as outlined by the minister. They understand the necessity for it. They hope, as he does, that it will achieve its purpose—to demonstrate to Russia that peace, after all, is the wiser course. But they cannot help the fearful feeling that persists, that the government has lingered too long before setting its hand to the task.

But there is a companion piece to this tragedy of national defence that is being enacted daily in the private homes across this country—the homes of pensioners, the homes of wage and salary earners, farm homes and city homes. It is the daily drudgery of penny-pinching to make ends meet. It is the story of the housewife in Sarnia and in Ottawa, in Winnipeg and in Vancouver, who daily is fighting a losing battle against the rising cost of living. And for the housewife with a family of small children it is a bitter struggle as the household dollar shrinks to the point where food has to be sacrificed in order to buy clothes, or clothes have to be sacrificed in order that enough can be provided the family to eat. Here again the federal government stubbornly refuses to translate into action facts as they exist.

In the period immediately after the last war the Progressive Conservative party advocated the abolition of controls. I believed then, and I believe now, that such a policy would have contributed to the quicker return of Canadian stability; would have eliminated artificial commodity shortages and artificial price props. Canada then was striving to return to a wholly peacetime economy.

Now the situation has completely changed. This country no longer can pretend that its economy is on a peacetime basis. The government has launched on a program of controls in order to channel essential materials into defence production. The needs of the day and the hour dictate such a course. But, added to that, the government, with its multi-million dollar orders for supplies and for defence production, has accentuated an inflationary condition that already has become critical for hundreds, indeed thousands of Canadian families.

The Canadian government defence dollar now is bidding against the Canadian housewife's dollar. And that bidding is an unequal contest. By its bulk purchases and its channelling of materials the government is reducing the availability of goods and merchandise on the consumer market. As that availability shrinks, the cost of the items remaining climbs higher and higher. In other words, government policy today is creating and aggravating inflation. In view of this condition, it is not inconsistent now for me, as a member of the Progressive Conservative party, to take a definite stand for a system of price controls in Canada.

Indeed, in view of the tremendous volume of defence spending that now will be pumped into the Canadian economy and into the balloon of inflation, it is my personal view that a mere pegging of prices is not enough. Such a course would be too little; already is too late. I believe this government, for once, should demonstrate its oft-boasted concern for the ordinary working people of Canada and roll back, and I mean roll back, prices to the point where the Canadian dollar represents something more than a fifty-cent piece.

And this is not an irresponsible suggestion. The government has the experience of the last war upon which to draw; it has the multi-million dollar dominion bureau of statistics personnel and facilities upon which it can call for assistance. And it still possesses in the Department of Trade and Commerce a shadow controls organization to which it quickly could give substance. Undoubtedly, the machinery necessary for a selective system of price controls would cost money. But, as I see it, the well-being of the Canadian people is just as vital a matter of defence as any other phase of the national concern and the national effort. The struggle for freedom could be lost at home just as surely as it could be lost in Europe or in Asia, by neglect or lack of preparedness, or lack of intelligent and vigorous leadership.

It might be worth while to call attention to a recent speech in Montreal by Donald Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways and former chairman of the war-time prices and trade board. Mr. Gordon is quoted as having said:

> Runaway inflation is so destructive that any method of stopping it, no matter how difficult or clumsy it may be, is surely the lesser evil.

And he went on to say:

> The defence program already has begun to enter into the cost of living because, in a grim and very real sense, it has become part of the cost of keeping alive.

To this he added:

> Clearly, our real standard of living is going to depend on the productivity of the whole Canadian economy, as it has in the past . . . If prices jump upwards, no one will cheer more lustily in private, or scream more noisily in public, than our communist fifth column, and you can be sure they will work diligently to speed up the whirling spiral of wages and prices.

With those views of Mr. Gordon I am wholeheartedly in accord. Significant, I think, was Mr. Gordon's reference to the necessity for increased production. Here is a prime sore spot in the present emergency, a sore spot which a little government care and tending and encouragement could do much to relieve and to heal. Bluntly, Canadian labour—the factory worker, the office worker, the farmer, the wage earner and the salary earner of Canada—cannot reconcile a two-sided Liberal government philosophy and doctrine, which on the one hand holds to the gospel of individual economy and sacrifice, while adhering, on the other, to a "business as usual", "spend as usual" creed on the part of the government.

True, the government probably has made halfhearted efforts to economize. But the time has come when it must demonstrate the political courage to neglect its constituency fortifications, to shore up the ramparts of the nation. The time has come for real and genuine economies in the whole range of government activity, from reduction in government and government delegation journeyings and junketings, to cutbacks on deferrable public works. The political toll on the Canadian taxpayer's dollar is altogether too high. If the Canadian people are to be called upon for sacrifices that will whittle down their standard of living, then it would seem reasonable that the government must also lower its own cost of living. And that cost is the price of patronage projects.

But to get back to Canadian labour—unionized labour and unorganized labour: Today Canadian manpower is being utilized to the full. There are pressing shortages for men in the skilled trades—toolmakers, diemakers and so on. These shortages will become more and more acute as the national defence program gains momentum. The throne speech made two or three references to the fact that the international situation now had created for Canada an emergency situation. With that I agree. But I believe the government now should make some effort to bring home directly to Canadian workers the urgency of the world situation and the urgency of Canada's need for more and more production. To this end, I would suggest that through its Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and its Department of Labour the government appeal to Canadian unions in all lines of endeavour to suspend for the duration of Canada's national emergency working contract clauses that stipulate the 40 hour week or less, and to permit working hours to be increased 10 per cent.

My own observations in this field have led me to believe that labour would be willing to increase its working hours, and thereby its production, at regular wage rates.

I believe, on the basis of patriotism, and as a direct contribution to Canada's defence effort, that labour would make this gesture. Indeed, many of the rank and file would welcome such an opportunity to supplement their present earnings. They would regard it in a sense as a way of earning their own cost of living bonus.

There would be a double incentive to the workers of Canada if such an appeal were made and accepted. There would be for the whole labour force the satisfaction that would come from the knowledge that they were doing their bit for democracy by increasing the production of all the goods and the materials needed for defence. There would be, too, genuine appreciation of the opportunity to add to their take-home pay. Perhaps the new advisory council on manpower, which the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) announced to the house the other day, will consider this possibility in its survey and review of the Canadian labour scene.

A state of national emergency, however, applies not alone to one section of the population, one part of the national economy. A call for more production from Canadian unions and Canadian workers generally should be counterbalanced with a call on big business, big industry, to play its part.

The financial statements of a whole range of Canadian corporations proclaim Canadian prosperity and unprecedented profits. While it cannot be denied that a heavy burden of taxation upon industry and upon business discourages incentive, curtails expansion, and dries up investment capital, nevertheless these enterprises should be called upon now to bear a far greater part of the tax burden than they now are bearing.

These corporations and companies today are enjoying the profits of the free enterprise system, the capitalist system, the system which all Canadians in all walks of life now are being called upon to defend, in and out of the services, and to the tune of $5 billion in the next three years. The fight of Canada and the free nations, then, is their fight just as much as it is the fight of Canada's liberty-loving citizens generally.

To the degree that the threat of Soviet Russia and of communism constitutes a national emergency for Canada, the Canadian government should be prepared to act with courage, with dispatch and vigour to draw taut the whole fabric of the Canadian economy. There must be equality of sacrifice. Canadian determination must match Russian ruthlessness.

It must be a source of regret to the Canadian government in the present emergent situation that in the years immediately following the last war it did so little to encourage the flow of immigration to this country. Canada today stands in need of skilled labour for her defence plants, labour for her farms, for her forests and mines, and for her armed services.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) in this year of crisis has announced that the government has set its sights on something like 150,000 immigrants for 1951. The minister now has announced what he has described as a balanced program to provide more hands both on the farms and in the factories.

The government has taken several steps which it hopes will help to double the 1950 immigration total of 74,000. In succession it has lifted the wartime ban on German nationals, has decided on a fare subsidy plan for those who come to Canada by air, and has decided to advance passage money to those seeking to come to Canada by ship. But even a doubling of immigration may prove insufficient because it appears possible now that the manpower shortage will become more serious than present estimates indicate.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is quoted as saying that Canada must push forward its industrial and economic expansion if it is to become an effective partner in the defensive preparations of the western world. How pitifully late is this statement of government policy! Now, in a year of national emergency, the government deems it wise to bring to Canada thousands of people from Europe to plug the gaps in Canada's manpower supply. Ever since the last war other nations have been actively encouraging British and European peoples to migrate. The best of the great reservoirs of manpower in Britain have been tapped while Canada dallied. The same applies to Europe with its potential emigrants and its thousands of refugees eager to gain the freedom and the opportunities that this young country affords.

Today Australia is competing for new citizens more energetically than is Canada, and its goal of 200,000 immigrants annually is considerably greater than that of Canada. Reports from Europe indicate that at least 200,000 suitable refugees still are homeless, and that many Germans want to emigrate.

Tragically enough, this government well may have tarried too long. The manpower problems that confront Canada in all probability will be the major problems that confront Britain and other European nations in this emergency year of 1951. Already it is indicated that Britain is becoming reluctant to part with her manpower—the skilled workmen needed just as acutely in British defence and other plants as they are required here.

The new Minister of Citizenship and Immigration perhaps is to be congratulated that he has been able to persuade the government to enunciate a program of 150,000 immigrants for this year. But the uncertainties of the world picture now have created new difficulties which may prove far greater obstacles than any that have existed since the war with nazi Germany ended. Now, when the government apparently is sincere in its desire to increase Canada's population by immigration, it may find desirable immigrants far more difficult to obtain. As in the matter of national defence, the Canadian government now can but scramble to overhaul lost time, can but seek to repair damage already done.

About a year ago the defence minister told the house, when he was presenting his estimates, that:

> Our planning must look several years ahead. On the one hand, we must start to work in time to produce the results in personnel and equipment when they are likely to be needed. On the other hand, we must avoid starting things now which might involve us in future commitments for the expenditure of money which might be needed for other defence purposes of greater priority.

Within months came Korea. It was immediately clear to all Canadians that its government had not been looking ahead to such an eventuality. Personnel and equipment were not there to match Canadian ministerial speeches at home, at the United Nations and in the councils of the north Atlantic alliance. It would seem that the government now is looking three years ahead. But there have been dangerous delays. Canadians are ready to play their full part. But they look to the government now to demonstrate a degree of foresight and of leadership that hitherto has been conspicuous by its absence.

For the government's military preparedness program there will be general public sympathy and support. In the meantime there will be, too, the prayerful hope that once again the government has not been too late; that Soviet Russia will give Canada three years of grace in which to knit her economy for the strains of war, perhaps a war of nerves but nonetheless war, three years of grace in which to recruit, train, equip and field Canada's fighting contribution to the cause of freedom and democracy.

Mr. D. A. Riley (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, before I launch into the main topic of my remarks today I should like to apologize for not having been present here for a short time yesterday afternoon. With some of my constituents who had journeyed here from afar I was attending to the business of my constituency. I especially regret my absence because I was thereby denied the rare privilege of being mesmerized by the golden voice of a great speaker, one who awakens reminiscences of the grand old days when oratory flourished in this land and in this very house. As the logical utterances of this hon. member are carried about the commons as in a silvery chariot guided by his dulcet tones—

Mr. Graydon: You are doing pretty well yourself.

Mr. Riley: Thank you—one can fairly envisage the spirits of Macdonald, Laurier and McGee gazing down with benign approval from the linen ceiling of this chamber. Some hon. members of the C.C.F. party are apparently aware of whom I speak, because I see signs of great enthusiasm over there. He is a kindly man, a great champion of the downtrodden, a friend of labour, a man of letters, a bachelor of arts, a teacher of man, an Ichabod Crane, a moulder of little minds. On those occasions when I see the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) part the curtains on the opposite side of this chamber and stride confidently to the seat which he occupies with such an air of wide dignity and legislative resolve I confess to a feeling of envy and wish secretly—to myself, mind you—that we could have such a giant on this side of the house so that I and some of my associates might look to him at times to guide our awkward steps as we bumble about in the dark recesses of the back benches. When I am lulled into revery by this soothing voice, this man with a heart so filled with the milk of human kindness, a heart which like that of St. Philip Neri well nigh bursts the frail casement which encloses it, I say to myself, "Here is a noble man whose very soul would rebel in horror at the thought of stooping to mean, cheap, contemptible political advantages."

Like him, and following him I feel like a frail skiff wallowing in the foaming wake of a giant leviathan of the deep; like him, I must administer a gentle rebuke to the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bruneau). So in all kindness, having the highest regard for the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, I must attempt to straighten out the question of how the hon. member for Saskatoon stands on price controls. Of course the hon. member has spoken at a number of meetings recently at which he expressed himself in favour of price controls, fixed ceiling prices on all commodities including—and the hon. member will correct me if I am wrong—labour, the price of wheat, and all other agricultural products. I would point out to the hon. member for Prescott that he might well take a lesson in unselfishness from the hon. member for Saskatoon when the latter thus tells the farmers of his own province that the prices of the commodities they produce must be pegged in safeguarding the interests of the common weal.

I was delighted to learn that the hon. member for Saskatoon had been in the maritimes, even in my own city. Though I had no word of his visit, I must confess I should have realized that the healthy glow which suffuses his cheeks bespeaks contact with the salt tang of the broad Atlantic. And witness his use of the word "fathom". It has a distinctly nautical flavour. I should have liked to introduce the hon. member to our dock workers. I should have liked to escort him down into the pit of our drydock. I should have liked to take him down into my own ward, where his soft and delicate hand might have tingled from the healthy handclasp of the workingman. And I should have enjoyed even more taking him out for a short trip on the tossing waters of the bay of Fundy. I am sure the experiences thus gained by him, albeit new, would have been of inestimable value in his sincere effort to improve the lot of those of us who make up the proletariat of this country. He might have found that we maritimers, in our ignorance, I must admit, refer to his doctrines — perhaps erroneously — as the impracticable and meaningless theories of long-haired idealists; and he might have discovered how the misguided workingman of my own city seems intent only upon gaining for himself a decent standard of living and for his children an opportunity to fit themselves into society as useful Canadian citizens.

I agree that the hon. member might have found in my city some elderly folk living in rather modest circumstances. He neglected to add—and of course I do not accuse him of wilful neglect—that these people are very proud that, pitifully small though their means may be, they have been rescued from an even worse fate by the sound administration which has been in power in this country, by the will of the people, since 1935.

My hon. friend referred to the slums of Saint John and mentioned having seen elderly folk living like rats in the garrets of those slums on an income which he gave as $42.50 a month. This comes as somewhat of a revelation to me, in that previously I had been under the impression that elderly people who existed on an income, not of $40 a month as we have for the elderly people of New Brunswick but of $42.50 a month, lived not in the unpretentious though solidly constructed houses of Saint John but in the shanty jungles within easy reach of his own home.

(Translation):

A few years ago, one of his colleagues, who has no longer the honour of sitting in the house, mentioned the slums she had seen from afar, in my city, during a whirlwind trip through the maritimes. Were she here today, she could repeat his remarks and they would be in harmony with what my hon. friend has said. Unfortunately, she had to go back before her electors, who are apparently fickle for they refused to repose once more their trust in her. I hope, and I believe, that with the decline and disappearance of socialist theories in our country, my hon. friend's career will come to an equally abrupt end.

This eager representative of the people who, in the past, filled his leisure deluging our legislators with countless pages of his turgid oratory for which he took inspiration in the warmth, safety and comfort of his quarters in parliament, had occasion, while on a tour of the maritime provinces, to come in contact with people whom he only knew, until then, from his perusal of books on socialism. I hope the experience he gained during that trip will encourage him from now on to support any government bill aimed at ensuring a more equitable distribution of that wealth which, thanks to Divine Providence, is so plentiful in this country, instead of cluttering up Hansard with senseless and groundless diatribes.

I hate referring to my good friend in such terms, but I know he will accept my remonstrances leniently and in the same spirit that prompted them.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I wish to extend also sincere congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) who, with a number of his colleagues, has made such outstanding contributions in an honest and healthy endeavour to bring about peace among all men of all nations. The people in my part of the country look to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with unswerving confidence, conscious of his ability to exert an effort beyond the ordinary in bringing about the fulfilment of Canada's great role at the conference tables of the nations. In common with the people in other sections of Canada, we too are proud of him.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) must still recall the expressions of confidence accorded to him, and the enthusiasm with which he was greeted in the course of his recent tour of the maritimes. The citizens of my own constituency, and they but reflect the feeling of their neighbours across the land, are girding themselves for great sacrifices if such must be made for the preservation of our democratic way of life.

Today as I gaze over the heads of the executive who guide Canada's destiny I cannot help but refer to another man who seems to me to be somewhat like Gunga Din. I liken him in some respects, but not in all, to that famous Kipling character. From time to time he is literally belted and flayed by both friend and opponent, but when there is a job to be done requiring tremendous effort, wise and quick decision, and almost superhuman perseverance we look to him with deep respect, and we solicit the services of the right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to perform another mighty task for our country.

We are about to embark upon a vast program of defence. Industrial Canada is prepared to increase production to an almost unheard-of degree. Defence orders have begun to pour out from Ottawa in an ever-increasing flow. We find that if we are to maintain our production schedule it may even be necessary to import labour from other lands. It is amazing for me to view and to hear about the vast expansion which industry in Ontario and Quebec, and in some of our western provinces, is undergoing now. I am proud when I reflect that my country is well on the way to becoming one of the largest producer nations in the world.

At the same time it grieves me to have to state that in the course of a recent review of employment figures across Canada I have been shocked to learn that unemployment in some of our most important maritime centres extends far beyond the ten per cent mark. I am, therefore, impelled to urge once again, as I have urged before from the floor of this house, that a real effort be made to bring about some degree of decentralization of industry in our country. In my own city of Saint John the unemployment figure is down somewhat in comparison with last year's figure. This has been due in part to an accelerated movement of freight through our port during the course of the past few weeks, but it is also due in part to an accelerated movement of our skilled, semiskilled, and even unskilled labour to the booming industrial centres in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Every day from all over the Atlantic provinces this movement continues. Maritime labour is once again answering the call of industry further inland. If our labour continues to thus migrate to the central provinces—

Mr. Wright: Hear, hear.

Mr. Riley: I am speaking also for the western provinces, as my hon. friend is well aware.

Mr. Wright: I agree with you.

Mr. Riley: It is fine to hear his voice raised occasionally in the House of Commons, because I have sat here for the last few days wondering when he was going to make, not a simple ineffective speech in opposition but one of those mighty speeches that we have heard him deliver in the past. I am keenly disappointed that this hon. member, who must definitely be aware of the great role which he must play if he is conscious of his responsibilities in parliament, has not given more effective opposition to this government which he persists in criticizing by means of catcalls in a sotto voce.

Mr. Knowles: Somebody must have sent you a dictionary.

Mr. Wright: He must have swallowed it.

Mr. Riley: The catcalls are coming from the hon. member speaking at the moment, and it is so interesting to see him with a smile on his face that I do not deign to answer.

Mr. Knowles: It is not a smile, I am laughing.

Mr. Riley: It is even nicer to see you laughing. I am surprised that your face did not crack.

If our labour continues to thus migrate to the central provinces, I am afraid we are going to find ourselves in an even worse position that ever before in our history after the present crisis is over. The only profitable business venture in which we shall be able to engage will be the retailing of cheap cardboard suitcases. I do not want to give to hon. members the impression that I have come here to give voice to a plaintive wail, nor do I wish to convey to hon. members of this house the idea that I or the people whom I represent are looking to the government to create vast industrial centres in the Atlantic provinces. I want to point out, however, that the defence program on which we are now embarked, calling as it does for the expenditure of billions of dollars, provides for the government of this country a ripe opportunity to stimulate the development of the far east and the west, by assisting and encouraging both the establishment and the expansion of small industries.

I have taken the time to discuss our problems with many of my constituents and they consistently ask me to make known to the government that they are willing and ready to build and to manufacture whatever the government might suggest for them so to do. They would prefer, of course, to manufacture commodities which could be produced by small, light industries.

I have here on my desk a letter from a young man in my constituency. He is the type of young man who is intensely interested in the development of his own province. He is a member of a family which has built up several small industries and who himself sees for the Atlantic provinces a great future looming on the horizon. In this letter he makes an offer to supply the necessary land, buildings and operation for any type of industry for the manufacture of defence needs. The land and buildings which he makes available are in a favourable locality, close to facilities for shipment by water or rail. He has in mind that when the present crisis is over this plant could be used to house a stable peacetime industry.

I also have here on my desk another letter from one of our younger citizens who is intent upon merchandizing a commodity considered to be the best in quality and the most practical of its kind manufactured in this country. It is a commodity which is now being manufactured almost exclusively in the United States for the government of that country. The raw material is in such great demand by the American manufacturers that the producers will have to curtail delivery in Canada unless the manufacturer here is able to get defence orders. That manufacturer himself, a ranking air force ace of the first great war, can increase his production to meet any government needs in this country. Despite our efforts to interest government officials in this commodity over the past few months we have not yet been successful. There is in my constituency a group of men who are at present preparing to found another industry. They have at their disposal an excellent plant for the type of commodity which they propose to produce. In addition, they have a great deal of extra floor space available, and they have asked me to in turn ask the heads of our government what they would like them to produce with this extra space. I had in Ottawa with me the other day one of these men, a highly skilled technical man who during the last world war managed several industrial plants engaged solely in the manufacture of defence items. I hope that his visit here will not have been in vain. Several other industries, already established, have sent representatives to me asking for direction on how they could best serve defence requirements, and they have stated their willingness to expand their plants to take care of whatever orders might be forthcoming. I have sent the names of these firms to the government agencies which might be interested and again I am hopeful that orders will be forthcoming. In checking over the lists of orders placed by Canadian Commercial Corporation since November 20, 1950, it has been a source of keen disappointment to me and to my constituents to note that orders going to the Atlantic provinces have been so pitifully small, so pitifully few and have amounted in value to such a meagre sum of money that I would be ashamed to place the figures on the record of this house.

I know that during the past two years some authorities here in Ottawa have at the instance of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the ministers representing the Atlantic provinces made extensive studies with a view to stimulating our economic development; but I again regret to say that the subjects of these studies have not yet tasted the fruits of their findings. I repeat that if ever there was an opportunity for the federal government to infuse a real stimulant into the economic life of our lagging provinces, that opportunity presents itself today. I should hate to have to thank those responsible a couple of years from now for an abundance only of sympathy received by our people. I would rather be able to say that the twenty-first parliament marked a milestone in the growth of the Atlantic provinces, the beginning of a realistic exploitation of their resources of materials and manpower.

It was a source of great satisfaction to me, as it was to many of my fellow easterners, to read the speech delivered by the premier of Ontario at the conference of federal and provincial governments here in Ottawa a short time ago. Speaking to the assembled delegates he expressed on behalf of his government a real appreciation of the problems which confront provinces other than his own. In the course of his remarks he directed attention to conditions in some of these other provinces, and I quote:

> Problems associated with large concentrations of industry, are, however, in the main incidental to these areas having such industrial development. What I have said makes evident the desirability of an even development of Canada. Large concentrations of industry in particular places in Ontario have created large provincial problems. A development of Canada with large concentrations of industry in particular provinces and little industry elsewhere creates like problems.
> Perhaps it would be well if this conference, as part of its work, would consider ways and means of providing for a more even industrial development across this country. It is very heartening indeed to see the expansion in the two far western provinces of British Columbia and Alberta.

May I say just here that I had hoped that when the welfare state had been introduced into Saskatchewan there might have been a better measure of industrial development there; but apparently it has not taken place. I continue with the quotation:

> It is to be hoped that the other provinces may show a like development, and we here should do everything possible to stimulate such development. The more even the development of this country the better it will be for all of us.

I hope that the words of the premier of this great province reflect the general feeling of her people; for what he said on that occasion can bode well for the future of those provinces in less favourable geographic locations.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) when he spoke this afternoon. It was my feeling that his speech was a strong argument in favour of the immediate introduction of an over-all system of price controls.

I jotted down a number of points he made when he was speaking—that our economy was operating at full capacity; that there were limiting factors in export trade, namely supplies; that the full impact of the defence program is yet to come; that the defence program will disturb our way of living; that there will be shortages. All these point to an increase in the inflationary pressure.

He said there is no intention to impose an over-all system of price and wage control at this time, but that it may be necessary in the future. He does not rule out that possibility. He made it clear that the success of the over-all system of price control in the last war was due to the fact that it was brought into operation overnight. I could not help thinking that if I were a businessman in this country, with no greater principles perhaps than many others, after hearing the minister's speech I would say to my colleagues, "Gentlemen, you have heard the program. The best thing for us to do is immediately to increase prices as other businesses are doing, or we will be left holding the bag." Judging by what is happening in Canada today, no doubt there are many businessmen who feel that way, and who perhaps will direct their energies to an even greater extent in that direction after reading the speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

We have before us a subamendment moved by the C.C.F. and reading as follows:

> That the following words be added to the amendment, immediately after the words "rising cost of living" in the last line thereof:
> "such as the immediate reimposition of price controls, and the payment of subsidies where necessary, so as to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people."

That is an amendment to the amendment; if it were not I would offer an amendment to insert the words "and wage" after the word "price". However, I do not think that is really necessary. One may well take it as written, because surely no thinking person today would suggest for one moment that we could have an over-all system of price controls without at the same time controlling costs in that price structure. I understand the C.C.F. fully appreciates that fact. Therefore we can take it as though that were written into the amendment. Let me make it clear that in supporting the subamendment we do so on the definite understanding that an over-all system of price controls would include control of all costs incurred in that price structure, including of course wages.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke in this debate with reference to controls he said, as reported at page 29 of Hansard:

> There cannot be enforcement in a country like ours against the feeling of a majority of the people of what is right and what is wrong.

Surely no one would suggest that today the majority of the people would not support a system of over-all price control. I do not think anyone would argue for one moment, for example, that labour would oppose it. Labour has taken a strong stand in support of over-all price controls. I doubt very much if anyone would suggest that the general consumer in Canada would oppose it. Stop people on the street and ask them if they are in favour of price controls, and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they would say that they are.

Speaking as a farmer I would say the farmers would not oppose the introduction of price controls. I noticed that when the leader of the C.C.F. party was speaking, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) said that the farmers were opposed to it. The farmers are not opposed to price controls, so long as they are brought in in an equitable manner. That was made clear in a resolution passed by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in Calgary last month. A report of that convention, as it is contained in the Manitoba Co-Operator of February 1, 1951, states in part:

> Producers were concerned with inflation and controls, and on this subject gave unanimous support to a resolution requesting that if anti-inflationary measures, taken by the government of Canada, include price control, these controls should not be first levied against foodstuffs, but should go into effect simultaneously with wage controls, industry profit controls and that any controls on foodstuffs be imposed on a proper relationship and costs of production.

I believe that is the general attitude of all farmers. They want price controls on all commodities. They are quite prepared to have the prices of agricultural products controlled, too, so long as the prices of those products are controlled at a parity with the general price level.

Certain people in the country today and certain members in the house are warning of the dire consequences of introducing an over-all system of price controls. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) adopted that attitude when speaking in the house on February 6. He quoted from the Financial Times of British Columbia and, in making the quotation, said he thought it was a sound and sensible argument.

Let me quote one part of the quotation to which he referred with approval in the house:

> There is really no choice. Comprehensive direct controls would defeat the purpose in the following ways: They would drive the economy into a regime of black markets and administrative paralysis; would destroy public morale and the incentive to produce, and would conceal inflation without preventing it. They would in any event require crushing taxation to be practical at all.

This article states that price controls would destroy the incentive to produce. Would anyone suggest that the over-all system of price controls during the second world war destroyed the incentive to produce? We know very well that during that war our production increased at a record pace, and to record levels. Furthermore when the hon. member suggests that price controls would require crushing taxation it must be obvious that if we do not have price controls we will have to have even heavier taxation. That was realized when price controls were introduced during the second world war.

These arguments and warnings against price controls are similar to some of the arguments we heard in the early stages of that war. For instance, on November 21, 1940, as reported at page 286 of Hansard, the minister of finance of that day, Mr. Ilsley, replying to a suggestion from this group that an over-all system of price control should be introduced, had this to say:

> Price fixing of a few commodities, indeed rationing of a few commodities, is possible and need not have a very serious effect, but price-fixing and rationing on a general scale have at least two disadvantages. In the first place this would call for bureaucratic interference in the private affairs of all Canadian citizens.

After that he allowed his imagination to run riot and said that if we had price controls we would have to put a spy in every grocery store in Canada. He said that kind of thing might be all right for nazi Germany but that the people of Canada would not tolerate it. That was the statement of the minister of finance of that day. It is interesting to note however that he did a backward somersault in the following year, because within less than a year he had completely changed his mind.

On November 6, 1941, he was commenting on the government's proposal to bring down an over-all system of price control.

This is what he had to say, and I quote from page 4148 of Hansard of November 6, 1941, as follows:

> But there is no doubt that when the resources and labour of the country are pretty fully used, when we reach a stage of full employment, and are making more and more war materials, devoting a larger and larger proportion of our human and material resources to the production of war equipment and war materials, there is no doubt that inflationary forces of a very powerful type are at work.

And again:

> One will see at once that, unless curbed, forces will push the price levels up and up and up. How can that be stopped? Since the beginning of the war we have pursued a severe taxation policy. We have tried to tax as much as possible of the purchasing power back into the exchequer. We have gone all across the country and combed it for small subscriptions to war savings certificates. We have sold bonds to the people. In these ways, namely by taxing and by borrowing, we have tried to get back from the people a large amount of this purchasing power. We believed that this was a right policy and we believed that it was anti-inflationary. To a large extent it was.

And he goes on to say:

> Therefore, in this war, no matter what the course has been in previous wars, so far as I know all countries have come to the conclusion that they must resort to direct measures of limitation and control of production, and price control.

Hon. members will notice that in those statements the minister stresses the fact that prices were steadily rising in spite of heavy taxes and fairly heavy borrowings of the savings of the people and for that reason price control was necessary. It is interesting to note what the price level was at that time when the minister drew attention to the way it was going up. He stated a serious situation had developed at that time. The price level had gone up from 108.2 in March 1941 to 115.1 in October, 1941. If the fact that the price level had gone up from 108.2 to 115.1 was then a justification for price control, then how much more justification there is today for price control when the cost of living index has gone up to around 172.5?

Mr. Knowles: The food index is 220.

Mr. Quelch: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) points out that the price of food has gone up to 220. That is especially hard on low income groups. Many people without thinking blame the farmers for that situation. They say that the prices of farm produce have gone up considerably and that the farmers are profiteering. I believe all hon. members received a copy of a pamphlet entitled, "Labour Research," containing a good article which I think all hon. members should note, headed, "Is it the farmer's fault?" This reads:

> Some might rashly assume that these figures are evidence of the irreconcilability of workers' and farmers' interests. But they aren't. In September last, the dominion Department of Agriculture published a report on Marketing Margins for Selected Canadian Agricultural Products, 1935-1949. The products are potatoes, eggs, fluid milk, creamery butter, cheese, beef (commercial quality), wheat flour, white bread and canned tomatoes.
> The results are very carefully qualified and hedged about with warnings that they must be used only with the greatest care, and with full allowance for all the qualifications. But one fact does stand out, unmistakably: That the farmers' share of the retail price in 1949 was not, in most cases, substantially different from what it was in 1946. The only notable exception is potatoes, where the farmers' share fell off 20·8 per cent. In five of the other eight cases, also, it fell off, but only by much smaller percentages:

That shows that any increase that has taken place since 1949 in the price level is not due to any increase in the prices paid to the farmer but is the result of increases in the price spreads. Of course that is something that should definitely be dealt with at the earliest opportunity. In his speech in 1941 the minister referred to the fact that at that time they had heavy taxation, but in spite of that heavy taxation they were not able to keep prices from rising. Taxation may have been heavy in the minds of the people in 1941, but taxation is also quite heavy today. I notice that in 1941 the total revenue from taxation was $771,540,000 or a per capita tax of $67. In 1942, the year in which really heavy taxation was introduced, the revenue had increased to $1,360,913,000 or a per capita tax of $120. In 1949 the revenue had gone up to $2,436,142,000 or a per capita tax of $180.

Some will say that we should not forget that the national income has also gone up. That is quite true, but the value of the dollar today is only fifty per cent what it was in those days. I simply want to point out that the arguments used by the Minister of Finance at that time to justify the introduction of price controls are equally applicable to the present situation. I would like hon. members to note the similarity in the other inflationary pressures that were referred to. The minister stressed the fact that we had full employment at that time. This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told us that we have full employment in the country at the present time. He pointed out that we were having to divert goods from the channels of consumption to wartime needs. The Minister of Trade and Commerce also stressed the fact that a greater percentage would have to be diverted in the future.

Then there is another psychological effect that exists today as it existed then. It is true that we were at war in those days, but today the government is continually stressing the seriousness of the international situation. If the situation is as serious as it is said to be, then no doubt we are going to have to make great sacrifices in the future, sacrifices that will greatly increase the inflationary pressure. Therefore, if the argument of the Minister of Finance in 1941 was sound and justified the introduction of price controls, then I would say that there is even greater justification today for the introduction of price controls.

Some people seem to fail to realize that great changes have taken place in the general economic picture since 1945 and more especially since June of 1950. Let me review briefly those changes. It will be recalled that at the end of the second war there was a strong inflationary pressure in this country, due mainly to three things. The first was the accumulation of war savings which then became a demand against goods. The second was the fact that we were reconverting war industries to peacetime production and the money paid out in the reconversion of those industries became a demand against existing supplies of consumer goods. Then we were making large loans or gifts to foreign countries which of course took that much production away from the channels of consumption in Canada.

That inflationary pressure continued for a number of years but by the spring of 1950 it had disappeared. Therefore there was a good deal of justification for expecting that the price level would level out. As a matter of fact by 1950 many people were becoming concerned that we might sink into a recession. I recall the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) speaking in 1950 and warning of the danger of a recession. To offset it he urged that people should spend more freely and stop saving as much money in order to create a greater demand for goods.

That was the situation up to the spring of 1950, but then in June the Korean incident occurred, and since then we have been increasing our preparations for war. So today there is an entirely different situation to that which existed just prior to June of 1950. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has stated that it may be necessary to introduce price controls later. A statement of that kind in itself is nothing more or less than direct encouragement to industry to increase prices. He said the reason that controls had been a success in the last war was that they were brought in overnight. Now he is telling industry that we are not going to bring in price controls today but that we may have to bring them in later on. They may be introduced next week for all we know, and naturally industries will feel that, if there is any danger price controls may be instituted all of a sudden in the future, the only thing to do is to increase prices while there is a chance to do so in order that they will be in at least as favourable a position as any other industry that has increased its prices.

Therefore we believe that overnight the government should freeze prices and wages, then, through the board that they set up, adjust prices to provide for a fair profit, and then adjust wages to conform with the readjusted price level. I say that we should freeze prices and wages overnight because as long as you talk about it you are encouraging increases in prices. The thing to do, as they did in the United States, is to freeze prices and wages overnight and then as rapidly as possible readjust the price level to whatever level it should be adjusted. You should allow a fair profit and then adjust wages to conform with the new price level.

It has been pointed out that wages today have been set under agreements. That is all the more reason for the step that I suggest. For example, let us take an agreement between labour and industry made in 1949 for a period of two years. We will say that at that time the price index was at 150. I do not say it was but for argument's sake let us say it was 150. The agreement expires this year with a price level of 170. Naturally if that wage level was right at a time when the price level was 150 labour would be fully justified in demanding increased wages when the new agreement is signed. Vice versa, if the government saw fit to roll prices back so that the price level fell below 150, then there would be every justification for reducing wages in the next agreement. That is why I suggest that wages should be adjusted to conform with the adjusted price level.

I notice that the consumers association of Canada have insisted, according to their resolution passed at Ottawa, that if price control is introduced prices should be rolled back to 1949 levels. I think most people would agree that prices should be rolled back to the level of prices at that period, but let us not forget that we run into certain difficulties when we do that. It would mean that you would also have to control costs at the level of that period. But then we would also run into this trouble. We would find that many imported goods are having to be imported at a higher price level than that of 1949, and if any attempt were made to roll back prices to 1949 we would have to be prepared to subsidize the import of those goods that we consider essential to this country. There is no great difficulty about that. We faced that difficulty during the second world war. We voted many hundreds of millions of dollars for the purpose of subsidizing imports in order that they might be sold under the price ceiling.

I now want to deal with the question of farm prices. We say that under a system of price control prices of farm products should be controlled at a parity with the adjusted price level. That is the stand that was taken by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I know that many members have argued in the past that parity is something so vague and indefinite that nobody can tell just what it means. There is nothing indefinite about parity. As a matter of fact parity has been in operation in the United States for several years. It is an accomplished fact, and as a result of parity the price level of their agricultural products generally speaking has been higher than the price level in this country.

Parity has a very definite meaning. It means that the price of agricultural products should be maintained at a level that will give the farmer his fair share of the national income so that the income of the farmer shall bear the same relationship to the national income as farm population bears to the national population. I telephoned the farm finance branch of the bureau of statistics this morning to ascertain just what that relationship is at the present time, because many people seem to think that farm prices are quite high today. I was informed that farm income today is approximately between 10 and 15 per cent of the national income and farm population is around 25 per cent of e national population. Therefore the income of farmers today is still considerably below parity.

In the United States they established parity on the basis of the period from 1909 to 1914. Since then I believe they have introduced a policy of taking for their base period the average of the past ten years. It must be noted, however, that prices during that ten years were based upon a certain base period, from 1909 to 1914. Therefore it would not be possible for us to adopt as a base period the average of the last ten years because during the past ten years prices in Canada have not been based upon any base period.

The first thing to do would be to establish a base period. Some people think it would be difficult to do that. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has already offered to co-operate with the government in establishing a base period. That period would have to be not only one which would return to the farmers their fair share of the national income but one during which there was a fair relationship between the price of one farm commodity and another. Once you had established the base period it would be quite an easy thing to establish the parity price of any farm commodity in the future. For example, if the price of wheat in your base period was $1.50 and the price index of the things that the farmer buys is 175, and for the things that he sells is 165, in order to obtain parity all you would have to do would be to multiply $1.50 by the fraction of 175 over 165 which would give you $1.59; $1.59 would be the parity price of wheat today. In the same way you could proceed to establish the parity price of any farm commodity once you had established the base period. So far the government has not attempted to establish a base period; and until such time as it does take the time and trouble to do so we are going to have a good deal of discontent in this country concerning agricultural prices.

Now I want to say a few words concerning the final payment under the five-year pool. I believe the farmers are fully justified in asking that a substantial portion of the losses suffered under the British wheat agreement, and as a result of subsidizing the consumers in this country, should be made up out of the general revenues of the government. The Alberta wheat pool has suggested that this payment should be 25 cents a bushel. Let us not forget that even if a payment of 25 cents a bushel is made, the farmers will still be standing approximately 50 per cent of those losses. That is all a 25 cents per bushel payment would represent. It has been stated by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and others that the interim payment of 20 cents a bushel on the 1950 crop is helping to alleviate any difficulties the farmers may be having in meeting their present obligations. That is only partly true. Unquestionably it helps the farmer who threshed a crop, and who was able to sell that crop. We must not forget, however, that many farmers who raised crops in 1950 still have those crops under the snow. In the constituency which I represent I should say, as a conservative estimate, that at least 50 per cent of the crops east of Hanna are still under the snow. You are not helping those farmers a bit by making an interim payment of 20 cents a bushel on a crop which has still to be threshed. Then again there are those in the more fortunate position of having threshed their crops, but who have been unable to sell them owing to the congestion at the elevators. I was told by certain officials in Alberta that generally speaking the wheat has been pretty well cleared away along the Canadian National lines, but that there is still a tremendous amount of congestion on the main C.P.R. line in Alberta. Those farmers face a very serious situation. Not only have they not been able to sell their wheat, but unless those crops, which in many cases are very damp, are moved at a very early date, there is great danger of spoilage. So I believe that as rapidly as possible the government should increase drying facilities, because we are continually running into this difficulty of handling our grain in a tough or damp condition.

I think it is high time the five-year pool was cleaned up. I listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) speak to the farmers' union of Alberta in Calgary last December, and he left the very definite impression that the final payment would be made in January. He did not give very much encouragement to the farmers as to what the amount might be, but certainly they got the impression that the payment would be made in the very beginning of the year. Then in January the Minister of Agriculture spoke to the convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and he made the whole picture very cloudy indeed. He said the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was conversing with Mr. Attlee in an attempt to get more money under the "have regard" clause of the British wheat agreement and that now the whole question was up to Mr. Attlee. The minister did not know when Mr. Attlee would come through, and until such time as he did there could be no final payment under the five-year pool. So the matter was left in a very unsatisfactory position. However, today I was glad to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce say he would do everything in his power to see that the payment was made before the beginning of spring seeding.

Another question I want to touch upon today is the price of wheat. Hon. members will recall that we signed an international wheat agreement, which received the support of the house. At that time I warned of the danger of trying to guess what the price of wheat or any other commodity would be in the future. I stressed the fact then that it was quite easy to establish a fair price for the current year, but that when you tried to say what that price should be, one, two, three or four years hence, you were guessing and the government might very well guess wrong, as they did under the British wheat agreement. Therefore at that time I urged that instead of adopting the policy outlined in the international wheat agreement we should first of all set the price for the current year at what we considered a fair level, and then tie the price of wheat to the general price level, so that if in future the price level of the importing country went up 10 per cent the price of wheat to it would also go up 10 per cent. If on the other hand the price level went down 10 per cent the price of wheat would go down by the same amount. In other words you would be establishing a parity price on an international basis. Apparently the government did not consider that proposal worth while, so today we are faced with the fact that there is a ceiling of $1.89 on wheat. No matter what happens to the general price level, even if it goes up another 50 per cent, the price of wheat is tied down.

Does anyone suggest that the farmers should have a ceiling on wheat when everything else is allowed to go free? Then in addition we arbitrarily reduced the floor under wheat by 10 cents a bushel a year. Why? Would anyone suggest any reason why the floor price under wheat should be reduced by 10 cents next year, 10 cents the year after and 10 cents the year after that, when the prices of everything else are going up? That is why I argued at that time that the basis for payment under the international wheat agreement was not fair, and that we would never get a fair base until we tied the prices of farm commodities to the general price level on both a national and an international basis. In other words I was asking for parity prices both nationally and internationally.

In conclusion I would say it is high time the government brought in a long-range policy for agriculture based on parity. Only in that way can we assure the most efficient operation of agriculture in order to help provide the supplies of food so urgently required in many parts of the world today. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) stressed the fact that we cannot hope to defeat communism by the force of arms alone, that we will also have to provide economic aid to the backward countries. The sort of aid most urgently needed in the world today is food. Therefore it is up to us to maintain our agriculture at the highest possible state of efficiency, so that we may make our greatest contribution to good will and contentment in the world.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to deal briefly with two specific matters. The first has to do with a recent announcement of the Liberal government, which I desire to criticize and protest against. I refer to the decision to apply dumping duties to automobile imports from certain European countries including Britain and France. Surely that decision can only be described as a short-sighted, narrow-minded policy, which is sacrificing the interests of the Canadian people as a whole to certain pressure or protectionist groups.

I should like to remind this house, and particularly members on the government side including the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), of the traditional, or perhaps I should say the professed, trade policy of the Liberal party during the past few decades. In public utterances, in parliament and elsewhere, not once but a hundred times, speakers of the Liberal party have stated that their government is working towards freer trade and fewer trade restrictions. I believe most members of the house would agree that the former prime minister, Mr. King, was an authority on this subject. He stated that Liberal trade policy in 1945 was as follows, and I am quoting from Maclean's magazine dated February 1:

> The Liberal party stands for the removal of barriers to trade, and is opposed to the principle of protection which is really a levy on consumers in Canada for the benefit of the protected industries.

On numerous occasions I have heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) speak along similar lines. I have one quotation from a speech he made in Toronto a little more than a year ago. According to the Globe and Mail of October 29, 1949, the Minister of Finance was thus reported:

> But the solution of Canada's problem, he said, would depend on expanded trade, the lowering of trade barriers and the elimination of arbitrary restrictions and discriminatory practices.

I have one other quotation which I should like to put before the house. It is one which was made a short time ago by the leader of the Liberal party in my own province of Saskatchewan. According to the Regina Leader-Post of December 12, 1949:

> Walter Tucker, Saskatchewan Liberal leader, Friday night called upon the federal government to abolish all tariff and other restrictions on imports of British goods.

How can any member of the government reconcile words such as those, how can he reconcile the past professed trade policy of the Liberal party, with this action to apply dumping duties against British and French cars? It would seem that there has been so much talk of Korea, so much talk of national defence and the major issues, that the protectionist forces of this country thought they might get this act passed without anybody noticing it. I say that this dumping duty is completely undesirable.

Ever since the end of the war I have heard government speakers urging British industry to get its prices down to competitive Canadian levels, and to produce goods which Canadians wanted. According to the Prime Minister, according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and according to the Minister of Finance, it was by such means that Britain would be able to earn the Canadian dollars with which to buy our farm products, our timber products, and our ocean products. After all, if Britain is to buy from us, I suppose it is natural that she wishes to sell us goods to earn Canadian dollars. The British automobile industry accepted the admonition of our government. It got its prices down; it produced goods which Canadians wanted; it earned Canadian dollars. What is its reward? Apparently its reward is to be this so-called dumping duty.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if we are to continue trading with the British we shall have to give them an opportunity of earning Canadian dollars. It would seem to me also that a government which has always stated its desire for freer trade would be more interested in securing markets for farm products in Britain than in giving a specific industry special protection.

Today the price of Canadian automobiles is almost beyond the reach of the average Canadian consumer. British cars are supplying a need in the Canadian market for cheaper transportation. If this duty is proceeded with it can only help to send the already skyrocketing cost of living up even further.

I say that this proposed dumping duty is all the more inopportune when we realize that at Torquay, at this very moment, many of the free nations of the world including Canada are discussing ways and means of eliminating this sort of restriction. There are few things which could so darken the prospects of success at Torquay as this new protectionist measure of our own government. I say that to raise these barriers in the midst of an international effort to lower them is an act of economic folly.

Why has the government decided to proceed with these dumping duties? We must assume that the action has come as a result of representations from the automobile industry. Were those representations justified? I should like to remind the house, Mr. Speaker, of two factors in connection with those representations. First of all, Canadian cars have roughly doubled in price since 1939. Today Canadian automobiles are so high in price that many Canadians, indeed I would say the majority of Canadians, cannot afford to buy them. Second, I would remind the house that the Canadian automobile industry already has ironclad protection from United States competition, because of tariff and control regulations. Having no fear from United States competition, the Canadian industry instantly protests as soon as the British competition becomes a little too serious.

I have always heard Mr. Sale, the president of the Ford Company of Canada, and other Canadian industrialists, pay great tribute to this free enterprise system, as they like to call it, and competition. Why now does Mr. Sale, as well as the others, protest competition as soon as it appears?

Is Canadian industry suffering because of this British competition? Has the industry been forced to curtail production in any way? Every member of this house knows that today the Canadian automobile industry cannot supply enough cars. If anyone wishes to buy a Ford, a Chevrolet, a Plymouth, or any other model he has to wait some months to secure delivery.

Is there any unemployment in the automobile field? There is not. On the contrary, today there is a shortage of skilled workers. There was an article in the Saturday Night this week which says, and I quote from page 42:

> Canada's preparedness program now faces a threat no less serious than a steel shortage—skilled labour. All the emergency legislation, all the controls that our government or any other government could dream up might alleviate a skilled labour shortage in the defence industries, but they could not increase the supply of highly-skilled labour in anything less than years.

In view of the war in Korea there is every indication that in the next year or so Canadian industry will be able to supply even fewer cars than it does now. By no stretch of the imagination can it be said that British imports are a threat to the Canadian automobile industry. I say that the request of this industry is a short-sighted, narrow-minded request made on the basis of self-interest. If the Canadian automobile industry wants to sell more cars in Canada, let it produce them more cheaply. I shall tell the government, although they will not listen to me, that this proposal is causing considerable concern in Canada, particularly in western Canada where the farmers are wondering why the government is taking such a step. I hope they will immediately withdraw these ill-advised dumping duties which they plan to impose on May 31.

Mr. Speaker, the second matter with which I should like to deal briefly—I think I can finish before six o'clock—has to do with the announcement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) last Monday evening. He said that during the year $1·6 billion will be spent on national defence. It is of course virtually impossible for opposition members who have not taken part in the many conferences under the Atlantic pact, who have not attended the military talks, to know whether this $1·6 billion is too much or too little. As opposition members, we have little choice but to accept the words of the minister that this spending is vital and essential.

Having done that, I think that the citizens of Canada do expect us to diligently and carefully scrutinize the details of these expenditures and the estimates, in order to make sure the taxpayer is getting value for his dollar. I remember that last year the Minister of Finance said at page 1992 of Hansard:

> I believe that the public of Canada have the right to expect parliament itself, the members of parliament itself, to exercise a constant and vigilant scrutiny over the conduct of administration, to search for waste and duplication.

Last Monday evening the Minister of National Defence said that 80,000 contracts had already been let.

It is going to be a terrific task to go over 80,000 contracts. Nevertheless, I believe it is our duty at least to make an endeavour. I personally believe, with other members who have spoken this session, that the only proper way to do that is by means of a special defence committee. I would like to see a specific committee set up for that purpose. I think most members of this group feel likewise. However, if that is not going to be done, we must have some other vehicle for the purpose. I personally doubt if the government has much to hide; yet their great reluctance to set up a special defence committee has caused many people in the country to wonder if they have. If we are not going to have a special committee, probably the next best vehicle is the public accounts committee.

I was indeed pleased to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) the other day state—at least I took him so to state—that opposition members would be given the opportunity in the public accounts committee to examine defence expenditures. As reported at page 111 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> There will be an opportunity for hon. members, including the members of the opposition, to examine in the public accounts committee all the expenditures that have been made.

I hope that the Prime Minister will tell his chairman and the other Liberal members on that committee about that statement; because last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) made a similar statement. As reported at page 1991 of Hansard it was as follows:

> Let me point out to the house that the public accounts committee is a standing committee of this house . . . and there is opportunity in the public accounts committee for any hon. member, and in particular for hon. members of the opposition, to ask that any deputy minister, or any official of any department, be brought before that committee, and to examine him to their heart's content as to the details of the particular services of the department.

The minister last year said that. But when we got into the committee, although the members asked for a good deal of information, they were not able to get it. Opposition members asked for witnesses, they asked for figures, and they asked for the public accounts. They asked for many things, but they did not get much satisfaction. We were repeatedly overruled when we sought information, and we were consistently refused the public accounts themselves. I think that committee sat for three months before it even got to the public accounts.

I would remind the house of one thing further. Last year the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) asked that that committee be called for the specific purpose of inquiring into national defence expenditures. Yet all during those three months, despite many requests, we were not able to get the national defence expenditures brought before us. I hope the minister will give some assurance that the same thing will not happen again. Let me say that Canadians want defence expenditures scrutinized. If the government is sincere in also wanting them scrutinized, I hope they will call the public accounts committee together, if that is to be the committee, and that they will call it together early. Perhaps it would be wise not to spend so much time as is customary with Mr. Sellar. Let us get down to the national defence expenditures at once and stay there.

The other evening the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) stated his opposition to calling the chiefs of staff before a parliamentary committee. I admit that I know little about military matters; but nevertheless I presume to disagree with the hon. member for Quebec South in this connection. These chiefs of staff, these men who are high up in military affairs, are the experts and they are the ones who should be able to inform parliament about defence matters. They should be the ones to tell us what is being done, how it is being done, why it is being done, and whether or not we are getting value for our defence dollar. Surely an explanation by a parliamentary committee could be conducted with some dignity and with a proper regard for security. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) should not be the only one who knows the reasons which require the spending of this $1.6 billion. I serve notice that this group will, as soon as the debate on the speech from the throne is finished, seek to have the public accounts committee called in order to deal with national defence expenditures. If or when it is called, this group will seek to call before it the defence minister himself, the chief of the general staff, Air Marshal Curtis and many other officials whom we may feel could give information which the people of Canada would like to have. I think one more thing should be done; if the government really wants to make this an effective committee, let them do as is done in England. Let them make the chairman a member of the opposition. Then I think we might get a proper scrutiny of defence expenditures.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, more than ever I wish we had amplifiers and recorders in the house.

Mr. Gibson: You do not need them.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should like to have a recording of that splendid applause—for which I arranged, myself. I am glad to see that the opposition benches are beginning to fill up, and particularly with those members who are interested in external affairs.

Mr. Graydon: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am sure they will have greater knowledge of our international situation, about thirty-nine minutes from now, than they have displayed up to the present.

I had not intended to say anything tonight. However, I am particularly interested in manpower and, having heard nothing of a constructive nature from the other side of the house as yet, I thought it was necessary for me to say something on this subject. I had sincerely hoped that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) might have been here. However, I am sure one of his colleagues will note carefully what I say in connection with manpower, so that at least he may review it in Hansard.

Before I came to Ottawa to attend this session I expressed my opinion about the manpower situation to the Legion in my riding—and, I think, the Legion in the entire province. I am particularly proud of having a gold medal from the Legion, which is the equivalent of a life membership. I believe it is the finest organization in Canada, and there is no other organization more entitled to speak about manpower or national defence than is the Canadian Legion.

They may make mistakes; they may ask for too many things, unquestionably. We on this side of the house do not claim to be experts in matters of national defence, but I know of no group to whom we could go for advice on defence matters who would be better qualified to give advice than the 250,000 former soldiers of the Canadian Legion. Surely they know something about that subject. I might not be entirely in agreement with some hon. members on this side of the house in connection with my opinion concerning the Legion's request. However, I want to make it clear at once that I make exactly the same speech in Ottawa as I make in my own riding; I do not have one for the consumption of the people of British Columbia—Vancouver-Quadra or elsewhere in that province—and another one for Ottawa. Neither do I have a different one in Nanaimo. I have exactly the same speech in the Fraser valley as I have in Ottawa, at least so far as manpower is concerned.

I say tonight that I believe we should have compulsory service for the reserve army. As it exists today the reserve army is almost useless. I do not say that in any derogatory fashion, or as reflecting upon the splendid men who serve in that force. Perhaps I might localize my remarks so that they will apply to my own district. We have there one company of twenty-eight men, who are working with very expensive equipment and in an excellent armoury. What in the world could twenty-eight men accomplish?

I can see no other way of getting the necessary manpower for the reserve army than that suggested by the Canadian Legion. Unfortunately the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has another engagement this evening. He did say however that he would much sooner listen to me than have to make a speech himself—and I can quite appreciate that. However, if he were here this evening I would point out to him that if the reserve army, with compulsory service, is to be made effective, it should start from the top and work down—not from the bottom, up.

A colleague of mine from British Columbia who served in the regular army during the last war has told me that in the reserve army they have a course lasting from three to five weeks to teach the recruits how to drive jeeps. There is not a farmer boy in my riding, from twelve years of age up, who could not teach anyone how that is done. Yet they have this course to teach it.

We have also in the reserve army—and I want some of their officers to know it—some of the old school, of the old tie, and with accents which at least to me are not conducive to getting young Canadians to "suhve" under them. That "old school" is all over, so far as I am concerned.

Of course, I do not know anything at all about military affairs. I am willing to concede that the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is one who served in the first great war. When he speaks of military or defence matters we must keep in mind that he had the honour, with me, of serving in the unit which won the first great war. Of course that gives him a great advantage over the other members on his side of the house. Those of us who served in that brigade never look into the past—that is, no more than to say that we were the finest brigade that ever left Canada. That is as far as I can go. I have made my stand here tonight with respect to compulsory service, so far as the reserve army is concerned.

Now I wish to make the same speech tonight that I made in the Fraser valley about that word which, I am told, members of the official opposition were told they should never even whisper—"conscription". I am told on good authority that they were instructed as soon as this session started that they must never mention the word conscription.

An hon. Member: A naughty word!

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, a naughty word. I had a clipping before me the other day—and, by the way, I am getting like some of the others in that I have so many clippings that I get lost in them. However I did have one here about the bridge—and I will have to be more careful with them, because I seem to have mislaid it. I will find it after a while. That clipping said—I am sure it was correct: If you are flirting around with Quebec for votes, be careful never to mention conscription. That apparently is the policy of the opposition.

My stand on conscription, when speaking before the Legion, as it is tonight, is that I think it neither desirable nor practicable nor necessary at this time. But if the day should come when there is a vote on conscription I will vote exactly as I did before, and make exactly the same speech as one colleague from British Columbia made with me in 1944. Incidentally, through you, Mr. Speaker, I say to the people of my riding that I believe that if the time ever comes—and members in all parts of the house hope it may never come—but if the time ever comes when conscription is necessary to protect our very existence and to maintain the forms of government and liberty in which we believe, Quebec will be in the forefront and serving with all the rest of Canada.

I am willing to concede that in military knowledge some members of the official opposition far exceed me. We remember that it was only a few years ago that they appreciated the fact that the Bren gun was not necessary! Then, again, they were able to foretell that we had not trained our troops for a sufficient length of time before they went to Hong Kong! Now I understand there is a great rush among them to send troops to Korea with only a couple of weeks of training. I should like to refer to what a colleague on the other side of the house, one of the finest soldiers Canada ever had, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), had to say. If you can understand just exactly where he stands in connection with this horrible word "conscription" or in connection with compulsory service in the reserve army, you are very good. What he said reminds me of my Uncle Horace. My Uncle Horace killed a pig but he said afterward, "It didn't weigh as much as I thought it would; I didn't think it would." I should like to quote what the hon. member for Nanaimo said, as reported on page 99 of Hansard of February 5, as follows:

> —and even though I might hold different views as to the methods by which these forces should be raised, I think it would be detrimental at this time to advocate strongly methods which the government is not prepared to follow, because I believe it is of paramount importance that the government raise the men that it requires, and the government alone will say by what method it will raise those men.

A little further along on the same page:

> —or in any way put any hindrance in the way of the national effort carried out by the methods recommended by the government to meet what I consider to be a grave situation.

I should like to ask hon. members of the house if the hon. member has answered the Canadian Legion's demand for 250,000 strength. It may be that the reserve army will have to be kept up to strength by compulsory means. If the time comes when we must have conscription I will be ready to say in my riding, even though it costs me every vote in the riding—probably I will not get the few votes that they will get if they do not fall off a bridge like that one down in Quebec—that I am ready to support it.

I pass now to another military expert from my province, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra. First I am going to deal with his remarks on manpower and then I shall turn to external affairs. I do not know whether he is the assistant leader of his party in that particular branch. It is quite easy for the hon. member to make speeches in Vancouver about the necessity of raising forces, but it is a different matter when you come down here. I want to assure everybody in my riding that at no time since 1940 have I been approached by the whip or by any member of the government to tell me what to say when I came before the house.

Mr. Sinclair: Fat chance.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) has interjected a remark. I do not know whether he is trying to give me the benefit of his mature judgment or whether an attempt is being made to see that I carry on along the right lines in support of the government because I seem to be surrounded by parliamentary assistants of all sorts.

An hon. Member: That is why you are doing so well.

Mr. Cruickshank: For the benefit of the hon. member who says that that is why I am doing so well may I say that two years before he was moved over here behind me I was two rows closer to the Prime Minister's desk than he is today. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is reported as follows on page 165 of Hansard of February 7:

> This house would be well advised to listen to the pleas for action by these bodies of Canadian veterans.

I suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra that he should state where he stands in so far as the supplying of manpower for the armed services is concerned, and this should include the reserve army as well. As I said before, if it ever becomes necessary to have all-out conscription, I shall vote for it. However, I have complete confidence in the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). I believe that he appreciates the situation. My confidence in the Prime Minister is such that I believe that if and when the time comes that action is required nothing will stand in the way of his directing whatever is necessary to preserve the freedom we now have.

I do not want to keep the house too long because I recently read an article by the Canadian Manufacturers Association about speechmaking. I do not own a lumber company or a packing plant so it is not very often that I agree with them. However, they said that a speech should never last more than twenty minutes and they said one more thing with which I definitely agree, something which is not followed by 85 per cent of the members of this house, that a speech should not be read. If at any time I do read a speech I shall be different from even some of my colleagues on this side of the house and will admit that I am simply reading what some member in the press gallery has written for me.

Perhaps I should not be too hard on the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra because he comes from my province. Perhaps instead of pointing out the mistakes of the hon. member I should point out the mistakes of hon. members from Ontario or the maritimes, although I do not know that there are any members in the opposition from the maritimes.

An hon. Member: They do not make mistakes.

Mr. Cruickshank: I am going to get over to Saskatchewan and cartels in a minute. A remark was made by the hon. member about our external affairs. I want to say with all respect that from the time this department has borne the distinguished name it has Canada has never had the privilege of having at the head of this department a gentleman with the capabilities of the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) or anyone who has enjoyed such respect throughout the world. I should like to quote a further remark by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, as reported on page 163 of Hansard, as follows:

> The handling by the government of Canada's activities in the Korean crisis has been one of the most disgraceful episodes in Canada's history.

That remark should never have been placed on Hansard as it brings no credit to the party the hon. member represents and it definitely brings no credit to the province from which we both come. I have nothing at all to be ashamed of as the member for Fraser Valley of the part Canada has played in the Korean or any other war that involved the freedom of the peoples of the world. It is a most peculiar thing that the representative of one riding should say that there has been a disgraceful handling of affairs by a man possessing the capabilities of our present minister. The status of our minister is borne out by a question asked on Tuesday by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) when he inquired if our minister had accepted the invitation extended to him by the president of the general assembly to serve on the good offices committee with respect to oriental problems. If that is not a compliment to the Canadian minister of external affairs, I should like to know what it is. I think it is one of the finest compliments that could be paid to him or that could be paid to Canada for the part she is playing in the Korean and other crises.

In case it may be thought that I am altogether too favourably inclined in my remarks, I should like to move on to the question of controls. Perhaps I cannot speak on controls with the authority with which certain Saskatchewan members speak. It must be realized that we farmers in British Columbia do not go in for chain farming. We operate just one farm, not five or more. Of course I can speak only for myself, but I think the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will permit me to say that we are both free traders. If we are able to convince the rest of the people to be free traders, we shall have free trade in this country.

Mr. Sinclair: What about margarine?

Mr. Cruickshank: What about margarine? I left one of the finest clippings I ever saw on this matter up in my office, but I think I can remember enough of it to be able to get down to margarine in a minute. In the meantime let me say that if anybody gets the benefit of our economic way of life in Canada it is the retailers of hardware products. I do not know anybody who gets more benefit than the retailer of hardware products. I know because I bought a Mixmaster wholesale through a certain friend, and I still paid 20 per cent profit to him. I believe controls are inevitable. That is my opinion. I have a little bit more hopeful view than might be taken after listening to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I presume he still has the same title. He comes from the head of the great lakes, and they change their titles and portfolios so often, but I will call him Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I am very hopeful yet, but if controls are put into effect in so far as I am concerned they must not be put into effect as they were in the last war, starting at the farmers' level. If the people of Canada try to kid themselves that throughout the war period they got bread at a reasonable price through Donald Gordon, they are all wrong. The reason they got bread at a low price was that it was at the expense of the wheat growers of western Canada. If controls are to be instituted let us not start at the level of the farmer. Do not forget that the farmer is not only a producer but also a consumer. I do not want to say too much about controls, but the government has a measure before the house—and I presume it will be voted on—involving when controls should be introduced and what shall be put under control. My own opinion is that controls must be across the board. If controls are imposed they must be on wages and everything else.

In the meantime, however, I believe that controls should be exercised by taxation through the Department of Finance. Even some of our lumber friends know that. I do not want to point directly so I will point to both of them over there.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Leave those independents out.

Mr. Cruickshank: They come from the Kootenays, that glorious part of British Columbia. I believe the way to have controls now is by taxation through the finance department. Here I want to say that I believe no government, be it Liberal, Conservative or, God help us, C.C.F., has any alternative but to do something about the cost of living so far as pensioners and others on low incomes are concerned. I know of the case of a widow of a veteran of two wars, in one of which he won an honour that I should like to have, the military medal. She is suffering from arthritis and is unable to do anything. She is receiving from a grateful government $40 a month. It is not good enough. I believe the people of Canada do not want that sort of condition to exist. I believe the people of Canada do not care what taxes are imposed upon them as long as no veteran's widow suffering from arthritis has to live on $40 a month.

We are spending billions on war; we can find billions to build jet planes and so on because we have to build them to protect our free institutions; but any government that can find ways and means through taxation or otherwise to pay $400,000 or $500,000 for an aeroplane surely is admitting weakness if it cannot find the money to provide a decent living to burnt-out veterans and other recipients of pensions. So far as I am concerned I will do my utmost throughout this session to see that the government rectifies the error of its ways in the past in that regard.

I should like to endorse something that the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) said the other day with respect to a check on defence expenditures. I do not see why the government should object to that. I know we have a public accounts committee. I have been a member of it ever since I have been here. Last year we sat and spent our time on a one-man fishing expedition trying to find out about the Bren gun and the North Star aeroplane. We do not want that sort of stuff as I see it when it comes to checking war expenditures. What we do want to see is that the money is spent to the best advantage in defence of our country. I believe that such a committee should be set up.

I disagree with my friend, the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), in the suggestion he made. Speaking with a little bit of military knowledge, I think it would be ridiculous to bring the heads of the army, navy and air force before a committee. It would undermine the whole idea of military discipline. It would be detrimental to our war effort in every way, shape and form. I think if the hon. member will consult any of the military members of his own group he will find that they will agree with me that it is not practical and, pardon the word, it is senseless to expect to bring military men before such a committee to use them for a political football, for purposes of political gain at the expense of our national defence effort.

I mentioned pensions a moment ago, and I include old age pensions. I understand that legislation is to be introduced to permit the levying of a three per cent provincial tax. I am not quite sure of the legal situation because in the province of British Columbia they put such a tax on, but it was not a hidden one. Of course in our province they can do almost anything. When you buy your driver's licence they make you pay five years in advance. If you live in British Columbia under the present government you might have to forgive anything because any government that can levy a tax five years in advance is a pretty good one. I expect that the income tax is going up this year. I am very thankful that you cannot levy income tax five years in advance, knowing the disposition of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. I want to tell the government that I am going to oppose the three per cent tax so far as possible.

I should like to turn for a minute to margarine because the subject has been introduced by one of my colleagues.

Mr. Sinclair: Free trade.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes, free trade, and we believe in free trade, but just before I came east a firm in Vancouver sent me a sample of fertilizer to try in my garden. I wish I had brought with me the description of that sample. It is up in my office. It indicates all the things that they had taken out of whale oil. They even took the odour out but they left the oil. When my colleague wants to ruin 500,000 dairy farmers in order to put such junk as whale oil into something to put on the tables of people who unfortunately cannot afford to buy butter at present prices, I should like to tell him that he would be far better advised, particularly in the happy position he holds in the right branch of the Department of Finance, to see that the taxation system is such that those who can afford to bear it will pay in order that the people can buy butter at a reasonable rate.

Mr. Sinclair: Free trade.

Mr. Cruickshank: I quite agree with the statement credited to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in one of the best papers in Vancouver under date of January 15. The headline is, "Butter holds power in Canada."

Mr. Sinclair: Free trade.

Mr. Cruickshank: Again I am getting interjections from my junior colleague on the left. We are short of butter and he has played a large part in the fact that we are short of butter. He introduced this axle grease, with the result that the farmers sold their good heifers because there was not the demand or the price for butter; they were being undersold by this colourless, useless stuff that he brought into our country legally, through the decision of a few judges. I am now surrounded by $32,000 extra a year; but those gentlemen surrounding me would not be getting the extra money but for the fact, as they said, that butter holds the balance of power in Canada. So I think they should cease their opposition to butter and stop supporting margarine. I hear someone say "sour grapes." You know the way businessmen generally go about arriving at a figure for a key man in their business. They size up what they are paying an executive in this department and a superintendent in that department, and make up their minds accordingly. I have come to the conclusion, with this galaxy of extra talent around me, that when my turn comes, if the Prime Minister will divide the $32,000 in proportion, I will get more than they will.

I am sorry to have taken so long; I would not have done so but for these interruptions. I want now to turn to public works, and I am going to be very brief. We see the results of one of these five-year plans over here at the fire trap called the east block. Why, any good Fraser Valley farmer could put that roof on in three months, but they have been at it for two years. Some years ago, before I came to this house, there was a popular song called, "I know where the flies go in the wintertime." I never knew until this year, but now I see that as part of the five-year plan they are finally taking the fly screens off that building, in this kind of weather.

Mr. Fraser: The efficient Liberal government.

Mr. Cruickshank: Yes; but if it had been a C.C.F. government the screens would have been on there still. In 1948 this government was most generous to the farmers of the Fraser valley, as was the provincial government. That year we had a disastrous flood, and while this government had no legal responsibility it recognized a moral obligation and responded generously. On behalf of the people of Fraser Valley I want to say that we appreciate very much the generosity that was extended to us. Ninety per cent of the dikes happen to be in my riding. The federal government invested some $10 million in those dikes. Forget the farms in that valley; forget, if you like, the third largest city in Canada. The fact remains that we have $10 million of the money of the people invested there. Last year we had very high water before the dikes could properly settle, with the result that parts of them washed away and we found weak places. So I believe it is incumbent upon some authority to find the small amount of money necessary to repair the damage and reinforce the weak spots.

I have some pictures here; I am only sorry all hon. members cannot see them. One shows a hole 30 feet deep and 130 feet long right into the dike. I was able to show that hole to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair), the future minister of agriculture, and also the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Major) and the hon. member for Norquay (Mr. Wood). One of those gentlemen was only an engineer; another sold what we produce on the farms; but the third was a real farmer. It does not make sense to me, Mr. Speaker, that a government should spend $10 million and then, for the sake of a paltry few thousand dollars in addition, let the original investment be wiped out. Why, within 150 feet of the weakest spot in that dike we have the main line of the Canadian National Railways, the main line of the Canadian Pacific serving Fort Lewis and the main line of the British Columbia Electric. In one day at the beginning of the year eight troop trains went over one line, near my house. I realize that the provincial government should make the move, but they have done nothing. If the provincial government does not have the gumption to do anything about it, it seems to me the federal government, who have been so generous and fair to us in the past, should cut off some of their grants, or give them a boost in some other way, to see that this work is done. We in British Columbia have tried, but we cannot hope to wake them up until the next election, when once more they will try to ride in on the back of the Liberal party here in Ottawa.

I am serious about this; I think it is very important. As I say, we appreciate the generous treatment we were given, and surely it is good business to spend another few thousand or few hundred thousand and do the necessary work to protect our investment of $10 million. I thank hon. members for being so patient with me. In passing I might say, for once, a good word about the Canadian Manufacturers Association, which is a great organization. I could never hope to achieve membership in that organization unless, by some chance or other, I should happen to engage in the hardware business.

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, during the next three years this country will spend $5 billion for defence. This will necessitate a curtailment in the production of a great many different kinds of goods, and the facilities producing them will have to be diverted to the production of defence materials. This will create shortages in many of the necessities of life which are in free supply today, and the bidding for the fewer goods available will cause prices to rise rapidly.

In addition, the wages of the extra people needed in industry and the armed forces to carry out a worth-while preparedness program will increase the amount of money available to bid for these goods. This will further accelerate the rise in prices.

The net result of all this will be that speculators will make tremendous profits, and the buying public must foot the bill.

During the past year we have had an increase of ten points in the cost of living index. This has caused severe hardship to pensioners and those in the lower income brackets. Further accelerated rises in the cost of living—due to defence preparedness—will create an intolerable situation for all our people, if they are allowed to go on unchecked.

It is obvious, therefore, that a defence preparedness program must be accompanied by over-all price controls.

At the same time that price control is introduced, it will be necessary to introduce wage control as well, because you cannot expect the cost of goods and services to remain stationary while the cost of the labour producing them increases.

Together with price and wage controls, of course, must come rent controls to protect those whose incomes will become controlled. This will create no hardship for landlords, because the cost of the things they buy, and the people they hire, will also be controlled.

As it will take some considerable time to set up the machinery for over-all controls, I strongly urge the government to set the machinery in motion now so that our defence preparedness program may proceed without causing great hardship to the people of this country. Prices have already risen considerably in anticipation of controls. Every day we delay their imposition, the more prices will continue to rise.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) this afternoon indicated that if the government should ever get around to doing something towards controlling inflation, the method they would prefer would be fiscal and monetary measures. These will not do the job, for two reasons. First of all, they are only directed against one source of inflationary pressure, namely the supply of money. Second, in order to get results, these measures would have to be applied with such severity that the result would be hardship among many income classes. An authority for these views is to be found in the report of the royal commission on prices, volume 2, page 42, paragraph 6. It reads as follows:

> For reasons which are outlined in chapter 6, it was decided that fiscal and monetary actions, though an essential part of the full program, could not be depended upon to curb the powerful inflationary forces then being put in motion. More direct action was necessary. Which should it be, an intensification of the use of selective controls, firmly fixing prices and regulating uses but confining these actions to key and basic commodities; or placing a price ceiling on all goods and services, with accompanying production and distribution controls? The choice fell on the over-all ceiling policy, for reasons which were outlined by the Minister of Finance in the House of Commons on November 6, 1941, and have been further discussed by Mr. K. W. Taylor.

Now, just as fiscal and monetary measures alone will not do the job, neither will selective controls, and for three reasons. First of all, they are discriminatory. Second, we have today no unused resources. Selective controls might work if we had vast unused resources of men and materials, but they will not work in a condition of full employment such as we have today. Third, industry is too integrated and interdependent to seal off a section of it manufacturing the necessities of life only.

The forces that are generating this inflation are too strong to be dealt with by other than an all-out attack, using all weapons. An authority for those views is the report of the royal commission on prices, volume 2, page 90, paragraphs 2 and 3, where it is stated:

> As we see it, selective price control may be justified under exceptional circumstances for a temporary period. It may, for example, be justified by a temporary restriction of imports for exchange conservation purposes which, if allowed to affect prices, might result simply in a fortuitous profit to domestic producers, and if some imports are permitted to importers. Selective price control, combined with subsidies, may also be justified as a means of slowing down the wage-price spiral, on the assumption that the rise in the cost of living is temporary and will soon be replaced by a decline. In specific cases of acute shortages of important commodities, direct controls may be necessary to ensure that the scarce supplies are directed to where they will best serve the national interest.
> Except under such circumstances it is doubtful, however, if selective price control has much to commend it in ordinary time. It is bound to be discriminatory. It is extremely difficult and complicated to administer. Most important of all, and particularly if subsidies are paid on the controlled goods, selective controls are more likely to augment the inflationary gap between demand and supply than to reduce it. If a general attack on inflation is to be made, the weapons should, in the main, also be general, directed to bringing the flow of money available for expenditure into equilibrium with the supply of goods and services available for purchases.

It therefore seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are entering a period of extreme inflationary pressure, for a substantial rearmament program is being imposed in an economy which is already fully extended. I believe there is only one way to meet this condition, and that is by making use of all the measures available to us, namely:

(1) Over-all price and wage controls;

(2) Fiscal and monetary measures; and

(3) The distribution and allocation of materials.

I sincerely urge the government to take action in these directions at the very earliest possible moment.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, when the date was set for the opening of parliament I believe most Canadians, and certainly all members of parliament, expected to attend one of the most serious sessions of parliament held in a long time. Since coming to parliament it seems to me that there has been a great deal of shadow-boxing between both the old line parties. Each seems to be afraid to speak out in terms that the ordinary people of Canada will understand. It reminds me a great deal of the beginning of the 1939 session when war was declared. At that time the Liberal party said in effect, "We will tell the people everything if necessary, but not necessarily anything."

I have been waiting with a great deal of concern trying to find out from spokesmen on the government side of the house exactly how serious the international situation is. I do not think there is anyone in this house, and I am sure there is no one in Canada, who is not greatly concerned with the international situation as well as the domestic situation. I read the speech from the throne with a great deal of care. I listened to the speeches made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew), by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson).

In the speech from the throne I could not find very much apart from generalities. It referred to a number of amendments which were going to be introduced. We all expected these amendments because there are some every session. There will be amendments to the veterans pension legislation, amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act, the Immigration Act, the Post Office Act, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Then there was mention made of new tax agreements with the provinces. It is true that it did not overlook the international situation. It outlined the international situation in general terms. It drew to our attention the gravity of the situation. But when one compares some of the remarks which have been made by responsible persons, one begins to wonder how serious the situation is. The Prime Minister has been reported to have said that there is too much talk about war and that he is still confident that there will be no war in his time. In his speech in the house, as reported at page 26 of Hansard he even went on to say:

> In spite of the gravity of the situation I do not believe a world war is inevitable.

Of course I do not think anyone would say that it was inevitable. We all trust that it is not. We trust that we shall never again have to face a war. But one of the best ways to prevent war is by being thoroughly prepared. In the September session, I recall the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) telling us how well this country was being prepared, and how adequate our forces were then to take care of any immediate situation. Then when it came to the Korean war we found that we did not even have any troops prepared with which to take our share in the Korean conflict. Now we are going to spend $1·6 billion in defence; and over the period of three years we are going to spend $5 billion in war preparations. These figures would indicate that we were not at all well prepared before the Korean outbreak.

I do not profess to be any authority whatever on military or foreign affairs, Mr. Speaker. I have never studied that subject since I have been here in the House of Commons, although I have listened to the speeches carefully. I must therefore rely on the information we get from the members of our own group, from the members of the other parties who had the privilege of attending the meetings of the United Nations, and the speeches which were made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

When I read the speeches of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I am somewhat impressed as I am also when I listen to those members who attended the United Nations, and I am convinced that the situation is quite serious. For instance, at one place in Hansard, at page 60, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is reported as follows:

> In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I return from Asia to our own western and north Atlantic world. Here we are now entering the period of greatest danger in the months ahead.

Then he goes on to emphasize the seriousness of the situation when he says:

> If we do not, but give way to smug complacency on the one hand or unreasoning panic on the other, we shall become, and deserve to become, slaves ourselves.

Those are grave words of warning to which we must all give a great deal of heed. When one hears, on the one hand, the words of complacency uttered by the Prime Minister, to the effect that he does not expect a war in his time and, on the other hand, has the grave words of warning of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, one wonders just how one can reconcile those two frames of mind in members of the same party and, in fact, members of the same cabinet.

I think that the action the government is now taking, although it is late, will result in a great deal more of preparedness. With that I think we shall have to be content. But speaking of preparedness, I have some views on the matter and I want to mention a few of them. If a war does break out—and I use the word "if" advisedly—it seems to me that we should not be in quite the same position as we were in 1939. In my estimation, one of the best ways to be prepared is to have a national registration. This is not something new. I think almost every organization in Canada is asking for that action. Certainly the veteran organizations of Canada are asking for it, and those who are the heads of the veterans' national organizations have had some experience in this field. In order to carry on efficiently national preparedness, it would seem to me that national registration is the first step in order that we shall know the place in which every man and woman in this country can best be fitted. When the first world war came upon us, we had time to prepare. Everyone told us that when the next war came, if it did, we would not have any time to prepare, that it would come overnight, in fact. Such is not the case. We have the warning from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, so we can be thankful for that. We should take advantage of the opportunity and should have a national registration under way immediately. We should know where every person fits in agriculture, in industry and in defence. In agriculture we should know just exactly what commodities we are going to require and in what abundance. In industry we should know what industries are capable of producing those materials which they can produce most efficiently in their plants. In defence we should know for what service men are best suited, whether for the army, the navy or the air force. I want to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) on his foresight in this regard. He is coming nearly to a national registration when he speaks of a national advisory council which he was given authority to set up under P.C. 567 and which I think is now under way. I think it was a good step to take, with regard to that national advisory council which the Minister of Labour says he is going to set up, to provide that there should be four representatives from labour, four representatives from employers, two from agriculture, two from the women of Canada and two from the veterans. I think that fairly thoroughly covers all the different fields in this country. I hope there will be good results from that national advisory council. But the success or the failure of such a council depends entirely upon the efficiency of that organization, on the completeness of their tabulation and on the records being kept of that tabulation. But I do not think it is sufficient to have a national registration and merely leave it to manpower as the proposition under the Department of Labour would suggest. I think that it must be a thorough canvass not only of industry but of finance as well.

When we came to this session there was one subject with which all members of the House of Commons and the people of Canada were concerned. I believe it has been mentioned by every member who has taken part in this debate on the address in reply. I refer to the cost of living. Despite this fact however the government seems to be most reluctant, and seems to be doing a little more shadow-boxing in telling us how it is going to cope with the problem.

This afternoon I listened carefully to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) who, I thought, gave an excellent account of the manner in which moneys were going to be spent for national defence, and for the procurement of munitions and supply. But when it came to dealing with economic problems he did not seem to be so sure of himself. He spoke of the method that would be used to bring about controls, and indicated that the chief emphasis would be placed on monetary control. I cannot imagine what control in that field he had in mind. However, if he was thinking of the remedy suggested by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), that the only way controls can be handled is by taxation, then I think he will fall far short of completing the task. In my judgment prices cannot be controlled by taxation alone. That has been tried; it is not something new.

For instance, the other day the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) referred to tightening loans on houses. Well, the tightening of loans on houses is certainly not going to lower the cost of houses, nor will it lower the cost of materials. It may lessen the scarcity of supplies, but it certainly will never affect costs. The same is true of the government's plan for curtailing credit buying. It will stop buying just as effectively as the procedure outlined by the minister will stop the building of houses; but in neither case will it lower prices.

That is evident from the fact that, while we have had a tightening of credit buying for some months, during that time we have had additional increases in prices—to such an extent, in fact, that it has become extremely alarming. Yet the government seems to rely upon this old procedure that it has been using for months, knowing that it cannot be very effective.

I do not think there is anyone who believes in free enterprise who favours controls just for the sake of controls. Certainly the Social Credit party does not. But we also believe that when it is necessary to have controls initiated—and in my judgment it is necessary now—there is no use for the government attempting to attack a problem by simply talking about it, and continuing to talk about it.

As was said so well this afternoon by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), this idle talk by government officials about putting in price controls, or the probability of having price controls, is one of the greatest factors in driving prices upwards. That is exactly what is happening.

When price controls are put into effect I believe there should be a complete coverage through not only price controls but wage controls as well. There should be an immediate freezing of wages and prices, and then a proper adjustment made of both. I do not think any fair-minded person would say that we could have an over-all system of price controls without having some form of wage control. Indeed, I do not think labour itself would expect that. Anyone must realize wages form a substantial part of cost, and must therefore enter into prices. However, I shall deal with that later on.

May I add in all kindness to both the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees), who immediately preceded me, and who spoke about controls, that neither of them said how they would bring about those controls. They spoke only in generalities. One has to be somewhat more specific when applying the principle of price controls. The Social Credit party has always taken the position that when they make suggestions in this connection they have a plan to apply, and I shall outline it as we go along.

This afternoon the hon. member for Acadia told the house how controls could be instituted. It seems to me there is a great need for them. Every member in the house has received hundreds of cards from different organizations.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Johnston: I have a pile of them now which must be at least three and a half to four inches thick. They come from all parts of my constituency. I have gone over those cards carefully to ascertain the distribution and I can tell the house that they come from every part of my constituency. The names on the cards represent every industry and every form of occupation in my riding. They come from the railway workers in Calgary, from the oil workers in Calgary, from the ordinary workingmen in Calgary; they come from the farmers throughout my district and from the miners in the Drumheller area. Every part is represented in those cards.

So it cannot be said that it is just a concerted effort of labour, of agriculture or of any other group to send out cards. When we see a coverage as broad as that, we can say that the people generally are very much alarmed about soaring prices. They are. Members of the house are, too. We are all concerned because the prices are going up continuously.

I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of February 2 headed "Living Costs Zip Yet Higher Into Wild Blue Yonder," and stating:

> The official cost of living index rose 1·4 points in December to a new high of 172·5 from 171·1, the bureau of statistics reported today.
> All groups surveyed showed increases. Prices were higher for meat, butter, vegetables, fruits, men's wear, furniture, blankets, carpets, telephone rates—

They should have included freight rates, too.

—laundry, coal, health care, barbers' fees, gasoline, street car fares and newspapers.

It was the tenth jump in the prices barometer in the twelve months of 1950. The index is based on 1935-39 prices equalling 100.

Yes, it was the tenth rise in 1950. When we see prices soaring to that extent, and as rapidly as that, is it any wonder the people are so much concerned about it? Yet everyone seems to be cautious about what steps should be taken.

Let me read another extract along the same lines. It indicates the great concern of different classes of people in this country over this question. I intend to quote from the Ottawa Morning Citizen of February 7 an article entitled, "The Wives Speak", by Jack Scott. His first reference is to a barrister, although I did not think that barristers were financially embarrassed. He states:

A barrister writes that "to live with any degree of modest comfort costs us $350 a month and any saving is out of the question."

I put that on record to give some idea of just what is necessary for people to live in any form of modest comfort. As is indicated, you cannot do it for less than $300 or $350 a month. But that is not the class with which I am concerned most. One woman whose husband makes $50 a week writes:

We have a family of two boys and just manage to get by on his salary by living like hermits and cutting our food to a minimum. I dread to think of how people who make less than this are living.

Then another woman writes:

Have you ever tried to live on $77 a month, feed two children, clothe them, keep them warm and house them, and try to keep up appearances? It's only believing in God and the innermost spiritual belief that keeps me carrying on.

As the writer states, many of the letters are downright tragic. The article continues:

There is the woman whose husband is a bus driver. They have two children. Her husband's take-home pay is $72.50 every two weeks. They have found it impossible to make ends meet on this salary and are forced to sell the small home they built together.

"When I look at the house," she writes, "I think of all the nails I've hammered, all the rocks I wheeled for the drains, the roof we worked so hard on, the cold and wet, the laughter and tears that went into our home. We love it. It is our home. But it is for sale.

I'm tired of counting every penny, of telling the children, 'We can't afford it,' of not being able to go to a show or go bowling, of buying soup bones and not roast, of walking instead of riding the bus, of no holidays.

I am just so damned tired of existing and not living."

That is what that woman writes and I do not blame her for using the language she did. I have heard some members of parliament use stronger language than that in referring to the cost of living. I think they too are justified. If you want to really hear what people are saying just go out into some of the farming and mining districts. Then you will hear what is really being said about the high cost of living. It is time that this government did something definite and concrete in regard to the cost of living.

We heard the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) say that probably the best way to take care of this is by taxation. Let us consider some of the causes for the increase in the cost of living. One of the most important causes is government taxation. When the government decides to put on a direct tax everybody knows of it when they look at an article or buy one; they know that the tax is causing an increase in the cost. When the government increases income tax, that depreciates the purchasing power with a resultant decrease in the standard of living. There should be no reduction in the income tax exemption level. Two thousand a year or $166 a month is little enough for a married person to have in order to eke out a living with present day high costs.

Indirect taxes should be done away with because that is just a subtle means of reducing the people's standard of living without their being thoroughly conscious of it. It is idle for the government to talk about their going to do something when it becomes necessary, because that it just another direct way of increasing costs. There is no doubt that when a business concern hears about the possibility of controls they begin to raise their costs in anticipation.

The second reason for the increased cost of living is the large profits being made by industry. I do not refer to all industry, but the greater part comes within this category in the last few years. I should like to place on the record details of some of the profits that have been made. I am not one of those who do not believe in profits. I do not think anybody can carry on a business without profits. I do not think labour can exist without profits in the form of wages because that is what they are. Certainly no farmer could carry on without profits. But there is such a thing as excess profits, particularly in these trying times when living costs are so high. I should like to quote from the Labour Research of December, 1950, as follows:

Profits are at or near an all-time high. In 1949, total corporation profits after taxes (DBS) were $1,241,000,000. This is $18,000,000 below the 1948 figure, but there is every indication that 1950 will more than make up this difference. Financial statements of 38 companies with fiscal years ending August 31, 1950, and later, summarized in the Financial Post, show an increase of $7,314,409, or 12·7 per cent over 1949. Even if the percentage increase in 1950 total profits is only half as large, this would bring the 1950 total to about $1,320,000,000, or 75·8 per cent above 1946.

You do not mind people making a profit, but let us not kid ourselves about the huge profits that were made during the last war. We heard it said in this house in 1939 that there would be no blood money made in the war. What a lot of rubbish. You only have to look around the country to see the way industry has prospered, to know that there was a lot of money made during the war. In my opinion that was blood money. Something must be done or we are going to follow exactly the same track.

I spoke a moment ago about wages forming a part of the cost which enters into prices. If we are going to have price control it must be brought in immediately and there must be a levelling off of prices. Wages must form part of that levelling off process. First of all, there must be a parity set for prices and then wages must be set in fair relation to that. Whenever there is an adjustment in price, there must of necessity be an adjustment in wages.

One of the reasons the labour unions have been compelled to fight for higher wages is that they knew without question that prices were going to keep soaring and soaring and, if they did not fight for an increase in wages for their workers, those workers were going to be in a mighty tough position as a result of the high cost of living. So they have been compelled to take that action, but wages have never kept up with prices. The only way you can ever have a reconciliation between this ever-increasing cost and wages is by having a fair price set, and then having wages tied to that.

Then there is the low income group of people, even below the tax exemption of $2,000 a year. There are the old age pensioners. I agree one hundred per cent with what the hon. member for Fraser Valley said a while ago. He said that it was a disgrace and a shame to ask any of our people to live on the sums that they are receiving by way of pension. Imagine an old age pensioner having to rent a house and get a little meat at 98 cents or $1 a pound on an income of $40 a month. I do not see how those people exist. When it is necessary we can raise billions for other purposes, so surely we can raise a few paltry millions, if necessary, to help people in the low income group.

