LETTER FROM GERMANY. To the Editor of the St. John Tribune. HEIDELBERG, July 1st, 1873. It was to be a day of rejoicing in Darmstadt, the capital of the Grand Duchy of Hesse. Ludwig III had completed the twenty-fifth year of his Dukeship, and the occasion was to be celebrated with far honor the festival with his presence, the Crown Prince of Prussia was to review the troops of the Duchy, and a whole host of lesser princes, from all the different provinces of Germany, were to lend their brilliant uniforms and noble presences to grace the festal day. You may be sure that a prospect of such inviting proportions would not be lost upon a somewhat republican, and plain going American, who, however much he may boast of the equality of men, and glory in a simpler and least titled governmental staff, yet never looses the opportunity of exercising his optics over the glancing glory of ropean Royalty. Moreover there was chance of balancing the opposites, for my road to Darmstadt lay along the most beautiful, perhaps, of all Germany, along the foot of the magnificent Odenwald; and the quiet beauty of nature would soothe my anxiety thither, and cool off the heated ardor of the day upon my return. One would not wish to look upon a lovelier sight, than, on this fair June morning, presented itself to the eye as the train moved slowly along through the village dotted plain at the base of THE ODENWALD. This is a wooded mountain district, lying between Heidelberg and Darmstadt, bont 40 miles in length and 30 in breadth. disorder of mountain and glen between the rivers Neckar and Main, abounding in ruins and traces of the middle age period. Its front is crowned with numerous tow-ers and castles to each of which is at-TEAN BOOTS parts, the old town and the new; con tains the inevitable Schloss and gardens tains the inevitable Schloss and gardens, a few statues, the three palaces of the Grand Duke and his two sons—rather unpretentious looking buildings,—a Boman Catholic church, built in rotunda form, supported by thirty massive pillars, and lighted only from the top, and the old Protastant Cathedral. It has the same rather unpleasant flavor of most German towns, owing to their bad system of sewerage, and its extreme flatness renders it uninterestedly tedious. In the Schloss is a valuable ibrary and also a picture gallery, containing about 700 paintings, many of which are very valuable. To these every-day items was, on this occasion, added another of a special character,—the Rhine Rose Exhibition,—in which, for a florin, one could look on in which, for a florin, one could look on a most superb collection of roses and house plants, and sicken himself with the oppressively sweet odor. There was little artistic grouping, no grottoes with nymphs and murmuring fountains; it was roses pure and simple arranged in large nympns and indimining foundaris; it was roses pure and simple, arranged in large wooden frames and reposing on mosses. The appearance was too artificial and monotonous to be pleasing; nature never does things in that way, and an exhibition of this kind should strive to maintain the matural a look as possible. But tion of this kind should strive to maintain as natural a look as possible. But what are roses and palaces to real living Royalties? The crowd seemed to have left the force of this question, for while the town curiosities and Rose Exhibition had their solitary visitors, the railway station and parade ground were filled to excess with the expectant multitude. The German people, although rather accustomed to sights of royalty and court pageants, seem to preserve their taste for these unimpaired by their frequency of occurrence, and use their elbows and shoulders as vigorously and as effectively as would a crowd of Americans on the trail of a Czar or British Prince. The multitude gradually made its way to the parade ground, whither, at 12 o'clock, the crown Prince of Prussia, the Prince of Hesse, and a numerous train of Princes Hesse, and a numerous train of Prince and Generals from other parts of Gen many repaired. The constitutional cool It rises abruptly in peak on peak from the Rhine plain, and runs back in a wild there hats were lifted, and among all was there hats were lifted, and among all was the most eager desire to see perceptiby; but no wild "hurrah," such as would have burst forth from a similar collection of British or Americans, allowed itself to be heard. The troops, once only on command of the officers, cheered the Crown Prince as he rode before the lines "on his prancing war horse lightly sitting." The review, in a military point of view, was said to have been satisfactory. I only knew that the troops as they marched past presented a very fine appearance; the men, evidently, had body; and just as clearly could one discern that they had more than average intelligence. The news gradually spread about that the Kaiser of Russia would arrive by train at three o'clock in the afternoon; and in the recess thus afforded, a general rush was made on the beer-houses and restaurants. The scene inside one of these baffles description.

which to-day looked extremely well, as most covered, as it was, with ducal flags, and hung with wreaths and garlands. One thing to be especially noticed in Germany is the great good feeling which exists between the various Dukes, and the consequent enthulasians and Princes, and their respective subjects and the consequent enthulasians and the consequent enthulasians. SPIRITS OF THE SEA. Over the wave and under the wave And through the waters deep. We dash, and splash, and merrily play, While whirlwinds are asleep: Nor spirits of earth nor spirits of heaven More merrisome than we. The spirits that live in the ocean wave, That live in the deep blue sea. From the foamy crest to the ocean's breast

Down to the dark glide we And there we play full many a day With the wonders of the sea.
We bind our hands with silvery bands Of warriors strong and fair, And our fingers twirl in the golden curl Of the maidens' flowing hair. All among the wrecks and through the decks Of warships high and long. We swifter pass than the lightning flash And light on the face of the sailor's youth A kiss, than fly away,

Up, up to the earth, the scene of his birth, To the mellow beams of day. Monsters we sweep from the pathless deep. And lay each crystal shell, A sandy bed remains of the dead, We guard with a mystic spell. With wind and with waves and ocean With the might of earth fight we. The spirits that lave in the ocean wave, That live in the deep blue sea.
