THE RUDDERLESS BOAT. There is a quiet drollery about the following oem that will recommend itself to those who re simplicity in merry conceits. The reader who is familiar with boats and beating will es ally appreciate its nauti al points.

His fishing-boat, a pretty craft,
Accommodated two—
(The bettom flat, of little draught)—
'Twas painted deepest blue;
'Twas painted thus to fool the sail,
Which often thought it a lue gale.

One night, when spiling on the bay,
The rudder got unshipped:
B fore Bill could his vessel stay
Away from it she skipped.
The rudder sank, I understand,
The taller started for the land. New, boats without a rudder feet Like birds without a wing, A wated without a balance-wheel, A wasp without a sting; And I might add, if called upon, A woman with her bustle gone.

Indeed, it would seem as though many country editors kept their best things for their rivals, giving only the crumbs from the table to the subscriber. One of the gentry seems to owe a deep grude to Alabama editors; he says:
"Since two of our Alabama brethren gouged, each an eye from the head of the other, peace has reigned. May they have a single eye ball to the public good and let dark villainies alone. Spaddassirs."

A Disgusted Widow. The body of a man was found drowned poses, doubtless to detect whiskey. As to the mouth it has received unnumbered attacks of the most cruel and deliberate character. One of the Chicago papers refers to a St. Louis editor as smiling:

The body of a man was found to when the other day, and the coroner after examination identified it as that of one John Bolan. The remains were given over to the widow, "A sweet, sweet smile just four inches and were recognized by her and prepared

Another Western journal says:

"He was a jolly Boston man

And when he gave his sweetest smile.

It measured two feet nine."

But it is to be presumed that this is a slight exaggeration.

It seems as though any excuse was sufficient to make some editors personal. One editor speaks of his good health in calm words, but his rival takes him up on it and says: it and says:

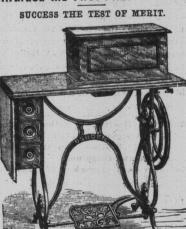

"Yes, he is still in good health, and still anaware that a small "g" is not equal to all the requirements of either reverence or good composition."

An important legal decision was rendered by the Court of Review. Some time since a Priest named Archambault at Richelieu, Quebec, denounced one Derionn from the pulpit and advised his expulsion from the Parish. Deriron sued the Priest for libel, when Judge Routhier decided that the law could take no cognizance of anything said by a Priest in the pulpit. The case was appealed, and yesterday the Judges reviewed, and reversed Judge Routhier's decision and fined Archambault fifty dollars. The Judges sitting on the review were Mondelet, Johnson and Torrance.

Next day you go to the Portland Police Court and have the officers running around for you. Then you appear here again with a complaint of assault and robbery. "Over stony ways,
In little sharps and trebles."