It is not only those living on pensions who are in the low income group. There are many people in the civil service who are in the low income group and need assistance. They have not sufficient to make ends meet during this period of high prices. They should also have some protection.

I remember speaking in the house on one occasion in 1939 after the war began and pleading with the government to decentralize industry. The danger of attack was great then. At that time our industry was centralized in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Much as it might be desirable to have a centralization of industry in those provinces, it is certainly not in the interests of the defence of this country, and particularly in the next war if there should be one. With the tremendous destructive power available to our enemies, it is not in the interests of the nation that our industries should be centralized in Ontario and Quebec. There is no reason in the world why we could not disperse our industries. Take the province of Alberta, and I am only using it as an illustration. We have tremendous quantities of oil and tremendous quantities of gas. We have an unlimited supply of coal and lots of raw materials. There is no reason why we should not be concentrating on the development of heavy industry, not light industry but heavy industry, in the province of Alberta. It would be much safer from attack.

I venture to say that our industrial potential could be almost ruined overnight as the situation stands today with our industries centralized in two provinces, and in just a portion of those two provinces, mostly in Toronto and Montreal. When you think of the tremendous destructive power of the atomic bomb, how long would it take to put us out of commission? How long would it take to ruin us as one of the great suppliers of munitions and supplies? Even in Russia they have recognized this problem and have gone to great pains to rectify it. They have not concentrated all their heavy industries in the large centres. They have dispersed them throughout the whole country, away out in the mountain areas for protection from their enemies. Yet we have not seen fit to do that. I have not time to expand that subject as much as I should like.

I want to say a word about highways. I think we should make every effort to develop a trans-Canada highway system, and that it should be done immediately. I understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce recognizes the importance of motor transportation in Canada. I am given to understand that when the motor transport delegation met the Minister of Trade and Commerce not long ago—I think it was last summer—he gave them assurances that priority would be given for motor transport replacements and the maintenance of such transport. I am sure he recognizes that in case of an attack on this country our railways could be put out of commission very readily, and it would be some days, weeks or maybe months before they could be repaired sufficiently to be of any use again. Motor transport could be operating again in much less time. If they were damaged the highways could be repaired in a matter of hours or days. I think every effort should be made to see that the trans-Canada highway system is completed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. J. M. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it gives me more than the usual pleasure tonight to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The mover happens to have the great good fortune to be a graduate of Queen's university, Kingston, of which I also am a graduate, and it gives me hope. When one looks at the serried ranks opposite and also to the right, one always has hope that here and there the light of reason may break through and effect a conversion. Of course when it is a fellow graduate of mine—although I am afraid he is not in the chamber at the moment—my hope is greater. With respect to the seconder of the address I should just like to say in my very indifferent French that I thought he did well. Il a gagné ses épaulettes!

Since we arrived here we have been discussing very largely dangers from outside, and indeed they are worth discussing. They are serious enough. I wish tonight to take some time, Mr. Speaker, in discussing the great danger at home, which we also have been discussing, the danger of inflation. Inflation has been described very simply, more simply than I thought an economist could ever describe anything. It is described very simply by an economist called Kemmerer. He says, "Inflation is too much money and deposit currency"—simply that.

I am not going to weary the house by going over ground that we on this side have gone over a good many times in the last five or six years, pointing out to the government how they have been constantly keeping the fires of inflation going. I am not going to weary the house by giving figures which have been given so often—that the means of payment have multiplied about four times while goods and services have multiplied about twice. I am not going to count up the many times we advised the government to free the dollar before they did it, and try to compare the many times we have told them to stop inflating it, because it might be that I might lose hope. If I did that I might find that we have said the one ten times and we have only said the other five times, and therefore we have got a long time to wait. At any rate it has been much discussed, and now for the first time I think people are beginning to consider that it may mean them. For the last few years our tendency has been to think of inflation as a funny thing that afflicts far off, funny people who do not know how to look after their own affairs. We have had a very simple phrase that has come to us from Britain, about "too much money pursuing too few goods."

I am not going to weary the house with a description of inflation elsewhere, because I do not think it is necessary. I only remind hon. members that after the first war there was inflation not only in Germany, where there was some suspicion they might be wanting to inflate in order to escape their debts, but in France, thrifty, hard-working, saving, hard-headed France. By 1926 they had suffered such a degree of inflation that their franc had gone down to about one-seventh of its value, and it was only by herculean courage and energy on the part of Poincare that it was rescued at that time. Since then, of course, it has gone infinitely lower. I was in Paris last summer and for a very modest breakfast at a curb restaurant one paid 200 francs, which was the equivalent of about 60 cents Canadian; and it was sad to reflect that when I was first in Paris, 200 francs would have been worth $40 Canadian.

Now just a word about the situation here. We are under pressure; we all know that. I am not going to worry you with figures, because we are all familiar with the situation. However, I do think we should remind ourselves that really the pressure is just getting well under way. I suppose that with the people who will be engaged on war orders, plus the people who will be required for the various armed services, plus the people who will be required to supply materials for the armed services, one would not be exaggerating if he said that within a year or eighteen months from now perhaps ten per cent of the present working force will have been diverted from the production of consumer goods. I am not going into the question of the tremendous capital investments facing us, to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) referred this afternoon, but I do want to comment on one point. I would be the last person to suggest that it would have been simple or easy to have prevented it, but it is bitter irony that in spite of the glowing figures the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave us this afternoon about our exports and imports, our investments and our production of all kinds of things—all of which was interesting and impressive—nevertheless to an extent we hate to admit we have here a kind of "poverty in the midst of plenty". We know that, and it is a very unpleasant thing to reflect upon.

I want to say just a word more about this easy money before I pass on. It has been said before, but frankly it does not seem to me that the lessons have all been learned yet. I have here an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of November 18 entitled "The Big Blunder". The blunder they describe is a blunder we on this side of the house have tried to describe. It is that in the year 1945 an excellent tool was devised and put forward in a white paper for dealing with a depression, and it was used for five years to deal with boom conditions. That is what the Winnipeg Free Press describes as the big blunder, and I shall read a paragraph from the editorial, which describes in some detail what has been happening. It goes on to say:

> Toward the end of the second world war the governments of all free countries expected peace to bring a major depression unless they could head it off.

I would be the last to blame them for that; I think what was done at that time was a very proper precaution; but I quote again:

> The great blunder was made in Washington, but the government of Canada cannot escape its share of responsibility. It, too, misjudged the economic current, was haunted by the fear of deflation and announced boldly in the famous white paper issued in the spring of 1945 that it would use every means of heading off another depression.

It did use those means year after year, I suggest, in spite of everything that could be said. That is what you might call the public inflation; but there was a little private inflation, too.

I want now to refer to the inflation that took place last autumn, connected with our freeing of the dollar, when we added another $200 million of naked inflation, that is to say money without anything to represent it. Again I shall quote the Free Press, feeling that it probably will be taken on the other side of the house as an authority of some value:

> The government was compelled to make new money to the amount of $200 million . . .

That was to satisfy the demand of the United States investors in Canadian dollars.

> This money was borrowed from the private banks on short term paper, which meant in fact that it was created by a fountain pen. At a time when the money supply was too big it was swelled by $200 million overnight.

That brings us to the session of last autumn. I would not want to blame people for not foreseeing things I did not foresee and probably no one else foresaw, but we did not need an awful lot of foresight last September to realize that we were getting in a tough spot. It seems to me it is fair enough to complain if there was any neglect of serious restrictive credit measures beginning last September. As I look back now, indeed when we considered matters last September, there did not seem to be any sense of tremendous urgency. The government did this and did that, but there was no great sense of urgency, and today we are reaping the result.

That brings me to the speech this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The part with which I wish to deal is the last part, in which he spoke of inflation, or prices, or price control. I suggest that a newspaper man might headline that speech something like this: "We have missed the bus. We are too late. Prices have got away from us. The inventories have been built up. We must just wait and see, and hope that the United States may help us out of our trouble." I shall try to satisfy you that this is a fair summary of some of the things, at any rate, the minister said this afternoon.

Let me review some of the chief points of his speech. He asked us to believe that fundamental governmental inflationary policies, as he called them, have been vigorously pursued. I wish I could think they had; that is what the minister said, and I shall quote his words:

> We must continue to pursue fundamental anti-inflationary policies as vigorously as ever.

Note the words "as ever." Let us have a look at the vigour. Can anyone tell me what has really been done since last September to halt inflation? I should like to know. First of all let us take bank loans. If it wishes, the government can have something to say about bank loans. We have a central bank; we have all kinds of powers and influences and suggestions that can be made, but let us look at the bank loans. They are pretty good evidence of what is going on in the way of credit expansion. We find that current loans were up something like $300 million in the last six months of the year; and I believe that is an understatement. I have not the December figure, and I think it is more than that. I do not blame the banks. They cannot conduct a gestapo. If they have a credit-worthy borrower the bank cannot say, "What are you going to use this for?". You cannot even blame the borrowers, because after all these people are in business. If everyone else is buying and putting up the price and they do not buy, they will go out of business quickly enough. The people to blame are the people at the source of credit, the people supposed to guide our credit policy, the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. But, as I have shown, last autumn the Bank of Canada and the government were busy injecting $200 million more credit of their own into the system, without trying to curb what was being done at that time by the banks.

As a matter of fact it seems to me that since last September everything has been going wrong. We have had any amount of talk, really too much talk, but precious little action. What was attempted last autumn? The only thing I can remember in the way of credit curbing was in connection with instalment buying. I have to admit that I have not been able to get the actual figures. But my impression is that they are not very large. In any event, I say without hesitation that so far as they have had an effect on the over-all credit situation, they have been as much good as a bucket of water on a three-alarm fire.

Now, the truth of the matter is that the government has been wholly inactive, but the purchasers of commodities have not been inactive. They have been on the job. The Minister of Trade and Commerce makes that very clear. I must say that he was very fair in a lot of the things he said this afternoon, and I thought he was surprisingly frank.

Mr. Gillis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Yes, certainly.

Mr. Gillis: I believe the hon. member made a statement a moment ago which I should like clarified. I thought he said that the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance controlled the issuance of currency and credit through the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I did not say that. I said that the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance could exercise over-all control over the credit of this country.

Mr. Abbott: How? I should like the hon. member's view as to how we could do it.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I am not going to get involved in that. We have been told many times, and we all have evidence of it, as to the influence of the Bank of Canada. No knowledgeable person in this house doubts that, least of all the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Abbott: I did not know whether you thought the Bank of Canada might approve the bank loans?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): No, and I stick to what I have said without hesitation. The Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance can exercise a very great influence over the banks if they wish, and they constantly do. Everyone in this house knows that has been done.

Mr. Gillis: I should like an answer to that question, if I might interrupt.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I have answered the question. Will you allow me to go on with my speech, please? I am not going to permit any more interruptions.

Mr. Gillis: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You can come and give me a private audience afterwards.

I should like to quote again from the minister's speech. Comparing the situation today with the price ceiling in 1941 the minister said:

> At this time many people expect the reimposition of the same kind of controls and are governing themselves accordingly.

The minister did not leave us in any doubt as to what he meant by "governing themselves accordingly", because he added that they were "all set." I believe that phrase is unfortunate. I do not believe for a moment the minister intended to create the impression that these people were trying to profiteer from the rest of the community. I still think that is the impression which one was inclined to get. Furthermore the minister did talk throughout his speech more or less as if he were talking about the "economic man", and not about a lot of men and women of flesh and blood who are today suffering from the evils of high prices.

I want to go on to say that my guess is that when the Korean situation quieted down in September, October and November, the government thought they were pretty well out of the woods and took a bit of an "easy". Indeed it seems to me that they have rested on their oars.

I believe that the minister's next comment will give very cold comfort to those who are in trouble. He said:

> The upward pressure on prices both in Canada and abroad was much less severe in 1941 than it is now.

In other words, conditions are worse, so we do nothing. It seems to me that is implied in that statement. There is the implication too that, not only is the pressure high now, but it is certainly going to be higher.

Then the minister did give us one bit of comfort which I hope may prove to be substantial. He suggested that a good deal of the demand was what he called anticipatory, and I can hope and believe that may be true and that it may have its effect later.

The next thing the minister says is:

> I am not ruling out the possibility that sweeping price control measures will be needed, should the developing situation make action necessary, but it may well be that these measures should be different in form from those that were applied during the last war. Alternative measures are now under active study by the government.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine, and I do not believe anyone else can imagine, anything that is more likely to fan the flames than that statement by the minister, because it seems to me that the very motives which have been driving people to anticipate their requirements, to buy in a big way, will be stimulated further by what the minister said. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that the minister has almost opened the door and that, to use his own words, presumably the people will govern themselves accordingly.

The minister said one other thing to which I want to refer. He spoke about the United States and said:

We earnestly hope our American neighbours will succeed in attaining a reasonable measure of stability . . .

At a later stage he said:

I do not suggest for a moment that we can relax and let the United States solve our economic problems for us.

That, of course, I take for granted.

Then, as I sum up what the minister said this afternoon, it seems to me I can imagine the ordinary citizen saying that the speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon is proof that this thing is going to continue, and indeed is going to get worse. It seemed to me that was the implication in it, unless he has some secret knowledge that none of the rest of us have, and which he does not feel he can divulge.

How long is the great mass of citizens going to stand by and be content with this? The ordinary citizen is not fully informed.

I have before me a speech delivered by Donald Gordon from which I should like to read one sentence. He said:

During the last war this country resorted to widespread controls over prices, wages and physical production and distribution, such as rationing and allocation of available supplies, et cetera. But the relative success of these measures in the midst of a total war for survival should not be taken as proof that the same results could be achieved in the quite different environment of today.

Even if the ordinary citizen reads that address of Mr. Gordon's and feels that since Mr. Gordon knows so much about this subject it is rather dubious that the same measures could be used again, and even if the citizens knew the caustic comment of Mr. Kenneth Taylor, for whom we all have the greatest respect, that price control was like "trying to cure a fever by fixing the thermometer", nevertheless they would find later in Mr. Gordon's speech the following:

Runaway inflation is so destructive that any method of stopping it, no matter how difficult and clumsy it may be, is surely the lesser evil.

I am afraid the ordinary citizen would be inclined to think that, from his point of view, inflation looks mighty like a runaway inflation. I am not saying it is runaway inflation, because I believe the good sense of Canadians, if properly led, would stop it. Still, I would not be surprised if a good many people would try to argue that it is. The minister himself, of course, speaks of the upward pressure of prices being less severe in 1941 than it is now. In other words, he leaves the impression of a great pressure. He leaves the impression of action still delayed, and to me it seems he gave no reason to suppose, except perhaps the one I mentioned of the excessive anticipated demand, that there would be a turning back.

One other remark the minister made was that alternative measures are now under study by the government. He refers further to a more comprehensive price control bill. Now, if this continues much longer it seems to me we will just be wasting our breath in asking the people to believe that the cure is more production and less spending, though I firmly believe in both. There is not much use in telling people who have not enough money to spend now that they must do less spending.

I also do not believe that controls stimulate production, except in very special and temporary circumstances. I am not telling the government what they shall do. But it seems to me that up to the present time, particularly since last September, they have certainly missed the bus and failed in what should have been done. The minister talks as if there was time to wait while fiscal control measures and, I presume, taxation policies and credit control have their effect. I wish that I could feel he is right, but his speech has definitely increased my concern. What I fear is that they have waited too long; and in the light of the minister's speech, I think every day makes it more difficult.

I believe in credit and fiscal remedies. I believe they are better because they are more pervasive, more economical, more democratic and because they do not need a whole army of controls. But unless some fortunate turn of events comes along, I feel that the demand for some other kind of measures will grow and become so strong that it cannot be resisted. Again I say that I am not telling the government what to do. I am pointing out that what they have done has been destructive and not constructive. I hope that other remedies can be found, as the minister implied. But meanwhile I reiterate that at the moment I think the ordinary citizen will feel that he has asked for bread and has been given a stone.

Mr. Howe: May I ask my hon. friend one question? If he places such a high value on controls, why did he spend the years 1946, 1947 and 1948 demanding that they be done away with?

Mr. Knowles: Why did the government accede to that demand?

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): If the minister had done me the honour of listening to me a little more carefully, he would have known that I have not demanded controls. I have said that I am afraid there will be an overwhelming pressure for them, unless other remedies, which the minister talked about and which I said in my closing words I hoped were still an alternative, could be made effective much more quickly. I made that clear; as least I tried to do so.

Mr. Howe: But you did not believe in controls at all.

Mr. Abbott: I could not tell what the hon. member was asking for.

Mr. Charles Cannon (Iles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my congratulations to the well-deserved compliments that have already been paid to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I listened with interest to their remarks and I agree with those who have already said that they both are valuable additions to this house.

During this debate, which has dealt at length with foreign affairs, I have not heard any member of this house mention the magnificent effort in Korea of our great neighbour and ally, the United States of America. But I have read the remarks of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) on the subject of what he calls American imperialism. I wish to pay tribute to our gallant American ally who, singlehanded at first, went to the help of the republic of Korea. This admirable action may be compared to that of England and France going to assist Belgium in the first world war or to assist Poland in the second; but it is not the same kind of gesture from a historical point of view. It is the first time in the history of the world that a great nation has gone to war to implement its obligations under a collective international covenant to outlaw and punish aggression wherever it may take place in the world. I salute this great nation that, from idealistic and altruistic motives, has sent her sons to fight a cruel and difficult war; and I decry and deplore the accusations that have been made in this house that the United States' intervention in Korea is based on imperialism and selfish motives.

The hon. member for Beauce made his remarks in French the other day; and as I wish to answer them, I am going to read from the English translation of his remarks which appears in Hansard of February 6. This is what he said:

> The monstrous war budget of $87 billion introduced by the American government and Canada's defence plan calling for an expenditure of $5 billion lead us strongly to believe that a general war is in the offing. The fabulous expenditures, I will be told, are designed to prevent war. As was done last September, the old saying si vis pacem, para bellum, if you want peace, prepare for war, will be invoked. But history proves this saying to be false; conquerors have always used it as a sham to hide their infamous designs for conquest. History is repeating itself once more.

I may say that evidently the hon. member for Beauce had not learned anything from the experience of the free and democratic nations at the beginning of the second world war when they were caught unarmed and when it took them two to three years to get together the armaments needed to wage a victorious war. I am sure that hon. members of the house will agree with me when I say that the old saying is still true and that the government of our country is right in saying that if we wish to avoid war, we have to arm. The hon. member for Beauce goes on to say:

> Besides, we all know that this saying was coined by these same people, these same imperialists who preached a preventive war of conquest with these words: delenda est Carthago, Carthage must be destroyed.
> The Roman empire then wanted, in the name of peace, to cross the Mediterranean and destroy the very foundations of the African empire. Today the American empire is picking up the torch from the failing hands of the British empire and wants to cross not only the Mediterranean but the seven seas and use guns, tanks and flame throwers to make the Asiatic people benefit from the blessings of peace. And they want to drag Canada into the venture: We are already taking part in the undertaking as members of the Atlantic pact organization that has been set up.

To put it mildly, that is not according to the facts. To say that the United States of America has gone into this war from imperialistic motives or motives of conquest is to make a remark so far from the truth that I feel it should not be allowed to go unchallenged in this house. In the interests of the friendship and understanding that have always existed between our two great countries, I feel that we in this house should, through my humble voice, express our disagreement with these remarks and our appreciation of the magnificent effort of our American allies in Korea. Again, to put it mildly, Mr. Speaker, these remarks to which I have referred are misleading.

It is the duty of the representatives of the people in this house not only to represent the people but to give leadership. In order to give leadership you have to tell the people the truth. With all due respect, I say to the hon. member for Beauce that in talking in the way he has, accusing the Americans of being imperialistic conquerors, he is using the communist line from Moscow. The best answer to the contention that the United States of America had those intentions is that they withdrew the last of their occupation troops from Korea just a few months before the attack on South Korea took place. If they had had any imperialistic or conquering designs on Korea, they would certainly not have withdrawn their troops just at the time they did.

Canada is taking its part in this action and we have been warned in the speech from the throne that we shall be asked to authorize Canadian participation in the European force to be organized under the north Atlantic pact. When I had the honour of proposing the address in reply to the speech from the throne at the last session of parliament I said, as reported at page 85 of Hansard of August 31, 1950:

> This is also the first time that Canada has been called upon to honour its signature to an agreement to give armed aid to another nation. Are we going to honour our signature? I say, yes. We are not going to fail this first test; and I am sure this house will also answer the question with a resounding yes, authorizing the government to send the special force to Korea or use it to fulfil any of our other obligations under the United Nations charter or the North Atlantic treaty.

The house at the last session gave to the government authorization to send fighting men to Korea, and I am sure that at this session it will authorize the sending to Europe of sailors, soldiers and airmen to fulfil our treaty obligations and to forestall war—because that is what we are doing. We are arming to forestall war and to preserve the peace.

I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon his courageous and straightforward statement on national selective service. As reported at page 28 of Hansard, he said:

> So far there has been brought to my attention nothing that would indicate that the institution of national selective service at this time would be beneficial. On the contrary, the information we have obtained is that it would hamper what is being done at this moment. Now, that does not mean that the situation cannot change, and it does not mean that if and when it does change there will not be changes in the manner in which our resources will be contributed to this pool of international strength.

[Mr. Cannon.]

I am of the opinion that universal conscription for military service would not be a good thing for this country. It it were applied it would not leave us enough men to reap full benefits from our agriculture and our industry upon which our friends and allies depend, as well as ourselves. But at the same time I deprecate the attitude of the hon. members for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) and Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) who said that they are against the sending of Canadian troops to Europe or Asia. It is now unanimously recognized that the first line of defence is in Europe. The United States themselves have promised to send several divisions over there, notwithstanding their commitments in Korea. I think that even the hon. member for Beauce will not accuse the United States of sending those divisions there to conquer Europe, as he has accused them of sending troops to Korea to conquer that country.

If the house and government were to listen to the hon. members who wish us to defend ourselves only at home, and not to arm the country as we wish to do, we would probably see this chain of events develop. If an enemy came to Canada, to my constituency of Magdalen Islands, or Halifax or Vancouver, these people would say, "It is none of our business; let us wait for them here. They are too far away. Let us wait until they come closer to home". If they came to Toronto it would be the same thing—they would wait until the enemy got to Quebec. And even when it got to Quebec city, if the enemy were in Lower Town and these people were in Upper Town, they would say, "Let us wait until it comes to Upper Town". This is a reductio ad absurdum of the theory of waiting for the enemy to attack us at home.

The North Atlantic treaty and our obligations under it are to defend us against communism. Let us not forget that. What are we doing to defend ourselves against communism at home? Although I have not yet expressed my views on that subject in the house, I am of the opinion that we have not done enough, so far. I welcome the reference in the speech from the throne to Canadian citizens who are not loyal to Canada. The reference is as follows:

> Appropriate amendments to the Canadian Citizenship Act will be introduced to prevent the retention of Canadian citizenship by persons who have renounced their allegiance or shown by their conduct that they are not loyal to Canada.

I believe that the enemy in our midst is even more dangerous than the enemy beyond our frontiers. I think that methods should be taken to suppress the communist party and to ferret out and punish those members of it who are dedicated to the forcible overthrow of the government and to deprive us of our liberties and of our way of life.

Patrick Henry once said these immortal words: "Give me liberty or give me death". It is heroic to offer one's life to regain liberty once one has lost it, but it is more practical to take measures to protect it while we still have it. Those measures that should be taken are measures to outlaw and to suppress the communist party and communists in Canada. These measures, I say, are as important as those being taken to prepare our military defences.

The United States were founded on and dedicated to the principle of human and individual liberty; but they have taken steps against the communist party which we have not taken yet. With great respect for those who differ from me, I have never understood those who say that the communist party must not be outlawed because it would be driven underground. We can be sure that its plotting and its plans against our government and our way of life, and its nefarious deeds, are done underground anyway. They are not carried out in the open. I believe we should take steps to defend ourselves from this enemy who is in a position to gnaw at the very vitals of our country.

The speech from the throne also says:

> Proposals were laid before the provincial governments for new tax agreements, and for a contributory old age pensions program along the lines recommended by the joint committee at the last regular session.
> The provincial governments are at present giving consideration to these proposals and to proposals for constitutional amendments which may require to be submitted to you before the close of the present session.

As a member of the committee that studied old age pensions last year, I am very glad the government has made reference to them in the speech from the throne, and has indicated that steps are going to be taken to implement what was done. One opposition member has said that the government is delaying. I say it is far from delaying. It is taking the steps necessary to pass the required legislation at this session of parliament, if the provinces do their share in facilitating the necessary constitutional amendment.

I was very pleased to see in the newspapers today that the province of Quebec has declared that it is willing to do what is required to allow us to have old age pensions at sixty-five, and to implement the recommendations of the old age security committee. I think also we should underline the fact that the government is showing very great courage in bringing in that legislation, notwithstanding the enormous expenditures placed on our shoulders because of the war effort to which we are committed in view of present international circumstances.

May I add my voice once again to that of other hon. members who have asked for a pension for invalids who are unable to provide for themselves. They should be helped. They have as much right to our sympathy and our help as have those who are blind.

These are the few remarks I wished to make in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne. In terminating my remarks I wish to assure our great Prime Minister of the continued admiration and loyalty of the electors of the Magdalen Islands, and of their humble representative in the house.

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable reluctance that I, as a backbencher, have finally decided to take part in the debate. However, as the representative of the constituency of Springfield, which holds the key to all the industrial activity of Manitoba, and which supplies all the power to all of Manitoba, and as the member who in 1949 was re-elected with the greatest majority ever recorded in that constituency, I think it is my duty to place before the House of Commons the views of my constituents.

May I offer my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in reply. I also take great pleasure in the government's decision to appoint the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham) to the position of Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I am sure that his appointment will be most helpful to the government.

I find it gratifying, also, to note that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). I say this, not because his riding is next to mine but because his record in the House of Commons as a member has been one of great assistance. He served in another capacity in the second world war, and his record is unsurpassed. I am sure his added ability will be of great help to the government in these trying and troubled times.

I am sure it will also be proper to say that the appointment of the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Langlois) as parliamentary assistant to the Postmaster General (Mr. Rinfret) will be appreciated by the people of Canada as a whole, and particularly by the constituents of Gaspe. This hon. gentleman served a long and difficult period with the navy during the last war and suffered many more hardships than most people realize.

Then I must not forget the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), who has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). He has shown a keen interest in former debates on foreign affairs and will prove of great value to our already famous minister.

It was also with great pleasure that I heard that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) had been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). Then we have our own prairie member, the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker), who has been appointed parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). I am sure that he will be of great help to the minister. The hon. member for Regina City is a "natural", as he served overseas as a medical doctor in both wars and has the record of having the personal ability to get things done.

I turn now to another field, something that is of great concern to us all, the question of national defence and all its ramifications. It is true that the amount of money required for our national defence forces and other Canadian commitments is of great importance, but it will be accepted by the Canadian people as a whole. At this point we must never forget nor neglect the magnificent and determined effort put forth by our navy in world war II. If it had not been for the determination of the navy to protect the soldiers and supplies which were crossing the many seas, the results might have proved to be different. I say to those inside the house and out that it would be well to review the official résumé of the battles of world war II in a publication entitled "The Far Distant Ships" by Schull. I know it will have the effect of bringing home the importance of the part played by the navy in the last war.

It is true also that Canadian airmen are known the world over as being super in courage and determination and have always had the reputation of having done their job well. I must say also that Canadian soldiers were always faithful and courageous in whatever part they played and are known the world over as real heroes.

I have said that all three services were important in the last war and each did a magnificent job, but there was also another group of men and women at home who did a large part in keeping the railroads and war plants going. Families worked long and tedious hours in order to keep the men at the front.

There are not many in this house who realize that a certain group of people called farmers sometimes find themselves to be not nearly sufficiently represented in the House of Commons. The number of farmer members is few in comparison to the other professions in Canada that are represented. When discussions on agriculture take place in the house few of the city members are interested enough to stay in their seats and listen to the debates and therefore they are at a loss to understand the problems faced by the farmer. I hope that in future more interest will be shown.

I come now to something that will have to be decided in the very near future, that is, the final payment on the four-year wheat agreement with Great Britain. It is the all-important "have regard" clause, a clause which was inserted in the contract at the request of the British government, which we are all concerned about, the farmers in the west in particular. The government in Britain never thought for a moment at that time that wheat would be near the price it is today five years after the war. The "have regard" clause would have given them the great advantage of cheaper wheat had world prices dropped. But their calculations were not carried out and there cannot be too much emphasis on the part of this government that the government of Great Britain carry out the "have regard" clause.

Great Britain has obtained from Canada wheat and bread supplies over a period of five years. Many million bushels of wheat were purchased at prices considerably lower than average world prices. I repeat that the government of Canada must impress on the government of Britain that the "have regard" clause must be carried out. The western farmers and wheat growers cannot and will not be satisfied until a final payment of at least 15 cents per bushel over the five-year period is paid. This is a must; it must be forthcoming if we are to do justice to the wheat growers of western Canada.

I come now to another subject and in this I am repeating the plea I made in the last session of parliament, that something be done for the crippled people of Canada. Many of these citizens are far more deserving of a pension or federal help than many of those already receiving a pension. As reeve of a municipality I am in position to understand the heavy drain on municipal funds or taxes made necessary by caring for this class of citizen. It is beyond the capacity of the municipality to stand this strain. In 1950 it cost the municipality which I represent almost $5,000, which came wholly out of the pockets of the taxpayers, for this purpose.

Therefore, I strongly recommend that consideration be given by the federal government to granting a pension at an early date to these people. There are pensions for the blind, there are pensions for the aged; why not pensions for the crippled who are unable to do anything for themselves?

There has been a great cry from our C.C.F. friends across the house who have advocated a reduction in the cost of living. In my opinion, the C.C.F. cater to one class only, the industrial workers. Mention has been made in the newspapers about the 800,000 cards that have been received by hon. members. There are 47,000 people in my riding and I received 66 cards. Those cards have been coming from the industrial and railroad workers. I have not received one from a farmer in my riding.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is always clamouring for higher wages, more pensions and shorter hours. If the government were to carry out his suggestions, there would be few people in Canada working at all. This kind of propaganda sounds good to many of the voters, but if put into practice would have a demoralizing effect on the country as a whole.

Why are prices rising? Why are young people leaving the farms? There is only one answer—they are finding employment in industrial plants where there are shorter hours, better living conditions and higher wages. If this continues across the length and breadth of Canada the spiral of prices will continue higher. Farm products will be in increasingly scarce supply with a continued shortage of farm labour. Something must be done to encourage young people to stay on the farm. Big business in this country should take note of this fact and their profits should compare favourably with the incomes of the producer and consumer.

(Translation):

Mr. Arthur Massé (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne but, in view of its importance, I cannot shirk the obligation of freely expressing my opinion and that of my constituents.

In view of the tension in world affairs, I will make so bold as to draw certain comparisons between the present and the past.

May I be permitted to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Their constituents must surely be happy to have chosen such representatives.

On looking at the international situation, the attitude of certain totalitarian countries comes not as a surprise but as a disappointment. On the other hand, the study of world history brings the realization that, at all times and in all eras, there have been conquerors who thought they could rule the world. I have in mind Victor Hugo's celebrated lines on Napoleon II, written when the latter thought himself to be master of the world's destiny.

What did all these conquerors gain from their conquests? A passing glory. And, more recently, what has followed in the wake of two world wars? Instead of looked-for happiness and prosperity, naught but misery, destruction, even the complete wiping out of certain countries. Even in this case, there is nothing new. After other devastating wars what became of once famous cities such as Babylon?

I must congratulate the government of my country for its sane attitude in seeking peaceful settlement of the conflict now plaguing the world. To my mind there are no better ways of relieving such tense situations than conciliation or negotiation.

However, without adequate defence preparations, it would be a mistake to leave the door open to negotiations. A strong defence acts as a check on those who crave for domination. The experience of the last war should make every Canadian realize that we should not wait till the last moment to make defence preparations.

I heartily endorse the stand taken by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) in his statement in this house on the form of our war contribution. The immediate organization of our territorial defence and our civil defence seems to me very wise. Civil defence deserves special attention for, with modern transportation facilities, distance is no longer a consideration.

It is high time we prepared our civilian population to face any possible danger that may arise through no fault of our own but which we must expect all the same.

Our government's wish to share adequately in the Colombo plan pleases me very much, because if we give sympathy and hope to those distressed populations, communism will not appeal to them.

I am not one of those who think that the whole of Asia puts unlimited trust in the communist regime. I prefer to believe that the people of Asia accept that way of life in the hope that it will lead them to greater happiness than they have had before. They look to it as a last hope which, until now, has been denied to them under their own governments.

In Canada the government has substantially contributed to the people's welfare by legislation providing for such benefits as family allowances and old age pensions. I trust that the government will also take the appropriate steps to give adequate aid to the needy.

Because of those welfare measures, the people of Canada are more confident. These measures are in keeping with the traditions of my district because my people who were left to themselves on the shores of the St. Lawrence river two centuries ago have been the custodians of our principles and our tradition of mutual aid and fellowship since the beginning of the colony.

As the representative of an agricultural and lumbering district located on the shores of the St. Lawrence and extending to the United States frontier, it is my duty to request the government to maintain the help it has so far given our farmers, particularly through the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

Agriculture is the very basis of our production; to realize this, one has but to read "Canada 1950," at page 109. Consequently, it is necessary that our farmers get all the help and assistance they are entitled to. I am convinced that the more we increase production the sooner agricultural prices will find their normal level while allowing the farmer to draw a reasonable income.

I wish to congratulate also the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for the task he has undertaken of finding markets for our farm produce. Thus, we may be able to keep on the land our young people who may be tempted to quit it temporarily for prospects of easier income.

It is also my duty to thank and congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) for the building of a soil research laboratory at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, that cultural centre in Kamouraska county. The laboratory will supplement the existing facilities at that experimental farm. This gesture shows how much the government has the interests of the farming people at heart. The future of the farming class is dependent upon research and it is the duty of the state to provide the means of undertaking the necessary research work; it is a well-known fact that the progress of agriculture has too often been left to the work of nature alone.

I stated a moment ago that Kamouraska was both a farming and a lumbering district. A glance at the statistics concerning my constituency reveals that 76 per cent of the area is covered with forests. Since the production of pulpwood in the province of Quebec increased from 2,119,183 tons in 1939 to 3,902,072 tons in 1948, according to "Canada 1950," page 142, it is high time to inform farmers or owners of forest land that they should adopt a suitable forestry program in order to increase the value of their property and draw a steady income.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I express the wish that in this holy year the peoples of the world will trust in God, the true King of the universe, to spare us, who still have fresh in our minds a war which is barely over, the horrors of a new conflict that might be more destructive than the two previous ones.

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the custom which exists in the house, may I first congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the ease and clarity with which they dealt with their subject matter.

I also wish to congratulate the newly appointed parliamentary assistants. I am delighted that their talent has been recognized and that they now have the opportunity to turn it to account.

I had not intended to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne and I have no wish to spin out the discussion any longer than necessary but, because of the principle that is at stake, it is my duty to protest against the decision taken this afternoon by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who has decided to deport Count Jacques de Bernonville to France.

In defiance of every custom and of the right of sanctuary recognized for centuries, we have just turned over to his communist enemies a man who has been accused of certain crimes, none of which have ever been proved, and who, in my opinion, is guilty only of being a Frenchman and a practising Roman Catholic.

There are other Frenchmen who sought asylum in this country at the same time as Count Jacques de Bernonville. And yet they have never been the subject of discussion. We hear about other immigrants to whom permission has been granted to remain in Canada even though they entered the country under false passports. Why make it a crime for de Bernonville to have sought refuge in Quebec when not a single voice has been heard in that province to demand his deportation? Could it be that Quebec is not allowed the right to choose the type of immigrants she wants? We, in Quebec, know that the crimes of which Jacques de Bernonville stands charged are pure fabrications, the work of communists or fellow-travellers who have sworn to get him.

The communists know that the Catholic church is their implacable enemy and the violent struggle they are waging against the church in Hungary and Czechoslovakia is evidence enough.

We know that Count de Bernonville was convicted in absentia by a communist government in Toulouse, France, but we also know who de Bernonville is.

At the age of twenty he was created a knight of the Legion of Honour in recognition of his gallantry in the field. At twenty-three he became an officer of the Legion of Honour. He is the holder of several citations and was awarded the Croix de Guerre in 1918. He has been wounded several times; the scars of thirty wounds are proof of that. He was mentioned in dispatches and was awarded the Croix de Guerre in 1940. That citation was published in the French Journal officiel.

Those are the crimes on which the communist element of this country has based itself to force from the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a decision he has been refusing for two years.

While testifying in his own defence before the courts in Montreal, in 1948, Count Jacques de Bernonville made a declaration under oath. It has never been denied and no one has been able to contradict that statement.

Far from having caused Canadians to be massacred, as is stated in the indictment proferred against him, he was, on the contrary, instrumental in helping Canadian prisoners of war to escape. Such was the evidence given by Captain Masson during the hearing of the Jacques de Bernonville case in Montreal. And, on February 24, 1949, Mr. Frédéric Dorion informed the house of this statement.

In view of the political persecution to which Jacques de Bernonville was subjected, he had the right to seek and secure asylum in another country. This asylum he sought in French Canada. Will Canada refuse to harbour this Frenchman who pays us the tribute of believing in Canadian liberty?

The laws of hospitality, the requirements of humanitarianism and those feelings which should come naturally to hearts still moved by appeals to compassion and honour, demand that political refugees should not be extradited. Modern Canada, more backward than eighteenth-century England, has just given in to bloodthirsty wolves who are after the head of this man whose only fault was to believe in a hospitality he is so shamefully refused.

History will pass a severe judgment upon those who were accessories to this deed. I dare hope that no Canadian will ever undergo such heart-rending tribulations as those which my country has deliberately inflicted upon a hero who could have expected more kindness from French Canada.

(Text):

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, it is a great honour for me to say a few words in this debate this evening. First, I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In particular, I should like to say a few words about the mover. He is a graduate of Queen's university. I am pleased to see him here, and I hope that he will attain the height and the prestige in this house enjoyed by a former graduate of Queen's, the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). It was an honour for me to accompany the member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) this fall to a special convocation at Queen's, and there to see an honorary degree conferred upon the Minister of National Revenue. I am sure that the university conferred this degree not only in recognition of his work as a minister in this house, but in recognition of his manner of assistance to others, of his services as a medical doctor in his community, and as a statesman of renown.

Tonight I wish to say a few words on a matter of less importance than the national emergency, but of importance to the preservation of the rights and independence of our citizens. I am pleased to see mention made in the speech from the throne of consideration of a measure respecting the abolition of the requirement of a fiat in cases of petition of right. I am sure that many of the members of the legal profession in Canada believe the time is long overdue for a complete re-examination of the crown's position in litigation, and also the special procedural immunities of the crown which should be regulated, cut down and possibly abolished.

It is my personal feeling, and I am sure it is the feeling in the constituency of Kingston City, that there is an extremely urgent need for the St. Lawrence seaway and power project in relation to the security and development of this continent. It is apparent that any step which this house can take whereby the government can promptly and effectively co-operate with the United States in initiating this construction would be welcome.

In the many speeches in this house members have dealt with the armed forces in terms of dollars and numbers, and have made other references to the armed forces of Canada. For a few moments I should like to deal briefly with the reserve forces from my own practical, personal knowledge both of the district which I represent, and from the point of view of the three services in that area. In my reference to these forces I shall not deal with numbers and dollars, but I shall deal with them in such a way that we can see what is actually being done. It is my belief that the reserve forces are playing an important role, and have developed to the point where they could become a trained nucleus of active forces if called upon. Their commanders, officers, N.C.O.'s and men are exceedingly well trained. For the most part, they are men who have won their spurs in Dieppe, Italy, and the attack on D-day. They are young men still, and will be able to pass on the lessons of their experience to the younger men, N.C.O.'s and recruits. I believe that this is being done.

Speaking of the reserve army training at Petawawa this past summer under General Vokes, it was remarkable to see how the commanders, officers, and N.C.O.'s fitted into their roles as in real battle. At this particular period of training new equipment and improved equipment was available for inspection and use. I might say that this was particularly true with respect to the Royal Canadian Corps of Signals. This unit, as you know, has it headquarters at Vimy barracks outside of Kingston. This summer the unit had a divisional signals set-up and was demonstrating the equipment and lessons which had been learned on Exercise Sweetbriar. At first we may not think it important, but they went so far as to demonstrate how they properly winterproofed their vehicles, and their special type of stove in the wireless van so that the operators could be warm and able to function efficiently. These displays and schemes, I suggest, cannot be disregarded. Training of this nature provides an opportunity for the active force to bring the reserve force up to date.

I am pleased that in Kingston and district there is a great feeling of comradeship amongst the R.C.A.F. veterans in their forming of the No. 416 wing, R.C.A.F. association. There are virtually hundreds of members, and they are associating themselves with the local air force cadet corps, No. 58 squadron. It is my belief, in common with the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall), that the greatest attention should be paid to the training of boys of high school age. They will be the pilots, gunners and navigators of tomorrow.

Turning to another branch of the service, may I say that the other night it was my privilege to pay a casual visit to H.M.C.S. Cataraqui, the reserve naval training ship at Kingston. It is under the able command of Commander Coleman. There I observed the training of sixty to seventy officers and cadets from Queen's university. This particular night was one of the nights of the week set aside for the university students, while the local corps is trained on the remaining nights. These officers and cadets were being directed in naval terms on the deck by officers who had gained their experience from active duty or in summer cruises, naval war games and manoeuvres. I might say that the instructors varied from highly technical instructors to those whom we called "frogmen". At one time the men were receiving instruction in close-armed combat, and at another they were receiving instruction in the operation of radar. I believe it is important for us to realize what these reserve units are doing today, and how fit these men will be if they are called upon to take their places in active duty. These officers and men would be available to assist in manning Canada's one hundred new naval vessels which were mentioned on Monday by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). After observing them train and knowing that they are aggressive and ambitious, I am sure that they will give a good account of themselves. I understand that similar training is universally available to naval reserve units. Those responsible for training of this nature are to be complimented. I am sure it is not a waste of the taxpayers' money.

I should like to discuss briefly our present war effort which results from world conditions. We have listened to the statement by the Minister of National Defence. We have all concerned ourselves with and have read a great deal about the modern machines of war. I am sure that it must strike us that the inventive power of the scientists in the world today is the greatest in history. If we are to win this war against communism, I am sure that one of our most important aids will be the use of these modern machines of war. It must seem to the people that the government was wise in not wasting the taxpayers' money on equipment which would now be obsolete, and which would not be in accord with that of our neighbour to the south. Now, through government planning and the purchase of modern equipment, we will avoid waste, and be one more spoke in the wheel in assuring the North Atlantic charter nations of victory with the least possible loss of life in the event of total war, and at the same time provide a great threat of strength to an aggressor. I am quite sure that those who have read the papers of recent date and have seen the pictures of the explosion of the new bombs will agree that they will be a deterrent factor to any aggressor.

As the subject of the exchange system of the training of officers has been mentioned in this house, I might say that it has been my privilege in my constituency in the outskirts of which is located the Royal Military College, as well as the defence college, the staff college, the signal corps, the R.C.E.M.E. corps and other units, to observe officers from all nations on friendly terms with us, who come to those schools and associate with our Canadian officers. By that association I am sure there is not only the exchange of good will and friendship but the fostering of better relations between nations in that we are bringing together our armies of the North Atlantic charter nations and moulding them into one, with the same idea. On the streets of our city you will see officers with uniforms quite different from our own going about observing our Canadian way of life and at the same time taking their training with our officers in Canada. There are some from India, some from France and others from Italy. They have done the clubs and citizens of Kingston the honour of appearing before them and giving speeches about their homelands. Through the facilities provided by the Department of National Defence in this country and the exchange system as outlined by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), I feel that we now have a great and strong link with other nations, and I am sure that our nation is the better for it.

In conclusion, may I say it is my belief that we are wise in following a plan such as that outlined by the government, of not losing a war before we have a battle.

On motion of Mrs. Fairclough the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 9, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

HONG KONG

POSITION OF CANADIAN CITIZENS—IMMIGRATION STAFF

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) inquired about the staff of the immigration office at Hong Kong. Up until September of 1949 we had only one officer there. We added one in that month. We added two in 1950. We added four clerks in 1950. Therefore we think the facilities are now reasonably adequate. The number of immigration visas granted in 1949 was 986, and we granted 2,068 during 1950.

I gathered from the tenor of the hon. member's preceding questions that he was more concerned about Canadians than immigrants. I want to assure him that the immigration staff is there for the assistance of Canadians as well, and we do assist in identifying them and getting their passage if they seek to come home.

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Has the medical staff, for the purpose of checking medical fitness, been increased? That was the cause of the delay before.

Mr. Harris (Grey-Bruce): The medical staff is partly our own, but consists largely of roster doctors outside the offices, whom we employ.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

QUESTION AS TO RECONSIDERATION OF CHANGES IN LOAN PROVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Graydon (Peel): I should like to have addressed my question to the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), but he was unable to be here, and is not here today. I do not want to let the matter stand any longer; therefore I address the question to the Prime Minister for his consideration and that of the Minister of Resources and Development when he returns.

In view of the objections that have been raised in some quarters to the drastic policy announced by the Minister of Resources and Development on Monday last with respect to curtailment of housing loans under the National Housing Act, will the Prime Minister reconsider the stand taken by the government on that occasion and ease the severe provisions which may have the effect of a serious cutback in housing generally?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As I understand the statement of the Minister of Resources and Development, it was a promise to keep the matter of housing constantly under review, on the basis that, next to construction required for defence purposes, housing was to have the highest priority.

Mr. Graydon: I am very glad the door has not been closed.

IMMIGRATION

COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE—QUESTION AS TO DEPORTATION AND TRIAL IN FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Taking it for granted that Jacques de Bernonville is entitled to a new trial if he returns to France upon deportation, what information has the minister to the effect that the trial will be held in the appropriate court of normal jurisdiction, as stated in the minister's press release of yesterday, February 8?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I will take the question as notice and table the text of the appropriate French decrees.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

DISQUALIFICATION OF CERTAIN MARRIED WOMEN UNDER AMENDED REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question with reference to the new section 5A of the unemployment insurance regulations. I refer to the section brought into force by order in council P.C. 5090, effective since November 15, 1950, and disqualifying certain married women from receiving benefits. Have protests been received against the new section? Is consideration being given to revising or dropping it?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The answer to the first question is yes. To the second question the answer is no.

Mr. Knowles: You will hear from me again.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, February 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Herridge.

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in the past week the debate has been directed in the main to the state of this nation's defences, and to the high cost of living, both of which are vital subjects at any time, but particularly so just now. It is natural that the defence of this country should occupy a large share of the attention of the house, especially as it is to be expected that hon. members would base their deliberations on the reflection of the views of their respective constituents. May I suggest that adequate defence is not only a matter of weapons, equipment and men. It is also a matter of production and of national spirit. The morale of our people and of our fighting forces—and do not think for a minute they are not communicable one to the other—rides high on the list of defence weapons.

Therefore it was almost with consternation that I listened to the statement made in this house on Monday last by the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), which has already been referred to by the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon), announcing reductions in loans made under the National Housing Act. I am amazed that this announcement should have occasioned so little comment on the part of members who must surely be aware of its consequences. In his address a couple of nights ago the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) referred to weighty matters of domestic concern. In my opinion this is a weighty matter. There are certain requisites to living which all will acknowledge—food, clothing, and a roof over one's head. Production cannot be achieved if the workman is not fed, clothed and sheltered. We can do without dance halls, bowling alleys and theatres. Surprisingly enough, we can even do without post offices if we have to, but we cannot do without houses.

In a city like Hamilton, a portion of which I represent in this house, we are vitally concerned with the state of housing. Perhaps I should explain to some hon. members who may not be familiar with the city of Hamilton that in about ten years we have increased in size from a population of approximately 150,000 to over 200,000. When you increase the size of any city, particularly an industrial one, by one-third, you do not have to look very far to find out that you are going to be in grave difficulties. You have to expand your boundaries. You have to provide essential services. In the new districts it is necessary to lay sewers, build roads, and construct sidewalks. All these things have to be done in a very short space of time.

In making his announcement, the minister, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) did later, referred to the fact that at the end of last year some 66,000 houses were reported incomplete, a number which, it was said, was some 8,000 units greater than the figure reported for the preceding year. I do not know how these figures are arrived at; if the minister were here, probably he could tell me. I understand, however, that a house must be completely finished, even to the sidewalk leading from the door to the street, before it can be reported to the department as a finished unit. From personal experience in my own city I know many people are living in houses with no sidewalks, so I presume those houses would be reported as unfinished units. Nevertheless people are living in them. Perhaps the minister could tell us whether he has any information as to the number of these unfinished houses which are in fact inhabited. I think he would find a great many of them. Those of us who served on the council in Hamilton, and had the headaches connected with trying to lift some of these districts out of the mud and provide some means for the people to leave their homes for work and the children to get to school, know that people are living under circumstances not altogether admirable but still in nice, tight little homes, with good heating units. They are sheltered and happy, despite the inconveniences they suffer.

The down payment required for a prospective home owner today would have bought a house a few years ago. I do not believe that statement can be disputed, because I am sure most hon. members will recall that it was not so long ago that you could buy a very good little home for a modest amount. Even in those days the prospective owner rarely paid cash for his property. He made the smallest possible deposit—because that was probably all he had—and then gave a mortgage for the balance. It is practically an impossibility for working people nowadays to save enough for a down payment. For ten years heavy taxes have taken from the working people of this country in varying proportions of their earnings; but I venture to say that the aggregate of those taxes on the average workingman over the past ten years, if placed in a savings account, would have provided the down payment for a house. I do not think anyone in Canada regrets having paid those taxes for the purposes for which they were required. Our people are loyal, and if they could not fight themselves I am sure every man and woman with red blood in his or her veins was glad to subscribe to the support of the forces which defended them. However, that does not alter the fact that they have no money left. It does not matter how worthy the cause you support may be; the net result is the same—you are broke.

I want to appeal to the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), and in his absence to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), as the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) has done already. In making this appeal I want to draw to their attention the fact that this action on the part of the government practically bars workers in the lower income groups from home ownership. Only a short time ago the government announced its intention to bring 150,000 people into this country. I am one of those who believe we have room in this country for plenty of new Canadians. We need them and the things they can bring here. I do not share the alarm some people seem to feel, or the fear that those who come in are going to take from those already here some portion of their livelihood. It has not worked out that way in the past. The more people we have, the more consumer demand there is; and the greater the consumer demand, the more work there is for everyone. But where are we going to put them? Where are the houses to shelter these people, if by this action the government withdraws from prospective purchasers the means with which to acquire homes? It is like handing a man an umbrella on a sunny day and snatching it away when it starts to rain.

Unfortunately this measure comes at a time when rental controls are likewise to be abandoned, and I submit that this threatens still further inflation. One need not have a very active imagination to see what is going to happen. If you cannot buy a new house, you buy an old house. If there is increased demand for old houses, the law of supply and demand comes into effect, and prices go up. The same thing happens in regard to rents. The more demand there is for rental property, the higher rents go. A report coming to me through the press of a meeting held in Hamilton early this week quotes a few examples which were submitted by the family service bureau of that city. I should like to refer to those for a moment, to give hon. members some idea of the conditions that exist. I do not contend that Hamilton is the only city in which you can find such conditions; I believe they prevail in any industrial city where there are many workers and where growth has been rapid in the last few years.

The first example is that of a man, his wife and his teen-age daughter living in one room twelve by twelve. Another family with three younger children live in one room. In another instance four families, comprising seven adults and eight children, live together in three rooms. The children range in age from fifteen years to six months. In still another case the parents live in one room, a baby is in the hospital, and the three children have to live with relatives. Another couple with one child who were living in three unheated rooms, one of which had been a pantry, had to separate to find accommodation.

These are not isolated cases, Mr. Speaker. These are probably the more urgent, but house after house in my city which was formerly a one-family dwelling now houses three or four families. These people are anxious to get out of these conditions. They know they cannot bring up their children in the manner in which they would like to rear them, and teach them the things they would like to teach them, as long as they live under conditions that are clearly not conducive even to compatibility.

I am sure that before the minister made this statement he must have considered alternatives. Possibly to him this appeared to be the better way. But without having the benefit of the information which must be in his department, I would think that there must be a half dozen other things that could be done. Surely the allocation of materials to builders for a specific number of housing units would have had the same effect, if the effect which is sought is merely to reduce the number of units being built. I beg of him, and of the government, to leave the door open to prospective home owners to acquire property. Do not slam it in their faces. None of these working people can raise that much money. There is no means by which they can.

One builder in Hamilton said, "We would rather see the government permit the one-sixth increase to continue, and cut building in half, so that many of the people in the lower income groups who need homes could still have them." Mr. Speaker, I have only one more word to say on this subject; in common with the hon. member for Peel I beg the minister to reconsider this action with a view to reinstituting the cancelled provisions for loans, and, if necessary, substitute therefor other forms of regulations which will not bar the wage earners from the acquisition of houses that may be available.

There is one other matter which I should like to mention at this time, and it has to do with the income of old age pensioners. As many members well know, the maximum income which is allowed old age pensioners is $600. This means that a pensioner may earn $120 a year without lowering the amount of his or her pension below $40 per month. Recently a woman who had made application for a pension came into my office. She had been a widow for many years, and had supported herself over those years by doing domestic work. Finally she became ill and required a major operation. Upon her release from hospital she had been told she must not do the heavy work which she had been doing in the past. However, there were several homes to which she had gone on a day to day basis doing housecleaning, and those people, being sympathetic to her, said, "Now, do not worry; you can continue here and we will give you lighter work."

Over the years this woman had saved a little money, which, when it was computed by the department on the basis of the yield if invested in a government pension, was calculated to yield $13.76 a year, or a little over a dollar a month. The next question the department asked her was, "How much are you going to earn?" In beautiful optimism she said, "Oh, I think about $8 a week." They put down as income $420, then added the $13.76, and when she finally heard about her pension it amounted to about $15 a month. This woman is all alone in the world. She has to rent a room and feed herself. Mr. Speaker, in all sincerity I ask hon. members, could you do it? Even where a person lives with relatives and is given free room and board, the value of that room and board is computed and deducted from the pension.

There are many of these people who are still in good health, and who can earn some money. Some of them are fortunate in that they earn it in ways that are not reported, so they put it in their pockets and get along very well. No one is any the wiser unless the investigator happens to call repeatedly and finds them out, and so becomes suspicious. However, if a person has steady employment anywhere, regardless of the meagre amount he or she may earn, it is deducted from the pension.

The other day I noticed a quotation from the Christian Science Monitor, not on the subject of old age pensions but concerning retirement at sixty-five. It reads as follows:

> The hundreds of thousands of men over sixty-five and of women above sixty who today continue at work contribute greatly to production. They are better off for their tasks, and so are their families and the community. Organized labour's developing stand against needless retirements deserves recognition by management as an expression of public sentiment. The mechanisms of pension plans need to be subordinated to the higher considerations of human welfare.

It is that last sentence, Mr. Speaker, that I wish to stress. While I realize that this article deals with industrial pensions, I submit that it is equally applicable to the regulations under which old age pensions in this country are administered. I hope that when this question of old age security finally comes before the house, this problem will disappear. There is bound, however, to be a time lag. These things are not accomplished overnight. My reason for mentioning this problem now is to ask the minister if he will give serious consideration to alleviating these conditions in a specific manner.

In order to explain why I feel this should be done, I should like to point out that on June 30, 1948, an amendment to the Income Tax Act allowed an additional tax exemption of $500 to all taxable persons over the age of sixty-five. These people have, in effect, had the old age pension added to their basic income for income tax purposes. I was curious as to what this meant to the revenue department, and I procured some information concerning it. Unfortunately I could not get the information for 1949, but I did get it for the year 1948, the first year this amendment was in effect.

I find that those persons over sixty-five years of age who paid income tax paid on $42,855,000 less income than that on which they would have paid income tax had this amendment not been put into effect. If this is divided by 500 we find that there were 85,710 people of sixty-five years or over who paid income tax and had the benefit of the original $500 exemption. These are the only figures available. They do not include, however, the people of sixty-five years and over who were pushed out of the income tax brackets altogether because of this additional exemption. There is no way of knowing exactly what this number is, but upon inquiry I did get an estimate from an official who told me he thought it would be about one-third of the 85,000, which would mean an additional 28,570 people. The total number of persons, therefore, who have benefited by this increased $500 exemption would be 114,280. I do not know whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) would talk to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) and come to some agreement, nor do I know whether that is necessary, Mr. Speaker. But I ask of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the procedure which was put into effect to aid taxable persons over sixty-five years of age be now put into effect to aid those persons who are the recipients of old age pensions, and that those pensioners should be allowed earned income—I am not now talking about investment income—of $1,000 in addition to the pension which they receive. Give them equal earning capacity with their more fortunate brethren. Since the exemption is $1,500 for single persons or $2,500 for married persons over sixty-five why not raise the allowable income to appropriate relative figures for old age pensioners?

Mr. Hector Dupuis (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, being a newcomer to this house, I should like to ask the indulgence of my colleagues while I say a few words in the mother tongue of the majority of the members of this house. My vocabulary in English, Shakespeare's language, is extremely limited. My remarks in that language will therefore be brief.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate you upon using the French language as often as possible, thus showing your determination to respect the rights of both languages in our country. For this you deserve to be highly complimented.

I regret that, owing to illness, I was not in the house to hear the speeches of the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I have read their remarks carefully, however, and I wish to congratulate them both upon the excellence of their speeches and upon the recommendations and suggestions made in them.

Before I proceed in my mother tongue, Mr. Speaker, allow me to correct a certain impression created by the press—unintentionally, of course—by designating the hon. member for St. Mary as an Independent Liberal, or simply Independent. While I did not have the pleasure of being the official Liberal standard bearer in the election which took place on October 16 in the constituency of St. Mary, I would say that I have advocated the principles of the Liberal party—I hope my hon. friends on the other side of the house have no objection to that—and the policy of the present government, so well directed by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who will be known in history as the champion of national unity in this country. I hope the representatives of the press—I have known them for quite a long time, having been in public life for some time—will correct that impression by giving me my correct designation. I am a straight Liberal, even if some say I am not so straight.

Mr. Knowles: What other kinds are there?

Mr. Ferguson: There are several kinds.

Mr. Dupuis: My intentions are always good, in any event; and I am sure that by attending the sittings of this house I will go straighter and straighter.

Before concluding my remarks in English I should like to say that I will try to live up to the confidence placed in me by my constituents, and that to the best of my ability I will do my duty in protecting their interests and those of the nation. I wish to say also that all proposals or suggestions looking to the bettering of our living conditions and the welfare of our fellow citizens will be given my entire support, without prejudice to the rights of each one of them, irrespective of origin or creed, so long as they conduct themselves as real Canadians.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, as I said a while ago in your own tongue I wish first of all to extend to you my sincere congratulations for the use you make of the French language, thus confirming the rights of both languages in this country.

Before proceeding further with my remarks I wish to congratulate very sincerely the mover (Mr. McMillan) as well as the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Unfortunately I was unable to listen to their speeches as I was detained at home by sickness, but I read their remarks with interest and noted their suggestions. They certainly deserve the hearty congratulations of the hon. members of this house.

I do not want to deal at length with this subject but I wish to say in French for the benefit of my French-speaking colleagues that the persons who referred to the fact that I am an independent Liberal or a plain independent did not do so unfairly but that, however, was the reason why I was given a seat in that portion of the chamber which is referred to as the "doghouse". During the election campaign I advocated and upheld the views of the Liberal party, led by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) who will go down in history as the champion of national unity in Canada.

Hon. members, the various Liberal administrations we have had in the past have deserved, I am pleased to say, the support of the people. Of course, the actions of the government may not at all times have been perfect. Nevertheless, when it comes for the people to make a decision, at election time, their choice must be based on what is commonly known as the assets and liabilities of a party. Thus, when the assets of a party are greater than what we may call its liabilities, the electors are in duty bound to support the party which has to its credit more good than poor or bad deeds.

The achievements of the present government and of previous Liberal administrations are numerous and I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the large number of social measures which they have put into effect. The part played by the Liberal party in the progress of our country, of which we are so proud to be citizens, is unparalleled. I beg my English-speaking colleagues to believe that I am neither biased nor fanatical. They have before them a man who asserts his rights and who, no matter what party is in power, is only too happy to congratulate a government that respects the rights to which minorities are entitled, and to encourage it to maintain that policy. I must say that we are only too happy to note that French-Canadians seem to be treated more fairly than in the past as far as appointments to the civil service are concerned. In fact, I am confident that, in that field, we shall soon have the representation to which we are entitled.

I am not one of those who try to take anything away from others but I never miss an opportunity to press forward our rights in any field whatsoever.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house any longer. I feel, however, that it is the duty of a representative of the people, even though he is newly elected and impressed by the atmosphere of this chamber, to give his impressions and humble views on the current situation. With your permission, I shall try to frame a few suggestions which, I think, may improve conditions.

Beyond a shadow of doubt, the period through which we are now passing is one of unparalleled difficulties. However, as the Right Hon. the Prime Minister so aptly explained, there is no need to decide too hastily on the course we are to take. As necessity requires, we can adopt the measures required under the circumstances.

If the Right Hon. the Prime Minister is willing to accept, not this compliment, but this expression of appreciation, I am happy to say that I admire his middle-of-the-road policy which acts as a counterbalance between both extremes, that is, those who censure the government for going too fast and those who feel the government is not doing enough.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

This middle-of-the-road policy is characteristic of the party now in power. It must be congratulated on the wisdom with which it administers this country in these difficult times.

There has been talk of controls. I would like to give the opinion of the member for St. Mary on this matter. It is a foregone conclusion that very soon, if not in a few days at least in a few weeks, we will be forced into controlling prices in order to halt the ever-mounting cost of living.

I do not hold the government responsible for this state of affairs, but I do believe it is their duty to solve the problem. I am told preparations are being made to that end and that, quite soon, steps will be taken to stop this alarming rise in the cost of living.

There are some who talk of freezing wages. From an economic point of view it may be necessary to set a ceiling for both prices and wages, although I am not in favour of the control of wages, at least for the time being.

Should conditions compel us to take such a course, the government would be in duty bound to set no wage scale or rather no wage limits until the appropriate adjustment had been made.

It should not be forgotten that at the present time certain groups of people do not earn enough to provide their families, not with luxuries but with the bare necessities. As for myself I shall never agree to the freezing of wages unless the case of the low wage earners is adjusted properly.

Furthermore we must not forget that humble group of workers, the unskilled workers or, if you will, the day-labourers, as they are commonly called.

There is also the white-collar group. I do not believe too much has been done for the welfare of this group of workers who may be worse off than the day-labourers or unskilled workers.

Before wages are frozen, the poor, the needy, the white-collar workers and the low-income groups should definitely be protected.

The workers riding I represent is comparatively poor and, during my term of office, I propose to serve more particularly the interests of the needy, of the poor wage earners. Not that I shall neglect the interests of those who live more comfortably, although they are less in need of assistance because they are better able to get out of trouble.

Recently salary increases have been granted to civil servants and I commend the government for taking that step in the right direction. However, I wonder whether some salaries that are not yet high enough to meet the cost of living should not be revised.

I respectfully beg the government to inquire into the matter, in order to increase, if possible, the salary of certain classes of civil servants whose income is insufficient to cope with the cost of living.

The price of milk was recently increased, and even more recently the same thing happened to the price of bread. Yet both are essential. I wish to make a suggestion. Would it not be possible to pay some sort of subsidy on dairy products, so as to stabilize, once and for all, the price of essential foodstuffs like milk and bread?

We must understand the predicament of a mother who has to manage on a budget based on the cost of living. Overnight, everything is upset; prices still increase considerably while salaries remain unaltered.

When the time comes to control the prices of food and other goods and when we must freeze salaries, I shall, even though I am not in favour of this measure, be the first to press forward the rights of the working classes and to support those whose cause needs pleading, at least those whom I represent in my riding.

There is talk of controlling materials. Following the vast production program which the government intends to bring in, it will be necessary to control the price of materials. I notice, however, that we have, on the other hand, reduced the loans available for building purposes and that their number has also been limited.

However, I would draw the attention of the government, of whom I am a faithful supporter, to a matter of particular concern to me. You know, Mr. Speaker, that the acoustics of the house are not good. I do not know if it is because of the cold air masses circulating in here, but we do not hear very well. Last night, dealing with restrictions on the use of building materials for home building, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) stated, if I heard him right, that this time restrictions would be enforced by close supervision, in order to prevent a repetition of what occurred during the last war. At that time, materials were diverted from home builders to the builders of theatres, dance halls and grills.

I do not blame the government; they may not be responsible, and I am convinced they do all they can to prevent abuses. The experience gained during the last war will, I hope, enable them to exercise close supervision over these materials, so that there will be adequate supplies both for the production of weapons and for home building, and so that building materials are not used for other than strictly useful purposes.

These things must be done now. After all, we are in a period of emergency and things could happen any time whose effects we cannot foresee.

I wish to congratulate the Minister of Labour on having formed a national advisory council on manpower. I am myself a former chairman of a regional employment service committee. There were five such committees for as many districts. I am now told that on March 31 next there will be left only one national advisory committee to look after the whole job.

These regional committees were composed of a chairman—yours truly being chairman for Quebec province—of the president of the Board of Trade, of two representatives of labour unions, of representatives of the provincial department of agriculture, of the armed forces, of the Department of Veterans Affairs and of several other representatives of proven efficiency.

Perhaps it is no longer necessary to maintain five local committees as was done during the war. In those days, there was a committee for British Columbia, one for Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, one for Ontario, one for Quebec and another for the maritime provinces.

However, should the international situation get worse to the point of causing another war, I am of the opinion that these local committees should be set up again in order to decentralize the national committee because the information secured by the local officers is much more useful than the information coming from Ottawa. That is my suggestion. In my opinion it deserves to be taken into consideration in the light of the experience I acquired while I was a member of one of those committees.

I wish especially to congratulate the Minister of Labour for appointing Mr. Arthur MacNamara as a joint chairman of that organization. As I do not know the other one, I cannot praise him.

Through my dealings with Mr. MacNamara, deputy minister of labour, I have been able to appreciate his competence, his worth, his broad-mindedness and his zeal. He is one of those civil servants we cannot do without. He is well qualified for the job and there isn't a shadow of a doubt that with him as a joint chairman of the national advisory council on manpower we can expect excellent results from the council.

I shall be brief since I shall have ample opportunity to speak in the house later. I wish, however, to express my views. It is the duty of every representative to do so and I beg my colleagues to favour me with their kind attention.

In closing, I wish to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) on the attention which his department is giving to national health by way of the many grants which are awarded in a non-partisan manner and are provided everywhere on an equal basis to such hospitals, clinics and other institutions that come under his jurisdiction which apply for them.

I am pleased to note that the minister is coming in just at this time. In the near future, I will draw his attention to a very special request concerning Notre Dame hospital, in my constituency. I do not know whether he has heard about it since I am not aware of all the information the minister receives, but may the humble representative from St. Mary be allowed to state the needs of Notre Dame hospital which is to be expanded very shortly. This hospital is located in a very poor district, which happens to be mine. I must say that, from the financial standpoint, the member for St. Mary is on the same footing as most of his constituents. This hospital needs to be subsidized. I have no doubt that the minister will be highly interested in the outline I shall give of this institution's requirements.

That hospital, now almost a hundred years old, has done a lot of good in the district I have the honour to represent.

There is a second request that I would like to make, particularly to the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) with a view to abolishing tolls on Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges. I am especially interested in Jacques Cartier bridge because it is located in my county. I wish to congratulate and thank the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) for putting on the order paper a motion requesting abolition of the toll system. I appeal to all my colleagues from and around Montreal for support in getting that motion through. It is not a vital question but it is important to the city of Montreal and the surrounding towns and villages. It will surely help bring more tourists into our district.

Taking into account the heavy expenditures which are justified in the present circumstances, I believe we might investigate the possibility of finding in those sums of money an amount sufficient for the removal of this toll. It is unfair to collect a toll at those two bridges, which are the only toll bridges in the country.

They are exceptions. The province of Quebec has done away with tolls on all its bridges. I do not see why the dominion government would not agree to treat the citizens of Montreal and the surrounding towns fairly. In any case, I thank the government for the attention it will give the request of the member for Chambly-Rouville, who has asked that tolls be eliminated on these bridges.

I am not in the habit of taking credit for what I am not wholly entitled to but I wish to assure the member for Chambly-Rouville of my full support when he presents his motion calling for the removal of tolls on Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridges.

Now, as I said earlier, I shall have the opportunity, in other debates, to express my views on various matters. I do not wish to detain my colleagues any longer. In my few remarks, I merely intended first of all to introduce myself, then to give voice to my political feelings and more especially to say that it is my intention to support the interests of those whom I represent, particularly the less fortunate, the little people.

(Text):

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, today, like many other members, I wish to convey my congratulations to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton), the mover and seconder respectively of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am sure also that all of us feel saddened today through the death of the wife of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). Our hearts go out to him in his sorrow. I should also like to pay tribute to my former roommate, Mr. Park Manross, of London. Mr. Manross was very kind to me, and I appreciate the association I had with him over a period of four years.

As we meet for this session, probably the thing that is uppermost in everyone's mind is the shadow of war, be it cold or hot, and of necessity our deliberations will revolve around that theme. One need only have in mind the $5 billion defence appropriation forecast by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) to realize the seriousness of the days in which we live. I do not suppose any other people on the face of the earth desire peace more than Canadians. Yet the course of world events, not only now but in two other wars, has drawn us into these conflicts. Because of our desire for peace, our enemies, by false fronts of one kind or another, are trying, through propaganda and other means, to cause us dismay, to mislead us and to do everything possible to impede our preparations to defend ourselves as best we can.

In the hands of the communists, peace is a weapon that appeals to every mother and father in the land. But above our desire for peace is our desire—and I think it is probably stronger in Canadians and Americans than in any other people in the world—for liberty and freedom. That is what brought our forefathers to this land in the first place—the desire to get away from tyranny of one kind or another in Europe and elsewhere. Without liberty and freedom, everything is but a mockery, and is ashes in our hands. Therefore let us do everything we can to maintain the freedom which we have preserved throughout two wars, and which now, with our backs to the wall, we are fighting for again. We have assumed very serious obligations to the United Nations and the North Atlantic treaty nations, and we also have an obligation to our own people; let us not forget that.

I mentioned that in some respects we meet here in an atmosphere of anxiety and unreality. The anxiety is with regard to three fronts. On the diplomatic front, are we being wise in our foreign policy? On the economic front we have the failure of the governmen to halt the rising cost of living, which is causing concern in every home in the land. That cost continues to rise, in spite of assurances and assertions that it can and will be stopped. Yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) admitted that already it was too late, that business had jumped prices in anticipation of a price freeze. We are also anxious on the military front. Has the government talked us into commitments hither and yon, without the material or manpower to back them up, dispersing our forces in such a way that we shall not be able to fight effectively on any front?

We have a vast, sprawling, sparsely-settled half continent here at home, as yet practically undefended. I mentioned this last fall, and I am going to mention it again. Our hydroelectric installations are not guarded; nor are the chemical plants along the St. Clair river and in the province of Quebec, which were mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). Our canals, the greatest inland waterway in the world; our steel and aluminum plants, so necessary to produce munitions of war—all these are as undefended as a ball park, with not an anti-aircraft battery or an interceptor or fighter squadron or detachment of soldiers to guard them. Some say it is the duty of the provinces to guard these hydroelectric installations, but they have no militia and no way to defend them from air attack.

Then apparently there are no plans to handle saboteurs. Today the saboteur is a traitor. Only recently we heard of attempts to disable the only aircraft carrier we possess. In some cases fires and wrecks in various parts of the country may be attributed to sabotage. Have the municipalities any record of the traitors in our midst? And what about civil defence against bacteriological, chemical or atomic warfare? Our civilians do not know the first fundamentals of how to protect themselves in case of attack. One great failure of the government, I think, is the failure to deal with our communists at home, failure to realize and declare that communists are traitors. Instead they are saying that traitors are communists; and I would like that to sink in.

On the military front, we have listened to optimistic reports by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) for three sessions. He will go down in history, I think, as the great consoler, not counsellor. It is so easy to pass it off by saying everything is fine, but it is all on paper. Some of us had the opportunity to go to Cartierville the other day and see the work being done there. We were glad of that opportunity, but I am afraid that it can be said today, as it was said in the last war: too little, too late. After all those assurances had been given to us during two sessions, came the dawn and Korea, and we had to recruit a special force. Then it was suggested that possibly the Korean incident was over, and there was some discussion as to whether it would be possible to send those troops to Europe. After all, if a man joins the army surely he knows what is expected of him. Let us get it out of our minds that a man joins only to go to Korea and cannot be sent anywhere else. If we are going into the army, let us be in the army and be done with it. Where did that sort of thing get us in the last war? As someone says, we have a phantom army. So far it has been ghostly, costly and ghastly, presaging tragedy in our time.

What about the Russian submarine threat? We have nothing to counteract that. I was interested in what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) told the farmers in Chatham the other night, when he advised them to grow more soybeans and less sugar beets. Sugar is one of the things we import in large quantities, and if enemy submarines were cruising our waters we would find ourselves mighty short of sugar in a hurry. So I believe we should attempt to build up as self-sufficient an agriculture as possible. It is true that we are not able to produce certain things in this northern climate, but it is folly to produce an overabundance of wheat instead of devoting some of that land to sugar beets, when we may be very short of sugar. That is only one item; I could mention many others.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to ask the hon. member where he got the idea I had advised a reduction in sugar beet acreage.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Right here. This is taken from the London Free Press of January 30, 1951:

> Mr. Gardiner recalled that in 1937 the farmers in Kent had three chief worries which brought him to the area, sugar beets, tobacco and white beans. They couldn't sell any one of the three crops, he said . . . The chief trouble over sugar beets was that they couldn't be sold at a price to pay the producer for his work and expenses. He could get only $4.60 a ton and required $7.20 to make a profit.
> The minister wasn't hopeful that producers could do much better in the future. He reminded that Canada had to keep her trade with countries producing sugar at far less money and, therefore, able to undersell the Canadian producer.
>
> Last year's acreage of sugar beets was the same as before the war and farmers increased acreage in Kent by one-third. Mr. Gardiner warned the farmers they may not be able to sell the sugar at the price they have to get.
> Asked what would happen if the present Korean war extended to a wide area and prevented shipment of sugar, Mr. Gardiner said, "Well, of course, war would change the picture entirely."

That is where I got it.

Mr. Gardiner: May I read my hon. friend the newspaper report? That is not a report of the speech at all.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Who is making this speech?

Mr. Gardiner: I am just asking for permission to make a correction. If the hon. member does not want it now, I can make it when he sits down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The minister is asking for permission to make a correction. Does the hon. member give the minister that permission?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Middlesex East has the floor.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): In another issue the London Free Press reported that Mr. Jewel the CFPL commentator had this to say:

> No man could be wrong oftener than Gardiner. The best thing to do would be to grow sugar beets in 1951.

Mr. Gardiner: That would still be following my advice.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I should like to say something more about this runaway inflation. This inflation has been sparked by the government's hesitancy, and the hint that controls would be put on if and when necessary. This gave the impetus to those who were in a position to raise prices. The unfortunate ones who are living on fixed incomes, such as pensioners and white-collar workers, find themselves in a position where today their dollar is only worth about fifty-six cents. Labour has been trying to keep pace with this inflationary spiral through contracts with industry, but some have not been able to do that. Every housewife is wondering how she is going to balance the budget.

Returning for a moment to the question of the threat of a Russian submarine fleet, may I say that it was not many years ago that the newspapers on the Atlantic seaboard carried pictures of Canadian boats tied up and idle, their crews paid off. At that time we lost a large portion of our merchant navy. The excuse was that we could not afford to maintain those vessels. A year or two later we find we cannot afford to be without them.

Dealing with the economic front we come to food, clothing and shelter. When the member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) mentioned these subjects, I wondered whether we had been comparing notes. These are the three essentials. What of food? I should like to review the food situation, because a lot of the pressure which is being brought to bear on the government today is being directed towards food. After all, the essential concern of the housewife is food. I should like to review for a moment Canada's declining food production. There has been a decline in bacon, cheese, eggs, butter, and many other commodities. Soon we shall have to make a decision as to whether we want to eat. It is just that serious.

I should like to point out what has happened in the last three or four years, and to do so I shall quote an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail on September 13, 1950. This article reviews another report by the Right Hon. Minister of Agriculture, and it says:

> Canada in 1941 had two million fewer people to feed than she has now, yet she had 400,000 more cattle, 580,000 more hogs and more than twice as many sheep as there were at the start of this year.

Later it says:

> The more than eight million hogs in 1943, the peak year, had shrunk to 4·6 million at the beginning of this year. In 1945, the last war year, poultry production was over 82 million birds. By last year it was almost halved at 42·5 million. During the war Canada supplied Great Britain with nearly 700 million pounds of bacon in a single year.

Yet today we can hardly produce more bacon than we need for our own use. If that trend continues for very long, we will certainly be in a serious position so far as food is concerned.

I have a reference here from the dominion bureau of statistics and the dominion Department of Labour concerning the quantities of food which could be purchased by one hour's wages, based on miners in Nova Scotia, carpenters in Toronto and machinists in Hamilton. I shall start to make the comparison at the year 1901, when an hour's wages brought 7·9 pounds of bread; 2·5 pounds of beef; 0·9 dozen eggs; 0·9 pounds of butter and 4·0 quarts of milk. The index for that is 100. Turning to 1920 we find that an hour's wages purchased 8·2 pounds of bread; 2·9 pounds of beef; 1 dozen eggs; 1 pound of butter and 4·6 quarts of milk. The index was 111. We go to 1939, when an hour's wages would buy 10·5 pounds of bread; 4·1 pounds of beef; 2 dozen eggs; 2·5 pounds of butter; 5·9 quarts of milk, and the index is 189. In 1948 an hour's wages would buy 13 pounds of bread; 2·3 pounds of beef; 1·6 dozen eggs; 1·6 pounds of butter; 6·6 quarts of milk, and the index was 155. I am sorry that I have not today's figures, but we know that an hour's wages today will buy slightly more than it would in 1948.

What does the dollar do so far as clothing is concerned? Yesterday I went to the library and looked at a copy of the London paper for July 2, 1923. I found that a man's suit, good and ready-made, was advertised at $19.50, and tailor-made for $27.50. Those were the days when a dollar was worth a dollar and not 50 cents. I shall just quote one example of today's prices and that is children's shoes at $7.50. It is almost a prohibitive price.

What about shelter? I believe probably the most ill-advised moves on the part of two ministers took place a while ago, one dealing with housing and the other with immigration. They certainly did not get their heads together when they announced their plan, because one is going to bring in 150,000 new people who will need homes and the other is going to reduce housing as rapidly as he can. Ever since the war ended, housing has been one of the problems of this country. At a time like this, to curtail housing, of all things, was I think an extremely ill-advised move. I am going to mention two subdivisions in my own constituency, namely the Hale-Trafalgar subdivision and the Byron Veterans Land Act development. The Byron V.L.A. development stood idle for several years while veterans put their names on the waiting list to get the Department of Veterans Affairs to O.K. it as a housing project. Late last year or early in this year the department finally came to a decision to open it up. Now when they are all set to go ahead the government decide that they will curtail housing. Most of the men have not more than the required down payment to start their building operations. This move is only going to aggravate the housing situation.

The immigration policy is just five years late. At the close of the war, when our housing shortage was must acute, we needed to bring in artisans of one kind and another who could engage in the building trade. But what did we do? We brought in some unskilled labour, put them on farms and in a sense froze them there—most of them have now drifted to the cities—and let the cream of the crop, shall I say, go to Australia, New Zealand and the United States. During that five-year period —and this is where the lack of continuity of effort comes in—we had five ministers responsible for immigration. I will mention their names. There were Mr. Crerar, Mr. Glen, Mr. MacKinnon, Mr. Gibson and Mr. Harris.

No wonder we have not any concrete immigration plans. Only with a war on our doorstep do we realize that we need more men.

There is another thing that bothers not only me but, I think, every citizen who reads it. I refer to a recent editorial commenting on the fact that 70,000 tons of rubber were sold in 1950 to U.S.S.R. and 30,000 tons to China as well as large quantities of tin and wool. Most of us can remember when we were shipping scrap iron to Japan, who tossed it back at us with interest. No wonder the young men are hesitating to go into the army when, on the one hand they see the willingness, nay, the keenness, to trade with the enemy and, on the other hand, the invitation to join the forces. We can easily find ourselves in the same position as the United States found themselves in at Pearl Harbor.

I now want to pick up a few of the loose ends. Who is getting the increased prices for foodstuffs? I think everybody would like to know. I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the Family Herald and Weekly Star of Friday, October 13, 1950. The farmers' share is not as great as most consumers believe it to be. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and his department have failed to do a public relations job for agriculture. As I understand it, the government has almost 300 ghost writers and propagandists working for them. I would suggest that the Minister of Agriculture secure some of the good ones so that he can point out to Canadians generally the unfortunate position the farmers are finding themselves in with respect to the propaganda that the farmer is the fellow responsible for all these increases in prices. I am going to quote from this article in the Family Herald and Weekly Star:

> This climb of food prices to a record level raises the question as to who gets the benefit and as to how the consumer's dollar is divided between producers and distributors . . .
> The marketing charge on eggs has doubled, from 7·7 to 15·4 cents a dozen, on cheese has risen from 9 to 20 cents a pound and on beef from 7 to 17 cents a pound. On flour the price spread went up from 2·7 to 3·9 cents a pound, on white bread from 5 to 8·4 cents and on canned tomatoes from 9·3 to 16 cents per 28-ounce tin.

From that article I think it is fairly obvious that the farmer is not the one who is getting the cream. I do not wish to annoy the Minister of Agriculture again, but somewhere I believe he said something about not monkeying with the market for Canadian butter. If anyone monkeyed with the market for Canadian butter, surely it was the government that sits opposite. We heard that there was going to be importation of butter. Then we heard stories to the effect that it was going to be stopped. Then the cabinet reversed that decision and in it came. I wonder who was interested in that butter? Could it have been Canada Packers or other large food distributors? I imagine it could be. Then again —and I only know what I read in the newspapers—

Mr. Gardiner: That is not very much.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The Minister of Agriculture said that Britain will take four times the amount of bacon she has asked for. Who would not when they are buying it for 32 cents a pound and it is worth 64 cents a pound here? I wish I could get some of it. I also want to say that it is about time we quit subsidizing socialism abroad.

I also want to point out to the government —and they have it in their hands—the brief presented by the Ontario Teachers' Federation with regard to federal aid to education. This matter was mentioned last session and I am not going to go into it in detail. But today the burden is bearing down too heavily on the people who own land. After all, we are not educating acres; we are educating people. The school taxes on some farm land have reached such a height that people are being forced to abandon them as farm lands. I say again that we must make up our minds whether we want to eat or not. Let us do what we can. I understand that federal aid has been extended to universities and to technical schools with regard to the Department of Veterans Affairs and veterans. Let us do what is right in this matter.

I also want to make reference to the announcement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) a year or so ago to the effect that municipalities would be given grants in lieu of taxes where there was a concentration of federal property in those municipalities. That announcement sounded good, but that is all there is to it. As to results, they are nil.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer before I take my seat. I regret that the hon. member for London (Mr. Jeffery) is not in his seat. The other day I saw a news story in which he is reported to have said that the runways at Crumlin would be extended. I want to point out what I said, as reported in Hansard of March 14, 1950, at page 753:

> The runways at the London airport are not long enough to permit these North Stars to land. They have been able to go everywhere in the world but to London, Ontario. The newly acquired jet F-86 is not able to land at that airport, and so it will not be available to the student pilots who are being taught at the R.C.A.F. station there.

I am glad that the hon. member reads my speeches and receives some inspiration from them.

At the same time I also mentioned the need for emergency power there, because it was at that time that the Dow plane crashed and killed the pilot. I also hope that the anxiety of the hon. member for London (Mr. Jeffery) and his efforts towards increasing the length of the runways at London are more successful than his bid to get a grant from the minister for the arena at London.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): I had not intended to join in the debate, particularly at this point, if at all; but there are one or two matters which have been referred to, and which have been a matter of discussion outside the house, and about which probably I should say something.

Since it has been necessary for me to rise to my feet I want first of all to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I did not have the pleasure of being here to listen to them, but I have had the privilege of reading in Hansard what they had to say.

I want to join with the last speaker in referring to what I think has been a great loss not only to those on the other side of the house, but to all of us in the house, and more particularly to those who come from the west, and more particularly still to those who come from Saskatchewan. I have known Mr. and Mrs. Diefenbaker for many years, perhaps as long as any member of the house, and probably much longer. There is no one's presence here from ocean to ocean which I shall miss more than the presence of the late Mrs. Diefenbaker. She had a spirit in moving about the place which will remain here long after she has gone. Most of us will remember her kindly smile to all hon. members no matter on which side of the house we sat. The manner in which she accepted criticism made with regard to remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and joined in discussion with the critic afterwards, was one which we ourselves find most difficult to assume when criticisms are made directly and more particularly of a personal nature. I cannot think of anything better to say at the moment—and the best is not too good—than to refer to the very close relationship that was always demonstrated as existing between Mr. and Mrs. Diefenbaker. I am sure that when he comes back here he will come back a lonesome man, and I trust that we can all convey to him the fact that we are sharing his loss with him.

There are one or two things I wanted to speak about, and this is as good an occasion as any to deal with them. One has to do with the matter of butter, which was spoken of a few moments ago by the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White). A number of stories have been published in the press recently which are so far from the obvious facts that I can scarcely understand their being repeated. For example, it is suggested that some decision was made by the government while I was here on January 24, which was reversed at a meeting on January 27, after I left. Well, surely, anyone who took the trouble to look up the press will know that I was not here at any time after January 20. I left on the night of the 20th, went to Calgary, and I was not back here until February 5. Therefore, it is obvious that there is no basis in fact for the story which is told with regard to discussions and decisions in council.

Then the further fact should be obvious to every hon. member who follows what is going on. This whole question was discussed not on January 24, but on December 28, and the results of the discussions which took place on December 28 were made known, if not at the time, then two or three days after that time; and the whole question that had to do with the importation of butter into Canada from New Zealand was dealt with directly by calling in the four parties concerned, including the one organization that my hon. friend referred to. There is no secret about that. Canada Packers, and three other organizations, were called in to Ottawa and asked questions with regard to the purchase. When it was suggested that they had purchased 4½ million pounds, not 2½ million pounds as is suggested in some of the articles, but 4½ million pounds of butter, from New Zealand, we made inquiries as to whether they knew that it was necessary to have the consent of the government of Canada to the importation of butter from New Zealand.

They intimated that they did not know that. Well, it was suggested to them that that was the fact, and it was also suggested that in the opinion of the government there was sufficient butter in Canada to take care of the situation until the new butter comes on the market in the spring, provided that it was properly distributed.

They have their own means of gathering information, of course, and do not necessarily need to accept the opinions given by the officials of the Department of Agriculture, and they held a different view. They said they thought that 4½ million pounds of butter would be required to add to what we considered would be very close to 8 million pounds that would be in surplus to what would be required to carry us down to May 1. After all, one must admit that that is more or less a matter of opinion. We said that we would likely have 8 million pounds surplus on May 1. Those who had arranged for the importation said that they thought we would just about break even and that we would need to have the 4½ million pounds at the end of the dairy year in order to carry over.

Well, we examined the figures, examined the records, and we finally agreed that if we were correct a year ago when we had discussions in this house with regard to butter, and when member after member on the other side of the house got up and accused this government of having too big a supply of butter, a surplus that was going to cause us trouble, then if that were correct and the figures we have now are correct and the figures the companies have now are correct, we were almost bound to have between 7 million and 8 million pounds of butter at the end of the year.

The next thing that was said by the companies was: We have the butter; we have purchased the butter and while it is not yet loaded, if it is going to be here toward the end of February or the middle of March, when it is expected it will be required, it will have to be loaded early in February. So they desired to have the consent of the government to have the butter brought in in view of the fact that it had been purchased.

We were not so much concerned about the amount of butter, because after all it was only 4,500,000 pounds or 4½ days' supply, as we were concerned about establishing the position with regard to butter coming to this country from New Zealand. Practically all the distributors of butter must come to the government for butter at this time of year. They have been distributing their own butter up until now. We purchased 34 million pounds of butter last summer and we began the distribution of it about the beginning of December. So in January the distributors must come to the government in order to secure their supplies of butter. All four of these concerns must get butter from us day by day from now until the time this shipment comes from New Zealand or they will have little or no butter to distribute.

We said to them: You are going to require butter; and they agreed with that statement. The arrangements which were finally made after the discussions were that for every pound of butter we supplied to these four companies between now and the time the butter arrives we will get back one pound when the butter does arrive. In other words, the pounds are delivered to the dairy board to be distributed to all those who require it from that time on and from one end of Canada to the other so that none will be dealt with any differently from the others. I should like to tell the hon. member who was making sneering remarks with regard to Canada Packers a few moments ago that Canada Packers were the first to consent to the arrangement. They stated they were anxious to co-operate in every possible way.

I think that will indicate that in so far as the butter coming here is concerned it is to be handled in a manner which will be in the interests, not only of the producer but of the consumer as well, in order to see to it that butter prices are not forced higher than they should be forced between now and the time the new butter comes.

