Fire without Wood or Coal. PERPETUAL AND ECONOMICAL SOURCE

In a law afraid Jack is dying, poor boy, said the grave faced old gentleman, in a low tone.

They came in softly. The young girl sat upon a low stool, with all the roses faded out of her young cheeks, and Jack's emaciated hand clasped lovingly between her plump, white ones, while the dying man bent upon her a look of unutterable tenderness, and lay seemingly content.

The fluttering leaves just touched by the silver light of the moon made quivering shadows on the wall as the wind stirred them softly. The lights far down the village streets, flickered and went out one by one. The coarser laugh of some belated miner, the drowsy hum of a beetle and the soft plash, plash of the river broke the silence. Away in the west fell the long, dark shadow of the mountains and the fragrant breath of their pines come in through the open windows. Once or twice Jack closed his eyes wearily and murmured to himself:

'The same face—the same face! Oh A correspondent has sent us a startling twice Jack closed his eyes wearily and murmured to himself:

'The same face—the same face! Oh Bernice, my darling!'
And so he died.

A day or two later, there was a function in the little cabin, and only two mourners wept above the grave that was made in one corner of the little lot—for, by Jack's own request, he was laid in the shadow of the dark evergreens that had sheltered him through so many long, sorrowful years.

The old gentleman stayed but a few days arranging Jack's business affairs, days arranging Jack's business affairs, days arranging Jack's business affairs.