The other question which was of greater importance than any of these matters, in the light of the fact that the amount involved is not very great, was the establishment of the position which existed here earlier with regard to butter. I shall not go back over the whole record which I have placed on Hansard. But the press from time to time have wanted to know why they did not know about certain things long ago. I suggest that if they had read Hansard they would have known all about this long ago.

The facts are these. Away back in 1931 the duty on butter was eight cents per pound under the British preferential, 12 cents per pound under the intermediate tariff, and 14 cents per pound under the general tariff. The duty remained at those levels until the time of the Geneva conference when the general rate was reduced from 14 cents to 12 cents. The duty is still 12 cents per pound on butter coming into this country from anywhere else but within the British empire.

The rate of duty on butter from New Zealand and Australia is three cents per pound lower than the British preferential rate which was put on back in 1931. It is five cents per pound and as a result of its being five cents per pound it was agreed by both New Zealand and Australia that the consent of Canada be obtained before shipment is made. My friends in the opposition should be claiming credit for this because it was done by Mr. Bennett, who had them agree that for thirty days he could place conditions on shipments of butter to this country from either New Zealand or Australia in order to have an understanding with regard to its distribution before it was landed in this country. His method of dealing with the situation in 1933 when butter was purchased, as this butter has been purchased, without the consent of the government and sent to this country, was to arrange when it was halfway across the ocean at the beginning of March that it would be placed in bond for thirty days when it arrived in Canada.

Immediately there was a communication from New Zealand asking to have the butter released and he suggested the conditions under which it was to be released. Those conditions were that he put on a heavy dumping duty which made it impossible for persons to make undue profits as a result of bringing butter here under that situation. That condition continued in just exactly that way to 1938. In 1938 when we were drawing up new agreements with New Zealand certain understandings were reached, one of which is referred to in a letter addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on January 26, 1951, which accounts for what was done on January 27, 1951.

Early in the fall I had some discussions with Mr. Hislop, the High Commissioner for New Zealand. He came in to make his first call when he came from New Zealand and broached the subject of selling butter to Canada. I intimated to him that there was an understanding between New Zealand and Canada with regard to the importation of butter into this country, and that understanding would be carried out if it were suggested that any butter was to come. I said that so far as we could see at that time we did not think it advisable for them to be considering the sale of butter here as we did not think we would require it this year.

As is stated in this letter, I called him, I think on January 3, and let him know what had happened, namely, that a sale had been made. My understanding is that he did not know anything about this butter having been sold here up until the time that I discussed it with him. He inquired into the whole matter and finally wrote to the Prime Minister on January 26, and this is part of what he said in that letter:

> In July, 1938, during negotiations for the renewal of trade agreements between New Zealand and Canada, Canada agreed to remove the exchange dumping duty which was then being applied to New Zealand butter but asked for an assurance that if and when, in the opinion of the Canadian government, shipments of butter threatened the interests of Canadian producers, the New Zealand government would restrict shipments to reasonable and satisfactory proportions. New Zealand gave this assurance and there was an understanding that should any difficulty arise the matter would form the subject of consultations with a view to arriving at a mutually satisfactory agreement.

That is the agreement which has been on the records ever since 1938. It was still there, and since that was acknowledged by the representative of the government of New Zealand the Canadian government took action which removed any restrictions that might have been imposed so far as New Zealand butter was concerned until the question had been discussed with the prime minister, Mr. Holland, who was on the way to this country at that time. When he came, as has been reported in the press, he agreed that this understanding was still to continue. That is the only matter that we had in mind in carrying on the discussions and the negotiations until the records were made complete. The records having been made complete, the situation is that we have control of the butter, and New Zealand is not sending any more butter here if we object to its coming, or until such time as we have reached an understanding as to what butter should come.

Coming back to the stories that have been told with respect to the situation within the government itself, I stated at the beginning that the discussions took place on the 28th of December. It has been suggested in many of the statements that have been made, and suggested in questions asked on the floor of the house, that other senior members of the government were not here, certain things had been done, senior members of the government return, and certain other things are done. All the senior members of the government were here on the 28th of December when we reached an understanding with regard to the handling of the butter situation.

As every member of the house knows, I was acting prime minister from that time until about the 17th of January. During that period of course the question did come up for discussion, but no action was taken in any council meeting with regard to the matter while anyone was absent from Ottawa. The understandings were reached before other members of the government went away at the beginning of the year and when they came back were acted upon when I was not here myself. The order in council passed on the 24th day of January was passed when I was not here but it carried out the undertakings that were given on December 28, and carried them out in full. The government had decided that, while the other ministers were away, if it were necessary I could have the right to issue permits in order to prevent butter from coming to Canada, not from New Zealand because we have this other control on New Zealand, but from the Argentine or anywhere else. By the time it became necessary to discuss it later on the necessity for such permits, so far as the Argentine or any other country was concerned, had disappeared, and the fact is that the government withdrew the order in council.

What I should like to say to the house and to the country is that all that means is that the statement made at the beginning of the year after the meeting of December 28 has been proven correct by everything that has happened, namely, that if it is necessary at any time to have the right to issue permits in order to avoid difficulties arising which should not arise then the government will see to it that that authority is there. But there is no reason for anything being done about butter between now and next December. Reason for a permit never does exist until December of any particular year, and the reason for its being in existence is completely gone by at least the middle of February, and practically altogether by the beginning of February. The reason for that is obvious. It takes more than a month for butter to come here from New Zealand. No one is going to ship butter to this country in the middle of February, without any previous knowledge with regard to it, if it is not going to be here until the middle or end of March. Shortly after the first of April our farmers are themselves producing butter as fast as we are eating it.

In other words, the time for control is only a period of about two and a half months at the outside, and the control that is needed only needs to exist for about two months in order to make it effective. We had that control for as long as we required it, and no doubt if there was any reason for having it at any other time we would have it again. That is the story in relation to butter.

I come now to sugar beets. I have in my hand the document which I had when I was at Chatham. I have here the figures which were produced at that time with regard to both soya beans and sugar beets. I think the report which appeared in the London Free Press, and from which my friend read, is a report of a press conference and not a report of my speech. Therefore the report of the two may not necessarily be the same, but nevertheless the facts in connection with the two occasions are the same. I am not going to attempt to correct the figures which were read from the report. I think the gentleman reporting must have been just listening and then afterwards made up the report as best he could, because at no time in that discussion did I make any reference whatsoever to the cost of sugar beet pulp being $7.20 or $7.80 in Ontario.

I recited something which probably the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) may remember. I said in the press conference—not in my speech—that I recalled my first experience with sugar beets. It had been in the office of the minister of finance, the Hon. C. A. Dunning, the first year that I was here. I said that one of the members making representations at the time was the hon. member for Lethbridge, and that he had used a figure which I said I was using from memory. I said that I might be a little out but I did not think I was very far wrong. I said that the figures given by him at that time were that the cost of producing sugar beets in the province of Ontario was somewhere between $4 and $5 a ton, the cost of producing in Alberta was something over $7 a ton, and that therefore certain things possibly would require to be done in connection with sugar beets in one section of the country that were not required in another section.

I just recite that here. It has no bearing on the question raised a few minutes ago except that those are the figures used in the London newspaper report. They were not used in my speech. They were not used in any other way but in that discussion, and had no relationship whatsoever to costs at present.

Coming back to the discussion, one of the reporters at that meeting was determined that he was not going to discuss with me sugar beets, soya beans or anything of that kind. First of all he wanted to discuss the question of selective service, and I said, "Well, that is not my responsibility. The house is going to meet tomorrow. The speech from the throne may say something about it. I do not think this is the proper place for me to say anything about it." Therefore I did not say anything. Then he said, "Haven't you any personal views on the matter?" I said, "Yes, I have, but I cannot think of any place where I would be less likely to express them than here."

Another matter he wanted to discuss was the control of prices, and I said that was not particularly my subject either at the moment. He excused himself, left the meeting, and we went on with the discussion about other matters later.

We were in the middle of this beet discussion when he left; and the question that had been asked me just before he left was in what cash crop I thought the farmers in that area ought to increase their production. My reply was soya beans. He asked if I would not add sugar, and I replied that I would not; that I would recommend soya beans. Then one or the other asked whether I would say they should reduce the acreage of sugar, and I replied, "No, I have not said that."

That was about all the discussion which took place at that time. When I was speaking to them after lunch I thought perhaps I had better deal with the subject, so I picked up this document, the current review of agricultural conditions in Canada, and turned to the subject of soya beans at page 100. There it says that the acreage in soya beans increased from 103,000 acres in 1949 to 142,000 acres in 1950, representing an increase of 36 per cent over 1949 and an acreage 196 per cent greater than the 1943-47 average. This increase resulted in part from the introduction of new varieties, which has extended production over wider areas.

At that point I took a great deal of credit to the department for having produced these varieties; I think you would expect that. However, if you wish to read a proper report of what was said, it appears in the Chatham newspaper, which I do not think is a supporter of this government. That report is very complete, without pretending to quote me word for word. In that report they say I gave Mr. Bennett credit for having converted me to the idea that soya beans ought to be produced in the southwestern part of Ontario. That was during my first session here. I am sure the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) will remember the speech by the late Lord Bennett, who had just been down through the United States and had looked into the possibilities of soya beans. I have never heard a better explanation of what can be done with soya beans than was given in this house on that occasion. I went directly from this chamber to my department and asked my officials about it. I asked what could be done to speed up research and find varieties of soya beans that would grow at least in the southwestern part of Ontario, and perhaps elsewhere in Canada. We have been trying it out in Brandon and other places as well since that time.

The night after I was in Chatham I was at the agricultural college in Michigan and when I mentioned to the officials there that we were growing soya beans across the lake they immediately said, "We must get in touch with your research men to find out what varieties they can grow there." In other words we have been doing a job on the soya bean. So I told these people they could increase their soya bean acreage, and I gave the reasons. I told them we only grew half the soya beans we used in Canada at the present time, even with the increase of 36 per cent last year, and that we were not using them for one-tenth of the purposes the late Lord Bennett told us they could be used for. We have been using them largely for feed, and a few other things; but with all the other uses to which they could be put there was practically no production limit to the amount of soya beans that could be marketed in this country.

That was what I told them. Then these people wanted to know if sugar beets would not be just as good. I turned up the records and pointed out that in 1950 we had 102,000 acres in sugar beets, an increase of 18,500 acres over 1949 and of 46,000 acres over 1948. There were increases in acreage in all producing provinces, the largest percentage increase being reported from Quebec. Then I went on to suggest that we were discussing commodities in an area organized on the basis of commodities; and may I say right here that in Kent county they have the best organization I have seen anywhere in Canada on the basis of commodities.

I went on to tell them that, as far as Ontario is concerned, most of the sugar beets are grown in that area. I told them they had 33,700 acres on an average between 1935 and 1939, which was during the first four years I was in this house. Then I told them that during the period 1943-47 they had cut down their acreage to 16,700, and in 1948 had brought it up only to 18,400, while in 1949 they had 34,200 acres which was only 500 acres more than the 1935-39 average. Then I went on to read what is contained in this report:

> Refining equipment in Manitoba and Quebec will be operating near capacity this season. A slight increase in acreage is needed to fully utilize the plant capacity in Ontario and Alberta.

After reading that I said I was not going to give them the same advice with regard to sugar beets that I had given with regard to soya beans, that they should go ahead and increase their acreage without limit. I said I was going to ask them to examine the records, not only in this country but elsewhere, in order to determine for themselves whether or not they should increase their acreage in sugar beets. I called to their attention the fact, which members from that section of Ontario will know, that for a period of time we had a very difficult time in connection with the marketing of three products, tobacco, white beans and sugar. The producers of tobacco solved their problem by having their own marketing board set up under an Ontario act. That board handles all the tobacco, and we have had no trouble in connection with tobacco since the early part of the war. I reminded them that their own board had asked them to reduce the acreage of burley tobacco, and that they had done so exactly in accordance with the request of that board. As a result their tobacco was being marketed and they were not finding it necessary to come to Ottawa for any help. So I suggested that they might find a way out in connection with sugar by doing the same thing; that their board would be able to examine conditions in the southern part of the United States, in Cuba and other countries where sugar is produced from sugar cane, and compare conditions there with conditions here.

I did advise them, it is true, not to listen to the agitation which might be carried on by some interested parties to go on and greatly increase that acreage, until they had all the facts. I advised them to organize as the tobacco people had and then to follow the advice they might be given by their own board. At the same time I emphasized that they should increase their acreage until they got it up to the capacity of their plant, and that then they should make a careful check to determine whether there should be any further increase. If anyone in the house has a better suggestion as to what they should have been told, I should like to know what it is, because all we want to do is help them. So I was surprised in listening to the radio this morning to hear it said I had suggested that they should cut down on their acreage. I immediately sent this wire:

Mr. Eugene King,
Chairman, Ontario Beet Growers Association,
Royal York Hotel,
Toronto, Ontario.

I learned from the radio this morning that certain misinformed executives . . .

They had called me misinformed, so I thought I might return the compliment.

. . . stated to your meeting that I had suggested that "beet acreage should be reduced". I was discussing acreage in Ontario and particularly in Kent only at Chatham and at no time suggested that either there or elsewhere should beet acreage be reduced. I stated sugar beet acreage should be increased in Kent sufficiently to take up the capacity of the plant now there and that if any change is suggested the producers themselves should through their own producer organization check world conditions related to sugar before further increasing. I recited reductions in acreage in the past and recent increases but at no time stated anything which would justify anyone saying I suggested decreases.

I assume that telegram will be placed before the meeting.

While my hon. friend was speaking I started to read another report which appeared in the local press concerning the same thing, and which I think you will agree is not very far from what was stated here. This report appeared in the Chatham Daily News and is a running record which the reporter made. This is what he says I said:

"For a time beets declined in this district because farmers found that soybeans paid much better. It is just lately that the acreage has been big enough to run two plants, and already some farmers are beginning to question the wisdom of growing too many beets."

"We should always remember," he emphasized, "that this is not the natural country in which to produce sugar."

[Mr. Gardiner.]

I may say that I read in one of the other papers that I had said beet sugar. I did not say "beet sugar", I said "sugar" as this report states. The report continues:

"They can make it cheaper to the south and are able—whether because of slave labour or some other factor—to sell at cheaper prices."

"We need enough beets to keep the plants we have operating and the companies say they are running slightly below capacity—but it would be just as well not to be led into something which may involve a big risk."

That is just in accordance with what I have said. This report is just about as true a report as one can get of ten minutes of a speech summarized in a few sentences. The record is there for anyone who desires to read it. I find it difficult to understand why so many people are trying to create so much difficulty in connection with everything that is said and done these days.

On one of the occasions when I was speaking recently a very bright young fellow whom I had never seen before—I do not know to what political party he may belong—came to me with a copy of my speech in his hand. I had read it. He said "Would it be proper for me to infer when you said this you meant that?" I said, "You have a copy of the speech in your hand, why not print it; I read it." He said, "We are asked to get inference stories, and if you would not mind I should like you to give me one." I said, "I do mind; that is what I said, that is what I wanted to say, and that is what I want the public to know. If you will print it, I shall be very much pleased." If we could get that type of reporting on everything we say, no matter where we say it, it would be a lot better for everyone. I say that with regard to reports inside this house as well as outside of it. It is just as well to have a report of what you did say and let the people draw their own inferences if they wish to do so. We usually try to express ourselves clearly.

The hon. member said a lot of things to which I shall not attempt to reply. He just said them, and then went away and left them, so to speak. There was one remark, however, that I cannot leave unanswered. It had to do with the prices of food now as compared with the prices of food some time ago. The suggestion was made that there was a much wider margin somewhere, but the farmer did not get his share. Well, that may be true, but when the figures were quoted I am sure my friend will agree when I say that at the time I was first discussing this question in this house beef on the hoof was worth six cents a pound. I should like you to look at what you would get for six cents now.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Yes, but the farmer is not getting his share.

Mr. Gardiner: My friend says the farmer is not getting his share. All I have to say to that is that he is getting a very much larger chunk than he ever got before, whether it is his share or not.

Mr. Graydon: It takes a larger chunk to pay for what he has to buy.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, it takes a larger chunk to pay for what he has to buy. I do not know whether the member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) was trying to outdo my friends in that corner, but I find it a little difficult to follow them. I have sat in this house for fifteen years, and that takes me through seventeen sessions, listening to their representatives talk about low prices, not only for farm products but low prices for everything, which meant low wages. There was a lot of reference to the terrible times in the thirties because of the depression, and the fear that they have that we are going to return to that condition. Recently they started going up and down this country saying that we must have controls in order to cut prices down, and I have heard them say in order to put wages down, in spite of the fact that some people in the house have been accusing them of not including wages. Some of their leaders have included wages.

What I have said to them in reply when I have been outside of the house I want to say now inside the house. I have never known a time when people were prosperous when prices and wages were not going up. Prices and wages go down when we are going to have a depression. I find it difficult to understand why my friends spent all the years of their existence as a political party building up the idea that returns should be higher. I am sure my friends—Social Credit—a little further down will not agree with this reducing idea, because they have always said that we ought to have more of the medium of exchange to spend. You only get greater spending power by having higher prices and higher wages. Farmers get greater spending power by having higher prices. Fishermen get greater spending power by having higher prices. Labourers get greater spending power by having higher wages. I am quite satisfied if our friends get out of the way, and let the Liberal party take the course it has always taken throughout history of being the real leader and defender of labour and the farmers, the country will prosper, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, would the minister give the date of the agriculture quarterly from which he quoted?

Mr. Gardiner: It is dated October, 1950, volume 2.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Having come from a legal family, I have always had impressed vividly on my mind the picture of justice in which she is blindfolded, holding a scale in one hand. This means that nothing will change the balance but a consideration of the facts.

I cannot help mentioning a recent occurrence. It involves a man who sought refuge in this country that is known as Canada, the home of the free. Count Jacques de Bernonville, apparently driven from his own country and finding it necessary to seek a place of refuge, sought freedom and protection here in the great land of the free, Canada. Apparently he had been tried or would have been tried in his own country by a court greatly tinged with the ideals of communism and dispensing justice as we know communist justice. That man came to this country and has lived here as a law-abiding citizen. Just recently our country has seen fit to inform the people of Canada that, according to our immigration laws, he is going to be forced to go back to his own country, to be tried by a court that we hope will be fair. But a man would have to stretch his imagination a great deal to believe that France is at the present time in a position to give that man an absolutely fair trial. I believe that Canada could have balanced the scales of justice more equally by giving that man protection for a little longer time, until there can be no semblance of doubt about the fairness of the trial he will receive, particularly when we have impressed on our minds every minute of the day the kind of fair trial that poor soul may expect to get in his homeland of France if the taint of communism is not entirely wiped out from the minds of the people who are trying him. I do not think this is the time for that man to be sent back to his own country.

The speech from the throne contained suggestions about things that might be done in Canada, that should be done and could have been done but that apparently have not been done. The speech was not enlightening with regard to what the people, who are anxious to find out about various important matters, could expect from this government in the near future. For instance, in this house on many occasions there have been discussions about a pension of some kind for permanently bedridden or crippled Canadians, men, women and children; but to date I and the majority of the citizens of Canada have not the vaguest idea what this government intends to do to provide help for people who find themselves unable to help themselves or to provide the necessary wherewithal to live. I believe that is a question that deserves immediate attention on behalf of the people of Canada. As the representatives of the people of Canada this government should immediately do something about that situation. We have pensions for the blind and for the aged. I want hon. members to pause for a moment and say to themselves, "Have I not seen some person who is crippled through disease and who now finds himself in the position of being utterly unable to provide himself with a livelihood?" We feel that when people reach the age of seventy—and this is true of many people when they are less than seventy years of age—it is possible for a human being to find himself or herself in a position of being unable to provide the necessities of life. That is what the old age pension is for. Surely the same sympathetic and common-sense feeling should be displayed toward any person in Canada who is not as fortunate as are we members of the House of Commons and, thank goodness, the great majority of Canadians; I refer to the person who finds himself unable to provide for himself. We who enjoy health and the wherewithal with which to provide sustenance for ourselves should gladly provide adequate pensions not only for the aged and the blind but for those who are crippled and bedridden and cannot provide for themselves.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is that of civil servants' pensions. That item should be looked into by this government in an ordinary common-sense manner. When civil servants have retired on a pension agreed upon at the time of their service but, owing to the increased cost of living, the pension is not adequate to provide a decent, respectable living for people who have given years of diligent and valuable service to the people of Canada, surely that is another item that should be gone into thoroughly by this government without further procrastination. In doing so, I am sure they would have the approval of all decent-thinking Canadians.

The housing situation is now apparently taking a turn for the worse, owing to the actions of the government in recent weeks. We may find an increased shortage of houses which are greatly in demand and highly necessary, because of the fact that there is an increasing shortage of materials. Yet only a few weeks ago I read in a daily paper a report to the effect that a $100,000 bank building is to be erected in the city of Hull. I cannot conceive that there is an actual shortage of building materials when a restraint has not been put on such edifices as bank buildings. One bank alone in Canada owns approximately 600 branch banks. We have seen the banks mushroom up here and there, debating amongst themselves whether one bank would settle in this town and another settle in that one. Irrespective of price, they bought the finest properties in all the towns and villages throughout Canada. Surely we believe today that the banks in Canada have adequate storage space for the vast hoards of money which they are constantly garnering in. Surely they could sacrifice their interests, for a period of time, in favour of those who need homes, and could postpone the erection of what I believe are absolutely unnecessary new bank buildings. I believe that the erection of a bank building is worse than the erection of a moving picture theatre. I believe that people need entertainment but I believe that some curb should be put on the erection of such absolutely unnecessary buildings as bank buildings, when it is a matter of making a choice between them and homes for people.

Another most important matter which apparently seems to be coming to the fore is that of immigration. In this house over the past four or five years, I have repeatedly advocated that a stepping-up be given to this government's efforts on immigration. On one occasion I can remember the then prime minister giving the shipping situation as the excuse for not bringing immigrants to this country. We needed all the boats to bring our soldiers back from far-off battlefields. There was a shortage of shipping space. We could not bring in the immigrants we would like to.

I also recall, as has been mentioned today previously, there has been a continuous stream of ministers of immigration. It seems to be one department of the government that no person cared much about. They do not seem to desire to survive. They do not care whether they do or not.

I do not believe that all of the muddling of the present immigration situation in Canada is due to the present minister. I believe he took on his shoulders a situation that was worse than deplorable, owing to a lack of government interest, and also to government mismanagement. Some things get down so low that there is little life in them. It is almost impossible for a man like the present minister to revive the department.

Only the day before yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) disclosed quite clearly that he has not been reading very much about the activities of that particular department, or he has not been paying much attention to the appeals from the opposition for immigrants. He said that apparently immigration these days was taking about the usual course that it had followed over the past fifty years. I should like to remind him that that is not so. Sir Clifford Sifton in 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1908 stimulated immigration for the Liberal party. At that time the Liberal party did just about the greatest job on immigration that has ever been done in Canada. From that period on they have held office in Canada as a government, I am sorry to say, and most Canadians will be sorry also, except for a few short periods. Since that time the Liberal government has never carried on or attempted to carry on the job that was carried on by Sir Clifford Sifton.

There are members in this House of Commons today, and others who hold high positions in Ottawa, who are the sons of immigrants brought out during that period. Their parents were of the right kind of stuff. They produced the right kind of children, and they have been a credit to Canada. They have set an example that could well be followed by many people who lived in this country prior to the 1900's.

In my part of Canada, Simcoe county, there are, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to say, tobacco farmers who have come from practically every part of Europe. They are diligent, hard-working, thrifty people, men who have produced wealth from the almost desert sands of that small section of Simcoe county. They have produced millions of dollars' worth of tobacco, the finest type and quality of tobacco produced almost anywhere in the world. The people who came there from Austria, Germany, Holland, France, Belgium and many other European countries are not afraid to bend their shoulders to the yoke and work with meagre, insufficient tools, and produce, by the sweat of their brow on lands that a few years ago produced nothing and were considered farms of no value, millions of dollars' worth of produce for the people of Canada. Not only that, but they set an example in the harmonious way in which they live. That harmonious way of living is appreciated not only in Canada but elsewhere, and is an example for the entire world.

Several months ago I was driving along the highway and I noticed that one of the tobacco kilns had commenced to burn. Somehow or other it had caught fire. Within a very few minutes trucks and automobiles were transporting practically every nationality in Europe to that one fire to help. Without any hesitation the tobacco producers, irrespective of religion, irrespective of the origin of the owner of the kiln, came there to help. That is the kind of spirit that spells unity. These are the kinds of people we want in this country to help build up the great Canada that my forefathers envisaged when they came to this country 130 or 140 years ago. They contributed their share in order to create a Canada that would be worth while and would be open to other people to migrate to and become good Canadians.

Mr. Stalin and our communist friends must get a great deal of solace out of the treatment we have handed to people in foreign lands. I refer to the way in which we have treated people in the past ten years who wanted to come to this country. On the one hand we called them friends. We have said: You belong to countries outside the iron curtain; we are your friends. And yet until recently we were at war with the Germans. We would not let them come to this country because we were at war with them. This government took the German soldiers who had been taken prisoners, who had paid the penalty for fighting for their own country, and sent them back to pacify Russia. We sent them back regardless of the fact that these men wanted to stay and do their share in building up this great country of ours. Now if they attempt to come to Canada they will pay through the nose. They will pay an amount for their passage which is almost prohibitive. Because of the amount they will have to pay for a passage it will be almost impossible for them to come here to seek employment in our factories and on our lands. Some effort should be made to reduce the cost to an immigrant of coming to this country.

We have been endeavouring to show the correct path to the Chinese, but any Chinese living in this country and who have families in their own land love their wives and children just as dearly as we love our wives and children. But if the Chinaman in my town of Collingwood wishes to bring his wife and two children to this land of liberty, the Dominion of Canada, it will cost him approximately one thousand dollars. I suggest that some form of transportation be made available so that these people, if they wish to, can travel on a steamship not any better than but just as good as that which was good enough for our soldiers to travel overseas and good enough for them to return in. I am sure that if the cost of the passage and the transportation was reduced we would get more of these people to come here and be enlightened and thereby enjoy our freedom, and we would have a great improvement in our immigration numbers.

On motion of Mr. Ferguson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Howe: I move that the house do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 6.02 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

February 12, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

FEDERAL DISTRICT COMMISSION

ANNUAL REPORT FOR YEAR ENDED DECEMBER 31, 1950—AUDIT OF ACCOUNTS FOR YEAR ENDED MARCH 31, 1950

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table two copies, in English, of the annual report of the federal district commission for the year ended December 31, 1950. The French version is being prepared and will be brought down as soon as it is ready.

I should also like to table two copies of the report of the audit of the federal district commission's accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1950.

THE REGULATIONS ACT

STATUTORY ORDERS AND REGULATIONS—INDEX AND TABLE OF AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to lay on the table two copies of the first consolidated index and table of amendments of statutory orders and regulations published since the Regulations Act came into effect. Perhaps it would be useful if I gave a short word of explanation of the consolidated index and table of amendments.

Hon. members will recall that the consolidation of the statutory orders and regulations is as of the 31st of December, 1949. This index is an alphabetical index of all orders and regulations passed during the year 1950, with an indication of the publication and the page at which they are to be found.

There is also an index in the form that has become traditional in our statutes, of the orders and regulations themselves, in alphabetical order, with an indication of the amendments thereto made during the year 1950. It is the intention to have the consolidated index and table of amendments kept up to date quarterly. Therefore each quarter there will be a new edition which will enable those who wish to consult these orders and regulations to have in convenient form an indication of what is in the five volumes of consolidation, and an indication of what has been done with respect to any order or regulation since that time.

Mr. Knowles: Does the index indicate as well the orders and regulations that have been cancelled?

Mr. St. Laurent: Yes; it is a report of what has happened to what is in the consolidation since it was published as of the 31st of December, 1949.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TRANSPORTATION

STATEMENT AS TO PRESENTATION AND TABLING OF REPORT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to inform the house that the royal commission on transportation handed its report to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) late Friday night, that it was received in the privy council office Saturday morning, and that the usual minute with respect to it was adopted by council today transmitting it to His Excellency the Governor General. At the same time instructions were given to have it printed with all possible dispatch, and as soon as it is printed it will be tabled and published. It is a document of 693 typewritten pages. It is signed by the three commissioners, and includes an appendix of observations and reservations by Dr. H. F. Angus, and a memorandum on transportation by Dr. H. A. Innis.

STEEL

EXTENSION OF RESTRICTIONS TO ADDITIONAL CLASSES OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to make a brief statement on the supply situation affecting steel.

In my remarks in the house last Thursday I indicated that further orders might be necessary to protect supplies of steel for essential construction projects. Order No. 3 was issued on Friday last. This order restricts the use of steel for a wide range of construction projects. Order No. 1, which was issued last December, remains in effect until March 1, when order No. 3 becomes effective in its place.

This extension of restrictions to additional classes of construction has been made necessary by the increasing requirements of steel for urgent projects which are essential to our preparedness program. For instance, we must assure adequate supplies of steel for construction of radar stations, military barracks and other projects which are required for the armed services. Also, we must assure a supply of steel for the construction of factories for the immediate production of aircraft, radar equipment and other military items. Equally important for the long pull to our joint defence efforts with other members of the United Nations is the expansion of Canadian capacity to produce strategic raw materials and to provide transportation and other essential services for the defence program. It has become apparent during recent weeks that in order to proceed with these urgent defence projects, restrictions must be placed on less essential types of construction.

My order No. 1 restricted use of steel for a few classes of construction, such as places of amusement, entertainment or recreation; construction for the merchandising, storage, manufacturing or processing of liquors, spirits, beers or wines; construction for the manufacturing or processing of tobaccos, cigarettes, cigars, carbonated beverages or confectionery; as well as use of steel for outdoor advertising signs. Order No. 3 adds to this list a wide range of other construction, including office buildings, hotels, printing establishments, banks, construction for the purpose of furnishing personal services, construction for the purpose of storing, distributing or displaying consumer goods, and construction of storage warehousing for personal effects.

The administration of this order has been delegated to the recently-established steel division of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Because of the critical supply situation for steel for construction projects, it will not be our policy to authorize projects on the restricted list where actual construction has not yet begun. In those cases where actual construction has begun and is well under way, it may be possible to authorize completion of the jobs, but each case will have to be considered on its own merits. It should be noted particularly that even where permission is given to complete a project on the prohibited list, this authorization does not assure availability of steel for the job, and it does not constitute any priority whatsoever for supply of the steel. It is most important that there be no confusion on this point.

Another point that probably requires some clarification is that order No. 3 restricts the use of steel materials for construction of a building. It does not restrict the use of steel for the manufacture of products such as builders' hardware, doors, fixtures and mechanical equipment, even though such manufactured products may be incorporated in or installed in prohibited buildings. I understand that there has been a certain amount of misunderstanding on this point in connection with my order No. 1. The definitions in order No. 3 are intended to clarify this situation.

As I reported to the house last Thursday, a preliminary survey of investment intentions would indicate that private industry and government are aiming at a capital investment program in 1951 of $4,260 million, or thirteen per cent greater than in 1950. I might add that large projects are being announced almost every day, which will add to those figures. In my remarks I pointed out that it was unlikely that this objective could be attained, and that it would be necessary to restrict the use of steel and other strategic materials so that at least the more essential projects can be completed. Although order No. 3 certainly will help to assure supplies of steel for essential construction, it will not do the whole job. Further restrictions may be necessary, and I want to repeat my warning that those who contemplate construction projects, which do not relate closely to our defence effort but which are not yet on a prohibited list, should not commit themselves to building operations unless they know that they will be able to obtain the steel and other building materials needed to finish the project. It would be most unfortunate and a waste of valuable labour and materials for projects to be started and then have to be abandoned for lack of some vital material.

Because of the urgency of getting under way and completing projects that are essential to our defence preparedness program, it will be necessary to divert increasing amounts of steel and steel fabricating facilities to these top defence projects. We hope to accomplish this with a minimum disruption to less essential construction that is already under way, but it is unlikely that we can avoid altogether some hardships to those who badly need structures of the kind named in the prohibited list.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister referred to orders 1 and 3. Is there anything significant or that we should know about in order No. 2?

Mr. Howe: Order No. 2 was issued last December. I have really forgotten its effect, but I think the only restrictive orders are orders 1 and 3.

KOREA

RECROSSING OF 38TH PARALLEL BY UNITED NATIONS TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Were members of the United Nations consulted about the reported recrossing of the 38th parallel by United Nations troops? If so, did Canada express an opinion, and what was it?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As to the first question, whether members of the United Nations were consulted about the reported recrossing of the 38th parallel, the answer is, not to our knowledge. In view of that answer, no reply is required to the second question.

Mr. Coldwell: If I may ask a supplementary question, has Canada made any representations to the secretary general or to the United Nations concerning reconsideration of the implied permission which was granted to the troops last October?

Mr. St. Laurent: I would not like to give a positive answer, but I will take the question as notice and ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to deal with it at an early date.

Mr. Graydon: What permission have the Chinese to be south of the 38th parallel?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TRUCKERS STRIKE, VICTORIA, B.C.—LOSS OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE TO CARPENTERS AND LABOURERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour why some 500 or more Victoria, British Columbia, carpenters and labourers were refused unemployment insurance benefits when thrown out of work last April, through no fault of their own, but owing to a strike of truckers.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): The commission was of the opinion that the men concerned lost their employment due to a labour dispute. That ruling was challenged; the case was appealed, and the umpire ratified the ruling of the commission. I shall be happy to send the hon. member a copy of the decision.

Mr. Fraser: I wish the minister would do so, but I should like to know if there is any further appeal open to these men.

Mr. Gregg: I believe that question will be answered when my hon. friend gets the copy of the decision.

HIDES

EMBARGO ON EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Has Canada placed an embargo on the export of hides and skins from this country to the United States, and if so, why?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A temporary embargo has been established. The officials concerned with price control in the United States have placed a temporary hold on the distribution of hides and skins in that country. When the hold order was announced, buyers from the United States came to Canada and not only bought all the hides offered in our market over a period of time, but paid a price very much above the United States ceiling price for those hides. It was felt, and it was agreed in Washington, that a temporary embargo by Canada that would protect the action taken in the United States would be in the interests of all concerned. It will at the same time protect the supplies of leather for boots and shoes that are being ordered in great quantity for the Canadian servicemen.

MANPOWER

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL—REPRESENTATION OF RURAL WOMEN OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Labour, in deciding upon the selection of one or two women to serve on the national advisory council set up by the Department of Labour given consideration to the appointment of a representative of the rural women of Canada?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): I have given consideration to this question. As the hon. member knows, there are a great many women's organizations, both rural and urban. Those of us in the house who represent rural constituencies are well aware of the excellent work being done across the country by the women's institutes of Canada. These institutes come under a national organization known as the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada Inc., of which Mrs. E. E. Morton, of Vegreville, Alberta, is national president. In conversation with Mrs. Morton we have assured each other that in the immediate future it will be quite possible for the women's institutes across Canada to give expression to their ideas and aspirations through the existing members of the council. I believe I can say the same regarding any other large rural women's organization in the country.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Friday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Herridge.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I was discussing one of the phases of the negligence of this government, having to do with immigration. I believe that this government's lack of an immigration policy is responsible for a great number of the shortages existing in this country today. Knowing the type and calibre of the persons who have come to Canada in the past, and their contribution towards the building of this country, I feel confident—as a matter of fact I am positive—that if this government had done a real job on immigration during the past five years we could have had a million willing and competent workers today for the farms and for all classes of industry. We need these people. Particularly do we need British immigrants, people who speak our language. There is no difficulty in telling a man from any part of the British isles the manner in which a certain job is to be done, especially if he is a trained artisan.

It costs the taxpayers of this country about $5,000 to educate a man or a woman. If we bring to this country people who have been educated by the European or British governments, we relieve our taxpayers of this burden, and, in most cases, receive the benefit of the presence among us of a competent person who contributes his share towards the building of this country. The people of Ontario remember with pride and admiration what was done in this regard by the then premier of the province, now the leader of the opposition in this house, when he brought to Canada ten thousand British immigrants. In checking the records showing the amounts of money which these people brought with them, I found that it totalled about $27 million. Under this plan, ten thousand British immigrants paid their way. The plan was formulated almost against the opposition of this government's department of immigration. As I have said, these people have contributed $27 million to the coffers of the Dominion of Canada.

Fortunately for the farmers of Ontario, again owing to the efforts of the present leader of the opposition, ten thousand Dutch farmers were brought to the province of Ontario. They have proven to be a godsend in the production of foodstuffs for Canada and the rest of the world. The department of immigration should be the focal point upon which this government concentrates its efforts. This government should put forth a superhuman effort in order to assure the people of Canada that this department will function as it should function, and put Canada, with its tremendous resources and its vast territory, in a position to fill the crying need for labour of the right calibre.

I shall turn now to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). It is interesting to note that on June 12, 1942, this statement was made by the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of National Defence, as reported at page 3312 of Hansard:

> If, on the other hand, Canada fails by even a hairbreadth to discharge her full duty to the united nations, to humanity and to herself, she would be dishonoured . . .

This statement should be recalled when we look at the position in which the people of Canada find themselves today. In this morning's newspapers we read that that famous and gallant regiment, the Princess Patricia's light infantry, is about to enter the front line in Korea. Here is history repeating itself, just as surely as we are sitting in this House of Commons. If these men, who volunteered to uphold the honour of Canada, run into any fighting, it will be history repeating itself; they will be short of reinforcements from Canada. To realize the truth of this, one needs only to reflect on the first real battle in which the Canadian army engaged at Ypres in 1915, when approximately fifteen thousand fighting men were wiped out in about twenty-four hours.

There are no strings attached to soldiers in the fighting line. You cannot tell them to go forward and then pull them back by the strings if they are surrounded by the enemy. How dearly we would have loved to be able to pull back these men at Ypres, who were surrounded by the enemy because of the breaking of certain of our allies on our left. The Germans surrounded the Canadians and marched them off by companies, that is, those who survived the unseen gas attack. If these gallant men of the Princess Patricia's light infantry are the victims of such a slaughter, where are the reinforcements for them? The Conservative government of 1914-18 was lax in securing adequate reinforcements. Men had to serve two terms in the front-line trenches, in water up to their knees. We who served in that war said that if there were ever another war we would see to it that these conditions were not repeated.

What did we find in 1939? We found—and you know it is true, for the facts were divulged by a gallant member of this House of Commons, Colonel Ralston—that there were no reinforcements for our men. This hon. member resigned from the ministry as a protest to the Liberal government against the lack of reinforcements for the fighting men in Italy. He knew the facts, because he had visited the scene. History did repeat itself. The same dilatory methods as those used by the Conservative government in 1914-18 were continued by this government. But this government had the example of the results of lack of reinforcements, and paid no attention to it. This government had the example of the heartfelt calls of the fighting soldiers for more reinforcements, for a bit of needed rest, during the war of 1939-45. So far their cries and their demands for preparation have been allowed to go unheeded. One does not need to be a military expert to realize what will happen in Korea if our poor soldiers do their part, as they will, and fight as all Canadian soldiers have always fought, with no thought of retreat when surrounded. They will carry on the traditions of Canadian fighting men. When what may be the remnants reassemble back of the line, and they are asked to go up into the fighting line again without adequate support, what will they think? They will think as we thought in the war of 1914-18, and as the boys thought in the war of 1939-45: "I suppose our parliament is doing the right thing." You and I know that this parliament did not do the right thing. The Tory parliament did not do the right thing. But let it not be said of this government that it did not do the right thing.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) stated in this house last week that we were proud of the efforts of Canadian soldiers in the last two wars. That is true. But we are not proud of the reinforcement effort put forward by either the Conservative government or the Liberal government in the past two wars. Our armies made history for themselves, and our factory workers made history for themselves, but with little semblance of guidance or encouragement by the present government.

We can easily remember the request which came from the British government for the opportunity to train British pilots in this country; and we can recall, with not a great deal of pride, the response that came to that request, and how late—but fortunately not too late—it was acceded to. We recall that those marvellous boys from the British isles came out to Canada and trained, returned to the British isles and flew aircraft in all parts of the world in order to crush the curse of Hitlerism. Let that situation not occur again. Every member of this House of Commons has a duty to perform, even those on the Liberal benches; and it is a duty that the people sent them here to perform. Irrespective of politics I suggest that hon. members go to their cabinet ministers and say: Please let us not have a repetition of the past. We are at war. Our men are going into battle today. We are still allowing certain factories to make non-essentials. We are still permitting a communist rally in Massey hall in Toronto, in spite of the fact that communist soldiers in Korea are murdering wounded men. We need no proof of that. We know the type and calibre of men we are dealing with so far as our enemy is concerned.

We are gradually pushing our men into the front line. Are we in Canada prepared for this situation? Do you feel in your hearts that it is the right thing to do to have these men in battle and at the same time to permit Tim Buck to eulogize the communists and their fellow-travellers, for them to cheer the remarks made by that man and for him to delude the minds of Canadians by the thousands when we are at war?

The backseat generals in the Dominion of Canada have been prone to criticize a great man, General MacArthur, who is carrying out a job with men who are not trained sufficiently to enter battle. He is carrying out a job against as ruthless an enemy as the world has ever known. General MacArthur should receive praise from the lips of every person this side of the iron curtain for the great show of generalship he has made on behalf of all the nations and peoples of the United Nations. General Eisenhower, a man of whom we are very proud, has now taken over the organizing of the defence of Europe. This city of Ottawa had the honour of having this great man visit it. I hope that when he delivered his secret messages to the cabinet, he impressed on their minds the seriousness of the situation in the world today, with the threat of the communist hordes. If they will only act as men capable of filling the positions they occupy, his visit was well worth while. The people of Canada are waiting patiently to see immediate steps taken, with no further procrastination, with respect to things that have to be done, that should be done, and that can be done. In my opinion this government will go down in history and be known as the "do-nothing Liberal government". It is about the worst of its kind that we have ever known in Canada.

Mr. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my first words in this debate must be words of congratulation to both the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As they were speaking I felt very close to them. One reason was a physical one, in that I sat between them; and in the second place, eleven years ago I had the same pleasant task myself. I was not surprised at the excellence of the quality of their speeches, because men who could come here, one with as big a majority as that of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan), and the other by that most wonderful of all political accomplishments, a political acclamation, are obviously men who are held in high repute in their constituencies. What I admired about them, sitting as close to them as I do, was the coolness and calmness with which they presented their maiden messages to this house. I think they will have fine careers in this chamber.

No doubt one of the reasons why they were able to acquit themselves so well when for the first time they spoke in parliament in the presence of these veterans of so many political battles was the advice they had undoubtedly received from the more senior members in their areas. I myself can remember getting excellent advice when I was chosen for this task and sought the counsel of one who was then the senior member from British Columbia; I refer to the late Ian Mackenzie. He gave me excellent advice, although I did not follow it as well as I should have. Had I done so, my maiden speech might have been more successful. In any case he concluded by saying, "Jimmie, there will be another thing you will need for your speeches. You will need a small trunk and a big trunk". I said, "What for?" He said, "A small trunk in which to keep the speeches you actually make in the House of Commons, and a big trunk in which to put all the speeches that you prepared for delivery but which for one reason or another you did not make." Well, I didn't get those trunks; but if I had them today perhaps I should put the speech which I am now about to make in the bigger trunk, because it was prepared for an occasion which has not developed. I try to be a good parliamentary assistant, to earn the pay about which the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) talks so much, by following very closely in the House of Commons the speeches and activities of hon. members relating to our own Department of Finance. I also follow the speeches they make outside the house. There are some members who are as quiet as field mice when they are in the House of Commons surrounded by their equals, but when they get back in the bosom of their own ridings and with their political associates, they roar like lions. There are other members, however, who are vigorous in the House of Commons and equally vigorous outside the House of Commons. I watch their speeches outside with especial interest, because what they say just before a session is probably what they are going to say during the session.

It was with this attitude that I read with great surprise a Canadian Press account of a speech made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), who I am sorry to say is now absent. I sent him a note just a moment ago telling him that I was going to devote some time to him, and hoped he would stay. Perhaps I shall be forgiven if I seem to be attacking him in his absence. Probably he will come back.

An hon. Member: He will be back.

Mr. Sinclair: In a Canadian Press account of October 25 from Saskatoon, the following appears:

> Saskatoon, October 25 (CP)—George Drew, national leader of the Progressive Conservative party, said Tuesday night that the government can save $500 million a year by eliminating wasted spending. It would help combat the growing dangers of inflation.
> Mr. Drew said in an address that savings proportionate to those outlined for the United States government by the Hoover commission could be made by Ottawa. This could be accomplished without interfering with necessary services and defence expenditures.

Well, my first reaction to that was, this must be a typographical error. It appeared in the Vancouver Sun. I looked up some other papers to see if I could see this Canadian Press account. I looked up the Saskatchewan papers. Sure enough, it was not $5 million; it was not $50 million; it was $500 million—half a billion dollars.

My second reaction was: how unfair to parliament! We have heard those speeches by many of the Conservative members, especially addressed to my minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). We have heard expressions about contempt of parliament when he at one time had to go on the radio between sessions and tell, not his party followers but all the people of Canada, about the changes in taxation which would have to be effected.

The leader of the opposition is also paid a salary. He too has responsibilities to parliament, and surely if in that silver-thatched head of his he has knowledge of how to save half a billion dollars a year it should have been given to parliament during the last session. It should have been given to the public accounts committee during the last session. It should not be given only to a group of his party followers out in Saskatoon, after the session is over.

My third reaction was: how unfair to the people of Canada; because, as he says, one of the best ways to combat inflation today is to curb all unnecessary government spending. The people of Canada are the ones who have suffered most if he could, as he said, have pruned $500 million from this year's estimates.

My fourth reaction was a personal one. How unfair it was to the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the financial critic of the Tory party. On occasion during budget debates I may have been a little hard on the hon. member. I know the difficult position he is in. The minister presents his budget, and a week later the hon. member replies. In the interval between, the people of Canada have shown acceptance of the budget, and he has then the very difficult task of criticizing. If the leader of the opposition had only told his trusted colleague how he could make this $500 million saving, what a speech he could then have made last session! He could have told the Minister of Finance not just how to raise the $50 million deficit, but how to acquire a surplus of $450 million as well. Well, I was sure that one question the leader of the opposition would raise immediately parliament opened was this tremendously important domestic issue, the saving of $500 million on our present estimates. Therefore I decided to do some work. I have done quite a bit of work on it, much more work than is indicated in the documents I have in my hand.

If I had any doubts whether or not I should work on this, those doubts were certainly resolved by a very strong editorial in a great Conservative paper in my home town in British Columbia, the Vancouver Daily Province, of October 27, which reads as follows:

> Mr. Drew makes a serious charge.
> Mr. George Drew, leader of the Progressive Conservative party, speaking to a group of young workers of his party at Saskatoon this week, gave it as his opinion that the federal government could save $500 million a year by eliminating waste spending.
>
> If Mr. Drew was speaking soberly and responsibly, he will have some grounds for his charge that half a billion dollars a year is being wasted in Canada. He will be able to go into detail—to give chapter and verse. And the people of Canada, who have a practical interest in federal expenditures, because it affects their personal spending, will listen to the indictment and demand an answer.
> The charge that the Canadian government is wasting $500 million a year is a very serious charge indeed; for, besides being a charge of gross extravagance, it is a charge of incompetence in administration. Half a billion dollars is one-fifth of the Canadian budget. It is twenty cents on every dollar collected in taxes from the Canadian people, who though they are prosperous enough at the moment, have no such sums to waste.
>
> Extravagance in government is bad enough at any time, but at a time when prices are going up and dollars are going down in value, it is doubly serious. It accentuates the inflationary tendency. Since the war, the fund of purchasing power available in Canada has increased out of all proportion to the volume of goods available for purchase.
> That is the stuff that makes for inflation. That is what sends prices up. And here, if Mr. Drew is correct, is an extra, irresponsible fund of half a billion dollars, flying about uncontrolled like a loose cask on a ship's deck in a storm, and doing damage wherever it strikes. Unquestionably, something should be done about Mr. Drew's charge. Mr. Drew should see that something is done.

Well, I sat here during this debate on the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne. I heard the leader of the opposition speak very carefully. He actually read his speech at great length, but there was no mention at any time of this half a billion dollars. I thought perhaps I should put this speech in the big trunk, but then I thought, after all, because of the work he has put me to, I should at least give to the members of the House of Commons a synopsis of my work on this matter of government spending.

It is true that I have access to a lot of information through the Department of Finance, but I am not going to use it. I am going to use the documents which are available to any member of parliament, the estimates of Canada for this year. Let us look at these. First of all, what is the budget? The main estimates were $2,309 million. Adding the supplementary estimates we get the gross bill of $2,389,106,000. It is on these amounts that economies and savings must be effected.

The leader of the opposition was the premier of a province, so he knows that all of the formal budget is not at the disposal of any government to slash. There are many of these things called statutory appropriations, which are payable by law. There are great transfer payments from one government to another government, from the federal government to provincial governments or from the federal government to municipal governments, or to individuals as pensions and allowances and interest.

Then there are other things. There are some items which the Tory party has approved. As a matter of fact, they have said that some items were much too low. Let us take them one by one. First of all, there is the Department of Agriculture. There are many good services there, some of which the Tory farm members have asked to be increased, but I will dismiss all them. I shall pick out only one or two statutory items. The first is freight assistance on feed grain. Conservative party farm members in the east have always voiced support of these. They amount to $5 million and are a straight transfer payment. If any Tory farm member in the east is opposed to that, let him speak up, and I will cut that out.

Mr. Fraser: You will cut that out? I thought it was the minister who did that Mr. Sinclair: I mean that I will cut it out of the calculation I am making. I have a few words especially for the hon. member for Peterborough West, if he will contain himself.

I will pass over the rest of these very important agricultural services and say that perhaps there may be some ground for the leader of the opposition's charge that there are some savings to be made there.

I now come to the Auditor General's department, and the amount there is $579,000. Well, that is one department that the leader of the opposition has shown in the public accounts committee that he thoroughly agrees with. He holds it up as a model for all departments so I will take it off as an approved item.

We come next to the chief electoral officer's department. I will not touch that. Then we come to citizenship and immigration. I will not touch that, but leave these whole departments for the leaders half billion economies. Then, there is the civil service commission. I will leave that. In the absence of the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) we will pass over external affairs.

Then, finance: this is undoubtedly the most frugal and careful of all government departments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinclair: In our list we have two or three things which most certainly are statutory. I will only include them. The first of these is the cost of financing the public debt of Canada, the sum of $433,045,000, a straight transfer payment. These are payments of interest paid to the holders of war bonds and the holders of other government bonds across this country. That is money going to the people of Canada, either directly as their own savings, or indirectly through the banks and the insurance companies or investing firms who invest their savings in these bonds. The only saving here could be made by repudiation.

I never heard the Tory party say they would repudiate that. Then, we have subsidy grants to provinces. The first are set by the British North America Act. The second are the tax rentals to the provinces, which are again straight transfer payments. Both the Conservative leader in British Columbia and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) say these are too low. So we can include that.

Then there is the transitional grant to Newfoundland, another transfer payment. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) has certainly complained about that being too low. All these provincial payments amount to $106 million.

Then we have grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes on crown property. That is a straight transfer payment of $1,665,000. There is no administration included in any of these transfer payments. If the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Drew), for instance, will say that Ottawa is getting too much—which he has never said—then I will cut it out of my calculation. However, I do not think the hon. member for Carleton county will say that the municipalities—especially the city of Ottawa—are getting too much in lieu of taxes.

Then we can pass over the fisheries department. I will not take anything out of that, but leave it all for the economies of the leader of the opposition. Maybe too he thinks we can get along without the governor general and the lieutenant governors. So I will leave that item out. Next, the insurance item is $343,000, but we recover $285,000 of this in fees for services, which I will include in my total.

We then come to the Department of Justice. I will only include the statutory payments in that department. The payments in respect of judges' salaries and allowances add up, all told, to $3,088,000. We have heard criticism in the house from the Conservative lawyers to the effect that the judges are not paid enough. Since the hon. member for Wentworth objects I will cut it in half—I am very anxious to accommodate! We thought the considered opinion of all the lawyer members in the house has been that our judges are underpaid.

Then we come to labour—and this is found at page 25. The first of these transfer payments comes at page 24 and makes reference to the contribution by the government for workmen's compensation for its employees, payable to provincial workmen's compensation boards across the country. This amounts to $840,000, again a straight transfer payment separated from administration No one has suggested that the government should not protect its workers in the same way as industrial workers are protected.

We then come to unemployment insurance —again not the administration item, but the actual contribution of government funds, amounting to $23 million. The Conservatives in 1940 when the act was introduced were not too anxious about unemployment insurance but they do not say that today, in public.

Mr. Fraser: I protested today. I think we have not enough. I referred to those five hundred men.

Mr. Sinclair: And the hon. member could not give me a better example. He now wants more money, not less, paid as unemployment insurance.

Mr. Fraser: I want these men to get what is coming to them. I want them to get a fair deal, and not to be squashed the way they are today.

Mr. Sinclair: Everybody else wants it. Then we come to unemployment relief for Newfoundland, amounting to $1,500,000, once attacked bitterly by the hon. member for St. John's East as inadequate.

Then we come to legislation—and we are getting right down to parliament now. I will not talk about administration costs. I will not discuss the cost of maintaining the House of Commons and the Senate, and will refer only to the statutory provisions for the salary of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the indemnities paid members of the House of Commons and the Senate, and the travelling allowances.

Mr. Ross (Souris): And don't forget parliamentary assistants.

Mr. Sinclair: No; I am away ahead of you on that. I am not including in my calculation either the $15,000 to the Prime Minister, the $10,000 to the cabinet ministers or the $4,000 to parliamentary assistants although no one thinks the Prime Minister or cabinet are overpaid. I know that the hon. member would be most anxious to make at least one saving in that respect. All right; let us say we parliamentary assistants are overpaid. All I am including is the $4,000, and the $2,000 allowance paid the hon. member for Souris for coming here to Ottawa. I doubt whether his leader would want that cut out.

Then I come along to the mines branch. Again I will leave out everything except statutory payments. If there is one thing that we have heard from the Conservatives from Bay street, it is that we should support a gold subsidy. This amount is $8 million, again a straight transfer payment. Certainly we have heard nothing from the leader of the opposition saying that he wants this item reduced or cut out.

Then we come to the Department of National Defence. We have heard a good deal from the opposition about the inadequacy of our preparations for defence, that we are not doing enough, so this item seems too little. In any case the leader of the opposition did exclude that. He said that his statement was exclusive of national defence, so I will add it in, $419,985,000.

Then we come along to national health.

Mr. Lennard: We could cut that down.

Mr. Sinclair: Possibly. First statutory payment is family allowances. This is not for administration, but just for payments to the mothers of Canada and they amount to $307 million. We have just heard the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) say that he would cut them out.

Mr. Lennard: No, I did not.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes.

Mr. Lennard: I said that the estimates for the Department of National Health and Welfare could be cut down. I did not refer to family allowances at all. And while I am on my feet I would refer to some of the stupid advertising that is being done by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Sinclair: I have been reading all these things in which the hon. member would make a saving, and I would just refresh the memory of the leader of the opposition by referring to what he said when family allowances were first introduced. This was the opinion of the leader of the opposition when he was premier of Ontario, as quoted in the Globe and Mail, August 3, 1944:

> This bill is an outrageous bribe offered to the people of Quebec immediately before an election upon which Mr. King's last chance of political survival depends.

And then, speaking as the leader of a provincial government, he said on a C.B.C. broadcast, Aug. 9, 1944:

> But I assure you that the government of Ontario intends to do everything within its power to make sure that this iniquitous bill does not go into effect.

Well, if he will say, or if one of his colleagues will say, that they want this $307 million a year, which represents a redistribution of wealth to the children of the nation, cut out, then let them say so. Otherwise I will include it.

Then we get along to old age pensions. This is an amount of $103 million. Again this particular item has nothing at all to do with administration. It is actually a transfer payment of $103 million to the provinces. Through this amount we pay our three-quarters share of old age pensions. The only criticism we have heard from any quarter of the house has been that it is too low, not that it is too high, so I include it.

Then we come to the post office—and I am sorry the hon. member is not here, because the post office department was the one department for which he had a good word. On August 30, 1950, as reported at page 27 of Hansard, he gave his thorough approval. So I believe we can include all this, with the exception of $1,750 which he thought was too much for the little posters he showed us at the last session, urging business in Canada to make better use of the mails to get their advertising program over. If there is one organization in Canada that should certainly use this service to get their program over it is the Conservative party. The amount for the post office department is $85,663,000.

Then we come to the Department of Resources and Development. The one statutory payment here is $20 million, for the trans-Canada highway. There were many Conservative members, of course, including the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), who think it is not sufficient. No one has thought that too large.

Then we come to the R.C.M.P., and again I will take only the one statutory item, an amount of $1,188,000 for retirement pensions. We all think, I believe, that the pensions of the R.C.M.P. should not be lessened—unless of course, the Tories want to cut the scale of pensions. Unless they do, I will leave it at that.

In all the great Department of Trade and Commerce I will take just the one statutory item, dealing with coal subsidies and coal freight assistance, totalling $4,850,000. Will the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), the hon. member from Annapolis or any other Conservative member from any of the maritime provinces, perhaps the member for Royal, say that this is a waste of money? If he will, then I will cut it off from my figures.

For all the Department of Transport I will take just the statutory payment under the Maritime Freight Rates Act totalling $7,319,000. Does any maritimer want this cut out? And we find $500,000 in that department for the railway grade crossing fund. We spend that each year, and in view of the grade crossing fatalities, we should be spending more. And unless the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson) who has spoken so much on it wants to have it cut down, we will leave it as it is. Finally there is the Department of Veterans Affairs. If there is one thing we have heard in this house again and again and again, it is the Tory criticism that we are spending too little on every aspect of veterans affairs, that we have not been generous enough. Since they want no economies here I will include the $198,881,000. Now all these statutory payments and the things that the Tory party has said are sound, and on some of which we are criticized for not spending enough, add up in the main estimates to $1,734,655,000. Mind you, we have the supplementaries, and I added their total to the figure of gross expenditure I gave for the main estimates. Picking out in these supplementals the statutory items, and adding the cost of the Manitoba flood and the Rimouski and Cabano fires—and I do not think the Tories said that was wasteful—we find another $21,161,000 of statutory payments in the supplementals. Therefore this brings the whole area of controlled expenditure, controlled by statute, controlled by thorough approval of the Tory party, up to the sum of $1,745,816,000. If we subtract that from the gross of our main estimates and our supplementaries, the figure of $2,389,000,000 to which I referred, we get left $643,290,000 as the area for all government departments in which there are controllable expenditures of every sort, and on that the leader of the opposition says he can save $500 million—not 20 per cent but 80 per cent economies on all the many activities of government in the federal field.

Of course hon. members know how he is going to justify it. "Hoover commission" are going to be the great words. If we could only make a saving similar to the Hoover commission, he will say, all would be well. I have done quite a bit of work on the Hoover commission. I would not have done so unless the hon. member had made that speech, but I am glad I did. I learned a lot. First of all, is it a good basis of comparison to compare our type of government, our cost of government, with that of the United States? Very few political economists of repute have ever thought that was true. One of the great works is that of the late Lord Bryce, "Modern Democracy." It is an excellent analysis of the differences between England, the United States and ourselves.

The United Kingdom is a small, compact country with a well-established government, most of the public facilities long since built up and paid for, a unitary form of government, just one level and then the borough down below, and parliamentary control over expenditures. It is a naturally efficient way, an excellent way of government. As for ourselves, we are a comparatively new government on the federal system. We have a comparatively small population, spread over an enormous territory, which naturally makes for expense in administration; an expanding economy demanding every day new and better public facilities to serve our expanded agriculture and expanded industry. We have a good civil service. We are getting away as fast as we can from the old evils of political patronage. There are few political appointments today.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Since when?

Mr. Sinclair: Then we can point to the fact that we have the British parliamentary system of control, the treasury board, the Auditor General, the comptroller general, the committee of the whole house, and the public accounts committee if the opposition will make it work. In a system like ours there may be however more opportunity for overlapping than in the United Kingdom, and for more costly administration.

But when we turn to the United States we find a very large population in a large country. That in itself makes it tremendously difficult to have a compact efficient administration. It also is a federal and not a unitary system. There is separation of the legislative body from the executive, both with powers of political appointment, a weak civil service compared with ours or the British, no auditor general, and no government responsibility for initiating money legislation. Any congressman, any senator or the executive branch can initiate such money legislation. They take their politics much more seriously in a political way. There is a great change in ordinary civil service positions when there is a change of the party in power as the result of an election, all adding to the cost of government.

Finally—and I believe this was mentioned long ago by Lord Bryce—there is the American Tammany hall maxim, a maxim which is used a great deal, and which perhaps still influences United States politics too much, that for successful re-election you must never vote for a tax bill and you must never oppose a public expenditure. When you make that comparison, you will of course see that there will be more need for savings by improving the administration under the United States system than under our system, and probably more need under our system than under the British system. However, let us go ahead with the comparison despite the difference in position.

I have done a lot of work on the Hoover commission, and so far the most optimistic report I have been able to find is that published by the civil service assembly, the group most strongly in favour of the Hoover commission in volume 17, No. 1 of their journal for January, 1951. It points out that, counting everything they possibly can, taking credit for all savings, they have effected savings of $2 billion in a budget of roughly $40 billion, or five per cent. Our budget of course is $2,500 million, and if our economy were the same, which it is not, if our government were the same, the savings would be $125 million, not the $500 million of the leader of the opposition.

More than that, the government rate of spending in the United States is very much greater than ours. Last year they spent $266 a person, and we spent $164 a person. The leader of the opposition will say more will be saved when all the commission report is implemented. I find that this blind faith in commissions, which the leader of the opposition has so far as the Hoover commission is concerned, is not shared by all people. For example, I remember that he himself started the Hope commission three years ago when he was premier of Ontario. When the Hope commission brought down its report a little while ago Premier Frost, the Conservative premier of Ontario, had this to say on February 7:

> We are in no way bound to accept the recommendations of the commission.

The Conservative Ottawa Journal said in an editorial on February 9:

> Premier Frost is very wise in not adopting the major recommendations of the Hope commission. He is in no way bound to accept the commission's proposals. Royal commissions are set up to report and recommend, not to make laws.

If Democratic President Truman is going to pay no more attention to the report of Republican ex-President Hoover, than Conservative Premier Frost pays to Conservative Premier Drew's royal commission, I do not think the hon. leader of the opposition can expect much more in the way of economies.

I want to finish my comment on what the leader of the opposition has said with a challenge only to him. I challenge him to come into the house, to come into the public accounts committee, and, not speaking widely about the Hoover commission, not speaking vaguely of percentages but as the Province editorial said, chapter and verse, item by item, say what services can be dispensed with and what employees can be dismissed. Then I will total his figures, and I shall be pleased if he can make this saving of $500 million out of the $667 million which is controllable. The people of Canada will be pleased. The government will be pleased.

There is one other thing I should like to say about him before I leave him. I should like to give him a little advice. He is not here, but he will read it in Hansard. He would not take it anyway from me.

An hon. Member: Who would?

Mr. Sinclair: There is a wonderful series of essays by Thomas Carlyle on hero worship. Naturally the leader of the opposition's followers try to pattern their conduct on their leader, just as I probably try to pattern my conduct on that of the Minister of Finance, a good model, though I am not very successful. There is one young member in particular in the opposition who is patterning himself very closely on his leader, the young and gallant member for Broadview (Mr. Hees). The leader of the opposition has the responsibility of making sure that the pattern this young member is following is a good one. I do not think it is such a good one right now, and we see evidence of that in the house.

As I pointed out, the leader of the opposition is careless with figures. His young follower, who came immediately after him in the debate, is also careless with figures. I say he is careless because in his speech, to be found at page 61 of Hansard, he compared our armed forces with those of Great Britain, and said that the armed forces of Great Britain totalled 1,023,000 men. Of course he may have authority, but I should like to refer to another authority, Prime Minister Attlee, speaking in the British House of Commons on January 29. His remarks are to be found in Canadian newspapers of that date, and in the airmail edition of the London Times which was available in the reading room on the 30th. Prime Minister Attlee said that in the last white paper strength of the armed forces, men in uniform, was 682,000 but that by April they hoped, by calling up many more reserves and extending compulsory training, to get it up to 800,000. The hon. member for Broadview is still not quite as reckless as his leader, but he is inclining that way when 800,000 next April is quoted as 1,023,000 today.

The second point is this matter of being careless in the basis of comparison. The leader of the opposition compares Canada with the United States. He says that our governments are the same, and the overlapping and inefficiency are the same. I say that is wrong. His young follower then compares Great Britain's manpower problem and our manpower problem and gives that as a reason why we are failing to put enough men in the army.

There are great differences on any basis, but let us look at Britain as far as manpower is concerned. They cannot feed themselves. The fifty thousand farmers who would be required to grow wheat in Britain, if they could grow wheat there, can be put in the army. We feed ourselves, and in addition we have to take fifty thousand men out of the manpower pool and put them on the prairies to grow wheat for Britain, plus all the men needed to service these farms and transport the wheat. Then we have seventeen thousand men up in Sudbury in nickel production, much of which goes to Britain. That takes men from our supply which Britain does not have to do. Ten per cent of our working force in British Columbia is employed producing timber for Britain today. The same thing is true of our base metals, oil, newsprint. These are things they cannot do for themselves, and of course that is why our scale of participation must be different from that of Britain. Of all the North Atlantic countries, Canada and the United States have the greatest resources; and in this cold war that is going on at the present time the production of equipment and the development of resources to get ready to defend ourselves are the overriding factors. We must divide our manpower between our resources and our armed forces for the best advantage of all our allies.

My hon. friend's leader skirted all around this manpower issue, both the conscription and compulsory service issue, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). So did the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). Out on the west coast we heard different statements by all three Conservative members, trying to kid the Canadian Legion into believing that they were endorsing their program. Although there is not much need for me to do so, I believe this would be a good time to place my views on record in this respect. Hon. members will remember that last fall the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) very kindly and thoughtfully quoted from one of my old speeches, made in 1944, in which I gave my stand on conscription. I said I still believed every word of it, but of course he did not commit himself at that time. I was proud of the brave, straightforward statement the Prime Minister made at the start of the debate on manpower. I was ashamed of the scuttling and scurrying of the Conservative party on the same issue.

I believe with the Prime Minister the use of manpower for the development of our resources and industry to help build up the North Atlantic defences is the overriding need today; but I also believe, and I have told the Prime Minister, that while we may not, because of labour shortages, be able to drain off our eighteen and nineteen-year-olds for two years of compulsory service as do other countries, we can begin such training without losing manpower from industry. First compulsory service in the cadet corps of our high schools. I had that training, and I am sure it did me no great harm. Those going to our universities are indirectly in receipt of state assistance for at least half their tuition and they also should be asked to take compulsory training as their contribution in return. Then our young men who are all working today in industry, and who should stay working, and who spend their evenings at hockey games or basketball matches, at the movies, at dances and in pool halls, should be called on for their duty and take time out from those activities and spend two or three nights a week during the winter and week ends during the summer training with the reserves, thus getting some training but not at the expense of our manpower requirements for industry.

I see my time is almost up; I have only six minutes left, and I still have a great deal of material. In these six minutes I will not have time to cover everything I had prepared, but I would like to suggest what members of parliament can do to help keep down the cost of government, because that is a tremendously important thing just now. I challenge the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew); I do not challenge any other hon. member. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) asks the co-operation of every member of this house to cut down civilian expenditures in every possible way. Last year I gave the house examples when I told hon. members what the treasury board does in holding down government spending. We have all these very desirable expenditures, for public facilities and services suggested by hon. members or by communities in the country which they persuade the appropriate minister to include in his estimates. The ministers go before treasury board, and desirable though these projects may be they are not approved. Of course the Minister of Finance is the awful ogre who is blamed for stopping the member or the community from getting this very desirable service. Well, somebody has to do that job and the taxpayers of Canada should be grateful to the minister for holding the line. It is not a matter of getting rid of superfluous services in this country; there are so many desirable things which need to be done in this expanding nation but treasury board has to decide which of those things are most desirable in view of funds available.

How can members help? Well, I think the first way in which members can help is by using some restraint in their own demands upon ministers and the government for more facilities and services for their ridings. I remember last year, when the Minister of Finance placed restrictions on capital expenditures for new public buildings. Who were the first to bob up? They were the Conservative member for Queens (Mr. McLure) and the Conservative member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I am sure the hon. member wants to put the record straight. I belong to the C.C.F.

Mr. Sinclair: I will certainly put the record straight, but those were the first members to bob up. They said, "Yes, we agree, but we hope that will not affect the post offices at Charlottetown and Winnipeg." Economies always begin in the ridings of other members. I have prepared something of an analysis of what hon. members have asked of parliament; and I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra is not here, because he was one of the best examples of an economy-minded Conservative. I went through Hansard for 1949; the index for 1950 is not ready yet so I could not search 1950 easily. I read all the speeches of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in 1949, and in doing that I certainly earned my pay. I should like to read this summary of my findings, but I have not time. Here are thirty items, ranging all the way from a Pacific pact to a complete trans-Canada highway system of several roads including lighthouses on the Queen Charlotte islands, $50 at sixty-five for everybody, agricultural floor prices, bigger travel bureau, Alaskan railway and so on. With the pricing I have been able to give, on those items where he was specific enough to make a calculation in that one year the hon. member advocated projects which would require an extra expenditure of $800 million; and taking into account the many other things he advocated, such as the Pacific pact and a modern merchant marine, which are difficult to price exactly I would say conservatively—that is in the old sense, not the spendthrift Progressive-Conservative sense—he would have added $1,500 million to the budget of Canada that year if the government had adopted all his suggestions, not bad for one economy-minded Conservative. This list is quite open to any hon. member who would like to see it.

When I was reading through his speeches I was also looking for something else, for any suggestion of economies in other departments which might make funds available for his projects, and most important of all for any suggestions as to how taxes might be increased in order to pay for just one of these new projects. Nothing of the kind was mentioned anywhere. There was no mention at all of any other tax. On the contrary he and his party have always opposed every tax proposal brought in by the Minister of Finance. In this house there is no more devout believer than the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra in that old Tammany hall precept I quoted earlier: never vote for a tax measure and never oppose a public expenditure. The hon. member goes a little further and suggests plenty of new expenditures.

That is not going to cut down the cost of government—that is not going to save $500 million out of the present budget.

Members of parliament can be of great help if, instead of fishing around the estimates in the House of Commons or in the public accounts committee, they would look around their own ridings. We do have these treasury board controls all through the departments looking for internal economies; but the people who can do a better job externally are the members back in their ridings and their constituents who are even better judges of where economies can be made without impairing needed service. These savings should be made where services are superfluous. Let them come here and tell the minister: "That service in my riding is no longer needed, we can do without it; these employees are no longer necessary" and they will be making a real contribution. If in that way they can effect any economy, not necessarily of half a billion dollars but of half a million dollars, half a thousand dollars, or even half a hundred dollars, the Minister of Finance will be grateful because it will lessen his burden; the government of Canada will certainly be grateful, and the people of Canada will be most grateful of all because then we members of parliament will be doing a real job in our own field in fighting inflation.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): In opening my remarks I want to associate myself briefly with those who have congratulated the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am still close enough to the new-member stage and to my maiden speech to remember just how difficult it is; and if for no other reason I feel that I am qualified to congratulate them upon the extremely able speeches they made.

I want to deal immediately with one or two of the remarks made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair) who just completed a rather odd speech. The hon. gentleman indicated that the government would be grateful if we would suggest concrete methods by which expenditures could be reduced. Unfortunately, that is not in keeping with the attitude of the government as revealed in this house last year. A simple suggestion, followed as I recall it by a motion which would have reduced an estimate for travelling expenses by only some $25,000, was immediately treated as a vote of want of confidence in the government. It was argued that we were upsetting the balance of ways and means, and that we were possibly cutting away at the most vital service of the Department of Transport—with only $25,000! We had taken the hon. member's suggestion and the suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) seriously. We made an honest effort to attempt to find some places where there might be reductions. We went so far as to make a motion, and it was treated as a motion of want of confidence in the government. This government, which is spending $2.5 billion of the people's money every year, says on the one hand that it desires suggestions for reductions, but on the other hand when we move a reduction of only $25,000 they call in all their one hundred and ninety-eight members to vote it down. That record speaks more eloquently than all the misguided eloquence of the member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair). From it the country can see who is really making the effort to reduce expenditure.

According to his own statement the hon. member has done a great deal of work on today's speech. I am glad he has, but I regret that apparently most of it was misplaced. It must be admitted he has done a lot of work, and has brought out a lot of figures. As he was speaking, I could not help but feel that had he done as much and as diligent research into the reasons and methods of making reductions in government spending as he has into the reasons why we cannot make reductions, then it would have been of some help to the taxpayers of Canada.

I was struck by the tremendously wide powers and influence which the member attributed to the opposition. I include in the word "opposition" the members of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties. Actually, we number approximately sixty members in the house altogether as against one hundred and ninety-eight on the government side. But what an influence we have, Mr. Speaker! According to the member for Coast-Capilano all we have to do is ask for an increase in expenditure, and it is immediately granted. According to the hon. member the opposition is entirely responsible for any increase in the amount of expenditures. We are responsible for the size of the government's budget. But when it comes to elections, Mr. Speaker, and the taking of credit for all the splendid things which the Liberal government says it has introduced such as family allowances, old age pensions and all these other things, who gets the credit? The opposition is not responsible for those, oh no, it is the Liberal government. That is the story we hear at election time.

One cannot help being struck, as I say, by the difference in the influence which the hon. member ascribes to the opposition in increasing as against decreasing expenditures. If all we have to do is to ask for an increase and it is granted—that is the impression he sought to leave—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Fulton: —then let him give us some credit, let him give some weight to our requests when we ask for a reduction as we have, in concrete form, in the past two sessions. Let him tell his minister, and the other members of the cabinet, that when we make motions for reductions they should not be regarded as motions of want of confidence, but the minister should really look at the question on its merits. The motions we moved concerning advertising, travelling expenses and sundries is the answer to the point made by the parliamentary assistant.

After listening to the remarks of the parliamentary assistant this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, on the question of manpower I believe it is time the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or some authority defined the status of a parliamentary assistant in this government and in this house.

Mr. Cruickshank: The hon. member will never be one.

Mr. Fulton: I would not want to be one under the present circumstances.

Mr. Abbott: Be careful, leave the back trail open.

Mr. Fulton: We used to have in this country a principle—I say "used to have" because it is certainly more honoured in the breach than in the observance today—a principle called cabinet solidarity. All indications are that it is completely gone now. I realize that parliamentary assistants are not, as such, members of the cabinet, but I believe it is time that their relationship with the government, and just how far they speak for the government, was defined. Just before coming to Ottawa for this session I recall reading in the Vancouver Daily Province that the member for Coast-Capilano said he supported the Legion brief entitled "Operation Preparedness". You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that that brief called for compulsory training for the reserve. The hon. member also stated, and repeated on a recent occasion, that he believed in conscription. Incidentally, he did not say here today, as I understood him, that he supported and advocated the immediate application of the Legion brief.

If in his view we should support the Legion brief, and I agree it should be applied now, I should like to ask him whether his view coincides with that of his minister, the Minister of Finance. The minister is in his seat, and I should like to ask whether he shares the view of his parliamentary assistant. These are matters of national policy. They are not matters unconnected with the various pressing affairs of the country today, but are matters of national policy. I suggest that no parliamentary assistant, no one associated so intimately with this government should go around the country expressing views on these matters of national policy unless those views are, in fact, the views of the government. I want to know whether the views expressed by the member for Coast-Capilano, I think it was at Powell River, are in fact the views of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Abbott: My friend has no right to cross-examine me, but I shall answer him. My parliamentary assistant is entitled to voice the views he did, and I am quite entitled to voice mine. I may or may not agree with his views as he has expressed them, but he is perfectly free to express them and always has been.

Mr. Fulton: Now we have it. We thought cabinet solidarity as a principle was in danger in this country, but the Minister of Finance has just buried it.

Mr. Cruickshank: What is your opinion?

Mr. Abbott: Would my hon. friend tell me what he believes to be the principle of cabinet solidarity?

Mr. Fulton: When a member of the government speaks, he speaks for the whole government.

Mr. Abbott: Is my parliamentary assistant a member of the government?

Mr. Fulton: It is for that reason I have asked if we could be favoured with a definition of the status of parliamentary assistants.

Mr. Abbott: I can answer that.

Mr. Fulton: Just before you do, I take it that he was speaking for the government this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Fulton: He said "speaking for the Minister of Finance", and he repeated that.

Mr. Abbott: The first order in council appointing—I think I am right in this—parliamentary assistants was one appointing myself as parliamentary assistant to the then minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley. I believe I can recall the wording of the order in council fairly accurately, and it was to assist the minister, both within and without the house, in such manner as the minister may deem fit, or words to that effect. I believe that is the definition of the duties of a parliamentary assistant in the order in council.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder then, if the minister and his parliamentary assistant express divergent views, whether the parliamentary assistant is assisting the minister in such manner as the minister may see fit? Or is the minister repudiating the statement of his assistant?

Mr. Abbott: I do not have to accept or repudiate his views. If my parliamentary assistant sees fit to speak to the house on matters relating to the Department of Finance, then I would expect him to voice my views, but if he sees fit to speak on any other matter of public interest he is free to voice his own views.

Mr. Fulton: As a statement of fact or policy of the present government with respect to the appointment of parliamentary assistants, I suppose we have to accept that.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: I have a number of other things to say, Mr. Speaker, and I should prefer it if I might be allowed to proceed. I should be glad to deal with questions at the end of my remarks.

I simply say that now we have that statement of policy outlining the status of parliamentary assistants, I think that we and the country should bear it carefully in mind when in future parliamentary assistants, either inside or outside of this house, purport to speak for the government, as they have in the past, and to express the views of the government.

Mr. Sinclair: Never.

Mr. Fulton: Oh yes, they have. I am not saying that this particular parliamentary assistant has done so outside, but others have made speeches outside, on agricultural matters, which the minister has had to, shall I say, correct if not repudiate.

Mr. Gardiner: I have never corrected reports of my assistant's speeches. I have enough trouble correcting reports of my own speeches.

Mr. Fulton: This is a serious matter, Mr. Speaker, opening as it does a breach in this principle of cabinet solidarity. I know that parliamentary assistants are not paid as much as our cabinet ministers, and I do not begrudge them their salaries in so far as they do the work and get an insight into the workings of the government; but for my own part I believe that when they accept that appointment as parliamentary assistant they should then see to it that, on all matters of national policy and matters which are issues of the moment, they take care not to go off at a tangent from the government. If they do so, and if that practice is persisted in and enlarged, as it undoubtedly would be, it would mean the end of the principle of cabinet solidarity. Having said that, perhaps we can leave the matter for the moment.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer, and which arises out of the speech of the hon. member who has just concluded his remarks, before I turn to the subject I myself wish to discuss this afternoon. He referred to the statement of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) and implied that he was careless with figures. I am informed by the hon. member for Broadview that the figures he used with respect to the strength of the British armed forces—and I point out that they were with respect to the armed forces, not just army—were given to him by the British information office in this city just shortly before he spoke.

The other matter was an attempt by the hon. member to suggest that the hon. member for Broadview had evaded the question of how the manpower for the armed forces should be raised. Once again I regret that the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) appears to have worked diligently but in a rather misplaced fashion; because if he had been more disposed really to study that speech in order to see if there were suggestions in it, he would have found that the hon. member for Broadview laid down a specific and clear-cut six-point program incorporating his suggestions as to how our armed forces should be raised.

This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word or two with respect to the program outlined so far by the government for the purpose of placing this country in a position to meet the crisis in international affairs with which we are now faced. I hope I will not be thought to be unduly critical when I say that what we have had so far are, in the main, broad generalizations—an indication of goals or objectives—but not much in the way of detail as to how we are to get them. The broad objectives are all very well and are of course an essential part of the information we must have in order to assess the merits or otherwise of the government's programs for this and succeeding years; but what I think we must concern ourselves with more than ever is the question of whether the plans are adequate even to meet the objectives which the government has laid down. In other words we must say to the government, "You have told us what you are going to do. You are going to raise so many men for national defence and spend so many billions of dollars—$5 billion in the next three years—on arming and equipping those forces. That is all very well, but now tell us how you propose to do it."

My own views with respect to the methods to be followed in the raising of our defence forces are on the record both in and out of this house. Nothing that has occurred since has caused me in the slightest degree to modify or change those views; I still hold and advocate them as strongly as ever. But the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has told us that the government does not propose to change its methods for the time being. While I do not in any way accept this answer as final or satisfactory, I do not propose at this moment to elaborate my own views but rather to deal with the government's program in the light of the present facts and within the limitations of the government's own policy. I believe that those facts show that the government's policy is inadequate and that its program will not work.

However, just before turning to an examination of this program, I should say that I support to the full the remarks made on Monday last by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) to the effect that the urgency of the situation is such that the government should lose no time in putting itself in a position where other and more vigorous steps, actually in the contemplation of the Prime Minister himself, can be taken to place this country in a position of readiness. The words of the hon. member for Nanaimo were so significant and they put the whole position so clearly that I think I am justified in reading them into the record again. They are found at page 99 of Hansard of February 5 and are as follows:

> It would, however, seem to me only common prudence that the government should at this time set up the machinery which may be necessary to accelerate its method of enlistment, its method of assigning the manpower of the country to the various services and to industry, agriculture, transport and all the rest of it. If these steps are left to the eleventh hour I feel that it will not be possible to take full advantage of the resources of this country, both in manpower and in materials. Therefore I feel there is no time to be lost in carrying out a review both of our assets and of our deficiencies. I feel that that review should be carried out at once so that the government will be in a position to change its present method of providing for the expansion which has been indicated, should the methods that it proposes to follow immediately fail, or should the situation deteriorate to such an extent that other methods would have to be followed. There is no time to be lost in making the preparations and in setting up the machinery so that a more vigorous system of supplying the material and the personnel for expansion can be followed, and to set up this machinery there are many requirements.

The reasons why I feel that the urgency of the situation justifies those remarks appear quite clearly from the statements of the ministers themselves. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) have both told us that the international situation was never more serious. Then the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) followed with an outline of what this government's program is to meet that situation. You will remember that he gave us fifteen points and in general outlined a program calling for expansion of our armed forces to 115,000 men and the expenditure of $5 billion. What this house and the country should now be told is when this program is to be completed and by what means. Is the government ready with its specific proposals now as to how the men, materials and money are to be found to fulfil that program?

Nothing said so far justifies the hope that they are ready. Personally I doubt it.

I hope the ministers are ready with their detailed proposals. I hope the estimates are ready so that as soon as this debate is over, which will probably be in a short time now, we can examine the details of how the defence department proposes to raise, equip and train the men, and how the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) proposes to procure the raw materials on which so large a part of the $5 billion will be spent. Are the estimates of the defence production department ready? Is the government ready to set up that department immediately? I hope they are and I believe the people hope so too, so they will know the government is ready with action to meet this emergency and to fulfil the program which they themselves have outlined.

No one knows, Mr. Speaker, just how long we may have. We can talk about programs, but the Russians in Europe and the Chinese in Asia are calling the shots.

We may have a year or two years or three years, but we may only have as many months. What plans has the government to deal with the situation which will develop if it should turn out that we have only a month or two or three months? When he spoke on Thursday, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) certainly did not indicate that he would have any substantial part of his program in operation within six months.

I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is ready with his budget and his other proposals as to how best to raise the money to make this tremendous effort. Is he ready particularly with his program and proposals as to how the present inflationary pressure is to be arrested? How does he propose to see to it that this $5 billion is pumped into our already tight-stretched economy without aggravating inflation to the extent referred to by Mr. Donald Gordon in his speech that has already been quoted in this house? This house and the country will want to know what plans the minister and the government have for dealing with inflation if it should actually reach the point referred to by Mr. Gordon, when it becomes that most dreaded of all things—runaway inflation.

And incidentally, Mr. Speaker, how much further does the government feel that we have to go before that point is reached? I wonder whether the government appreciates to the full the dreadful squeeze which is being felt now by the consumers of this country—the ordinary men and women of Canada. The people of this country are in a position where they desperately need something to be done now to help them. Prices have already gone up enormously and the trend is being aggravated by every statement that the government makes threatening further and increasing shortages of both basic materials and consumer commodities. Of course prices are bound to go up when such statements are made and so much money is pumped into the stream of competitive buying, and no steps are taken to control the pressure. This house and the country, Mr. Speaker, will want something better than the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on Thursday, which when you analyse it amounted to nothing much more than a lame plea that we cannot really do anything by locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen.

And incidentally, it is very noteworthy what a different and timorous attitude the government takes this time from its attitude previously with respect to measures to control inflation. We all remember how, particularly in the post-war years, when we thought we were back again to a peacetime economy and controls were being discussed, the government used to boast about the promptitude with which it had acted in 1941 to keep costs down by its anti-inflationary program. We all remember how they used to boast—and with, I think, justifiable pride—that when the Americans came to work out a program to check inflation and rising costs there they studied carefully the Canadian machinery and adopted much of it in great detail. In other words, Canada acted first and the government boasted about it in the last war, and has always taken credit previously for its own ability to control its own affairs with respect to rising costs in this country on that occasion. This time, however, what an unfortunate reversal of attitude! The government now says that Canada itself can do nothing to control inflation but that the whole situation here depends upon what is done south of the border, and that we must wait for them to do it first. This country is experiencing on every hand today the outward expression of the inward policy of do-nothing Liberalism. The Minister of Trade and Commerce confirmed this when he said on Thursday, as quoted on page 186 of Hansard:

> We earnestly hope our American neighbours will succeed in attaining a reasonable measure of stability; for only if that happens can we in Canada hope to avoid serious trouble.

Mr. Speaker, this sort of attitude and this sort of policy on the part of a government which is responsible to the Canadian people is not sufficient to satisfy this house and this country, which want to know what the government proposes to do to arrest the present inflationary pressures.

What plans have the ministers and the government for dealing with this situation if we should be faced with all-out war in one, two or three months instead of years? It is the responsibility of the government to prepare for this eventuality. So far the only thing we have heard of a concrete nature is that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) expects to be ready at the end of three years—and there are grave doubts, on the basis of past records and performance, that he—or anyone else in this government—will be ready by then. So I hope the Minister of Finance and the other departments are ready with their detailed plans, proposals and answers; because, Mr. Speaker, my firm belief is that just as soon as this debate is over parliament must get down to a thorough scrutiny of the state of this nation's preparedness and of the government's plans to prepare the nation.

In particular we will want an assurance that the goods on which it is proposed to spend this five billion dollars are or will be available within the time required. What plans has the government to gear our industrial machine to the production of those specific goods and materials? Short of this assurance and outline to this house by the responsible ministers, the proposals referred to by the Minister of National Defence on Monday must be considered as paper plans.

This is no new situation that we face. This emergency has been in the contemplation of the western democracies for three years now —and we are not ready yet. I wish I could believe that the plans and programs hinted at are more than mere words; but in the light of past performance it is difficult to believe so. Let us look at the record.

In March of 1948, to go back no further, the deflnite possibility of immediate war being thrust upon us was faced. The Winnipeg Free Press reported on March 10, 1948, three years ago next month:

> Washington, March 10 (BUP)—United States military authorities in Germany have given up their belief that the world is relatively safe from war for at least ten years.
> Informed senate sources said Tuesday this was a gist of a report made behind closed doors Monday to the senate armed services committee. It came from James Forrestal, defence secretary.
> These sources said the military authorities are not necessarily predicting war. But they feel, it was said, that recent events make it necessary to reconsider their earlier estimates. Among the military experts reportedly cited by Forrestal was Gen. Lucius Clay who as United States commander in Europe has to deal with Soviet occupation forces in Germany and Austria.

Then, Mr. Speaker, to show how serious this situation was in 1948, the report concludes with these words:

> Forrestal's testimony was credited with prompting the armed services committee to call immediate hearings on the controversial universal military training bill.

We are of course entitled to assume that our government was informed of that view and of the extreme gravity of the situation at that time. At that moment our armed forces were from 35 per cent to 37 per cent below their actual authorized strength and approximately 45 per cent below even the modest ceilings then set. Yet seven days later, on March 17, 1948, the Minister of National Defence assured this house that all was well and that good progress was being made.

The government did know at that time of the seriousness of the situation because the very next day, March 18, 1948, the prime minister, the late Mr. Mackenzie King—a man not given to strong statements—apparently told the Liberal party members in caucus that "the international situation had never, even in the days of Hitler, been more critical". This was three years ago next month at a time when we had only 33,000 men in our three services. Yet today after three years and the expenditure of billions of dollars we have only 62,000. The estimate for Russia and her satellites at that time was 5,032,000 men of which 4,000,000 were Russian, estimated to be fully trained and equipped. No one knows exactly how many more the Russians have now, but everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, that the Russians have not failed to make good use of the time. And yet two and a half years after the events to which I have referred, last June when a further move in the Red campaign of aggression was made in Korea, Canada was found with no army ready to send. We had had the Atlantic pact—we had had big words—we had spent much money on defence, but the strange and deplorable fact is that June of 1950 found us with no army ready to be sent into action in the defence of democracy. And when in September of 1950, reluctantly, the decision was taken to send some troops it was necessary to raise a special force which could not be ready as a force for a year anyway. And all three services were still far below their then authorized strength.

We are told we now have 62,000 men in the three services. It has taken us three years then to build up from 33,000 to 62,000; and now we are told that we have another three-year plan—and will then have 115,000 servicemen and 33,000 civilians, a total of 148,000 actually engaged in national defence. That, Mr. Speaker, is just one per cent of our present population: and three years to get there. And if we are still as far short then of our objective as we are now we will not have attained even that limited objective.

This house therefore will want definite answers from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) on how he proposes to raise those numbers, and what are his plans for the possibility of hostilities in one, two or three months. Because time is short. He gave some figures which should arouse the greatest interest and concern. The increase for January in the three services was 2,500 men. That was the best month we have had and I understand that the department itself will be surprised if it is maintained, particularly when the competing claims of expanding defence industries are felt. But let us hope for even an average of 2,000 per month. Our objective calls for 53,000 further men for its realization: that will take twenty-six and a half more months at present rates.

So we will want to know: What are the minister's plans for an emergency? And even in the absence of an emergency, how does he propose to guide the men and women of this country, particularly the skilled tradesmen of whom there are great shortages in both the services and in industry right now? How does he propose to guide them in making their choice so that the rate of increase in the services will be maintained? It is a problem for which the government has as yet suggested no solution.

There are some other matters on which the country and the house will want information with respect to the defence program. It has been stated from time to time, in answer to criticism from this side of the house as to the rate of expansion of the services, that we are doing very well and that in any event we have not got the facilities either in equipment, which includes accommodation as well as arms, or training personnel, to handle any more than are coming in now. The question which must be asked is: Whose responsibility is that? And the answer of course is that it is the government's responsibility. Then the question is: Why have they no greater facilities? It certainly cannot be because they are satisfied they have enough men. A look at the recruiting advertisements contradicts that at once.

The answer then must be that the government just failed to make provision for these facilities. This brings to mind the known fact that last year the defence estimates presented by the minister to his colleagues were cut by some two hundred million dollars before they ever reached this house, and it is equally certain that this had a very serious effect on the program of the three services. Why then did the government mutilate its own defence program? And especially why did it do so at a time when the international situation, in its own words, was never more serious?

Why was no provision made for accommodation to handle an increasing inflow of recruits? Why is it that the special brigade could not be trained in this country because there was no accommodation available, but had to be sent to Fort Lewis—in a foreign country—for its training? The answer is not that it was in order to enable them to train in co-operation with the American forces for service in Korea, because this is not the fact. Our troops there are training by themselves. The simple fact is that with the international situation as serious as it was, this government neglected altogether to make any provision to place our training facilities and accommodation in a state of readiness to meet a situation which was developing daily. The country will want to know the reason for this, will hold the government responsible for this, and will want to have facts to assure them that the lost ground is being made up and that our resources and our ability to handle a greater intake of personnel are actually being increased to a degree commensurate with the seriousness of the emergency.

Another matter on which the country will want information, and this house should have information immediately, is just what is behind the present policy which appears to be complete Americanization of Canada's armed services. I refer not so much to the adoption of American type weapons and equipment, although even here there are grave reservations—because it is by no means a foregone conclusion that American arms are superior in every detail to British type. Indeed, in a substantial number of cases the opposite can be shown. However, from the point of view of production and availability of resources there is much to be said for the standardization of equipment, but I do wish to point out here that standardization should be a two-way and not only a one-way stream, and that in those respects where the British type equipment is superior we might standardize on those types.

But what I have in mind particularly here is the now very definitely discernible trend towards Americanizing the formations and training and conditions of service of the Canadian forces. We have an example in the use by the minister of the term the other night, "air division" instead of "group," and also the American term "combat team," which might mean almost anything, as against our much more exact term "brigade group." We now see by the press that the brigade which is to go to Europe is to serve as part of the American forces and not, as might have been expected, in accordance with tradition and geography, in company with the British forces.

There would seem to be no great reason for this trend except as part of the definite although always subterranean government policy of prying Canada loose from her traditional ties with the commonwealth and empire and tying her up ever more tightly with the United States. Let me ask the minister this: Does the government really believe that the American tradition, the American organization and the American method of training are superior in every respect to our own and the British? If they do, on what examples from history and experience do they base their conclusions? If they do not, for what reason are they Americanizing the Canadian formations?

Mr. Claxton: There is no basis at all in fact for what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. Fulton: We will have more to say about it when the estimates are being considered. At that time perhaps the minister can explain in more detail than he has now the trend which we see in progress.

The results of this trend toward Americanization will I believe be most disastrous to the morale and fighting efficiency of Canada's army.

I will confine my remarks to that branch of the service with which I have some acquaintance and leave the others to speak for themselves. Speaking of the army, the minister himself has said that the basis of Canada's expanded army for participation in any actual war is the reserve force. The reserve force, and indeed our whole Canadian army, is built on the regimental tradition and I am convinced it is fair to state that much of the splendid record established by the Canadian units and formations in two world wars has been due to the regimental spirit which has been built up.

Mr. Claxton: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: In this we model ourselves entirely on the British tradition.

Adoption of the American system means not only the complete re-organization of our supply, medical and other services but also the abandonment of this regimental system. The units will completely disappear, those splendid units from coast to coast of this country, the Canadian Scottish in Victoria, the Seaforth in Vancouver, the Loyal Edmonton Regiment, the Royal Winnipeg Rifles, the Queen's Own and the 48th Highlanders of Toronto, the Black Watch, the Carleton and York, the Nova Scotia Regiment and a score of others, to say nothing of the five named units of the permanent force—all with a tradition and history which are the very backbone of Canada's military tradition —will be swept into oblivion by necessity if we adopt the American method.

Mr. Claxton: Not at all.

Mr. Fulton: The effect on the morale of the reserve army will be immediate and disastrous. The minister has just interjected "not at all". If we adopt the United States method our formation will be based on numbers of various regiments and you will not have named units.

Mr. Claxton: There is no such intention whatever.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear the minister say that. I hope he will give us some proof of it and be able to explain the trends that we see going on when we come to his estimates. I repeat that the house and the country, and particularly those officers and men who have been struggling so gallantly to keep the reserve army alive, with so little effective assistance and support from the government, will want to know the reason behind the policy of Americanization, will want to know how far it has gone and will, I believe, insist that the trend be first stopped and then reversed.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will you answer a question now?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: Are you in favour of compulsory service in the reserve army?

Mr. Fulton: I have made my views about the method—

Mr. Cruickshank: Are you or are you not?

Mr. Fulton: —of raising, training and equipping Canada's defence forces clear. They are on the record and speak for themselves.

Mr. Cruickshank: Are you in favour of conscription now?

An hon. Member: Are you?

Mr. Cruickshank: I declared myself. I am.

Mr. Fulton: I might point out to the hon. member that I have also declared myself, and did so before he did, and received no support from him.

Mr. Cruickshank: Then say it now. Get your instructions in caucus.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have listened for a couple of weeks to this debate, and I hesitated about taking part in it. A lot of discussion has taken place on many matters, and it was all useful. As a rule I take the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne as an opportunity to air problems and grievances close to home, but at this particular time I am going to deal with what I think are the most important and serious questions confronting the parliament of Canada and the Canadian people. I am going to deal with the questions of manpower and defence, because they are so closely related.

In December of last year I was hopeful that war was a long way off and could be prevented. I pinned my hope on what had taken place at the conference of prime ministers in Great Britain. Since the end of the last war an attempt has been made by Russia largely to divide the world into two camps, communism and capitalism, and the United States foolishly fell into the trap. We all know that the bible written by Stalin is merely the bringing up to date of Leninism, and definitely tells the Russian people, and everyone within the orbit of totalitarianism today, that war between capitalism and communism is inevitable, that it has to come, that we cannot live side by side in the same world, that either the totalitarian system must go forward and conquer the world or the world will inevitably go back to the old capitalist, imperialist regime.

That seemed to be the trend in the United Nations. The trend there was to go headlong into that kind of war. In listening to broadcasts and reading the deliberations at the prime ministers' conference, I was pleased to note that the commonwealth countries and the Scandinavian countries were getting together. I thought that they were going to be able to exert sufficient influence in the United Nations to modify United States policy and perhaps prevent for a long time—possibly for all time—a head-on clash between Russia and the United States. I was very much disappointed in what happened, and I have revised my opinion that war is a long way off. We may have a year; we may have two years; we may not have a month. It depends on the timing of Uncle Joe. If he thinks the time is right he will strike, and they always do what you do not expect them to do.

I have revised my opinion as to whether war is a long way off because of the vote of the United Nations declaring China an aggressor. Last December I was very hopeful. Since the vote was taken I am not so hopeful. It was played up in the press and over the air that a large percentage of the members of the United Nations voted to declare China an aggressor. However, if you look at the figures you will see that there were 44 in favour, seven against and nine abstentions. The seven who opposed the resolution were members of the Soviet bloc representing the governments of 300 million people, and India and Burma with more than 300 million people, a total of 600 million. To that must be added the population of communist China of more than 400 million people. Therefore the seven against the resolution represented more than a billion people. The forty-four countries that voted for the resolution—and it seemed such a huge majority—have not a billion people. Therefore when you analyse the vote of the United Nations declaring China an aggressor the population of the countries that voted against the resolution or abstained is larger than that of the forty-four countries that supported it. Do not forget that practically all of the billion people opposing the resolution are within the communist orbit or can be absorbed very easily.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Does the hon. member really believe that the billion people he says were represented by the seven were in favour of what the Soviet government wanted?

Mr. Gillis: They voted against declaring China an aggressor.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Those seven representatives are not representatives at all.

Mr. Gillis: That may be your opinion but the facts are on the record.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Do you think they are?

Mr. Gillis: Yes, I do. They represent their governments.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): They represent their people?

Mr. Gillis: Yes, or they would not be there. That is how the vote is summed up. When you declare a country an aggressor, under the United Nations machinery you have got to do something about it. Otherwise you are just making a fool of that organization. That is what leads me to believe that we should not complacently proceed in this house or throughout the country on the assumption that we have a year, two years or three years to prepare. I hope we have got ten years but we should take the facts as they are. As I was suggesting a moment ago, the enemies that we may have to fight are countries that do not play the game as we do. They have no ethics and no morals. There is no particular line that can be followed by the old-time generals. They hit fast; there is no declaration of war. They fight a war on the basis of winning at all costs. Manpower means nothing to them; and if war comes it will be a fast one. We do not want to go along in this house or in the country on the assumption that we have the same set-up we had in 1939-40. We have not. In 1939 we had a million people unemployed in this country from whom we could draw. We had a very small national income. We had all kinds of room for industrial expansion, and we had the manpower on which we could do a fast job; and I think we did an excellent job.

Today the situation is different. The manpower position is very tight. If you had to do a fast job today I do not know where you would get the manpower. Look at the last statistical survey on the labour force in Canada issued by the Department of Labour. You will find very few spots where you can siphon off people who may be non-essential to the economy. We have a working force of approximately five million, and they are all in industries essential if the economy is to be kept moving, or industries which would have to be converted for war purposes; and if you convert them for war purposes you are increasing your manpower problem. You may get a few from those employed in trade, such as in retail stores and that sort of thing, where some 331,000 are now employed. You may get a few from the 72,000 in finance and insurance, though they would not be very good soldiers; they are not tough enough. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would not want to don a uniform and slug it out again. In general services across the country you have another 451,000 employees. So looking at that statistical survey we find that we have approximately 818,000 people to draw from. How many of those are fit and how many are unfit; how many would be any good for combat service and that sort of thing, I do not know, but that is about the only force in Canada on which you could draw today.

In the meantime the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) plans a large industrial expansion. He has to expand steel, and I say that is a must; that has to be done. But if he is going to expand steel he will need a great many more people in the steel industry, and I do not know where he is going to get them except from the group I have mentioned. So there is a great difference between our manpower problem in Canada today and the problem in 1939-40; and we must start doing some serious thinking about it.

On the other hand there are some spots we may draw from, and I have a few suggestions to make. First I would refer to the Canadian Legion's preparedness program. I must say I think it was badly timed. That program of compulsory training in the reserve forces could not be implemented in this country for some considerable time because we do not have the facilities for training soldiers. Take a look at your reserve army set-up from Vancouver clean down to Cape Breton, and what do you see? You do not have to leave Ottawa. The barracks in this city leave much to be desired; that is about as kind as I can be. The facilities are terrible. So I think we will have to undertake a vast building program to provide barracks for reserve army training in this country, because I believe the reserve army must be the base of our army for the future. That is where the training will have to take place. I quite agree with the program of the Legion, except that I believe it was badly timed and could not be put into operation for some considerable time.

Then there is the type of training the reserve army is getting. Most of it belongs to the Boer war. They get a little bit of foot drill in the evenings. In many sections of the country you call a parade for two hours in the evening, and you will have perhaps six officers and four men turn up. Well, four men do not want to be shouted at by six officers, and the officers are in the position that they just have not the facilities; and no one is pushing the thing very hard. I believe someone will have to take a look at the whole reserve army set-up and see that it is provided with facilities so that a proper type of training may be carried on. Even the types of weapons used in the last war are obsolete today. If the reserve army is to be properly trained it should have up-to-date weapons and be taught how to use them, together with all the modern techniques. I believe training for two weeks in the summer is too short. The first week you are in camp you are busy getting the tents up and getting settled, so nothing is done. It takes three days of the second week to tear the tents down again, so they figure why bother with the remaining three days, and go have a beer. As a result not much training is done. I believe that training should be extended to at least a month.

Then I do not believe industry in this country, or even the civil service, gave proper co-operation in permitting men to go to camp. For example, I know one industry that has a contract with its employees. If you are off a certain number of days in a month or a year you may be declared an habitual absentee and are liable to lose your employment. Men actually have lost their employment for this reason. I know some boys who went to camp last year for eight days. When they came back they were given slips notifying them that they had violated their contract and were considered habitual absentees. There is no incentive in that kind of treatment for a young fellow to take training. Worse than that, this industry pays a bonus at the end of the year. I know some young fellows who went as instructors and spent thirty days in camp. When they came back they were notified that they were absentees, so they lost 50 per cent of their yearly bonus. Someone in the government will have to check on employers of that kind. That is quite a large organization, too. I do not want to name it. That sort of thing must be corrected, however, because I believe the reserve army has to be built up as the base of our army for the future.

Then I do not want to see manpower made available in the ways I think are developing. For example, on Saturday I noticed in the press that 3,500 employees of General Motors at Oshawa had been laid off. If that kind of economic conscription is going to take place for military purposes, I think it is bad and should be clarified. No one can tell me that a shortage of materials developed so quickly that it necessitated laying off that number of men in that short time. I hope it is not a matter now of just rooting them out of what you may term non-essential industries in order to pressure them into the service. That is the worst kind of conscription, and I think the government should say this is not government policy and they are not in favour of it.

Another thing I did not like was the cut-back in housing; and I see the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) is in his seat. I think that cut-back was one of the worst things that could have happened. We are going to need more and more housing. If anything serious develops which necessitates Canada making an all-out effort we are going to have to augment our manpower supply through immigration, both for military and industrial purposes, because with the manpower situation today I do not see how we can expand our economy very much and have any left to go into the services. So we may need wholesale immigration and we may need it fast. I think the cabinet did the minister a disservice when they ordered him to cut housing in this country, because I know he would not do it himself. I believe that program should have been stepped up in order to prepare for what may be an eventuality.

In my opinion this is not a situation that is going to be cleared up by tomorrow. It is a situation that is going to keep the Canadian people, and the people of this continent, on their toes for the rest of our lifetime. While we are not a military nation we have to face up to the threat from the people outside. If we let our bars down and show any signs of weakness, these people will take advantage of it. Our only chance to keep peace in the world for any length of time is to show the other fellow we are ready to fight if he wants to fight. We are not looking for a fight, but it is being forced on us whether we like it or not. I should like the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) to take another look at the housing problem and see whether the government will permit him to go ahead with a better housing program than he had before. I am sure that if he is short of lumber the member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and several others can tell him where to get plenty of lumber. British Columbia is full of it.

There is another way in which we could perhaps augment our labour force. There are hundreds of men in this country on pensions who are still productive, but the means test in the old age pension and war veterans allowance prevents them from taking employment. I believe the abolition of that means test in the war veterans allowance and old age pension would return to service many men who are still capable of doing some work. If the average boy drawing war veterans allowance takes a job and earns over a small amount, then his allowance is cut off. He has to go through all the red tape in order to have it restored. Most of them will just sit there. There are hundreds of men in this category who could be used, not in the heavy industries, but for replacing men who are doing light work who are capable of doing other types of work that are more essential.

For the benefit of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) I might say that there are hundreds of able-bodied men doing clerical work in the defence department who could be replaced by women. I believe the minister should take a look at that. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) enters this picture, too. Women are not going to go into industry unless there is some tax incentive given to them. If the average woman goes out and earns a few hundred dollars, her husband is declared a single man for tax purposes and has to pay at that rate. I believe that in order to augment our labour force the women should be utilized, and some compensation should be given to them if they do go to work. I believe it is necessary for everyone to get in and pitch.

On the point mentioned by the member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), the standardization of arms, I think our men in Korea are in a spot. The United States has established and is maintaining the supply lines to Korea. If something happens to a Canadian mortar and a part is needed, they have to send to Canada for it. There is nothing in Korea. While depots have been established by the United States, our fellows cannot use American ammunition because they have different types of weapons. It is an awkward position. I do not need to tell the Minister of Finance how awkward that is. He recalls how, during the first war, we had to wait until some poor Tommy was killed in order to get his rifle because that big long pole which we had, the Ross rifle, was no good. Until we were furnished with English arms we just gathered up English equipment, and I believe that is pretty much the situation in Korea.

In my opinion the standardization of arms program should be speeded up. With all due respect for the opinions expressed by the member for Kamloops, I do not believe it is possible for us to stick to British type weapons today. The British have already agreed upon standardization with the United States. These forces are no longer the forces of any particular nation. They are the United Nations' forces. We are all in one pool. The United States has the machinery for production. They can turn it out faster than anyone else. We are all fighting together anyway, and it is just as well to have one type of equipment throughout. I believe standardization should have taken place a long time ago.

I should like to say one word on this matter of civil defence. I am not going to enlarge upon it at all because another member of this group is going to do so. Civil defence in Canada is in a pretty bad way. I believe that it is in better shape in Nova Scotia than it is in the rest of Canada. We have a very good fire marshal in the provincial government who has been working on this problem for the past two years. I believe we have pretty complete standardization of equipment in that province today, and that has to happen straight across the country. The thought I should like to leave with the minister responsible for that particular arm of defence is that, as soon as possible, civil defence should be divorced from military control. It should be organized on a local level. Villages and towns could co-ordinate in areas where they can work together. It should not be centralized in Ottawa, and it should not be under the military arm at all. There should be a department of civil defence. During the last war in Britain it was handled almost exclusively, and very effectively, by the local authorities in the towns and villages. I believe that is the way it should be done here.

Since the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is in his seat and has announced plans for expanding the steel industry, I should like to direct a remark to him. When I came to this house I was rather surprised that there was a shortage of steel. From discussions in this house I was under the impression right along, of course, that there was a shortage, but I read a statement made by the head of one of the large corporations in December. It was made to a yacht club, and was to the effect that there was no shortage of steel in this country. He said they could not market all the steel they were producing. It might not be a bad idea to get together with that fellow. He may be hoarding steel somewhere. If there is to be an expansion of the steel industry, as I have suggested many times in this house, the logical place for that expansion is at Sydney, Nova Scotia. There is iron ore and a supply of men at that point. You have all the facilities, coal and everything bundled together. It is a good spot for expansion. I believe the company has some plans for it, but it might not do any harm to prod them a bit.

Mr. Howe: I was doing that this afternoon.

Mr. Gillis: I hope the plate mill down there has not been forgotten. The shipbuilding industry will be reopening and that mill could be used. It should be done as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to conclude by saying that I associate myself with the remarks made by the member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) a few days ago. He made an excellent speech for the maritime provinces, and pleaded for the decentralization of industry as well as a greater recognition of the economy of those maritime provinces. I do not want to repeat anything he said, and because he said it so well I am not going to say anything about it this afternoon.

Mr. J. L. Gibson (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to join with those who have taken part in congratulating the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) on the excellent speeches which they made. I believe they should be congratulated on another score, for having won their by-elections. Since I came here in 1945 the history of the Liberal party in by-elections has been very bad. I believe they must have been good men to win by the majority that they did.

I have been rather surprised that there has not been more support for this excellent brief prepared by the Canadian Legion, "Operation Preparedness". It seems to me that their suggestion that we have a national registration now is one that should be given careful consideration by the government. I realize that there are many problems and difficulties which would arise with regard to superimposing a national registration on a census, but it does not seem to me that those problems should be insuperable. It seems to me that we could use the same organization that we set up for the census in order to take this national registration. I am sure the government is giving consideration at the present time to this national registration and I sincerely trust that they will try to avoid the mistakes that were undoubtedly made the last time we had one, which was in 1941. I would presume that the government this time would be prepared to tie in our national registration with rationing.

Then there is another suggestion that also might be considered by the government, namely that it might be a wise thing if they were to consider having a fingerprint put on these national registration cards this time. We are in an entirely different type of warfare this time, and we do not want any phony registration cards running around. I would think that fingerprinting might be of great use in case there were any sabotage in the future. Certainly there are some people in this country who will object strenuously to that procedure, but my own experience has been that anyone who is an honest citizen has no hesitation about having himself positively identified under any circumstances.

The second request of the Canadian Legion is for modernization of defence resources and defence production. I believe that this brief was drawn up some time ago and that at that time there was probably some validity for the Canadian Legion's request. But after having listened to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), having seen the figures they have given us—80,000 contracts have been let for defence supplies and materials—and having had the ministers tell us what their program is to be, I believe that the Canadian Legion and all members of the House of Commons will be reasonably well satisfied that our government is proceeding vigorously with this particular phase of our preparedness.

I now come to the third request, and many speakers have already given their views on it. I am quite sure that the Minister of National Defence is not particularly happy with the results he has obtained so far in response to his request that people should join the reserve forces. The problem is this: What is he to do about it and what assistance can we, as members of the House of Commons, be in helping the government to obtain reasonable enlistments in the reserve forces? The Canadian Legion suggests that we should have compulsory service. I realize that there are great problems in putting into effect any program for compulsory service. Immediately one brings in compulsion, one has to think about means of enforcing that policy. There is also the consideration that in large cities we have facilities such as those mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis); we have armouries and the necessary facilities there. In the small communities, of course, we cannot have those. I should like to see the government make some move to give the Canadian people an appreciation of the fact that we intend to try to do something about the education of our people in some form of national defence. I do not think it particularly necessary that men should go out, put up a machine gun and take it down and have ack-ack battery practice. That in itself is only one phase of our national defence. It would seem to me that in any reserve force services we could well allow first-aid instruction, fire drill instruction, decontamination instruction—and there are many other things of that kind that would serve just as well—to give our young men in this country some useful knowledge in case they are called upon to use it.

I want to congratulate warmly the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) on what I thought was a particularly constructive speech. Whenever I hear the hon. member speak, the thought crosses my mind that he too seldom gives us the benefit of his great experience and the true wisdom that he has always displayed in this House of Commons. It seems to me that his suggestion that Canada might make her maximum contribution by concentrating more on air power than on other phases of our national defence is one that should be given great consideration by the government. From the statement made by the Minister of National Defence I can see that that is to be done.

There is another phase of national defence in which Canadians have shown particular ability, namely in our navy. I think that the contribution made by our navy in the escort service during the last war is one that contributed greatly to the allied victory. I am sure that next time, with Russia having concentrated a great deal on submarines, Canada's defence effort could be well served if we had a competent navy such as we had in the last struggle.

I am glad to note that we had from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) the announcement that he was setting up a national advisory council on manpower. Knowing the minister as I do, I am quite convinced that he has no particular intention of using this body as a place to which to pass hot potatoes or anything of that kind but that he really thinks that something worth while can be done by it. The great task of this council, of course, is to try to see just how we can divert our manpower into phases that will produce greater productivity in Canada. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy) was worth while. He suggested that possibly we could approach our labour leaders in Canada and suggest to them that they might be willing to increase the work week in this country of men working forty hours a week and that they might be willing, as part of their contribution to Canadian defence, to allow their men to work forty-four hours a week. The resulting increase in productivity would be valuable to the nation. I am also sure that the extra take-home pay these men would have would help in solving many of their financial problems.

I think that the suggestion made by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), coupled today with that of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, was a good one, namely that we should allow increased income for our pensioners and for those who are drawing war veterans' allowance. If we also allowed them to contribute to our production in Canada I think they would make a worth-while contribution because there are many skills available to us in that segment of our Canadian citizenship.

We have another source of manpower which I know the government is counting on, namely the 150,000 immigrants whom the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) has said he hoped to get into Canada this year. I sincerely trust that conditions develop which make it possible for those people to come here. After we get to that point, where do we look for the other manpower that is going to be necessary to take care of the increase we need in our production? I was going to suggest to the minister that he might consider our gold-mining industry. It has been suggested that we need gold in this country like we need a third leg in a pair of pants, and I am somewhat inclined to believe that is possibly true. We have 23,000 skilled men working in the industry coupled with, I should say, another 50,000 men who are probably providing them with goods and services, together with all the materials that go into the production of gold. I am quite sure that our communist friends must get quite a chuckle out of it when we have our minister of defence production get up here and tell us that he is short of critical minerals and then tell us that our greatest mining labour force in Canada is digging out gold that we take over to the border, for which we take a few American pieces of paper, and which they take and put back down in the ground in Kentucky. I am quite sure that nobody, other than on economic grounds, could suggest that that procedure even made any sense at all. It certainly does not make any contribution in Canada.

Mr. Murray (Cariboo): What would you use in place of it?

Mr. Gibson: I am sure that Mr. Hitler fought quite a substantial war without having any at all. I am not sure that our Russian friends are taking any of their manpower and putting them into the production of gold, because I have never heard of Russia's gold production. We see very little of it in this country. They seem to be doing very well without it. After all, if the gold is in the mines we know it is there, and I would be quite prepared, if the gold was blocked out in the ore bodies, to support the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) if he decided to issue a certain amount of currency against the gold in the ground. It might as well be in the ground in Canada as in a cave in Kentucky.

I realize that some of our gold-mining friends in these communities which are dependent upon gold production will feel that is a very harsh suggestion to make. I am very sympathetic toward the gold mining industry. It is the one industry that has not increased the selling price of its production. Everything else has doubled and trebled in value. I would suggest that under normal circumstances we should probably revalue the price of gold and put it up to $50 an ounce. It seems to me that that amount would be much more in keeping with its true value than what it is worth at its present price, namely, $36.50 an ounce. Such a course however would be too inflationary at this time.

I was disappointed to read in the speech from the throne that the government intends to extend assistance to the gold-mining industry. I see the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham) in his seat. He looks a little unhappy about the suggestion of mine. I certainly hate to hand a lemon like that to a young man who has just gone into the cabinet and is trying very hard to do a first-class job, and which I am sure he will do. However, there is one thing I would say. I am sure he would make a greater contribution to Canada's war effort if he took the manpower now engaged in gold mining and put it into the mining of strategic minerals, because I am sure there are all kinds of them in Canada that could be got out and used for national defence purposes.

There is another suggestion I should like to make but I hardly think that the government will adopt it. Any time we ever talk about anything which affects the press the government usually heads for a foxhole. The same thing is true of the opposition. It is very unpopular to do anything in this country that our friends from the newspapers do not like. I have said before that we lose millions of dollars in the Post Office Department by carrying newspapers containing the exploits of little Orphan Annie back and forth across this country at the taxpayers' expense. I do not think that it makes much of a contribution to our national welfare; but at any time that particular saving is brought up in this house everybody ducks for cover. Therefore, when I suggest that probably we are producing a little too much newsprint in Canada I wonder whether the government will go along with that suggestion either. It would seem to me that a great many of the logs that are being chewed up for newsprint could very well be turned to the production of lumber. I think probably we could get along with about half the production of newsprint in Canada that we have at the present time. Where are we sending it all? Ninety per cent of it goes down to the United States which is used of course to advertise and create a great demand for consumer goods which the United States government is trying to control. That is government policy down there. Another thing, they use it of course to produce funny papers or to glorify the Kentucky colonel, Colonel McCormick. I do not believe any of these things are essential to the prosecution of a war effort in any democratic country. If it did not mean such a tremendous waste of our great national resources and of manpower one would not object to it so much. Then there is the fact that Europe is desperately short of newsprint.

We have a story to tell in Europe. I am not too sure that some of the members of the Atlantic pact are so much sold on democracy as we should like to believe. When you come to Europe and to Great Britain you find that they have little two, three or four-page newspapers. They need more Canadian newsprint to tell a story. I do not think it is fair. I would think that the minister of defence production or this government could enter into some kind of arrangement with the United States to cut down our shipment of newsprint to that country. Just recently I noticed an editorial in the Ottawa Journal in which it was said that one copy of a paper down in the United States had three and a quarter pounds of newsprint in it. Some of the papers in that country have a circulation of half a million. It just occurred to me that half a million of these newspapers, each weighing three and a quarter pounds, represent a million feet of timber, enough timber to build a hundred houses.

I realize that the United States must have newsprint, but at the same time it seems to me they could use it in moderation. Our government should do something about bringing it to their attention, and not let them be as wasteful as they would sometimes like to be.

There is another thing that I should like to call to the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). I personally was disappointed, and it was a disappointment to many people in British Columbia, when the Alberta natural resources conservation board refused a permit for the piping of gas to British Columbia. It seems to me that this is one time when selfish provincial interests should not be allowed to stand in the way of our greater national interest. I would like to feel that my good friend, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), would discuss the matter with some of his colleagues in Alberta. After all, we might point out to them that British Columbia and Ontario also have certain natural resources. Ontario happens to have all the nickel. Ontario, therefore, might easily say, we do not want any nickel to go to Alberta. They do not need it there; we need it all here in Ontario. British Columbia has a lot of fir timber. Maybe we have not enough to spare any to Alberta. If we are to go ahead with the policy of Balkanizing Canada it will lead to disastrous results. I would certainly hope that the Alberta government—half the province out there will burn anyway in one form or another, oil, coal and gas—would show some evidence of real statesmanship, some evidence of their real concern for the welfare of Canada and try to get that gas piped out to the Pacific coast. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) of course is very insistent that it go through a certain pass, and I still hope that it will go that way. But before we get into any trouble I would like to have that Alberta gas in Vancouver and in the Pacific northwest.

I am glad that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is now taking on added duties. He is going to be minister of defence production, along with his other jobs. It certainly seems to me that the old adage works in the House of Commons the way it works elsewhere. You always pile a little more on the willing horse. I am certainly glad to give a man of his training and capacity the opportunity to take care of that job for us. I hope that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) will look around that galaxy of talent that he has—all these young fellows and the older men who are willing to do so much more than they are allowed to do today. If they were to create another minister or two over there I do not think that even our financial critics would object too much to it. I hope that we do not work the senior men of the cabinet too hard; because if we should get into trouble we want their experience and advice.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has probably heard something about the steel industry we have been trying to promote in British Columbia for a long time. I trust that he will give the matter his usual careful attention. I hope the time will come when we shall have a steel industry there. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) suggested that we could increase steel production in Cape Breton South. Probably we can increase our steel production in British Columbia also.

I would point out that in Comox-Alberni we have substantial deposits of high-grade magnetite ore.

Mr. Sinclair: No gold?

Mr. Gibson: We have a little gold out there. We will leave that in the ground for a while. We have great deposits of magnetite iron ore on Vancouver island close to tidewater. The minister does not need much coaching from me—he does very well without that—but I would certainly hope that he will see if we can get some of it into production. I do not think he will have to contribute any of Canada's money to it either, because I believe private enterprise will do it. I should like to see him facilitate in every way the use of the iron ore on the Pacific coast. I have an idea we may get some of that steel back into Canada and thus assist in relieving some of the shortages which are bound to develop.

This was not a bad speech from the throne, despite the fact that some people have said there was nothing in it. I was gratified to see that the government had come to realize the plight of pensioners in Canada. I was quite sure that, once the government had recognized the justice of the demand made by civil servants for increased wages to take care of the increased cost of living, it would do something for the pensioners. It must be a source of great satisfaction to those pensioners, as well as to all members in the house, that this move is foreshadowed in the speech from the throne.

The government must never forget one thing, namely the great difficulty faced by people on fixed incomes. It is good to see that those people are recognized in His Excellency's speech.

The Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) is not in the house at the moment. From various quarters of the house I have heard him criticized for having made announcements that building loans under the National Housing Act are to be cut. I do not know what measure of justification there was for his announcement, nor do I know how wise it was from a psychological standpoint. However, if one may judge from the figures placed on Hansard the other day by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in view of the situation with respect to bathroom fixtures and soil pipe, and builder's hardware, it does not appear necessary to discourage the starting of more housing units.

However, I do not go along with what was said by the hon. and gracious member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). She seemed to feel that because the city of Hamilton was short of houses, and because its population had increased from 150,000 to 200,000, the federal government should be primarily concerned. I think sometimes the people of Canada are inclined to believe that the government's excursion into the mortgage and building field has been such that we are now required to use reasonable prudence and businesslike judgment in how we handle matters connected with housing.

I have an idea that lending values in Canada have gone up to a pretty high point. It was made comparatively easy in this country to become a home owner. Only a small down payment was required, with the result that many people assumed mortgages far beyond their means.

I would suggest to the hon. member for Hamilton West that at least a minor part of the housing problem could be met by the Steel Company of Canada, or the Studebaker Corporation or the International Harvester Company, or any other large company in that city. After all, if any one of them brings in a hundred new trucks as part of its operating equipment, it would have to build garages so as to keep them out of the snow. But if they bring in 20,000 extra employees, they immediately turn to the Minister of Resources and Development and ask for houses. It seems to me that we have reached the time in this country when employers might take a little more interest in their employees' houses, and give them some assistance in that respect. I believe those companies could probably bring about some savings which private enterprise can effect much better than any form of government bureaucracy I have ever seen, or anyone else.

A number of industrial units in the logging business in my constituency have looked over the National Housing Act. They have been offered money under its provisions; but they have said, "Nothing doing. We cannot afford such a luxury, with all that red tape and regulations." I know of one outfit in my own riding that has built two hundred houses for its employees in the last four years. It was offered a government loan to the extent of $175,000 for the first one hundred units, but after looking over that offer the company decided there was too much red tape. They said that if they built the houses according to government specifications they would have to rent them for $40 a month, and that they did not believe their employees wanted to pay that much.

Instead of accepting the government money they went ahead and built their own houses. They have about two hundred of them at the present time which rent for $21 a month. The employees of that concern are ahead of the game to the extent of $19 or $20 a month. The houses are just as good as would have been built under the National Housing Act.

Mr. Graydon: Not all people work for big companies.

Mr. Gibson: The small company could build three or four houses. However, I accept the hon. member's point. On the other hand most men work for some company, or work for themselves. I am not asking that the National Housing Act be discontinued, but I still think it would be an excellent idea, if, instead of shifting the problem to the municipal, provincial and federal authorities, some of the employers in the country got up and scratched for themselves, and did something for themselves once in a while, without coming here all the time asking for help.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Gibson: When the house rose at six o'clock I had almost finished my remarks, but there has been so much discussion about inflation that I think I should take a crack at that subject also. I believe anybody who really knows the situation must recognize of course that the present level of inflation in Canada and the present purchasing value of our dollar merely reflect the amount of water that the government saw fit to pump into our currency in order to win the last war. I do not think anyone in the house would blame them for the action they took at that time. After all, it was a universal method that was adopted to try to finance that great struggle.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): And nothing since then.

Mr. Gibson: Of course it is always fashionable to look for a goat at a time like this, but I think we all must recognize what the government has done. Possibly I have been giving them a little too much praise. Once in a while they may need a little dusting-down. On the other hand, in order to be fair I think we have to recognize the fact that they have done a pretty good job since 1946 in producing balanced budgets, and indeed budgets that had substantial surpluses. Every time that those surpluses were announced there was a great deal of criticism in the house and throughout the country that the government was taking money unduly and robbing the taxpayers. I believe the very fact they did that has kept our price level within the reasonable bounds we have now.

Unfortunately our great and good neighbour to the south of us did not see fit to operate under the same kind of budgets and the effect of the good work done by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the government has been nullified almost completely by the action of the United States government in running into huge deficits at the same time. Unfortunately we in Canada cannot have a price level different from that prevailing in the United States, certainly not one which is substantially different.

It is very important that the government should address itself with real vigour and imagination to the very real problem faced by pensioners and others on low fixed incomes. I sincerely hope they will bend every effort in that direction. In due course when the Minister of Finance brings in the budget I expect that he will introduce substantial taxes on luxury goods. I think that is one way he should raise money. It is one way by which to try to discourage expenditures on non-essential items by the Canadian people. Despite the inflation everybody is talking and roaring about, I think no member of the house can stand up and say that the people of his riding are not better housed, fed and clothed, and have more economic security today than at any other time in the history of Canada.

I believe that if war is thrust upon us it will be necessary for the government to institute very definite controls in every sphere of our economic activity. When I say that I mean wage controls, rationing and the whole line-up of controls that we had in the last war. I hope the plans of the government are prepared so that they can be put into effect very rapidly if necessary. I do not want to see Canada with a menagerie of controls such as they had in the United States, rolling back prices and then rolling them up again, putting controls on and taking them off. When the government starts in to do a job of that kind I sincerely hope that they will have made up their minds and will be prepared to go ahead and make a real job of it. Until the situation develops further, I am certainly glad that we have a Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and men in his cabinet of the calibre referred to by our old friend, the great Kipling, when he says to the youth whom he is supposed to be addressing in the poem:

> If you can keep your head when all about you
> Are losing theirs and blaming it on you . . .

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, it is a very great privilege for us ordinary members of the house to have the opportunity of speaking in our free parliament and expressing ourselves on problems that we feel are closely associated with our particular ridings and with the country in general. I am very glad the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) is in the house. His riding adjoins mine, and I should like to commend him highly, together with the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) for the excellent job they did in moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne. While they were very optimistic concerning what the throne speech contained, perhaps a little more so than those of us on this side of the house, I commend them on their initial efforts.

I should like to say a word about my predecessor in office, Mr. Mark Senn, who represented the riding of Haldimand, as you know, for some twenty-eight years. I was most pleased that the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) paid tribute to him. It was naturally not my privilege to have served in the House of Commons with Mr. Senn but it was my privilege to have lived in the riding which he represented so ably and well for a period of twenty-eight years. I can perhaps best describe the feelings of the people of the riding by telling you what a very fine old lady said when she heard Mr. Senn was going to retire from public life. She said, "Well, I guess I can go back to the party I was associated with some twenty-eight years ago."

His funeral service was attended by thousands of people from every walk of life rich and poor, young and old, people who had come from far and near. One could not help but feel that we were writing the closing chapter in a book of a life of service to this country. Canada has lost a great citizen and we in Haldimand county have lost a true friend.

As I mentioned at the outset, in this debate we have the opportunity of speaking on a number of topics, and I should first of all like to say a word or two about defence. I do not expect to occupy more than twenty minutes of the time of the house this evening. According to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), Canada has offered to increase her air training plan for Atlantic pact allies and has invited them to train in this country. The minister has never been specific about the type of training to be provided. He has never been very specific about many other matters pertaining to national defence concerning which we would like to have information. However, he took the house into his confidence the other evening up to a certain point when he told us we were going to train 3,000 airmen in this country per year instead of the original 1,000 concerning which we previously had information. If this is to be Canada's offer, I still feel it cannot be regarded as particularly impressive. In the war of 1939 to 1945 under the commonwealth air training plan Canada trained 132,000 air crew. Among those, of course, were several thousand of our own Canadian boys. This was a remarkable achievement, and was perhaps a greater contribution to the common victory in that war than any other factor. President Roosevelt, whom we all know and recognize to have been an outstanding statesman, referred to Canada as the airdrome of democracy. Looking at our defence effort and the contributions we can make to it, it seems to me there could be no greater contribution to the cause of freedom than for Canada to offer to train air crew by the thousands, as we did in 1940-45, for the free nations joined together not only in the Atlantic pact but in the United Nations as well. The experience and knowledge gained in the commonwealth air training plan, together with the fact that many of the 154 air and ground schools are more or less intact and could be converted for training purposes, would enable Canada again to be properly called the airdrome of democracy, and to become a bulwark for the protection of free peoples against possible Soviet aggression.

Those of us who availed ourselves of the privilege of visiting the Canadair plant at Cartierville, Quebec, last week witnessed an amazing exhibition by jet fighter aircraft. We saw the F-86 Sabre travel faster than the speed of sound, between 600 and 700 miles an hour, and give a demonstration of manoeuvrability beyond what we had thought possible. If there is another opportunity I strongly recommend that hon. members visit this plant and see what this marvellous plane can do.

I believe it is the opinion of most hon. members of this house that if a shooting war does develop air power will play a leading part, and I am entirely in accord with the view of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and others who have given support to the need for greatly expanded air power.

It is very necessary, also, to inform our people of the great dangers with which they are faced. In a statement made some two years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said:

> Recent events have brought home to us all the increasing threat to our democratic national existence of the rising tide of totalitarian communism. We know that Canada's boundaries against such a threat extend far beyond her physical frontiers. We know there can be no neutrality in this conflict.

But only last August the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) made this statement:

> The furnishing to the United Nations on short notice of expeditionary forces capable of quick deployment in distant areas wherever acts of aggression might take place had not, I admit, entered into our planning.

There is a real danger, I think, in making serious estimates of the menace of aggression and then not implementing corresponding and commensurate measures of defence. If this practice continues the conviction will gradually form in Canada that our defences, meagre though they may be, nevertheless will be sufficient to protect us and our way of life. In April 1948 the Prime Minister, speaking on foreign affairs to a Senate committee, said we were not doing enough to inform the Canadian people of what is going on. Let us implement this statement; let us frankly and truly inform the people of Canada not only of the gravity of the situation, but let it be known in plain terms what the consequences could be. That is what they want to know.

It is most encouraging to note in the speech from the throne the announcement that a department of defence production will be established to act as a procurement agency for the armed forces of our allies and ourselves. This is a department of government that I think is very necessary, and I am very glad to see it being set up. It will be openly welcomed by business generally throughout Canada. Most large industrial firms which have been working on civilian orders are ready to co-operate in industrial mobilization, and can be depended upon to utilize their immense resources to this end when needed. Many small firms throughout the country are finding their business practically coming to an end, owing to the shortage of steel; and I believe that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would clarify the steel situation these smaller firms might be able to stay in business.

The speech from the throne also stated we would be asked to consider measures respecting federal grants in lieu of taxation on crown properties. I am very glad the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has recognized the need for legislation of this kind and plans to bring in a measure dealing with this specific matter. I do hope serious consideration will be given the possibility of giving the municipalities power to assess all government properties within their boundaries on the same basis as other properties. I believe government property, regardless of where situated, from the largest and most extensive buildings to the very smallest, should be the responsibility of the owners, the Dominion of Canada. As the British North America Act now stands it is not possible to tax property owned by the crown. I believe this act should be revised to make this possible. However, if the government cannot see their way clear to do so, I suggest that they consider legislation under which federal grants may be paid in lieu of taxes on all crown property. The announcement made by the Minister of Finance on November 14, 1949, in which he gave a detailed explanation of the proposed method for making grants to municipalities, was most welcome, but I think most hon. members were greatly disappointed when they learned the final details. However, now that this plan has been in operation for fourteen months I am sure the minister has learned a great deal about it, and I hope the government is now prepared to recognize the need for legislation such as I have suggested.

The speech from the throne also states that we are resolved to aid in constructive endeavours to improve the standards of human welfare in underprivileged countries. This, I believe, presents an opportunity for Canada to demonstrate to the Asiatic countries not under the Soviet heel the sincerity of our desire to aid them, by providing quantities of food and other materials. If we could see our way clear to send shipments of wheat and flour to India, Burma and other countries which would alleviate to even a small degree the hunger that prevails in those lands, I am sure we would be well repaid in the good will that would be established. I also believe that if we in the western world had recognized the famine conditions which have existed in China during the past four or five years and had sent some of our surplus supplies to that country, communism would not have been the force there it is today. We cannot ignore the fact, which has been brought home to us so forcibly, that the most fertile ground for communism is in the hearts of starved and hungry peoples.

Let us hope also that at this session the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) will bring in legislation which will carry a ray of sunshine to our crippled and disabled citizens who, because of their afflictions, are unable to provide for themselves. I believe such legislation is just as necessary as that providing for aid to our blind and our old age pensioners, and just as necessary as the family allowance. Every member of this house knows of such people who are very much in need, and I feel that it is our responsibility to provide for them just as we provide pensions for our older citizens.

Along with this, on the domestic side there are no great problems requiring the attention of this house except the implementation of the social security recommendations brought before parliament at the end of the second session. It is admitted everywhere that the present old age pension plan is completely inadequate; and, since the government has expressed a willingness to act provided the provinces will co-operate by endorsing the necessary constitutional amendments, I strongly urge that the government take action on this question during this session of parliament. It is to be hoped that the government will not allow the international situation, serious though it may be, to interfere with this very necessary domestic reform. Relief for our elderly people is long past due, particularly since the inflation of the past few years has cut deeply into the purchasing power of their meagre funds. How some of these people are able to exist is beyond my imagination. I think the Minister of Finance might make use of their advice in his department.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) made an eloquent plea to the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) the other evening with respect to the housing program. I certainly cannot agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) when he says this plan should not be brought forward at this time. I do feel that the hon. member's idea in regard to firms building homes for their employees is sound. I also feel, regardless of how many homes are built by firms, by individuals and by everyone who can possibly build, that we will still be far from having enough to supply the demand for homes in this country, especially if we are going to continue the great immigration program that has been suggested by the government. I am heartily in accord with that program, and I believe every effort should be made to continue to expand home building in this country.

I had hoped, sir, that instead of this announcement by the minister, which cannot fail to have a depressing effect on building, a statement would have been issued to the effect that part IV of the housing act would be proclaimed, allowing for loans on home improvements. The genial Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) can win friends and influence people by influencing the government to realize the need for reconsideration of this matter.

I should like now to say a word about controls. In September of last year the government asked for and secured powers for controls. We had hoped that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) would have made a statement concerning this matter in his speech on February 8. The very least that should be done is for the government to state its intention as to whether or not controls will be introduced. As has been stated by many hon. members in this house since this session began, numerous cases have come to light in which there have been unwarranted mark-ups in the prices of a number of products by some manufacturers who anticipated government action. This increase has been and will continue to be a hedging operation against future contingencies. There can be no doubt about that. I feel that these operations will continue until some measure of controls is put into effect. The simple fact remains that uncontrolled inflation will bring disastrous results to tens of thousands of Canadian people who have practised thrift to provide for their security, and who will find that their dollar is worth approximately half of what it should be. I feel that an immediate statement from the government concerning what it intends to do about controls is necessary.

Some people have asked me what the farmers think of controls and this inflationary spiral. I can say that the position of agriculture today is affected equally by the decreased purchasing value of the dollar as are our urban friends. Dr. E. C. Hope, perhaps one of the outstanding economists in Canada, outlined the situation in an address to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in Calgary, when he stated that the net income of the farmer reached its peak in 1944 and has since declined despite continued high prices for farm products, until today it is sixteen per cent less than in 1944. He stated, and I am entirely in accord with the main point in his address, that the responsibility and primary function of government is to protect the value of our currency. Inflation, as Dr. Hope clearly pointed out, is the last thing the farmers want. I feel, sir, that an immediate statement from the government is necessary concerning its intention with regard to controls.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, since our last session here last fall you had the honour of representing this house at the opening of the new parliament at Westminster. That you did so, sir, with honour and with dignity is a matter of satisfaction to all of us. I should like to offer you my congratulations. I should like also to join with the others who have preceded me in congratulating the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of this address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Hitherto in this house I have refrained from speaking of things provincial or things pertaining to my riding. I did so for the very good reason that I did not want my presence here to be misunderstood. The entry of my province into union was inclined to be misunderstood, and if I were to bring up provincial matters or matters pertaining to my riding, perhaps I would be misunderstood by the press of this country just as they misunderstood our entry into the union. I believe we have been here long enough now for the people of Canada to understand, so I can now revert to form and in this speech refer to matters pertaining to my province and to my riding.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) has laid before this house the condition of the people in the fishing industry in Newfoundland. He did so in a very matter of fact way, and I have nothing to say in rebuttal. But I do want to say to this house that this is no new thing in the history of the fishing industry in Newfoundland. Our fishing industry, in common with all the other industries in this country, has its ups and downs. Last year we found we had a surplus of fish on our hands. When we began to market our new catch we found that this surplus brought down prices in foreign markets. That is trade as we know it in the world today. Unfortunately, the position in which we found ourselves was not kept to ourselves, but was broadcast to the four corners of the world. This did not help the industry, and it did not help us to maintain higher prices.

The fishing industry in Newfoundland is vital to the economy of the province. Hundreds of thousands of our people depend upon it for their livelihood. I make no apology for bringing this matter to the attention of this house, because unless we can give our fishermen the wherewithal to make a decent living this industry will decline. It will disappear from Newfoundland. Neither my province nor this country can afford to allow the fishing industry to decline in that way.

We have in Newfoundland what is known as NAFEL, which is a marketing organization that markets all of our fish. We have also a salt-cod fishing industry, and there is the federal Department of Fisheries which is represented by the fisheries board of Newfoundland. These organizations and representatives from the fishermen meet yearly, sometimes twice a year, to set the prices which the fishermen get for their catch. It is not mandatory on the purchaser to pay those prices, but I can say here that in the main the recommendations coming from those organizations are carried out. The member for St. John's West said that some of the purchasers paid too little for the fish last year. I believe that to be correct. But I would also like to say that on other occasions they paid more than the price recommended by these organizations.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): May I ask a question? Is it not a fact that this year the joint committee to which you referred did not set the price for fish?

Mr. Stick: They did not this year, but they have in the past. The situation in Newfoundland is something we have had for many, many years. It cannot be cured overnight, and it did not come overnight. I suggest to this house that instead of blaming the purchaser or blaming NAFEL or other organizations in Newfoundland, all these organizations should get together in a spirit of good will to ascertain what is wrong with the industry and devise ways and means whereby this industry could be put on its feet. I believe that is a reasonable and sensible way of going about it. I believe a solution of our problem could be found in that manner.

You may be inclined to ask, who are these people about whom I am speaking? Are they worthy of assistance? Let me tell you in all sincerity that these people in Newfoundland who get their daily bread by toiling on the sea, and who face the Atlantic in its calm moods and in its stormy periods, are producing some of the things which you eat here. It is necessary for the economy of this country that we keep the fisheries going just as much as it is necessary to keep the farming industry going. Those men are brave. They face the dangers of the sea day and night. They know what it is to be on the Atlantic when storms are raging, and when the wives and the children at home are praying that they may return safely. Those are the men that helped to keep the Atlantic sea lanes open so that your commerce could travel to and from Europe during the first world war. Those are the men who beat the U-boat menace on the Atlantic during the last war. Those are the men who are today enlisting in the Royal Canadian Navy in such large numbers. They are the men that Churchill called for during the second world war when he wanted men to man the small boats of the Royal Navy. He sent out a special call for them, and he named them the greatest small-boat men in the world. If we get into a shooting war they will respond again as they have in the past. They are willing. I speak on their behalf tonight, and I make no apology for doing so.

For fifteen years in Newfoundland we had a form of government that we called a little dictatorship. You may call it bureaucratic, if you like. We know what we suffered under that regime. In my riding we know how the wharves, the navigation aids and public works generally deteriorated. They were not kept up and they withered as grapes on the vine. I have made recommendations here in all honesty and in all sincerity, which were designed to assist the people about whom I am speaking tonight. I ask for special consideration on behalf of those people. Since I have come here, particularly lately, I have found a certain amount of the bureaucratic business that we had in Newfoundland years ago. We now find that all requests going in are answered with one word "no", that defence comes first, and that we must economize. I would say that there is such a thing as false economy. When those requests are taken into consideration, I hope that those people who live hundreds and thousands of miles from the sea will realize how the people for whom these requests are made earn their daily bread. It requires no brains to say "no". You can teach a parrot to say that. In bringing this matter before the house on behalf of those people I ask, in all sincerity, that they be given the consideration which they deserve.

There is one other matter, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to bring to the attention of the house at this time; perhaps I should say there are two matters, but one is interwoven with the other. Recently we have heard of the huge iron ore deposits in Labrador. It is necessary for the economy not only of Canada but of the whole North American continent that that iron ore be placed in the hands of the steel makers so that we may have the requirements of steel to meet our needs. That development will take place in two or three years. In two or three years that ore will be coming up and going through the steel furnaces in the middle west and other parts of Canada. I want to make a plea here tonight for the deep water canal on the St. Lawrence seaway.

Mr. Graydon: We are right with you on that.

Mr. Stick: When the fathers of this nation looked out upon this country they saw vast tracts of land inhabited by people who were scattered. They conceived the idea of welding this country into one nation and they did it by building railroads. We have advanced from that stage, and last year we had in this house legislation respecting what is known as the trans-Canada highway. That is to further the process of cementing this country into one nation. I submit that today the St. Lawrence seaway is vital not only to the defence of this country but to its economy. Far too long have we waited for our friends and neighbours to the south of us while this project was kicked around as a political football. The time has come when we must act and, if necessary, do so alone. I am informed that this project will cost from $700 million to $800 million and that it will take some four to five years to complete it. In spite of what has been said here in this house this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Sinclair), I am convinced that it is within the capacity of this country to carry out that project, if necessary, alone. I am further convinced that the time to begin it is now. We will welcome our friends in the United States if they come in with us but I say here definitely tonight that we cannot wait longer than 1951 and that we must be ready to begin this project in 1952 even if we have to go it alone.

Last year some of us paid a visit to Windsor and Detroit. We saw the huge industries in that area. Those of us who like the sea and who have the sea in our blood were naturally interested in the water. We saw the huge amount of shipping passing to and fro on that strip of water between Windsor and Detroit, and we were told that that stretch of water has on it the greatest amount of sea traffic in the world, that the amount of shipping passing up and down that river is far greater than that passing through the Suez canal or the Panama canal. From looking at it at the time, I can well believe that statement. I myself have been through the Suez canal on four or five occasions. I have been on defence for two or three months on the Suez canal and I know what traffic goes through it. I ask the house to visualize what will happen when we get that deep water canal on the St. Lawrence. I say that the traffic passing between Detroit and Windsor can be duplicated on the St. Lawrence and that this seaway will knit this country as it has never been knit before. It will allow the resources of the east to flow to the west and the resources of the west to flow to the east. It will be one other link binding this country together.

We have at this time the spectacle of the shortage of steel. Almost every day in this house we receive new orders with respect to the curtailment of the use of steel. We have the iron ore in Labrador; we have the coal in the maritime provinces, and we have the limestone. Why have we not the steel industry today capable of supplying our needs? I ask this house to have vision and faith. It has been said that as goes the family, so goes the nation. Carved in letters of stone in the peace tower, at the western end, are these words: Where there is no vision, the people perish. This chamber here represents the family of Canada. Our forefathers supplied the faith and the vision to make this country great. Is it too much to ask of us here now that we supply the vision necessary to make those projects I have mentioned come to fruition? Inasmuch as our forefathers by their vision made Canada great, is it too much to ask of each one of us here tonight that we carry on in our day and generation the example they set and that we make Canada greater?

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with my other remarks, may I say I understand that some remarks were made this afternoon which were intended for my particular attention. All hon. members are well aware of the sad event which kept me away from this house on Thursday and Friday. For that reason it was necessary for me to take some time this afternoon to examine Hansard so that I might know what had been said during my absence. I regret that I did not have the opportunity to hear the remarks to which I have referred. I trust that those remarks were a serious attempt to examine the grave problems now before us.

We are now discussing the amendment moved by the opposition and the subamendment which was moved to that amendment, and which adopted the wording of the amendment, making the additions now under consideration. I think I might read into the record at this point the words of the amendment and the subamendment so that we shall have before us exactly what it is that we are considering in this debate at this very important time. This is the amendment:

We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed

(1) to give this nation leadership in the face of the present grave danger; and

(2) to bring into being forces necessary to enable Canada to defend itself and discharge its international obligations; and

(3) to take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living.

A subamendment was moved to that which reads as follows:

That the following words be added to the amendment, immediately after the words "rising cost of living" in the last line thereof:

"such as the immediate reimposition of price controls, and the payment of subsidies where necessary, so as to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people.

That is what we have under consideration; and the vote that will be taken at the time it is called will be upon that amendment, accepted in the subamendment, with the additional words that I have just read.

Before I come to the subamendment I should like to deal with the first two subjects mentioned in the amendment which I moved in the early stages of this debate. It covers three subjects. First, the failure of the government to give leadership in these critical days. Second, the failure of the government to bring into being the defence forces required to fulfil our tasks at this particular time; and third, the failure of the government to deal with the high cost of living and inflation.

First of all, let me deal with the question of leadership or lack of leadership given by the government at this time. After all, on an occasion when we are told that we face as grave dangers as ever confronted western civilization, it is most certainly imperative that the government give leadership to the people of this country as to the nature of the tasks that they must undertake, and as to the way in which they can best contribute to the common effort to be made by all our people.

If there had been any question in the opening stages of this debate about the complete absence of leadership by this government that doubt must have been removed during the course of this debate from anyone who is prepared to examine carefully exactly what the government has put before us during the past two weeks.

First of all, we had a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) which indicated what might be done if, as and when the government thought there was any reason to act. Then we had a statement by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) in regard to the money to be spent; and we had placed before us, in a cumulative form, an estimated total of the amount which might be spent over a period of three years. I would remind hon. members that our obligation, our duty and our only right is to deal with the things that will be dealt with in the coming year, although I agree that it is wise to plan for the time ahead.

We knew in advance of the statement by the Minister of National Defence that approximately $1,600 million was to be spent on defence during this current year. What was told us then was not new. It is only a question of simple arithmetic to reach the conclusion that carried forward over a period of three years it would approximate $5 billion. There is not a single member in this house, including the Minister of National Defence, or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), or the Prime Minister, who has the slightest idea of what the expenditure may be that this country will be called upon to meet if events during this current year should take the course that presented us with graver dangers than those we now face. The whole presentation of this subject was placed before us as though we were in a period of relatively stable preparation for defence, in spite of the fact that we have been told by the government that the next few months may be the most critical in the history of the western world.

Again, the announcements that were made indicated an approach on a long-term basis to the provision of manpower and of weapons, and of the things that are required for the defence of this country. Money is very necessary in preparing for military defence. This parliament and the people of this country have learned that it takes a great deal of money in a free nation to bear the burden of defence. But the actual burden of defence itself is not the dollars that are put forward. Defence rests upon trained men with weapons with which they can defend our freedom.

What we need to know, if the crisis is in the nature of the crisis that has been described to us, is how many men fully trained and equipped and armed this country is going to have on April 1, on May 1, on June 1, on July 1, on August 1, on September 1, during the most critical months that the western world will face for many years. There is nothing in what has yet been placed before us that gives us any real indication of what measures of defence this country actually has, or will have, during these most critical days.

There was one speech from the government benches which approached this subject in an atmosphere of reality—and only one. That was the speech of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). In that speech a man who had accepted the responsibility of one of the defence ministries during the years of war pointed out the obligation that there is on every member of the House of Commons to know what we actually have to defend this country.

He himself, not unnaturally, indicated his own interest and his own faith in that branch of the service with which he was associated during the years of war. He presented to us reasons why he thought this country should place the utmost emphasis upon the Royal Canadian Air Force and upon the training and equipping of air units. He suggested that members of the house should express their opinions as to the balance of emphasis which should be placed upon one branch of the service and another.

I for one wish to subscribe to the views he expressed, that there are reasons that Canada is peculiarly fitted and qualified to train large numbers of airmen, and that our greatest emphasis should be upon that branch of defence. For at least two years to my recollection the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has been urging that greater emphasis be placed upon air defence; and I am very happy to see that an increasing measure of emphasis is placed upon this service.

I think our geographical position suggests reasons why we can best contribute both to the defence of Canada and any collective effort that may be made, either in Europe or any other part of the world, by those military craft that can move so fast into any area of danger.

There is another reason—and I should like to indicate that this is no new conviction of mine, but rather one I have held for many years. Like the hon. member for Quebec South, I have sought for some time to emphasize the special qualifications possessed by Canadians in this great branch of the military service. In 1930 in a book I wrote under the title "Canada's Fighting Airmen" I had this to say about the particular qualifications of Canadians in this field:

> Canada's share individually and collectively was out of all proportion to her population. Not long after Canadians really took up flying in earnest it became apparent that they were at least the equals of any of the airmen in the war. It is interesting to speculate why they displayed such an undoubted superiority in this new service. There must be some explanation for the fact that Canada, with about one-tenth of the white population of the empire, should have supplied one-third of the pilots in action with the Royal Air Force at the end of the war, and there must also be some explanation for the individual dominance of Canadians among the British fighting pilots. Perhaps the wide horizons of life in Canada, the atmosphere of optimism, the confidence of individual opportunity, and the general adaptability to unexpected tasks born of life in a rapidly developing country all contributed to the qualities which so peculiarly fitted Canadians for success in this new and incalculable adventure. Whatever the reasons may have been, the simple fact remains that, without any qualification as to population or otherwise, Canadians proved themselves the greatest air fighters on the side of the allies. Their exploits should be an inspiration to young Canadians for all time, because at the height of their glory these men were mere boys, and what Canadian boys did then forever avoids the necessity of seeking beyond the borders of Canada for examples of the highest bravery, devotion to duty and self-sacrifice.

Those same qualities were shown during the second world war. Those same qualities are possessed by young Canadians today, and I think there are good reasons why the utmost emphasis should be placed upon this service. There are also reasons why emphasis should be placed upon the equipping and training of airborne troops. There are also reasons why emphasis should be placed upon the equipping and training of fast armoured units which can train in the great spaces of this country and be moved rapidly into any threatened area. There are also reasons why, with our great coast lines, and the fact that there is good reason to believe that the danger spots where trouble might arise may be some distance from our own shores, we should build ships of a type which would make it possible for those young men and women who have shown such great adaptability for naval service to continue that service wherever Canadians may be required to assume the collective responsibilities they have accepted.

Then we come to the land forces. In that we still depend to a very considerable extent upon the reserve army, which can be organized here in Canada and can be brought into a position to defend this country during a period when any threat might present itself.

No one should underestimate the importance in the Canadian defence plan of the reserve army. One of the things that have not been answered in the debate, but which should be answered, is the statement by the senior officers of all the associations representing the different branches of the land forces, that any suggestion that the number of men we have in the reserve is an effective force for the defence of this country is a travesty of the facts. These men who made that statement are the men who know best of all what the state of training of the reserve units really is. They know better than the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). They know better than the general staff. They know better than anyone else because they are the ones who are actually assuming responsibility for that training. They have made the bald statement that we are not getting full value for our money in reserve training, and that any statement that we have 40,000 effectives, which has been made over and over again, is a travesty of the facts.

This is not a time for us to be given any statements which do not clearly and accurately represent the situation with which we are confronted. Examine the speech of the Minister of National Defence. It tells us how much money the government may spend. It tells us what units may be raised with the money to be spent, assuming that it is still dollars of the same kind. It tells us also some of the general plans, but it does not tell the members of the house what the defence forces are that we have today, what the state of our defences actually is, how ready we are to meet any threat that might confront us, or how ready we are to accept our share in any collective responsibility that we have assumed.

The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) raised an extremely important point when he said that one of the great problems confronting us now, when so much power of necessity is assumed by this and other free governments in the face of threats of this kind, is to find a method by which members of parliament can be fully informed and assume the responsibility which it is their duty to assume before they pass the votes of money which they are called upon to pass. The hon. member for Quebec South supported the idea of a committee to examine defence so that members might be informed. He pointed out that such a committee should not be permitted to deal with questions of policy. I agree with that. At no time have I suggested that a committee should deal with questions of policy. Policy must be the exclusive responsibility of the government. What I have urged is that there be a committee which can examine the facts so that in turn the committee may report to the house and the house may know what the state of the defences of this country really is in these most critical days.

In the various things that have been said, suggestions have been made that staff officers be called before that committee, and if in any of those statements the government has interpreted the argument as an argument that such a committee be permitted to deal with questions of policy, may I remove any suggestion of that kind. The suggestion has been made, and my argument now is, that such a committee is essential if members of the house are to have the facts in regard to defence which they should have if they are in fact going to perform their duty and their responsibility as representatives of the people of Canada at this time. Short of that we have no adequate information. Short of that we are passing over this great subject with a statement as to the amount of money to be spent. What do members of this house know about the state of our active force? I have sought to ascertain what the state of our active force is, that almost forgotten force which was by-passed when it came to the acceptance of responsibilities under the United Nations, that magnificent well-trained force.

Do not let members of this house be asked to accept the explanation that the airborne brigade was kept in Canada to defend Canada in the event of attack. The aircraft which could have carried the airborne brigade into action were sent outside of Canada, and they cancelled their training last autumn because of that fact. Today we have land forces of at least three different types. We have the special force; we have the active force, which seems to be particularly for the defence of Canada; and we have the reserve force, as well as such other forces as might be brought into existence. Surely members of the house have a right to hear a discussion of this subject and opinions expressed as to the organization of military forces which will most effectively deal with the tasks before us.

That is not a question of government policy. It is a question of the presentation of facts upon which members of the house can then make their arguments as a result of which the government in turn would decide policy, which is its responsibility. Most certainly the thing that is creating an atmosphere of uncertainty and confusion in Canada today is the absence in the house or outside of that detailed information which is so essential if we are going to assume our responsibilities. For that very reason I once again repeat my earnest request to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) that the government agree to set up a committee to examine the whole subject of national defence, recognizing that there will be subjects that must be kept behind the veil of secrecy but recognizing also that this house is always ready to accept any reasonable explanation in that respect, and has never sought to violate the secrecy essential in cases where real secrecy is needed.

When it is suggested that this would be taking over the responsibility of government, may I once again point out that surely external affairs are just as much in the realm of secrecy as national defence, that a committee is set up to deal with that subject, and that it has never been suggested at any time that the external affairs committee is usurping the authority of parliament. There is plenty of evidence of what has been accomplished by committees in other countries. I have been told by those in a position to know—and I am sure other members of the house have received the same information—that one of the reasons that little Finland was able to make such a magnificent stand against Russia in 1939 was because a committee of their parliament had been set up to examine national defence, and that committee made recommendations which led to a reorganization of the defence forces of Finland as a result of which we had that sublime act of courage when that little nation stood against the full force of communist slavery. We would reap the same benefits. We would receive information to which we are entitled, and I hope that, at this stage of the session, when it is so important that we proceed with knowledge of the subject we are discussing, a committee of that kind will be set up.

Then let us examine the information placed before us by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). Surely there was a complete absence of leadership there. If any member of this house knows definitely any more than he did before that speech, he has been able to find in it something I could not find. That speech was simply a statement that certain things may be done some time; that some things are under serious consideration. This is a time for serious consideration, Mr. Speaker, but it is also a time for action; and the time for action is long past in regard to some of the subjects that were discussed by the minister.

One of the most remarkable things to have been presented during this debate, either inside or outside the house, is the suggestion that it is not necessary for us to tackle some of these problems because the people of the United States are also tackling them and this may be adequate for our requirements. Surely the sovereignty of this country, the sovereignty of this parliament, suggest that no member of the Canadian government should stand in this house and say he expects that the things done by some other nation are going to be adequate to deal with the problems we are called upon to face. This parliament has the responsibility of dealing with its own problems. Today as we prepare for defence, as the enormous sums of money that will be called for will be spent, we know that the inflationary pressures in the country will be infinitely greater than they are at present. We know we have not yet even felt some of the inflationary pressure already created. We know some raw materials are going into industrial production which cannot be replaced at the same price. We know that when those raw materials must be replaced the prices will go still higher, simply from the evidence of what those raw materials cost today. We have seen what has been happening in connection with inflation. We know how it has been increasing, and we also know the whole tendency will be for it to increase still further unless effective steps are taken to bring it under some measure of restraint.

It is not necessary to remind some members of this house of what has happened; nevertheless it is important that we all bear in mind what has been taking place during the past few months. In 1949 the cost of living index had risen to 160·8 and people were getting seriously concerned about it. For the last month of 1950 it had climbed to 171·1. During the twelve months of 1950, the cost of living climbed 11·5 points, or practically one point a month. Some of the statements being made on behalf of the government gave us every reason to hope that this tendency had been checked, but the latest bulletin issued on February 2 of this year shows that the general cost of living index is now 172·5. The government has given some indication that it may deal with this subject by controls, but it is not yet prepared to say exactly what it is going to do or what form the steps it has under serious consideration may actually take.

Today, Mr. Speaker, we are not dealing simply with a cost of living index as such. We are dealing with a situation that is threatening the people of this country with a measure of insecurity they have not known for many years, a measure of insecurity in no way related to the apparently high income our people are earning at the present time. One of the things that must be borne in mind in all these discussions is that it is no use talking about the high national product in terms of dollars unless we talk about that national product in terms of what those dollars will buy, and what kind of dollars they really are. After all, the national product of France today in francs is many times what it was in 1914; the national product of Italy is many times what it was in 1914, in lira; but it is a very different figure when you examine those units in terms of money value today, and in what they will buy. What has been happening in Canada in the past few months should be an indication and a warning that here, as in other countries, that same dangerous course may be run unless with all the vigour, all the ingenuity and all the initiative we possess we deal with the emergency that is actually upon us in regard to the cost of living.

There is no one here who does not know from his own personal contacts the desperate position in which many people are living today. A man earning $120 a month may be called upon to pay $50 or $60 for rent if he has a family. He may be called upon to buy fuel in addition to that, and then food. Where the money is to come from for clothes and all the other incidentals is hard for anyone to imagine. Yet that is the reality with which we are actually confronted at this time. This government, through its lack of leadership, is primarily responsible for the inflation we see in Canada today. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) laughs. This is not a laughing matter. Certainly it is not a laughing matter to the people who are trying to find out how to make their dollars go around at this time. It is not a laughing matter for the people to have invested money in insurance for their own protection, and who know that the dollars they get from that insurance are worth only a little more than fifty cents as compared with the dollars they put in.

Mr. St. Laurent: On a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I cannot permit the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) to suggest that I was laughing at the predicament in which we all find ourselves because of inflation. I was laughing at my hon. friend's assertion that the government was responsible for the inflation that has taken place.

Mr. Drew: This is not a laughing matter for those who have put their money in the banks in the form of deposits, in order to protect themselves. Nor is this a laughing matter for those who have put their money in government bonds which they have been told was the safest form of investment into which they could put their money. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) says that he is laughing at the suggestion that the government was responsible. The government is responsible. The government has not taken one single step, since the pressures were placed upon the economy of this country, to check inflation by any of the several measures they could have taken to deal with this subject.

Mr. Speaker, I know that those people of Canada who are concerned about the value of money today will be interested to know that this is such a humorous subject to some of the members on the government side. This government had it in its power to do a number of things that would have greatly helped to meet this situation. Those things were pointed out many times. One step that was suggested was that the government cut down on non-defence spending. Those members who have an interest in the affairs of parliament, and who follow the debates in parliament, will know that it was in this parliament that the suggestion was made that, if savings were effected here comparable to those indicated in the United States by a similar commission, they could amount to $500 million a year in Canada.

Mr. Cavers: Explain fully.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Cruickshank: Can we laugh now?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, there are certain members in this house who know nothing better than to laugh, and who have made no better contribution.

Those members who have followed the debates in this house will also recall that at the time that proposal was made it was pointed out that the way that this could be done would be by an examination, in exactly the same way that any big business would deal with its own problems. It was pointed out that if that were done the members of this house could offer many suggestions as to the way savings could be made. This is not something that is confined to Canada alone. This is something that affects every one of the free nations today, and in every one of the free nations the emphasis is being placed upon the need for cutting non-defence spending. As yet we have no evidence of any real attempt by this government to cut the non-defence spending which has been built up.

I recall another occasion when the Prime Minister, with good humour—

Mr. Sinclair: As always.

Mr. Drew: —indicated that he felt that the reference to bureaucrats and bureaucracy was a rather amusing subject. For that reason it must have been interesting to many of the members on the government side of the house, as well as the other side of the house, to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) referring to the immense bureaucracy which this government had been called upon to build up, and which it did build up. We have not yet seen any substantial cutting down of what the minister describes as an immense bureaucracy.

Mr. Speaker, this country today is faced not only with the problem that every housewife must try to solve, of making those dollars go around with the rapidly rising cost of food, but also there are other problems that in themselves are inflationary and which at this moment are very serious for the future of Canada. Up until about two months ago it was possible for people who are called upon to buy supplies for various types of jobs to enter into firm contracts several months ahead. Today it is almost impossible to get anyone to give a firm quotation on any commodity or any supply that may be needed, because of the inflationary pressures that are now felt. The very fact that this government is still leaving the whole subject in an air of uncertainty, increased still further just a few days ago, is in itself forcing these people to hesitate to commit themselves because of the knowledge that the things that, in turn, they must sell may be at a very much higher price before the time comes when they would be called upon to deliver them.

Now, that has an effect upon every one of us at a time when we are told that this country must produce more than ever before. In his statement to this house the other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave what constituted an admission of abject failure on the part of this government to deal with the question of inflation. The minister said that the reason that controls had been effective on an earlier occasion was that they caught everybody by surprise. But this time, he went on to say, the people had governed themselves accordingly. Then he added words which I am informed were said, and which were referred to by another speaker although they do not appear in the minister's speech; he used an aside which was heard by members in this house when he said "They are all set." That is exactly what he meant. What he meant was, because of the uncertainty created by this government, those who might have been affected by controls had governed themselves accordingly with the thought that this government was going to impose controls, and that they were now set to meet the situation.

Mr. Speaker, in relation to those words which do not appear, I think it is time that some understanding was reached in this house as to those words which can be deleted from Hansard. There are certain words which may be used ungrammatically, which may be an obvious transposition of words, or an obviously inaccurate word may be used, and no one would suggest that there should not be proper corrections made; or as we have seen on other occasions a statement that should have been made in the first place, as happened to one of the ministers today. But the fact remains that there are other statements which have a definite meaning and a definite bearing on the debate. The statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) that those who might have been primarily affected by those controls are "all set" had a meaning and a significance which should not have disappeared from Hansard. There have been too many occasions on which Hansard has been deprived of statements which had a definite meaning, such as the one when the statement was made that our troops had been kicked out of Germany but which never got into Hansard; and there were other statements of the kind which never got into Hansard. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there be a clear understanding that while appropriate amendments may be made in order to correct the context, statements which have a real bearing on the debate itself will remain in the context of the speech in which they appear.

I now wish to come to some of the things that have been said by those who spoke in support of the subamendment. The subamendment adopts the amendment which I introduced in the early stages of this debate. The subamendment, having adopted that amendment, adds words which are intended to amplify the original resolution and which must be read along with that resolution. Those words say that this house regrets that steps have not been taken to deal with the rising cost of living and inflation, such as the immediate reimposition of price controls, and the payment of subsidies where necessary so as to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people.

On examining some of the statements that have been made in support of that subamendment, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that those who introduced it have more in mind than simply an explanation of the amendment itself and that there is a return to the doctrinaire belief in over-all controls as part of our general economy and not something simply to meet an emergency, and a very real one, such as that with which we are confronted today. This point of view is one which I certainly do not accept. I most certainly believe that part of the struggle in which we are engaged today is to keep within our economy the greatest measure of freedom which can possibly be preserved throughout these difficult years. Freedom is not divisible. Freedom means economic freedom as well as freedom of speech, freedom of association and freedom of worship. Having said that, Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that in support of this subamendment arguments have been presented which in themselves are arguments with which I cannot agree, although I am satisfied that they are sincerely put forward by those who believe in the over-all effectiveness of state intervention in our daily affairs. Nevertheless, we must examine those words as they really are and the subjects to which they refer. If we do that, I think there can be little difficulty in seeing that, divorced from any doctrinaire explanation, these words refer to subjects that were in the mind of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), that are in the minds of most of the members of this house, and that definitely are in the minds of the people of Canada at this time.

I believe in a free economy; and I believe that one of the great issues before us in the years ahead will be whether we can preserve that free economy in the face of the threat with which this and every other free nation is now confronted. But, Mr. Speaker, it is only an attempt to be doctrinaire from another point of view to suggest that there is a free economy in which the movement of prices, on a competitive basis, offers protection to the public when any large part of the basic commodities, supplies or production of any kind is bought by the government for special purposes with the money appropriated by this house, and that much of that production or of those commodities is removed from the ordinary free competition within this country. The moment that any substantial part of any commodity or of any type of production is bought directly or indirectly by the government, then the free economy is no longer operating in relation to the balance of those supplies. Any failure to take effective steps to deal with the balance of those supplies is simply playing into the hands of the speculators and those who will be able to make money at the expense of the general public. I believe that our free economy may be gravely threatened, and soon, unless this runaway inflation is brought under control. I for one believe that it is essential that, to meet this immediate emergency, there be price controls which will protect the public from the abuses that are arising at this time.

By all means let us have the highest measure of freedom within this economy of ours, but let us face the simple reality that the water is running over the dam so fast that unless flood gates are provided right away this flood may carry away the savings of our people and that free economy which is being asserted as the reason for not doing anything at this time. After all, communism can win this struggle in more ways than by force of arms. That has been said in this house before. Communism has already extended its dreadful slavery to large parts of the world without moving a single armed man across the borders where communist dictatorships have been set up. There are other ways that communism can be spread; and one of the ways that the communists have said they would seek to spread their dreadful disease is by undermining the economy of the free nations so that the destruction of that economy would open the door to this dreadful form of slavery that they are trying to impose upon the whole world.

People did not believe Hitler when he wrote in "Mein Kampf" exactly what he intended to do, namely, to enslave Europe and the rest of the world, and too late the world came to realize that he meant exactly what he said, and that he intended to carry out that plan. Stalin has told us in just as clear terms what he and the Russian dictatorship intend to do. They plan to extend their control over the whole world; not so much by force of arms as by the threat of force against countries where the economy has been undermined through the many activities that they carry out.

Every point that our cost of living goes up is something that will bring satisfaction in the Kremlin. I would not be surprised if on the walls of the Kremlin, probably opposite the walls where they have all the maps of free nations they have absorbed in other ways, are charts showing the dangerous trend in the free nations and the threat that there is to the free economies which they are seeking to destroy. It is just as important in this country today to protect our dollar, the dollar which our people need for their daily lives, for their savings and for their security, as it is to build the bulwarks of freedom of other kinds. Neither can be neglected. Both these great efforts should go on side by side and simultaneously, and the time to deal with the threat to our economy is now long overdue.

In so far as our amendment is concerned, Mr. Speaker, it was intended to cover the field of inflation. We express regret that the government had failed to take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living. These are inclusive terms. Certainly these terms include price controls where price controls are necessary. Certainly, these words include subsidies where subsidies are necessary. But they include several other things as well. To any of those who may find some measure of amusement in an assertion of that kind, may I point out that I had the responsibility—and I accepted it—of introducing certain subsidies in the province of Ontario at a time when the dominion Minister of Agriculture was failing to protect certain of our important crops that faced a very dangerous situation indeed.

For instance, in Ontario we found it necessary to provide a subsidy for sugar beets, a subject of which the Minister of Agriculture has had some recent experience. This of course was on an earlier occasion. There was a serious shortage of sugar in this country at that time and the production of sugar beets was seriously threatened. I have no apologies for accepting the responsibility of introducing a subsidy to continue the production of that crop, while at the same time I disbelieve in the general principles of subsidies except where they are actually needed to meet an emergency of this kind. We introduced subsidies to assist hog production, to assist cheese production and to assist production of other kinds.

I have had experience in this before, and I know there are occasions where the nature of the emergency demands that we deal with these things in terms of reality and meet the situation head-on, and do the things that are needed to be done to deal with the problem that is before us.

In this subamendment there are the governing words, "if necessary". And that is exactly the meaning that I take from these words. But if it had been intended to amplify the words in our motion we would have amplified them a great deal more than this. The fact that we have not, however, does not make the reference to these objectionable; because quite contrary to what some hon. members have suggested, this subamendment does not leave the whole question of inflation upon these two subjects alone. It says: "such as price controls and subsidies where necessary".

Much has been made of the words, "reimposition of price controls". I grant you that I do not like the word "reimpose"; but what is it that we are talking about? We are talking about price controls, but not necessarily price controls of the same kind that we had before. No; Canadians have got too much initiative, too much ingenuity, too much intelligence not to have gained a great deal from the experience of the last war. And in dealing with the problems now before us under different circumstances, and meeting a long-term situation, I am perfectly certain that the price controls that would be devised to meet the emergency with which we are now confronted would be a different type of price control from those that were imposed before. But I am not going to engage in an exchange of dialectics and argument about whether some inference can be drawn from the word "reimpose".

This refers to price controls; this refers to subsidies. It leaves it open to deal with any other things than can be done to stem inflation in this country. I am going to point out some of the other things that are covered under these general terms that were used in our amendment. First of all is the reduction of non-defence spending by this government, and a substantial reduction of non-defence spending. Second is increased production in every line of production which will not only meet our military requirements, but which will meet the daily needs of our people and by that very fact ease the strains and pressures of inflation itself. And third, we should encourage immigration on a scale which will bring to our country people with skill and stamina who believe in our methods, so that we may spread the burden we have assumed over a larger population within this vast land of ours. And fourth, we should most certainly remove anything that will discourage the people from building houses at a time when we are also encouraging immigrants to come into this country.

Anything more badly conceived than the plans of the government to reduce demand by creating the necessity for a higher down payment would be difficult to imagine. We have no lack of raw materials in this country. We have no lack of resources. We have resources in this country beyond the dream of most nations in the world today. What we need at this time is for this government not to place restrictions upon the building of houses at the very time that we are trying to convince the people that our way of life is the best of all, but to encourage them to build houses where you create the whole foundation of your society.

Then again another point is that this house should insist upon every step being taken which will assure that we get full value for every dollar spent on defence. This house should insist upon every step being taken which will assure that we get full value for every dollar spent on defence. We know we are not getting it today.

Then we should also demand, with the hope that this demand would not be confined to one side of the house, that the government use the very wide powers it has to deal with the credit of this country. After all the Bank of Canada was set up with its very first declared purpose being the supervision of the credit and economy of the country to the best advantage of the people of Canada. The government, through the agencies it has created, has it within its powers to do several things that will help to prevent this runaway inflation that is now before us.

Then again we come to the question of controls. Most certainly we urge that, to meet this emergency with which we are now confronted, there be controls, where those controls are needed, to bring the dollar into some real relationship to a proper value, and to create a measure of stability which will restore the confidence of the people of this country in their bank savings, in their insurance, in their bonds, and in other things which are so necessary if we are going to carry forward a free economy.

Surely the government should be very conscious of the danger there would be in putting out a bond issue by the government to meet our defence requirements, unless there was some measure of assurance that the people who put up their money are going to have reason to believe that it will be at least a somewhat similar dollar they will get back when those bonds mature.

That is not suggesting that the people of our country are going to reduce their patriotism to dollars. But at a time when the government is urging the people to put money into those bonds as the safest investment in the country, then the government has the responsibility to make them the safest investment. The fact is that they have not been the safest investment, and that during these past few years—during this past year particularly—there has been a real threat to investment in those bonds, which is now a subject which should cause serious concern to the government and to the people of Canada.

In passing I shall refer to another subject not unrelated to investments. The stock markets of Canada serve an important and useful purpose. In a free economy those stock markets provide the opportunity to buy and sell securities which finance the great developments under our economy. There are still people who express some measure of surprise that at a time when events are undoubtedly serious the stock markets should be rising, rising, rising, to a point where it is strangely reminiscent of the days of 1929. Why is that? Is it because the people of Canada are confident that these stocks are worth more every day? Some of them, yes. But the real reason that there has been this constant and rapid rise is the concern of many people as to the continuing value of the dollar; and they are putting their money into what may be regarded as equity securities which bear a proportionate relationship to some fixed assets which change with the changing value of the dollar. And yet part of the increase in the value of securities in this country has been an increase that has been related to a flight from the dollar itself—

Mr. Abbott: Nonsense.

Mr. Drew: And I hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) say "nonsense." If any word could demonstrate how unfitted he is to be Minister of Finance, it is that word. The Minister of Finance obviously does not read the financial papers which are subscribed to by the people employed in his own department to give expert advice. The minister is disregarding what is being said by those who have been observing this phenomenon for some time; and the minister knows perfectly well that in other years, as well as this year, when there is inflation in this country or in other countries, there is a corresponding increase in stock values related to the fact that inflation itself carries those values up. In that, of course, I am referring to common stocks, because it is the common stock which has the equity value in the assets of any company.

It is time that, in addition to urging there be some effective measure of control over those things which are threatening our economy, the people of this country should also come to realize that there is no easy way to wealth, that real wealth is earned only by hard work, by initiative and by ingenuity. And it will be a healthy thing in this country if some measure of caution is displayed by the people at this time, and that they should not believe that the stock markets in Canada or in any other country always go one way. Because, while it would be certainly very unwise that anyone should ever sell Canada short, it would also be unwise that the people of this country should come to regard stock exchanges as gambling casinos where they are simply tossing money down for chips of one kind or another which they buy and put on some gambling device. That is not what stock markets are. Stock markets provide a very real and important function in our economy. Their place will best be held and the service they can offer will best be performed when everyone recognizes that the value of those exchanges should be related to the actual value of a security itself, and related to the production of any particular company.

I come now to the question of how these things can be done. If the government does adopt a stabilization policy, if the government does make a real effort to stabilize the dollar, controls alone will not do the job. Controls alone might only aggravate the situation and create new problems in years ahead. The whole problem must be tackled, along with imposing those restraints and controls made necessary by the action of the government itself. And the government should also take these other steps which can be taken for the benefit of all the people of this country.

I spoke about the necessity for increasing production. Taxes imposed should be taxes which will encourage savings. Taxes imposed should be taxes which will in every way possible not stifle the productive capacity and productive effort of this nation. There are taxes which can be borne by the people of this country without placing any shackles upon the great productive capacity of Canada. There are other taxes which would greatly reduce our ability to meet the demands ahead. The mainspring of a free economy—and it is a free economy in which I believe and a free economy which I hope we will preserve—is the hope of getting more in the form of money or goods or other things for the efforts that are being made, and of being able to create security, comfort and happiness for your family by saving from what you earn. If the safety of bank deposits, insurance, government bonds and other investments of our people is threatened, then in doing so the very mainspring of our economy is threatened as well. In imposing the taxes that will be imposed upon the people of this country to meet the heavy demands ahead, every single thing should be done to see that they are imposed in a way that will make it possible for production to meet the demands of our people while at the same time meeting defence requirements.

For that very reason it is to be hoped that the government will give an opportunity to the house at the earliest possible date to deal with the estimates, to examine them and to see what actually can be done, by suggestion and otherwise, to improve the situation. I have directed criticism to what I believe the government has failed to do. But to the extent that the government really meets its responsibilities, to the extent that this government really shows a determined effort to stem the tide of inflation, I am sure they will get the support of every member of the house no matter what criticism may have been directed to what has taken place in the past.

For the reasons I have mentioned it is my intention to support the amendment to the amendment. In doing so I have indicated that the subjects discussed are subjects to which we have referred. If I had drafted the subamendment I might have changed the wording of it, and would; but what I point out is that the one way in which members of the house have an opportunity to protest against the inaction of the government is to vote on a subject of this kind without too much attempt to get down to the last possible meaning of every word in the amendment to the amendment now before us. I hope that it will not only be members on the opposition side of the house who will indicate to the government that they want some action, because I know, and every member of the house knows, that there are members on the government side as well who believe that conditions in this country today are such that they demand immediate and vigorous action, and that the urgency which has been suggested is not only an urgency related to defence preparation but also is a great urgency related to the preservation of our free economy and the welfare of our people.

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it would seem appropriate at this point that I should say something on the third point in the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). The amendment reads in part:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed . . .
> (3) To take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living.

At the same time it will afford me the opportunity of accepting a suggestion that was made in my absence the other evening by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). At page 165 of Hansard he said:

> I also believe that it would be most opportune if the Minister of Finance were to make a full and frank statement in this debate on ways to prevent inflation. I realize that price controls are not a cure-all, but I believe it is the duty of the Minister of Finance to tell the house, and through us the Canadian people, everything that can be done. There is little understanding throughout the country of the underlying causes of inflation or of the best remedies. We hear, for example, such recommendations as these: that individuals should increase their personal savings, that the government should cut out every unnecessary expenditure, that there should be heavier taxation, that there should be restriction of credit, that there should be an allocation of scarce materials, that interest rates should be raised so that persons having savings accounts, for example, would receive a higher rate of interest and thus would be encouraged to save rather than spend; we hear that there should be increased individual production.

In the course of his remarks the leader of the opposition has said that he considers that the government is primarily responsible for the inflationary situation which admittedly exists today. He went on to say that the government had not taken one single step by using measures open to it to check this inflation. Then he proceeded to enlarge at various times on what he considered to be the cure for this condition. I must confess that I am in complete agreement with a number of the suggestions that he made, but in the course of his remarks he contradicted himself so many times that I am really not just sure what he would do if he had the responsibility of directing government policy.

I am very happy to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra and discuss what I conceive to be and what I think are generally recognized as the fundamental causes of inflation, and what are the best ways of meeting it. Before I do that, however, lest anyone may be under any misapprehension that the Minister of Finance is not just as much concerned in doing what it may be possible to do to check inflationary tendencies, let me hasten to disabuse his mind on that point. I do not want to introduce a personal note into these things but speaking as an individual, in common with perhaps a number of others in this house, I have the greater portion of my savings in the form of life insurance, and I am just as much interested in maintaining the integrity and the stability of the Canadian dollar as any other member of the house or any other person in Canada. Therefore do not let anyone think that this matter is being taken lightly by myself or by the government.

As I had occasion to say at the special session last September, the root cause of any sustained inflation is an excess of spendable income as against the available supply of goods at current prices to meet it. Consequently the fundamental cure for an inflationary situation is increased production and, if necessary, draining off such excess of spending power as may exist; in other words, maximize production, minimize waste and reduce competitive expenditures such as government expenditures. I think those principles are recognized by all students of this sort of thing. That is the fundamental attack on inflation, and any other collateral remedies, such as controls, which I shall deal with a little later, are useless—they are only auxiliary—unless the fundamental fiscal and monetary policy which attacks inflation at its root is followed through and followed through vigorously.

My hon. friend said that the government had done nothing to check these inflationary forces. Before I touch on that perhaps I might say that I agree in large measure with the enumeration made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra of the various steps which should be taken to attack inflation at its source: increased production; all fiscal and monetary measures such as reduced government expenditures; heavier taxation; budgetary surplus; increase in the interest rate; decrease of credit; reduced personal consumption; higher personal savings; reduced capital expenditures by business; direct controls; the allocation of scarce materials, and so on. With that enumeration I agree; those are various methods by which inflation can be attacked at its source.

Let me point out briefly to the house what has been done as a result of government policy since early last summer, when the admittedly strong inflationary forces which exist today first began to make themselves apparent. I said this in September, and I repeat it today. Early last spring it appeared that the strong post-war inflationary forces had run their course and that prices had pretty well levelled off. Then, of course, came Korea, and since the end of June or early July world conditions have made for the creation of strong inflationary forces not only in Canada but throughout the whole civilized world.

First, what are the fundamental cures for inflation? Increased production. A good deal can be done in that field by increasing efficiency, by getting more elderly people into the working force, by employing more women, by all of us working a bit harder and if necessary a bit longer. As has been said before in this house, we are in an economy which is working pretty well at capacity. I think there is room for increased production by some of the means I have suggested; by improved efficiency, by harder work, by bringing in older groups, and so on. But the extent to which we can carry our greatly increased defence effort by increased production is limited, as I have said before. The weight of defence superimposed upon an economy already operating at a high level will mean inevitably that it must be at the expense of some of the goods and services we now enjoy as civilians. In other words the people of this country as a whole must expect a reduction in their present standard of living.

So much, then, for the effort to increase production. That is something in which the government as such can exercise little direct influence. I have used such powers of exhortation as I possess to urge all Canadians, individuals and employers and others, to endeavour to increase efficiency and production; and, Canadians being what they are, I am confident they will do so.

The second point is the use of the fiscal and monetary weapons. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) made a speech the other evening to which I listened with great attention and interest. He seemed to imply that we had done nothing in this field. I could not make out, any more than I could from what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said, just exactly what he thought the government should do, but I gathered that somehow or other we had failed to exercise some controls over the banks, as to the type of loans they should make. Let me enumerate briefly some of the things the government has done in the fiscal and monetary field. First I come to the reduction of government expenditures; and my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has strongly urged that we should effect a reduction in government expenditure on civilian account. I agree that we should effect every dollar of reduction we possibly can, because the demands of the government are competing with other demands, and consequently to the extent those demands can be cut down it helps reduce the inflationary pressure.

As soon as the added responsibilities which were to fall upon us as the result of the outbreak of the Korean war became apparent, we inaugurated a detailed review of government expenditure. I requested all departments to review their programs for the current year and postpone or eliminate any expenditures which could properly be postponed or eliminated. The house will appreciate that where works are under way or contracts are let, it is not easy to do that quickly; but I am happy to say we have achieved substantial results in that regard. The expenditures for the first nine months of this year, up to the end of December, are below those of last year in most departments. They are substantially below the estimates presented to and voted by this house; and I venture to say that when we close our books at the end of this fiscal year a very creditable result in the way of a reduction in controllable civilian expenditures will have been achieved. In both my budget speeches last year I made appeals to provincial and municipal governments to cut down as far as possible on their non-essential expenditures, and I have directed similar appeals to corporations and private individuals.

In the next place, by way of fundamental attack on the inflationary problem, we have not only been following a full pay-as-you-go policy, but today we are running a substantial surplus, which means that we are taking out of the spending stream more than we are putting back in the shape of the goods and services we are buying from the people of Canada. I never like to compare ours with other administrations, but the United States administration has been appealing for just that sort of thing. We have done it both rigorously and effectively, and in fact the budgetary surplus of Canadian federal government expenditures for the calendar year 1950 would run very close to $450 million. That surplus is still running high in these last few critical months, and that has been so for two reasons. The first is because our actual expenditures are running substantially below the estimates which were approved by this house, and in the second place because our revenues have been running substantially ahead of the revenues I estimated both last March and last September. Still we have been making very effective use of the budgetary weapon by not only fully balancing our budget but by actually attaining a substantial surplus.

In addition to that we have been making, in my judgment, full use of all practical monetary policies. As the house well knows, the Bank of Canada raised its rediscount rate last October. While the rediscount rate has perhaps ceased to have the significance it had a few years ago, interest rates have been allowed to rise; and the changes in those rates, particularly in the short-term rates, have been quite significant. But perhaps most significant of all in this use of the monetary weapon to attack the inflationary forces was the action we took last summer to offset the inflow of capital from the United States prior to releasing the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar. The house, of course, is aware of that huge inflow; I have referred to it before. The increase in our reserves in the third quarter of 1950 exceeded $536 million, and for the year as a whole amounted to the tremendous total of $625 million.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Caused by your unsound policies.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend says it was caused by something or other—

Mr. Ferguson: By your unsound policies, in case you did not hear it.

Mr. Abbott: That may be, but others do not share that opinion. In the circumstances of this huge inflow of capital, which as anyone who knows anything about these things appreciates was bound to have a highly inflationary effect upon our economy unless measures were taken to offset it, we were very fortunate that we did have a large cash surplus in our government accounts which enabled us to finance an important part of that increase without recourse to borrowing.

It is true, as was pointed out by the member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), we did have to have recourse to additional borrowing to the extent of $200 million of the $625 million. But in addition to the use of that large cash surplus, the Bank of Canada had to take, and did take, aggressive action to hold down the cash reserves of the chartered banks. A study of its weekly and monthly statements will show that during those few critical weeks to which I have referred the bank sold several hundred million dollars of government securities out of its portfolios in the open market.

In his remarks the other night the member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) seemed to me—perhaps I am doing him a bit of an injustice—to flounder around a bit in discussing the central bank's capacity to control loans by the chartered banks. I must confess that I was not sure what he had in his mind, and I do not know whether he was quite clear in his own mind. He certainly did not make it clear to me.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member be surprised to know that the governor of the Bank of Canada, when giving evidence before the House of Commons committee on prices in 1948, said precisely what I said the other night? If the minister would be interested, I could read briefly from the committee report.

Mr. Abbott: The hon. member did not give him credit for it in his speech.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): I complained the other night that the power had not been exercised. If I understood the minister correctly, he took me to task for suggesting there was any such power or influence. I now read briefly from what the governor of the Bank of Canada said in 1948, with the minister's permission:

> There is one point I should like to mention in connection with the activities of the central bank and that is the extent to which we maintain touch with and have consultations with the commercial banks;

Then, later he says:

> Later on, in February, 1948, . . . we did express the view of the banks that under existing conditions, when the rate of capital investment is pressing on relatively scarce supplies of manpower and materials, it was undesirable to finance capital expenditures through the expansion of bank credit.

That was the point I brought up the other night, when I pointed out that current loans had gone up by hundreds of millions and which I understood the minister questioned as being within the power.

Mr. Abbott: I thank my hon. friend for the explanation. I understand now what he was driving at. At the time I thought he was suggesting that the central bank should exercise some sort of supervision over the granting of loans by the chartered bank. We all know, of course, that the function of a central bank, such as the Bank of Canada or any other central bank, is to consult from time to time with the commercial banks and to express to them such views as may seem appropriate as to credit policy. I think probably we can take it for granted that that course of action has been followed by the Bank of Canada. I am glad to know that my hon. friend did not suggest that the Bank of Canada should go over the loan portfolios of the banks, and attempt to indicate the loans they should make, and for what purposes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): The minister brought up that clever point himself.

Mr. Abbott: I thank my hon. friend for the compliment.

I do not mean to suggest that the policies which I have been outlining, budgetary policies, monetary policies, fiscal policies and so on, can operate perfectly under all conditions. For instance, with the soundest fundamental anti-inflationary policy in the world, a completely balanced budget, a full use of the interest rate, and so on, if people will not accept the inevitable consequences of the draining off of supplies as a result of the war effort, and insist on wage increases in order to compensate for the increased costs of war, or if they insist on utilizing past savings to maintain their present level of consumption, then of course the pressure on available supplies will not, for the time being, be significantly lessened by the operation of these fiscal measures.

Some member, I forget who it was although it may have been the member from Greenwood, referred to the freeing of the Canadian dollar in September. As anyone who knows about these things will appreciate, that was, in itself, an anti-inflationary move.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Somewhat delayed.

Mr. Abbott: Here I should repeat that we are continuing our efforts, I am continuing my efforts, to push aggressively all appropriate means to encourage the people to increase their personal savings. I deprecate more than I can say, Mr. Speaker, the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) tonight, when he purported to cast doubt on the stability and strength of the Canadian dollar. If responsible public men stand up in this house and attempt to convey an impression to the public that the Canadian government bond is not worthy of confidence —well, I would hate to take the responsibility involved in making a statement of that kind.

Mr. Drew: I would hate to take the responsibility of doing nothing to protect it.

Mr. Abbott: My hon. friend contented himself in his speech with making assertions, and I have been outlining some positive measures which have been taken to protect it.

On the question of direct controls, one of the few positive things he said in his speech was that he was for price control. He did not say whether it was over-all price control. He carefully skated around the inevitable corollary of wage controls, but he did say he was in favour of some measure of price controls. The government has had some considerable experience in the administration of price controls, both on a selective and over-all basis. If I may say so with proper modesty, I have personally had a considerable measure of experience in that field, because I pretty well lived with it from 1943 on when I was first appointed parliamentary assistant to my predecessor, Mr. Ilsley.

As my friend the member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) pointed out the other night, we all know that controls as such do not cure anything. Under certain conditions and certain circumstances, they may be a necessary adjunct to the proper fiscal and monetary policies. This is what I said about that last September, after speaking about direct controls, and this is found on page 420 of Hansard:

> At best direct controls can do little more than contain for a time the pressure of demand; they do not reduce those pressures, nor do they go to the root of the matter. Their proper role is to support and buttress or, if you like, to protect the flanks of fiscal and monetary policy when we have reached the point of the practical limits of taxation.

Let me hasten to say at once, Mr. Speaker—and I am sure I am not revealing any budgetary secrets—that I do not think we have yet reached the practical limits of taxation. As I have had occasion to say in other circumstances, in a full-out war economy you come to a point where it is both administratively and practically impossible to devise a tax scheme which will raise the full amount of your war expenditures as you go along. Human nature being what it is, the effect of such an attempt is that you destroy incentive and reduce the productivity upon which the real fight against inflation depends. We have not reached that point yet.

I am now in the middle of a detailed consideration of the estimates, which I hope will be completed in the fairly near future. As has been suggested, I shall have them before the house for consideration at the earliest possible date. When that task is completed, I shall be in a position to give detailed consideration to the budgetary recommendations which I intend to put before my colleagues and the house. I will say this, and I have said it before: I intend to budget this year for a fully balanced budget, and that in itself is I think one of the fundamental attacks on this problem of inflation.

Up to the present time I think it is fair to say that a substantial degree, certainly by far the greater degree, of the inflationary price rise which we have experienced in this country has been due to forces operating abroad, either prices in countries from which we have to import such a substantial portion of our raw materials or the export prices of our products determined by the prices available in those markets. As I say, we know the value of controls. We know their limitations. We believe we know when they can be made most effective. We have taken powers to exercise selective controls and we are exercising them now. On the order paper there is a resolution, upon which a bill will be founded, asking for wider powers of control. I think it is fair to say that the government will not hesitate to recommend and to bring into force such control measures—whether they are price control measures, wage control measures or otherwise—as it deems necessary in order to protect the Canadian economy; and it will bring them in at the time it believes they are necessary and can be made effective.

In a consideration of this problem of inflation I think we must realize that we are heavily dependent upon forces which are completely outside our own control. I do not want to oversimplify these things. I think it is perhaps fair to say that we cannot expect to experience a much less degree of inflation in Canada than is experienced in the United States. If we do not keep our own house in order, if we do not do the things that we need to do in order to take care of our domestic problems, we can of course sustain a much greater degree of inflation. But inflation is not entirely a matter of formulas or arithmetical computations. It depends upon personal behaviour and upon psychology. In addition to the measures I have been outlining for this fundamental attack on inflation at its roots, if each individual Canadian will make up his mind that he is going to work perhaps a little bit harder and not try to get a bit of an edge on the other fellow because he is afraid that the other fellow may get an edge on him, and if we all put our backs into this task, I am not in any way pessimistic as to what the end result will be.

I believe that essentially Canadians are a common-sense people. I think common sense is one of our outstanding characteristics. I do not think that Canadians are a people who work on the principle, "I'll look out for myself and the devil take the hindmost." The government will do what it can do and what it should do to check inflationary forces. But make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker, this is not one of the things you can cure by passing a law. Too many people believe in the philosophy: This is a bad thing; there ought to be a law against it. This is not one of those forces which can be cured by passing any law. It can be contained, having regard to our domestic economy, by following sound policies along the lines which I have been outlining. In order to be successful it will require the co-operation and the participation of the Canadian people; and I believe that that co-operation and that assistance will be forthcoming.

I do not believe that a system of over-all price or wage controls would be either desirable or effective at this time. Make no mistake about it; one cannot go into this thing for any length of time in a piecemeal manner.

Controls on any wide scale will mean control of prices, of wages, of allocations, rationing and all the rest. I do not believe that, as yet, the proportion of our national production which is to be devoted to the purposes of war is such as to make a course of that kind necessary, desirable or effective. I conclude on the note I sounded a moment ago. We know how controls work; we know what their limitations are; and we will use them to the extent that we believe they may be necessary.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): First of all, Mr. Speaker, let me say to the minister, who has outlined what he contends the government has done to protect the Canadian people from the rising cost of living, that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. Prices have continued to rise. I recall that a couple of years ago the minister, not in this house but at a press conference, said that he hoped that prices would level off—he did not say that they would; I want to be fair to him—at an index figure of somewhere, and I am speaking from memory, between 140 and 145.

Mr. Abbott: I said about 145.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, about 145. Last summer, at the time that the Korean war began, our cost of living index had already exceeded 165 points and at the present moment the cost of living index in this country has reached 172.5, the highest point in our history. The minister has outlined what the government has done and I say that the government's policy, if it was intended to assist the Canadian people in this period of the rising cost of living, has failed in its objective. On the other hand, during the war we find that by means of controls and subsidies the cost of living was stabilized.

We are not proposing the subamendment to this house on any doctrinaire principle. We are proposing it because we have believed and now believe that had we continued to exercise not entire control of the economy, as has been suggested, but some control of the economy in these post-war years, the cost of living in this country would not have inflicted on the Canadian people the hardship it has inflicted ever since 1945. In this house in 1946 there was a sentiment for the continuance of subsidies on certain primary necessities of life for the Canadian people. I remember how, in August of 1946 upon a motion moved by one of my colleagues in this group, this house voted for the continuance of the subsidy on milk in order to assist both the producer and the consumer. The house voted in favour of our motion. Yet within six weeks of that vote the government discontinued that subsidy and in effect flouted the will of the elected representatives of the people. Since then step by step we have seen the removal of subsidies, the removal of controls, the rise in prices and the unprecedented heights to which rents have gone in this country.

Tonight the minister has defended what the government has done, and I am saying that the government has failed. We welcome the leader of the opposition's support for the subamendment, but again let me remind the house that when we were fighting for a continuance of intelligent controls and beneficial subsidies my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party joined with the government of Canada in voting against the continuance of those controls and subsidies. To the leader of the opposition and to the Progressive Conservative party may I say that my hon. friend who moved this motion (Mr. Herridge) made it perfectly clear that this was not being done from any doctrinaire standpoint so far as we were concerned. In moving this subamendment, as reported at page 156 of Hansard of February 7, he said:

> For the sake of my good friends to my right and my friends immediately opposite, who are listening to me with considerable interest, I should like to make this point clear. Price controls, and the necessary subsidies, do not constitute socialism. They are an attempt, under capitalism, consciously to regulate the system so that it will work for the greater advantage of the greater number. There is nothing very frightening about that, and nothing radical about it. It is just an attempt to bring order out of chaos and to bring stability to our financial and economic system, so that the people of this country will have a cost of living that is reasonably stable, and so that we shall have a wage structure that is necessarily more stable because of that price structure.

The leader of the opposition said that he could picture the Politburo in Moscow with a chart watching the inflation in our countries. I can picture them also, and so can a very influential and prominent Conservative in Great Britain. The fact is that is the very thing he warned about in his most recent article in Maclean's magazine. I refer of course to Mr. Beverley Baxter. Incidentally, I have not always quoted him with approval, but on this occasion I think he drives home the point that the leader of the opposition makes, and the point which is very much in my mind as I see this rising cost of living.

I say to the house now, as I have said before, that if you want to increase the support for communism in this country, or anywhere else, you make it impossible for the ordinary man to live decently. At that point you will find that communist propaganda becomes very effective, and the best propagandists for communism are not the members of the Labour-Progressive party in this country. They are the people who today are taking advantage of the inflationary factors in our economy, who are shooting up in an unwarranted way the price structure, and who are trying to reap undue profits out of the present difficult situation in the country.

In discussing the tremendous expenditures proposed in Europe and elsewhere for rearmament Mr. Baxter says this:

> There will be threatening incidents in Europe which will cause the western world to increase its mounting expenditure on rearmament and take more and more men from industry into the armed forces while, with the cunning of the Oriental and the patience of the Slav, Stalin will try to crash the western world economically through inflation caused by rearmament. Obviously, if communism is ever to become a force in the western world, the best way is to force up prices until the poor and the lowest-paid workers find life almost unendurable.

I say that I agree with that statement in Maclean's magazine made by Mr. Beverley Baxter. The government has not taken the steps to meet this situation. Indeed the very speech of the minister tonight and the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the other night, in which they both intimated that perhaps sometime in the future controls would be put into effect, is an invitation to certain types of businessmen—and they are not all alike; please do not misunderstand me—to push prices up and take all the traffic will bear in the hope that if they get them high enough, and the price level is stabilized at that point, they will continue to reap undue profits.

Mr. Knowles: They will be set.

Mr. Coldwell: In other words, they will be all set. As a matter of fact, you have only to go into the stores in this city to know how prices have been pushed up over the last few weeks. On Saturday I had a letter from a man in Swift Current, and he asked me if I could explain to him why three boxes of matches, which a few weeks ago were selling at 23 cents, were that day in the store in the city where he lived 33 cents. Or can anybody explain to me why, for example, if I may speak personally as the minister did, a collar which I bought a week ago, an Arrow collar, which I could buy in New York in November for 29 cents, plus one cent tax, 30 cents in all—and I bought them there—cost me 65 cents in a local store? When I asked the reason I was told, "Oh, well you see, the price has gone up during the last two or three weeks." Clothing, particularly shirts as well as all the articles that comprise a child's clothes, boots and shoes and so on, are being shot up to a level so that if the prices are controlled they will be controlled at the very highest price.

I say to the Minister of Finance when he brings down his budget I hope he will not neglect to deal with this kind of thing by clapping on an excess profits tax to drain back this kind of money which has been taken out of the Canadian people. I would like to see him do something else as well. The leader of the opposition mentioned speculation. Over the last number of years we have seen people take profits out of common stocks, out of property such as housing, and so on, without turning a hand.

Years ago, during the first war, I suggested a capital gains tax. I think that one of the most fruitful sources of revenue that we could find would be a capital gains tax, a tax on unearned increment, on all sorts of things, including the stocks that the speculator deals with. He toils not, neither does he spin, but he has all the wealth of Solomon, lacking perhaps his wisdom. He has his wealth, and if I may carry the metaphor just a little further, he sometimes lives as Solomon did in other respects. I suggest a capital gains tax to catch the speculator who has been taking the cream off the economy.

Bear this in mind. We are making large governmental expenditures. I remember the tribute that was paid to the price controls system that was put into effect during the war. Let me read it. The Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley who was minister of finance during the war, in dealing with the emergency powers under which we exercised control, had this to say. When he was dealing with this bill of course he was no longer minister of finance. He was minister of justice. This is what he said, as reported at page 1926 of Hansard of April 1, 1947:

> It is estimated that government expenditures averaged $4 billion a year between 1942 and 1946. Without price control this cost might have been at the very least twenty-five per cent higher. I think that twenty-five per cent is based upon the other figures which I have given with regard to the additional percentage which the consumers would have been obliged to pay; and the stabilization program has thus meant a saving of another billion dollars a year. From these estimates it is possible to see that the cost of the control program was under $200 million a year, while the savings to the consumer purchasers and government as a buyer were on this hypothesis possibly $2½ billion a year. The figures are tentative but do give some idea of the relative magnitude of the cost of and the savings effected by the government price control program.

If you divide $2½ billion by $200 million which it cost, you find that for every dollar we spent on these controls we saved for the consumers and the country, and after all consumers also make up the population of the country, $12.50.

The argument was made, of course, that we could not do this kind of thing in peacetime. Very well; we thought that we could. But in any event we are now in what is virtually a war economy, or so close to a war economy, that it is very difficult to make any distinction between this economy and a wartime economy.

When the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) comes before the house and tells us we are going to spend $1,600 million on defence preparation in the next year, and that we are going to spend $5 billion in the next three years, then we are embarking upon a spending program on behalf of the people of Canada, apart altogether from the people of the country as individuals, which does approach the wartime economy when controls and subsidies proved to be so beneficial. When I say "approached" I am not pretending that they are expenditures right up to wartime; but at least they are approaching wartime figures.

The minister shakes his head. What are peacetime budgets? Well, I was here before the war. I was here before we had wartime budgets and post-war budgets. I remember that in the pre-war years we thought a budget of $550 million for this country was a very substantial one. I can remember how in June of 1939, when my hon. friends of the Social Credit party wanted to move for an issue of $200 million worth of currency by the Bank of Canada, it was opposed. At that time I suggested a compromise, that we ask for $100 million which, to me, seemed reasonable. We were told by the then minister of finance, the Hon. Charles Dunning, that we had accepted a budget of over $500 million: Where did we think we could get another $100 million? Those were peacetime budgets. Budgets we have had since the outbreak of the second world war were either wartime budgets or post-war budgets made necessary because of the conditions arising out of the war. They were wartime budgets in that sense. And when we see that this year we are going to spend an additional billion dollars and more on defence over what we have been used to spending in the last few years, one can see that this is bound to have an inflationary effect, unless we exercise some measures of control.

I agree with the minister that an answer, of course, is increased productivity. He said tonight that we had no pool of unemployed in the sense that we had a pool of unemployed in 1939, that we have no idle machines, that every available resource we can produce is being utilized by industry in one way or another.

Of course I believe we could improve our productivity to some extent by improving our industrial organization, by improving our machinery and so on. But I think all we could do in that respect would not be sufficient to increase production to the extent that would be necessary to keep down the present inflation.

So we have to do something else. We suggest that other measures should be taken. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) is quite right; we give these two, price controls and subsidies, as two of the things which should be done. And, incidentally, we believe that they should be done. May I add that when I mention price controls I am also thinking of rent controls. I do not in my own mind differentiate between one sort of price and another sort of price, the prices of commodities and the price paid for a place in which a man and his family shall live.

An hon. Member: What about wages?

Mr. Coldwell: Someone says, "What about wages?" I will not dodge that question. We have today a very substantial measure of wage controls. We have a substantial measure of the control of farm prices. The farmer who produces wheat in the prairie provinces today in large part—not wholly—is controlled by the world wheat agreement. As the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) knows well, organizations with which he is connected make agreements for a year in advance. Some wage agreements are for two years in advance, and those wages are controlled.

Let me add immediately that if we have the proper kind of controls in effect in this country—price, rent and other controls—and the leaders of the unions and workers are brought into conference, I am convinced agreements can be worked out that would stabilize wages. That could be done, if prices were controlled. Because, remember, wages have been chasing prices—not prices chasing wages, as is so often said.

So that today we are in an economy which is virtually, in the sense in which I now use the term, a wartime economy. Higher productivity—yes. But higher productivity will not meet the needs of the current situation. So I say that in my opinion the government should not wait until clothing, furniture and a hundred and one other commodities which enter into the daily living of the people of Canada have been pushed up to the top level, and then stabilize the price level. I think attempts should be made, indeed, to roll back those prices, so that many people in this country could have some hope.

I understood what the leader of the opposition said when he spoke about the depreciation of the Canadian dollar. I do not think he said what the Minister of Finance interpreted him as saying. What he said was an actual fact, of course, that the dollars of the people invested in insurance, victory bonds and other savings, would buy when the investment was made almost twice as much as they will buy today. To that extent the purchasing power of a dollar in a bond has certainly depreciated.

I think it is the duty of the government to see to it that those savings of the people are protected, and that there is also protection for the standard of living of those who have suffered, those who are living on savings and pensions—old age and veterans, industrial and otherwise. In our opinion that can be done only by doing far more than the government has already done. Some of the things that should be done are the putting into effect immediately of price controls and the paying of subsidies to primary producers so that consumer goods will cost less; and that a real attempt should be made to roll back prices and to organize our economy so that we shall have some economic stability and essential unity among our people in the great national effort we are being called upon to undertake.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 13, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION ACT

CREATION OF NEW DEPARTMENT—MOBILIZATION OF ECONOMIC AND INDUSTRIAL FACILITIES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill (a) to constitute a department of defence production, to be presided over by a minister, with appropriate provision for the employment of officers, clerks and employees; (b) to provide that the minister shall take steps to mobilize, conserve, and co-ordinate all economic and industrial facilities in respect of defence supplies and defence projects, and in connection therewith, to buy or otherwise acquire defence supplies and to construct defence projects, and for these purposes to confer appropriate powers on the minister and to provide for the establishment of a defence production board revolving fund; and (c) to provide further that the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations as he deems necessary to control and regulate the production, processing, distribution, acquisition, disposition, or use of materials, or the supply or use of services deemed essential for defence purposes.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL PARKS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PARK IN NEWFOUNDLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Would the Minister of Resources and Development be good enough to tell us what progress has been made in connection with the establishment of a national park in Newfoundland?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): That is a matter which has received a good deal of consideration. It is still under consideration, but I am not able to report any definite progress at this time.

HOUSING

WINNIPEG—LOW RENTAL HOUSING FOR VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What consideration is the Minister of Resources and Development giving to the request of the Winnipeg branch of the Canadian Legion that some way be found to retain wartime houses in Winnipeg on a rental basis for veterans in dire need of low rental housing accommodation?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question, which I received just prior to coming into the chamber.

The Winnipeg branch of the Legion has been in contact with me and with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation about the sales program of veterans housing. When the agreements were drawn up, they contemplated the sale of the houses. The agreements provided that there would be a $400 lot fee payable to the city in the event of sale within the first five years, and that thereafter the lot fee would be $200. In response to requests from many veterans, the government decided to sell these houses to veterans when the $200 arrangement came into effect. That program has been instituted and is going very well throughout the country. So far about 300 houses in Winnipeg have been put up for sale, and the remaining 1,300 will be made available for sale when the $200 lot fee arrangement applies.

Mr. Knowles: Does that mean that no consideration is being given to the Legion's request that this program be suspended?

KOREA

INQUIRY AS TO REINFORCEMENTS FOR CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Would the Minister of National Defence inform the house whether there are today in Korea the ten per cent first-line reinforcements for the Princess Patricias which it is customary to send with all field forces into a theatre of war?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the rate of reinforcements provided to meet conditions in Korea—according to the best of my recollection because I had no notice of this question—is eighty-five officers and men per month. This seems to have been found adequate in the experience of the other forces fighting there. The men necessary to supply these reinforcements indefinitely, of course, are at Fort Lewis in the third battalion of the Princess Patricias and the other formations there. En route to Korea are enough to look after the first month's requirements after the Princess Patricias go into action. Whether or not they are actually in Korea with the unit or somewhere between Japan and Korea, I cannot say. It is a matter of hours, one way or the other.

RECROSSING OF 38TH PARALLEL BY UNITED NATIONS TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Yesterday I directed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In his absence, it was answered by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). It is found on page 253 of Hansard and reads as follows:

> Were members of the United Nations consulted about the reported recrossing of the 38th parallel by United Nations troops? If so, did Canada express an opinion, and what was it?

The Prime Minister answered, and I asked a supplementary question to which I am most anxious to secure an answer. It reads:

> Has Canada made any representations to the secretary general or to the United Nations concerning reconsideration of the implied permission which was granted to the troops last October?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Prime Minister has directed my attention to these questions and has asked me to reply to them, which I am glad to do.

There is some doubt as to the exact details about the reported crossing of the 38th parallel by a South Korean detachment. Apparently it was a purely tactical movement and on a small scale, and does not indicate that any decision has been taken for a major crossing of the line, even if military conditions make that possible.

In reply to the second question, Mr. Speaker, Canada has not made any representations to the secretary general or to the United Nations concerning the question of the recrossing of the 38th parallel by United Nations forces. However, representatives of governments with forces participating in Korean operations have had informal discussions recently with the United States representatives in regard to this and other matters arising out of the Korean campaign. These discussions have included a Canadian representative. As a result of these discussions, I think I can state that the political significance of any new move across the parallel deep into North Korean territory is fully appreciated. At this moment I would not like to add anything to this observation beyond repeating my view that any decision taken in this matter should be a collective one, including particularly those governments who are participating in United Nations-Korean operations, of which the most important is the United States of America.

IMMIGRATION

COUNT JACQUES DE BERNONVILLE—QUESTION AS TO TABLING OF FRENCH DECREES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration; I am sorry that it was impossible for me to give him notice. When does the minister expect to table the text of the French government's decrees mentioned in his reply to my question on February 9?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The texts in English and in French will be tabled at the earliest possible moment.

TORONTO SUBWAY

QUESTION AS TO AVAILABILITY OF MATERIAL TO COMPLETE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the Toronto Transportation Commission can be reasonably assured of enough material to finish its badly needed rapid transit subway?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Toronto Transportation Commission seems to be getting on very well without any help from the Minister of Trade and Commerce; at least it has asked for none. I know of nothing to prevent the commission from carrying on with the work.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS OF DR. ENDICOTT AND ASSOCIATES IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Ferguson (Simcoe North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. How much longer is this country going to tolerate—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Ferguson:—termites like Dr. Endicott and his associates voicing their communistic opinions in the capital of Canada?

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr.

W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Herridge.

Mr. J. J. Smith (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I join with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Laing) in his expression of the opinion they were good Liberal addresses. This afternoon it is my intention to make a good Liberal address. Everyone may not agree that it will be a good Liberal address. However, I can assure you it will not be a Social Credit address, nor will it be a C.C.F. address, nor a Tory address; therefore, it will be a Liberal address, good or bad.

I am going to deal first, Mr. Speaker, with controls. I should have liked to deal with the previous C.C.F. subamendment. In my opinion it was a Red subamendment, but since it has been discarded I suppose I am not at liberty to deal with it. However, this control subamendment which is now before the house is a better one. Of course, that is the way the C.C.F. generally operates. I know about the C.C.F. party because I was brought up among them in Saskatchewan. They wave a flag, and if the people will follow it, fine and dandy; if not, then they drop that flag and pick up another one and wave it. In my opinion they have a flag this time which more people will follow. Already it appears as though they have support for this subamendment from the other two opposition groups. I believe the amendment calls upon members of parliament for a vote of nonconfidence in the government for not imposing controls.

I represent, sir, a constituency composed of farmers and many labouring men in and around the Estevan area. I have had many little cards sent to me, as have most of the members of this house. On checking these cards I find that the ones I have received, and I have hundreds of them, came from the labour group in my constituency. This card says that controls should be applied immediately to protect the living standards of our families. I am not opposed to controls, Mr. Speaker, in principle. I am going to answer, through the record, the people of my constituency who sent me these cards, because I have far too many to answer personally. I am going to say to them that in my opinion a large majority are sincere in asking for controls. They ask me for my support. Had they also requested control of wages, I assure them that they would have obtained my support. However, I have neither read nor heard anything from union leaders suggesting that wages should be controlled. I would say, therefore, that at the moment they are barking up the wrong tree. They should ask their union leaders to come out and say they are willing to accept controls across the board.

I am going to deal with the farmers in a moment, but on this same card it says that rent controls should be maintained, and it urges me to support this legislation. As to rent control, again I say that in principle I am not opposed to it. But I think rent control is a provincial responsibility. I definitely think that the matter should be handled provincially, because it could be handled more efficiently in that way than by the federal government. For instance, I do not think anyone would suggest that the premier of his province and his government and the city councils could not sit down and work out a rent control scheme for that province better than could the federal government.

I will now speak for a moment about the farmers in my constituency, and I think what I say about them is applicable to the farmers in many parts of Canada. I have not read or heard anything to the effect that the farmers have said they want to be controlled across the board. I do not think farmers on the whole are opposed to controls; but at the moment I cannot see what a farmer has to gain by being controlled. The things that he has to sell, with the exception of beef, in recent months have gone down in price, and the things that he has to buy have gone up. I cannot see where he would benefit from controls at the moment. However, if the farmers want to come out, through their leaders and through the farmers' union, of which I am a member, and say that they want controls across the board, they will definitely get my support. At the moment, however, they have not said so, and I do not think the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has said so either.

I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), in the special session last fall, said that in his opinion one of the reasons why the government was not putting on controls, was that the people of Canada were not yet ready for them. I am quite satisfied that the farmers and labour in my constituency have not definitely stated that they want controls. I join to some extent with the official opposition, speaking through their leader, who intimated in the first part of his speech that he was in favour of controls and then before he finished said that we should support the C.C.F. amendment just on principle, even if we did not agree with it. At one time he is in favour of controls, and at another time he is not in favour of controls. I join with him and take the same position, because I do not know whether that would help the situation.

Some good comments have been made with regard to the speech from the throne. The opposition has given the house some food for thought. However, I have been less impressed by the criticism this time than I was in previous sessions when I was a new member, and, I admit, one who was very green and still is. They are now criticizing the government for not doing anything to head off inflation. When I came here first I sat in this chair and heard the members of the opposition say that prior to the session the government had hidden a depression. They said that we had a depression in Canada and that for election reasons the government had kept it out of sight; that we had lost our markets and that prices were going down. Representing the constituency which I have the honour to represent, Mr. Speaker, I sat in my chair and shivered. I thought that possibly what they were saying was true. However, it did not turn out to be the case. It is well to recall that the predictions which the opposition make do not seem to turn out; I do not know why.

Last spring, when it was said that we had an unemployment situation in Canada, the official opposition—and I think the other two oppositions joined with them—again called upon this government to bring in a public works program, or to start a building program across this country, so that it would take care of this unemployment and head off this so-called depression and tendency towards lower prices. Again I have to confess that I more or less agreed with them. I thought that was the situation, but it turned out not to be so. Some hon. members might say that the Korean war was the cause of that. But if the government of the day had gone into a program of public works, it would have laid itself wide open to criticism today, because the public works program is going to have to be cut down. I am not too critical of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, because it must be maddening to sit in the opposition and make statement after statement, only to find out that none of them turns out to be in accordance with the facts. They complain about the government not giving them any information. Under the circumstances I suggest that the government should give them some more information, so that when they make these assertions they will know what they are talking about.

I want to say a word about inflation. There is a great deal of talk about the man in the street and what a hard time he is having. I can recall the time, in the thirties, when I started to farm in Saskatchewan. I had a hard time. It is true that the dollar is inflated today. Some people say that it takes two dollars now to buy what one would buy a few years ago. But I do not think it makes much difference to the average Joe, including the average farmer, whether the dollar goes only half as far as it used to, provided that he now has two or three instead of one. I think that is the picture throughout Canada today. I have not travelled over a great deal of Canada, but I have been around a little bit, and when I visit the towns and cities I do not go to the high-priced hotels. I visit my friends and relations who happen to live in the poorer parts of the city and quite close to the slums, if there are any. I find that today there is less difference between the poor man and the rich man than there has been at any previous time in the history of this country.

We have another group that are complaining about inflation. We have a certain number of people in this country who have bought insurance and government bonds and who have money in the bank. They are complaining because they thought at one time that the interest on those savings would keep them. They are in a bad way. I suggest to them that if they have not the standard of living they think they should have, they should spend a little of their principal in these days. If the principal will not keep them going, they have one consolation, Mr. Speaker. I am hopeful that we shall have the old age pension at seventy without a means test, and at sixty-five with a means test. If by that time they have not anything left, they can do as many of the rest of us may have to do, namely, live on the pension. If they will not be sixty-five at that time, then they can get out and work for a living as most of us Canadians do.

I am now going to turn to my final subject, and I wish to read a little poem I have here. I do not think the author was Shakespeare or Bobbie Burns or anyone of that calibre; he may have been one of my colleagues from the province of Ontario. It reads:

> To the winging bird the only word is > Tweet, tweet, tweet;
> To the maid in spring the word she loves is > Sweet, sweet, sweet;
> But the damndest word I ever heard is > Wheat, wheat, wheat.

I realize that to many hon. members wheat is not an interesting subject. I must confess that when hon. members are speaking about fish—and properly so, although I listen—I am not greatly interested. Since I represent a wheat-growing constituency, I am going to talk about wheat for a few minutes. Today in Canada, as most people know, wheat is handled through the Canadian wheat board. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the time will never come when I shall have to market my wheat in any other way. I want to make it very plain where I stand.

Some people argue that if we had an open market we would have received much higher prices for our wheat. That I question. I am going to use flax as an example, to show the house what happens on the open market. I think an open market is a crazy set-up. I harvested flax this fall, and therefore I am talking about something with which I am familiar. That is why I did not deal with external affairs. At the conclusion of the special session last fall I went home and got out the combine, and I threshed a fairly good crop of flax. As I said, I am using flax as an illustration to show the difference between the operations of the open market and those of the wheat board. I repeat that I am not in favour of the open market set-up. The law of supply and demand will definitely set what you are to get for a thing in the end, but I am not in favour of that method of marketing.

Coming back to flax, last fall while harvesting my flax I drew one load to the elevator. That was in October. I do not recall the date, but I sold it for $3.34 a bushel. It was the first grade of flax. The elevator man tested it for moisture, and it just got by. He said to me: "If it is tough tomorrow" —that was in the evening—"don't draw any in". The next day the sun did not come out, and I figured it might be tough, so I did not take it in. I put it in the granary and sold it in December before coming down here, and I received $4.70 a bushel for that flax. It was the same flax that I had sold for $3.34 a short time before. It has gone up since, and within recent days it has gone down. It dropped a matter of thirty cents a bushel in two days, fifteen cents a bushel a day. That is the same set-up as we had under the open-market scheme for wheat.

There are some hon. members who have made the statement—I do not know whether the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) is one of them but I know definitely that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) is one of them—that the farmers had lost thirty-five cents a bushel under the wheat board set-up this fall. The price set by the board was $1.40. I do not think we lost thirty-five cents, because since then we have received twenty cents. The premier of our province has been running around the country and speaking over the radio, telling the western farmers that in Saskatchewan they have lost $100 million. If what he said was correct, then we have already received $56 million of that. That is what twenty cents a bushel is going to amount to; and I am informed on very good authority that we can expect another twenty cents. Therefore we in the province of Saskatchewan are going to have under that scheme $12 million more than we lost.

I hear voices, Mr. Speaker, but I am not sure just where they are coming from.

In conclusion I wish to say that many of the farmers in western Canada are a little disappointed that the government has not seen fit to make an announcement on the five-year pool. It is true we have been told that negotiations are going on with the United Kingdom government.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Not according to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Well, discussion, if that suits the hon. member better. I do not care whether it is discussion or negotiation. I was going to say that I was getting sick and tired, but I am going to leave out the word "sick"; I am not sick yet but I may be a little tired. I am not blaming the government at the moment for not making the announcement. But I urge the government to crack the whip and get going on this negotiation or discussion with the United Kingdom government and let us have a decision on what is going to happen in respect to the five-year pool payments.

Many figures have been given as to what we should get. The other day the hon. member for Souris said that we should receive fifty cents a bushel as a final payment on the five-year pool, but that we were willing to take twenty-five cents. That is charitable. We are willing to take half of what we think we should get. If I may say so, I think that thirty cents a bushel would be closer to the mark, and I agree with him that we are willing to take half, which in that case would be fifteen cents. Of course that is only my own opinion. If we were to demand the last cent from the United Kingdom government that we calculate we have lost under the agreement—

Mr. Ross (Souris): How about the Canadian government?

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): The hon. member had better get after them; I am talking about the other contract. If we were to demand the last cent from the United Kingdom government that we think we have lost, I think we would be a very mean people, particularly when we remember the battle of Britain. We all know what Britain went through; but at the same time I do not think we should be expected to accept anything less than something in the neighbourhood of fifteen cents a bushel as a final payment. I would urge the government to do something before seeding time rolls around again or before Easter, about bringing this matter to a conclusion. I shall be going home at Easter, or at the end of the session. I have been following the session very closely, Mr. Speaker, and the policies of the government. I am prepared to go home and explain the policies of the government to my constituents. Unless we get something for this wheat I am not prepared to explain that; nor do I intend to make excuses.

We have a good strong government, and we are ready to support it. Once again I say we should have a settlement on this matter. However, I shall be speaking on this again, and if we get a settlement I think it should be in the neighbourhood of fifteen cents a bushel. I am prepared to make one of two addresses. If we get a fair payment, it will be a very pleasant and juicy address, but if there is nothing done, I can assure you, sir, that it will be sour and bitter.

I suppose that my colleagues and members of the opposition groups and some of the people in my constituency will say that I should not have said the things I have said; but I am quite sure that if they realize the consolation I get out of saying what I think, they will excuse me.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith) will pardon me if I did not follow his remarks very carefully. Unfortunately I could not hear the first part of his address. The second part of it had to do with wheat, which is not a matter of great interest to most members in the house, particularly those from the maritime provinces. I believe that in the sixteen years I have been here, practically fifty per cent of the time in debate has been taken up in the discussion of wheat.

For a few moments I should like to refer to the matter of controls. Two important matters have been before the house: first, our Canadian defence program, and second, controls and inflation. I shall not take much time in discussing inflation, because it was thoroughly covered by my leader yesterday. I will simply say that I agree one hundred per cent with the very practical ideas he expressed on the subject.

Contrary to what the hon. member who has just taken his seat may think, the people of Canada are greatly exercised about controls and inflation. I believe that today it is the chief problem facing the people of this country, and certainly it is the problem which the people feel the government should deal with immediately. There is a feeling of impatience with the soaring of living costs throughout the country. Not only are the people impatient, but they have a genuine fear in their hearts about this condition.

Last night I listened to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and I must say that to a great extent I agree with his remarks. To illustrate a point he made, he mentioned his having paid sixty cents for a collar which only a short time before could have been bought for thirty cents. Let me tell the house about an experience of my own in that regard. I went to a shoe store to buy a pair of shoes. The clerk told me that only the day before, the price of that particular type of shoe had increased by $2.50. While I was in the store a man who worked in a factory in our town came in, in company with his two boys, with the intention of buying shoes. He asked the price, and when he was told that the price of shoes for his boys had increased by more than $2, he said that he felt he could not buy at that time. Knowing that I was coming to Ottawa to attend the session, he turned to me and said, "You people up there will have to do something about this matter. It is becoming impossible for me to clothe and feed my family and to pay my rent, because of the way in which prices are soaring".

I am sure the experience of this man is that of all heads of families throughout the country. The hon. member for Moose Mountain said, "Oh, these people can use up their principal." The people I am speaking about —and there are tens of thousands of them across the country—have no principal to use up. The hon. member went on to say that the rich and the poor are in much the same position. That is not correct. The poor man today has not sufficient money with which to buy the necessities of life. This is one reason why I feel that the government must do something now to halt price increases. It is being done in the United States.

The hon. member for Moose Mountain says that the C.C.F., Social Credit and Progressive Conservative parties are backing controls. I would point out to him that in the United States today it is felt that a measure of controls is necessary. In Canada we are proud to follow the United States in many things. I believe that in this matter as well we would be wise to do so.

In the situation that is developing I am sure some controls have become necessary. I do not think over-all control is required, but certainly controls are necessary to some extent. I believe that public support would be behind a measure of controls at this time —and we must have public support; otherwise enforcement would not be possible. Some measure of control would curb the extra momentum gained by inflation at every step.

The other day the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) told us there were many interests which are opposed to controls. We know this to be true. We know, for instance, that the producer may be opposed to controls, and that many consumers are opposed to controls. This is always true in an economy where the supply of goods is reduced in relation to the supply of dollars. That is what is happening in Canada today, when civilian goods are being turned to military uses, with the resulting scarcity which is causing inflation. In view of the height to which prices have climbed, it seems clear that some measure of control should have been put on two or three months ago. For instance, we read only yesterday in the evening papers that coal had been increased in price by $1.75 a ton. Pick up a paper any day and you will find that prices are going up, not just a few cents, but in many instances by much larger amounts.

It is not my intention to discuss this matter further at the moment. All the evidence we have points to the fact that some measure of control must be exercised in Canada. I agree with the Minister of Finance that one way to help to stop inflation is to have heavy taxation. Unless we tax the people heavily, there can be no question that inflation will do so. These two might work together. I agree with the Minister of Finance that we must balance our budget. These things go hand in hand with controls, and if immediate action is taken it will be well for the people of this country.

The other question which is exercising the minds of our people is that of security and the part we should play in world events. Canadians are a proud people, and I am satisfied that they wish us to carry our full share of such defence measures as may be necessary to preserve the liberties we cherish. Speaking yesterday, one hon. member compared what was being done by Canada and by Great Britain. It was pointed out that while Great Britain had from 600,000 to a million men under arms—and he accepted the lower figure—Canada has only 60,000, showing a ratio of ten to one. This means that Great Britain, with a population slightly more than three times that of Canada, and with natural resources far inferior to those we have, has armed forces ten times as great as those of Canada.

There is the same ratio also in the United States. Much praise has been given the United States for the splendid work which is being done in Korea. We are all proud of our neighbours to the south for the action they have taken in that country. We feel that the United Nations took the only action that was possible. But it must be remembered that the United States was the only nation that had troops in that vicinity, and therefore she has had to bear a great burden there.

It must be remembered that while Great Britain has only one brigade in Korea, she has many thousands of troops in Malaya and a large army at Hong Kong. This is all part of the picture in the east. It should be pointed out also that France has a large army in Indo-China, which is part of the picture in the east. When we give great credit to the United States, as we should, for what she is doing in Korea, we must not forget the part that is being played by Great Britain and France in their respective areas.

Canada is going to spend $5,000 million in the next few years on defence. This is an enormous sum and should permit the raising and equipping of whatever troops are necessary. We should be able to produce the munitions that may be required. All sections of Canada are anxious to bear their fair and adequate share of the responsibility, both as to taxes and as to manpower. There is no question that every part of Canada will bear its share of taxes, because taxes are levied on the same basis all across the country.

If war should come and it is necessary for Canada to raise large forces, I think the people would wish that the raising of manpower be done in a way that will be fair to all sections of the country. Everybody knows that in time of war some men must fight, while others serve in other ways; and soldier and civilian morale will be much better if the selection for service is defined in the most understandable terms possible. I think the people of Canada wish and desire that that be done.

All sections of Canada—the maritimes, central Canada and the west—should have some share in the production of munitions and supplies. The minister has made much of the fact that equipment has been sent to Belgium and the Netherlands; that was a good thing and we approve of it. It was the logical and sensible thing to do. I am satisfied that since Canada is taking equipment from the United States we could not do less than send equipment to those people in Europe who will be fighting, if necessary, the battles of freedom.

I think also that the people of Canada approve of the defence of Europe. I have heard very little talk of isolationism here in Canada, although there has been a good deal in the United States. I am thankful that we in Canada have not taken the same attitude as a great many people in the United States have taken, although it seems to be dying out. Everyone realizes that if the western hemisphere is to be defended, Europe also must be defended. One minister has said that if we should lose Europe to Russia in the next war we would lose one of the greatest manufacturing potentials in the world. We would lose all the steel and manufacturing centres to Russia. There is no reason in the world why Canadians should not approve the defence of Europe.

The question of arming Germany has come up. This is a difficult problem for the United Nations or others concerned to deal with. There is no doubt that eastern Germany is armed today. Russia has 50,000 east Germans under arms at the present time. They are equipped with tanks, guns and aeroplanes. If the other half of Germany is not armed, we may have the same situation as we had in Korea. The Russians armed the North Koreans while the United States left the South Koreans unarmed. Then they went away and the North Koreans moved into South Korea, and we all know the great difficulty our people have been having in trying to drive them back and to retain that country. So I think these matters, or most of them, have the approval of the Canadian people.

My main object in speaking this afternoon was not to touch on the matter of controls and the manpower problems that will arise should another war come, but to deal with another matter which is referred to in the speech from the throne, in the following words:

> The urgent need of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project in relation to the security of this continent is becoming increasingly apparent. It is the view of my ministers that the Canadian authorities should be kept in a position to co-operate promptly in undertaking construction of the project once affirmative action has been taken by the appropriate United States authorities.

Anyone who has read the press of Canada and the United States during the last few weeks knows that the St. Lawrence seaway is a burning question in the United States. A bill has been introduced in congress by F. D. Roosevelt, Jr., a son of the late president, providing for the construction of the seaway and power project. In introducing the bill Mr. Roosevelt said:

> The St. Lawrence seaway and power project will provide the least expensive means of providing necessary transportation of iron ore and other critical materials and the least costly way of providing additional power—so badly needed in New York, New England and eastern Canada.

President Truman has said that it is necessary to construct this seaway for the national security of the United States and Canada. As one from the maritimes it is my opinion that the St. Lawrence seaway will be of absolutely no benefit to the people of the maritime provinces. However, I do not mean that the people of the maritime provinces will object to the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. When our government and the government of the United States decide that the seaway is necessary for the defence of this continent we shall have no choice in the matter but to support it. Nevertheless, as I have said, as a peacetime project it would be of practically no benefit to the people of the maritimes. As a matter of fact it would be a hindrance, because there is no doubt that the main reason for constructing the St. Lawrence waterway would be to provide a great deal of additional electrical power to Ontario and Quebec; and the more power they have, the more industry will be concentrated in those provinces, to the detriment of the maritimes and the west. However, on the basis on which it probably will be constructed, as I said a moment ago we in the maritimes do not feel that we can raise any great objection.

In fairness to the people of our province, however, there is another project I should like to mention. It is also an international project, of interest both to the United States and to Canada. I refer to the development of hydroelectric power in Passamaquoddy bay and the bay of Fundy. This is not new; it has been advocated for a great many years, and has been investigated at different times. I remember that some twenty years ago the matter was discussed in the New Brunswick house when I was a member there; and while the Americans of that day were more or less in favour of it, we in Canada were opposed. The chief opposition at that time came from the fishermen of that area, who said it would ruin their industry. That idea now has been exploded, and engineers have reported very favourably on the feasibility of the project. Mr. Truman also favours it. As far back as last April an Associated Press dispatch from Washington said:

> Mr. Truman was described today as favouring revival of the Passamaquoddy-Maine tidal power project.

Senator Brewster and Senator Smith of Maine and many other statesmen of the New England states also favour this project. What it would mean to the people of the maritime provinces, and particularly to the people of

New Brunswick, cannot be overestimated. At the outset it would mean a million horsepower divided between the New England states and the maritime provinces. It would mean that our province would be placed on an equal footing with other sections of Canada so far as hydro power is concerned. If, therefore, the government of Canada feels that it must go through with the St. Lawrence seaway, in justice to the people of the maritime provinces, who in years past have contributed many millions toward the cost of projects in other parts of Canada and who would have to pay their share of the cost of constructing the St. Lawrence seaway, I think it is only fair that consideration be given the development of this international power project in Passamaquoddy bay, which would mean so much to our people.

Mr. Riley: Or the Chignecto canal.

Mr. Brooks: Yes; but one thing at a time. I should like to quote what the maritime board of trade has to say about this project, as contained in a report appearing in the Moncton Times a few months ago:

Low Cost Power is New Brunswick's Need

In the lengthy and important agenda which the maritime board of trade went through in executive session here, that regarding the projected harnessing of the tides of Passamaquoddy bay transcended all other features in so far as the future development of New Brunswick is concerned.

This is a prodigious scheme, greater than any other power project ever undertaken in the maritimes, and, if given the green light by United States congress and the Canadian parliament as a joint enterprise of the two neighbour nations, would mean an illimitable surge in the industrial and commercial expansion of New Brunswick and also a very large section of Prince Edward Island. Both these provinces have been greatly retarded in economic progress, because the natural resources in New Brunswick, capable of producing more than a sufficiency of electrical energy in continuous supply for an inestimable time and at low cost, have never been capitalized upon.

Then the last paragraph:

It is indeed encouraging that a favourable report is in prospect—

That report is not only in prospect; it has been submitted.

—as ensuing from the recent investigations conducted by the international joint commission into the projected development of electric power from 'Quoddy tides, and that consequent upon such a report there exists the strong possibility of future joint Canadian-American action to implement it. The completion of this scheme would surely witness the ushering in of an era that New Brunswick has long looked forward to as being a hive of industry and the scene of busy commercial enterprises of various types.

That pretty well expresses the opinion of the people of the maritime provinces. I want to congratulate the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) on his excellent speech of a few days ago. He mentioned something which I am sure he would not claim to be new, because it has been mentioned in this house by myself and other maritime members on many occasions. I refer to the decentralization of industry in this dominion. During the last war I brought this matter to the attention of the government, and at that time the minister told me the main reason we could not have industry in the maritime provinces was that we did not have the hydroelectric power. Since that time we have developed new sources of power in the maritimes, and today are in a position to take on these small industries which were mentioned a few days ago by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert. If the government would carry out this extensive power development in Passamaquoddy bay, however, we could not only take on small industries; we could take on extensive industries as well.

We have been the neglected section of Canada. This is an old story, and I suppose many hon. members are tired of listening to it. But we have been sadly neglected. In the last war only one-half of one per cent of our war industry came to my province of New Brunswick. It was an absolute disgrace. Only two per cent came to the whole of the maritime provinces. Now we are threatened with another great war. Whether or not that war comes—and I sincerely hope it does not—billions of dollars are to be spent in the production of munitions and other military supplies, and surely it is time that we in the maritimes, who have always done our full share in supplying manpower for the defence and development of Canada, should receive more consideration from this government and the country in general.

My hon. friend spoke about manpower. We have the manpower in the maritime provinces, but unfortunately it does not stay there. Just this morning the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) was telling me about seventeen young men who left the small village of Centreville in Carleton county in one day, to come to Ontario to look for work. I know that young men are leaving my own town daily, and I am sure the hon. member for Saint John-Albert knows of the hundreds who are leaving his city to come to Ontario and Quebec to find employment. A few days ago we had the great privilege of visiting the Canadair factory at Cartierville on the island of Montreal. I enjoyed that trip. There we saw thousands of young men. It was a regular hive of industry. We were told that there were 5,300 men working in that one factory.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are more men working in that one factory in the city of Montreal on government work than there are in the whole of the three maritime provinces. I do not think it is necessary to argue this point any further, but I do hope this government will realize that we in these provinces are deserving of more consideration.

During the last war we trained many men in the maritimes. There was a splendid camp at my home town of Sussex, New Brunswick; another one at Debert, one at Aldershot and one at Utopia. I was amazed, as was the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), to learn that all our men are now being sent to Fort Lewis in Washington for training. That might have been necessary when those men were being trained as a brigade, but why is it necessary now when we have all the space that we have in Canada to train our own soldiers? I recall that before the last war Great Britain wanted to train some airmen in Canada, and that move was opposed in this house because some members were afraid that Canada would lose her sovereignty if she allowed the troops of another country to come here to train. I have not heard of the United States losing her sovereignty because we sent a few thousand troops over there to train.

However, Mr. Speaker, that is beside the point. The point I wish to make is that since the maritimes have been so badly neglected in other matters, I see no reason why, when we shall be training a good many soldiers for some years to come, the camps at Sussex, Aldershot and other places should not be rebuilt. There is a good nucleus there for a start, and the men could be trained there.

I was amazed to hear that the men who were training at Fort Lewis received an extra $20 per month, and that the officers received an extra $40 per month, because they were training outside of our country. These extra payments amount to something like $200,000 a month for 8,000 men training in this area. The minister is not in his seat, but I should like to know just how much we are paying the United States authorities for the privilege of training our men in Washington. I venture to say that it runs into a tidy sum. I venture to say that the government could rebuild these camps in Sussex and other parts of the maritime provinces for the amount of money they are paying and will pay for having these men trained in the United States.

I listened with attention and interest to the speech delivered yesterday by the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson), because he mentioned a matter which is very close to us in the province of New Brunswick, and that is the question of the conversion of our forests into pulpwood, one of the chief industries in New Brunswick. The price of pulp this winter has been so high, and the United States newsprint people have been so anxious to buy it, that almost every standing tree is being cut down for pulp. I feel that we are using up a heritage that belongs to the people who come after us. When the hon. member for Comox-Alberni mentioned the fact that each copy of a recent issue of a United States newspaper weighed three and three-quarter pounds, we were given some idea of the terrible waste. Trees that could be cut down later to make lumber are now going to the United States to be used for this purpose. It is about time something was done about it. I believe it would be preferable to send this pulp to Great Britain or some of the European countries where the newspapers contain only three or four pages. I would rather have a British paper of three or four pages, so far as real news is concerned, than some of these bulky twenty-five and thirty-page editions from the United States which contain a lot of trash. It is a shameful waste of pulp and of the forests of Canada.

I have some other notes here, Mr. Speaker, but I feel that I have spoken long enough. I wish to thank you for your kind attention.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all join with those hon. members who have congratulated the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The manner in which these two hon. members acquitted themselves has brought honour not only to them but also to the constituencies which they represent. I also want to join with the member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) in the high words of praise which he had for the newly appointed minister from Alberta, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Prudham). Those of us who know the minister have been struck by his sincerity of purpose, his business ability, and above all his honesty. Some of us who know him quite well often refer to him as "honest George."

The speech from the throne has been significant in that it has conveyed to the people of Canada the fact that an emergency situation now exists in view of the further deterioration in the international field. The policy of our government, and the desire of the Canadian people, is to prevent war and maintain peace. However, the international tension today has been caused by communist imperialism in its determination to dominate the world by force or by the fear of force. We in Canada, and the people of the free world, are compelled to take such steps in our national defence as may be adequate to safeguard our security.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) pointed out to us a few days ago what the government's national defence policy will mean to the Canadian taxpayer in dollars and cents. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has indicated some of the sacrifices which will be expected of the Canadian people. The same thing may be said of the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters) with regard to housing.

It is my intention in this debate to deal exclusively with the international situation. I might as well warn hon. members in this house, as well as the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), that some of the views which I shall express are probably different from some which have been expressed on this topic in this chamber. At the outset I feel that the difficult position in which we find ourselves today is, to a considerable extent, our own fault. When I say "our own fault", I mean the fault of the democratic countries towards whom the world looks for leadership and guidance in international affairs. It is true that when we fought the last war we defeated Hitlerism; but it would appear that we did not lay the foundations of a lasting peace. I think that the blame falls on the democratic world in that we failed to assess international communism and that at the same time we allowed another dictator to obtain tremendous powers, the like of which have never before been witnessed in the history of mankind. If we assess communism, we find that Marxist communism is a militant philosophy based on struggle. Because of the nature of its inspiring promises, it creates fanatics within its ranks. It is a philosophy that will not tolerate any criticism or stand for any opposition and therefore it cannot be appeased. Marxist communism is based on the teaching of the German philosopher Hegel who said that when you have two conflicting views or two opposing ideologies as between states, such differences can only be settled by war.

Let us face the facts. The world today is divided into two camps, with two opposing ideologies; our western world with our way of life and the communistic world which is being headed by the Kremlin. We can therefore ask ourselves this question. If my appraisal of the communist philosophy is correct, are we to expect that the communist leaders throughout the world, including Stalin and the fanatics in his ranks, will change their methods and mend their ways even if we match them plane for plane and soldier for soldier? The question is: Can a leopard change its spots?

Let me point out that it is not so much international communism with which we are obliged to contend as it is in effect with Russian imperialism. It is evident to all of us that international communism is merely being used by Stalin as a tool or instrument to further his own imperialistic designs. I repeat that it was a failure of the free world to assess communism in its true light and in allowing Stalin to obtain vast powers, many of them through default, that makes our position now most difficult. However, this is now water under the bridge.

The Korean incident, although regrettable in that it has caused great sacrifices especially on the part of our good neighbour to the south, has nevertheless awakened the free world to the danger of international communism and Russian imperialism. The pattern of Stalin's operations should be clear to all of us by now. Although there may be a cease-fire in Korea, we must be prepared to face similar difficulties in other parts of the world. Only yesterday, I believe, Anthony Eden, in making a statement at Westminster, warned the world of grave possibilities in Yugoslavia in the near future.

Analogies are trick bases for argument, but the fact is that communism has many heads; and it is necessary to recognize the difficulties of the problem of destroying it. In Greek mythology many of us have heard of the hydra-headed monster which Hercules was given the task of destroying. I recall reading in the New York Times an editorial which appealed to me—incidentally it is dated October 25, 1950—and which reads in part as follows:

> This simultaneous activity at opposite poles of the earth is a reminder of the hydra-headed character of international communism. It might be well for us to remember, too, that the heads of the mythical snake grew back again as fast as Hercules cut them off. He had to root out its body and destroy the one immortal head (shall we say the Kremlin?) before the monster was defeated.

Let us not forget that communism or communist imperialism is centred today in Moscow. Let us therefore, now that we realize the menace of communism and of Russian imperialism, be prepared to deal with our potential enemy effectively. Let us not underestimate his strength; but above all let us not overlook his weakness.

When I say that we must not underestimate the enemy's strength, I mean that certainly we must not underestimate the strength of the Red army, the strategic position of the soviet bloc and the aggressive leadership of international communism throughout the world. Certainly tanks, guns and planes are necessary and vital in our defence preparations. Should we be forced into it, there is no easy way to fight Soviet Russia, but I think Hitler has shown us the hard way of doing so. Let us not fall into that fallacy which lay at the root of Hitler's stupidity when he thought that Soviet Russia could be beaten by military means alone. Probably I should modify that statement and say that perhaps Soviet Russia can be beaten by military means alone but at a terrible price.

When the nazis launched their attack on Soviet Russia, they met with such huge successes at first that it was almost unbelievable. Hundreds of thousands of men laid down their arms and surrendered to the Germans. The population welcomed the Germans, not because they had any love for the nazis but because they looked upon them as liberators from the Kremlin oppressors. It was only after Hitler treated these people in the same brutal fashion as he treated the Jews that the population turned against him, with the results that were indicated in the battle of Stalingrad.

What is this weakness in Soviet Russia's empire today which we must not overlook and which we must be prepared to capitalize on? Many people in Canada and throughout the free world do not fully appreciate the fact that within the borders of Soviet Russia there are about one hundred ethnic groups, the most numerous being the Russians themselves. The Russians, however, comprise less than half of the total population in the U.S.S.R.; and during the time of the czars and during the time of Stalin they have been the motivating or driving force of the nation. Their dominance over the smaller minorities, however, has been made possible because of their superiority in numbers; but it has always been resented by those smaller minorities.

May I say that the apparent unity which exists in the Soviet union today has been made possible through slave camps, liquidations and mass extermination of racial, ethnical and religious groups as such. We can feel quite certain that the rulers in the Kremlin, in order to maintain further unity within their borders or that so-called unity within the Soviet union, must resort to further mass exilings, slave camps and liquidations. The national problems of the Soviet are one of their most vulnerable spots. We can, I think, rely on these suppressed people to be the most certain allies of democracy against the Red tyranny.

[Mr. Decore.]

Let us also bear in mind the fact that today there are millions of political prisoners in concentration camps and under slave labour conditions. There are today throughout the Soviet union hundreds of thousands of families, one or more of whose members have either been liquidated or sent to slave camps for political reasons.

The fact is that in spite of nearly two generations of indoctrination, despite the mass exilings and mass liquidations, despite the slave camps and the dread secret police to crush all opposition, there is a bitter resentment against Stalin's regime. That, Mr. Speaker, is where is to be found the enemy's weakest spot—in that smouldering opposition of the population against its oppressors in the Kremlin, which once aroused can become a weapon in our favour much more effective than the atom bomb itself.

And what about the satellite states such as Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania and Czechoslovakia? Apart from Titoism, which is prevalent within the communist ranks itself, there is evidence of a strong but latent underground, an opposition which is smouldering but waiting for an opportunity.

The menace of the Soviets to freedom is realized by the democratic world but it is also important that the Soviet's weakness should receive attention. It is already receiving attention from prominent men throughout the world and among them is Harold E. Stassen, president of the university of Pennsylvania, and a prominent Republican, who in a radio address over the national network made this statement. Incidentally his observations were based on a trip that he made around the world. He said, as reported in the New York Times of January 16, 1951:

> First of all I received information all around the outside of the vast communist empire of the discontent and unrest within the Soviet union and within the iron curtain countries. This includes the red army itself.

According to the New York Times he urged the United States to rearm and called for solid support of General Dwight D. Eisenhower. He also urged a revision of the United States foreign policy, and sought certain goals. I quote further from the New York Times:

> The establishment of separate national sovereignty and true independence of the Ukraine, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary.
> The release of all of the millions of political prisoners now in concentration camps and under forced labour in the Soviet union.
> The granting of the Russian lands to the Russian peasants for their own farming.

The granting of the right of genuine labour unions to organize and bargain collectively everywhere in the world. The winning of the right of all the people to worship God as they choose.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a very inspiring message to those millions of people behind the iron curtain. It gives them new hope and new encouragement. It hits at the very heart of Stalin's brutal tyranny. How much more effective this message would be if it was the official policy of the United States, of Canada and of the free world?

Canada of course does not decide the United States foreign policy nor that of the United Kingdom. But it is one of the member states of the North Atlantic treaty. From the observations I made while being associated with the recent Canadian delegation to the United Nations assembly, I realized the tremendous role that Canada does play in international affairs, and realized also the weight exerted and the ability recognized by delegates to the United Nations from throughout the world of our own Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson).

Someone would say that this type of policy which I call "political warfare" if adopted, shall we say by Canada and the western democracies, would offend Mr. Stalin. No doubt it will offend Mr. Stalin. It is a weak spot in his armour, but let us not forget that he has left no stone unturned through the use of the communist international organization, the cominform, to rouse and whip up fifth columnists and traitors in Canada and other countries; to create fear and unrest. One of his most effective weapons against the world in creating fear and distrust has been the use by him of this so-called political warfare.

Let us turn the tables on him and give him back some of his own medicine. Let us offer new hope and new encouragement to those millions behind the iron curtain who are our potential allies, by supporting them in what we believe in and what is the very foundation of democracy, namely, freedom.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): In rising to take part in this debate, along with previous speakers, I wish to congratulate both the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am sure each did credit to himself and to the constituents whom he represents.

The point at issue in the debate at the moment is the C.C.F amendment which has been moved by the hon member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), asking the immediate reimposition of price controls and the payment of subsidies where necessary so as to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people.

I listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith). He said that he would support our amendment had we included in it the provision that wages should also be controlled. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the provision for the control of wages is already part of the amendment, as it has been moved. It says:

. . . the immediate reimposition of price controls . . . so as to project the health and living standards of the Canadian people.

To my mind price controls mean prices of all commodities, including wages. We ask that controls shall be implemented in such a way as to protect the health and living standards of the Canadian people We suggest therefore by those words that any control of wages or any control of farm prices that would stem from the adoption of this amendment shall be control in a fair and equitable manner.

Then the hon. member for Moose Mountain went on to say that he was a member of the farmers' union. I took down his words. He said: "If the farmers' union will support controls I too will support controls." I should like to read to him a resolution which was passed at the most recent annual convention of the Saskatchewan Farmers' Union held in Saskatoon between the dates of December 12 and December 15. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas we, the members of the farmers' union, view with alarm the general economic trend wherein prices in general are sure to be increased, and are convinced that security lies in price control,

Therefore be it resolved that we demand that the federal government put price controls in effect at a point comparable with farm prices.

This resolution proves beyond doubt that the farmers' union are solidly behind price control. I suggest to the hon. member for Moose Mountain that we shall welcome now his support of our amendment asking for price controls, since the Saskatchewan Farmers' Union, of which he is a member, is supporting price controls at this time.

Last night I listened with attention to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) elaborate upon and enumerate the various fiscal and monetary measures the government had already taken to deal with inflation. He suggested that those measures were getting at the root cause of inflation, and suggested further that this was no time to implement over-all price controls.

The best way for one to judge whether those monetary and fiscal measures have been and are effective is to look over the price increases in the last twelve months and compare those increases with the increase in the cost of living index in the twelve months immediately preceding the imposition of price controls in 1941. In looking over that index one finds that while it increased by 8·1 points between September 1940 and September 1941, and while the government following that increase felt it was necessary to have over-all price controls, the increase in the price index between January 1950 and January 1951 has been, not 8·1 points but 11·5 points. In other words, if there was any reason to impose price controls in 1941—and there was—then there is even greater reason today.

The degree of inflation rampant in the Canadian economy today and for the past twelve months is even greater than the degree of inflation which prevailed prior to the government's imposing over-all price controls in the fall of 1941.

Last night the minister seemed to take great exception to the suggestion put forth by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) that because of inflation our government bonds were no longer the same safe and secure investment they had once been. It seems to me that, with the runaway inflation as we have it today, many Canadians will consider seriously cashing their bonds and discontinuing the purchase of bonds as a method of saving.

One has but to look at what has happened in the last five years to the value of the dollars Canadians have invested in government bonds to see that there are many investments which have been much more secure. In January 1946 the cost of living index was 119·9; five years later, in January 1951, it had increased to 172·5. The purchasing power of a $100 bond bought in January 1946, according to the government's cost of living index, is today only $69.52, on the basis of 1946 prices.

So that anyone who bought a $100 bond in January, 1946, and cashed it in January of 1951 would find that instead of getting $100 in value, the $100 they would obtain would buy goods to the value of only $69.52, on the basis of 1946 prices. In other words, anyone who invested $100 in government bonds in January, 1946, has in the last five years lost $31.48 in purchasing power. If the bond had been a Canada savings bond, always worth one hundred cents on the dollar as a monetary value, the interest in those five years would have amounted to $13.75. Therefore anyone who purchased a bond five years ago and cashes it today finds his net loss, after deducting interest, amounts to $17.73, in relation to purchasing power.

I make the statement that any time the value of the Canadian dollar goes down faster than the rate of interest on our bonds, then at that point our bonds cease to be a safe, secure, sound and attractive investment. The minister said that during the session last fall, and since that time, the government has been getting at the root causes of inflation by drawing in some of the excess purchasing power.

One of the measures I presume the minister would advance in support of his contention that there has been an effort to reduce the supply of money in the country would be the small, the almost insignificant, increase in the corporation tax, amounting to an additional 5 per cent. That in itself, as events have proven, is not, I am afraid, an anti-inflationary measure of any real strength. At the session last fall the government failed to take one of the most important fiscal measures that I believe—and I said it at that time—they should have taken. That is, there should have been not increases in the sales tax on soft drinks, chocolate bars and chewing gum, but a substantial increase in the income tax as it affects the people in the higher income brackets.

If any tax can be considered fair, and based upon ability to pay, then surely it must be a properly graduated income tax. But the government did nothing last fall to draw off the excess purchasing power in the hands of the well-to-do people in Canada. At the same time it did not hesitate to ask for and to implement the authority it was given to curtail instalment buying. It has not hesitated at this session to increase the amount of the down payment to build a house under the National Housing Act.

I am opposed to any legislation similar to the increase in down payments on instalment buying or the increase in down payments under the National Housing Act, when such provisions are drafted in such a way that they merely prevent the lowest income groups from making necessary purchases. I say the type of legislation we have for the curtailment of instalment buying, and the announcement with respect to down payments under the National Housing Act, taken in the light of the fact that as yet there has been no increase in the income tax levied against the well-to-do, is nothing short of class legislation.

I have here an editorial appearing in the Co-operative Consumer, the official publication of the various consumer co-operatives throughout Saskatchewan. Those associations are composed of tens of thousands of members throughout the western provinces, most of whom are farmers. The editorial says this:

The imposition of credit controls is intended to reduce the demand for certain classes of consumer goods among the Canadian people. It is expected that this decreased demand will tend to halt the present trend toward inflation but those who favour the credit restrictions fail to see that these restrictions do not limit purchases by persons of wealth. Indeed, such credit restrictions are a subtle type of economic class privilege since only the poor people may be unable to make the necessary down payments and unable to complete payment for major items in the limited term allowed for such payment. Rich men and rich women can still buy at their pleasure. The wife of the poorly paid labourer, teacher, pastor or other worker, may have to forget her dreams of a new refrigerator or a new washing machine. The struggling young couples with their young families see their only chance to secure many of those things which make life worthwhile vanish with the introduction of anti-poor credit controls. The regrettable feature of the whole credit control situation lies in the fact that these credit controls establish the principle of economic class legislation—

I agree wholeheartedly with the sentiments expressed in that editorial. The editorial goes on to suggest certain methods that might have been used in place of this so aptly termed class legislation. The editor states that if the government had desired to cut down the purchase of new automobiles in a fair and equitable manner it might have established a permit system which would not allow anyone driving an automobile of a model say later than 1945 to purchase a new car. Or it might have required permits for the purchase of refrigerators, washing machines and so on, which would make them available only to mothers of families. I think that type of allocation of scarce consumer goods would be more in the interests of the Canadian people and the cause for which we are raising such a large army, navy and air force than legislation which has the effect of pushing even lower the standard of living of thousands of people who cannot afford to pay 20 per cent down when they purchase a new refrigerator or make a down payment twice as large as that previously required under the National Housing Act.

I want now to discuss the effects of price controls on farmers and their attitude toward price controls. If I can interpret their resolutions correctly the farmers of Canada do not want an over-all price freeze on every single item of goods the farmer sells or goods the farmer produces at current prices, but they are asking for price controls which will mean parity prices for the farmer, parity prices for the worker and will permit—

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): Go ahead, hang yourself.

Mr. Argue: —the average Canadian to maintain himself and his family on a decent standard of living. I notice the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith) interrupts to say that I should not hang myself. I am sure that if I hang myself by this speech I shall only be following the example he has already set.

Mr. Smith (Moose Mountain): That is what you think.

Mr. Argue: I come now to the question of how much the government should pay as a final payment on the five-year pool. I notice the hon. member for Moose Mountain, the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) and the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) have advocated a payment in the neighbourhood of 15 cents per bushel. I should like to refer the hon. member for Moose Mountain to another resolution passed by the Saskatchewan Farmers Union of which he says he is a member—since he says he will support their demands for price controls. I should not hesitate to support their demands in connection with a final payment on the five-year pool demanding a settlement on the basis of not less than $2 per bushel, basis No. 1, Fort William. If that resolution were implemented it would have the effect of providing a final payment of 25 cents per bushel on the five-year pool.

Lest there be any misunderstanding in any quarter of this house or of the country, let me say that I support foursquare the demands of the Saskatchewan Farmers Union, the Alberta Farmers Union, the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities, the Alberta wheat pool, other farm organizations and individual farmers who have written to me all demanding a payment of 25 cents per bushel. To date I have received no resolution passed by any group of farmers saying that they would be satisfied with a payment of 15 cents per bushel. Rather I have had many resolutions from farm organizations and from local groups of farmers saying that, if anything less than 25 cents per bushel is paid, farmer delegations will be in Ottawa shortly afterward demanding a further payment until the total payment is at least 25 cents per bushel.

On August first there was a drop in the initial price of 35 cents per bushel, followed by a lack of box cars and a lack of marketing facilities. All these things taken together have resulted in my opinion in reducing support for the policies the government has directed the wheat board to follow.

Farm organizations and the vast majority of farmers support the wheat board and ask that its powers be extended to cover the handling of oats, barley, flax and rye.

When the government is considering the final payment they should take a number of factors into account. Last fall the initial price dropped 35 cents per bushel. Our crop was severely frosted and the spreads were increased to the point where the price of feed wheat at the local elevator point was 80 cents odd per bushel. And when the farmer tried to market his wheat he was told there was a shortage of box cars, that most of our box cars were in the United States. The government, the board of transport commissioners and the railroad companies all taken together could not get enough box cars to handle the shipment of last fall's crop.

We used to have a quota system which worked very well. That was followed conscientiously by the wheat board and supported by farmers. But this fall the quota system seemed to literally break down. An eight-bushel quota was first established at most points. At a great many local delivery points, long before the eight-bushel quota was filled the quota was lifted. At my neighbouring elevator point of Dahinda the elevators plugged up on the Thursday before Thanksgiving day. At that time farmers had delivered only approximately half the eight-bushel quota; yet the following morning the elevator agents received wires from the wheat board lifting the quota. The farmers were disappointed and angry. At that time many had not sold a single bushel of the 1950 crop, and even today in that area I know a number of farmers who have not sold any of their 1950 crop.

I believe in the quota system but I think it should be applied fairly, and should be maintained at our local elevator points until almost every farmer has delivered his full quota. I do not know the reason for the situation which prevailed at Moose Jaw this fall, but I know that situation provoked a great deal of criticism in an area of perhaps a hundred miles around that city. I was told Moose Jaw had a quota of twenty bushels per acre; I have been told since that it had no quota at all. If there was a quota at Moose Jaw, certainly it was a large one. At the same time early last fall all the towns on the Soo line, the towns on the C.N.R. line south of Moose Jaw and the towns along the C.P.R. line west of Weyburn, had small quotas and very few box cars. So farmers trucked their wheat to Moose Jaw from up to seventy-five miles away because their local elevators could not handle the grain. We had the spectacle of farmers hiring truckers and paying twelve to fifteen cents a bushel to have their grain hauled to elevators seventy-five miles away because the elevators within two or three miles were full and could not handle their crops. I believe the distribution of box cars should have been handled in such a way as to give the farmers adjacent to each delivery point a chance to market at least a reasonable proportion of their 1950 crop.

We are asking for a final payment of 25 cents a bushel under the five-year pool. That will amount to a great deal of money. Some of those who have taken part in this debate have agreed with the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith), who spoke this afternoon, and have said the Canadian government should crack the whip over the British government and make them come through with a further payment. The right hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was in London last year, and when he came back he had something to say about the negotiation in which he had participated concerning the "have regard to" clause. This is what he said at page 3221 of Hansard for June 5, 1950:

> We asked the United Kingdom what further settlement it is to make on account of the "have regard to" clause. The United Kingdom government took a very strong position that they had filled all obligations under that clause, and so far as the United Kingdom was concerned. We agreed on behalf of Canada that considering all the circumstances that was the case.

From that quotation we see that according to our own minister, in June of last year the British government had fulfilled the "have regard to" clause of the wheat agreement. The farmers of western Canada took exception to that statement. They are not demanding that the British government only shall make the payment of 25 cents per bushel. They are saying to the government of Canada, "As our agents for the marketing of our wheat over a five-year period, we think you should see that the "have regard to" clause is fulfilled. If in your wisdom you think the British government has fulfilled that clause, then we believe you should make up the difference between the final surplus in the wheat pool account and the 25 cent payment we are asking—if necessary out of the national treasury". So I say to the government that the farmers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta are asking a final payment of 25 cents a bushel; and they are asking this government to take whatever steps are necessary to see that this final payment is forthcoming.

I believe certain changes should be made in the wheat board act and in the policy which has been followed by the wheat board. I welcome the 20 cent increase in the initial prices for wheat and barley and the increase of 10 cents in the initial price for oats; but when that announcement was made I believe a statement should have been issued showing the present financial position of the wheat board so the farmers would have a reasonable idea what the final payment at the end of the year would be after the crop had been marketed. Further, I believe the annual report of the wheat board should be made public within three months of the end of the crop year, again in order that the farmers of the west may know the financial position of the wheat board and the amount of money they may expect to receive in further payments.

In asking for a final payment of 25 cents per bushel the farmers are calling upon the federal government to make up part of that amount out of the national treasury, because throughout the five-year pool the Canadian consumer obtained wheat at a price lower than was received for class II wheat on the world market. Farmers know that the cheap flour and bread policy of the government was not paid for in the main out of the national treasury, but was paid for by a few thousand prairie farmers. Today the farmers of western Canada are still subsidizing the Canadian consumer. For wheat sold in Canada and going into the production of flour the millers of this country are paying at present about $1.90 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, which is the ceiling under the international wheat agreement. At the same time class II wheat is being sold in world markets at $2.12 per bushel. So on every bushel of Canadian wheat going into Canadian consumption the farmers of the west are subsidizing the Canadian consumer to the extent of 22 cents. I object to a policy of that kind. I do not object to wheat being sold at $1.90 per bushel or less; but if the Canadian consumer is to get cheap wheat let it be at the expense of all the people of Canada, not at the expense of one section of our population, in this case our wheat farmers.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, once again I urge upon the government the necessity of making a final payment of 25 cents a bushel under the five-year pool, and making that payment immediately.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with all previous speakers in congratulating the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on their excellent speeches. I was particularly struck with the remarks of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) in referring to the contributory health plan to meet the cost of major accidents and sicknesses. I feel sure all members of this house are in accord with that idea, and I trust that the hon. member will keep on putting his plan forward until the government sees fit to adopt it.

The accent so far in this debate has been on external affairs. I trust that I will be pardoned if I refer to Newfoundland matters for a short time. I do so because some of them have a bearing on the international situation. In that connection I refer to Gander airport, about which you have heard so much as the crossroads of the world, and the extension of the runways that is now contemplated. I wish to thank the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) for finally acceding to the request for the extension of these runways. I have a number of questions on the order paper one of which concerns the materials to be used in the new construction. However, at this time I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Transport to the fact that the runways are macadam now, and from the experience of those operating the planes at Gander it would appear necessary that the new construction, indeed, the whole of the runways, should be of concrete.

Recently one of the managers told me that in landing heavy aircraft such as the Boeing Stratospheres at certain times, the runways give the impression of being composed of snow. The planes would weave around. As I have said during other sessions, if Gander is going to be forced again into the position of being vital to the defence of the free world, then we have to have these runways in such condition that they will be able to carry the heavy war planes that will be put in use.

When speaking of Gander I should like also to draw the attention of the minister concerned to the condition of Goose airport. As hon. members will realize, Goose is probably the most strategic airport for the defence of the western world. I am not in a position to give any description of the condition or length of the runways of this airport, but I trust that those concerned will see to it that if extensions or repairs are required they will be undertaken before the need becomes too urgent.

There is one other factor in connection with Gander that I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport, and that concerns an organization in Newfoundland that is known as NONIA, Newfoundland Outport Nursing and Industrial Organization. This is a philanthropic body that has been in operation for some twenty-five years, and which is today primarily concerned with the weaving and knitting of wearable goods of high quality. The materials are distributed to various people throughout the province who make some little extra money in their spare time by knitting or weaving these woollen goods. One of the main places NONIA had for the sale of these goods was at Gander airport, where a display counter was maintained and a considerable amount of goods sold. Since the Department of Transport took over the airport, NONIA has been completely removed from Gander.

The other day the NONIA committee for this year issued a report in which there is a paragraph reading as follows:

> It is with regret we report a complete "shut-out" for our goods at the Gander terminal. Last year, while the booth was under government supervision, we sold $3,000 worth but now that the concession has been given to a private firm, we are completely overlooked. It is to be deplored that such high-class goods, handiwork of Newfoundlanders, are banned from this important selling centre, where wide publicity could be given.

In that connection I may say that within the past year the government of Newfoundland had Mr. Leo Dolan, who is chief of the Canadian travel bureau, make a survey of Newfoundland tourist requirements. In Mr. Dolan's recently released report there appears this paragraph:

> I saw, to my amazement, some of the handicraft progress already made in your island. The merchandising of these handicrafts should become a very profitable business. You have a handicraft industry that has a remarkable potentiality. I recommend that steps be taken to make the airport the show window of Newfoundland. I think all Newfoundland handicrafts ought to be on display.

Mr. Speaker, as you are aware Newfoundland is again trying to develop its tourist industry. One of the important phases of that tourist industry is naturally the display and sale of Newfoundland goods. As I have said, one of the chief outlets has been lost. It is easy to see why it would be the chief outlet because there are 1,400 passengers daily passing through Gander from all over the world. It is one of the greatest show windows we have for these goods, and it is closed. I would urge the Minister of Transport that immediate steps be taken whereby NONIA will be permitted to display and sell these goods at the airport.

I have another "thank you" to make, and this time it is to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), for his interest in promoting the increased sale of Bell island iron ore. As the minister is aware, we have had a number of questions back and forth in the house during past sessions about this matter, and I feel he has taken an active part in the recent sales increases. The operating company, Dosco, has announced its intention of making improvements in the handling and mining facilities which will cost about $6 million. It is said that the greatest labouring force in Bell island's history will be working there within a short time.

In thanking the minister for that, I am sure that he will appreciate that when the Greeks bear gifts they look for something else. I am not asking the Minister of Trade and Commerce this time, but I am asking the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) if he will recall my request to him some time ago concerning the condition of the wharf at Portugal Cove. With the greatly increased production, and the increased number of people going to live and work on Bell island, that pier becomes all the more important. At one time last session the minister, I presume through a misunderstanding, said he was going to have that pier repaired. At a later date he said he was not going to have it repaired. As I understand it, the reason now given is that, because it is a pier for a ferry, his department is not able to do it. With the increased importance of Bell island, particularly in view of the possible war ahead, I submit that these little difficulties such as the question of whether it is or is not a ferry pier, should be overlooked and that a proper and suitable pier should be provided for the people of Bell island to use. Outside of St. John's, it is the most congested part of the whole of Newfoundland. I submit to the minister that it is a great hardship for the people of that island if they are not going to be provided with proper facilities.

The other matter that I have to thank you for, sir—as my colleague the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) has done—is the freight rates decision. But I am not so certain that there should be any great thanks for that. After all, it was a matter that was clearly laid down in the terms of union and the decision was merely implementing what should have been done without any recourse to any board or any other form of tribunal. Actually, Newfoundland was put to quite considerable expense in having to go to the various tribunals; so as a quid pro quo for what should have been done, I think it is a fair and reasonable proposition to ask for compliance with the request of the Newfoundland board of trade that proper accommodation on the newly-constructed ferry from Port aux Basques be provided for freight cars. With the dimensions of that ferry as announced by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) some time ago, it would be possible to carry twenty or thirty freight cars on it. If that accommodation was provided, not only would there be avoided a great deal of damage to goods resulting from the way they are at present carried but there would be a considerable reduction in the cost of goods going into the island. I would endorse my hon. friend's request in that connection, and I trust that the minister will bear it in mind.

There is one other matter to which I should also like to direct attention. It is paragraph 45 in the terms of confederation. The provision in subparagraph (1) is as follows:

> Should the government of the province of Newfoundland institute an economic survey of the province of Newfoundland with a view to determining what resources may profitably be developed and what new industries may be established or existing industries expanded, the government of Canada will make available the services of its technical employees and agencies to assist in the work.

I do not know what the position is with regard to that particular clause in the terms of confederation, but I know that a number of outside organizations have been brought into Newfoundland, at considerable cost to the taxpayers of that province, in order to do exactly what that particular clause envisioned. I know that at the present time there are two firms engaged in making surveys. One is engaged in making a survey of power and the other is engaged in making a general economic survey. I do not know the full name of the latter firm but the short name of it is Ibec. It is an American corporation somewhat loosely associated with the Rockefellers. The other corporation is the Power Corporation of Canada which is making a survey of water powers. As I said before, I do not know whether application has been made by the province of Newfoundland for the assistance envisioned in that clause. If not, I should like to know why it was not done; and if such a request has been made, I should like to know why it was not acceded to.

There are just a couple of other Newfoundland matters to which I wish to refer. One is in connection with defence expenditures. Here I must re-echo the remarks made by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) and by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). I hope that, in allocating these expenditures, the powers-that-be will remember that for all practical purposes Newfoundland is part of Canada. It would be a great help indeed if some of that money could be funnelled into that province. During the past war there were a number of naval installations there that were of great importance in the winning of the war. I see no reason at all why those naval installations could not be brought back into active service again. At the present time they are merely lying up. They will rust out quicker than they will wear out. If I had the euphonious tones of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert, I might go further into this matter. But if he and the hon. member for Royal will take it as understood that I endorse everything they said, and if the ministers opposite will do the same, I shall not trespass further with regard to that particular point.

As hon. members are aware, Newfoundland is the only province of Canada that has United States bases. As I intimated on previous occasions, we are not by any means unhappy about this fact; but I think it is about time that we again had a clear-cut statement, under the present circumstances, as to who is to take over the defence of Newfoundland in the event of war. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) visited us last summer and I believe he conferred with the United States military authorities. I feel that it would be in order to ask him to make a statement, when he has the opportunity to do so, with respect to the defence of Newfoundland.

Another matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the genial Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) is the question of the Industrial Development Bank. I understand that by the charter of this bank it is impossible to obtain loans for fisheries. I think this is a matter which should be remedied. I think it is equally important that not only the fisheries of Newfoundland but the fisheries of Canada generally should be in a position to apply to the Industrial Development Bank for assistance. This brings me to the question of fish.

The hon. member who preceded me spent considerable time on wheat. Wheat is extremely important to him and to his constituents. To us fish is the most important thing in the country. Some 50 per cent of the people of Newfoundland live directly out of the fishery. Because of that fact, it can be easily realized what an important factor fish is in the economy of the country. Associated with fish is the question of being able to sell it. The bulk of our salt fish is sold to countries that have great difficulties in converting their money. I would ask the minister to be prepared to make convertibility of sterling possible at the time this new year's catch is to be sold. Last year, as a result of delay, it was impossible for a considerable quantity of fish to be sold. I would also ask that serious consideration be given by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) to the idea of a guaranteed price for shore fish. Last year there was a guaranteed price for Labrador fish. I know from the people in my own area that unless something of the same nature is given for shore fish, we shall not have people going fishing this year. This is therefore an important matter and I would ask the minister to take it into consideration. I am not in a position to endorse as strongly as I should like to the remarks made by the hon. member for St. John's West; but if the situation that he spoke about exists, then definitely a serious investigation with respect to the fisheries is required. Personally I can hardly realize it is quite as bad as he stated; but he has made a study of it and probably is aware of what he speaks.

In that connection, last night I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) who endorsed the remarks of my colleague. I was particularly taken with a portion of the remarks of the hon. member. At page 283 of Hansard he is reported as having said:

> Hitherto in this house I have refrained from speaking of things provincial or things pertaining to my riding. I did so for the very good reason that I did not want my presence here to be misunderstood.

He continued:

> I believe we have been here long enough now for the people of Canada to understand, so I can now revert to form and in this speech refer to matters pertaining to my province and to my riding.

I hope that the hon. members associated with the hon. member for Trinity-Conception will also have the same feeling, because it is very important that Canada should understand the position of Newfoundland and all her troubles. I would ask the hon. members, two of whom I see opposite me this afternoon, whether they will join with the hon. member for Trinity-Conception. Let us have a united front. We might even form a maritime bloc here.

In another part of his speech the hon. member for Trinity-Conception said, as reported at page 284:

> For fifteen years in Newfoundland we had a form of government that we called a little dictatorship. You may call it bureaucratic, if you like.

Later on he said:

> Since I have come here, particularly lately, I have found a certain amount of the bureaucratic business that we had in Newfoundland years ago.

Surely, the hon. member does not mean to imply that this government is a little dictatorship in any way. That would be a terrible thing.

Mr. Fleming: It is a big one.

Mr. Higgins: We all know that is the wrong name. It is not a little dictatorship; it is quite a big one by the look of hon. members opposite. I must confess it came to me as a complete surprise to hear the hon. member say this:

> We now find that all requests going in are answered with one word "no," that defence comes first, and that we must economize. I would say that there is such a thing as false economy.

He continues:

> It requires no brains to say "no." You can teach a parrot to say that.

Surely he does not mean that hon. members on the other side of the house have been taught to say "no" to Liberal requests. I would understand it, frankly, having had the experience with requests from hon. members on this side of the house; but it is certainly new for a request by a Liberal member to be turned down. There must be something rotten in the state of Canada or in the Liberal party. What is it? At all events, it is very pleasant to hear him speaking out. I trust that other Newfoundland members will have the same spirit and will speak out in the same way. That is about all I have to say on Newfoundland affairs.

The remainder of my time I am going to devote to a few comments on outside matters. I must confess that I was taken with the reply of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) last week to the conscription issue. As far as I am concerned it is only fair to say that he adopted a frank and manly attitude, and he is to be complimented on it. In making that statement as he did he had the advice of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). He had the advice of the various ministers of the commonwealth whom he met in London. He had the advice of General Eisenhower and General Mark Clark, both of whom he met, and he had the advice of most of the western powers. Therefore, the statement that he made would be the generally accepted statement of the government. It does not do much good to try to make any suggestions contrary to that. But before we came up to Ottawa some four of us had a meeting with the members of the Canadian Legion. My colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) and the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) and myself met with the members of the Canadian Legion and the whole matter was discussed. The matter of the brief that was submitted to the government was discussed. One remark that struck me very forcibly, as I am sure it did the other hon. members at that time, was this. We were talking with one of the officers in command of the reserves. There are three reserve regiments in Newfoundland. This commander had recently been up here. He said that in talking with his colleagues of the reserve regiments he was told by them that the Newfoundland reserve regiments were the best in Canada. The comment that he made, Mr. Speaker, was this. It struck me so forcibly at the time. He said: "If we are the best, well, God help the rest of Canada". I am not pursuing that subject any further.

In connection with the defence committee, I must confess that the remarks of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) were very interesting, because they corroborated exactly what the leader of the opposition

(Mr. Drew) had been asking for, for some time past. Coming from a former minister for air, from an hon. member who has had such opportunities as the hon. member has had, his remarks were indeed worthy of note. I know that my adding a request would not make any difference one way or the other.

We are all supposed to be cogs in this machine of parliament. If we are cogs in that machine we should at least be able to make an intelligent survey of what goes on. Frankly, so far as I am concerned in this defence expenditure picture, I do not feel I am any better than a piece of dust in one of the cog wheels. I believe that will be the feeling of most of us. I am merely going to say we should have that defence committee.

With regard to price controls, I am entirely in accord with the stand of my leader. Yesterday I listened carefully to the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), and I believe that his explanation was not too far away from the remarks of the leader of the opposition. With price control we must inevitably have wage control. As the leader of the C.C.F. party said, labour leaders are prepared to get around the board at any time and discuss wage control, provided that price control measures are taken. After all, we have to remember that in these days the labouring man is not the hewer of wood and the drawer of water that he used to be. He is equally well able to form judgments as any hon. member in this house. He knows the facts quite as well as we do, and if he finds it necessary to cut back his wages, then he will do so, provided always that he is getting a fair deal under price control.

With regard to the St. Lawrence seaway proposition, I must confess that I have two views on the matter. I am definitely in agreement with the need for it. As I recall it, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) said that it should be done by Canada alone, if necessary. I am entirely in accord with the idea that the seaway project should go through, with this provision, that Newfoundland and the maritime provinces generally should get some quid pro quo for it. After all, it is the ore that is coming out of Labrador that is going to go up that seaway. What are we in Newfoundland and the maritime provinces going to get for it? So far it looks only like skim milk, with the royalties and the work being provided. I do not in any way wish to condemn the possibility of the building of that seaway, but I do feel proper precautions should be taken whereby the province that has within its boundaries the greater portion of the ore will be reimbursed for the taking away of that ore. We must remember it is not a crop: once the ore is extracted, it is gone. As I said, I have two views in the matter; I should like to see the seaway go through, but at the same time I cannot help feeling that in our part of the country we are being robbed to make a big iron industry in Canada and the United States.

The other matter upon which I wish to speak briefly concerns the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). With respect to him also I must confess that I was deeply impressed by the frank and free statement he made. Like some other members of the house I had the opportunity this year of being present at the United Nations, more in the capacity of an observer. While there I was extremely impressed by the minister's work. Like the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) I feel the minister played an extremely important part in the consideration of decisions of the United Nations. Certainly it was most apparent that he was highly regarded by all those present at the meetings. My own observation was that all who were associated with the minister, particularly those who served in the capacity of delegates and alternate delegates, did an excellent job for Canada in every way. In that I include members of the House of Commons.

May I add further that the permanent staff from the Department of External Affairs who served at Lake Success are extremely capable in every way. The permanent head of the delegation, Mr. R. G. Riddell, is indeed doing a good job for Canada, and Canadians may be justly proud of the work of the department in that connection. This afternoon, replying to a question by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the Secretary of State for External Affairs commented upon the crossing of the 38th parallel. As I took down his words he said that Canada has not made any representations to the secretary general as a result of the British statement. He said further that the political significance of any new move is fully appreciated, and that any decision should be collective, including those countries participating.

The English view appears definitely to be that the 38th parallel should not be crossed at the present time. I must confess that is my view, and I trust that, having secured agreement in the cabinet, the Secretary of State for External Affairs may consider making active recommendations to the secretary general that the 38th parallel be not now crossed, until further negotiations are proceeded with.

I remember when the matter was discussed, at Lake Success in October, the minister was far from happy in having to support the decision to cross the 38th parallel. I do hope we will feel he can make the recommendation which has been suggested at this time. I feel that voting to declare communist China an aggressor was the only course that could have been pursued, and I entirely agree with him in that respect.

There is one point in that connection to which I should like to refer. The chief advocate at that time for non-crossing and for not declaring China an aggressor was Sir Benegal Rau. Those who read the editorial which appeared in yesterday's issue of the Ottawa Journal must have been struck by the pertinent comments of the editor. It is headed "Strange Happenings in Korea—And in India", and states in part:

When UN, on February 1, was about to proclaim Red China an aggressor, India's Sir Benegal Rau, was instructed by Prime Minister Nehru to declare:

"I feel bound to mention that my government has been informed on the highest authority that once there is a condemnatory resolution there is no hope for a peaceful settlement." Sir Benegal Rau, in sepulchral tones, closed with a warning of "disaster."

What had India heard from Red China? According to a despatch from the correspondent of Newsweek in New Delhi, India had heard nothing to warrant Sir Benegal Rau's despair. He writes:

"A state department investigation in New Delhi and elsewhere failed to disclose any basis for these dire warnings. The inquiry discovered that the Chinese, in their messages to India, had been careful not to close the door to negotiations. They had not refused, as the Indians charged, to negotiate a cease-fire while the UN resolution was pending."

And then the editorial comment continues:

During UN's debates on the U.S. resolution much was heard of Panikkar, India's ambassador to Red China; he was the man supposedly keeping Nehru —and others—informed of what Mao Tse-Tung was thinking. Interesting to note, therefore, that (according to Newsweek's New Delhi correspondent) ambassador Panikkar's daughter, Miss Devaki Panikkar, was advertised recently in an Indian newspaper as "giving the lie to western slanderers of New China." Writing on New China's glories, apparently with the ambassador's approval, she said:

"I could not help thinking how much some of our ministers would profit by a course of intense training in the Marxist-Leninist theory."

Reading this, noting its source, some may wonder. Wonder if by some chance there may have been more than appeared on the surface in the notes which, during the debates at UN, came from Mr. Nehru's ambassador at Peiping—and more than appeared on the surface in Sir Benegal Rau's efforts to stop Red China being called an aggressor.

I think that we might very well have comments from the Secretary of State for External Affairs respecting that editorial; it is one which strikes me as very important.

The last matter to which I should like to refer is the suggestion contained in some news dispatches, and particularly a United Press dispatch of yesterday headed, "Soviet Stand Towards West May Soften; Opening of Door to Discussions Indicated." The suggestion I presume is that at the forthcoming meeting of the foreign ministers of the big powers Russia is going to try again to produce some kind of peace movement.

The main item on the agenda is the rearming of western Germany. The discussion of this item is at the insistence of Russia. I trust that our minister of external affairs will use whatever influence he has to see to it that the Russian attitude is not allowed to eat too much into the vitals of the decisions that must be made by the foreign ministers. I listened carefully to the exposé of communism by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore). As hon. members know, Lenin is the interpreter of the Marxian doctrines and is quoted frequently and reverently by Stalin. It was Lenin who disposed for all time of there being any question of friendly and lasting collaboration in a statement in the following words:

We are living not only in a state, but in a system of states, and the existence of the Soviet republic side by side with imperialist states for a long time is unthinkable. One or the other must triumph in the end. And before that end comes, a series of clashes between the Soviet republic and the bourgeois states is inevitable.

In commenting on diplomatic statements, Stalin made the following statement:

Words must have no relation to actions—otherwise what kind of diplomacy is it? Words are one thing, actions another. Good words are a mask for concealment of bad deeds. Sincere diplomacy is no more possible than dry water or wooden iron.

That is the man we have to depend upon to keep the peace of the world. As I see it, there is only one way in which the peace of the world can be kept, and this is in contradistinction to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). I still believe the United Nations has a part to play in keeping the peace of the world. If there is going to be a just and lasting peace the only way we can have it is by a true parliament of man, as the United Nations has been planned. In that parliament Canada must play her part.

There is only one way in which to meet the communists of the world, and that is with a big stick. It is to have that big stick ready that we in Canada are united today. No matter on what side of the house we sit or to what party we belong, I am sure that whatever sacrifices the government deem to be necessary will have the full support of everyone. All we want is to know what we are spending the money for and to see that it is properly spent. Once we have that, you can be certain that we as representatives of the people will speak with their voice when we say, "All right, go right ahead, you have the highball. Carry on down the track."

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I trust you will permit me to add my congratulations to those already extended to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, on their apt presentation. Then may I say it affords me great pleasure to be associated in this house with my friend and colleague from Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham), who is to be congratulated upon his elevation to the portfolio of mines and technical surveys. His appointment is a compliment to his constituents and to the province of Alberta.

Today, Mr. Speaker, there is a feeling of urgency in our thoughts and in our affairs. It may well be that the requirements of national security rightfully deny us the opportunity of learning full details of the plans of the government. I feel, however, that this is a time for outspoken leadership, for a clear declaration of policy and a reaffirmation of our faith in democracy. Above all it is a time for an expression of confidence in the future of our Canadian brotherhood. Our people have been given a description of the duties and sacrifices of citizenship. We need not have the slightest fear that Canadians will not respond; our most recent history is proof of that. But it is of the essence of our way of life that the people must be kept fully informed. When our people know the need they will answer the call.

Over the years great social benefits have been obtained for our people, and these must not be endangered. We must provide full opportunity for individual self-expression. We must provide safeguards for the legitimate interests of each segment of our society. We must strive to guarantee our citizens a share of the national wealth so that at least minimum requirements and necessities of life will be secured to all, for herein are contained the fundamental tenets of Liberalism and the philosophy of the Liberal party. Canada has achieved an envied position in the eyes of many of the world's peoples. It is recognized for its constructive, deliberate and fair-minded search for social justice for the disabled, the underprivileged and the aged; for its emphasis on health, welfare and education, equal opportunity for all, and a steady approach toward the goal of full employment; and for the productive capacity of its citizens. These are fine aims, which to a very considerable extent have been realized. To go further and attain a full measure of security will be difficult, the more so under our defence economy.

We plan to spend in the next few years in this country some $5 billion on national defence. We are all agreed on this stern necessity. We will seek by every means to assure that this money will be expended in such a way as to give us the maximum possible protection. When we consider what $5 billion would do for the aged, the ill-housed and the undernourished in our country, perhaps a truer measure of the cost of this great effort can be visualized. While this vast amount must be spent on preparedness, which is basically a non-productive purpose, I submit that we must yet continue to assure our people the goods, services and rights which are theirs by virtue of their citizenship and as a return for individual effort in the national interest.

Today we should be concentrating our energies on increasing our output of vital materials. Whatever restrictions may become necessary on the output of certain types of consumer goods, or on price and wage levels, these should go hand in hand with an urgent emphasis on the production of food, clothing and in fact all the necessities of life, and the full exploitation of our immense industrial potential. We are associated with many other countries in an effort to assure national security. In our own interests, as well as in accordance with high moral principles, we have undertaken to assist underprivileged nations elsewhere in the world. Increased production will not only help improve our own living standards but will help us meet those international commitments.

Increased production alone is not enough. There must be a proper distribution of the goods we produce. With this attained our people will be prepared for the physical and spiritual part they must play in the world today. To this end the social security measures instituted by our government can make a powerful contribution. In effect our unemployment insurance provisions are a means whereby a better distribution of purchasing power is afforded wage earners between periods of gainful employment. Family allowances are also a method of redistributing the national wealth between periods of lesser and greater family responsibility. Furthermore, the recommendations of the joint committee on old age security when implemented will go a long way toward bringing about a more equal distribution, and will tend to distribute the burden on the shoulders of all. With respect to the whole field of social security in this country I cannot do better than quote the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as set forth by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in his submission on old age security on March 10, 1950, as they appear at page 643 of Hansard:

> One of our main domestic concerns is the provision of social security for all Canadians. The funds distributed under old age pensions, family allowances, pensions to the blind, health grants and other measures have also, in addition to the direct benefit received by the direct recipients of those amounts, added a strong upward influence in maintaining levels of employment. Our social security program is, as you know, by no means complete. We still have a good way to go before provision of social security in Canada reaches the level which will satisfy . . .

In actual fact all incapacity resulting from sickness and all disability due to age are a burden upon the national wealth, irrespective of the administering authority. It would be far better if these problems were made a governmental responsibility, though not necessarily of the federal administration. A sounder, more satisfied society would result from a proper allocation of expenditure in this regard. Both locally and nationally, through municipal, provincial and federal agencies, and through the devoted efforts of many fine service and charitable organizations, we have achieved a creditable record in the field of social service. Until such time as the world situation permits us to go forward with courage and with confidence towards the bringing into being of full security for all, we must participate to the full in any other means available.

There is, however, one factor which continues to be a sore spot and that is housing. Should we not be laying ever greater emphasis upon the provision of low-cost housing, and in fact of housing generally, to meet the still well-nigh insurmountable demand for living accommodation? Until the people of this country are adequately housed, there will be bad influences which will continue to wreak havoc with family life, and the economic pressure of sustained high rentals will continue its damaging effect on the standard of living. Rent is one expense which more frequently than not bears hardest on those least able to pay. The benefit of the fairest and best thought out plans for social security will continue to fall short of even the minimum standards for which they are designed, so long as we are short of adequate housing at a price people can pay.

I have previously made reference to the work of voluntary organizations in connection with social welfare. To my mind, it is a question as to whether we are considering the objectives and methods of these organizations as fully as we might to assist them in obtaining a greater degree of effectiveness in their objectives. After all, no one will deny that the greater the degree of voluntary social betterment the easier will be the task of the official government organizations in this field, and the more in keeping with our principles of self-determination in a free society. We have, I would think, gone a considerable way along the path of recognition of the importance of voluntary aid and organization in social service, as witness our association with the national physical fitness campaign, our national health grants, vocational training and many other projects. Much of the evidence considered by the committee on old age security consisted of submissions by voluntary social service organizations interested in this field. The incidence and development of mutual aid, friendly societies and charitable trusts is an outgrowth of many centuries of the democratic way of life, particularly in the English-speaking world. For my part I would like to feel that a comprehensive study would be made with a view to determining, in the light of present-day conditions, their full significance and value in helping to bring about the kind of social organization we in this country would like to see established.

At the present time a large measure of protection is afforded groups of employees against sickness, including hospital and medical expenses, through commercial insurance bodies. One example of this is the medical benefit plan recently instituted through the efforts of organized representatives of federal civil service associations. Moreover, in addition to the many plans sponsored by industrial concerns, whether instituted by management or by management co-operating with labour, there are large numbers of mutual benefit societies which are purely associations of employees, fraternal organizations, or social groups in which the economic factor is only part of their attraction.

There are, of course, a number of societies, some of them religious, many of them participants in the community chest, which do magnificent work in social aid and welfare. Special consideration with regard to taxation for purely charitable organizations is embodied in our legislation, though I am not familiar with the provisions concerning the related voluntary service organizations.

We all know the value of the labour-management production committees set up in industry under government auspices during the war which had as their object increasing production and the ironing out of difficulties at the source. Might they not serve as the basis for the promotion of thrift, saving and co-dependency among employee groups not otherwise taken care of by collective bargaining agreements.

In the field of co-operative saving as distinct from the object of insurance, we have the phenomenal growth of the credit union movement. The most significant development has been in the province of Quebec where the caisses populaires have had their widest growth. However, in 1948, for all Canada, there were some 850 thousand Credit Union members with assets of more than $253 million.

The history of co-operative marketing in Canada would require a volume to unfold. Perhaps the western Canadian wheat pool enterprises are among the best known of this type, and their value to the western farmer, and in the long run to the general economy, has been magnificent.

At this time when we are concerned with reducing easy credit and the building up of our financial reserves to meet an emergency, I feel we should promote the development of these and similar organizations from the point of view of encouraging saving as a bulwark against temporary insecurity and unforeseen expenditure.

This country, Mr. Speaker, has been more fortunate than many in this modern world. It is due, in a great measure, to the comprehensive policies of this government that the war and its aftermath caused as little real dislocation and hardship as has been the case. The true value of these policies during the period of consolidation and restoration from the ravages of war will be seen when we face up to the difficulties that lie ahead.

We are fortunate, too, that in this country our people continue to exhibit those pioneering qualities which have brought about our present high degree of development. This process of development, particularly in its industrial aspects, is greater, actually and comparably, than at any previous time in our history. The requirements of modern living, and of the maintenance of a high standard of living in our complex society, demand far-reaching policies and methods to permit society to function freely. We realize the problem is complicated. It is a problem which is not personal or local or even national. Our problems are international.

We are fortunate in having such a highly regarded and brilliant Canadian as our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We of this party hold no brief for the socialized state with its accent on regulation—nay, regimentation. We continue to adhere to the concept of a free society where individual initiative and energy shall have full play; where faith in the essential goodness of the individual is maintained, but where nonetheless realistic understanding of human nature, and of the influence of economic and social pressures, forces the adoption of some degree of regulation of individual activity in the general interest.

We have faith in the direction of a government which carried us successfully through the second world war and the return to a peacetime economy. It will not fail us now in preparing and concerting those measures which will give us, we trust, the wherewithal to meet the future with confidence unshaken.

Nevertheless, I would like to see the expression of our faith in our country clearly asserted, forcibly set forth at this time. Perhaps, in that war weariness that seems to possess all peace-loving nations after conflict, we fail to apprehend the need for that eloquence which can personify the spiritual values in our civilization; to realize the need for clarity of expression akin to those outpourings of the human spirit which have heretofore inspired nations to heroic effort and endurance. In such fashion in our time the genius of Winston Churchill, of Franklin Roosevelt, glowed through their exhortations to their peoples. This quality was possessed in more humble, plainer-spoken fashion by the late great leader of the Liberal party, Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, as it is by his successor, our revered Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

There is, I maintain, no scruple, no objection or no law which denies us the right to have confidence in ourselves and in our cause, nor yet the right to express the same in forthright fashion. Let there be, however, no delay. Let us act while we speak.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): In rising to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with all of those who have preceded me in congratulating most warmly the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. All of us realize the exacting nature of the task they had before them, particularly those of us who have had the privilege of a similar honour at the opening of previous sessions of this house. These two gentlemen certainly carried out their duties in a most creditable fashion, and they deserve the words of commendation which have been addressed to them by those who have taken part in this debate.

I also wish to join with the others who have expressed the appreciation that the members of this house feel of the manner in which you, Mr. Speaker, represented this house and this parliament at the opening of the new House of Commons in London. I am sure that the members of the mother of parliaments were pleased to know that this house, this spiritual offspring of that mother of parliaments, could send a man of such obvious dignity and distinction to represent us on such an occasion.

It has been made obvious, during the course of this debate, that the members of this house recognize full well the seriousness of the situation with which this country and the nations of the western world are now faced. I find it a little bit difficult to agree with the point of view expressed by some hon. members opposite, when they have said that one of the great needs is for this house to convince the people of Canada of the great seriousness of the present situation. I cannot speak for the whole country but in Nova Scotia generally and in Halifax in particular I feel that there is a full and deep realization of the problems with which we are faced and the serious nature of those that can be foreseen in the immediate future.

The people with whom I have spoken—and I have made it a point to speak with as many as possible—have shown an awareness of what the future may hold in store and a realization that Canada and her allies must do all in their power, first of all, to avoid war and, second, to make all necessary preparations for war if war must come. Because of my belief that there is this realization by the people of Canada of the realities of the present situation, I feel that the government and this parliament can trust the instinctive good sense and the courage of the Canadian people, and that we can feel assured that if we do the things we consider necessary to maintain peace and at the same time to prepare for whatever eventualities may be before us, we can proceed with confidence that the nation will respond to whatever demands have to be made upon it.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that this country for a number of years past has been extremely fortunate. We have never experienced the real ravages of war. It is true that the price we had to pay in blood and treasure in two wars was bitter enough; but a kind Providence has always protected us from the actual onslaught of the enemy. Since the end of the second world war we have faced some difficulties, and we have had reason to complain of a number of inconveniences and troubles. But by and large, I think that our good fortune has continued. This morning I was greatly impressed by a phrase that I read in a pamphlet put out by the Department of Agriculture. In discussing the question of the food situation in the world this pamphlet said that the per capita food supplies in most countries are still below the 1935-39 level. What a picture, Mr. Speaker, that draws for us in Canada, a country which has for some years past, I understand, enjoyed a per capita consumption of all the essential foodstuffs, and many that are not essential, that has been the highest in our history. I would direct attention to the fact that this is per capita consumption, not per capita supply. In spite of increases in prices which have been significant and serious enough, and have been one of our major causes for complaint over the last two or three years, the vast majority of Canadians have been in a position to increase their consumption of such a fundamental thing as food while other countries have been facing an actual deficit situation with regard to supplies. I think also of the significance of the phrase "most countries." That does not just include the countries we have always regarded as being in a normal deficit position. It includes the majority if not all of the countries of western Europe which is the very cradle and birthplace of our civilization. It is not unreasonable to suppose that this good fortune to which we have become accustomed might have created a sense of complacency in the Canadian people; and this is probably the basis for the statements which have been made by hon. members opposite, and to which I referred. I may be wrong, but I am personally convinced that such is not the case. I am sure that no feeling of complacency exists among the Canadian people. In my humble estimation Canadian public opinion is alive to the dangers of the present situation, and the Canadian people are prepared for forthright action and leadership. Leadership by the government and by men in public life will find a ready and loyal response from a vast majority of all the Canadian people.

Our most important and essential activity at the present time is our struggle to keep the peace. This struggle to keep the peace is after all, by every possible means of comparison, our best and first line of defence. If the outbreak of a new war, which appears to loom more imminent day by day upon the horizon, can be prevented, the saving to humanity will be incalculable. We might just ask ourselves: can any price be too high to pay to ward off this terrible catastrophe of human suffering, waste and futility? I think the answer is that no price can be too high which leaves our honour unsullied and maintains our essential freedoms. The scene of this battle for peace is the difficult and complicated field of international relations.

During the recess of the special session I was one of the members who had the privilege of having a glimpse of this all-important side of Canadian policy during the fifth session of the general assembly of the United Nations. I hope that on another occasion it may be possible and appropriate for me to deal at greater length with the experiences which we all shared there. However, what I want to say tonight is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) is making at a cost of prodigious labour and at the expense of tremendous energy a truly magnificent contribution to the strengthening of our vital first line of defence.

I have been particularly pleased to note, Mr. Speaker, the almost universal approval and esteem in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs is held by the people of this country. This is a second instance to which we can point in which public opinion in Canada is at the present time particularly sound and firm. However, I should like to point out to both his friends and his enemies, if he has any enemies, that behind the Secretary of State for External Affairs in all his actions and in the stands which he has so courageously taken in the name of his country is the solid backing of his colleagues in the cabinet, and particularly our great Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent).

The activity of second importance which we have before us in these days is that of our preparations for collective defence. Defence is such an essential matter that it is almost impossible to describe it as secondary to anything else. It is perhaps a paradox of our age that the only thing we can possibly regard as more important than the building up of the armies and armaments of ourselves and our allies is our equally strong and tenacious efforts to ensure that these arms and armaments will never be put to their intended use. However that may be, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has outlined to the house the government's program calling for expenditures of $1,600 million this year as part of a $5 billion three-year program. I am sure that the announcement of this program in the house gave us all a very solemn thrill.

In his criticism of the defence program the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) saw fit to point out that under the rules and procedures of the house we are limited to the commitment by the government of $1,600 million. He appeared to set quite some store by that. Then, shortly afterwards, he turned around and admitted that it was perhaps very wise for the Minister of National Defence to disclose the whole program. It was particularly wise because I am quite sure that if he had not done so it would have been seized upon as another excuse for claiming that no information has been given on defence matters. I believe that this kind of criticism is, Mr. Speaker, a very clear indication to the house and to the country of a complete inability to discover any valid basis for criticism, and of satisfaction with the small kind of carping criticism that I have outlined.

My judgment of the temper of the Canadian people is that they are not inclined to question the amount or the size of our defence program; but they are—and I hope they will always be—very much inclined to question how the money is to be spent, and to make sure that it is spent in the best and the most economical way. With this in mind I am sure that a very vast majority of the people of Canada are greatly satisfied to know that by and large the members of the opposition have indicated their support not only for the broad basis, the broad lines of defence policy as outlined by the minister, but also for most of the details. This is a very reassuring situation from several points of view, as my colleagues will agree. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, there will be other opportunities for discussing very fully the details of the defence program and spending. I do not propose to make any more extended remarks on that subject this evening.

Last evening the debate in the house turned to the consideration largely of economic and financial policies. This, under present circumstances, is of course inseparably linked with our problems of defence and of meeting the costs of defence. I am sure that all hon. members and the public generally were very appreciative of the frank and able speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). I think this house was expecting a clear statement from the minister on the steps being taken by the government to curb inflation, and, particularly in view of the widespread public interest in the question of controls, of the government's view on that very important matter. It is true that the cost of living is only a symptom of inflation; but it is a very painful symptom, one which touches every person in Canada and bears particularly heavily upon those least able to bear the burden. The C.C.F. subamendment to the address in reply deals with one of the suggested means—and in my view a very partial means—of meeting one of the problems relating to inflation. As I understood him, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) in his remarks last night supported, on behalf of his group, the C.C.F. subamendment. In fact, I understood him to say affirmatively that the C.C.F. subamendment was included in the amendment and that it was really only stating in words what was actually there in any event.

To me this conjures up a most interesting picture, an inviting picture I may say, that is quite apart from the obvious public interest in a statement of that kind. The picture I see is that of a student of political science a few years hence looking up the records of parliament—Hansard for the twentieth parliament—and reading the debates of the sessions from 1945 to 1949. He would read there the resounding speeches which one can almost hear still echoing in this hall, speeches of the then leader of the opposition, speeches of the then hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, the present member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell); speeches of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming); speeches of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe); speeches of the then member for Broadview, of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Adamson), of the hon. member who then represented the constituency of Rosedale—to name only a few of them.

What was the burden of all those resounding speeches? It was the absolute and imperative necessity to get rid of each and every control that had been placed upon the Canadian economy during the war.

Mr. Noseworthy: And the Liberals fell for it.

Mr. Dickey: My hon. friends are great people for diagnosing real troubles but never being able to do anything about them.

Mr. Knowles: Have you read what Graham Towers said?

Mr. Dickey: Then our student of political science turns to the records of the twenty-first parliament, and reading the debates of the session of 1951 he comes across the speech delivered last night by the leader of the opposition, and speeches of ten or twelve other hon. members opposite. What does he conclude from those? I am sure the only conclusion to which he could come would be that of confusion thrice confounded. I am quite sure there are very few members in the house, either on this side or in the ranks of the official opposition, who are quite sure whether or not the official opposition is supporting the C.C.F. subamendment because it is for a system of over-all controls, including wage controls, or whether they are supporting it because it is a system of selective controls specifically excluding wage controls.

I would say also to my hon. friends of the C.C.F. party that I think it would be well for them to outline pretty carefully the way in which they want the various opposing groups to interpret their subamendment, because the support of the Social Credit party has been offered to them on the distinct understanding that the C.C.F. subamendment means that wage controls must be part of the program; and there is some suggestion of that kind in the speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins), and those of some others.

Mr. Knowles: Wages are controlled already.

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Knowles: This parliament passed a wage control bill last August.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Dickey: Perhaps we could deal with that particular bit of ice-skating at some other time.

I turn now to some other aspects of the impact of our defence program on the Canadian economy. I should like to dwell with particular emphasis upon the necessity of the greatest possible attention being given to a decentralization of the new industry it will be found necessary to set up. I should like to place certain considerations before the government, and I do so most sincerely indeed.

I hope as the situation develops it will be found possible to take action along lines currently being suggested. It is quite obvious Canada is going to undertake a great industrial effort, and I think that the Canadian people are most anxious that that industrial effort be carried forward with the greatest possible effect and to the greatest possible extent.

This is the second time in a generation that Canada has embarked upon a program of this kind. We are going to try to do our bit, as one of the great arsenals of democracy; and the extreme ends of the country, east and west, are clamouring for an opportunity to play their proper part in this great effort. I wish to join with other voices raised in the house and in the other place—and may I say this is a regular broadside at the government, and we should not forget there is another place—outlining to the government the necessity for making some long-range plans for decentralization.

The hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley), the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and a number of others speaking in the debate have brought this subject to the attention of the house. I venture to mention it again this evening because this matter has been the subject of very serious study and discussion by a number of groups of members for some months past. It is our intention to bring our views before the government as strongly as possible.

Hon. members will recall the situation that faced us in 1939. With very little warning we were involved in an all-out war with a very serious opponent; and for some considerable time we, as part of the commonwealth, fought almost alone. It was therefore a situation where speed was of the essence in our industrial mobilization. Because of the economic difficulties which immediately preceded the outbreak of war, there was a pool of labour available in the industrialized portions of the country, and that pool of labour was a skilled pool. I think there were very good reasons why those advantages had to be taken into consideration and used. The result was a serious concentration of industrial development in the central part of the country. Perhaps it is unnecessary for me to say that I was not a member of this house at the time, but I well remember the representations that were made repeatedly to the government by maritime and other members early in the war and throughout the war pointing out the situation which was growing up and which eventually became a fait accompli.

The situation is now quite different. Canada is enjoying a very buoyant economy, a situation which is described as full employment. To say that there is full employment reminds me a little of something said in "Animal Farm". It was discovered that there was a saying among animals that all were created equal, but some of the animals were more equal than others. Canada is enjoying full employment, but some parts of Canada are enjoying fuller employment than others.

One place where there is a ready pool of labour is in the maritimes and eastern Canada. There exists there a pool of workmen possessing great ability and great adaptability ready for recruitment. They are not all by any means unemployed; many of them are employed but in positions which do not give full scope to their abilities. A great deal could be accomplished by a reallocation of labour. We have there great resources in the way of steel, coal and other raw materials. We have also a great advantage in our geographic position. We have immediate access to tidewater twelve months in the year, and that is of great advantage in the present situation. I submit to the government that these are compelling reasons for giving consideration to these factors when industrial expansion is being carried out.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has warned the house and the country that a danger of direct attack exists. That was not so in the last war except for some danger from shelling from the sea. The situation in Canada today indicates that consideration should be given to the dispersal of industry in order to avoid the possibility of our industry being completely hampered by one or a series of aerial raids.

Another consideration which should not be lost sight of is the advantages which accrue to the economy of an area in which industrial mobilization takes place. I think we all recognize the importance of ensuring as much as possible the equal development of all sections of the country. It is impossible for one section of the country to enjoy great prosperity if other sections are not in a similarly favoured position. The advantages to the economy are of two kinds. First is the direct advantage of the employment created in an area by war production. Second is the much more important advantage derived from the availability of the plants which have been created for defence needs when those needs have passed. This availability was the basis of the great peacetime expansion of industry which occurred in central Canada during the five post-war years. This has been the experience in the past and I am sure that in the future when the need for defence industries will have passed as we hope it will, the stage will be set for a further industrial expansion for peacetime purposes. I submit that it would be of inestimable value to Canada if a large proportion of that peacetime expansion were to take place in the maritimes and the western parts of Canada.

I should like to attempt to drive home my points, and to do this I should like to cite one example which I think will show exactly what I have been trying to point out. During the last war an aircraft repair plant was constructed at Eastern Passage with government assistance. That plant was operated during the war by the Clarke-Ruse Aircraft Company. After its usefulness for that purpose had passed, the plant became vacant and remained so for some time. Through the co-operation of the provincial and federal governments the Fairey Aviation Company of England acquired the plant about two and a half years ago and this establishment is now a thriving industry which is literally bursting at the seams. It is making an indispensable contribution to the economy of that particular section of Nova Scotia. In addition this plant is carrying out repair and conversion work on naval aircraft with an efficiency and economy that I know is a source of considerable satisfaction to the officers of the Department of National Defence.

That is an example of what has occurred over and over again in connection with defence plants that were constructed in central Canada during the war. I appeal to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and to the government generally to consider the case, which has been made by other speakers much better than I can present it, and to give every possible assistance in the process of the decentralization of our defence industry.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, when I took part in the debate on the second or third day of the present session, I said little about the defence of our country because at that time I did not wish to attempt to criticize the government's policy without having their program in front of me so that I could give it careful consideration. That program has now been presented to us, and since it was presented to us by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and various of his ministers a number of members on both sides of the house have in their speeches amplified the information. As a result, we now feel that we are quite capable of assessing the whole program and of deciding for ourselves whether or not it is adequate. We feel that in some measure at least we can give support to what the government has proposed as its program for meeting the situation that confronts us today. As a matter of fact, I suppose with a great many of the things they propose we can find ourselves in complete agreement.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if it would be possible to have more order in the chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Low: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. It was hard enough for me to hear myself, let alone to have others hear. I of course realize that hon. members think they are not missing much, and I do not blame them, at this stage of the game. But at the same time I have something to say that may prove to be of interest to one or two people anyway, and they are entitled to hear. There is freedom of speech in our country. I think there is something that is equally important, and that is freedom to be heard. All too often that freedom is overlooked in this house.

The government's program calls for the spending of $5 billion for defence in the next three years. We know that Canada will have to spend a great deal of money if it is to get ready to meet the dangers that we see about us. We know that if we are to prepare ourselves adequately it will cost us a great deal of money. But it seems to me that altogether too much emphasis has been placed upon the amount we are going to spend and far too little on the details of the ways in which we are going to spend the money.

I cannot help feeling that a good many who have spoken in this debate have been of the opinion that just because we were going to spend $5 billion in three years, which means about $1,600 million a year, that was all it was going to take. But anyone with a lick of sense knows that is not so. It is not how much money we spend that is going to count. In the end, it will be the wisdom with which that money has been spent that will tell the story. We think that anything less than the amount that has been proposed to be spent in the next three years would certainly not be enough. When I say that altogether too much emphasis has been placed on telling the world how much we are going to spend in our budget for defence purposes in the next three years, I do not mean to imply that we expect the government to talk too much about the details of their plans. But what I do suggest, Mr. Speaker, is that those of us who are in this house, and observant and intelligent people throughout the country who are able to see what the government is doing, should judge for themselves whether or not the action that is supposed to go along with $5 billion of spending is wise action. Quite frankly I cannot begin to see that the government is moving along a line of action that will prepare Canada, and ensure that we can make an optimum effort—perhaps I had better say the maximum effort of which we are capable—to defend ourselves.

I quite agree, too, Mr. Speaker, that in our defensive effort the main emphasis ought to be placed upon air power. I think the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) made a notable contribution to the debate. I read it with very keen interest, because I felt that the hon. member knew the situation and knew what he was talking about. I certainly feel in agreement with him that our main effort ought to be in the realm of the air. Certainly the Canadian people seem to me peculiarly adapted to aerial activity, aerial warfare. I think, too, that Canada should emphasize the strengthening of her navy. That is something with which we agree.

I agree that a country as large as ours and as blessed with resources, natural resources, but with a very small manpower such as we have, must measure its contribution more in terms of material than manpower. When I say "measure its contribution more in terms of material than manpower," I mean by that the contribution which we make to the defence of Europe or of any other country outside Canada. I hope that I can make that particularly clear because it is important to the case which I want to make.

Certainly, if war should come upon us again—I am one of those in the house who have expressed the hope that it will not come again—if it should come we do not want to make the same mistake that was made in world war II, when we practically bled our country white of manpower and put ourselves into an almost impossible position with respect to reinforcements when reinforcements were needed. We ought to be careful not to bite off more than we can chew in any effort that we do have to make to fulfil our commitments under the Atlantic pact.

As I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) last night describe the steps that his government expects to take to cushion our economy against further inflation, I thought that he was very forthright and perfectly sound in so far as his description of those steps related to the orthodox system that he persists in following. I could agree with him perfectly if I could make myself believe that he simply has to stay within the old accepted orthodox financial policies; but, Mr. Speaker, I have to criticize the Minister of Finance and the government very severely for their stubborn refusal to make use of subsidies for what I consider today are two most urgent purposes. One of these purposes is to encourage production of those things of which we have an insufficient supply in our country, and the lack of which may make us weaker in our effort to prepare.

The second of those purposes is of course to mitigate to some extent the terrible effects of the very high cost of living. The government could have helped immeasurably, through a wise use of subsidies over these past two or three years.

I quite agree with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said last night in that respect, and I do not need to repeat it because he said exactly what I think. I also feel very critical of the failure of the finance minister to use the Bank of Canada as it should have been used over these years. Ever since 1935 the government has refused stubbornly to make use of the Bank of Canada to regulate the supply of money in this country at a level of balance with the goods and services that were there to be purchased, and as a result of the failure we have gone on to a condition of inflation that simply need not be.

When the Minister of Finance jumped on the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) I thought that he did not quite know what the hon. member for Greenwood had said. I am in agreement with the hon. member for Greenwood when he says that the Bank of Canada could have exercised an overall supervision of banking in this country to the extent that we would not have today such a terrible inflationary condition.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He did not know what the Bank of Canada had been doing either.

Mr. Low: That is perfectly correct. When the Minister of Finance says that the Bank of Canada cannot do that of course he is perfectly right unless and until this government supplies it with a policy under which it will operate. What we are asking the government to do is to supply it with that policy. It seems to me that one of the most important things we have to do if we are to prevent a recurrence of this sort of inflationary condition in the years to come, and established as a result of an all-out effort for defence, is to put the banking system of this country on a 100 per cent reserve basis. I do not see any other way by which we can ensure that the country will not be flooded with inflation time and time again.

I do not know but I do not believe that the hon. member for Greenwood believes that. I am not suggesting for one moment that he is joining me in making that proposal, but I will say this: that coupled with a program of that type it would become necessary for the Bank of Canada to get a money provision to supply the government with whatever money it requires at any time to augment the supply that is in the country at the present time for making available to the people goods and services that are there for them to buy. When that is done, and only when it is done, can we ever hope to cope with the inflationary dangers that arise out of lack of regulation of the money supply such as we have today.

We feel that the present financial policy of the government, a policy which has caused disaster time after time down through history, has brought us to the brink of complete break-down more times than one can speak about in the short time that he has in this debate. It seems surprising to me that we continue to believe or hope that that same system will bring us through other dangers such as those we have passed through, without causing a break-down. It is just impossible for it to do so, and we cannot hope for an all-out effort, we cannot hope particularly for an effort of preparedness that will spread the sacrifices over the population of Canada in anything like equality until we do have a sound and sane approach to the policy of finance.

I said there are many things with which we can agree in the government's program, but we do deplore the fact that the government has failed to take appropriate steps to ensure a greater measure of equality of sacrifice and service in their program of preparedness.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke in the debate he expressed his conviction that we were living in a time of emergency, a time of grave danger. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), speaking in Montreal just a day or two ago before a delegation of the Canadian Lumbermen's Association meeting at the Mount Royal hotel, is reported in these words in the Montreal Gazette of today:

> The behaviour of the Soviet union and its allies and satellites in the last six months has shown that they are more prepared than we had previously estimated to take risks which may lead to a third world war. For that reason there is no escaping the conclusion that we must arm ourselves and quickly, and assist our allies to arm. We must accept that necessity.

I emphasize the words, "that we must arm ourselves, and quickly". I accept that; I agree. But I am asking the government this question: Where is their program that arms us so quickly? That is the whole, the nub, of the situation now. Where is that program? I have not seen any, and they certainly have not given evidence, so far as they have divulged their program to the house and country, that they have a program that will make it possible for us to arm quickly. I assume in the absence of it that there is no such program.

I must say I have not been able to find very much urgency in the government's proposals thus far. In the debate to date it seems to me we have spoken as if most, if not all, the causes of world chaos stem from Russia. Consequently there seems to be an attitude that all we have to do is to build a wall against Russia.

Let me emphasize once more, as I did when I spoke before in the debate, that there are deeper things to be concerned about—deeper things. What we have to be concerned about is this: What is it that made a bolshevik Russia; what is it that made Russian imperialism, and made those things possible? They are results, not causes.

It seems to me we must be aware of the forces that have caused the growth of a bolshevik Russia, and made her strong and a menace now to the world. World chaos today stems from attempts in practically all the democracies to build upon decadent systems and wrong principles. What we have to do is to set out to change those wrong principles to right ones, to do away with decadent systems —financial, economic and otherwise—and try to build our democracies on sound and solid rock.

If we do that we can abolish the things that have caused Russian imperialism and the spread of the evil doctrine of communism throughout practically all the countries of the world. True, we have to build some sort of wall now, and it is very urgent that we get that wall built. At the same time however we should be concentrating considerable attention upon the weaknesses in our own way of doing things that have given rise to these evils which now menace us.

I have listened to the speeches and examined them all but, as I said, I have not seen any evidence in the government's program that would ensure equality of sacrifice in the things we have to do. In all the debate I have gained the impression that there has been altogether too much pussyfooting on the matter of manpower. I do not think there is any question about it at all. There has been a lot of skating around, and a lot of shying away and soft pedalling the business of manpower. I think about the only man in the house who spoke true to his convictions, and boldly, was the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). He let us know exactly where he stood, and made certain proposals to which I think it would be wise for the government to pay heed.

Let me deal for a moment with this question of manpower. There is no question about the fact that if we are going to make the maximum effort in our own defence, and if we are going to fulfil our obligations in any regional pacts to which we have given our allegiance, then we have got to make the wisest possible use of the manpower within Canada. As I have already said, I am convinced that our greatest contribution to any external effort, wherever that may be, will be in materials, not masses of manpower. Because our country, big as it is and wealthy as it is, has a small population. Let us lay that down first and foremost, and definitely.

But on the other hand I do not think the government can possibly begin to make preparations it ought to make without carrying on immediately a national registration. We are calling for a national registration just as fast as the government can get at it. We feel that not only will Canada need to know where its available manpower is, what kind of manpower is available and of what type, but it will also need to have a well trained citizenry ready to take the offensive in any danger that threatens our country. And the only way we can have that is to have compulsory training of our Canadian people for home defence. We are calling for the compulsory military training of our Canadian people in readiness for anything that menaces our shores or our land. At the same time that we are calling for national registration and compulsory service for training our citizenry so that they can be ready and so that they will know how to do things, we think every community in Canada ought to have a well-trained group, small though it may be, with sufficient equipment so that they may know how to use it, and not only how to use it but be prepared to use it in case things do happen making it necessary.

I know isolated parts of our country where it would be the simplest thing in the world for an enemy to drop airborne troops. Who says they may not attempt to do such a thing? Certainly we are not so isolated that that could not happen, if Russia decided it would be wise to get hold of certain areas within this vast country, from which to launch, let us say, rockets with warheads composed of atomic machinery of some sort. How far would we be able to take care of a situation like that under present circumstances? It would not take much of an airborne force to cut communications and transportation in certain vital parts of our country and thus render us impotent. There is only one way to deal with a situation like that, and that is to set out now to build up a reserve force in Canada which will be indeed a reserve force, something of which we can be proud and under which we can feel some security.

We have got to begin—it should have been done long ago—to train leadership, those who can train and take the lead in every community in Canada in putting our people through the type of training they require. Where is that program now? Has the government something like that? If so, why has it not been presented? I suggest it is because they are afraid to present it.

We feel that while we are attempting to prepare ourselves adequately with respect to the proper distribution of manpower and the preparation of a well-trained citizenry in home defence we ought to be trying to organize our financial and economic preparedness so that they will guarantee that in everything we have to do there will be equality of sacrifice for our people. I do not think it is fair for the government to expect to go on through this emergency as they went on through world war II, and again further back through world war I, expecting the people of this country to make an all-out effort to build equipment and provide materials for an all-out war, to supply an army that will be a credit to the country and guarantee that the forces of right will be victorious; to expect them to make supreme sacrifices, in many cases to give limbs and eyes and other parts of their bodies in this great effort; to pay for the war in that way and then when the whole thing is over to come back and have to pay for it again two or three times. That is not right or just, but that is what has happened. That has been the effect of our financial approach to this business of war and defence.

There must be a change. How many of our boys who went over in world war I and world war II came back and said, "We thought we had paid for the war with our efforts." But then they were taxed to the very last cent they had and kicked out. As one of my colleagues has said, they were allowed to languish without decent jobs or any form of security during the thirties. That was the result because we did not have the gumption to lay down a financial and economic system that would make it unnecessary for those fellows to pay through the nose and in every other way and then come back and pay for it again with dollars and cents.

We also call for an all-out organization that will make it possible for us to defend ourselves and to help other countries that require our materials to defend themselves. The strongest possible Canada should be the slogan. Canada should be able to do her utmost. We have thought, along with many other speakers, that in the industrial effort that is to be made due consideration must be given to the claims of western Canada and the maritime provinces for industrialization. I listened last night to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson) and I must say that he made a very good speech and offered some practical and forthright suggestions.

One of the things that he asked me to do was to try to get the province of Alberta to make available to the Pacific coast part of the gas being found in that province so that the people down there may also be able to make an effort. I appreciate very much the suggestion and request he made, but if I were to ask the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to send to Alberta about two-thirds of the logs that he cuts so that they might be manufactured into finished lumber, I wonder what attitude he would take? I do not think he would look on it with very much interest.

Mr. Knowles: Timber.

Mr. Low: I should like to point out that the province of Alberta set up a commission to study the whole matter of reserves of gas. That commission gave the most earnest consideration for quite a long time to this matter. If there is one thing we try to do out there it is this: When we set up a royal commission and that commission makes its report we do not like to be like so many other governments I could name and not do anything about it. We feel that if we have confidence in the personnel of a commission when it is set up we ought to be ready to accept their advice when they make their report.

That is exactly what we are trying to do in Alberta. For the benefit of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni I should like to quote from the report of the board as follows:

> The board finds that Alberta's present established gas reserves are approximately equal to the amount of gas the board estimates is necessary to ensure the present and future requirements of the province and accordingly recommends that these reserves should be further increased before the export of gas is approved.

There may be differences of opinion about the extent of the gas reserves, but that is the considered opinion of the board experts who studied the whole thing, and who heard all the evidence that anybody wanted to present. When that report was presented the Alberta government decided in its wisdom that the best thing to do was not to give any permits for the export of gas from the province until further reserves were made available.

I understand that Mr. Manning's government has laid down a policy of inducements to private enterprise to come into the province, to make an all-out effort to find further gas reserves and to see that those are made available as quickly as possible. I say to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that if by this autumn those gas reserves have been augmented sufficiently I feel satisfied that the province of Alberta will then give its consent to the export of gas to those areas that require it for an all-out defence effort.

At the time the Alberta government made this announcement with respect to the gas reserves Mr. Manning announced that if in the meantime, that is between now and September next, the government of Canada feels that it is necessary to have gas in order to make an all-out effort for our defence, all they have to do is to ask and they will get it. That statement was made by Mr. Manning just a short time ago.

There is one other thing I should like to mention. Just after the close of the last war the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking in this house, criticized the Alberta government for not taking advantage of all the things it could have taken advantage of at the time to industrialize or increase its industrialization. If I am misquoting the right hon. minister I want to be corrected.

Mr. Gardiner: That is correct.

Mr. Low: That is what the minister said. I do not agree with his criticism. I did not at the time and I think I said so. But badly as we need industrialization to balance our economy in Alberta, certainly it would be unwise and foolish in the extreme for us to send out of our province the materials and power we need to industrialize. So we say let us take some of the industrial effort out there. I have already suggested that we make an effort to set up steel manufacturing right at our own coal beds, and I think it can be done. I believe it would be in the interests of this country to do so. Certainly we will need the gas and other things that come from oil production if we are to have industrialization.

Because I have not seen any evidence, in what the government has proposed to us thus far, that the government has in mind an all-out effort, because I think we agree with practically every principle laid down in the Progressive Conservative amendment but we believe it does not go far enough, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw):

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following as clause 4:
> 4. To ensure that a complete program of preparedness including compulsory training in the reserve forces for home defence be executed with the greatest possible degree of equality of sacrifice and service.

Just to make absolutely clear what we are calling for, let me take a moment or two to review. Our amendment calls for a financial organization which will provide a guarantee to all the Canadian people that there will be equality of sacrifice, as far as that can be achieved, in anything we have to do to defend our country and to assist other countries to defend themselves. Our amendment would call for an industrial organization for all-out defence production which would build Canada into the strongest possible country. Our amendment calls for a well-trained citizenry ready and equipped to defend Canada. We feel that only by following the terms of that amendment can Canada hope to make the effort that will devolve upon her in the next few months.

Mr. T. J. Kickham (Kings): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish first to join in the expressions of sympathy tendered to the families of the late J. L. Douglas and J. E. Matthews. Of Mr. Douglas I can say, as the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught) said, that he ever extended a kind, sympathetic and helpful hand. In my close personal association with him I found him always putting forth ardent efforts for the welfare of his constituency and the province he loved.

I should like to make a few comments on the railway strike of last year. We in our province were severely affected by that strike, because of our insular position. The terms of union guaranteed us unbroken transport communication. The federal government placed in the hands of the Canadian National management the operation of the ferry boats connecting Prince Edward Island with the mainland. When the railway strike was called the two ferries operating were tied up at the docks. After frantic negotiation carried on by Premier Jones, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), the spokesman for the railway union, Mr. Hall, finally condescended to permit one ferry to operate until the strikers went back to work. It seems to me that we have arrived at a critical stage in the economic life of our province when the leaders of labour unions can practically abrogate the terms of confederation which we took as a sacred trust to assure our province continuous transport communication with the mainland. This matter deserves the most serious consideration by the government. Measures must be taken now to see that a similar situation does not occur in future. It should be borne in mind that the people of Canada are the owners of the Canadian National. They vested power in the government to operate the railway and the government in turn passed on the duty of management to the officials of the railway. The goods carried by our railroads result from the industrial efforts and endeavours of the people; therefore when the employees of the people refused to carry these goods it was a case of the tail wagging the dog.

Coming from a province where the people are largely producers of agricultural products, fish and pulpwood, naturally I have some comments to offer on our industries. Potatoes, our principal farm cash crop, have been terribly disappointing to the growers for the past two seasons because of depressed market conditions in the United States. The real cause of these market conditions, I believe, is the action of the United States government in assuring minimum price support for their growers. That, of course, is their right, but it has had a depressing effect upon market values in Canada.

The continuous increase in freight rates has also had an adverse effect upon our potato industry. At times the railway receives more for a bag of potatoes than does the grower. At the present market price per bag the railway is splitting with the grower on a fifty-fifty basis. If the board of transport commissioners would grant the maritime potato industry preferential freight tariffs it would be of great assistance in eliminating distress. Assistance similar to that given the western grain growers in marketing feed grain in eastern Canada and the maritimes, which is also of great benefit to the farmers of eastern Canada, should be implemented to assist our potato industry.

In our fishing industry, last season the lobster catch was very good. We had strong markets with satisfactory prices, especially for the fresh market catch. On the other hand the prices for hake and cod were disappointingly low, only two to two and a half cents per pound for the green fish. Efforts are now being made by the departments of fisheries, both federal and provincial, to assist the industry in the operation of draggers of a lesser tonnage than now receive assistance. Other matters of concern to the fishermen in the field of packing and processing the by-products are also under consideration. In this industry there is great need for improvements which, when put into effect, will be of the greatest assistance.

I should like to support the request of the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Riley) for the decentralization of war industry whenever that can be effected. Premier Frost of Ontario has referred to the problems created by the centralization of war industries in already crowded cities and municipalities, in connection with housing, and so on. In the maritimes, where some war industries could be established, the workers already have their homes and other facilities for home life, thus eliminating the housing problems which must be faced in concentrated areas. The distribution of war industries over wider areas is also an important defence factor.

I notice a trend of thought permeating some members' speeches to the effect that Canada has an obligation to assist east Asian countries, technically and economically. While this may be without question a worthy objective during a time when the gross national production of Canada has climbed to over $17 billion in 1950, indicating a boom condition in most of Canada, no such economic condition exists in the maritimes. Caution should be exercised against too great exuberance, because these may turn out to be but temporary economic conditions. In this respect we should remind ourselves of the old adage that charity begins at home. This provokes the thought that the maritime provinces could avail themselves of surplus federal capital to great advantage in many fields. For example, it would be an advantage to the farmers in our province, the producers of poultry, eggs, dairy and beef cattle, hogs, potatoes and fish. Western feed wheat now costs $4.25 per hundredweight. If the government, through some medium such as subsidies, laid down this low-grade wheat and other grains in the maritimes at $2 per hundredweight, it would stimulate the production of these products. This would ultimately lead to lower costs for the consumers, and would enable the western farmers to market low-grade wheat and other grains here in Canada. There is also an urgent need for financial assistance to the fishing industry.

There is another group of citizens who are continually asking for assistance, namely our war veterans of the past two wars. They are requesting pensions, veterans' allowances and widows' allowances. The Department of Veterans Affairs apparently has not now the authority to satisfy many claims that appear to be justified. In this connection, I am pleased to note that amending legislation will be introduced at this session, as indicated in the speech from the throne, for the purpose of reaching veterans who are now beyond the scope of this legislation. All in all, there are numerous fields in Canada in which capital investment would be rewarding.

Many people who have practised prudence and frugality all their lives, and who contributed through direct and indirect taxes to the treasury of the dominion government, about which they have not complained, are now protesting over the arbitrary and exacting decisions of the income tax branch. I do not think they would take too kindly to having their money given to Asian countries, either as risk capital or in other ways.

In conclusion, I should like to urge upon the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) the necessity of providing winter boat service between the port of Georgetown, in Prince Edward Island, and Pictou, Nova Scotia, after the two ferry boats servicing the route between Wood island and Caribou are forced to discontinue because of ice conditions in Northumberland strait. Premier Jones has pointed out that the ferry boat Prince Edward Island is idle during the winter months, and would be suitable to continue this service. Since the distance is only thirty-eight miles the boat could make one round trip per day, thus enabling our shippers and others to carry on regular business relations.

Mr. F. D. Shaw (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, when concluding his remarks in this house on February 1, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) moved an amendment. That amendment read as follows:

That the following words be added to the address:

"We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed

(1) to give this nation leadership in the face of the present grave danger; and

(2) to bring into being forces necessary to enable Canada to defend itself and discharge its international obligations; and

(3) to take effective measures to combat inflation and the rapidly rising cost of living.

As my leader indicated a few moments ago, we found nothing to complain about so far as that amendment was concerned, except that in our opinion it did not go far enough. Accordingly, he moved an amendment to the amendment as clause 4:

To ensure that a complete program of preparedness including compulsory training in the reserve forces for home defence be executed with the greatest possible degree of equality of sacrifice and service.

Mr. Speaker, in seconding that amendment I agree wholeheartedly with all of the observations made by my leader. In essence we are asking the members of this house to endorse the Canadian Legion's program for total preparedness. With certain very notable exceptions this debate, Mr. Speaker, has been characterized by brevity, and I shall make an effort to keep my remarks particularly brief.

Before continuing, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As indicated by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) some days ago, one's first speech in this house is a rather trying experience. It is more trying when the speakers are new to the house, particularly when they have come to parliament via the by-election route. In my opinion the two hon. members acquitted themselves in a commendable fashion.

The discussion during this debate thus far has, quite naturally and quite properly, revolved around the extremely critical international situation, and the acute danger which confronts all free democracies including our own. His Excellency's address referred specifically to the deterioration in the international situation, and to the menace in the Far East which reinforces the mounting evidence that communist imperialism is determined to dominate the world by force or by fear of force. Quite apart, Mr. Speaker, from anything that was said in His Excellency's address, and quite apart from anything which has transpired since mid-June, there has certainly been ample evidence to convince anyone who is open to conviction that communist imperialism has set as its ultimate objective the complete domination of the free, democratic world of which we are a part.

As indicated yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), all one has to do is go back to the communist manifesto itself to learn to one's own satisfaction what that goal is. He indicated that in the manifesto itself it is stated for all to see that their belief and conviction is that communism—call it by any particular name you like—and capitalism, so-called, cannot live side by side in the same world. Subsequent actions and declarations on the part of communist leaders have certainly provided clear evidence that, right from the date of that communist manifesto, there has been no departure whatsoever from that avowed purpose.

I often say to myself that communism has become the greater menace because communists everywhere know exactly what they want. They are united in that purpose of complete domination and enslavement of the free world. Unfortunately there were all too many who, down through the years, could not or would not comprehend the significance of what has taken place in certain European countries. We think of Hungary, Roumania, Czechoslovakia and so on. In all parts of the free world, including our own country, there were people who gave evidence of simply closing their eyes to what had taken place. Tragically there have been altogether too many who have not seen, and have not been willing to see, what has taken place right in our own country.

It is not too long ago that some of us who kept repeatedly referring to the growth of the communist party in this country and the dangers of communism were told that we were just looking for bogeys in clothes cupboards. If the truth were known today, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the members of this house and the people of this country would be shocked at the numerical strength, if I may put it that way, of the communists within our own nation. I realize fully that it is probably not possible to advise this house and the country of the counter-espionage activities which have been under way. I realize that in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police we have an agency which, limited by its strength, has been doing excellent work in this field. But if there are in the neighbourhood of 20,000 or 22,000 card-carrying communists, and if there are 8 to 10 sympathizers for each of that number, surely we know what could happen overnight within this nation should Russia decide to move forward in the next step toward world conquest. Realizing that danger, and realizing how ill prepared we are today to meet that menace within our own country, does it not become absolutely essential that within Canada we establish among our people a type of organization by means of which our people shall be trained and equipped to meet not only what may come flying over the ocean but what can occur right within our own country? It is that consideration more than anything else which governs my thinking and which motivates me when I refer to the necessity of placing our Canadians in a position where they will know what to do and how to do it, and will be equipped to do it, if a situation of that kind develops. Let us not pass off too lightly that word "if." I have great confidence not only in the willingness but in the eagerness of our people to be prepared, to be trained and to be equipped to meet whatever may happen in our own country.

As was stated by my leader, Mr. Speaker, we regret many of the things that have taken place in the past. For example, we regret that it is only at this rather late date that we talk of the Colombo plan and of rendering technical assistance to the unfortunate peoples of certain other lands. It is most regrettable that that has not been our avowed policy down through the past many years. Is it any wonder that in certain parts of the world constantly hungry people have been swayed, have had their affections alienated and have turned their eyes away from countries like our own which were capable of doing so much to help them in their affliction? I think of our trade policies and our failure to understand that there cannot be peace with the "haves" and the "have nots" endeavouring to live side by side. I deplore certain of our policies; but being a realist I hope I am not unmindful of the great urgency that exists in connection with the necessity of building up a strong defence wall around our own country. We hope it will not be soon; in fact, we hope that it will never occur; but let us govern our actions with the thought foremost in our minds that it may be soon when a ruthless and unprincipled enemy may be hammering at that defence wall. Let us also bear firmly in mind the fact that, as I said earlier, it will not be purely a matter of the enemy being without that wall; there will be an enemy within—alert, ready and trained—to unlock the gates of that wall; and the password is "sabotage." Do not mistake the truth of that statement. As I said a moment ago, we have a big job to do quite apart from defence. We have a job to do in winning back the affections of many of those people elsewhere in the world who have turned away from us.

This amendment of ours, Mr. Speaker, called for that training and that preparedness which is so essential; but it also referred to that question of the greatest possible degree of equality of service and sacrifice. When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke with respect to the manpower question a great many thoughts went through my mind, as they always do when manpower in relation to war, or to defence, is mentioned. My mind goes back to some of the things mentioned by my leader tonight. Some may assume that in the past we have enjoyed the highest possible degree of service and of sacrifice, but surely that was not so. Thousands of our boys joined the various branches of the armed services and went out of Canada. Many of them left their wives and children. They passed the whole of the war in distant battlefields, or in the skies over the battlefields, or on the sea. They came back, and, as indicated by my leader, they were faced with the unhappy and extremely deplorable situation of the colossal debt. The thought constantly went through their minds what the acting minister of finance had said in 1939, namely, that as far as it is humanly possible we shall pay for the war as it is fought. They came back greatly disillusioned. And when I hear this talk today of a lack of housing for those veterans; when I learn today of the continuing grievances with respect to various items of legislation affecting veterans; when I realize that there were families in the country who expanded their holdings very materially during the war as a consequence of all members of the family being at home while others in many instances were obliged to see every male member of the family depart, in my opinion there was not even a remote approach to the question of equality of sacrifice.

Referring also to this question, I should like to think, Mr. Speaker, that, when the Prime Minister spoke earlier in this debate and asserted with respect to our manpower question that sentiment would not be a deciding factor, there would be no mobilization of manpower simply for the sake of mobilization, when he took exception to the doctrinaire anti-conscriptionist, when he said that sentiment, race, and creed were not valid factors, when he said that the decision would be made purely on its merits, I agreed with him; but I had to conclude that he had not gone far enough. I thought there was an air of optimism about him and about what he said that to me at least could not be justified in the presence of the obvious facts. I would have appreciated hearing the Prime Minister saying something like this when he spoke that day. This is somewhat similar to what I should like to have heard him say: While not a pessimist or an alarmist, I am a realist. Communist imperialism constitutes a deadly threat to Canada. This country is a logical military target. Moreover, it is vulnerable to attack. Then he could have gone on and said: The effective defence of this great democracy involves several essentials: first, rapid and maximum production of required defence materials; second, the establishment of strong defences where such defences are deemed necessary within our country; third, the immediate implementation of a program of compulsory military training, without exemption, in reserve forces of this country; fourth, there would be an immediate inventory, call it registration, if you like, of our human resources within this country; fifth, the adoption of a financial policy to obviate much of the need for oppressive debt and subsequent interest charges such as those which were built up during world war II; sixth, effective action to deal realistically with the cost of living problem; and seventh, and final, immediate action to prohibit the accumulation of huge profits resulting from war.

May I repeat, Mr. Speaker, had I heard the Prime Minister of Canada make an assertion of that kind I could have gone to my room and rested more comfortably than I did the night of the day on which I heard him speak.

Early in the last war, on September 12, 1939, to be exact, the acting minister of finance, Mr. Ilsley, speaking in this house, said this, as reported at page 140 of Hansard —he was referring to the method of financing:

> All this is not to say that a small and carefully regulated amount of credit expansion may not be desirable in the early stages of the war in order to assist the increase of production and employment. It must be small and carefully controlled because its effects which may not appear immediately are cumulative and otherwise might get out of hand.

In the same speech he said:

> However, as soon as the expansion of employment and production gets well under way and certainly before it approaches its limits, further expansion of the supply of money and credit must be stopped if the danger of progressive inflation is to be avoided. With an economy at full production and employment, the only result of expanding money and credit is to raise prices without increasing production.
> It is with these fundamental considerations in mind that we have decided upon our policy of war finance. Because we believe it is the part of wisdom, we shall follow as far as may be practicable a pay-as-you-go policy.

Not only initially but throughout all the years of world war II the government of Canada persisted in its policy of heavy borrowings from the chartered banks. This was a significant feature of government financing. I am told—I have not confirmed the figure myself—that they borrowed over $3 billion from the chartered banks, and spent it throughout those years of the war and continued this quite contrarily to the position laid down by the minister of finance himself during the war. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but they went out during the war loan campaigns and instead of telling the people, as they should have told them, that they were trying to meet and correct a condition of inflation resulting from too much money in circulation, they told the people that the only way you could have ships and shells and guns and tanks would be for them to subscribe their savings. But the very nature of the campaign resulted in hundreds of thousands of those people going to the chartered banks and borrowing newly created credits, thus adding millions upon millions, hundreds of millions more to an already highly inflated condition resulting from the government's persistent policy of borrowing from the chartered banks all during the war.

In 1939 the bonded debentures and treasury bills of Canada amounted to $3,385,722,462. Then ten years later, according to the Canada Year Book, it had jumped from that figure to $15,585,036,580. The actual interest-bearing debt was greater than that. What effect was had upon the interest? The annual interest charges in 1939 were $129,077,904. Now, in spite of a lowering of interest rates on borrowings by the government in the latter years of the war, the interest jumped from the figure I have given to $442,059,153.

Mr. Low: And no "sense".

Mr. Shaw: And no "sense", as our leader has said. You can take that in its broadest sense. During the war, taking into account the deaths and our wounded, generally categorized as casualties, we had about 100,000.

We blew—into kingdom come, as some say—approximately $20 billion worth of production. Substantially as a consequence of the pursuance of that inflationary policy of borrowing heavily from the chartered banks, the boys came back and, with us, face a debt of $16 billion, as compared with the former three and a half billion, with interest charges of $442 million per year as compared with $129 million at the time the war broke out.

If there were any justification whatsoever for a situation of that kind I would be reasonable enough to accept it. But surely I cannot accept that, especially when we may never be advised by the government exactly what part of this debt was held by the chartered banks, nor have we been given a break-down to show what percentage of the bonds sold went back to the chartered banks through default on the part of purchasers.

In 1939 the late Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, then prime minister, said, as reported at page 23 of Hansard for September 8:

> I come to profiteering. I believe I have already stated in this house that I know of nothing in the world more contemptible than that any man should seek to profit from the sacrifices which others are making . . . Unfortunately human nature has its weak and its bad sides, as well as its strong and good sides. Sometimes it is very difficult to cope effectively with the underworld and its methods. I care not who the individual may be, how respectable in his own eyes or in the eyes of others he may appear, or what position he may hold; if in this crisis he seeks to profiteer he belongs to the underworld and should be treated as one of those who menace all that is sacred in human relations.

When one comes to the definition of a word one finds a wide divergence of opinion. One person may think of profiteering quite differently from the way I would think of it. But when I stop to think of persons who entered the field of war production, there come to my mind some people who did not have a dollar to start with. Through a policy of cost-plus—and as a member of the war expenditures committee of that time I am one who knows there was lots of "plus"—coupled with a rapidly accelerated rate of depreciation on buildings and machinery, men who had virtually nothing when the war started came out of the war as wealthy men. I well recall the time that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking in the house on September 12, 1939, referred to the five per cent ceiling on war contracts which had been put into effect under the defence purchases act. While I was not in the house at the time, having come here a few months later, I recall clearly having read in Hansard at that time where the minister spoke specifically about the fact that there was not one tender, as long as that five per cent proviso existed in the provisions for defence purchasing.

[Mr. Shaw.]

The proviso for limited profits was eliminated in, as I say, those, in many respects, devilish cost-plus contracts. I am not saying that a government can go into a period of war production now, when there are so many component parts which have to be imported, and a certain number of uncontrollable factors, and say at the commencement of a contract, "This is to be the end price." But, in my opinion, looking back as a member of the war expenditures committee I think there was a great deal of laxness that should never be allowed to prevail again. There should be far stricter supervision where cost-plus contracts are in operation.

I for one, so long as I am here, shall insist upon that. I think, too, we had better watch this question of rapidly accelerated depreciation, because a lot of people in this country are fed up with what occurred at that time.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have spoken beyond my allotted time, but I do not think anyone else would desire particularly to start just before eleven o'clock. I am sure anyone following me would favour my going on for a few moments more.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Shaw: Dealing with that section of our subamendment which refers to compulsory training in the reserve forces, I cannot but refer to a letter which came to me from one of my constituents only yesterday. I have received the telegrams from the various branches of the Canadian Legion and have made no decision purely on the basis of those telegrams. I participated in a good many meetings of one kind or another during the past several months, and I know what people have told me. I know what I have been told on the street. This man's letter reflects in an admirable fashion the feeling prevailing in the constituency of Red Deer. This man is not the type who is likely to go off the deep end. This man is a solid citizen, a good type of man from my home community. He is a substantial farmer and under date of February 8, he wrote:

> I feel that all good men and true who have the honour and security of this great dominion of Canada at heart can do no less than endorse the Canadian Legion's "Operation Preparedness."
> Therefore, sir, I hope you will not cease to press upon the government at every opportunity the need for action upon the terms laid down therein and particularly, as a first step, the urgent need for national registration and compulsory training in the reserve forces.
> The taxpayer knows the price will be high, but not so high as the cost of unpreparedness. I know that I speak for a great number of your constituents in this matter and while not desirous in any way to emulate the system of our good neighbours to the south, I feel nothing but disgust for the soothing reassurances emanating from the government. Time is short and this is not the time for political expediency.

Mr. Speaker: I think at a previous session the house came to the conclusion that an hon. member should not read a letter unless he was prepared to table it.

Mr. Shaw: I was aware of that fact and I would not have considered reading the letter had I not been prepared to table it. It can go into the record. It comes from Innisfail and is signed by G. Hamond Gates. As I say, it is available for the record.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Send us a copy of the letter.

Mr. Shaw: I was reading a copy because with all due respect it was a little easier to read my own writing than what was in the letter. In order to quote this gentleman correctly I took a little time to rewrite his letter, but the original letter is here.

In conclusion, may I say that all of us hope and trust that there will be no third world war, but all of us know that possibly for the next quarter of a century we shall have to feel somewhat as though we are at war. Earlier in my remarks I said that I like to be branded as a realist. Should the worst come to pass and this country be attacked I want the people to know which end of the gun goes to the shoulder so that they will not blow out their own brains in the process of trying to shoot the enemy. Secondly, such training would avoid panic, which is one of the things that could be really bad. It would develop confidence in our people. Speaking personally, I think it would be good for one's physique—not that I have much of a physique even though I spent more than a year in that type of training.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, thanks to the graciousness of the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer), I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO REPORT IN MONTREAL "DAILY STAR" OF FEBRUARY 12

Mr. Robert Fair (Battle River): Mr Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has been brought to my attention that on page 10 of the Montreal Daily Star of February 12, someone has taken my name in vain. Under the heading "Extract from Hansard", it reads:

> Remarks of Robert Fair, Social Credit member for Battle River, in the throne speech debate:

Then the article continues and quotes someone else's remarks. I am not questioning the accuracy of the remarks, but they do not belong to me so I want to have that corrected.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 14, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS

MR. MCIVOR—EXPRESSION OF BEST WISHES

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I venture, as a matter of personal privilege, and on behalf of all members of the house, wherever they sit, to present a valentine of good wishes to the senior member, in years, of this house, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), who is today celebrating his seventy-eighth birthday. From his appearance now, and that to which we are accustomed in this house, I believe we can with confidence wish him also many happy returns. Some of us would even say that our wish is that he may yet celebrate several of those happy returns with us in this place.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I join the Prime Minister in extending best wishes to the member for Fort William. No matter whether we all agree entirely with everything he says, we always recognize the deep sincerity and the warm-hearted affection for his own people that prompts the things he says in this house. May I add, in wishing him many further happy years, that he is also an encouragement to some of the rest of us by the evidence he gives that life in this parliament may not be too destructive after all.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, to return to the language of the farm, I am just flabbergasted. I deeply appreciate this courtesy. I do not know how long I am going to live, but I am going to live as long as I can.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR EARLY DISTRIBUTION OF PAYMENTS AT END OF POOL PERIOD, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, this bill will have the effect of amending the present act in two particulars. Under the act as it stands, it is necessary to sell every last bushel of wheat or oats or barley in a pool before the pool can be liquidated and the participation payments made to those who have delivered grain to the pool. This amendment will make it possible for the pool to sell the remnants of grain to the succeeding pool, thus making it possible to wind up pools more quickly than can be done under the act as it is today.

The bill also amends the present act in another particular. Today interim payments must be uniform for all the grain in the pool, regardless of grade. The amendment will make it possible to vary the interim payments for different grades. Owing to a problem that arises from time to time, occasionally it would be in the interest of the pool not to make the same interim payments on all grades of grain.

Mr. Fair: May I ask the minister whether that applies to coarse grains as well?

Mr. Howe: Yes, sir.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Later:]

QUESTION AS TO INCLUSION OF RYE AND FLAX

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When the wheat board act is under revision, will the inclusion of rye and flax be considered?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It has not been the intention to include rye and flax in the act. The present marketing arrangement for these grains seems to be operating in a satisfactory way.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FISHERIES

PACIFIC COAST—PROTECTION AGAINST ENCROACHMENT BY JAPANESE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. T. Applewhaite (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, but in his absence I will address it to his parliamentary assistant. Is any action being taken by the Canadian authorities, similar to that reported from the United States, to assure that, when the Japanese peace treaty is being drawn up, adequate protection will be afforded our Pacific coast fisheries against encroachment by Japanese fishermen?

Mr. J. Watson MacNaught (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Fisheries): I want to assure the hon. member for Skeena that I will draw his question to the attention of my minister and that an answer will be made in due course.

POSTAL SERVICE

MAIL DELIVERIES IN URBAN RESIDENTIAL DISTRICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Why are deliveries of mail to residential districts in the cities to be cut from two deliveries to one delivery per day?

An hon. Member: Economy.

Mr. Fraser: In other words, why are citizens to be given second-class service for first-class mail? It is not a question of economy in this case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to ask a further question. Why are postmen who are transferred from these postal routes to clerical jobs to lose their positions and their seniority, while their walks or mail routes are to be taken over on Saturdays by schoolboys at seventy-eight cents an hour?

Hon. Edouard Rinfret (Postmaster General): I think it would be well for the hon. member to wait until the announcements are made before he makes any predictions about what is going to happen.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, a directive with regard to this matter has gone out from the Post Office Department to all post offices across Canada.

Mr. Graydon: May I ask a supplementary question of the Postmaster General, arising out of his answer to the hon. member for Peterborough West? Have there been any changes in urban postal deliveries in recent weeks?

Mr. Rinfret: Some are contemplated in view of the economies that we have to make; yes.

[Mr. Applewhaite.]

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO STUDY ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister indicate to the house when he expects to receive the report of the committee now investigating operations under the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): I would think that the target date, about March 1, which was planned, would still remain the target date. We shall shortly know whether it is possible for us to achieve that goal in actual fact.

Mr. Fleming: Will the report be brought to the attention of the house when it is received?

Mr. Garson: Yes.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Low.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They spoke ably, and I hope that they will be heard often in this house. This is not an academic speech, and I cannot say all the good that I think of them. We disagree at times, but on the whole we manage to get along fairly well together. The proof of that statement may be found in the farewell speech of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith). He is one of the most brilliant members of parliament that I have met. I am sure that both Mr. and Mrs. Smith will be so greatly missed, that their farewell will be merely "au revoir" and that we shall see them again, Mr. Smith in the House of Commons and Mrs. Smith in Ottawa.

The subamendment proposed last night reads as follows:

To ensure that a complete program of preparedness including compulsory training in the reserve forces for home defence be executed with the greatest possible degree of equality of sacrifice and service.

I am strongly opposed to the kind of one-sided conscription for military service only which was in force during the last war. It was back-door conscription from November 1940 to November 1944, but open-door conscription thereafter did not win the war and served nobody other than racketeers and greedy profiteers. During both wars it was only a political football. I am sick and tired of hearing the repetition of the speeches made by the Marses and Thors of both wars. I may tell the Legion right now that if they were looking after their own disabled members they would serve their members much better than by telling members of parliament what to do. I have always considered the manpower of my country to be its most valuable asset, and I will do my utmost to defend and to protect my fellow citizens in case of emergency. I appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has spoken sensibly and honestly about this vital issue. That is why he enjoys the confidence and respect of all. He deserves it. I regret nothing that I have said or done in the past to combat bureaucratic anarchy and I hope not to have the same trouble as I had in the past in exposing political insanity to internal ridicule against a background of rampant prejudice.

I love my country. I am satisfied to be a member of the Liberal party and I do not want this fine association of men and women of good will to fall into the errors of the last war. I have a right to speak and I am going to do so. I have taken some notes in my own hand in order to make my speech shorter, because the time allowed to me today is not long. I am familiar enough with the contemporary history of Canada to tell the true story of conscription. I have been forty-three years in political life. When I was eighteen I made my first political speech at the Laurier meeting at Murray Bay in 1908. Many of my hon. colleagues were not yet born. I was elected for the first time at a by-election on December 1, 1924, as a straight Liberal against the convention nominee who was defeated by 3,500 votes. A week later Mr. Mackenzie King invited me to luncheon at Laurier House with Mr. Lapointe and both introduced me to Mr. Speaker. With the exception of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) I am the senior member of this house; and with due deference I may consider you, sir, and all my other hon. colleagues as newcomers, but I do not. I have been honest with my electors and I thank them for my political survival throughout these many years.

At the outset of world war II two proclamations were issued. The first was a declaration of emergency signed by the then attorney general of Canada. The second came a few days later. It was a declaration of war signed by Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie King who explained to us in caucus that he wanted to sign it with his full name because his grandfather, who had been banished as a rebel during the last century, would have stood by His Majesty the King in 1939. From August 1939 to the capitulation of France the war was called a phony one. The War Measures Act of 1914 had not yet been repealed. It was still in force. But in June 1940 the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, was hastily passed and the Department of National War Services was established. In the meantime, there was the general election of 1940, which was easily won by the Liberal party. I wrote to Mr. Lapointe. I said:

> During the last election I said in each parish that under your government anyone would be free to enlist if he chose, but that no one would be forced to do so, whereas with Mr. Manion in power we would inevitably have compulsory military service.

This letter may be found in Hansard of June 18, 1940, at page 871. Nevertheless, due to the affolement caused by the fall of France, both human and material resources were mobilized for the defence of Canada. My party had been so bitter against Tory conscription that another word had to be used for the same meaning and the same purpose, and later on followed to the letter the precedents established by the Union government. There was a registration of all men of military age, and because the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Houde), who was then mayor of Montreal, objected to it, he was sent to a concentration camp.

Believe it or not, Mr. Speaker, to prevent the imposition of conscription I offered to raise in my constituency a regiment in two weeks for the defence of Canada. I added that if each member did likewise we would have in a very short time an army of 245,000 for the defence of Canada. Mr. King rejected it. He repeated in the house what I had said in the caucus room. Here is what he said, according to Hansard of June 19, 1940, at page 922:

> An hon. member on this side of the house made the statement publicly this morning that he felt he could go into his constituency and, by making it known to his constituents that this measure had to do with the protection of Canada and our own Canadian soil, bring forward in a very short time men from the forests, from the fields and from the factories, all prepared immediately to join the Canadian forces to resist any possible invasion, and that he would be prepared to guarantee that that could be done in constituency after constituency throughout the country, once it was understood that there was the necessity of defending our own Canadian shores. I pointed out to him that in doing that he might be making the greatest mistake possible with respect to the national interest; that, to win this war, we might wish to keep at work in the forests the men who are now working in the forests, to provide the timber which will be required for docks and wharves and required immediately; that the men who are working in the factories may be a thousand times more useful to the government of this country in giving their skilled labour to the manufacture of aircraft, munitions, or other weapons of war than they could possibly be in lining up and presenting themselves for military service; equally that on the farms, if we are to perform what will be expected of us, we shall need all the production that can be effectively and rapidly carried out on the farms of our country.

The day after, I asked him the following question—I quote from Hansard at page 969:

I want to make myself as clear as possible. I am speaking only of mobilization for home defence, and I want to know if a man not in the class that may be called for military service in connection with home defence may enlist just the same, without being obliged to agree to overseas service.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The answer is yes.

It should have been no. My position was made clear in a letter that I wrote to Mr. Lapointe and which is on Hansard of June 18, 1940. I quote from page 872:

If we say to the French Canadians that henceforth recruiting will be solely for the defence of Canada, in Canada, and if we remove all obstacles to voluntary enlistment, you will be surprised to see the number of French Canadians ready to enlist, provided that they are well equipped and well trained and that they be given competent commanding officers.

I have summarized the conversations I have had with a large number of good Canadians. Since then, I have had occasion to converse with English-speaking members who told me quite openly that war was too serious a matter to be considered from the point of view of sentiment, and that our policy should be guided by reason. They added that in their counties there is an awakening of Canadian sentiment for the organization on a solid basis of the defence of Canada against any aggressor. By a strange revulsion of feeling, it is on the solid basis of Canadianism that national unity will be established.

Yours very truly,

Jean Francois Pouliot

Mr. Gauthier: Very well.

The parliamentary leader of the opposition was Mr. R. B. Hanson, a former colleague of Bennett. He was a jingo and a megaphone of Arthur Meighen. He was insisting upon outright conscription, and the prime minister of the time did all he could to appease him.

The registration being completed, it was considered necessary to make the best use of it, and the iniquitous national war services regulations, 1940, were passed. They had been prepared in the heat of the summer, and in the absence of Mr. Lapointe, by a western judge and an industrious Quebec lawyer, who had to report to another Quebec cabinet minister who was holding five portfolios, exactly like Mussolini. These regulations were approved by P.C. 4185 on August 27, 1940. Here is the part of the regulations that I particularly objected to:

Seasonal employees.

Listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

14. (1) Each divisional registrar shall deliver to the board in his administrative division copies of all registration cards in his possession upon which it is stated that the men registered are engaged in farming, fishing, lumbering, trapping or other seasonal occupation.

Agriculture and lumbering and even transportation were considered as seasonal occupations.

(2) In the case of men engaged in farming, fishing, lumbering, trapping or other seasonal occupation, the board may make advancement orders or postponement orders as seems best in the public interest.

Under these regulations, special exemptions were provided for conscientious objectors, Mennonites and Doukhobors. One had to use a religious motive to be exempted, and no consideration was given to the essential and vital importance of farming and other essential war industries. I wrote in my local weekly some advice for the draftees, and I asked my secretary to ask the deputy minister of national war services what he thought of it. She saw her factotum. He was a major in the general's office, and he told her that my advice was all right except that there was no conscription. I should have used the right word "mobilization"—just sheer hypocrisy. In September of 1940 a five-man council composed of the deputy minister of agriculture and of representatives of the deputy minister of fisheries, mines and resources and transport, and also the wealthiest lumberman of British Columbia was appointed to explain the seasonal description of the essential war industries. Their report was sent by the then deputy minister of labour to the deputy minister of national war services on September 4, 1940, a week after the regulations were passed.

That manpower council made an effort of imagination to report that each of the essential war industries was primary only during the peak of employment, and was of secondary importance during the rest of the year. I shall mention two, namely agriculture and lumbering. I shall send to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) the French copy of the instructions that were sent to the registrars of the various boards. He may check the résumé I have made of that piece of nonsense. Those fine brains, those bureaucrats for the time, established a distinction between the primary and secondary periods of essential industry.

For instance, in the three maritime provinces agriculture was considered a primary industry. It was so declared in Prince Edward Island from May to November, a period of seven months; in Nova Scotia there was mixed farming during July and August, a period of two months. In New Brunswick it ran from May 1 to June 15, or a month and a half, and from July 1 to October 15, three and a half months, making a total of five months in all, with a lull of two weeks.

Butter and cheese production was considered a secondary industry. In Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia it ran from June to September, a period of four months, an in New Brunswick from June to August, a period of three months.

The canning of fruits and vegetables took place in Prince Edward Island in December and January, a period of two months—and I have never heard of fruit and vegetables being canned in those winter months. In Nova Scotia it ran from September to December, a period of four months. In New Brunswick there was no canning of fruits and vegetables, but they were making biscuits, and there was catering and cocoa. For a period of two months, namely September and October, there was salting, as there was also for a further two months in October and November.

Turning to the miscellaneous items, we find fecula and glucose for the two months of October and November. In Nova Scotia, pop and mineral water for the two months of July and August. I do not know if any farmer makes pop. Then, in New Brunswick we find chemical products and fertilizers for the one month of May. It seems that they make fertilizers in one month. I thought they were getting it all the year round.

Turning to Ontario and Quebec, we find that agriculture was considered a primary industry. In Ontario it was so considered, as a rule, for the two months of July and August, but "this year"—that is, 1940, it ran from July 1 to September 15, or a period of two and a half months, during which time agriculture was considered essential and a primary industry. However, there were exceptions. In district A—and no one knows what that is—the period ran for four and a half months, from June 15 to October 31.

Then, in the south portion of Quebec—

Mr. Harris (Danforth): On a point of order, surely the hon. member is not reading his speech, is he?

Mr. Pouliot: I will tell the hon. member, one of the two members who are senior to me, that I do it so as to be just as brief as possible. If I had not written these things, and made reference to them in this way, I would be speaking for days and days about conscription—and would surprise him very much. I want to be accurate. I have sent a copy of the report to the minister so that he may check to see just how absurd it was. Naturally I do my best to satisfy the legitimate curiosity of the house.

The report shows that agriculture was considered a primary industry in the south portion of Quebec for a period of four months, from May to August; in the northern part, where it is colder, it ran from June to September—one month later in each case.

Turning to a secondary industry, butter and cheese production was so considered in Ontario for the four months from June to September, and in Quebec for the six months from May to October. Other dairy products in Ontario and Quebec were recorded for the three months from June to August. The information concerning condensed milk gives, for Ontario, the three months from June to August. The canning of fruits and vegetables is given as the four months from July to October in Ontario and the three months from July to September in Quebec. For tobacco curing and packing, it runs for the three months from December to February in Ontario, and the three months from January to March in Quebec; for pop and mineral water, the two months of July and August in Ontario, and the three months from June to August in Quebec.

Whoever heard of that?

Then, miscellaneous, leather articles and mitts, Quebec only, the four months from July to October; sugar refining, Ontario only, October and November; and wine, Ontario only, for the month of October.

I now come to the prairie provinces—and this will interest the mover and seconder of the subamendment respecting conscription.

Agriculture is given as a primary industry in Manitoba, the northern part, from August 15 to September 12, or a period of less than one month. In the southern portion it is given as only the month of August. In the southern part of Saskatchewan it runs for the one month of August, and in the northern portion of that province, the one month of September. The farther one goes to the north, the later, naturally, is the season.

The season in Alberta—here it is—is given as the two months of April and May, following which there is a lull for the two months of June and July, followed by the inclusion of the two months of September and October, making a total of four months in all. There is nothing to do between May and September. I wonder what my hon. friends think of that?

This was drawn up and sent to the registrar so that he could draft the people accordingly, and was done for the purpose of putting in the minds of those people that agriculture was not a necessity and was not an essential industry. How could they defend that?

Mr. Low: It is obviously ridiculous, is it not?

Mr. Pouliot: But we are about to do the same thing—and that is what I do not want. I want them to listen to me, and they will learn a lot.

Mr. Wylie: You might think so, but we don't.

Mr. Low: Which government was in power in Quebec?

Mr. Pouliot: It was the Liberal party and a Liberal government. But all my friends from the west were strong for conscription right at the very start, when we were fighting the cause of labour and the farmers. I am not attacking anyone; I am just telling the truth. Who of that party ever supported me when I was fighting the cause of the farmers? No one did.

Mr. Wylie: People from the west remember; don't be silly about it.

Mr. Pouliot: It may hurt my hon. friend.

Mr. Wylie: It doesn't hurt.

Mr. Pouliot: If it doesn't hurt, shut up.

Then, as a secondary industry, butter and cheese, for the province of Manitoba—

Mr. Wylie: It does hurt you.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: It is obvious there have been too many interruptions.

Mr. Pouliot: The report shows that, in connection with secondary industry, concerning dairy products other than butter and cheese, only the months of June to August are set out for Alberta. For butter and cheese, the report shows for Manitoba, May to September; Saskatchewan, June to September; and Alberta, May to October. For the canning of fruits and vegetables—and this is a secondary industry, of course—it shows: Manitoba, July and August; Alberta, July and August and no record for Saskatchewan. For pop and mineral waters, it is from June to August in Manitoba, the month of July in Saskatchewan and from June to August in Alberta.

Turning to primary industry in British Columbia we find a record for April and May, with a lull of two months, followed by September and October.

Let us consider the forest industry. I am sorry I cannot mention what is said about secondary industry, but saw mills, the manufacture of wooden boxes and cooperage were considered to be secondary. In New Brunswick the forest industry was a primary industry from November to May, seven months.

Mr. Hatfield: All the year round.

Mr. Pouliot: I know that. I am getting my information from the remarks of hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: I must remind hon. members that their remarks must be directed to Mr. Speaker. Hon. members should not converse across the floor of the chamber.

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker, when I get approval from any one of my colleagues I cannot do otherwise than beam with joy.

Mr. Knowles: Beam at the Speaker.

Mr. Pouliot: Ontario and Quebec, forest industry: Ontario, December to March, four months; Quebec, November to March, five months. Saw mills: Ontario, May to September and Quebec, May to July; Ontario five months, and Quebec three months. Pulpwood and paper: Quebec, July to October, four months. Imagine what would happen if the pulpwood mills were working for only four months. Wooden boxes: Quebec, May to September, five months. Roofing paper and board: Quebec, May to October, six months. Shipbuilding: Ontario, May to July, three months. Iceboxes: Ontario, April to June.

Here are details of the forest industry in the prairie provinces. Primary industry: Manitoba, December to April; Saskatchewan, the same thing; Alberta, the same thing. Secondary industry—saw mills: Manitoba, June and July. No saw mills in Saskatchewan and Alberta apparently. Primary industry in British Columbia—

An hon. Member: You are wrong there.

Mr. Pouliot: I am simply stating what has been decided upon by these bureaucrats. A lot of my hon. friends support me and agree with me when I say it is wrong. Primary industry in British Columbia, April to June and September to December. There is a lull in July and August. Secondary industry—shipbuilding: March to July. That is all.

The report of that irresponsible and silly brain trust was mimeographed and forwarded by the deputy minister of war services to the registrars and members of the mobilization boards, as a directive to be used by them, to be used as their vade mecum. As a cure for unemployment everyone of military age was called for military training. No industry was recognized as being essential for the prosecution of the war. It was considered to be the duty of all young men to be in the army. All those who did not sign for overseas service were disdainfully branded as zombies. A great many were taken away from the farms. A farmer who did not enlist was not considered to be a good citizen. The first chairman of the Quebec board was such a fanatic and lunatic that I succeeded in having him replaced. His practice was to decide that farm hands who were working part-time in the forest were not real farmers and were not engaged in an essential industry.

The thirty days training period was decided by P.C. 4904 of September 17, 1940. It was extended to four months, or for such other period as the Minister of National Defence may from time to time prescribe, by order in council of March 18, 1941. The training was extended for the duration of the war by a stroke of the pen of the Minister of National Defence. Army Order No. 132 of July 2, 1941, was printed but was not published in the Canada Gazette. It was not made public until I asked for it four and a half months later in this house in the middle of November, and I refer hon. members to page 4359 of Hansard of November 13, 1941. Each one of the joint defence ministers had the same responsibility for it. I used the name of Mr. Lapointe and did my best to unfasten all the wrong that had been screwed in by the three defence ministers and their wooden-headed brass hats. I pointed out to them that the industries that I have mentioned were essential but they were too hard-hearted to strike out the word "seasonal." I succeeded in getting an amendment through on June 6, 1941, nearly a year after it was decided that they were seasonal and essential. That was a victory.

Now we come to the plebiscite, which read:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

The affirmative vote was 64.2 per cent, but the vote in Quebec was 72.5 against. Senator Dandurand told me that the question was drafted to be as obscure as possible so that nobody would understand what he was voting for. They wanted to save the face of the Liberal party with the people of Canada. I pay a tribute to my colleagues in the Liberal party who decided to vote against the government on the issue of conscription. Some hon. gentlemen joined the Bloc Populaire, others went with the Independent group, but two hon. members and myself went to the last row of seats in the chamber to indicate that we were still remaining Liberal and were keeping alive the traditions of the party. We had nothing to do with the other groups. It was pretty hard to do that. I notified Mr. King before I did it and he seemed surprised. However, it was my duty to do it.

If members of the Liberal party have been re-elected they must thank the members who were against conscription during the last war. If we had not taken that stand the Liberal party would have been finished and the Tories would have come in after changing their policy to catch the vote of the people.

An hon. Member: Too bad they were not.

Mr. Pouliot: I was here for twenty-six years before the hon. member was born and I shall be here long after he has been defeated by the people at the polls. Then there was the registration of women. We had to follow everything that England was doing. In England they had a registration of women and in this country all the women had to be WAACS. The registration of women in the age group 20 to 24 years inclusive took place from September 14 to September 19, 1942, for the purpose of establishing an inventory of manpower. If hon. members would like to have more details I refer them to page 361 of Hansard of March 28, 1946.

At the time I wanted to defeat Laflèche who was running in Montreal. Everything was organized and some day I will tell the story to the house.

Mr. Drew: Tell us today.

Mr. Pouliot: I have not the time. You would not let me proceed. You would be calling "Forty minutes! time!" However, I promise the hon. member that I will tell him the story some day. Mr. Cardin was ready to support us if there was unanimity, but there was no unanimity because one of the members wanted to be a parliamentary assistant. Another hon. member, who now holds a high office outside of this house, told me he had ambitions similar to those of Stalin. He said, "Don't you think I would be a good secretary of a soviet?" We were not a soviet and we did not need a secretary so he was not appointed. I went to support one of the Independent candidates in Charlevoix-Saguenay.

An hon. Member: That was wrong.

Mr. Pouliot: What is the matter? I went there to prevent the conscription of women. There was no government nominee. There were four or five independents. I went there and explained the matter to the people. The previous ministerial majority of 9,000 was changed to a majority of 3,400 for the man whom I was supporting. The day after the election a friend of mine, an old pillar of the Liberal party, was in Murray Bay. He said: I voted for the Independent candidate supported by Pouliot. It was a good thing that he came. No other member of parliament came to the county during that election. We were waiting for word about what to do. Thanks to Pouliot we had that word, we elected our man so that there would be no conscription of women, and there was none.

I could say many other things, but you may ask me what is my conclusion. My conclusion is that I was amazed when I heard about the appointment of a manpower council consisting of labour leaders, beautiful women, businessmen, members of the civil service and Rhys Sale. If members have time to look at Votes and Proceedings for yesterday they will see that I have given notice of two questions I intend to ask about these people. The first question is:

Referring to the members of the newly established national advisory council on manpower,

1. What is the civilian background and the overseas military record and experience of each one?
2. What was the occupation of each one during world war II?
3. What was their occupation and their residence at the time of their appointment to the said council?
4. Is that membership a full-time job?
5. Where and when do the meetings of the said council take place?
6. What remuneration is paid to the members of the said council?

Here is the second question.

1. Are any of the members of the national advisory council on manpower connected with any firm or company which was awarded government contracts directly or through subsidiary companies?
2. If so, who are they?

Having said that, I come to what Rhys Sale has said before certain social service clubs in an effort to strike the government below the belt. In Time magazine for January 29 he said in part:

We have the wherewithal for a defence effort ten times greater than the puny program now in effect.

How many contracts does the Ford Motor Company and its subsidiaries have? I find it shameful that some men of importance in the business world should try to defend conscription, the killing of people, not the defence of the country, for the benefit of their companies. If we have to have conscription we must have the conscription of everything. We must have conscription of wealth. The wealthy should pay for the armament program to the greatest extent that it is possible to get money from them. I abhor these people who think of war only in terms of the prospects of making money.

My conclusion is twofold. I sincerely suggest to the government the immediate abolition of the manpower council none of whose members are responsible to the people. Second, I recommend the appointment of a parliamentary committee—it is more important than Canada day—of responsible members of the House of Commons to study the Canadian manpower problem in its entirety with due consideration of the usefulness of all Canadian citizens in each of the essential war industries. The senators are too old to serve on such a committee. I have also come to one conclusion with respect to the labour leaders who are members of the advisory council on manpower. They may be nice fellows. I know one or two of them, but let me tell you what happened during the last war when I addressed a question to the then minister of labour who was in charge of mobilization after the national war services department was abolished. Some members who were here then must remember that I asked him what the duty was of each Canadian citizen and that he answered that the duty of each Canadian citizen was to come to the colours and enlist in the army. I said: No sir, you are mistaken. What would the soldier do without the assistance of the farmer, the railwayman, the miner, those who make arms and munitions, those who are engaged in the leather industry, the transport industry, and all other industries? It is a most difficult problem.

Then he tabled letters from Mr. Coleman and Mr. Vaughan, respectively presidents of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R., that were exactly to the same effect as the speeches I had made and the articles I had written. Some time later one high leader of labour organizations came to Riviere du Loup to distribute medals to veteran employees. I said to him: "Sir, you did not thank me for what I have done. I did not expect your thanks but you could have told me that you appreciated the fact that in parliament I have done your job, the job that you have always been reluctant to do." He said to me: "You know, I had an uncle who was a judge of the supreme court of the United States, and I left my family to join the labour ranks." I said: "That is all right but the reason that you do not approve of the fact that I have defended your own men, those who pay to be members of your union, is not because I do not wear overalls; it is because I am not a member of your own union, and you should be ashamed of yourself." The conversation ended there.

Is there anyone in Canada who knows the needs of the Canadian people better than members of parliament? I disagree with other members at times. I tell them what I think and they tell me what they think. Then we meet, shake hands and everything is ironed out. Is there anyone in Canada who has the knowledge and wisdom of all members of parliament as a body so far as the discussion of such a vital issue as manpower is concerned? I bring the matter to the attention of the government. I have been very careful in my remarks. I have named very few people but I will name many if the thing continues in the future as it has been going on in the past. It is time to stop making a political football of conscription. We are all ready to defend Canada. We are all ready to support the army but that does not mean that we have to listen to the predictions of the Legion.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in common with the previous speaker I wish to discuss this question of manpower. I cannot promise the house as interesting or as amusing a forty minutes as those to which they have just been treated, because I have not the parliamentary experience nor the natural wit of the member who has just resumed his seat. It will be recalled that on February 1 the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) moved an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne which, in part, contains these words:

> We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed
> (1) to give this nation leadership in the face of the present grave danger; and
> (2) to bring into being forces necessary to enable Canada to defend itself and discharge its international obligations;

The remaining words of the amendment do not refer directly to this question of manpower. I should like to remind hon. members that that amendment was introduced after the leader of the opposition had asked the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) if he would adjourn this debate in order that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), might make statements. That request was denied. This amendment, therefore, was introduced before the government program had been clearly defined in detail, as it was subsequently, by the Minister of National Defence. I do not know that there would have been any change in the wording of that amendment, even though we had heard the speech delivered by the Minister of National Defence.

I feel, and I think evidence has been produced during this debate to indicate, that there has been a lack of leadership on the part of the government in being able to sell to the people of Canada the gravity of the situation today. Members from various parts of the country have pointed out that the units of the reserve army are in a deplorable condition, in so far as the number of recruits for those units is concerned. There have been press accounts from one side of Canada to the other showing quite clearly that practically all units of the reserve army are under strength. The reserve army is recruited voluntarily, mainly from amongst the young men of this country. I have faith in young Canada, and I have been associated with young Canada for a good many years. I cannot help believing that had this issue been put up fairly and clearly to young Canada, there would have been a better response to the appeals which have been made for recruits for the reserve army, the reserve division of the navy, and the auxiliary air force.

Turning to the second part of the amendment, namely our regret that the government had failed to bring into being forces which were ready to meet an emergency, one cannot help but recall the feverish activity which was necessary last fall in order to raise the special force which was then to go to Korea or elsewhere. When the Minister of National Defence spoke, he outlined a program which is designed to bring into being large forces in all services. That very speech, that very program, surely is evidence to show that there is justification for our regret that the government has failed in the past to bring in forces which would be adequate to meet the situation. I frankly admit that the situation has deteriorated rapidly, but there is somewhat of the appearance of a deathbed repentance on the part of the government now when, at the eleventh hour, it seeks to raise far more substantial forces to be ready and in being to meet the obligations that Canada has accepted, and to be prepared for the defence of our own country.

You will recall the program which has been outlined: 100 vessels or thereabouts for the Royal Canadian Navy; 40 squadrons for the Royal Canadian Air Force; and somewhere about a division for the army. According to the figures given by the minister the active component of these three services would total approximately 115,000 men. It must be recalled that for a number of years the members on this side of the house have been urging the government to take a more realistic view of the situation, and not to adhere too slavishly to worn-out methods of raising forces, to realize that in modern warfare there may not be the time to equip, train and recruit forces after the outbreak of war, while some other country has its regular force holding back the enemy.

I recall how, during the special session of last fall, the leader of this party stressed the necessity of having forces in being. Every hon. member in this house was impressed by the statements which were made last week by the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power), who spoke from the depth of his vast experience as the minister of national defence for air during the last war. He stressed the importance of the air arm, not only for the defence of Canada but for Canada's obligations wherever they might be. I cannot help reminding the house that it was not very long ago that I said very much the same thing. I said that the air arm was the essential arm for the defence of Canada. With its speed and range it is the only service that can eliminate distance, and Canada is a country of vast distances. I even went so far as to suggest that for every dollar spent on one of the other services, three dollars should be spent on the air services. I was laughed at. Before the end of these three years I think you will admit that we are coming much closer to that mark than I ever thought this government would. It is not surprising to see that the R.C.A.F. is to be increased by two and a half times its present strength. The government has laid down this program. I believe that the remarks contained in the amendment are justified and that one's criticism of the program would be in the main: You are starting too late. In other respects that program places emphasis on the air arm; it emphasizes the importance of having forces in being. The government has made clear how it intends to raise the men to man those formations and to man the equipment. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) was quite clear when, speaking in the house on February 1 as reported at page 28 of Hansard, he said:

> So far there has been brought to my attention nothing that would indicate that the institution of national selective service at this time would be beneficial. On the contrary, the information we have obtained is that it would hamper what is being done at this moment. Now, that does not mean that the situation cannot change, and it does not mean that if and when it does change there will not be changes in the manner in which our resources will be contributed to this pool of international strength.

That surely means that at the present time the government has decided to raise those forces by voluntary enlistment but that if the international situation deteriorates, or if this attempt to raise the forces by voluntary enlistment fails, then the government will be prepared to consider other means. Nothing that I can say in this house or out in the country, nothing that any member who is a supporter of the government can say, nor anything that any other member of this house can say, can change that point of view of the government. I for one believe that these men are needed. If I made statements in this house and if I went about the country and made statements, now that the government has announced how it intends to raise the men this country needs, I believe I could discourage young men from volunteering to go into the active forces and that I could do something towards sabotaging this country's efforts. But I have never been a saboteur or a traitor and I will do nothing of the sort.

That being the case, I think it is up to all hon. members of this house to try to further this country's effort to raise men by the only means that is possible for this country at the present time, because of the government's decision, namely by voluntary enlistment. In my humble capacity I shall do what I can in that respect to help the services obtain the men that I am convinced they now need. I believe that the situation is grave and I believe it is imperative that at the earliest possible opportunity we have in the forces adequate men to meet, within the next few months, a situation that might arise.

A subamendment has been moved to the amendment that was introduced by the leader of this party. That subamendment would add these words:

> That the amendment be amended by adding thereto the following as clause 4:
> 4. To ensure that a complete program of preparedness including compulsory training in the reserve forces for home defence be executed with the greatest possible degree of equality of sacrifice and service.

I want to stress once more the point that conscription for the active army is not a matter which is under consideration at this time. This is suggesting a form of compulsory training in the reserve forces. I must review the value of that suggestion in the light of the program which has now been announced by the government. This subamendment was introduced after the government's program had been made known. I must therefore ask myself this question: Will having universal compulsory military training for the reserve army, navy and air force help or hinder the government's program to raise 115,000 men for the forces in being? I cannot help but come to the conclusion that if the emphasis is to be placed on getting recruits by compulsory means into the reserve forces, then there will have to be a reduction in the effort which is being made to raise and maintain the forces in being. One does not need to go into great detail. It is obvious that if you bring into the reserve forces hundreds of thousands of young men—it would not be hundreds or thousands; it would be hundreds of thousands if you were going to introduce compulsory universal service in the reserve army—you could not begin to train those men without drawing heavily upon the forces which are now the active components of the various services. This would mean retarding the preparations of those active components to get ready for a task that they may have to do in a short time. One would have to pull out instructors from the special Korean brigade and from the special airborne brigade, to deal only with the army. You would have to take instructors from the R.C.A.F., and at the present time the active components of the R.C.A.F. have not sufficient men to carry out the numerous duties that they have to do. It would be detrimental in any way to interfere with their program of preparation where they have to expand themselves two and a half times the size they are now in order that they may be ready within the next three years to man the great part of the forty squadrons of the R.C.A.F.

Then comes the question of equipment. I do not believe that the program of replacement of uniforms and boots, for instance, and clothing generally, that has been carried out over the past three or four years has enabled the government to make any sizeable stockpiles of that equipment. I have no doubt that the various services have a reasonable reserve of that equipment, reasonable enough to meet the expansion that they foresee now, but I very much doubt—I have no information on the matter—whether there are reserves which would be able to take care of hundreds of thousands of young Canadians who are called in to the reserve army.

Then, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), the question of accommodation in itself would make it almost impossible at the present time to train adequately large numbers in the reserve forces. It would therefore be necessary to divert from other defence projects essential building materials in order to provide the accommodation, the drill halls, and so forth for these men who will be called up. Therefore I am forced to the conclusion that, if we adopt this subamendment, instead of helping the country to procure the men that I believe are so essential to have in the active components it would retard the effort that is now being made.

It has been mentioned during the course of the debate that the suggestion was based upon the recommendations of the Canadian Legion. I am a member of the Canadian Legion, and have been from the day that it was formed. I have spoken to branches of the Canadian Legion in my constituency. I have congratulated them upon focusing public attention upon the urgent needs for improving our defence forces. I think it is a splendid effort that the Legion has made by sending from one coast to another notices of its "Operation preparedness" and of holding meetings of its members, communicating with members of parliament, and in some instances of holding public meetings in order to focus attention upon the needs of this country to increase the state of defence.

Remember also that this Legion brief, this "Operation preparedness", was drawn up and issued and the majority of these meetings were held before the government had announced its program for defence. I do not know what the Legion would say now; I have had no communication with them; but I think the Legion would expect that the government is going to implement many of its recommendations.

The first of these recommendations is that there should be what the Legion describes as national registration. It says:

> Nothing can be done to organize efficiently the resources and manpower of this country until a complete national registration has been carried out and proper assessment made of the information gained.
> In view of the time necessary to conduct such a large-scale project and to interpret the results, it is vitally necessary that this be started immediately.

Everybody will agree with that. I know I can subscribe to that, and I have said that I subscribe to it in every detail. I believe it is necessary that the government carry out a review of its manpower resources. I should like to see that review of a very thorough nature. I do not think that there is any time to be lost. In my opinion that review should canvass the whole country to decide where national registration boards can be set up and who are the people to be on them; to draw up some uniform questionnaire which these boards would ask of young men. I should like to see it go even further than that. Some form of preliminary medical examination should be held so that if it became necessary for the government to change its form of finding its personnel for its force it would have all that material. As far as medical examinations are concerned, although a second one would have to be carried out, it could be done far more expeditiously than if no preliminary survey had been made.

I cannot help thinking that the Canadian Legion, the country as a whole, and this parliament, will expect this manpower committee, which the government has set up, at least to explore and see how far it could go in making that review of the manpower of our country. The very fact that the deputy minister of national defence has been named as a member of that committee indicates at least that the government does intend to show how the armed forces requirements will fit into that over-all picture. I feel very keenly that this parliament will hold the government responsible for seeing that that committee does a thorough job.

The next recommendation of the Canadian Legion deals with the mobilization of industrial resources for defence production. Here again it says:

> If this situation is allowed to continue, it can have only one ultimate result—our hastily mobilized forces will not only be poorly trained but will be tragically lacking in equipment when faced with an enemy thoroughly prepared for war, and Canadian lives will be needlessly sacrificed on the altar of procrastination.

We have heard already during this session of parliament of the setting up of a new department of defence production. The people of this country will hold the government responsible for seeing that that department does a thorough job. And if it does a thorough job, then this second requisite of the Canadian Legion will be complied with.

The third is that of compulsory training in the reserve forces. I do not go with the Legion as far as that, and I do not believe the Legion branches would have subscribed wholeheartedly to that program if they had been asked to submit this after hearing the government's program for raising the forces that are considered necessary to be in being.

As I have already said, if we adopted this compulsory service in the reserve forces—and as the Legion frankly admits—there would be many difficulties in the way. It may be argued—and I do not think any member on this side of the house would have the right to argue it—that it would be necessary for the government to provide the extra money to carry out this program, that it would go ahead with its present program utilizing the $5 billion in the next three years, and that it would go to the country and ask for, shall we say, an extra $2 billion—I do not think that figure would be excessive—in order to enable the putting into effect of the Legion's recommendations. But if such a suggestion were made the amendment would have been ruled out of order.

I have said that I do not think it is advisable to have compulsory universal training in the reserve army within the amount of money to be provided by the government. I repeat, I feel that it would deter and distract attention from what I believe is the main effort that Canadians should be making in this situation, namely to create forces in being ready at a short time to meet a rapidly deteriorating world situation.

But even if the government did feel that it was prepared to advance large additional sums of money, by making available such large sums to take care of this compulsory training in the reserve forces, I doubt very much whether that would be the right way to expend the additional funds.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

I believe quite possibly more money might or should be made available; but I question very much whether the soundest way would be to expend it on compulsory training in the reserve forces. I fear that if we brought into the reserve forces hundreds of thousands of young men who would be given, shall we say, thirty, forty or even fifty days training a year, this country would be lulled into a false sense of security, believing that they had hundreds of thousands of young men thoroughly trained and ready to take the field at a moment's notice.

No other country I know of attaches such importance to having compulsory training in its second line or reserve forces. There is no compulsory training in the national guard of the United States, which may be considered as comparable with our reserve army. One may say that in the territorial army there is; but then in the territorial army of Great Britain only men who have served in active components of the regular force are required to continue their service in the reserve—and that is an entirely different outlook from that of placing raw recruits into reserve formations and then trying to kid the people that you have a really efficient defence force.

I would like to pay a very humble tribute to the officers and men of the reserve forces. I have been connected with them for I suppose thirty years in one capacity or another, and I know of the immense effort and the immense patriotic sacrifice made voluntarily by those men to prepare themselves for war. The strength of the reserve force is that it is a voluntary force, and that they are prepared to give so much more than what is actually demanded of them.

Now then, if you begin to force men to go into this reserve force you will kill that spirit—because the men who are forced into these units will do only what is actually required of them by law. And how you are going to enforce that law, I have not the slightest idea.

Therefore I feel, looking at the situation across the country as I know it, that it would be really impracticable to have this compulsory training in the reserve army. And even if the money were available I would not recommend that it be spent in that way.

Finally I may have to sound something of an almost personal note. I see that in this subamendment there is the recommendation for conscription or compulsory universal training in the reserve army for home defence. As one who a few years ago suffered the agonies of trying to persuade soldiers who had been called up for home defence to volunteer to go and fight alongside those men who were fighting farther afield for Canadian homes, I never want to saddle anybody else with that same problem.

So, Mr. Speaker, while I heartily support every effort that should be made toward total preparedness, I cannot support this subamendment, because I feel that it will distract attention from the main object we have before us at the present time, the utmost importance of producing men at the earliest possible time.

I have spoken in the house about the need for the defence of Canada. I think that to a certain extent Canada is vulnerable today. I think the extent to which it is vulnerable is greater than the danger of merely a small diversionary raid which could be eliminated by a few men. I do not believe that Canada is going to be a main theatre of war in the foreseeable future, nor do I believe that the greatest effort to prevent a third world war can be made here in Canada. It will be necessary, as has been announced by the government, to fight Canada's battles and protect Canada's homes as far away from Canadian homes as it is practical to do so.

The crucial theatre of war today is western Europe. If we adopt this idea of building up large reserve forces by compulsory enlistment I think we shall have to divert some of the equipment which the minister announced only a few days ago was being sent, an announcement which was applauded by hon. members on all sides of the house. That equipment is being sent to help our comrades in arms of other groups in the United Nations to defend their homes and our homes. I do not believe it would be in the best interests of the United Nations or in the best interests of Canada to divert equipment at this stage from European nations in order to use it for reserve forces here in Canada.

For the reasons I have given I cannot support the subamendment as moved last night.

Mr. Irvin Studer (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, this is my first opportunity this session to address you as Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that privilege because today we are living in a world in which democratic boundaries are becoming narrower and narrower as time goes on. I deeply appreciate the permission that has been granted us to express our opinions in this house. I hope it is taken for granted by the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address that we also extend our congratulations to them. We also congratulate those who have been elevated and accepted recently in the higher sphere of government in this House of Commons.

To those who mourn at this time, especially those from our province, we should like to extend our sympathies and consolation and the hope that they will find consolation in loving memories and the kind solicitude of their many friends. I have just had the privilege of listening to what I consider one of the best patriotic speeches we have heard in this House of Commons during this session. We appreciate that, as does everyone in the Dominion of Canada at the present moment.

Last year hon. members were kind enough to listen to a discussion by me of my constituency of Maple Creek. I should like to extend that a little this year. I have the largest settled constituency in the Dominion of Canada which also has the record of being the driest constituency in the country. The problems that we face are chronic. I would like to say a few words in connection with conditions there.

We have the largest number of polling places, 272, of any rural constituency in the Dominion of Canada. As I say, our conditions are critical because of a lack of moisture and therefore it must be taken for granted that my constituency is not too prosperous. But with the assistance of the government and the policies that have been brought about from time to time we are making progress in Maple Creek. However, the purchasing power of the people remains at a low ebb because where there is no production, there is no value. Yet the cost of production must be met.

We hear references to the cost of living among the labouring and other classes, but the condition there is static. There is no comparison between that situation and the situation faced by farmers in areas such as mine who are receiving no compensation for their year's work and yet they must contend with overhead in connection with the operation of their farms. One can imagine what the situation is like when it is continued over a period of years. These people must get along on crop failure payments which were set in 1939. We hope to rectify that situation. We would like the government to give consideration to the situation that actually exists in that part of the country and when we take care of difficulties which arise in other areas we should bring these people along until such time as we can carry our fair share of the burdens of the economy of this country, which we hope will be soon.

We heard of the tragedies that occurred at Cabano, Rimouski and in the Red river valley. Those were terrible tragedies, but there is no tragedy that compares with that faced by a farmer who farms for thirty years and then has nothing to show for his labours. We should continue with all haste to rehabilitate these people and make it possible for them to take their places in life along with the rest of us. The first essential in rehabilitation is take out of production lands that are of no value and return them to their native grass. It is the responsibility of the province to declare lands to be submarginal. I call upon the province of Saskatchewan, which to my knowledge has not all through the years declared one single acre in that entire area to be submarginal, to determine what lands shall be considered submarginal so that we can proceed with the necessary rehabilitation.

I told the house last year that we had in Maple Creek some of the best things in the whole Dominion of Canada. This year I am glad to be able to say to the house that we have some of the best things in the whole world. This past fall, despite severe drought, grasshoppers, dust and many of the other things that we must face in that part of the country, R. P. Robbins, a farmer in my constituency, won the world wheat championship. That is a particularly high honour to win considering the conditions under which the wheat was grown. It is an honour which was particularly due to that individual. He is one of those real men who come from the mother country of England. He came to this country about thirty years ago possessed of that bulldog tenacity that people from Great Britain seem to have. He held on in spite of the greatest difficulties. In that area there were seven consecutive crop failures in the last ten years and yet he produced world championship wheat. I think that is a record in itself for an individual to keep trying that long on 160 acres of land, which is equivalent to about 10 acres in this part of the country. He has been trying to make a living and make a contribution to the dominion in which he lives so that as a result of his work and his labours those who follow after him will benefit as a result of his having been there. Having lived under such conditions with just the bare necessities of life, trying to carve out a home, having worked for many years, he does not receive sufficient from the world's championship wheat prize to make it even worth while to ship the prize wheat to Chicago. There is no concerted effort in the Dominion of Canada to recognize that the world's wheat championship is of any value to the economy of Canada, and I think it is.

We have the record in Canada of growing the world's best wheat, and whenever the championship goes out of the dominion I think a part of the record goes with it. In spite of that, only incidental recognition has been given to any of these men. I call upon the people who are interested in the money that has accrued to the economy of Canada from the production of wheat to take into consideration that perhaps something should be done, if not for him—and I hope it will be —for all others who will follow, in order to provide an incentive so that the quality of our wheat may be improved, or at least maintained, and thus assist the general economy of the country. Therefore I ask the farm organizations, the grain handling concerns, the wheat pools, the provincial governments and the Dominion of Canada to give consideration to establishing a prize of $5,000 that any man in Canada can win. It would not be even the tiniest speck in the economy of our country compared with the value of winning the championship.

Something should be done to recognize the value of wheat to this country. These men do not only win championships. They spend their lives in trying to produce better wheat. Therefore I think the least the Dominion of Canada can do is to recognize the fact that some people are working in its interests, silently and alone, and are producing results although subject to the greatest possible discouragement. I want to place before the house the record of the people of the constituency of Maple Creek to indicate what they have been trying to do. I want to place before the people of Canada the results of the efforts that have been made there.

I think there has been some discussion in the house, so far as wheat is concerned, with respect to the four-year British wheat agreement. We have heard the matter raised and discussed from day to day. I believe the impression that has been left in the House of Commons and throughout the dominion is that about the year 1946 a contract was signed between the government of Canada and the people of Canada. I believe that is the impression throughout the country at the present time, but the fact is that a contract was signed beween the government of Great Britain and the wheat growers of western Canada represented by the government of Canada. Under the contract Great Britain agreed to pay a certain price for Canadian wheat over a period of years. At the end of that term of years, if the price that had been paid was not approximately equal to the world price during the same period, under the contract the British government would give consideration to what is termed the "have regard to" clause, and would make up the difference between the price it had paid and the world price.

That was not an agreement between the people of Canada generally and the wheat growers of Canada in particular. It was an agreement between Great Britain and the wheat growers of this country. I believe more emphasis should be placed on the honouring of a contract between two countries. If there is any honour left between nations—and we see too much of dishonour among nations of the world—I think the contract should be fulfilled by the peopl who signed it. If members of the House of Commons were in agreement with the British wheat contract, then every agreeing member of the House of Commons signed. Therefore I think they should not try to compel the people of Canada as a whole to pay the additional sum required under the wheat agreement. I think it is their duty to endeavour to obtain payment from the place where primarily it was supposed to have been paid. If that is the situation I think we should do something about it.

Some people estimate that the loss has been 50 cents a bushel, but I have not heard one member say what the world price of class II wheat would have been if the 600 million bushels of grain sold under the British contract had been placed on the open market, and we had had the same experience with the open market that western Canada has had in the past. I venture to say that the world price of class II wheat would not have been such as to involve the loss to western Canada mentioned by some hon. members.

What would the price have been? If we go back to former years before there was a wheat board or a wheat pool, we will have an indication of what the situation was so far as the open market was concerned, as pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith). I maintain that our system of marketing wheat under control, under the wheat pool, is the only system that is satisfactory to the farmers because it means orderly marketing, and that is what the farmers want. They want orderly marketing so that millions of bushels of wheat will not be dumped on the market in the fall, depress the price, and after it has disappeared have the price go up the following spring.

That was the argument of the farmers of western Canada against the open market system which allowed only those with sufficient money to speculate on the open market to make money that should have accrued to the farmers of western Canada. To those who would be the saviours of the western Canadian farmer, and also to those who are supporting the view that the government should pay, let me ask why the western farmers should have to help to pay the additional sum under the British wheat contract. If that is not the situation, let the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) get up and explain it. During the last session he said that the farmers of Saskatchewan were paying more income taxes than farmers of any other province. If this payment must come out of the people of Canada through the government will it not have to come out of income taxes? Where else can it come from? If Saskatchewan farmers are paying the highest income taxes why penalize them to make this payment?

Surely the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) would not want to do that. On another occasion he argued against the 20-cent interim payment on wheat by the government. He said that the government should not have done it because the farmers had to pay interest on it, and the farmers should not have been compelled to pay interest. Now he is demanding that the farmers pay most of the additional amount being asked for from the people of Canada through the dominion government. If these hon. members—especially the socialists—want to be the saviours of the farmers, if they want to be of service to the people of Canada, they should hie themselves over to Great Britain and talk to their socialist friends who now control the government of that country. They should tell their socialist friends that Canada signed a contract that they agreed to in the House of Commons. They should ask them what they are going to do about meeting the obligation they are in honour bound to meet. If they do not pay it then I would say that there is a conspiracy between the socialists of Canada and the socialists of Great Britain to refrain from paying the farmers of western Canada what is their just due until after the provincial election in Saskatchewan. I would tell them to go over there and closet themselves with their socialist friends and convince them that there should be some honour—well, there is honour even among the people who are not so good. I do not like to use the word. I would ask them to do that. If they cannot get over there any other way, I suggest that the province of Saskatchewan will pay their passage because the province would be bound to win. There would be that much additional money in Saskatchewan, and we need a lot of money in Saskatchewan because the taxes are going up. Anything we can get from any other source will be mighty handy within the next five years if we are still there.

Along with that, I would suggest that the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) go along because, although he might not wish to be included in the company of socialists—

Mr. Ross (Souris): Hear, hear.

Mr. Studer: —nevertheless he has been stowing away in the same boat. He has been riding with them. If they will not accept his company, then I would suggest he go to the grain exchange. They might contribute towards his passage over there.

Mr. Ross (Souris): He is not very acceptable there either.

Mr. Studer: He could have a heart to heart talk with the leader of the opposition in Britain, and tell him about the situation in Canada. He could tell him, "Perhaps you had better take some action." The margin is rather close over in Britain as between the two. I believe we would get some results if we had good men such as the socialists from Saskatchewan serving in this House of Commons, and the member for Souris, over there talking to the leader of the opposition. Any spare time the member for Souris had he could spend at the corn exchange in London.

There has been a lot of talk about buying British products. We in western Canada will buy British products if those people will honour some of the contracts that the two countries have previously signed. What is the opinion of the western farmer concerning these contracts, if he is called upon to partially pay for them? Is he to accept something from a country that does not honour its contracts? I would not worry too much about the dumping duties that seem to have been worrying the member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher). I would worry about these contracts being fulfilled. I am sure that, when they are, much of the difficulty between the two countries will be removed. I want them to bring back twenty-five cents a bushel when they return from Britain, and nothing less, because nothing less is going to satisfy the people of Saskatchewan.

I intended to refer for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to the socialist subamendment that was made at the beginning of the session. However, that is out of the picture now, except for one thing. Although the socialists here were not too proud of it, and did not call for a recorded vote, there was a recorded vote in Saskatchewan on that subamendment. If the socialist members in this house are ashamed of it, there are some gentlemen out in Saskatchewan who are not ashamed of it. They are holding up the semblance of this subamendment as a bait, you might call it, and are prepared to run an election campaign on Korean policy. What in hell has the Korean policy to do with Saskatchewan? That is what I should like to know. You will pardon the word, Mr. Speaker, but I have heard it often in church so I thought it was all right to use it here. What the socialists here are not so proud of, their brothers in Saskatchewan seem to be proud of, because in the debate on the speech from the throne the premier of that province told the people of Saskatchewan he would hold an election campaign on this Korean issue. We find a Goliath, a Colossus, from the province of Saskatchewan, who is emulating Samson by going out and slaying the Philistines, not the Philistines in Saskatchewan but 500,000 Liberals, with the jawbone of an ass. I am telling the world that the United Nations have missed a sure bet when they missed the brains that are just wasting away out in our province of Saskatchewan, because when the premier was in this House of Commons he had the solution for everything. He has the solution for everything in that province of Saskatchewan which everyone is leaving. Now, he is going to settle all the difficulties of the whole wide world.

I do not offer any apologies, Mr. Speaker, for talking about the province of Saskatchewan, because two-thirds of the time spent in the provincial legislature in Saskatchewan is spent in discussing federal matters. I believe that the socialists should practise what they preach. They come to this house and talk about price controls, the high cost of living, but they hold the solution to the problem in their own hands out in the province of Saskatchewan. Instead of coming down here and telling this government what to do, they should go back to the province of Saskatchewan and tell the government out there what to do about it. They have thirteen crown corporations that have a lot to do with the cost of living in the province of Saskatchewan. I would tell them to eliminate the box factory which they own, and make lumber. They are always mentioning the lack of houses. Why do they not get busy and make lumber at the box factory, and then they could build houses?

The Saskatchewan government also owns a brick factory. Bricks enter into house building; why do they not make more bricks and utilize them for building purposes instead of utilizing them for brickbats to throw at people? The provincial government has a leather factory. The co-operative horse factory is right next door, so they can get supplies of leather. There is plenty of leather there. There is no need for the children in Saskatchewan to go barefoot because the government cannot obtain enough leather. They also have a wool factory. I do not know whether it is operating, but if it belonged to a Liberal government and was not operating we would hear plenty about it. There is plenty of wool in the constituency of Maple Creek. They would not need to be talking about the poor neglected children who are walking around without proper clothing if they produced enough wool. There is a co-operative flour mill in Saskatchewan. Why do they not provide a subsidy to make bread for the hungry people of Saskatchewan? We want the price reduced on all of those things. Get the price down to the ordinary level they are talking about in this house. The government owns the telephone system. Why not also reduce the rates for that service?—because it enters into the cost of living. The government owns buses. Why do they not give us two tickets for a nickel, so that the ordinary person could ride on the buses?

I believe the government of the province has some control over liquor—at least, I have heard about it. I have not heard anything about reducing the price, but I have heard a lot about increasing the water. Why does the government not increase the mothers' allowances? That would increase the purchasing power of the poor people. These poor mothers have nothing else to depend upon except what a beneficent government might allow them. They have the lowest mothers' allowance in the Dominion of Canada. They might increase the old age pensions, about which they are always talking. This pension could be increased until it at least equalled that of the neighbouring province of Alberta. It is said that in Saskatchewan some assistance is given by way of health service. The same thing is done in Alberta and British Columbia where the pensions are $50 per month, while in Saskatchewan it is $42.50, of which $2.50 is subject to the means test.

In Saskatchewan, the premier stated in the debate on the address that crown corporations made $11 million. Where is that $11 million? There is no record of it. It was supposed to be used to reduce the cost of social services. No one can find any record of it. In any event, that $11 million should not be there because these crown companies are supposed to provide a service and not operate for profit. They must have taken the $11 million away from someone. I believe the government could go into the manufacture of liquor, because that is where the real money is. Between 1945 and 1949, $4,675 million was spent on tobacco and liquor in Canada. If a portion of that money were placed in the economy of the poor people, in order for them to buy the necessities of life instead of the extravagances of life, what results would that not have in regard to the cost of living in this country of ours? I do not think any country is proud of that figure. The only people who can reduce it are the people of Canada themselves. They cannot reduce it through laws. So when we talk about armaments and billions of dollars, that is the disarmament figure for the Dominion of Canada; because that amount of money is not uplifting the spirit or the morale of the people of Canada. It is disarming them. If the Russian people can increase that disarmament, through the poverty, illness and unhappiness that enter into that figure of over $4½ billion, to the extent that the people are completely demoralized, it would be walking right into the Russian trap.

I am not saying that the government of Saskatchewan should manufacture liquor. I am not saying that no one should drink liquor. But I think it should be done moderately. Liquor is one of the things that are put on earth, the same as all other good things, in order that it may be utilized moderately. But if the Saskatchewan government still wants to make some money, they might keep their eye on that possibility. If they do not like that, they can perhaps begin to make some machinery. They invested many millions of dollars in these crown corporations and their speakers go up and down the province talking about the high cost of machinery. There is out there Canadian Co-operative Implements. Stick a few million dollars into that in order to provide some additional machinery for the people of Saskatchewan which they can afford to pay for.

So whither are we going? Why do we not practise what we preach? I do not think they are socialists at all, as far as Saskatchewan affairs are concerned, from what we have heard and the different issues that they place before the people, like the Korean affair and the Saskatchewan premier talking and saying in the debate on the speech from the throne that there was a prominent Liberal in Ottawa who went to New York and told the oil men in New York not to invest in Saskatchewan because if they did the C.C.F. would be elected again. Mr. Speaker, I think politics are getting to a fairly low level. No one needs to go to New York in order to discourage anyone from investing in Saskatchewan. The Regina manifesto that went through in the year 1935 stated that socialism will not rest content until capitalism is eradicated from the face of the earth. No one needs to go to New York or anywhere else, because their words have preceded them. The premier himself was in New York not so long ago and he must have confirmed them in their belief that there was a mighty slim possibility of getting any of their money back if they put it into Saskatchewan, until there is a different government there. So I would say they are not socialists at all; they are just political auctioneers. They just auction off their ideas, their votes, even their very souls, to the highest bidder. That is the philosophy that I find when the socialists are out on the hustings in Saskatchewan and I think the whole world should know about it.

They say that communism breeds on malnutrition, or that communism is a disease. What causes socialism? It must be a deficiency in the diet. That cause has an extremely depressing effect. They certainly are depressing. No matter how high is our standard of living, no matter how great is our prosperity, you will never see a socialist enjoying it. He will suffer the highest form of prosperity in the world. So I would say that we should know the men that are in this country, and that they should stand up and be counted, because we are living in serious days. I believe that the socialists are following the same tortuous road they followed prior to 1939, working in the hope that the people would side in with them in what they thought was the cause of the former war. I am telling you what I know when I say that those socialists were hand in glove with the ideas and the philosophy of Hitler up until 1942 when Russia was attacked. Then you saw the slickest political phenomenon on the North American continent in the about-face they made at that time. That was the situation out there in Saskatchewan, and more people should know about it. I am prepared to tell them about it when the time comes.

Socialism does not mean distribution; it means confiscation, everywhere in the world. There is no distribution under socialism because socialism has never been able to produce that which is required, let alone have anything to distribute. That is the situation with regard to socialism. I therefore say: Know the men in this country so that we can tell what they stand for; and I would say to them that the time has come right now to vote, not for a third force in the world because there is no such thing as a third force. There is no room for a third force. There are only the forces of evil and the forces of good. Let them align themselves with the forces that they think they should support here in the House of Commons, out in Saskatchewan and all over the world.

Having spoken about knowing your men, Mr. Speaker, I should now like to present to you some views in just a slightly different vein. Speaking about men and descriptions of them, figuratively, typically and all the rest of it, may I say that we acquire names for ourselves in spite of ourselves. To give you an illustration of the typicalness of a name, may I refer you to Senator Taft in the United States. He is referred to all over the country as Mr. Republican. The reason he is referred to as Mr. Republican is that he typifies what is basically inherent in the Republican party. There are people of that kind. You and I acquire names descriptive of us. You will also find in the United States that Mr. James Farley is described as Mr. Democrat. Some years ago he wrote a book called "Behind the Ballots". I read that book, and after I read it I decided to go into politics. Now I think I am on my way out. However, I read the book and that was the result. Then we come to Britain and who could be more typical of Britain than Mr. Churchill. He would go by the name of Mr. Britain. Then when we come to Canada, who could be more descriptive of the Canadian people from one end of the country to the other than our beloved Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent), Mr. Canadian. Then we have another individual who is typical of the Liberal party, who year in and year out, in bad times and in good times, has preached the spirit of Liberalism. I refer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), Mr. Liberal. Then I would refer to another gentleman; and wherever his name would be mentioned anywhere in the world he would be referred to as Mr. Statesman. I have reference to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). Then we have a member who celebrated his birthday today and who has endeared himself to the heart of everyone; regardless of whether we wanted it to happen or not, he has endeared himself to us all. I refer to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor). He would be Mr. Minister.

Then we could perhaps come over to this side of the house and describe someone who would be typical of the Conservative party. I would select the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure) for that honour, Mr. Conservative. Someone else who would be typical of the Progressive Conservative party would be the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), Mr. Progressive. One individual that I think should also have the honour of being mentioned is the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). I think one could describe him as Mr. Grain Exchange.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was not going to make a speech, but now I will.

Mr. Studer: Then there is the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Everyone takes it for granted that he is Mr. Socialist. Then there is the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher); and there is no argument about it, he is Mr. Capitalist. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) will of course be known as Mr. Professor. There is no denying that. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) is without doubt Mr. Independent. There is one other gentleman that I dare not leave out. He was a former member of this house. I refer to the present premier of Saskatchewan. His name will surely go down in history as Mr. Politician. He is the biggest politician on the North American continent, bar none. Here is the description of these various gentlemen that I give. I offer the descriptions with no malice whatsoever, Mr. Speaker. No doubt as time goes on I shall get a proper description of myself.

I should be getting pretty close to the end of what I did not have to say. I wish to make one or two more remarks and then I shall be thankful for your consideration. The newspapers are playing a great part in the history of this country. So far as the opposition members are concerned, seldom do they speak without holding up a clipping from some newspaper in Canada, describing what in the editor's opinion should be done. If the newspapers of this country are running the country—and they are because sooner or later we are going to do what they say—if that is so, then I suggest that they should be represented in this House of Commons. I think they would be able to give great service to the people of this country and to the House of Commons if they displaced some of the members of the opposition, because they have been awfully weak in their arguments, and I am sure that some of the editors would be much more helpful than what we hear in this house day after day.

Some of these newspapers might be able to give assistance to the government side of the house, because it would eliminate a lot of this misquoting and a lot of the instructions to newspaper reporters. This is the instruction that is given to them: "We are not so much interested in what he says; go out and get a story". If we had a much more extensive representation in the House of Commons some of that would be eliminated.

Then, if we had representation from newspapers on the government side of the house there would be the necessity of having parliamentary assistants and we are surrounded with likely candidates over here. The hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. McWilliam), the editor of the North Shore Leader, the hon. member for Durham (Mr. James), the editor of the Bowmanville Statesman, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray), the editor of the Alaska Highway, and the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. McLean), the editor of the Huron Expositor, would all fit the bill. We would have lots of assistance in the House of Commons in regard to keeping the record straight.

If they are to displace anyone in opposition I would suggest that they be displaced by the editor of the Montreal Gazette, the editor of the Ottawa Journal, the editor of the Globe and Mail, the editor of the Vancouver Province, the editor of the Winnipeg Tribune and the editor of the Halifax Herald. If our socialist friends over there need some assistance I would nominate the editor of the Saskatchewan Commonwealth. He has the keenest one-track mind in Canada.

Since we are living in a troubled world perhaps we should not be prone to levity. We are living in a world where, as everyone knows, it is considered that might is right. In Canada we have adopted the philosophy that only right makes might. Therefore we are living in a world in which there are these two philosophies of life. As the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Decore) and the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) said yesterday in their well delivered speeches, the real danger that confronts us is an enemy who is ruthless and who will stop at nothing to achieve his purposes.

In closing I should like to say that in my opinion the system that the enemy is using at the present time to undermine the nations of the world is both physical and psychological. That is, he appeals to the hunger that is in people. He appeals to their suffering and then to their spirit. There has been a concerted effort during a great number of years by these people who control the Kremlin, and hope to control the world, to destroy people's minds. As I said, their appeal is both physical and psychological. That is true especially in regard to the different races of the world.

As we know it today, the white race is outnumbered seven to one. That is, there are seven coloured people to every white person in the world today. I believe the Kremlin is making an appeal to these coloured people all over the world. They are filling them with the doctrine that the white people have dominated them and exploited them throughout the centuries. They tell them that their enemies are the white people of the world. In rebuttal I would say that the white people are the only people that are the hope of the world, because they are the only people who have solved the difficult problem of production and the method of distributing the surplus of their production to other people of the world. How are people to be fed unless some civilization solves the production problem? I would say that the coloured people can look to the white people for their idealism and to safeguard them and lead them to a better life rather than look to those nations that would destroy not only them but us.

The science of destruction has advanced rapidly throughout all the world. It is the prayer of all good men that this same science, energy, striving for peace, brains and money could be utilized to eliminate poverty and disease in the world, and that we endeavour to offer to all the people of the world, whatever their colour may be, our assistance in regard to their needs, physically, mentally and psychologically.

I am sure that Canadians will accept their responsibility along with the other twelve nations of the United Nations Organization, first to maintain peace, second, to guarantee that peace in the present-day world by being strong, and third, to recognize with all of the people on earth their right, along with ours, to health, wealth and happiness.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal during the course of this debate about whether or not war with the Soviet union is inevitable. We certainly hope that it is not. But war will be inevitable if we fail to make our forces strong enough to defeat the forces of communism.

There is no way on this earth that we can talk to them, get together with them and form any compromise. Stalin has made it clear on many occasions that they are out to rule the world, and nothing short of that will be satisfactory. That end has been advocated all the way down from the time of Marx, and it will never change. The Russian minister of education as quoted in the September issue of Outlook said—I will not attempt to give the exact words, but the effect of his statement was this: "We must hate Christians. Even the best Christian is our worst enemy. They preach the doctrine, love thy neighbour. We say, hate thy neighbour; for without hate we cannot conquer the world". These are the men, Mr. Speaker, that we are trying to talk to and attempting to pacify. It simply cannot be done, and the only possible way that we can stop this Russian aggression is by seeing that we are willing not only to match their strength but to go beyond it. We must remember also that now we have not only Russia to deal with, but practically all of the Orient. We can blame ourselves for the fact that the Chinese people's government has lined itself alongside Russia.

I am mighty glad to see the Colombo plan going ahead. It will be a good thing, but it should have been done fifteen or twenty years ago. Those people were starving; they have been starving for years while we in the so-called western democratic countries have been crying because we had surpluses and no markets in which to place them. We made it evident to them that the only interest we had in their affairs was that of exploitation. Now, twenty years too late, we are trying to give some aid to those undeveloped countries. Years ago we should have shown that we have some sense of responsibility and some thought in line with that spirit of Christian charity about which we boast so often. Now, after all these years, when it is too late, we offer them assistance—not through the goodness of our hearts but through the fear of communism.

According to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) the defence of Canada is to be the first consideration. I agree wholeheartedly; but for goodness' sake let us go ahead and do something. Reports indicate that voluntary enlistments in the armed forces are not sufficient, that the permanent army is about seven thousand below required strength and that the reserves are greatly undermanned. Surely, if the minister says that the defence of Canada is our first consideration, we should do something about the deficiencies in our reserve army at least.

Many people say that compulsory service in the reserve force would withdraw men from the active army to serve in the capacity of instructors. That is not so. There are any number of good officers, retired and medically unfit for active service who, if asked, would be only too willing to give their service for the training of these men.

As a matter of fact during the last war the thirty-day training schools were staffed almost one hundred per cent by men medically unfit for the active armies. I would be the first to admit that most communities have inadequate facilities and equipment to go into a large scale training plan at the present time. But, after all, whose responsibility is that? Why do they not have the equipment and facilities they need? While much of it may be out of date, we have now enough equipment at least to make a beginning.

Speaking the other day the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said that at present in the reserve forces we find parades called with only about six officers and four men showing up. That is in itself sufficient reason to see that these reserve training units should be brought up to capacity. Quite apart from war, this military training would not do anyone any harm, especially the youngsters. It gives an opportunity for first-class physical training for those who need it. As the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw) pointed out last night, at least it teaches those who attend which end of the gun to hold to their shoulder before pulling the trigger.

There is no doubt that in the present situation compulsory training is essential. Let us have cadet training in the schools and colleges. Let the young men have their training, and then permit them to go into industry, with the understanding that they may come back one or two evenings each week to gain at least some knowledge of any technological advances there may have been.

With respect to registration: if war were to come to Canada we would find registration absolutely essential. The present outlook indicates that such a thing might happen in a very short time. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, speaking the other day, threw a challenge across the floor of the house in which he asked the opposition how to save money. If the government wants to save money, then let it have the registration made at the same time the census is taken next summer. By doing that they would see how many millions in expenses they could save.

National registration would give the government an idea as to the possibilities of each and every person in the country, and also a very clear indication of any subversive elements we may have—and believe me we have some. That, too, is our own fault. We have those subversive elements here today because the government has refused time and again to put forth some sort of concrete financial policy which would offer the people of Canada some degree of security.

We won the last war, but not necessarily because the men and machines we had were better than those possessed by the Germans. I would be the first to say that the Canadian armed forces were the best to be found anywhere in the world. But we won that war simply because we had more men and equipment than did our enemy. Then, let us get ahead, and see that we have more equipment this time—because if war comes we are going to need it, and need it badly.

Speaking the other day, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) said that American forces were going into Korea after eighteen-day refresher courses. We do not want to see that happen here. My mind goes back to the early days of the last war, when men had to be sent across with no knowledge at all of military affairs. This time we may not have a buffer state to protect us until our men are ready. Not only that, we have no reason to believe that we might not be attacked right here on our own soil. It was reported in the press not long ago that one of the United States pilots in Korea had stated that if the United States had had the MIG-15 jet plane and if the communists in Korea had been equipped with the United States jet planes they would have been slaughtered, they would have wiped the skies with the North Korean communists. That bodes ill when you consider that for the most part the Chinese communist pilots are poorly trained. What would happen if we were to run into superior numbers of well-trained Russian pilots in their apparently superior MIG-15 fighter planes? While I am speaking about jet planes and pilots I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of February 8 which reads:

> 400 jets a month said Russian aim
> Russia is expanding production of her MIG-15 jet fighter planes and, say Swedish sources, expects to be producing 400 a month in the next few months, the magazine Aviation Age said yesterday. It said American production of planes of all types does not exceed 250 a month.

That means that our whole defence program is entirely inadequate, not only in connection with the training of men for the reserve and active forces but in connection with our industries. There is already a shortage of manpower, and training in the reserve forces is the only way this country can have its men trained without disrupting industry. If the government want to get manpower all they need to do is to remove the means test from the veterans allowances and the old age pensions. They will find that these older people can do a good job. They may not be able to do the hard work that younger men can do but there are many jobs in industry they can handle quite well.

Let us call upon the women of this country. They will go into industry if required. Let us encourage the married women to go to work by allowing them to earn up to the income tax exemption of a single person without any penalty being imposed upon the husband. There is really no shortage of manpower in Canada. We have lots of it if the government will go ahead and utilize what is available. These things will create small inconveniences, and I think that is admitted by all. But will anyone in this house say that a few inconveniences are not better than slavery under the heel of Moscow?

Accusations have been flying around the house ever since this debate started about skating around this and skating around that. The official opposition has accused the government of skating around the international situation and not giving the people a true picture. The government has accused the official opposition of skating around by not making any concrete proposals. The C.C.F. has accused the government of skating around something else. Incidentally the best job of skating around I have seen was the speech this afternoon of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). He made the best Liberal speech I have ever heard in this house. If skating is a good description to use, I think the floor of this House of Commons during this debate would remind me of a community skating rink on a Sunday afternoon when the subject of manpower is mentioned.

To carry on just a bit further with this skating, this amendment has the effect of giving members of this house and those who are doing so much skating, the rules of the game and a hockey stick. Let us get on with the game.

On motion of Mr. Gillis the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fournier (Hull) the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 15, 1951

The house met at three o'clock.

COBALT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PURCHASE BY GOVERNMENT OF NORTHERN ONTARIO ORES AND CONCENTRATES

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement with regard to cobalt ore.

In order to stimulate further production of cobalt to meet future defence and essential requirements for the metal, the Canadian government will purchase northern Ontario concentrates for a period of three years on the following basis:

For ores and concentrates containing 10-11·99 per cent cobalt—$1.35 per lb. of cobalt contained; containing 12-13·99 per cent cobalt—$1.40 per lb. of cobalt contained; containing 14 per cent or over cobalt—$1.45 per lb. of cobalt contained.

This incentive price schedule will be posted immediately by the Deloro Smelting and Refining Company, acting as buying agents for the government, and that company's smelter facilities will be used to convert such ores and concentrates into metal to establish a Canadian emergency stockpile.

The new price schedule represents an increase of approximately fifty cents per pound of metal. The ores and concentrates shall be purchased by the Deloro company on the basis of assay determinations by the Temiskaming testing laboratory at Cobalt, Ontario, and in minimum shipments of 5-ton lots. The silver content of such shipments will be paid for on the basis of Deloro company's customary tariff.

Cobalt metal is in short supply today. In a defence program cobalt plays a vital role for such essentials as jet blades, tool steels, alnico magnets and tungsten carbide.

IRON ORE

STEEP ROCK AND LABRADOR—INQUIRY AS TO ACCELERATED PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, notice of which I have given. The question arises out of a report in this morning's Montreal Gazette of comments made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the production of Steep Rock and Labrador ore. The minister is reported as stating: "We are taking steps to accelerate production in both areas". Will the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys or the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell me a little more in connection with both, particularly with respect to Labrador?

Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I wish to thank my hon. friend for giving me about an hour's notice of his question. The government does not contemplate giving any special assistance to the Labrador iron ore development.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce say whether the statement reported in this morning's Gazette, attributed to him, is correct? Will he tell the house at an early day what the government's plans are for acceleration of the production of iron ore?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I do not think I need notice to answer that question. We were notified by the company that they wished to accelerate their program from four years to three years, and we were asked if we would help in expediting materials for the development. We offered to give that help to the accelerated program.

Mr. Knowles: Which company is the minister referring to?

Mr. Howe: I am referring to the Labrador company.

Mr. Knowles: Will the minister comment on Steep Rock?

Mr. Howe: Steep Rock advised me that they wish to accelerate their program, and asked me for the same sort of help. We are endeavouring to give them that help.

NEWFOUNDLAND

INQUIRY AS TO FINANCIAL SURPLUS ON DEPOSIT WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, notice of which I have given. What is the amount of Newfoundland's financial surplus now on deposit with the government?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): I thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of the question. As he is aware, the arrangement for the deposit of Newfoundland's surplus was made with the government of Newfoundland. I shall communicate with them, and if they have no objection to my giving the information, I shall be happy to do so.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN—DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister report to the house whether conversations were recently held with the Saskatchewan government in connection with the South Saskatchewan irrigation project? Has the provincial government agreed to pay $33 million of the costs involved? If so, will the project commence this year?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The last occasion upon which I was in Regina, by appointment I did discuss the matter with the government of Saskatchewan.

The next question, as my hon. friend gave notice of it, is:

Has the provincial government agreed to pay, with the water users, $33 million of the costs involved?

I would rather say that I have a letter from the Saskatchewan government in which they have urged that construction be proceeded with, and have agreed to take as a basis of discussion $33 million on the part of the provincial government, and the farmers and others who are interested, but I would not like to say that they have agreed to make that payment. It was merely suggested as a basis of discussion.

As to the latter part of the question, that is a matter which has not yet been decided. It is a matter of policy to be decided by the government.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question? Is there any estimate as to what the federal government's share would be?

Mr. Gardiner: As has been reported to the house, the estimated total cost is $102 million, and $33 million subtracted from that is what I assume they propose.

Mr. Coldwell: Then you would pay what is in the estimate?

[Mr. Abbott.]

FIRES

CAMP BORDEN—QUESTION AS TO INVESTIGATION—USE OF FIRE-RESISTING PAINT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has his department investigated the cause of the very costly fires that have taken place at Camp Borden during the last few months, especially the one that took place the other day?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): I have had no notice of the question; therefore I am not immediately and completely informed as to the fires to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. Fraser: There was one at the rink to the extent of $250,000, and one in the canteen to the extent of $75,000.

Mr. Claxton: The fires are investigated by the fire marshals of the service concerned, and also by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Where it is considered desirable, there is also a court of inquiry. The results of these reports are given to me, and are very carefully looked into with a view to preventing recurrence in the future, or to the taking of such appropriate action as may be necessary. I should point out that the value of defence property in Canada is very large. Our surveys indicate that the proportionate value of the property destroyed by fire is no greater than that of the property of the civilian population, despite the fact that a good deal of it is highly inflammable.

Mr. Fraser: May I ask a further question? Has the department investigated the use of fire-resisting paint in these buildings?

Mr. Claxton: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: Because it has helped—

Mr. Claxton: Yes, and we use fire-resisting paint wherever it appears to be economical to do so. But to apply any kind of paint to all the wooden buildings of the Department of National Defence at the present time would run into not hundreds of millions of dollars but into billions of dollars.

Mr. Fraser: What?

Mr. Claxton: Oh, sure.

Mr. Fraser: Your buildings would not cost that. There is something wrong there.

Mr. Abbott: Use nails instead.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND SALT CODFISH—PORTS OF CLEARANCE FOR EXPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. I have not given him notice. If he is not prepared to answer the question today, perhaps he could do it at the next sitting. Is he aware that some of the exports of salted codfish from Newfoundland are not cleared through the ports of Newfoundland but through ports in the maritime provinces? Will he consider giving the necessary instructions so that these entries may be made at the point of export?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I will have the matter looked into and answer the question later.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. McMillan for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Low.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have already had a good deal to say in this debate on the subject of manpower and defence. However, the subamendment now before the house is pretty specific on one point, namely, immediate conscription for the reserve forces, which makes it necessary for me to say a little more on that particular subject.

In my opinion the whole intention of the subamendment is to support the brief or recommendations of the Canadian Legion to the government on the matter of conscription for the reserve forces. I am reasonably sure that when the Legion drafted that program and presented it to the government it was not their intention to put pressure on the government to bring in an ill-considered program of conscription. In my opinion that brief was intended to arouse public opinion as to the gravity of the international situation, and the necessity for Canada's recognizing it and instituting an adequate defence program. It is on that basis I am going to discuss the matter, because I think the representations of the Legion have served the purpose they were intended to serve.

When the recommendations were drawn up, much of the information now at the disposal of the public and given to hon. members was not known. I think the subamendment is impractical at this time and could not be put into operation, even if the government desired to do so.

In my opinion the most important matter with which the government has to contend is that of manpower. The Legion have recommended that three things be done. First, they say there should be a national registration. Unless there is a national registration it will be impossible to have conscription of any kind for the armed services, whether for the reserve forces or on an over-all basis. National registration, therefore, is the first step that would have to be taken. The suggestion has been made in the house that the census to be taken in June could be used for the purposes of a registration. My own view is that it could not be done. Most of the information gathered for statistical purposes when the census is taken is confidential and could not be dovetailed into a national registration. Such registration would have to be taken for a specific purpose, with a view to determining the age groups that might be called up, where they might be placed, and the like. The passing of the subamendment at this time would place the government in the position of being asked to do something that cannot be done until other steps are first taken.

Secondly, the Legion have asked for the mobilization of industry and resources for purposes of defence. When the recommendation was made, there was very little knowledge throughout the country as to what the government's program for mobilization was. Since coming to this session, and since January through the medium of the press, we have been given a pretty good idea of what the government has done. A special department of government has been set up for that purpose. When one takes a look at the labour force in Canada, the manpower available to work out the program while maintaining the internal economy of the country, one realizes that the subamendment is impractical at this time, because there is no manpower available.

If we instituted conscription for the reserve forces we would draw from the eighteen- and nineteen-year groups. Perhaps we would get about 100,000 young men. Where would we get them? They would have to be taken from the farms, from industry and from many other essential projects the government has already mapped out. We have not got that kind of manpower.

The Financial Post of January 20 outlines in detail the program upon which the government has embarked for defence purposes in industry. For the information of hon. members, and particularly those who may be supporting the subamendment, I should like to place part of this article on the record. It states:

1. In nine months the Department of National Defence has placed $700 million of orders for armament construction and supplies. That is twenty times the comparable orders prior to world war II; six times total orders placed in the first year of that war. And for 1951-52 defence spending is likely to be double the 1950-51 rate, with production, not the dollar sign, as the limiting factor.

The emphasis there is on production.

2. Armament orders for NATO countries are just starting to roll under the $300 million arms aid program. The first order of $40 million went through last week; others pending will reach or exceed $150 million very shortly.

3. Capital expansion plans for 1951, plus hundreds of millions of dollars of unfinished 1950 business, is at an all-time peak, twenty-two per cent of national production. We are already experiencing critical bottlenecks in materials, which portend imminent and far-reaching controls.

4. Employment in manufacturing has been sharply rising since June 1; is currently at its post-war peak. Durable goods industries at November 1 employed seven per cent more than November, 1949.

5. New record employment peaks were reached in November in construction, public utilities, trade and finance. Employment in these groups now totals one and a quarter million, up forty-three per cent from the same month five years ago.

6. Canada's jobless shelf is pretty bare. On November 4, 1950, we had only 117,000 persons without jobs and seeking work according to D.B.S. labour force survey. This is only two per cent of the civilian labour force at work, against a comparable figure of 13·6 per cent, 573,000, in June, 1939. Applications for employment at N.E.S. offices on December 14 were 207,000—42,000 less than at the same time the previous year.

Practically all of that is connected with the defence program. In order to get the manpower to carry on this job, men have to be siphoned off from organizations and industries that are now providing the standard of living we enjoy in Canada. We see that twenty-two per cent of Canada's total production is allocated to defence purposes. This implies that the labour force will have to be augmented. Anyone who thinks that at this time we could embark upon a program of compulsory service in the reserve forces is not being realistic, because we have not the manpower.

Then, we must think of this: we are linked up with the North Atlantic pact countries. There is danger of war in western Europe. Those countries have manpower available, and they are faced with the possibility of attack at any time. They have not the weapons with which to fight; they have not the equipment necessary to enable them properly to defend themselves. On this continent we have the productive capacity, and I believe that under present circumstances the best contribution Canada can make will be in the field of producing the arms necessary to arm the countries with which we are allied.

In the light of those facts I believe that conscription of any kind for the armed services would be impracticable. If we did accept the subamendment, through which we would be instructing the government to embark upon that kind of program, what kind of conscription would we have? I certainly would not vote to give the power to the government to conscript manpower for the services at this time. I pointed out the last time I spoke that we had a lay-off of over 3,000 automobile workers in Oshawa. Those men could be pressed into the services under economic conscription. I do not like it, and I do not want to see the government embark at this time upon that kind of program, or to possess the powers of compulsion that would enable them to pick up people who might not have jobs.

Here is something else we shall have to watch and guard against. A news dispatch from Bonn, Germany, dated February 8, indicates that 600 Germans are to be trained as miners and then brought to this country to work in the mines of northern Ontario under the supervision of the Canadian Metal Mining Association. If the whole picture with regard to conscription is not clarified, it would mean, as is suggested in this clipping, that 600 Germans could be trained as miners and put to work in the mines of Canada, and then other miners could be conscripted to be sent to Germany to fight. I am not prepared to give the government the opportunity to do that kind of thing until the picture is much clearer than it is at the present time. I should like the Minister of Labour to comment on that particular news dispatch and indicate whether that arrangement is being made with the knowledge and consent of the immigration department. I do not want to see that kind of thing happen.

That there is surplus manpower in Europe is indicated by the fact that groups such as I have mentioned can be brought to this country to work in our industries. I am not going to place myself in the position of being accused of having voted to conscript Canadians for service at a time when Europeans were being brought in to work in the industries of this country. Until the picture is much clearer in this regard I do not think this house should consider for one moment the passing of any measure of conscription for service.

I think the government has met the demands of the Legion for the mobilization of our resources and industries for defence purposes. The figures I have put on the record indicate that it is a huge program. It is going to require a lot of manpower. I think the request for national registration has been met to some degree in the setting up of the 28-member manpower council. The government has appointed to this council representatives of labour, industry and veterans and women's organizations.

Many times in the last ten years, particularly since the end of the war, I have suggested to the government that basic industries, such as steel, coal, textiles, packing houses, and so on, should be brought under the national labour code. There are good national unions represented in these industries, and industrial councils should be set up on which the unions would be represented as such. Such men would be very valuable in arranging either the reorganization of industry or the reorganization of manpower. Each of them would come to the council with full knowledge of what is going on in his particular industry. The representatives of that industry and of the union could meet with the government, and the government would thus be in possession of complete information as to what is actually happening in the industry.

The best feature of this plan would be that these men would go back to the men in the industry, who would have the assurance that their interests were being protected. They would act as liaison officers between the manpower council and the men who do the work. The workers would trust them. I am always sceptical of having my life planned by men who live in ivory towers. The government has appointed as members of this council the heads of national organizations whose offices are in Ottawa. These men are far removed from the conflicts of life. You live in a vacuum in this city; you get away from realities. The 28-member manpower council which it is proposed to set up is not representative of the men who actually do the work. The men who work in the mines, in the steel and textile plants, are going to be a little sceptical if twenty-eight men living in ivory towers in Ottawa are going to plan their lives for the next five or six years and determine what sacrifices they are to make. I repeat that there should be industrial councils set up under the national code.

Do not forget that one of the greatest dangers this country will face in time of war is sabotage. It is going to be much more difficult to prevent sabotage if the workers are directed from Ottawa to do the things they do not want to do, by people that they do not see, than it is if someone from their own ranks who has been in on the planning can assure them that their interests are being looked after, and can go back to them and say to them, "This is what has to be done". He would be their direct representative, and he would be a good agent of the board in doing this planning.

I suggest to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), under whose direction this is going to be done, that no decisions affecting any particular industry be made unless the representatives of that industry, both labour and management, are called in, and given an opportunity of saying exactly what should be done, whereupon they can go back to the workers and let them know what has been planned. I suggest to the minister that he do that.

I am against this particular amendment, for the reasons I have indicated. But you still have to do something. In the first place, you still have to build up your reserve forces. That is a must. If we are going to do it on a voluntary basis, certain steps will have to be taken to encourage men to go into the reserve forces. I want to repeat what I said the other day, that there are hundreds of older men on pensions in this country who still have productive capacity. Many would like to work, but because of the means test in connection with veterans allowances and old age pensions they are reluctant to do so; if they did, they would be taken off pension and later would have to go through all the red tape that is necessary to get their pensions back. The manpower of this country could be augmented by these aged people if this suggestion were carried out. I think they would provide a good defence mechanism at this particular time.

In the second place, women's auxiliary corps, such as we had in the last war, should be formed. Hundreds of them would come in if they were appealed to. They could replace personnel in defence headquarters and in many other departments. There are many able-bodied men who might go into the service if they could be released, because they are patriotic enough to recognize the danger that confronts the country today and want to do their duties as citizens.

Third, there are many married women who would come back into industry if they were given some income tax relief. At the present time they do not want to come into industry and earn a few hundred dollars, because by doing so they would put their husbands into the single-person bracket of the income tax. I think a proper incentive by way of tax relief should be given to married women to encourage them to go into industry.

Moreover, in order to get men to go into the reserve forces I think we must embark upon a program that will provide adequate training facilities. Today they are such as to leave much to be desired. I am not going to elaborate on that point, because last evening the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) did an excellent job, and I agree with everything he said in that respect. The equipment is very poor. In many of the barracks across the country, where the reserve army forces train, you will not find uniforms for the men. There are no shoes for them. In one particular place I saw there were all kinds of shoes if your size was eleven or six, but there was nothing between sizes six and eleven. It was not good to see a fellow going along with size seven feet in size eleven shoes. He was not doing a very good job of marching. I think the equipment has to be examined.

My fourth suggestion is that the income of $150, $200 or $300 received by reserve army personnel for attending all the drills, and so forth, is taxable. A lot of men do not join the reserve forces for that reason. A boy may be earning $1,500 or $1,600 a year. If he enters the reserve army, takes training, and augments his income by $300 or $400, it shoves him up into another income tax bracket, and he is taking all that training for the income tax department. They take all the money back from him. If you are going to encourage young fellows to take army training, such income should be exempt for income tax purposes. There must be some proper incentive, and unless these things are done we are not going to be able to build up the reserve army.

If the four steps that I have mentioned are taken, I think the requirements of the brief of the Canadian Legion will be met. They presented their brief for the purpose of arousing public opinion. They have succeeded, and it has created a lot of discussion in the house. We all know something more about the situation. Discussion would not have taken place in this house and throughout the country if the Legion had not seen fit to publish their brief. I think the government has met two of their requirements. They cannot meet one of the others, because there is not the manpower to conscript. The reserve army can be built up if the things we have suggested here are done.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on their excellent performances on the occasion of their first speeches in the house. Since coming to Ottawa I have been considerably encouraged by the speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). Their speeches indicate that the government has finally wakened to the danger of the world situation and the necessity it imposes on us to increase our defences considerably. As one who has urged this course for the past three years, I welcome the announcement of the Minister of National Defence that our armed forces are to be materially increased, with the particular aim of bringing into being fully equipped forces which will be ready to fight, something in which we have been especially deficient.

The rapidly changing events in Korea and the Far East have occupied the minds of our people to a large extent in the past six or seven months, and have in some degree obscured the more important general picture. They have also led to a good deal of confused thinking. During the short session last September I stated that the basic situation then was no different from what it had been for some time prior to the Korean outbreak, and I still think that is true. Of course the intervention of the Chinese in the Korean war has made the threat of the outbreak of a general world war much greater than it was then.

In considering the world situation, there are four or five important facts that I think we should always keep in mind. All of them have been mentioned at some time or other in various speeches already made during the present session, but I do not think they are generally realized throughout the country; therefore I should like to make a few comments on each one.

First, the Russian communists are engaged in a program of world domination. This view was expressed in the speech from the throne, in the following terms:

> The increased menace in the Far East reinforces the mounting evidence that communist imperialism is determined to dominate the world by force or the fear of force . . .

What this means is that we are in a war now, and in fact in a war of survival. Let us not fool ourselves on that point. It has been called a lukewarm war up to the moment, and because we have been fortunate enough not to come to a red-hot war, a full world conflagration, a great many people still seem to think that we are not in a war at all, and will not be for many years. In other words, there is no sense of urgency among a large number of our people. I think to a considerable extent the government is responsible for this attitude. Members of the cabinet have been making soothing and reassuring speeches on the matter for years, culminating in the Prime Minister's statement that he did not expect war in his lifetime and that he expected to live for a good number of years—which I trust will be the case.

Of course that is the kind of statement that most people like to hear. It justifies them in sitting back with a sense of complacency and saying that there is no need for them to do anything very much about the defence effort. They say: If the Prime Minister thinks there is not going to be war for several years, why should we worry about it? I do not understand how the government can expect a wholehearted defence effort from our people, in the face of statements that merely encourage them to stick their heads in the sand and to disregard the realities of the situation.

The second fact we should keep in mind is that the only thing that will prevent the Russians from carrying out their designs is superior military power on the part of the western nations. In other words, the only hope of peace is rearmament on our part and on the part of our allies. If the worst happens, and war does come, such a course of rearmament is vital to us if we are to survive. I think this has now been realized by all the democratic nations. Certainly the United States and Great Britain are engaged now in gigantic rearmament programs. However, there seems to be a frightening disinclination on the part of some of the nations of the west to make the sacrifices which full rearmament involves. I am afraid there is an undercurrent of thought to this effect: Let somebody else do it. Not the least guilty of the nations in that regard is Canada. We have not been pulling our full weight in the common defence effort, and apparently the government is still not prepared to do so.

I do not wish to weary the house with a mass of figures to show that this is the case, but I should like to put on the record a few which I think establish it. They are found in the issue of Newsweek of February 5. I wish to refer to an article headed, "Who is giving Ike the most help?", and under that there is a chart with the heading, "Is the burden being shared?" This shows in graphic form the comparative efforts of the nations of the Atlantic pact in regard to manpower and economic effort. As to the manpower effort, the chart shows the number of servicemen per 1,000 of population, and the figures are as follows:

France	17
United States	15
Britain	14
Belgium	12
The Netherlands	11
Portugal	8
Norway	8
Denmark	7
Italy	7
Luxembourg	5
Canada	4

In other words Canada is last; we are the worst of all the allies. These figures were taken as of the end of the year. I cannot vouch for their accuracy, except so far as Canada is concerned. I worked them out for this country and the number is correct; therefore I am quite sure the figures are correct for the other countries as well. Three years hence, if the plans announced by the Minister of National Defence are carried through, our manpower figure on this basis will go up to almost 8 per thousand. By that time, however, the figure for the United States will be up to 23, and the figures for the other countries will be up also. So there is no indication that we are prepared to pull our weight with our allies in the matter of manpower.

We have had a considerable number of speeches by the Prime Minister and supporters of the government to the effect that Canada could make a better contribution to the common cause by producing essential materials and armaments than by supplying military units; but let us look at the figures concerning the economic effort. These are prepared in the form of the percentage of the gross national product which is being devoted to defence expenditures. The gross national product, as I think most people know, is the value of all goods and services sold or produced in the country; and when we look at that figure this is what we see:

	Per cent
United States	16
Britain	10·3
France	8·2
Italy	6·3
The Netherlands	5·1
Belgium	4·6
Norway	4·4
Canada	4·4
Denmark	3·4
Luxembourg	3·3
Portugal	3·0

Mr. Claxton: That of course was before the recent announcement of the increased program.

Mr. Harkness: I said this was as at the end of last year.

Mr. Claxton: The figures are not accurate, either.

Mr. Harkness: This shows that in economic effort also, at the end of the year we stood eighth, and that our effort was only 27 per cent of the United States effort. That is not a very creditable record in the economic field, or anything we can boast about.

The minister has indicated that these figures do not take into account the increases he announced. I have already said that in connection with manpower those increases would bring the figure for Canada up to 8, which would still be very low in comparison with the figures for many of our allies. Our percentage from the economic point of view will also go up, but so will the percentages for the other countries. They will by no means stand still, or at least we hope not; and they have already announced greatly increased efforts in that direction. I think we cannot escape the conclusion that the government is not meeting the realities of the present situation in the plans it has announced so far.

The third point I should like to make is that the potential strength of the western world is much superior to that of the communists. We have much greater resources of vital military materials, such as metals, oil, rubber and so on; and equally important, we have the industrial plant to convert these materials into armaments. This means that, if we have the will to do so, we can build up a much stronger war machine than our enemy. But potential strength is no good; it must be converted into actual armaments in the hands of men trained and ready to use them. It seems to me that so far the government has not displayed the will to do this, and is still stumbling along with half measures.

The fourth point I wish to make is that in any contest between the communists and the western democracies, the vital strategic area is in Europe. There are really in the world four great concentrations of industrial power: the North American continent, western Europe, Russia, and Japan, in that order of importance. At the present time the west has three of them. Our industrial potential is very much greater than that of Russia, but if Russia should move into western Europe and have undisturbed possession of that industrial plant for a few years, we would be in an extremely dangerous position. The situation then would be that the communist industrial potential probably would be equal to and perhaps even greater than our own. That is a situation we dare not permit to come about.

To defend Europe I think there is no doubt that we need German manpower. I first argued in favour of this in this house some two years ago, and since that time, I am glad to say, it has been adopted as a policy by the Atlantic pact nations. I regret, however, that difficulties have arisen in carrying that policy into effect. Those difficulties include the attitude of the Germans themselves; but I was particularly sorry to hear that policy questioned during this debate by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I hope our government will continue to press for the adoption of the policy of German rearmament.

To reiterate what I have said on several previous occasions, in this struggle with communism we should accept all the allies we can find. Particularly I think we should come to an agreement with Spain and make use of the strategic position of that country, the best on the continent of Europe. We should include it as part of the defences of the west against the communist conquest of the world. Apparently there is a strong move in that direction at the present time. I am glad to see that the United States and Spain have exchanged ambassadors, and I would hope that the other Atlantic pact countries might do the same thing, and in that way help the Spanish people strengthen their bastion, which, if the worst came to the worst, is probably the only area in Europe which could be held in the immediate future.

My fifth point is that in meeting communist aggression it is essential that we have unity among the western powers. I have been greatly disturbed by the differences which have developed between the Atlantic pact countries and other members of the United Nations over Korea and the treatment of China. Differences of opinion as to the course to be followed are bound to exist between democratic countries; that is one of the essentials of the democratic system. However, only harm can come from attacks on the good faith or wisdom of the leaders of the different countries. The United States is by far the most powerful of the western countries, and has been carrying almost the whole burden of the Korean war. It is only to be expected that she should have a major voice in the conduct of that war, and in the decisions made in regard to it. We would expect the same thing as far as the French are concerned in Indo-China and the same thing as far as the British are concerned in Malaya. However, not for a minute do I think that we or the others of the allies of the United States should refrain from putting forth our ideas or giving our advice as to the course to be followed. But this is a different matter altogether from personal attacks on General MacArthur and other United States leaders. It should always be remembered by all of us that General MacArthur is a national hero in the United States; and bitter attacks on him, such as those made by persons and newspapers in this country and Great Britain, serve only to cause anger and bitterness on the part of the people of the United States. They serve no good purpose whatever, and I greatly deplore the fact that that type of attack has been going on. I would hope that in this country at least we shall have no more of it. The important thing for us to remember is not to let our differences divide us and thus prevent our making the united all-out effort which is needed to preserve our independence and our existence as a free people.

I should now like to say something about the defence program announced by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) on February 5. It proposes to give us, three years hence, a regular force of 115,000 men, with the major emphasis in this defence build-up on the air arm. With that emphasis I agree. For the past two years the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and others of us in this party have urged a policy of that kind. The first question that came to my mind after the minister's speech was this: Will his program give us the minimum forces necessary for the defence of Canada and to meet our commitments under the United Nations and the Atlantic pact? I would respectfully suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it will do neither. It is not sufficient from either point of view, so far as I can see. When the Korean war broke out in June we had only one battalion up to strength, trained and equipped. We had only one battalion at that time ready for service overseas or, more important than that, ready to meet any attack which might have developed on this country.

Since that time we have raised the special force which is now in training in the United States, with one battalion of it, the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, now probably at this very moment committed to action in Korea. In Canada, however, for our own immediate defence we still have only one brigade and that is all; that is the regular army or airborne brigade as it is ordinarily called. I sincerely hope that that force is now up to strength, but we do not know whether it is or not. The minister has not yet said so.

The program the minister set forth calls for the dispatch of a brigade group to Europe, presumably the one training at Fort Lewis. It provides for a total force the equivalent, he said, of one division. This would mean that we would have the equivalent of two brigade groups in Canada. However, to get that number more units must be raised, particularly in artillery regiments which we are definitely short of. What the word "equivalent" means needs elaboration. Are we to have two brigade groups in Canada or are we to be held to one now in being and some scattered units, having all together the number of men or the strength to make up a brigade group? That is a question to which we should have an answer.

As to the regular brigade group, as we have pointed out before on this side of the house it is a misnomer really to call it a brigade group. The units of that so-called brigade group have never trained together as a brigade; and, unless it has been done recently, they have had no brigade headquarters which has trained as such. That is another thing which should be done immediately. Headquarters should be set up and the brigade should get some training as a brigade.

I think that the very minimum that we need now in Canada is three brigade groups; that is, actually in the country. But the program announced by the minister does not even call for that number in three years, if we are fortunate enough to have that length of time to get them ready. In my own view they will probably be needed less urgently in three years than they will be needed in the next nine months. If we get through the next three years without war, and if the Russians have not struck in that length of time, I think there is an excellent chance that they will not strike at all; because by then the western world will be so strong militarily that the enemy will not dare to move.

Another question which came to my mind following the minister's speech is this. How rapidly is the program to be implemented? How many ships will we have in commission by the end of 1951? How many air force squadrons will we have in being, how many men equipped with planes and trained to use them will we have by that time? What will be the situation of the army by the end of 1951? The same questions apply with regard to all those three services at the end of 1952. What is to be the rate of implementation? That is another matter on which I hope the minister will elaborate in a later speech.

The most important question of all which came to my mind was this. How does the minister propose to get the men required? In his speech he stated that during the six months up to the end of 1950 there had been a net increase of 14,893; but of this total I believe over 11,000 were for the special force, which leaves a gain for the three regular forces of under 4,000 men. This is a rate of gain of about 8,000 men per year, which is not half enough to meet the program outlined. It is just a little bit more than a third of enough to meet that program. It must also be borne in mind that the special force was enlisted on a short-term basis of eighteen months. That means that within less than a year now the term of those men will be up, and there is no doubt that a good number of them will then leave the service, always on the assumption that by that time no general war has developed. That means of course that there will be another big gap to be made up there in relation to what you might call the regular rate of enlistment, in order to get sufficient men.

The minister assured us in his speech that the rate of recruitment is satisfactory, although what I have just said would cast some considerable doubt on that statement; but the minister has been assuring us of that for the past three years. Every year we have been told here that recruiting has been satisfactory. In spite of those assurances we know how defenceless we were when the Korean war developed, some seven or eight months ago. In my opinion the rate of recruitment is far from satisfactory, and unless the government impresses on our people much more strongly than they have yet done the urgency of the situation, I am much afraid that the 115,000-man defence force will never be reached. It certainly does not look like it at the present moment. As a matter of fact, how can one expect young men to be impressed with the need for them in our forces when the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) makes the statements he has made with regard to no war in his time, that Lloyd's are betting fifty to one against war by September, and things of that kind? Nothing better could be designed to discourage recruiting than statements of that kind.

The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made a much better statement here on February 1 in regard to manpower. It was a reasonable statement, but it should be followed up at once with a scheme of national registration, so that if the government does find that methods other than the ones now being used are necessary to provide us with the manpower required for defence purposes, either in the forces or in war industries, they will know what the manpower of this country is, where it is, and how it can be best used. Such a step would also enable them speedily to put any change of plan into execution.

All these things take time, and now is the time to take the preliminary steps, not when the emergency develops. National registration should be embarked on at once. A manpower advisory council has been set up. Perhaps this body is the government's first step in a national registration scheme. I do not know, because they have not told us that. What its purpose is, otherwise, is a little difficult for me to understand, because certainly for the council to be able to advise the government properly on manpower such a national survey is necessary. I cannot see that the council can do much otherwise.

The minister did not say much in his speech about the reserve forces. However, as far as the army is concerned particularly, it is these forces which would be largely responsible for the immediate defence of Canada if war broke out, and which would provide the framework for mobilization. The minister has given us optimistic reports on the conditions of the reserve units during the past three years, and has sought to give the impression that they were in a satisfactory state. The contrary view expressed by members of this party, that reserve units for the most part were inefficient and ineffective because of lack of sufficient men, has now been fully borne out by the report and recommendations of the conference of defence associations, which held its annual meeting only a short time ago.

This conference is composed of representatives from all the military associations, the Armoured Corps Association, the Artillery Association, the Infantry and Army Service Corps, and so on. The men who compose the council of defence associations are the brigadiers in command of reserve brigades and the commanding officers of reserve units—regiments, battalions and so on. They are the men in closest touch with the situation so far as the reserve force is concerned, and they are the men whose advice as to the situation, the efficiency and the needs of that force we must take. I do not think there is any use guessing about the thing and saying that this is the case, or that. These men have made a report and recommendations, and I think that much weight should be attached to it. Part of their report has already been put on the records of this house, so I will not repeat it except for this sentence:

> To say that the reserve force is 40,000 strong, and to give the Canadian people the idea that it has 40,000 men who could quickly be ready for action, is a travesty of the facts.

This is a very strong condemnation of the speeches and statements the minister has been making about the reserve forces for the past two years.

In another place the report states:

> It is our considered and unanimous opinion that proper value is not being received for much of the public moneys now being spent on the reserve force.

That has been one of our contentions here in the house. We have said that a great deal of money spent by the Department of National Defence was being wasted. We have never been loath to vote money for national defence. There has never been any question about the amount of any estimate. We have urged that it be increased, but we have maintained that a great deal of the money was being wasted, and now the reserve forces people themselves have come out and said that the situation in the reserve is indeed unsatisfactory.

The report then goes on to make recommendations and it makes them in these terms:

> If it is not to be Canadian policy to lean on our allies in the initial stages of a war—and we are satisfied that the national pride of our people will tolerate no such situation—then men must be made available for training now. This will involve a national registration system and the introduction of an enforceable and enforced system of selective service for the reserve force. Only in this way will the reserve force obtain the men it needs, the training it must have, and the effectiveness which the Canadian people are entitled to expect in view of the expenditures. Only in this way can we build a reserve force to which Canada can look with confidence.

Included in that policy was a resolution along these very lines which reads:

> Resolved that in the opinion of this conference it is vital to the security of Canada that the government introduce immediately a policy of selective training in the reserve force.

Well, there is the evidence of the men most qualified to know what the situation of the reserve force is, and what should be done in order to make it an effective force.

The Canadian Legion has also made recommendations of the same kind in the brief they submitted to the government. I should like to take this opportunity of complimenting them and commending them for their stand and for their campaign called "operation preparedness". It has done more than anything else to bring our defence needs to the attention of the general public. In view of what I have said it is needless to say that I support the Legion brief completely.

This matter of compulsory training in the reserve forces is not a new thing so far as I am concerned. I made a speech in the house two or three years ago in which I advocated that very course. I think that probably I was the first one in Canada to do so publicly. My opinions as to the need for it, and what it will accomplish, have really not changed since that time. As a matter of fact, I think the need has increased. At that time I stated the reasons in some detail as to why I thought this was the only method by which we could provide the minimum defences we need in Canada, without at the same time withdrawing large numbers of men from industry, and also which we could provide at comparatively low cost.

This afternoon the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) spoke for a considerable time about the fact that compulsory training in the reserve forces was not practicable because it would withdraw too many men from industry. One of the features of it is that it does not withdraw men from industry; it leaves men in the jobs in which they are, and it calls upon them to train one or two nights a week, and then during the summer to spend two weeks or thereabouts at a summer camp. That is the particular feature of the scheme which makes it of the greatest value to Canada where manpower is one of our great questions. It does not withdraw men from industry; it leaves them at their jobs; it enables them to carry on in their normal life. The entire speech of the hon. member for Cape Breton South in that regard was away off the mark. He apparently does not understand the idea of the scheme, or what the scheme is, or he would not have spoken as he did.

It is very easy to say that such a scheme is not practicable, and to point out difficulties in regard to putting it into execution. But all these difficulties could be met if there was the will to meet them. That is what we lack. There is no doubt that such a scheme would give us reserve forces which would be effective, something which we must have if this country is to have just even the minimum of defence protection which it requires.

To look at the matter from another point of view, if no such scheme is put into operation, what is the alternative? It is, practically, I would suggest, to leave ourselves without forces for the immediate defence of this country, and without the framework upon which to mobilize in the event that war should develop. There is no use fooling ourselves any longer. That is what we have been doing for the last two or three years—fooling ourselves that the present reserve force can fulfil those functions. The men in charge of the reserve force have themselves said that they cannot fulfil those functions. If we are to have a reserve force at all, then we must take steps to increase the numbers in it. Far from a large increase in the reserve force by some compulsory means serving to lull the country into a false sense of security, it would actually give it some real security. At the present time we have no security because we have nothing there to provide it.

The argument has been made that compulsory training in the reserve force would make it impossible to have regular units in being, ready for immediate action, and that that is what we need most. I do not think such an argument will stand up for one moment. The present reserve units have considerable numbers of officers and N.C.O.'s who served throughout the war and have been in the reserve force since. They are quite capable of training their own units. They do not need to take large numbers of instructors from the permanent force. As a matter of fact most units do not need to take any instructors from the permanent force. They can carry on their own training by themselves. The mobilizations in 1914 and 1939 show that that is so.

When they mobilized in 1939 in Calgary neither my unit nor any other unit of which I am aware had permanent force instructors. We did not have any; we did all our own training ourselves. The same thing can be done so far as the reserve force is concerned. Any idea that we must put thousands of men from the permanent force in as instructors to train the reserve army was disproved by our whole experience in the last two wars.

Another point is that, undoubtedly, a large number of our young men in our reserve force would help recruiting for the regular force. These young men, after some training in the army, the navy, the air force or whatever branch of the service might be chosen, would become interested in military affairs, and I am convinced that a good many of them would wish to make such service a career. I am convinced that, rather than endanger our regular force, a scheme of this kind would greatly help it.

The question of cost has been mentioned. According to men who know best, money being spent on the reserves is largely wasted. I believe there is no doubt it would be much better to spend more and to get something effective and worth while, rather than fool ourselves and waste money as we are doing at the present time. I believe everyone admits that, if we are placed in a position where we have to defend ourselves against an aggressor, we must spend the funds necessary to do so. There is no reluctance on that point in any part of the house or country, so far as I know. People are willing to have the money spent that is needed for our defence requirements.

Furthermore, as I said earlier in my remarks, we are not spending at anything like the rate of our allies. We are still not pulling our weight. I do not think this would cost a greatly increased sum of money each year. True, it would be considerable, but I do not think it would be unreasonably great; and it would certainly be much cheaper to have a reserve force capable of doing something than to adopt any other means. It would bring our effort more into line with that of our allies.

Equipment has been mentioned, and the statement made that even if the men were mobilized there is no equipment for them. According to the minister's own statement in the speech he delivered a few days ago there is equipment in Canada sufficient for four divisions. I think that equipment would go some considerable distance toward equipping the men who would be raised by this method, if such a scheme were put into operation. I suggest therefore that the argument with respect to equipment falls to the ground.

In closing let me say that I shall support the amendment offered by the leader of this party, and I shall also support the subamendment calling for defence preparedness and compulsory service in the reserve force.

Mr. John Hunter (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to enter this debate; but when the amendment to the amendment was moved I felt that perhaps I should, in view of the fact that I had had some slight knowledge of the reserve force.

I can only conclude after reading the subamendment that it could have been moved only for one of two reasons, either because of very bad advice, or for political reasons. I would not for one moment suggest that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) would do anything for political reasons, so I must conclude that he was badly advised.

To begin with, I consider the subamendment is most unhappily worded, and its intent is no more satisfying. It shows a lack of understanding of the reserve force which could only be acquired through years of neglecting to study the subject. In the reserve army, which at no time was ever designed for compulsory training, it would be quite impossible under its present set-up to have compulsory training. It would produce great inequalities throughout the country, and would not result in the desired effect.

The evening training, of about two hours' duration an evening, has very limited value, except to those people who join it voluntarily and have some enthusiasm for the subject. If anyone can tell me how people can learn to become soldiers by devoting two hours one or two evenings each week—when anyone who knows anything about the army knows that it takes at least six months' full-time training to train troops—then I should like to hear about it. I should think that anyone who would make such a suggestion would not know what he was talking about. The answer is that this training is for voluntary enthusiasts who will come to parades in an effort to learn something in the short time available.

To take large numbers of troops and bring them into a reserve army would result in a waste of money and a loss of efficiency and manpower. The only possible way in which the reserve army could be used for training would be to give a longer period of full-time training which, in turn, would take them away from industry.

It is true that the officers and N.C.O.'s in the reserve army could be used for training troops; but definitely they could not be used to train the number of troops which would be involved. For instance in the city of Toronto, a city which, with its suburbs, has a population of about a million people, we have the Royal Regiment of Canada, the Irish Regiment of Canada, the Toronto Scottish, the Queen's Own Rifles, the 48th Highlanders. Those are the infantry units of that city. If we were to take the number of people who would be eligible for the training suggested it is obvious that those units could not possibly contain the number of troops involved. It might be necessary to form perhaps another dozen units in that city, and go through the same involved scheme of building them up. In turn, many more armouries, more drill halls and more places in which to train would be required.

The scheme is fantastic. In addition to all this, when one goes out to the countryside he finds that in many districts there are no facilities for the training of reserve units. The unit would have to be formed, a drill hall built—the start would have to be made from scratch. In some sections it would be possible to give some slight training while in others it would be impossible. Surely the whole basis of a compulsory training scheme is that there shall be equitable training throughout the country.

I was pleased to listen yesterday to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). He gave us a very able, statesmanlike and detached address to which it was a pleasure to listen. For a time I began to think that the Progressive Conservative party might have altered; but, oh no, I find it was just one member of the Conservative party who perhaps has not altered but has expounded a very able and sound view. After listening to the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) I am convinced that the Progressive Conservative party has not changed in any way.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Wait and see.

Mr. Hunter: If the hon. member wishes to make a speech I will sit down and he can carry on. There is one thing about the Conservative party that delights me. The members are delightfully consistent in their supreme faith in their ability as strategists and senior officers. It seems to be something that is ingrained in their protoplasm. I could write their speeches myself and I would be delighted to do so for a nominal fee. I am sure they would contain everything the hon. gentlemen would like to have. I could write them from memory without even drawing a draft.

Mr. Rowe: The hon. member is not offering a very good advertisement.

Mr. Hunter: I am pleased to have the hon. gentleman present and I am glad he came into the chamber for my speech. Let me get back again to the hon. member for Calgary East. He went into quite a discourse as to the use of the reserve army for compulsory military training. I had the honour to command a reserve unit for two years and I think I have some knowledge of the problems that must be met. I spent some time studying those problems. I had the rather unusual honour of commanding our unit after returning from overseas in this war and my father commanded the same unit after his return from the first war.

In referring to the hon. member for Calgary East I do not wish to be personal in any way but I am forced to conclude that his lack of knowledge is exceeded only by his lack of knowledge of his lack of knowledge. If you are going to train troops on a permanent basis obviously you will have to have some sort of selective service scheme. Surely anyone who knows anything about the needs and complexities and difficulties of training, the enormous amount of equipment and material required, must realize that if you are going to train and fit troops for the field it must be done on a full-time basis. The reserve army provides a means of giving enthusiasts a knowledge of the basic training so that when they go into active service they can be got ready much more quickly. That is the obvious basis of the whole reserve army.

If you are going to increase the numbers of the reserve army, unquestionably you will have to increase the number of units, the amount of equipment and everything else. In my opinion the suggestion which has been made is a very unhappy one and is not at all sound from the standpoint of efficient training or the efficient use of manpower.

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to say anything more in connection with manpower, but because of the amendment that has been moved I think I should say a few words at this time. I was much impressed with the speech yesterday of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and I should like to congratulate him upon what I think was a very fair speech. I may have provoked him but I admire him for the fact that he took it in good part. No doubt he has had criticism behind the curtains and in the lobby, but he gave a most constructive speech in a fair and able manner. I only wish I had the extensive knowledge of military affairs possessed by the hon. gentleman.

The government might do well to take a little advice from hon. members who have had experience, such as the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg) and the member for Nanaimo. We happen to be fortunate in this house in having two men who could not have reached the rank or obtained the decorations they did without outstanding military ability.

I think everyone knows what I said the other day about manpower and the reserve army, but lest there be any misunderstanding on the matter I should like to quote from page 204 of Hansard of February 8 as follows:

> I say tonight that I believe we should have compulsory service for the reserve army.

Then in the next column:

> That is as far as I can go. I have made my stand here tonight with respect to compulsory service, so far as the reserve army is concerned.

I could go on to conscription, and probably I had better have that on the record as well. I said, and I quote from page 205 of Hansard:

> My stand on conscription, when speaking before the Legion, as it is tonight, is that I think it neither desirable nor practicable nor necessary at this time.

I still think that. I am perfectly satisfied with the stand taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as to what action will be taken if and when it is necessary. I should like to go back to June 16, 1942, and quote what was said then by the Prime Minister, as follows:

> I am convinced that we all want to win the war and that we are all prepared to submit to any measure which may be absolutely necessary. No thinking person can therefore have any objection to the government resorting to conscription for overseas service in the event of absolute necessity.

I did not have the privilege of hearing the Prime Minister when he spoke at the opening of this session, but I have read his speech in Hansard. The rest of you probably heard him speak. I think he made it perfectly clear just what would be done in so far as manpower is concerned if and when it was absolutely necessary to have conscription for the safeguarding of our country. Perhaps we on this side of the house should have more confidence in the Prime Minister than those on the other side. Frankly, I would not be here nor would ninety per cent of the members on this side if it were not for the leader we had. Make no mistake about that.

I have every confidence that if and when the need should arise he will not fail to take whatever steps are necessary. I am still of the opinion that some action should be taken in connection with the reserve army. With all respect to them, I perhaps do not have as much confidence in the reserve army as some hon. members do. But if we are to have a reserve army they should have sufficient manpower with which to work. We should not have the situation referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) of five officers and four men on parade.

I am afraid we are not going to obtain the necessary results by voluntary methods. But greater efforts should be made to get men into the reserve army. I know in my own district these men could meet certain nights in the week and spend more time in the summer with their training.

The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) said the other day, and for once I agree with him, that there is no reason why the boys attending college or high school should not be getting training. I know that in my district, which is the purest district in the Dominion of Canada, these boys would be better off if they were taking reserve army training two or three nights a week. This would not be training for the benefit of Canada, for the benefit of their own province or for the benefit of their own riding, it would be training to save their whole way of life. They would be much better off getting that training than attending dances, going to bowling alleys, or following the more enjoyable pursuit we have in western Canada called parking.

I appreciate that it is perhaps not practicable to carry on reserve army training in all parts of Canada at all times of the year. I do not know how it could be done in many parts of Saskatchewan at this time of the year, nor do I think it would be practicable in the northern parts of my own province. I am willing to concede that.

I believe that some method could and should be adopted to augment the services of the reserve army. I know that what I am going to say might not meet the approval of some people. Certain papers might give me a little more favourable report if I took a different stand to that which I take at the present time. During the last war I had the experience of being present in the house during the special session when we had to decide the question of manpower. It would take too long to go through the whole story but I suggest to hon. members that they check what happened in Hansard. Once more I am losing all the Hansards I have around here, but if they will check what I said on page 6868 of Hansard for December 6, 1944, they will see the stand I took at that time, and I have exactly the same opinion now. I hope some of the new members will take the trouble to look it up.

I had to go against my party at that time, together with two other colleagues. I sat in the rump then, and after I was through speaking I had the great honour of the prime minister of the day coming over, tapping me on the shoulder, and sitting down with me behind the curtain and talking with me for half an hour. I was told by older members that, so far as they could remember, it was the first time it had happened in the history of the house. Usually prime ministers do not cross to the rump to talk to backbenchers. Afterwards we shook hands but nobody knows yet what the then prime minister and I talked about for that period of time.

I still believe that some form of compulsory service could be put into effect to strengthen the reserve army. If the Department of National Defence would become modernized and live in the age in which we are living, I believe there would be a far greater number of voluntary enlistments in the regular army. I had the privilege of accompanying the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) when he visited our part of the country. I do not say this from a partisan point of view but I do not believe that we have ever had a harder working, more able and conscientious minister than the present one. I think I know something about such matters. I did not say it before but I think I know something about soldiering. I accompanied the minister to the airport within my riding. Incidentally, it is as fine an airport as we have in Canada, and I am also of the opinion that our engineering camp is the finest in Canada.

I pointed out to the minister one little thing he could do to encourage enlistment in that very camp. At the present time there are some 200 houses for married men; the government is in the real estate business and rents the houses to them. The government should not be in the real estate business, and I believe that the Department of National Defence should cut the rent of those houses in half tomorrow, particularly for those soldiers who are privates. We should not attempt to make money through renting houses to men who want to enlist and make it their life's work. One man at that camp who did not have the advantage of an education is now spending $2 an hour two nights a week from his own pocket to increase his knowledge of mathematics so as to improve his position in the service. He has two small children, and after he has finished his army work for the day he works five nights a week in a service station in order to support his family. When such men will enlist in the regular army, surely the government can get out of the real estate business, cut the rent and make enlistment more attractive to them.

There are many other ways in which we can make it more attractive. I was very glad to see that we have reduced our so-called standard for officers. If, God forbid, another war should come I hope the Department of National Defence will take their officers from the ranks as we did in the first great war and not men from the Moler barber college, Wellesley college, Rhodes scholars, and so on. I hope they will take men who qualify for promotion on the battlefronts, as was the case in the first great war.

I want to be brief because I have spoken on this matter before. I said I would support the Canadian Legion's demand for compulsory service in the reserve army. I will support it if the matter can be brought before me in the form that the Legion desires it. My good friends over there, quite sincerely from their point of view, moved an amendment which in my opinion does not represent the desires of the Canadian Legion at all. Let me tell you what I think about it. I think it would just bring about another—and I will use the word although some people do not like it—zombie army and divide Canada as it has never been divided before. It would not be an army that could go and defend us if and when it should become necessary. As another speaker has said, those who moved the amendment have not adopted the attitude they should have. We do not want to have a war in Ontario, British Columbia or Quebec. If we have to fight a war we want to fight it as far away as we can, and we want reinforcements suitable for that purpose.

As I understand it, the amendment would just mean the creation of another zombie army. We would have nothing but dissatisfaction. We know from experience that in the past we could not get such men to even go up to the Aleutians. We know that we had trouble to try to get them on the boats to go over as reinforcements. Therefore let us not divide Canada again in this critical time. Another point brought out yesterday was that we are endeavouring to secure sufficient reinforcements for our armed forces in Korea and possibly elsewhere. In my opinion you can never obtain the reinforcements if you take what available manpower there is and put it by compulsion in another zombie army. That is all such an army would amount to. If we follow that course we will not have reinforcements available. We will not have men for the air force which, as every member with any military knowledge knows, would be the most important part of our armed forces if and when another war comes. The air arm is the force to which we will have to look.

We can never secure airmen by compulsion. Any military man knows that. If we drain off the available manpower for another reserve army for service in Canada only I believe we will defeat the very end that every hon. member in all good faith intends to support.

I wanted to make my stand clear, and I still stand by what I said before. If it is possible in any way to recruit strength for the reserve army now—not for defence in Canada only—I would support it. As it is, I am going to oppose the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. H. H. W. Beyerstein (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, my remarks in this debate will be very brief. I merely wish to take this opportunity to endorse what has already been said by other members of our group concerning the necessity of implementing price and wage controls, and the necessity for supporting a preparedness program for the defence of Canada. The subject of price controls was thoroughly covered by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) when he spoke in this debate a few days ago; therefore it is not necessary for me to deal further with it at this time. I merely wish to endorse the facts that he presented when he spoke.

I should like to take a few moments, however, to discuss the question of preparedness in case of a national emergency. I feel that we should give full support to the preparedness program submitted by the Canadian Legion. At the present time the government leaders seem to have divided opinions concerning a program of national preparedness. For example, I have here a clipping from the Calgary Herald of December 30, 1950, which quotes the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) as having said:

> The situation is of course very serious, but I have said a good many times that I didn't expect to live long enough to see another world war—and I haven't changed my view.

One has no way of determining how long the Prime Minister intends to live, but in view of the statements of some of the other ministers one may conclude that the Prime Minister was either talking for home consumption or he has lost hope of living to a very great age. On February 8, 1951, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) took part in this debate, and at page 179 of Hansard had this to say:

> Since parliament met last autumn, world events have moved swiftly. Canada, with the rest of the free world, has had to revise its schedule of preparedness. The challenge of aggressive communism leaves no choice but to move ahead at once, and quickly, with defence preparations planned on a scale never before contemplated except in time of all-out war.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

I think that statement gives us a clearer picture of what we are facing at the present time, so I think there can be no doubt about the reasonableness and soundness of the program which has been presented by the Canadian Legion. I say there should be no delay in adopting that program. The Legion program, "Operation preparedness", consists of three parts. The first point is a request for national registration. I agree with the Legion that it is necessary to efficiently organize the resources and manpower of this country. The value of national registration in connection with the control of aliens and subversive elements was demonstrated in world war II, and I believe that is a point which should be implemented at the very earliest opportunity.

The second point in the program is the mobilization of industry and resources for defence production. There is no doubt that present supplies are inadequate to meet any increased enlistment in the active and reserve forces. If this situation is allowed to continue until the need arises the ultimate result will be that our hastily mobilized forces will not only be poorly trained but will be tragically lacking in equipment with which to meet an enemy which has been trained since youth, and which would be completely ruthless. Without adequate training it would be very difficult to cope with such an enemy.

The third point in the Legion program is compulsory training in the reserve forces. We must have a definite program which will prevent a repetition of our bitter experience in world war II, when Canadian citizens were committed to battle without adequate training. I am sure not a member of this house would want to see his son in the active army. If that should ever become necessary, however, I am sure he would want his son to have training which would enable him to defend not only himself but his home and his country.

Those are the three main parts of the Legion program. I think we should endorse them wholeheartedly and lose no time in implementing them. If war should come it is highly probable that the Russians would send considerable forces to Alaska, no doubt accompanied by bands of tough Siberian troops who would be landed by air in the Canadian north. Their object in doing this would be to create confusion and alarm, in the hope that it would prevent us from sending troops and material abroad. A second purpose would be to pinpoint our attention on the defence of North America while they extended their hold on Asia and Europe, with ultimately a life and death struggle for possession of this continent. A third purpose in occupying Alaska would be to hamper the development of our resources. The present lack of population and communications in the north country is a direct threat to the security of this continent. Even the well-advertised Alaska highway is not an all-weather military road, and that is another point which should be considered in the near future.

The problems I have mentioned are too vital to be made a political football, and I challenge the government and some members of the opposition to face the issue. There are those who believe the next war will not require armies, that it will be a push button war. Their idea is that if we have more atomic bombs than the Russians we can win a war within a few days. Those who hold that opinion should take a lesson from Hitler, who thought he could grab Russia in one short blitz. He found he could not, and failed miserably in that attempt. Hitler was surprised to find that Russia could suffer more than five million casualties in the first six months of the war and still muster sufficient forces for counter-offensives which lasted through most of the winter of 1941-42. The Russians are ruthless in their fighting and we must be prepared to meet them. There is no doubt that they would make an attempt to invade Alaska if it should reach the point of war, and I say we should be prepared to meet that emergency.

Then we must have a program of home defence; and in drawing up such a program the utmost care should be taken to come as close as possible to equality of service and sacrifice. There must be no room for such dodges or subterfuges as renting a quarter section of land, or obtaining a false certificate in business. Our program should be made as nearly equitable as possible.

These are the main points that prompted me to take part in this debate. There is one other small matter I should like to mention, however; that is the growing concern over the abolition of rent control. At present approximately a million people in Canada are under the protection of rent control. If that protection should suddenly be removed we would find that people now paying $30 to $40 a month would have their rent increased to perhaps $60 or $70. The people renting homes are usually in the lower income brackets, and cannot afford such an increase.

The cost of living index at the present time stands at 172.5, and a substantial boost in rents would make it almost unbearable for people in the lower income brackets. I was sorry to hear the announcement that probably National Housing Act loans would be curtailed this year. There is still a shortage of homes. It has been said that houses built under the National Housing Act scheme take care of only those in the higher income brackets. However, an analysis of 15,000 houses built in 1949 shows that 55 per cent of them were for people in the middle income group, those who were receiving from $2,400 to $3,500 a year; 11 per cent of those 15,000 were built for those in the income bracket below $2,400 a year; and 34 per cent were for those with incomes over $3,500 a year. On analysing the building under the National Housing Act, it will be found that about two-thirds of the homes being built are built by those who are in the middle or lower income brackets. I therefore think it is a pity that the National Housing Act loans should be curtailed at this time, especially when there is such a great shortage of housing in Canada.

Those are the main points I wanted to discuss at this time. In closing I would urge that the government should by all means institute at this session a system of over-all price, wage and rent controls. In addition to that, they should formulate a program of preparedness similar to that suggested by the Canadian Legion, in case of a national emergency. The vote on our subamendment will show whether politics is stronger than the conviction of the individual; and I would urge everyone to support this subamendment.

Mr. L. Philippe Picard (Bellechasse): As I rise, Mr. Speaker, I want my first words to be ones of congratulation to the mover (Mr. McMillan) and the seconder (Mr. Breton) of the address in reply on the ability and the dignity they showed when they performed their duties. Through you, sir, I think we might extend to Mr. Speaker the congratulations of the house on the way he represented Canada when he was in England last summer. Not only have the pictures which have reached us shown his appearance of dignity but those who were there—and other hon. members will speak with more authority than I do at the moment, because they were there—have told us of his dignity and the splendid manner in which he spoke for Canada.

I had intended in this debate to speak on international affairs and, since this last motion, on mobilization or on manpower. But I also had in mind that something had been said in the house about one of the important functions of the house, namely that performed by the public accounts committee, of which I have been chairman for the last six years. I therefore thought it might be appropriate at this time for me to avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words on the matter.

The public accounts committee is one of the means at the disposal of parliament by which it may exercise control of the expenditure of public moneys. By "control" I mean the ascertaining of whether the moneys voted by parliament have been wisely spent or wisely used. To quote Durell, at page 117:

. . . the functions of the committee extend, however, beyond the formality of the expenditure to its "wisdom, faithfulness and economy." It should not only act as a check upon extravagant, irregular or unauthorized expenditure, but also, within limits, upon unwise methods of management.

I therefore cannot let go without comment some of the remarks that have been made in this house by some hon. members opposite in the C.C.F. party to the effect that the public accounts committee had not discharged its duties properly. I think that the importance of the house exercising control over public expenditures is such that public confidence in the committee must be safeguarded and kept, so that the public will feel that the committee is performing its duty in the right manner. I therefore propose to devote a few minutes to that question. Then I shall make way for others who may want, at this late stage in the debate, to take part in it.

If we refer to our own House of Commons rules we find in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms that the only reference made to the committee on public accounts is on page 177. Standing order 63, paragraph 1, reads in part as follows:

At the commencement of each session, a special committee, consisting of five members, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the following standing committees of the house:

. . . (e) On public accounts, to consist of 50 members, 15 of whom shall constitute a quorum.

In the past the custom has been for the government first to appoint the striking committee or committee that prepares the list of members. Then the custom has been to appoint the different committees and subsequently to present a motion to this effect:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

As to the public accounts committee, the tradition has been that the main thing would be to refer to them the report of the Auditor General and the public accounts of the current year. This has been the practice up until now. The committees were usually formed immediately after the address in reply was adopted. Each year up until now this procedure has been followed, and the committee has been appointed and the public accounts have been referred to them. On the other hand, the committee has not sat each year for the last twenty-five years. In the past the custom has been for a member of the committee to write to the chairman or to get in touch with him and to suggest that the committee should assemble or to suggest a subject for the work of the committee. In the past twenty-two years the committee has sat only eight times, four of them under my chairmanship. The committee sat in 1929 under the chairmanship of the then hon. member for Cartier, Mr. Sam Jacobs. The committee reported but made no recommendations. It held eleven meetings and heard twelve witnesses, but made no recommendations whatsoever. The committee sat again in 1939, and everybody will remember its object at that time. It conducted what has been called the Bren gun inquiry. Suffice it for me to mention the name. The committee was in the middle of its sittings when the house rose and it did not report. The committee sat for the next time in 1943.

I should say that in 1939 they sat under the chairmanship of Mr. William Fraser. They sat again in 1943 under the chairmanship of Mr. Fraser. They reported after a few meetings, but made no recommendations. The committee sat in 1944, again under Mr. Fraser. They sat four times and made no report. The committee sat in 1945 for the first time under my chairmanship. The committee met informally on November 9, before any work had been referred to it, at the request of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). At that time nothing had been referred to it and the matter suggested for study by the hon. member was an account for the current year, and not an account that was reported in the public accounts.

The chairman ruled that that matter should be brought to the attention of the war expenditures committee that was still in existence during that year. The committee then sat in 1947, again under my chairmanship, although for a few meetings it was under the chairmanship of Mr. Isnor, now Senator Isnor. Twenty-eight meetings were held. Besides the usual perfunctory reports, the committee made five reports of a constructive nature, two of which were over the signature of my colleague, Mr. Isnor, and three over my own.

First of all, the committee studied Bill No. 22 and reported favourably thereon. The committee then studied the question of the Japanese evacuees on the British Columbia coast. It made a thorough study of the problem and made a constructive report on it. The committee also made a study of the administration of the custodian of enemy property concerning the so-called illegal organizations in Canada, and we also reported on the matter.

The committee also heard the Auditor General on the memorandum that he had prepared especially as to his suggestions concerning different aspects of his report; and finally the committee studied the building projects under the Veterans Land Act, administered under the Department of Veterans Affairs, on which the committee reported.

In passing I might note that I as chairman had to make the first draft of three of these reports, and if any hon. member might feel that I was biased and was trying to cover up or protect the government, as has been said by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), I might say that in the fifth report, the one concerning the building projects, I was the one who first included a word of censure against the gentleman who was administering that branch. Although he had been a very efficient man in other quarters, I and other members of the committee on all sides of the house considered that he had not shown enough ability in carrying the job he held in charge of the building projects for the veterans. The department evidently took this into consideration because the next summer he was moved to another position owing to the fact that he had previously proven his worth in other endeavours.

In 1949 the committee held only two meetings, and heard the Auditor General. The general elections interrupted the sittings of the committee, with the result that is quite evident in this house at present.

Then the committee sat in 1950, which is the year which has been the object of criticism by some hon. members opposite. The committee held thirty-two meetings, which was the first time in a great many years that the committee had shown such activity. The committee heard seventeen witnesses and presented five constructive reports. When I say "constructive" I do not say it only to be complimentary to the committee, but to signify that they were not only routine reports, which are often made, but rather reports that dealt with conditions that had been brought to the attention of the committee, reports which will have an effect either on the presentation of estimates or, as I have been informed lately, may have an effect on the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, a review of which is to be presented to parliament.

The committee first presented a report on the relationship of estimates to public accounts. It then presented a report on the study of the Auditor General's report. It then went on to report on the sale by the War Assets Corporation to Canadair Limited of property at Cartierville, Quebec. It reported on the sale by War Assets Corporation to Canadian Exploration of Emerald lake, and finally it dealt with other aspects of War Assets Corporation.

Hon. members of the C.C.F. party have thought fit at this session or at the last fall session, or at the end of the previous session, to cast aspersions on the work of the committee and on the chairman. I would not take the trouble to rise if only my humble person was concerned in such a question; but I think the public accounts committee performs one of the most important duties that this house has to perform. I think that the confidence of the public of Canada in its members is most important to our democratic institutions; therefore at this moment I think I ought to tell the facts as to that and present a true picture of the situation to the house to show that really the committee has worked assiduously, and has opened as far as it could the doors to every member to investigate, to question and to do whatever they wanted to do on the different matters that were brought before the committee.

Last fall during the short session a gentleman whom I personally respect highly, namely, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), said this, as quoted at page 632 of Hansard:

> The public accounts committee met and we were sidetracked most cleverly into considering the form of the estimates. Ninety per cent of the time of the committee was spent in determining the form in which the estimates should be presented at the next session of parliament.

Except for the fact that I object to the word "sidetracked", and except for the fact of the proportion of ninety per cent, there is something in this. We studied the form of the estimates, but we were not sidetracked into it as I shall show in a moment. It was the committee itself, and the committee with the approval of all members sitting there and without any protest to us, that decided to hear the Auditor General and get whatever memorandum he wished to bring before us. It was not the committee that decided that the Auditor General should come before us and take the estimates. We decided unanimously in the steering committee or the agenda committee when a representative of the other party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart), for whom I also have great respect, was there, and who was more or less responsible, more than anybody else, for the committee assembling on that day, because he was the one who had written to me asking that the committee should assemble. He asked that because it was his intention to put before the committee a proposal to the effect that the committee should reconsider reviewing the affairs of, or the moneys spent by, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and the Department of National Defence.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North sent that letter to me, and I immediately assembled the committee. I might say here that that gentleman was made one of the members of the agenda committee. He brought in his proposal. At that time the hon. member for Halifax proposed that we should go into a different type of study. If I may be permitted, I shall quote from the minutes and proceedings of the public accounts committee of April 27, which says:

> The chairman stated that the subcommittee had decided to call Mr. Sellar as the first witness. It had been agreed that Mr. Sellar would read a brief, on which he would be questioned, and that when this had been disposed of, the committee would proceed to consideration of the Auditor General's report for the fiscal year 1948-49.

Then if I turn to the verbatim report itself, I find I said at the time that the committee on agenda had decided that:

> Mr. Sellar be asked first to come before us and to present whatever brief he might feel advisable to submit; and in connection with that, it was agreed that we would not interrupt Mr. Sellar while he was reading his submission but afterwards we would limit our questions to the brief itself, and that then he would go ahead and submit the other material which he wants to place before the committee, and that when he had concluded his submissions the material would be open for discussion. Consideration of the report of the Auditor General itself would be the next order of business. Following that Mr. Stewart suggested that at the conclusion of Mr. Sellar's examination the committee review the accounts of the Department of National Defence as set forth in the public accounts for the fiscal year 1948-49. Mr. Isnor suggested that the superintendent of insurance of the Department of Finance and the director of the annuities branch of the Department of Labour be examined by the committee as to the facilities of their branches. The subcommittee recommended that for the present we would limit ourselves to a study of the report of the Auditor General and subsequently that a further meeting of the steering committee would be held to decide as to the matters that will be taken up.

At that meeting, when this was given as the order of precedence by the chairman, were present the two gentlemen who later in the house criticized by saying they had been sidetracked in considering the question of estimates. Both the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) were there at that time; yet I find no word in the proceedings indicating that they protested in any way by suggesting that some other matter be considered immediately.

I have here a note where the present hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) asked what the order of business would be, following which the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) spoke. It appears from the record that everyone agreed that should be the order of business at that time. No member rose to his feet and said that he had been sidetracked into doing something he did not want to do. No one objected. Indeed the whole committee approved of that order of business. That was why we called the Auditor General to appear before us. We did not dictate to the Auditor General as to what he should tell us. Here is a man who has been appointed and who, because of a regulation, is, except upon a two-thirds vote of the members of the House of Commons, immune from discharge from his office. Without that vote we can do nothing to him. He is above politics, and during most of the years he has been there has been free in his language, as have his predecessors.

I know of some hon. members on all sides of the house who have thought that, at times, he has expressed his views a little too openly respecting matters of policy. So we cannot say that this man came to that committee with any idea given to him by anyone as to how he should treat this matter or the other. For years the Auditor General had had certain pet ideas as to the way estimates should be presented. He came to us this year and gave us the benefit of his memorandum.

I do not think it would have been fair to the treasury officials, to the comptroller of the treasury or to the House of Commons if we had been satisfied just to listen to the Auditor General and then to have said, "Sir, you are a most important fellow. We will accept whatever you have decided. Let us now move to the next order of business."

In our committee we proceeded in the order I have indicated. Hon. members from all sides questioned the gentleman as to the advisability of his recommendations, some of which were reflected later on in our report, and with some of which we did not agree. We expressed our views upon them. I do not think it would be fair to say that anyone was sidetracked into studying the estimates instead of going into the public accounts.

Later on I shall discuss the question of what should be the order of business in such a committee; but I do object strenuously—especially when it comes from a man so mild in manner, so pleasant and one whom I admire so much as the hon. member for Melfort. I am quite sure he overstated it and did not accurately express his views when he said, "We were sidetracked." He may have felt we should have done something else and, if so, he is free to have his opinion and I will respect it. But when he says that he was sidetracked, when no objection had come from anywhere, I must object.

Further than that, it is true that we spent a third—not ninety per cent— of our time dealing with the form of the estimates. We spent fourteen out of thirty-two meetings in that work. The evidence to which I have just referred shows that at the time the subcommittee reported no one thought he was being sidetracked, or that anything wrong was being done.

I did not bring with me the large volume of Hansard for last year in which the speech of the hon. member for Moose Jaw appears. However, he repeated almost verbatim the same speech at this session and, for that reason, I felt it unnecessary to bring the large volume to my desk in the chamber. The result is that I have only his words delivered this session, which are sufficient to give an idea of what his views were in committee, and the criticisms he made. In his speech at this session he said:

> When we got into the committee, although the members asked for a good deal of information they were not able to get it.

Which is false.

> Opposition members asked for witnesses, they asked for figures, and they asked for the public accounts. They asked for many things, but they did not get much satisfaction. We were repeatedly overruled when we sought information, and we were consistently refused the public accounts themselves. I think that the committee sat for three months before it even got to the public accounts.

Well, that is what I call misrepresentation. That is a misleading statement, if there is such a thing. The committee followed the procedure that had been approved by all members of the steering committee who were present. I do not think it is fair to spread throughout the country the suggestion that a committee such as that, the function of which is to control government expenditures, to make sure nothing is wrong with expenditures, and to decide whether proper amounts have been spent, or if expenditures have been made wisely, has misbehaved for political reasons, or that it has failed to help our democratic institutions, as our friends profess to do.

When they say we have spoken too much about estimates, I would refer them to a book that was issued by the treasury in Great Britain. It is for official use, and is called "Parliamentary Supply Procedure".

Item 11 at page 7 states:

> It has long been the established usage that important changes in the form of the estimates should not be made or sanctioned by the treasury without their first being submitted to and approved by the public accounts committee.

The Auditor General had suggestions to make. We did not necessarily have to accept them. We recognized his competence over us in matters of accountancy. We recognized that he had a much better grasp of many of those economical and financial problems than we have. Yet, no matter what our way of thinking might have been we had to judge by what we had in our own minds. We could not accept all he said without looking into it carefully. I think there were on the committee enough men of good sense to judge fairly and who were able to assess the value of those suggestions, for the benefit of the public of Canada, to assure the control by parliament in respect of whatever the gentleman might have suggested.

In the same booklet I find this:

> —since the form of the estimates directly affects the parliamentary control of expenditure and is intimately connected with the form of the appropriation accounts, the treasury has undertaken to consult the public accounts committee before making or sanctioning important changes of form.

I think it was important that the committee should look into that carefully and a number of sittings were given up to the consideration of that question. I think I can say without divulging any secret that the form in which the estimates will be presented this year will reflect many of the suggestions made last year by the committee. I think the results will satisfy one of two of the hon. members who criticized namely, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) when he sees that our many suggestions were not ignored but were looked into and even incorporated in the new form of the estimates.

When the Auditor General came before us I do not think it would have been right for the committee to say that they would not consider his memorandum, that they would either approve it or reject it. I do not think the committee, in order to please the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher), should have taken up the question of how many nails went into this or what material was used somewhere else. I think the committee did its duty by acting as it did.

I am given to understand that these changes will be made at this session and then I hope that hon. members will see that our work has been well done. A most misleading statement was made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw when he said that hon. members had been prevented from asking for information and that the truth had been withheld. Since we were acting under the instructions of the steering committee and were studying the form of the estimates, naturally when the Auditor General was before us we asked him what form he would like the estimates of certain departments to take. We agreed to take as an example the Department of Agriculture.

We took that department, not because of any prejudice but simply because it came under "A", the first department. We asked the Auditor General how he would like to see those estimates worded or grouped in the future.

After hearing that gentleman it was our duty to hear the deputy minister of agriculture, the secretary of the treasury board, who is also an assistant deputy minister of finance, and the comptroller of the treasury. As responsible members of this house we obtained such information on the problem as we could get before making our recommendations. I think it was a normal procedure at that time for the committee not to consider whether there should be an elevator at this place or something somewhere else. We had to decide whether the groupings suggested by the Auditor General were the right ones.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw went ahead and asked questions that had nothing to do with the matter before the committee. In order to have the proceedings carried on in a proper manner, the chairman had to rule him out of order. The committee was dealing with the question submitted by the subcommittee and deciding on the form of the estimates, not on how much money should be spent on a particular item. That would come under the public accounts and would be considered later. If we had sat long enough it would have come up later on.

I agree with one suggestion that was made, that the public accounts committee should take a different department each year, look carefully into all the items and ask all the necessary pertinent questions. But I do object to the statement being made that hon. members were sidetracked and were refused information by the committee or were not given the chance to ask for figures. It is a distortion of the fact to say that figures were refused in the committee.

Everything that was pertinent was given, but when a question was out of order, when it did not concern the item under consideration, it was ruled out. I think the chairman of the committee went to great lengths to satisfy hon. members. When the brief on the estimates presented by the Auditor General was disposed of the committee continued with its work of reviewing the Auditor General's report. The report of the committee dated June 15, 1950, deals with the form of the estimates, the number of the items, the wording of the items, the details of estimates, the summary of estimates, the revenue producing services, the vote texts that legislate, the committee on estimates and the public accounts committee.

As I say, after that part of our work was completed we went into the Auditor General's report. The hon. member for Moose Jaw objected that the study of the Auditor General's report was taking up time that should have been employed in studying the public accounts. That is a most misleading statement because in considering the Auditor General's report we were dealing with the public accounts. The report of the Auditor General contains references to certain matters which under the statute he is bound to report to us and other matters to which he considers it his duty to call our attention. Here is what Durell's "Parliamentary Grants" has to say:

> In the first place, in dealing with the purely accounting point of view, it (the public accounts committee) necessarily reviews the comptroller and auditor general's report and investigates any irregularities brought to notice in that report. In this respect its examination amounts to an enlarged revision of that report, supplementing it by oral examination both of the accounting officer and of other officers concerned in the expenditure. In point of fact the committee is primarily guided in its line of investigation by the comptroller and auditor general's report, as to the subjects it selects for consideration, though it is not necessarily restricted to the ground covered by that report.

I think that should suffice to show that when the committee took up the study of the Auditor General's report it was acting in a correct way. As I said, the Auditor General is obliged by statute to direct our attention to certain matters and is at liberty to bring other items of the public accounts before us. After we had studied the report of the Auditor General we submitted a second report containing five items. The first item dealt with the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act and it was stated that it should be amended to authorize writing off uncollectable debts that have accumulated up to 1940 in the government accounts. The second recommendation was that the government should consider the advisability of revising the International Boundary Waters Act.

The next paragraph stated that the committee was of the opinion that the yearly report of every crown corporation should be referred for study to a select committee of the house. The fourth recommendation was in connection with the post office guarantee fund and the fifth recommendation had to do with the Department of Public Works bearing the cost of office accommodation for all departments. The report reads:

> Your committee is of the opinion that departmental heads in co-operation with treasury board officials, the comptroller of the treasury and the Auditor General should examine the advisability of charging each department in respect of the space which it occupies.

Those are important questions, and I do not see that it was wasting the time of the committee or the house to have gone into them. I contend that the committee of last session did valuable work. Before it finally adjourned it also looked into a number of matters brought to its attention by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). At that time, since the committee had already disposed of the two items which had been selected by the steering committee, it might have accepted the idea of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) to proceed right away to investigate one department of the public accounts, but we had had certain remarks by the hon. member for Moose Jaw, and had lost one full meeting investigating whether or not it was good policy to have a quinquennial census in the western provinces, and whether we might save a few pennies there.

Mr. Thatcher: More than a million dollars.

Mr. Picard: The gentleman in charge, who should know better than my hon. friend, came before us and said it was necessary and had to be carried on. From the hon. member's performance that day I think the committee got the impression that it could do better work, work more satisfactory to the people of Canada, by investigating the three matters that had been suggested by the leader of the opposition. The committee might not have had unanimous approval in dealing with them, but I should like to emphasize that it studied them carefully and then reported. My hon. friend cannot say that the committee did not use its time well in so doing, and much better than it would have by accepting some of his views that it should go into this or that small question in order to save a few cents by not purchasing nails or hammers for this or that project.

I am convinced of one thing. Since I have been chairman of that committee I have always had the view—and I was fortunate in finding the same view expressed elsewhere —that the essential principle on which parliamentary control is based should not be complicated checks imposed before expenditure takes place but an orderly audit of the expenditure after it has occurred. That is the job of the Auditor General and of a committee of parliament through examination of the results of his audit. If my hon. friend had been in his seat earlier he would have heard what I said in the first part of my remarks, and I advocate that he should read them in Hansard. I said that for the first time last year the committee sat for any length of time. It had to listen to a long brief from the Auditor General, and it was its duty to report on it.

The committee must perform the actual work of not only going into each department but also, as I suggested a moment ago, digging first into the Auditor General's report. The amount of time spent on that depends on how hon. members put their questions, how they interpret what is in the report, and how they word their questions in order to secure the answers they want. Examination of past expenditures, says Durell, is the best means of informing the House of Commons how to criticize further expenditures. I contend that the committee did valuable work last session. It followed the agenda to which no objection was raised at first by the very few hon. members who later violently criticized our work. As I pointed out a moment ago, material results will come about from the work performed. I am convinced that good results can also be achieved by the committee if the work is performd in the spirit which motivated the inception of the public accounts committee, that is, the verification of whether moneys voted have been well spent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Picard: I shall only be a few minutes. I will shorten my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Picard: Anyway it will oblige the next speaker if I do so because he would not have much time to speak before six o'clock. I shall conclude in a few minutes. Another comment that is not out of place is to point out for the future—and this is directed to my hon. friend as well as to others who may want to bring different matters before the committee—that questions of policy do not come within the purview of the committee on public accounts. The other day my hon. friend said that he intended to have generals, admirals, commodores and so on called before the committee. All right. I may not be there, but it will be all right with the one who is chairman of the committee if it concerns an analysis of how moneys have been spent, but not to determine whether the money should have been voted, not to determine whether these people agree with the policy behind purchasing of these items. The function of the committee is to check on the expenditures and not on whether it was wise to decide to spend this or that. It is there to ascertain whether the money that has been spent has been well spent, whether there is something wrong or crooked about it, or whether everything is all right.

In this connection I might also quote Durell, a recognized authority on the subject in the British House of Commons and in all other commonwealth legislatures. At page 118 Durell says:

> The committee is . . . in no way concerned with questions of policy in the broader sense.

That would apply to any committee which had as its aim the securing from departmental officials of information as to the what-for and wherefor of the different items, and the criticizing thereof. We have a right to know where the money has gone, how much money has been spent; but whether or not it was voted or recommended wisely is not for the committee to decide. On page 119 Durell says:

> The chief obstacle to discussing merit will generally be found in determining the question as to the extent to which administration is involved. The reasons for the limitation in the functions of the committee as regards policy are twofold. In the first place a discussion on questions of policy would imply the right, whether exercised or not, of approving or disapproving of that policy, and might be set up by the department in its defence. Any system, however, which would tend to relieve ministers of their responsibilities in this respect would unduly diminish the control of the executive, and might also diminish the carefulness of the department. There would consequently be insuperable objections to any attempt on the part of the House of Commons to delegate questions of policy to a committee. Ministerial responsibility is an underlying constitutional maxim, and no intervention between the minister and the House of Commons, to which alone he must answer, would be consistent with its satisfactory working. The amount of the estimates or the amount of any particular grant are matters of policy, and it would be entirely outside the scope of the committee to question either, or to investigate the grounds on which they were based. This is true generally, even when the policy is common knowledge; but it may sometimes be the case that items have been inserted in an estimate on grounds of policy based on confidential documents. As the minister could not be called on to divulge these to the house in order to justify his insertion of the items, still less could the department be called on to produce them to the committee for discussion.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that personally I believe it is rendering a disservice to our democratic institutions to cast aspersions upon the work of such a committee, especially when those aspersions are founded not on fact but on personal peevish impressions. For a number of years I have had the privilege of sitting on such committees. During the war I sat on the war expenditures committee with several hon. members of the same party to which my hon. friend belongs, members who in my opinion were as faithful to the principles of their party as my hon. friend could be, and I never heard them cast any such aspersions. As chairman of the subcommittee looking into the matter of synthetic rubber I had the opportunity of sitting with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I found him to be a gentleman who carefully studied all questions, and I am sure he never thought I wanted to hide things, just as I never thought he wanted to do anything which would be detrimental to the country. On the war expenditures committee of 1943 which looked into the question of aluminum, I sat with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I took an active part in the work of that committee, though perhaps not such a prominent part as he took, and I do not think he ever had cause to think I was not performing my duty fully or that I was not unbiased in the way I approached that problem. Nor did I ever think he ever had any wrong intentions in asking his questions. The same thing happened in 1947, when we investigated the matters I mentioned a moment ago. On that committee we had another member of the same party, Mr. Burton. I remember very well, too, that in the war expenditures committee of 1941 or 1942 I voted with three members of the opposition parties to make sure our proceedings would be published. At the time I stated that whatever happened should be divulged, even though it should concern a friend of ours.

So, Mr. Speaker, believing it important not to myself but to parliament to deal with these aspersions that have been cast upon the work of the committee, after the care that committee took to look into the matters brought before it, I thought it my duty to rise and bring this to the attention of the house and state the facts as they really are. In doing so I believe I am performing a service, because if we are to carry on with our democratic institutions it is most important that the people should continue to have confidence in the House of Commons; not in one party in particular, because parties may come and go, but the institutions last. The moment the people become convinced that those institutions are wrong, it is not important what party may be in power; there will be no democracy then.

Mr. Thatcher: I wonder if the hon. member who has just spoken will say whether, if he is chairman of that committee this year, the national defence expenditures will be allowed to come before it.

Mr. Picard: No one knows who will be chairman this year, because the committees have not been constituted. I do not know whether I am right, but I understand that the lists on our side have been made up, and that the complete lists are being prepared. Once the lists are complete the committees will assemble and choose their chairman. It will be left to the chairman to decide what to recommend to the committee, and it will be left to the committee itself to decide what matters it should take up.

Mr. Thatcher: The same as last year, then.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): In common with all hon. members, Mr. Speaker, I feel that this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne offers us an opportunity to bring into the house the views of our constituents and also to place before the house their local problems while they are still fresh in our minds. To my mind, a member of parliament returning to Ottawa after visiting his riding comes here with a knowledge of his people, their needs and their point of view. This personal contact with one's riding makes for greater efficiency in the carrying out of our duties as members of parliament. Having in mind the value of this constituency contact, I should like to see the sessions divided into two parts, with half the session held in the early part of the year, in the spring, and the other half in the fall. This would allow members, particularly those from the west, an opportunity of going home, contacting their constituencies and coming back fresh for the fray. I would of course take it for granted that the first half of the session would be adjourned and reconvened later, in the fall of the year, with just the one indemnity. In that case there would be no extra cost to the government. This would particularly benefit all the members who come from the extreme ends of Canada. I make that as a purely personal suggestion; I have not consulted my colleagues about it; but I believe that hon. members in all parts of the house would be quite satisfied to have the sessions split in that way. Their work would have that freshness resulting from the benefit of close contact with their constituencies to which I referred. I find that matters are brought to our attention that have a great deal of merit and are worthy of consideration, as was the case during my recent visit to my own constituency; and I propose to deal with one or two of them tonight.

First of all, I shall deal briefly with the subamendment that is now before the house. We who have seen service and who understand some of the problems can readily sympathize with the point of view expressed by the Canadian Legion in pressing for compulsory service at this time. This amendment to a certain extent follows the line of argument of the Canadian Legion. I believe we have made certain commitments to the Atlantic pact group and to the United Nations with regard to the supply of manpower; and before we could deal adequately with the proposals for compulsory service made in this subamendment, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) this question: Are we now able, through the voluntary enlistment method, to provide all the manpower that we have been committed to supply to those two groups? I should also like to ask him: Are we supplying all the personnel that has been requested of us by those two groups? Of course that includes our own national defence personnel. In other words, are we prepared to meet our commitments on the voluntary basis of enlistment? These questions should be answered before we could deal with this subamendment adequately. Instead of our talking of defence and armaments continually, I believe we should hear more in this house and outside of it—through the press and through all channels of thought and action in Canada—about sound proposals for peace that will be acceptable to those who now threaten us with aggression. Not this evening but later on I should like to deal with that matter. I feel that all hon. members should give more attention to the question: Are we doing all that we can to bring about world peace or are we just so obsessed with the idea of defence and the idea that we must prepare to withstand aggression that we have overlooked the fact that there is a possible solution to our problems by expressing tolerance and a willingness to work with the possible enemy towards ultimate peace.

The frank and, I might say, courageous statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) recently has given comfort and relief to many Canadians who up to that time entertained—and justifiably so, I think—fears that the question of conscription would be sidestepped as has long been the case in the history of Canada. I agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) that the Legion brief was prepared some time before the Prime Minister made that statement and was based on the assumption that Canada would be torn by strife and turmoil should we find ourselves faced with a manpower or defence emergency, as was the case during the first and second wars. The subamendment calling for compulsory service in the reserve forces, if carried out—and I take it that their intention is complete compulsory service—would call all able-bodied men to the reserve forces. With the I.Q. requirements and the physical requirements for the reserve army much lower than those for the regular army, plus the extended age limit that covers that group, I feel that these lower standards could bring together close to 10 per cent of our population. If such be the case, we would call to the colours

1,400,000 men. But let us say that only five per cent would be affected. In that case 700,000 men would be called up for training in the reserve forces.

I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has already pointed out our position with regard to equipment and suitable quarters. I think he showed clearly that Canada is not prepared to take care of the training of anything like 700,000 men, and possibly not even 100,000 men. I therefore feel that more thought has to be given to the suggestion of the Canadian Legion and that a more balanced approach has to be reached before we can do anything about it. I do not think for a moment that the present reserve facilities could stand the strain of this vastly increased number of personnel. Compulsory service is a step that may have to be taken later on; and we have from the Prime Minister the assurance that should the need arise the government would put that system into effect. In the meantime, establishments and equipment of the reserve army should receive the immediate attention of the Minister of National Defence. I believe that a survey made today of the eligible men in any town in Canada, asking their reasons for not joining the reserve army on a voluntary basis, would give sufficient answers with regard to the numerous kicks and dissatisfactions that are prevalent throughout Canada about the present set-up of the reserve army so that it would give the minister a sound background of knowledge as to how to improve those conditions that are now barring the entry of men into the service, by eliminating several of the causes of complaint. I admit that some of them are trivial, but nevertheless they are causes of complaint.

Closely tied up with the subject of the reserve army is the question of civil defence. I propose to deal briefly with this subject. It is well known to everyone that the legal responsibility for the defence of Canada is a federal one. The defence, or protection of our people from attack, the defence of Canada, the protection of our homes, the persons living in those homes, in our towns and on the farms is an obligation of the federal government. It is the duty of the government to be prepared to meet any onslaught or any attack that might possibly be made by any potential enemy. While the war may be in Europe or Asia or in our own country, the object of our participation in it is based on the same principle, namely, the defence of Canadian homes and the Canadian way of life.

Civil defence fits into this picture. It is actually indivisible from the over-all picture. Again I say, although it is localized in municipalities and with provincial governments, it is still the obligation of the federal government to provide the funds for civil defence. At the present time the participation of the municipalities is on a voluntary basis, and is auxiliary to the general plan. The participation of the hard-pressed municipalities should be restricted entirely to the providing of personnel. The funds should come from parliament, and they should be a direct charge on the $5 billion program that this government proposes to pass at this session.

I would suggest that as a first step toward making this body efficient, training classes should be held in our schools; that classes for civil defence, particularly in the higher grade schools, should be held previously, giving instructions to selected teachers during either the Easter recess or the summer recess, if that is soon enough, and training them to come back to their pupils, and help them to become part and parcel of the local civil defence in the town wherever they may happen to live. I know that this worked wonders in England during the blitz, because they had something of the nature of trained personnel in all localities.

I agree with hon. members who have already spoken that the first step that should be taken is a program of national registration. I believe that is urgent. In spite of the fact that it has been said it cannot be done, I should like to see an effort made to combine national registration of this type with the census. In England only through national registration were they able to determine how many people lived in a certain blitzed house. After they had counted the number rescued the list showed that there were two or three others still unaccounted for. They went on and worked until all were accounted for. In Canada, particularly in Ottawa, I doubt whether the residents living in an apartment house themselves know how many people are living there. They definitely do not know all the names. In the event of aggression and, shall we say, demolition of one of these apartment houses, we would be at a total loss to know how long to go on searching the ruins for the injured and killed, no registered list being available.

I also feel that help should be given the municipalities to provide fire fighting equipment. In the matter of providing fire fighting equipment the same problem is facing the municipalities as is facing the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), namely, lack of standardization. I would suggest that now is the time, if any help is given by the federal government to the municipalities to provide fire fighting equipment, to see that they have standardized couplings, connections and so on, on all the equipment supplied so that that equipment could be transferred to another community that might be in difficulties and needed it. Until that is done I am afraid that the equipment in some towns in Canada would be totally unsuitable for other towns, because there is no standardization of couplings and connections.

I do not believe that the question of civil defence calls for secrecy. I do not believe it calls for the secrecy that naturally the general defence of the country demands. I believe that publicity is essential in this instance, a full knowledge of the gravity of the situation, and a full knowledge of the part that our citizens are expected to play in the event of a catastrophe. With the facts known you will get greater co-operation, and people will be willing to take their part and meet their obligation to the community.

Hospital supplies should be checked immediately to make sure that they are adequate for any eventuality. Food supplies should be placed in cold storages. I have in mind the fact that last year one of our British Columbia communities was cut off for a matter of two or three weeks, and it was completely out of food. That was not one isolated case. That could happen in any community in Canada, because few communities carry more than two or three weeks' supply of food at any given time in their cold storages. We should encourage merchants, wholesalers and all food suppliers to put large quantities of food in cold storage at the present time as part of our civil defence. I hold in my hand a publication issued by the government dealing mainly with ways and means of combating it in the event that aggressive war should be directed at Canadian targets. On reading it I find that it missed one important point, and that important point in my opinion is the possible sabotage that may follow aggression by a potential enemy, in this case Russia.

We know that in our midst there are men who would carry out a program of sabotage to assist the enemy immediately. Probably they are not numerous, but we have them. Possibly they are scattered all over this dominion ready to play their part, not for Canada but for a possible enemy. Men of this type can do more damage in a month or so to the economy of the country than can an aerial attack, by damaging the water, light, power and sanitation systems. I suggest that that matter be given serious consideration and included in this book for the information of the people who are making use of this as a basis of civil defence.

I find that the municipalities in British Columbia are willing to co-operate in every way they can; but with the high cost of education, hospitalization, social services and other commitments, they definitely have not the money and they are looking to the government for help.

In this booklet there is a chapter dealing with one important matter, namely, the dispersal of industry. I believe not only in the dispersal of industry, but in the dispersal of population, as they offer the poorest target to any enemy aircraft that may come to this country. I would urge the government to use its influence now with these departments that are spending a billion dollars, when they ask the industry to accept a contract, or a contract is given. If it has to start a new plant it should be asked to try and find a location in Canada where it would help the local conditions and where it would become dispersed.

I could tell of several areas in British Columbia, hidden in the mountains where no enemy could find them. Near towns such as Penticton, Kelowna, Vernon and Grand Forks would be ideal for industries of this nature. I would not say this would include industries calling for 10,000 or 20,000 men; but industries calling for anything from 100 to 1,000 men could be ideally located both as to the availability of power and manpower, and protection from potential enemies.

If the government is going to take part in establishing a steel industry in British Columbia I would suggest that it give consideration to what is known as the Princeton area. In that area are found some of the largest coal deposits in British Columbia, as yet untouched. The mines there have been operating for about thirty years, and up to this date only about 4 per cent of the known coal has been mined. About 96 per cent of the coal in that area is still available. This affords cheap power, and to my mind would be ideal for the establishment of a steel industry.

In line with the suggestion by my hon. friend, that this debate affords opportunity to place local problems before the house, I would draw the attention of the government to the recent floods in the Fraser valley and in my own riding at Princeton. Our valleys, because they are valleys, are conducive to flood conditions. At the same time they offer means of control by way of dams. Such controls are not possible on the prairies.

Three years ago the Okanagan valley suffered a severe flood. It was so alarming that the government took steps to remove the possibilities of a recurrence. A commission of engineers was appointed, and it came to the conclusion that controls were feasible and possible. With that in mind the commission made recommendations to the government, and money has been provided in the estimates. However, the work has not yet commenced. This year in that valley we are particularly alarmed by the potential danger of similar floods in the current year. We understand that the lack of government action has been caused in one instance through not having been able to negotiate the purchase of land from Indians. I believe that could be overcome. The difficulty in the other case was through having to supply fish ladders at the request of the state of Washington. This, too, can be overcome. I would ask the government to speed the work. The people whose lands and homes are subject to these floods have been waiting anxiously for the government to implement its promise. I realize it is possibly too late to help to stem floods in the natural way, because we have been logging fairly heavily the territory that supplies the moisture which causes the floods. The denuding of the land has possibly added to the condition from which we suffer. At the same time the silted river outlets retard the flow, and a crooked river has to be straightened out. All this is known to the government, through its engineers.

I suggest to the government it would be far cheaper to have this work done now, because if the money is not now spent and if the work is not carried out the damage that may be caused, through a flood similar to that of three years ago, would cost the government more money by way of compensation than would be required to carry out this work at the present time.

One other matter I would draw to the attention of the government has to do with our fruit industry. I do not know whether hon. members are fully aware of the value of the British Columbia fruit industry to the economy of Canada. For the information of the house I shall place on record some figures showing the growth of the industry. In 1920 we shipped 43,000 tons of fruit and vegetables from the valley. This was contained in 2,600 carloads. In 1949 we shipped 258,600 tons, or 16,162 carloads. The freight revenue to the railways from these shipments, during the same period of time, had increased from half a million dollars to $8,500,000, plus the increased inbound traffic.

Employees in this industry have grown in number, i.e., in the packing houses, shook mills, processing plants and so on from less than a thousand in 1920 to over 8,000 in 1949. During that period payrolls jumped from $300,000 to between $8 million and $9 million. I am bringing these matters to the attention of the house because this prosperous industry received a severe shock last winter, caused by the frost—something which is most unusual in our part of Canada. That frost took a toll of 336,610 trees. I am giving the correct figure, because the information was secured through a count made under the auspices of the provincial government. The average loss would be about 20 per cent. Some districts lost as much as 54 per cent, and some individual growers lost 100 per cent of their trees. The over-all loss to growers can best be shown by referring to specific fruits such as peaches, cherries, apricots, pears, plums and prunes. The crop sold in 1949 for $7,484,874 while in 1950, after the loss, it sold for $1,832,691. In other words the crop loss, exclusive of apples, was $5,652,183.

These people are not asking for compensation for that loss; they are asking for assistance, and I believe assistance is now being negotiated between the provincial and federal governments, and consideration is being given as to what assistance they will or can provide. I hope the federal government will go out of its way to show its desire to rehabilitate these men on the land and make them once again prosperous taxpayers, as they once were. This applies particularly to those who suffered to the extent of 50 or 100 per cent. As I said, these people are not asking for charity; they are asking for compensation to replace trees, and for long-term loans to cover replanting, living costs, fixed charges, taxes, irrigation, spraying and the like.

Hon. members perhaps know that it takes eight years to bring an orchard to the point of bearing. These people are willing to bring their orchards to that point, if they can be financed during that eight-year period. They would like to get loans through one of the government agencies at 2 or 2½ per cent. This would re-establish, not newcomers to Canada but experienced farmers, farmers who have had twenty or thirty years' experience in the growing of fruit. This form of help would rehabilitate men who have contributed to the country, and who still have something to contribute to the economy of this dominion. Many of them are veterans; some are veterans of the first world war and they have been badly hit. Farmers in other parts of Canada have been rehabilitated in the past, and I do not think we would be breaking new ground if in this case the government saw fit to assist the farmers of the Okanagan valley.

Naturally this disaster has definite results on the workers, many of whom worked part time as pickers, thinners and general orchard workers. These people go to the packing houses for part of the year, and while there they are called upon to pay unemployment insurance. But they do not pay this when they are on the farm and the combined period does not permit them to benefit under the act. The industry is having difficulty in getting help and one reason is that many men are leaving the farms because farm work offers no protection for the worker. This particular organization, possibly the largest in Canada, the British Columbia Fruit Growers Association, was asked to support a resolution produced by the workers asking that they be afforded the benefit of unemployment insurance. I think their claim is fair and just and I should like to place this resolution on the record. It originated in Peachland and reads:

Whereas employees in most industries are now covered by unemployment insurance, and agricultural workers are not, and

Whereas this has the effect of sending the more responsible type of worker from the land to other industries with the consequent tendency not only to lower the standard of farm help available but also to make farm help increasingly difficult to secure;

Therefore be it resolved that this 1951 B.C.F.G.A. convention request the federal government to make unemployment insurance available to agricultural workers in cases where such workers desire to be covered by this insurance.

I understand there are certain difficulties that would have to be overcome in connection with extending the benefits of unemployment insurance to farm workers, and one difficulty is caused by the nature of the industry. The farms are scattered all across the dominion and it would be quite difficult for the auditors to carry on their work. One suggestion has been made, which I endorse, that when farmers come under the scheme on a voluntary basis they should be willing to agree, and I am quite sure they would, to bring their books to a central point at a given time each year for auditing, possibly the nearest town.

One other matter I should like to refer to before I close is the Vernon campsite. Last summer I visited this campsite once or twice and the people in the district asked me, and I think quite rightly, why the Canadian government had sent troops to be trained at Fort Lewis. Fort Lewis and the area surrounding is all flat country, almost like the prairies, while the terrain around Vernon is hilly, and in many respects similar to the terrain of Korea. It would be ideal for training when the conditions are so similar.

In addition the climate is excellent and the facilities are already there. Light and water is available and sanitation facilities. Thousands of troops were trained here during the last war and all these facilities are available today. I understand that roughly 9,000 men were sent to Fort Lewis and the government is paying a premium at the rate of $40 per month for officers and $20 per month for men. On the basis of 1,000 officers and 8,000 men it means that Canada is paying a premium of $200,000 per month in order to have men trained at Fort Lewis, and that is in addition to the pay and other expenditures that are being expended in United States dollars which a few months ago we were told were so scarce that they had to be withheld from ordinary industrial ventures.

The government should consider bringing these men back to Canada to complete their training, and I suggest that they be sent to Vernon because I know it is suitable. I suggest they be brought back before this extra cost of $200,000 a month accumulates and takes too large a bite out of our $5,000 million program.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the subamendment under debate seeks to add a paragraph to the amendment which was moved the other day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). The new paragraph would read as follows:

We regret that Your Excellency's advisers have failed

4. To ensure that a complete program of preparedness including compulsory training in the reserve forces for home defence be executed with the greatest possible degree of equality of sacrifice and service.

That subamendment contains three parts. First of all it stresses preparedness and the necessity of a complete program for that purpose. Secondly, it includes, as only one aspect of that preparedness, compulsory training in the reserve forces for home defence. Thirdly, it contains a very important reference to equality of sacrifice and service. I propose to divide my remarks this evening into three similar parts.

I believe that this is one of the most important amendments that have come before this House of Commons in the fifteen years I have been privileged to be a member representing one of the seats in the western city of Vancouver. I may say at the beginning that it is my intention to support the subamendment. I give credit for honesty of purpose to all hon. members who have spoken on this amendment, including those who belong to my own party, and also any hon. members who will be speaking before the vote is taken. All I ask is that I be given the same credit.

There is room for various opinions in discussing the subjects raised by this subamendment. I believe that those subjects are better discussed now than after war begins. We can debate them calmly and with reason. There is no excuse for bitterness or tension in a debate on this amendment at the present time. Also, and more important, if consideration of these subjects is delayed we may be too late for action. The safety of the state may be at stake.

First of all, preparedness. The minister of external affairs made a significant remark in Montreal just four days ago. The report in the press is headed, "Risk of war very great, must arm quickly: Pearson."

In this report we find that he used the following words:

> The behaviour of the Soviet union and its allies and satellites in the last six months has shown that they are more prepared than we had previously estimated to take risks which may lead to a third world war.
> For that reason—

This is the paragraph I point out particularly to hon. members.

> —there is no escaping the conclusion that we must arm ourselves, and quickly, and assist our allies to arm. We must accept that necessity.

How much every one of us here wishes that it were not necessary to believe what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said, but we must believe it. As representatives of the Canadian people in this time of great crisis, we must believe the warning given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who should be an authority on the subject if there is one in Canada.

There will be no real preparedness in Canada until we have a clear-cut plan for the use of our manpower. There is no such plan today, and this is the great weakness of Canada's situation at the present time. Let us consider some of the facts about manpower in Canada. This is a time of high employment, perhaps the highest employment in the history of our nation. It is a time of almost maximum production, a time when our factories are operating to an extent that has not been the case before. Therefore there are many places for manpower to be used right at home for purposes of ordinary peacetime production. Again, there is no fervour in this country as there would be in the event of actual war. There is also little glamour about the type of service which men will experience in the forces. It may be a matter of service for many years. It may be a question of men serving year in and year out.

Another fact which must be faced is that the volunteer method of raising men for the forces is discredited in this country. It is discredited because of the unfairness there was in the last war and because of the many types of pressure which were brought to bear upon men to enlist. Conscientious high-minded young men of this nation were put on a mental rack over the question of whether or not it was their duty to offer their lives to their country. The volunteer method is also discredited because of the actions of this same government during the second world war. The record of the government on manpower and reinforcements is not such as to inspire much confidence in the Canadian people at the present time.

Then there is the fact that our young men expect direction from the government. In the latter days of the second world war we found that young men were being high-pressured to enlist for overseas service, and time and again they said: Let the government make up its mind; if it thinks we should go overseas let it give the order and we will go gladly. The attitude, "let the government take some responsibility", is abroad in the land today to a greater degree, I believe, than it was in 1944 and 1945, and it must be faced by members of the House of Commons.

In any event the forces are not getting the men today. The target for the active forces was 69,000. At the end of December the strength of the three forces had only reached 62,000. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) came into the house last week and announced that he was going to try to raise the men in our active forces to 115,000 in the next three years. He says quite frankly that it will require a very big effort to get that number of men. I believe there will also be trouble in getting men for defence production at home. It is obvious to me at any rate—and I suspect to many other members of the house regardless of party—that some form of selective service is necessary for defence production as well as for the forces if Canada is to become strong quickly and continue strong during this period of world tension—and that has been stated as the objective of the government.

I believe that the government should set the number and kind of men required for the forces and then choose them by lot from the group best fitted to serve. Let others volunteer if they wish. They will then be real volunteers and not volunteers who have been subjected to high pressure. Let there be a selective service law under which young men will be chosen by lot from the group best fitted to serve. The other day the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said that he would do this if necessary, but not yet. There is a very good test whether the Prime Minister meant what he said. If he meant it, why not take the power during this present session just as he is going to take stand-by power to bring in controls? Let him bring down the necessary legislation, have it frankly discussed in the house and get it on the statute books. Let us get the kinks ironed out. Let us get it in the best shape possible. That is not going to be an easy task because one has only to think of the great difficulty they have had in the United States in getting their selective service law into proper shape. Let the government do that now if they really mean what they say, and prevent delay later when delay may mean the end of this nation.

Let the government have national registration. There must be national registration before any selective service scheme can be put into effect. Let them go ahead with that registration now. Perhaps it could be done in connection with the census, but in any event my opinion is that for many reasons it should be done without further delay. One reason I would stress is that if there is a national registration in this country now that very action will bring home to the Canadian people the seriousness of the situation they face. Then they will have reason to believe it is the opinion of the government that Canada is in danger. Not many steps have been taken by the government as yet which would impress upon the people that the government really believes this country is in grave danger.

I know that a selective service law is not popular here or in any other country, and it never will be; but failure to enact such a law, or any further delay, would be very serious in the event of war, and Canadians should not be called upon to take that risk. Other nations have found it necessary to make this same hard decision. Every other nation which is a party to the North Atlantic treaty, except Iceland, has a selective service law. The United States has not found it any easier than we would. In the press this evening we find that the senate armed services committee yesterday recommended the draft for eighteen year olds in the United States, and made that recommendation unanimously. Everyone here knows that would not be an easy recommendation for any democratic body to make. They had been inundated with wires and protests against drafting eighteen year olds, but they found it necessary to make that recommendation. Let us be honest; here in Canada much of the emphasis being placed upon the volunteer system is for political reasons and nothing else.

The second part of this subamendment, which as I said before is put forward as one way of making this nation prepared, has to do with the reserve forces. It is of importance that members of this house and the Canadian people should thoroughly understand the role of the reserve army. In the second session of 1945, after the last war, when the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) was minister of national defence he gave a very clear explanation of the role of the different branches of our forces in the post-war years. On October 16, 1945, at page 1136 of Hansard for that year, the minister described the role of the Canadian reserve army as follows:

> In so far as the reserve army is concerned, it is to be organized as a force of six divisions with supporting armoured elements and selected corps and army troops for an army of two corps.

Then this is very important:

> In addition, the reserve army will include our operational coast and anti-aircraft artillery units and supporting services necessary for the static defence of the country.

In other words the defence of Canada against air attack was left in the hands of the reserve units; and I presume now that would include also the handling of radar. When the minister was questioned as to the size of the reserve force he said, at page 1179:

> The strength of six divisions plus would indicate that it would be somewhere in the vicinity of 130,000 to 150,000 men, with supporting troops which might be somewhat substantially in excess of that.

The plan was that the reserve army should have a strength of from 130,000 to 150,000. The minister also stressed the great importance of the reserve army, which he referred to as "this important force which will form the background of any possible future military endeavour". The same importance attaches to the reserve force today. I have here one of the advertisements issued by the Department of National Defence urging men to join the reserve force, published on January 10, in which I find these words:

> How Important Can a Man Be?
> Today the Canadian army reserve force assumes a place of importance to Canada's freedom that is almost unparalleled in our history.
> In order that this country may take its rightful place among free nations of the world in the preservation of peace and freedom, Canada must make her reserve force strong.

We must always remember that the reserve army is the force relied upon to defend this country in the event of attack. I have warned the house repeatedly that if there were a world war there would be attacks on northwestern Canada from Siberia. In the current issue of Maclean's magazine I find an article by Colonel Nicholas Ignatieff in which he states his belief that the plan of the Russians would be to invade Alaska in force and to drop Siberian bands in Canada's north. No doubt many hon. members have read that article; if they have not I suggest they do so. It goes to show how vitally important the role of the reserve army will be in the event of a third world war.

Today I believe the strength of the reserve army is between 40,000 and 50,000. The minister did not give the figures the other evening, and if I am wrong I should be glad to have him correct me. The number required to bring the reserve army up to strength must be something like 100,000, at least to bring it to the strength planned in 1945, and probably even more men would be needed at the present time.

I have here a dispatch giving the numbers in the reserve army regiments in Vancouver. The other evening I gave the figures for the 65th light anti-aircraft regiment, Irish Fusiliers, which would have to protect us from air attack. It had 200 officers and men, which was 700 below its complement. The British Columbia regiment, Duke of Connaught's Own Rifles, the only tank regiment west of the Rockies, was looking for 500 men to add to its present strength of 220, according to the officer commanding, Colonel T. B. Nash. Lieutenant Colonel E. A. Royce, commander of the 15th field regiment, RCA, said his unit was 640 men under strength. The Seaforth Highlanders, that famous unit which served with the first Canadian division, under Lieutenant Colonel Allan W. Mercer had 250 men who could be equipped with light arms, mortars and anti-tank guns and the unit has facilities to train 900 men.

Here in Ottawa I notice that there is quite a hue and cry about civil defence. There is quite properly fear of an air raid. I suggest that the members from this district and the people of Ottawa find out the strength of the reserve unit that is supposed to protect them from air raids. I suggest that they find out the strength of the reserve anti-aircraft regiment which is supposed to protect this capital city of Canada in the event of an air raid. I think they will discover that it will take several times the number of men the unit already has, plus several months of training, for that unit to be in a position to defend this city.

It surely must be obvious to everyone that these units must be filled if they are to be effective. That is the meaning of this sub-amendment and that is the meaning of the Canadian Legion brief. Neither that sub-amendment nor the Canadian Legion brief is advocating universal military training through the reserve forces in Canada. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), in his speech of yesterday, based much of his argument on the fact that what was being asked for was universal military service in the reserve force; and the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Jones) did the same thing in his speech just a few minutes ago. Both of them pictured the hundreds of thousands of men who would have to be handled by the reserve units. No one is simple enough or foolish enough to advocate that a step of that kind should be taken. What this amendment advocates and what the Canadian Legion advocate is that the units of the reserve forces be brought up to strength by compulsory service. That is an entirely different thing.

Here again I suggest that the government set the number and the kind required, choose them by lot from the groups best fitted to serve, and let others volunteer if they wish to do so. In that way we shall get in our reserve forces the men best able to do the job. Operational units, such as our anti-aircraft regiments, our radar units and our coast defence regiments wil' be able to fulfil their functions. The men in the reserve army will get at least partial training; and how important training was when the Department of National Defence were trying to get young Canadians to enlist for the special service force! I have here in my hand their advertisement of August 8, 1950. The words printed across the bottom are as follows:

> Armed aggression must be met with trained united strength.

That was true then and it is even more true today; and it applies to the reserve forces as well as to the active forces. Taking the action I suggest would certainly cut down the time in which these reserve units could get into action; and time is of the essence in this business of fighting a war in 1951. It would also give the reserve units a chance to do their job, and that job is to defend Canada.

Arguments have been made about the practicability of such a plan. I believe that the men in the Legion have just about as good an idea as anybody in Canada as to what is or what is not practicable in the matter of defending this country. There you have a body of Canadians who are just as responsible in their thinking and in their action as any group of Canadians in the nation, including the group sitting here in the House of Commons. These men of the Canadian Legion do not take steps without the most careful consideration or without believing that the steps they are advocating are right. The fact that they have advocated such a step in itself shows the practicability of that step. There are others whom one might call in support of the practicability of this measure. I have here a press dispatch from Victoria, dated February 3 of this year. It is headed "Call-up Ruling Bad News for Reserve Unit" and reads as follows:

> Disappointment was expressed in reserve army circles here today over the government's decision there will be no call-up of young men to fill the badly under-strength reserve battalions of this area.
> "If that's the way it is, we'll just have to continue as best we can and hope voluntary enlistments will resume at the January rate," said Lt. Col. Walter Mosedale, commander of the First battalion, the Canadian Scottish Regiment (Princess Mary's).

We hope, however, the government will see fit to provide some additional compensation to make the reserve army more attractive to young men.

Then I have another witness here, namely Major-General M. H. S. Penhale, C.B.E., C.B., who has been the general officer commanding western command, and has now retired. He was questioned about this Legion plan less than a month ago. In fact, the press dispatch is dated just one month ago tonight. Here is what he had to say:

"There are so many competing interests and activities, it is difficult to persuade men to devote their time to the reserve."

General Penhale said he supported the Canadian Legion stand for compulsory military training in the reserve force.

"Every other country has had to come to compulsory training. I don't know why we should be privileged," he said.

His statement to the other Vancouver evening paper was to the same effect. The dispatch reads as follows:

Canada's reserve army needs more men, says Major-General M. H. S. Penhale, retiring general officer commanding western command.

Interviewed here on his farewell visit to Pacific coast military units, the army chief declared: "I am in favour of any scheme that will fill up the ranks of the reserve force."

Asked if he favoured the Canadian Legion plea for compulsory military training service for all Canadian youth, he replied indirectly:

"Just about every other country has had to come to this."

Then there is the submission made by the conference of defence associations. Portions of that have been read by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness). I do not intend to read all of it this evening, but there are one or two portions which I think should be read to this house. These are statements by the men who are responsible primarily for the reserve army of Canada:

The threat of war has never been greater. The need for strength if war is to be averted and to meet that danger if it comes is recognized by every democratic country in the world, including our own. It is admitted that to successfully prosecute a war against our potential enemies will take every effort the free countries of the world can put forth. Every country of the Atlantic pact, with the sole exceptions of Canada and Iceland, has adopted some form of selective service. In all these countries, including our own, vast sums are to be spent on the armed services.

Reserve units have been asked to recruit to strength, if possible. The need for strong reserve units is therefore recognized.

Years of experience have taught us all that to obtain anything like the number of men now required in the reserve force by voluntary means is impossible. Large sums have been spent on advertising and in other ways to induce men to join the reserve force. To a large extent, such moneys have been wasted. The men have not been and are not coming forward.

The men represented through the conference have exhausted every effort to improve these conditions and have sacrificed time and their own money in such efforts.

The delegates to the conference feel that, since the effectiveness and efficiency of the reserve force is largely their responsibility, and that of the men they represent, they would be derelict in their duty to the government and to their fellow countrymen if they did not put before that government and the people of Canada their views as to the present state of the reserve force.

Then they go on to deal with the fact that we are not getting value for our money, and continue:

In spite of the existing shortages of facilities for the reserve force, in many places the strength of units does not absorb present facilities for training by a substantial margin. Far more men could be trained in the reserve force than are presently coming forward.

The turnover of other ranks is such that the vast majority of men who appear from time to time on the nominal rolls of reserve force units receive no training worthy of the name. They do not stay with the unit long enough. To say that the reserve force is 40,000 strong, and to give the Canadian people the idea that it has 40,000 men who could quickly be ready for action, is a travesty of the facts. There are few, if any, reserve units in Canada that could be ready to function in action under a minimum period of six months. This includes anti-aircraft and other such units which should be ready for immediate action. The Canadian public, in spite of the moneys spent, cannot look to effective and efficient protection from internal sabotage or external aggression from its reserve force for a considerable period after war breaks out, and the active force is far too small to undertake the full burden of such duties.

The modern army, with modern equipment, requires vast numbers of men specially trained. These men are termed tradesmen or specialists. The shortage of such men, most of whom require many months of training, in addition to their ordinary training as soldiers, is almost total in the Canadian reserve force—and there is not the slightest hope of producing the numbers required under the present voluntary system.

They go on to point out:

If it is not to be Canadian policy to lean on our allies in the initial stages of a war—and we are satisfied that the national pride of our people will tolerate no such situation—then men must be made available for training now.

This will involve a national registration system and the introduction of an enforceable and enforced system of selective service for the reserve force. Only in this way will the reserve force obtain the men it needs, the training it must have, and the effectiveness which the Canadian people are entitled to expect in view of the expenditures involved. Only in this way can we build a reserve force to which Canada can look with confidence.

The minister offers no other way. In his speech the other evening he did not answer this question as to how reserve forces were to be raised. By the way, I also have a clipping from the dominion executive of the Naval Officers Association of Canada setting out that the situation in the naval reserve is much the same. The minister offers no other way. In other words, the government is failing to ensure preparedness for Canada, and if for no other reason I would vote for this amendment in an attempt to force some action by the government.

The third part of the subamendment is equality of sacrifice and service. That means equality of sacrifice and service in fighting, in dying; equality in preparing to defend Canada, and equality as between the men in the forces and the civilians, and do not forget that we are now in a time when prices are running wild. I believe it will be far more difficult to prevent profiteering in the years immediately ahead than it was during the last world war.

In 1939 when this house met on the outbreak of war a determination was expressed by practically every hon. member who spoke, that there must be equality of sacrifice and service, referring particularly to the men in the forces and the civilians. In this debate practically no mention has been made of that principle. No plans have been envisaged which keep that principle in mind. I think it is a very significant thing, and a very tragic thing, that there has not been more emphasis placed on equality of sacrifice and service. That is a policy which must be kept always in our minds and before the Canadian people.

Today there is far too much of the attitude that this is somebody else's war in Korea, some other country is in danger, not Canada. There is far too much of that attitude. This house and the Canadian people are not yet facing realities, although today young Canadian lads in the Princess Pats are moving up the frozen dirt roads of Korea to the battle line, going to what for many of them means death.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the last few days we have listened to two members of the Legion offer two different ideas; one has just resumed his seat, the other was the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes). Yesterday, the hon. member for Nanaimo spoke as a great Canadian. He also, although he did not know it until this moment, is a former officer-commanding of mine in the second world war. Since listening to his ideas yesterday and the ideas of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra tonight, the latter speech based on half a dozen newspaper clippings, the other hon. gentleman speaking from his own experience, I am willing to go along with my former O.C.

Much is being made of this idea of compulsory service in the reserve force. I am speaking only about the Vancouver situation. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra said that the Seaforths had the equipment for 900 men. I know that at Bessborough, for instance, which was the headquarters of my old regiment, you could perhaps put 250 men on parade, but I certainly could not have done any training at that time. The hon. member for Nanaimo knows the place very well. Where are these men that you are going to call into the reserve force going to be trained? I can say from the artillery angle perhaps better than any other that it takes at least two years to put a man on a twenty-five pounder and train him properly. You cannot do it in less time. They tell us here that three nights a week with two hours a night can train men for the defence of Canada. Three nights a week and two hours a night mean thirty days of training in a year. In thirty days in the last war we just about got a man ready to be able to put his hat on properly and find out where the cookhouse was, and perhaps he knew how to wear his uniform properly, and that is all the time we had.

During the last war I was in the instructional cadres of most of the training centres in Canada, and on coast defence, and I think it can be said that you cannot train men on part-time service. We have seen reserve forces go out with the twenty-five pounders on the coast and, with all due respect to them, while they do a very good job I doubt very much whether they would be much use in Korea.

There is only one way to get men into the army and to train them properly. The Prime Minister said the other day that when the time comes action, and proper action, will be taken. The proper action at that time, if we need men, is compulsory service, conscription, or whatever you wish to call it; and that is what I am in favour of, at the proper time. This compulsory service in the reserve force was perhaps a fine idea to put in a brief to present to the government, but I do not think there is any effectiveness to it.

I am a member of the Legion; but I still believe that it was ill-timed for the Legion to present this idea before they knew the government's program at this session. The subamendment asks the house to approve of reserve forces for home defence. I think I want to go a little further than did the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) the other night, when he spoke about the forces that were introduced into military service during the last war. He did not know it at the time, but I know now whom to blame for giving me the job of trying to take some of these home defence men and make them active. Perhaps some day I will be able to get back at him. That was one of the most disgraceful episodes in the history of the Canadian army, when we took men in the home defence force under the universal training idea and gave them the status of home defence troops, at one time not even giving them the privilege of putting "Canada" on their sleeves. I remember that in Petawawa they walked down one side of the street and we walked down the other side, because we had a little badge on our arms with the letters "G.S.", and they were not permitted to use it. That was the caste system in the lower ranks of the army; and we do not want that back again.

If we are going into a war—perhaps some of the higher officers know, but it is not known to the backbenchers—let us go into it right. Let us go into it with that equality of service mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). If my boy has to go into the army, let him go in on the same basis as any other boy. Let the government take the lead and put him in the army, if we need him; but let my boy be on the same status as anybody else.

I am going to speak for only a moment longer. Let me congratulate the Legion upon at least bringing the need for preparedness to the attention of the country. I think their idea with respect to the reserve force should not be supported, and I told them that in Vancouver. So far as the Social Credit party is concerned, I think the subamendment is something that should have been thought about longer than evidently they did think about it. I intend to vote against it.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just preceded me has referred to some of the policies carried out during the last war regarding manpower. I would agree with him that many of those policies deserve severe criticism. I would say further that some of them were absolutely despicable. But who put in those policies? The Liberal government did.

Let me remind the house of one or two things that were done. I remember how men were asked to be willing to volunteer for four months' training. They were definitely promised that at the end of that four months they would be allowed to return to their occupations. After the government got those men into the forces they were frozen there, and the government would not let them go back to their jobs. In other words they obtained those men under false pretences.

That has nothing to do with this subamendment, but it was Liberal policy. Then again I would agree that the kind of campaign which has been described as a zombie campaign, that was used in order to try and force men in the reserve army to go active, was also despicable. That, too, was government policy. It was the policy of the Liberal party.

I would say that if anything like that ever happened again, any officer responsible for carrying out such a policy should be disciplined. I realize that any member who desires to vote against this subamendment will find it quite easy to make an excuse. So far however I have been struck by the weakness of the excuses that have been made. For example the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) stated that he supported the stand of the Legion but that he could not support the subamendment because it would mean something different, that it would mean setting up a different army. It is strange that he is the only man in the House of Commons who has come to that conclusion. Every other member who has spoken has recognized that our proposal is based upon the recommendation of the Canadian Legion. That was made clear when the subamendment was moved, and it has been made clear by every member of this group who has spoken. It has been clearly understood by other members in the house. Yet he, through some mysterious functioning of his mind, has jumped to the conclusion that this would set up an entirely different arm of the reserve army.

Let me read the subamendment, so that there may be no misunderstanding about it:

> To ensure that a complete program of preparedness including compulsory training in the reserve forces for home defence be executed with the greatest possible degree of equality of sacrifice and service.

Those words "compulsory training in the reserve forces" are the exact words used in the Legion's program, "operation preparedness". In order that there should be no misunderstanding on the point we have pointed out that we were putting it forward in the same way that the Legion was putting it forward.

It has been stated by some members that they agree with the general proposal to have compulsory training in the reserve army, but that they think the timing is wrong. They do not think it is wise to bring it up at this time. I would say that that depends largely on the seriousness of the international situation, and how great a degree of urgency there may be. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), when he spoke in the house, gave a very graphic description of the international situation, after describing the situation in China and in Korea, went on to say that at present there are a large number of danger spots in the world, and he made reference to Indo-China, Malaya, Indonesia and Burma, and stated that if those countries came under the control of the communists India and Pakistan would be in a precarious position. He referred to the fact that both Persia and the Middle East were vulnerable, and also stressed the danger to Yugoslavia. Then he said that the danger to the free world is still greatest in western Europe, and that we are now entering the period of the greatest danger, in the months ahead.

I think he made it quite clear that the situation in the world today is a very serious one. In his speech at Montreal the other day he mentioned the need for making haste. I would say that, with this picture in mind, and the knowledge that in Canada we have a very small population, considering the vast area over which that population is scattered, long lines of communication, great productive capacity, and great productive plants that have to be handled by this population, we should be careful indeed about the type of agreement that we sign under article 43 of the United Nations charter. If we sign agreements under that article of the charter by which we may be called upon to send forces to any part of the world where an act of aggression has been committed against a member of the United Nations we may find it impossible to meet our commitments under the North Atlantic treaty or to defend adequately our country against aggression, and of course, still further, to develop the resources of the country.

I regard the international situation today as being even more serious than the situation in either 1914 or 1939. I say that because the armed manpower against us is far more heavily weighted than it was on either of those former occasions. As is clearly pointed out in an article that appeared in the June issue of United Nations World headed in large letters, "Urgent" and with the subheading, "Memorandum on the Russian Military Power", Russia has 30,000,000 trained soldiers. The article continues:
