Has the minister given consideration to the setting-up of a form of remission service so that, instead of the accused appealing in every case against a sentence which he regards as unfair and unjust, the officers of the department would have the power and also the responsibility of immediately reviewing the circumstances in each case to the end that uniformity of sentences be secured in all provinces?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister has not given consideration to that, and is not yet convinced that it would be proper for him to do so. Under our system the administration of justice is given to the courts, and the minister would feel that it would be impertinent on his part to set up a bureau in his department to review, modify and harmonize the judgments rendered by the courts of justice. The only power that exists in the federal authority to deal with that is the power of clemency exercised by His Excellency on the recommendation of a minister of the crown. It would be going much beyond what the power of clemency implies to set up an administrative court or bureau of review to deal with sentences pronounced by the courts of justice.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In reality, is that not what has being done by the remission branch here for a period of time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, that is not what has been done by the remission branch or a period of time. What is done by the remission branch is to take the sentence as a proper sentence imposed by the proper authorities and then to see whether there are features in the case which would make it one which could be recommended to the sovereign for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In connection with remissions, is the system of personal interviews carried out? What I have in mind is this, I know there are counsel and so on, but we will assume that a man is in Stony Mountain penitentiary. Does someone from here personally chat with that fellow and so on before he makes up his mind?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not in every case. There are inspectors who, when they inspect the penitentiaries, have interviews with those who are applying for some measure of remission; but it must not be forgotten that the prerogative of clemency is exercised not only with respect to those who are confined to federal institutions but also with respect to those who are in provincial gaols. It frequently happens that there is an application for clemency with respect to a sentence being served in a provincial gaol. That is dealt with without there being a personal interview between anyone connected with the Department of Justice here and the applicant. In those cases, the application is dealt with on the basis of information obtained form others than officers of the Department of Justice.

Item agreed to.

99. Expenses of litigated matters, $25,000.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What were the expenses for litigated matters during the current year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: $9,960.64.

Item agreed to.

Exchequer Court of Canada—
102. Administration, $48,540.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On the last occasion that these estimates were before the committee a question arose with regard to the number of judgments which had been held up in the exchequer court for a period of more than one year. During the war, having regard to the tremendous volume of litigation as between the crown and private individuals, the exchequer court found itself in the position where the judges got far behind in their work. As I see it, in no case was it due to any lack of efficiency on the part of the judges, but rather to the lack of sufficient judges and also to the increased amount of litigation. However, a serious situation had developed in that, as I remember it, fifty cases had been concluded without any judgment having been given. Would the minister advise whether that situation has been met and to what extent judgments have not been delivered for a period of more than one year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It will be remembered that parliament provided for the appointment of an additional judge, who was appointed about a year ago. Since that time an effort has been made to have the new cases tried by the new appointee, or by judges assigned as ad hoc judges to the exchequer court. Three ad hoc judges have assisted in the work of the exchequer court during the course of the last year: His Honour Judge Cameron, Mr. Justice Smith and Mr. Justice Michaud, and they heard quite a large number of cases. Since the first of January His Honour Judge Cameron has delivered judgment in three cases and has one still under consideration. Mr. Justice Smith heard two cases and delivered judgment since the first of January, and Mr. Justice Michaud, ten, and has four still under consideration.

The president of the court just a few days ago, less than a week ago, when I asked the clerk of the court for a report, still had under advisement twenty-three cases, ten of which were of 1945 and 1946, and thirteen of which were of 1943 and 1944. Mr. Justice Angers had twenty-three, fourteen of which were of 1944 and nine of 1945 and 1946, and Mr. Justice O'Connor still had eight reserved in 1946.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): How many did Mr. Justice O'Connor try?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Since his appointment? I have not that figure; but the information I have is that the cases which have been tried by Mr. Justice O'Connor have been disposed of without there being accumulation. The president of the court and Mr. Justice Angers still have several of these cases of 1944 and early 1945 that have not yet been disposed of, but they are being disposed of with considerable dispatch. The president of the court has disposed of seven since January 1, 1946, and Mr. Justice Angers has disposed of twelve. I was informed also that the president of the court had three judgments about ready which he expected to hand down within a very short time and that Mr. Justice Angers had five which he was completing and which would be handed down within a short time.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Under this item I see that the salary of the registrar is given as $5,000 and that of the deputy registrar as $3,720. I have had quite a bit of experience in the exchequer court, in patent matters; I know the importance of the post of registrar and deputy registrar, especially now that there are three judges on the exchequer court. I know the work of a good registrar and a good deputy registrar is important, and since the minister's predecessor saw fit to increase the salary of the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada to $7,500, for work which is comparable with that of the registrar of the exchequer court, I feel that some consideration should be given to making the salary of the registrar of the exchequer court at least respectable.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The question of the salary of the registrar, and the salaries of the additional help that will be required in order that the affairs of the court may be dealt with as expeditiously as possible, is under consideration.

Item agreed to.

103. Yukon territorial court—administration, $5,040.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not a lawyer; I do not know much about these matters, but I notice that in Ontario we have some sixty-five county court judges who receive salaries of $5,000 each. I understand that the minister has under advisement at the present time the matter of increasing the salaries of some of these judges, but I should like to point out that we have several of these county court judges living in the city of Toronto, and I know their cost of living is much greater than is the case in some of the smaller places. So that it seems to me there should be some differential when we decide what the county court judges should receive in future. I do not know whether the judges of the circuit court in the province of Quebec would be equivalent to the county court judges in Ontario, but I notice that these judges in Quebec receive $7,000. I notice also that in that province there are thirty-eight judges receiving $9,000 each. There do not seem to be many county court judges in Quebec. I do not know the principle of the thing, but I know how hard these men are worked. A salary of $5,000 might have been all right when they took the job, before the war when the income tax was a great deal lower than it is to-day, but these men are in responsible positions, and I want to put in a word on their behalf in order that when this salary revision takes place some consideration may be given from the point of view of the places where these judges reside, so that they will not be all treated in the same way. Certainly I believe the cost of living might be taken into consideration.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am afraid the hon. member will be disappointed. That point has been given careful consideration; and while there is much to be said for the views expressed by the hon. gentleman, if he could see the representations I have received from all over the country since it became rumoured that there was to be a difference as between judges living in one place and those living in another, he would conclude, as we have had to conclude, that the proposal we shall make to parliament—of course parliament will deal with it as it may see fit—will have to be uniform for all county court judges.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I notice that under this item there is an increase of $9,000 in the salaries and travelling allowances of judges.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The committee is considering item 103, Yukon territorial court, administration, $5,040. Shall the item carry?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Oh, no; you are going too fast.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Might I point out to the hon. member that the matter to which he refers is not a vote. It is just included to show what is required by statute to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund for salaries of judges. If the hon. member were here this afternoon he heard that a bill is to be introduced this year to deal with judges' salaries. The salaries are not voted, but the amounts required are indicated in the estimates for the information of hon. members. The matter of what is the proper salary and why there should be an increase will be gone into fully when the bill to modify those salaries is brought before the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am not so much concerned about the salaries; what I wanted was a little information concerning the allowances. Do they include allowances for wives of judges?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no allowance for wives of judges.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Having regard to the number of judges who are serving on boards, such as those under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and other administrative bodies, is it a fact that these judges receive allowances over and above their official salaries while they occupy these positions? If so, will the minister give a list of the judges who during the current year received, in addition to their indemnities as judges, additional amounts earned while serving on boards or administrative bodies? That is one subject which is the cause of considerable complaint among the judges themselves, that certain members of the judiciary, while occupying such positions, receive the full amount of their indemnities as judges and, in addition, payments for other services. I am not going to mention anyone specifically, but I know of two cases where judges occupied administrative positions and were paid on a per diem basis. Their absence not only disturbs the court but also causes not a little annoyance to the other members of the bench on whom additional duties fall by reason of their absence.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: All I can say to the hon. member is that the only additions the judges receive from the Department of Justice, beyond their statutory salaries, are the travelling allowances which are also fixed by statute.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That does not answer the question at all. Let me put a specific example before the minister, that of a judge of the high court who receives $9,000 a year if he is a puisne judge and a larger amount if he is a chief justice. While receiving that indemnity, this judge serves as chairman or other officer under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, and receives an additional amount for the services he renders. That is referred to as expenses, but I want to find out if it is $15 a day or $25 a day that he receives while performing these extra services. Whatever the additional amount is, I want a list of the judges who have received additional amounts, over and above their indemnities, from the federal government during the past year.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall have to make the hon. member's question an order for return. A judge gets nothing additional from the Department of Justice. If he is acting under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, which is under the administration of the Minister of Finance, I am not in a position to say whether there is an allowance there, or what it is. I shall bring the hon. member's question to the attention of the Minister of Finance, and perhaps we can have an inquiry made in the various departments.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is satisfactory.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: But the Department of Justice certifies the vouchers for payment of salaries provided by the Judges Act, and the travelling expenses and allowances under that act.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I understood the minister to say that no allowances were paid to judges' wives. I recall that a while back one or two judges were sitting on a board of arbitration, and the wives did receive special allowances. Has that any connection here?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I say to the hon. member, as I said to the hon. member for Lake Centre, that there have been occasions when judges have been required to fulfil special functions with other departments; and it may be that there were arrangements under which they got expenses, or perhaps even allowances for doing so. But that was not from the Department of Justice. If the hon. member would say what the function was I could inquire from the department under which that function was fulfilled.

Mr. JOHNSTON: There would be nothing extra in this vote.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, there is nothing in this. This is really not a vote, but rather a statement to the house that the amount payable under the Judges Act for the salaries fixed by parliament, and the amount payable for travelling expenses, aggregate the figure mentioned here.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Would the Department of Justice recommend an additional amount like that as travelling expenses for judges wives?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; that would be an arrangement made by the department requiring the special services.

Mr. JOHNSTON: To the Department of Finance.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, to the Department of Finance.

Mr. REID: How are the supreme court judges apportioned? Are there as many supreme court judges in British Columbia, for example, as there are in Ontario? I understand that some of the smaller provinces, with smaller populations, have as many supreme court judges as Ontario.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The courts are established by provincial legislation. Provincial legislatures determine what they require in their provinces as courts of justice. All the federal authority has to do is to appoint and pay those judges. Sometimes it happens that a legislature provides for more judges than the federal authority feels are required. In such event, it does not fill all the vacanies created by the provincial authority. We are, however, very careful in that regard. We do not feel we should take an arbitrary stand. After all, the local authorities know best what is required. We try to exchange views, and to meet the legitimate requirements of the population.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It seems strange that the minister has not any information respecting the earnings of judges working for other departments of government or engaged on commissions for other departments. As an example, I refer to the coal inquiry which is now proceeding, and on which two judges of the supreme court are engaged, one from Nova Scotia and one from Alberta, and both estimable gentlemen. They have been engaged on that work for the last year. Do they receive their allowances as judges in their respective provinces during the time they serve on the coal inquiry; and do they receive, in addition to that, any per diem allowance designated as expenses, if you will, but generally of sufficiently generous proportions that it goes beyond that? And, if so, has the minister any information as to how much they receive?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They receive their salaries as judges under the Judges Act, when they are fulfilling commissions to which they are appointed by governor in council. They do not receive travelling expenses provided by the Judges Act for sittings in courts, because that would not be applicable. It had been the practice, in spite of the terms of the Judges Act, to have special allowances made without, it seemed to me, statutory authority. During the war that was provided for under the War Measures Act. Under that act an order in council was passed which provided that, notwithstanding the terms of this section of the Judges Act, allowances could be granted. I am not in a position to say what they are; but I am in a position to say that they have been carefully discussed and controlled by treasury board, because I know of disputes which have arisen between treasury board and others as to what they should be. I am, however, not in a position to say what they were in respect of the two judges to whom the hon. member has referred.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I should not like the committee to get the impression that no allowances are being paid to judges' wives. I do not know whether this is the proper occasion to discuss the matter, but I must point out that in the auditor general's report for 1945, at page 41, near the back of the book—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. JOHNSTON: —there is reference to two judges' wives receiving allowances in substantial amounts.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the estimate to which the hon. member is referring come under the Department of Justice? If not, it would not be in order.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If the minister will tell me what item it comes under I shall leave it to that item?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The minister cannot tell the hon. member what item it comes under, because it is not in his department at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON: But they certainly paid the judges' wives, and that is what we are discussing now.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; at present the committee is discussing estimates for the Department of Justice. The estimates of any other department cannot be discussed at this time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We might as well face the issue, so far as commissions are concerned. I have in mind in my own province two judges who served on royal commissions, one of whom received over $40,000 in a period of eight years.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): How long?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Eight years. The other received $26,000 in three or four years. I am sure, having regard to statements made by the minister on previous occasions, that he agrees that a judge's place is on the bench and that no measures should be taken which would enable judges to angle for preferment by securing commissions; because it places the judiciary in a position where, whether they are susceptible or not, they find themselves subject to the suspicion of being susceptible to influence in order to secure appointments on commissions. Appointment of judges to royal commissions is undermining our judiciary, because it places judges who are presumed to be removed from any influence whatever, in a position where, in order to secure preferment, the suspicion arises that political considerations are not always forgotten. For this reason the matter is of first importance, to assure the inviolability of the bench, which cannot be inviolable when judges find themselves in a position where from time to time they receive appointments which pay large amounts in addition to the salaries they receive as judges.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Were the amounts the hon. member for Lake Centre has mentioned paid in addition to the salaries these judges received?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Absolutely.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I can say to the hon. member that I know of no case where large amounts have been paid to judges acting on royal commissions. I know that on several occasions I have been asked to communicate with judges for the purpose of having them assume these special duties, and I have had to ask them to do it as a public service as something that was required to be done. I do not at all agree with the suggestion of the hon. member that there has been any angling for any one of these jobs. I will not say that I have communicated with every one who has been on these commissions, but every time that I have had anything to do with the appointment of a judge to one of these commissions I have found it difficult to convince him that he should perform this public service. I remember, not because it was something that came before me in the Department of Justice, but because it was something that came before me in connection with an allowance made to a judge who came here as chairman of the war labour board, that he would not have come if there had not been an expense allowance sufficient to enable him to bring his wife with him. There was a lot of discussion over the fixing of the amount.

[Mr. J. Sinclair.]

Mr. KNOWLES: That was ruled out because it was under the Department of Labour.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I heard of this as a member of the treasury board. I think the hon. member for Lake Centre is doing a disservice to the judicial body of Canada by his suggestion that there are judges angling for appointments on these commissions. That is not my experience, and I have been here now for almost five years. Whenever it has been necessary to get a judge to act on these commissions, I had to ask him to do it as a public service and frequently as a war service. While engaged on such services, judges have frequently come to me asking if I did not think they had done their share and asking to be relieved. I can assure the hon. member that the judges do not like to do that work.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On royal commissions?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That has been my experience.

Mr. JOHNSTON: One got $8,000 extra and another $6,000 extra.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us get the record straight. Take my own department.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If we are going to discuss the Department of Labour, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss the matter I raised a few moments ago.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The minister has not had an opportunity yet to let the committee know what he is going to talk about, so that I cannot rule him out of order.

Mr. MITCHELL: I had not intended to say anything on this question, because I am busy at the moment on what some members would call a week's work and which I am trying to do in half an hour. A great deal has been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre about the judiciary. When I was a young man in the labour movement in Hamilton judges were appointed, in the majority of cases, under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, to act as chairmen of conciliation boards. My mind goes back to Judge Snyder, who was always very fair and who the labour people of Hamilton always thought would render a fair decision.

Then, during the war it was customary to have judges act as chairmen of the mobilization boards. Again, we have had judges acting as chairmen of the national war labour board and the national labour relations board, and let me say that it takes some courage for a man to assume responsibility as chairman of such a board as the national war labour board. It is the easiest thing in the world for hon. members to rise in their places in the house and criticize when they have no responsibility. But I want to say to hon. gentlemen that the judges who have assumed these obligations under my department have rendered a service to the whole nation during the war period and in the post-war period too, for which they should be highly commended.

The hon. member for Lake Centre has introduced the political angle and talked about political preferment. I recollect asking Mr. Justice McTague to be chairman of the national war labour board, and he made an excellent chairman. When he had to retire because of pressure of the duties involved in such a responsible position, I asked Mr. Justice Archibald to assume the chairmanship of that board.

Mr. JOHNSTON: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, are we discussing Judge Archibald now?

The CHAIRMAN: There has been a general discussion to-night on the position of judges, and the Minister of Labour is discussing the general question of the services which have been rendered to our country by judges.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am speaking of my experience in my own particular field. It is difficult to get someone who is impartial to act in a labour dispute, but I am glad to say that the judges who have served as chairmen have been looked upon with high regard by both the labour men and the employers in this country. Take for instance, the dispute in inland shipping. Where, outside the judiciary, could you have got somebody to act as commissioner who would not be accused of being partial? Or take the great services rendered by Mr. Chief Justice Sloan in the dispute in British Columbia. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to rise in their places and suggest somebody else in British Columbia who would have undertaken that difficult assignment. So I go right down the line in the regional war labour boards, and I ask them to suggest to me somebody who would undertake those difficult assignments.

Mr. McIVOR: And handle them.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, and handle them the way they have done.

The hon. member for Lake Centre spoke this afternoon about salaries of judges. He said that it took some courage to say what he was saying about their salaries. With due deference to my hon. friend, it takes no courage at all to be just. and I think the time for the increase of the salaries of the judiciary of this country is long past and gone.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is not gone.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is gone up to the moment. I think it is an obligation on members of the House of Commons to see that that situation is rectified before this parliament prorogues.

Mr. FULTON: Yes, but not by appointing them to royal commissions.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend ever gets any responsibility in this country, and he is looking for someone with courage, he will go to just the same place as I have had to go, and that is to the judiciary. I hope that before parliament prorogues, we, irrespective of party, will see to it that the men who honour the bench in this country, and honour this country, receive the salaries to which, in my judgment, they are justly entitled.

Mr. JOHNSON: And old age pensions, too.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought my hon. friend would get down in the gutter again.

Mr. JOHNSTON: On a point of order, I ask that the minister withdraw that remark. Surely he would not imply that the old age pensioners are down in the gutter.

Mr. MITCHELL: All right.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I insist that he withdraw the remark.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He did not say that.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Bow River has requested a withdrawal.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have withdrawn it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If hon. members would not interrupt they would have heard the Minister of Labour say that he withdrew the statement.

Mr. MITCHELL: When my hon. friend talks about old age pensions he might bear in mind that I was advocating old age pensions before he ran for parliament. I want to tell my hon. friend that before he was ever heard of in this country—

Mr. NICHOLSON: You have not done much about it, though.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will my hon. friends be quiet for five minutes? I signed the agreement between the Hon. Howard Ferguson and the Hon. Peter Heenan which brought old age pensions into existence in Ontario.

Mr. NICHOLSON: For how much a month?

Mr. MACKENZIE: More than you ever gave them. It was given by a Liberal government.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think it is altogether fair to try to deflect the argument in this way. I was putting what I think is a sound, reasonable and just case for a group of men who have made a great contribution to this nation in war, and are making an equal contribution in the difficult reconversion period we are now passing through.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I want to add my word. I do not quite know whose side I am on in this thing.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You won't be against the judges, I suppose.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member for Vancouver North is quite right. The only way I ever succeeded in law was by standing in with them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: By convincing them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): In this way, I sent them a turkey but I sent it in the other fellow's name. That is the way to win a lawsuit. I am one of those who are anxious to agree with the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Labour and his Charley who is sitting in front of him and making a speech for him a moment ago. I want, in so far as I may, to uphold their hands in most of the things which they have said. I know that the compliments of the Minister of Labour to our judiciary were quite sincere. I call to his attention, however, that in this house last fall I made a suggestion to him that what I thought was wrong with our capital and labour relations was the lack of the introduction of the rule of law into these differences, and my suggestion was that we should have a judge or judges of the supreme court in each province to whom either party might go on a voluntary appeal. My thought was that now, once conciliation fails, we have strikes and really the rules of the jungle are the only rules by which these things are determined. The strong man or the strong company waits until it is going broke before it capitulates; the labour men engaged in the strike wait until they get hungry. This is the simple situation with respect to these matters.

Now what has happened? Mr. Justice Richards settled an incipient packers' strike all across Canada; meetings were held in Winnipeg and Toronto. I commend the minister for his appointment in connection with the seamen's matter, because both on the Pacific coast and in the interior of the country the appointee has done some amazingly good work. Then take the Ford situation, regarding which we were all so concerned last fall. Who settled that? A judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, Mr. Justice Ivan Rand. Then, from my own province, Mr. Justice O'Connor has been called in and has done some excellent work in that way. Now Chief Justice Gordon Sloan, a young man who, as someone so well said, has made two studies in that province, one, of the coal mining interests and areas, and second, with respect to the whole logging and lumbering business, has finally brought, as the minister said, a peaceful conclusion to the strike out there. In all these things no one gains; the strikers lose their pay; the operator loses his business, and the public fail to receive the commodities produced by the combination of capital and labour in these businesses. So I repeat, with the liberty which the Chairman generously granted a moment ago, because this discussion grew out of the question of judges' salaries, that every major labour dispute during the time we have been sitting here, and since we left here last fall, has been settled by these trained, impartial men, these men of integrity. Therefore, why should we not legalize the position and thus prevent strikes, and then we would not be so concerned with settling them?

Item agreed to.

105. Combines investigation branch, $67,430.

Mr. JAENICKE: There is one condition which I should like to bring to the attention of the committee and of the Minister of Justice in connection with combines and cartels. My story concerns Canadian Industries Limited. I do not think I need tell the committee much about this firm, because in the report, "Canada and International Cartels", which I believe was tabled last fall, the company is very well described. There is no question that, according to this report and to other facts which we know, this company has monopolies in the manufacture and sale of many commodities in Canada. One of these commodities in which the company has a monopoly is ammunition; that is, ammunition for civilian use, or what is usually called sporting ammunition. There is in Winnipeg a wholesale firm known as Merchants Consolidated Limited with a subsidiary called Falcon Hardware. This company, I may say, is owned by individual retail merchants throughout western Canada. These individual retail merchants are shareholders of these companies. Last fall this bona fide wholesale firm tried to buy ammunition from C.I.L. Although they were selling to other customers, however, they refused to sell to Merchants Consolidated and its subsidiary, Falcon Hardware. The company, or someone on their behalf, took the matter up with someone in Ottawa, with the result that, finally, last January, the company agreed to sell sporting ammunition to this concern. In order to make the situation clear, I shall read part of a letter which Merchants Consolidated wrote to their shareholders at the beginning of the year:

On January 26 we received a letter from the sales manager of the "dominion" ammunition division of Canadian Industries Limited, in which he stated that his company was now in a position to discuss the matter with us.

Later, this official wrote to state that he would call upon us either on the following Thursday or Friday. On Friday, February 8, he and his assistant called upon us and presented a letter addressed to this company under date of February 4, in which Canadian Industries Limited agreed to sell to the company on the basis of their "A" list, copy of which they attached to their letter. They stated that this list would be subject to discount of two and a half per cent on carload orders. They also set forth the quantity of ammunition they would be in a position to supply to us in the year 1946.

The prices on the "A" list are five per cent higher than the regular list applying to wholesale buyers. In other words, we are expected to pay five per cent more for ammunition than our competitors.

When I first was apprised of these facts I thought the company, that is C.I.L., was guilty of an infraction of section 498 (a) of the criminal code. However, there is a saving clause, so to speak, at the end of the paragraph, and discrimination must exist in respect of the sale of goods of like quality and quantity. I had heard that C.I.L. had claimed that this company was not buying in the same quantities as their other customers or some of their other customers, and I therefore made inquiries of the company as to their trade and their capacity to accept goods from C.I.L. I quote a part of their letter which I received last April:

We note that you state that C.I.L. maintain that they cannot sell to us at the same price as they do to the two larger wholesale hardware houses in this city,—

That is, Winnipeg.

—because they sell to these people in larger quantities than they would sell to us. We do not think this is a good argument. We are ready to concede that possibly at the present time these people are in a position to buy somewhat larger quantities than we are, but nevertheless we are prepared to buy, from C.I.L., ammunition in proper jobbing quantities. Also they will have on their books many accounts that will not buy any more than we buy and, in all probability, considerably less.

Further, it must be borne in mind that any figures that C.I.L. will quote as to the purchases of either of the two Winnipeg houses would include their western branches, which, obviously, is not a fair comparison.

At the present time, with the shortage of supplies, C.I.L. are not in a position, as their representative informed the writer, to ship in carload quantities to any one buyer. They have to incorporate orders for two or more buyers in a carload. Further, even in times of normal production, they make up what are known in the trade as "pool cars" to the various distributing points of western Canada. It is true that wholesalers may bring in, in the fall of the year, in times of normal production, straight cars for themselves.

In addition to all this, this company and Falcon Hardware Limited are buying from C.I.L., in every other branch of their business, the goods we handle, and never at any time has there been any suggestion made that our volume did not comfortably come within the quantities usually purchased by wholesalers.

I am further informed that they sell these other goods to Merchants Consolidated Limited at the same price as they sell to the other competitors of this wholesale firm, which proves to me that in cases where they have monopoly, such as ammunition, they discriminate against this firm.

I personally believe that, on the basis of these facts, C.I.L. committed an offence under section 498 (a) of the criminal code. I am glad to see that the former section 20 in the Dominion Trades and Industry Commission Act will be transferred, under the new amendment to the Combines Investigation Act, to the combines investigation commission. The question I have to ask of the minister is this: Has he been informed of these conditions which I have explained, or has the commission informed him of this complaint, which has no doubt been made, and is any action being taken?

While I am on my feet I should like to mention another matter that occurred to me a few weeks ago, and possibly other members may have some views in this regard. There was a news dispatch to the effect that in the United States the International Nickel company of that country was being prosecuted by the Department of Justice for an infraction of the anti-trust laws of the United States, and according to this newspaper report the Canadian International Nickel company seemed to be very much involved. The question in connection with this matter, which I would ask the Minister of Justice, is: Is he aware of the prosecution being conducted in the United States, possibly involving the Canadian company, and has he made arrangements for a watching brief in those proceedings so that we may be informed of any of the facts that might be disclosed in that court?

Mr. FULTON: May I associate myself with the hon. member for Kindersley in his last question. I have here the Northern Miner, and it would appear that the company involved is the International Nickel Company of Canada. I would add that to what the hon. member has said. It is the Canadian branch which apparently is involved in the proceedings in the United States. According to information appearing in the press, the president, the vice-president and the executive vice-president of the International Nickel Company of Canada are being sued; and this company, through its president, has issued a statement apparently denying the charges and expressing confidence —to quote from the Northern Miner—that "upon our record the United States courts will not sustain the Department of Justice." It appears, therefore, that the company will dispute the case. I would ask the minister whether he has any information with respect to this prosecution, which appears to involve the Canadian company, and, further, if he could as a matter of information tell the committee something of the work of the combines investigation branch. What I am particularly anxious to know is whether they set out to ascertain for themselves unfair trade practices and to uncover abuses, or whether they exist merely to investigate cases which have been reported to them.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This matter of the dispute between the C.I.L. and the Falcon Hardware company is still under investigation. Here is a case which may or may not, according to the facts disclosed by the investigation, fall under section 498 (a) of the code.

With respect to the case in the United States, the Department of Justice has not appointed counsel to hold a watching brief.

With respect to the third question, there is before parliament a bill which has already received its first reading and is due for second reading as soon as it can be reached, which will authorize the commissioner to make investigations whenever he has reason to believe that a combine or a monopoly exists or is being formed. The formal investigations are made upon complaints filed with the department. I think the hon. member and I are in agreement on the fact that it is probably better to prevent than to attempt to cure. It is hoped that the activities of the commissioner will be helpful, not only to the purchasing public but also to the trade, in pointing out to them in advance what things would amount to offences. Most people wish to avoid committing offences, and if they are informed and shown that there are certain things which they cannot do without falling foul of the law they are apt to refrain from doing them. It is hoped that there will be a spirit of cooperation; that is the line which is being followed at the present time; and unless and until the commission gets the amendments which are proposed in this bill which is now before parliament, its activities are hampered.

Mr. FULTON: Can the minister tell us for information purposes whether he has any knowledge of the charges against the International Nickel company, and what is involved in the case?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; the department has no information in that respect at the present time.

Mr. KNOWLES: Because of the international implications in this matter, should we be questioning some other department? The minister said that his department knows nothing about it. Does that mean the government is not concerned in the matter?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure whether the Department of External Affairs has received any information or not. It is not necessarily an international matter when a citizen of one country is prosecuted for violating the laws of another country. On more than one occasion we have instituted proceedings against United States citizens without its becoming an international question. There have been quite a number of proceedings instituted against dealers in securities, for instance, with the allegation that they have violated the laws of another country, and it does not necessarily bring about exchanges between the state department and our Department of External Affairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the fact that a United States department expressed concern about this company prompted the combines investigation branch or the minister's department to look into the same situation? Has what has happened in the United States prompted the investigation branch to make some inquiries of its own?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall have to ascertain whether the commissioner has yet started any inquiry in that connection. During the war period the activities of the commissioner were very much curtailed. As a matter of fact he was acting as an enforcement officer of many of the war-time regulations, because there was no opportunity for harmful effects from combines or monopolies while controls were being exercised by the wartime prices and trade board and by the administrators acting under the Minister of Munitions and Supply. But when these controls are removed there will be opportunity for combinations which may be harmful to the public. It is for that reason that the machinery of the commission is being put into shape to deal with the situation, and I am sure that the commissioner would secure all the information available about any Canadian concern which was charged elsewhere with constituting a combine or a monopoly.

Mr. KNOWLES: Perhaps the minister will have all the information to answer the questions we have in mind when we reach the bill amending the Combines Investigation Act and will be able to deal more fully with them.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: There is one matter which concerns me in connection with this vote. I take it that this is the total vote for the combines investigation branch?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is the total vote in the estimates, but there will have to be a vote in the supplementary estimates, because within the last three or four days I signed a recommendation to the treasury board for a supplementary estimate.

Mr. GREEN: I think that will be necessary because, as the minister knows, this vote for $67,430 is only $6,430 greater than the vote for last year, and the difference is not made up by any increase in staff but by promoting one official and then the difference in printing, stationery, sundries, telephones, telegrams, postage and travelling expenses.

I believe that the people of the country are much concerned about the activities of cartels and combines. As hon. members know, we had a report just a few months ago submitted by Mr. F. A. McGregor, who is the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. The report is entitled: "Canada and International Cartels", and is described as "An inquiry into the nature and effects of international cartels and other trade combinations." Among his recommendations I find the following on page 67:

> It is recommended that there be more adequate provision for the initiation of inquiries by the combines investigation commission into restraints of trade and unfair trade practices.

Then Mr. McGregor goes on to point out that:

> In the administration of the Combines Investigation Act in the future it will be necessary to engage to a greater extent than in the past in activities which will serve to prevent—the development—

And apparently he emphasizes those last two words:

> —the development of undue restraints of trade as well as to take prompt action to prevent the continuation of such abuses. The successful development of preventive activities will require that necessary inquiries be initiated by the commission without depending solely on the filing of statutory applications by the public, which ordinarily are not received until after the effects of a restrictive trade arrangement have become widespread.

He goes on to say:

> It is recommended that steps be taken to build up an effective organization under the Combines Investigation Act to maintain much more comprehensive scrutiny of restrictive practices and developments than has heretofore been attempted.

Then he says:

> To do this it will be necessary to recruit and train an adequate staff and to provide appropriations sufficient to enable the organization to function effectively. Such an organization should have the responsibility of securing at all times as full information as possible with respect to domestic—

Then he adds:

> —and international trade combinations and monopolies and their effects on the producers and consumers of Canada.

It seems fairly obvious that if this commission is to carry out these increased activities a more effective machine will have to be set up. I would ask the minister to tell the committee whether or not it is the intention to implement the recommendation of the commissioner in this report on cartels and combines. As I said a few moments ago, the Canadian people are very much concerned about cartels and combines, and I think will be solidly behind whatever action may be necessary to curb their illegal and unfair activities. Apparently most of that work will have to be done by the combines investigation branch, so that obviously there must be some further vote than we have before us at present; otherwise nothing more can be done than has been done in the past.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is the intention of the government to recommend to parliament substantial implementing of the recommendations of this report; and bill No. 193 has been designed for that purpose. If parliament adopts that bill the supplementary estimates will contain the financial provision necessary to put the commissioner in a position to carry out the programme outlined in the report.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister tell us in what way the organization is to be strengthened?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At this time I would not care to speak without having before me the detailed programme I had a few days ago when I made the recommendation to treasury board for inclusion of the amount required in the supplementary estimates. At that time I had before me a schedule of the set-up proposed by the commissioner, with the extension of the cost of carrying out that programme, and it went before treasury board in order to have the necessary amount included in the supplementary estimates. It is the kind of set-up the commissioner felt would be required substantially to implement the programme set out in his report.

Mr. GREEN: That should meet the case, then.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries branch—
106. Branch administration, $133,499.

Mr. BRYCE: Coming from a constituency in which we have one of the largest penitentiaries, I have some matters I wish to bring before the Minister of Justice. I should like to urge once more that the warders and guards employed in the prisons should have at least a 44-hour week. Recently we have had quite a lot of people wanting a 40-hour week. This is a government institution, and surely we should not begrudge these men a 44-hour week. If, because of sickness or for any other reason, they have to work longer than that, such extra time should be allowed as overtime; or if that is against the regulations of the department, they should at least have time off equal to the extra time they put in. In case of sickness they may have to work a great many hours extra, so that I should like the minister to look into this matter and see if it is not possible to grant the penitentiary employees a 44-hour week.

On previous occasions I have appealed to the government in regard to the wages paid these men. I think they should receive more money because, if you want good men there, who will rehabilitate those who have gone wrong, you need a fine type of citizen, and with the wages you are paying to-day you will not get men of that type. The wages are not sufficient to attract men coming out of the armed forces. I refer to the report of the royal commission on the penal system of Canada, in which the commissioners had this to say:

> It is also imperative that the pay of officers should be raised to a standard somewhat comparable to the rates prevailing in other similar services. It is hopeless to expect to get competent penitentiary officers at salaries that are considerably less than the wages paid to street cleaners in the large cities of Canada.

If there is anything we need to improve it is our penitentiaries, and that improvement can only be brought about by employing the best men available. So that I would ask the minister to take this into consideration.

Then I would suggest that when vacancies occur in the penitentiary service they be advertised in all penitentiaries, so that men possessing the necessary qualifications may move from one part of the country to the other. This would mean more rapid promotion for good men and, I think, would be a step in the right direction. I also find that in this department as in others, when a man reaches the age of retirement and is entitled to three or six months' leave, another man cannot be employed until that leave is up. If you had a good man doing a good job before his service was completed, then you lose the benefit of that good work until he is replaced, and it means extra work for the remainder of the staff. I believe the civil service commission should make some recommendations to overcome that situation. In other departments you find that, when a man retires, somebody is ready to fill his place, and it should not be necessary to wait for six months before that is done.

Another matter I should like to mention is that the department is still working under the quota system, which means that a penitentiary where there is a small number of convicts is likely to be understaffed. I regard a penitentiary as something like the Queen Mary or the Queen Elizabeth. You would never think of sending either of these boats to sea without a full, adequate crew, but some penitentiaries in this country are being conducted with less than a full crew because the number of prisoners does not come up to the quota. I believe that should be changed, and the quota system should be abolished. Certain posts in a penitentiary have to be manned adequately at all times, and if you run short of crew you will run into difficulties right away; somebody is going to be neglected or someone is going to have too much to do.

I drew the minister's attention last year to the terrible housing conditions at Stony Mountain. They are disgraceful. The royal commission which investigated the penal system of Canada in 1936 said this:

> Accommodation for the staff is inadequate. It is unreasonable and unnecessarily humiliating to ask members of the staff to live under conditions which now exist in officers' tenements belonging to the institution. These houses were built fifty years ago. They are without sanitary conveniences, and prisoners themselves are much more comfortably housed in their cells than officers in the penitentiary tenements.
> Your commissioners are of the opinion that this state of affairs is destructive of the morale of the officers and that immediate steps should be taken to provide the staff and their families with respectable accommodation. In a large metropolitan centre the homes which are provided for the staff would, indeed, be condemned by the medical authorities.

When I drew that to the attention of the minister before, he told me they were going to build fifteen houses. I should like to know if they have reached a point of going on with the building of those houses, because the present condition is a disgrace.

I am appealing to the minister to institute a bus service between Winnipeg and the penitentiary, so that these men may live in decent homes. I know that all of them cannot be taken away; but some can be left there, and some permitted to go to Winnipeg, because it is a disgrace to ask people to live in homes like that.

What progress has been made with the new dairy herd established at Stony Mountain? How many animals are there? I draw the minister's attention to the fact that it will be only fair to the staffs of all penitentiaries in Canada to have all vacancies advertised in every prison.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Since the hon. member for Broadview is in his seat I should like to deal with two or three of the points he raised at the opening of the debate on these estimates. The matter of the consolidation of the criminal code is being dealt with progressively by an important committee of the Canadian Bar Association, on which the attorneys general of all the provinces are represented and which, without cost to the federal treasury, is doing work which will be of considerable value to the Canadian public.

I understood the hon. member to say that when he commenced practice there were three county court judges in Toronto. I believe there are nine to-day functioning under His Honour Judge Parker. The county and district court judges are required by the constitution to be members of the bar; so that if there are any gentlemen administering justice who are not members of the bar they must be magistrates appointed by some other authority, because the British North America Act in sections 96 and 97 expressly requires that the judges of the county and district courts, as well as those of the superior court, shall be members of the bar.

There was a suggestion that the federal government should reimburse to the municipalities costs of the administration of justice. That would involve a substantial change in the distribution of powers and responsibilities between federal and provincial governments. Proposals for the reallocation of some of the responsibilities between the two authorities were submitted to the dominion-provincial conference, but unfortunately it was not possible to get an agreement on the proposals. Until some reallocation is made, I am afraid we shall have to leave it to the provinces and municipalities to continue to bear the cost of performing services which under the constitution are their responsibility.

In bill No. 13, standing in the name of the hon. member, which he permitted to stand pending consideration of the estimates, suggestions are contained which would not be within the constitutional jurisdiction of this parliament. Parliament cannot say what laws will bind judges who preside over courts. It has no right to say that those judges will respect judgments rendered by higher courts, except in criminal matters. But in all other matters the administration of justice is presided over by judges appointed by the federal authority. This parliament has, however, no right to say to them what judgments they will render, and by what authority they will feel they are bound.

The other bill standing in the name of the hon. member deals with responsibility for motorcar accidents. It was discussed when the hon. member was not in his seat, but I believe all hon. members appreciate the motives which prompted his making the suggestions contained therein. However, I believe there are some principles underlying the suggested changes which it would be dangerous to adopt. I do not believe it has been a principle in the criminal code that guilt will be presumed, or even that there would be guilt without the element of intent for which the code now provides. I should hope that with the provision of better vehicles—which will become possible as soon as they are available—for those large numbers who are anxious to get them, there will not be on the highways the kind of vehicles which were used during the war years, and that that will be one substantial means of diminishing the number of accidents occurring on the highways.

I do not think we can prevent accidents by having severe legislation in the criminal code, and I believe that on reconsideration the hon. member would not want the presumption of guilt, which his suggested changes contain, to become part of the administration of our penal law. The matter is one of concern to all of us. It is receiving consideration, and will be dealt with if it is felt that there will be time at this session of parliament to give it the consideration it deserves.

As to the suggestions made by the hon. member for Selkirk, he knows that a commissioner of penitentiaries has been appointed. I have read more than once the report of the Archambault commission. There is very much that is good in it. There are certainly some assertions in it that are exaggerated. I have not had time myself to verify all the conditions described in that report, and it is because I did not have the time to do so myself that I wished to have a commissioner who would go about and see just exactly what the conditions are.

The hon. member says that there are houses at Stony Mountain that are fifty years old. I was born in a wooden house that was more than fifty years old when I was born, and whenever I have an opportunity to go back to it I find great comfort in it yet. So that age alone is not sufficient to condemn a house. I said to the hon. member that there was a project for the construction of fifteen additional houses for the Stony Mountain penitentiary; but the hon. member knows that those who are living in the houses there, if they vacated them, would soon be replaced by others who have no houses at all. There is quite a serious housing shortage all over the country; and for the purposes of this year's budget every department was told to keep its construction down to the very minimum because the government did not want to be charged with taking material for its purposes when material was required so urgently for those who have no houses at all, and for whom provision has to be made first.

The money is available for the construction, but we are not prepared to regard as more urgent the requirements of ourselves and of our civil service than the requirements of the rest of the population, especially of the returning veterans. That puts upon the replacing of those houses a time limit which is not within our control.

The hon. member asks, are we any nearer toward the completion than we were last December or November when the estimates were being considered last year? I hope we are. I hope we are getting nearer every day to a situation where building material will be easier and where some construction can be provided. We are certainly much nearer to it than we were a week ago when the forest operations in British Columbia were interrupted by the strike. If we can all of us get to work and keep at work and not do foolish things we shall get to an easier position much more quickly than if we continue to do some of the foolish things we have been doing during the last several months, and I hope we all realize that. We all have the same interest—labour and management, and management and labour—and I hope we shall all take the view of the commissioner, I think he was, in New Zealand who recommended to the people there that if we want to improve our conditions we must all get down and produce.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the only way to do it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To that extent we shall get nearer the time when there will be the fifteeen houses built around Stony Mountain penitentiary. The hon. member suggests the establishment of a bus service. My information is that there is a public bus service from Winnipeg to Stonewall along a highway that is within a couple of hundred yards of the administration building of the penitentiary. I have not been there myself. I have not been anywhere else since I came to Ottawa four and a half years ago. But recently a commissioner has been appointed who is going all around to see the situation for himself, and who was recommended to me as one who is practical in such matters, on whose reports I could rely, and who would have the tact to try to harmonize and coordinate the good will of all these organizations to which the hon. member for Davenport has referred with respect to prison after-care. That is a matter that is not within our jurisdiction. It is not to pass the buck that I say that. It is something which is deserving of the best efforts of all jurisdictions concerned.

One of the qualities that I was looking for in the appointee to the penitentiary commission was the fact that would make it possible for him to interview the authorities of the provinces and of the municipalities and try to promote coordination and cooperation between us. My experience has been that we make much more progress by conferences between officials than we do when members of the various governments are called together in conference. The extent to which there is in fact cooperation between the officers of the provincial governments and the officers of the federal government is much greater than what we were able to accomplish in the conferences that were held between the premiers of the provinces and the representatives of the dominion government. I think, after the commissioner of penitentiaries has had an opportunity of visiting not only the penitentiaries which are under our jurisdiction but the prisons which are under provincial jurisdiction, and seeing the men who are in charge of those institutions and discussing with them what can be done to improve the situation, we are apt to get better results than we got when the premiers of the provincial governments and the representatives of the federal government got together to discuss amendments to the constitution and transfers of jurisdictions and responsibilities.

Mr. BRYCE: In reply to the minister, I should like to tell him that about sixty years ago I was born in a little house among the heather that had very poor conveniences, and I do not want to go back and live under the same conditions again. I do not want anybody else to live under those conditions. The conditions that were good enough fifty years ago are not good enough to-day.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not saying that the house I was born in fifty years ago is in exactly the same condition to-day as it was then, and these houses around Stony Mountain penitentiary have been maintained and improved. I am not saying that they should not be replaced by something better as soon as it will be possible to get the materials to do so without taking that material away from those who need it to build homes for themselves. But the fact that a house is fifty years old does not in itself condemn it.

Mr. BRYCE: I agree with the minister to a certain extent, that an old house may be good. But if you want the best people to serve in Stony Mountain penitentiary you will not get them if they have to live in a house with no sanitary conveniences. You want the best people. The best people want something better than an outdoor toilet. The houses are fifty years old. I am ahead of the minister because I have been around there many times; I live not very far from there.

An hon. MEMBER: Careful.

Mr. BRYCE: Having reached the age of sixty years without going in, I think I can keep out during the rest of my life.

I should like the minister just to touch on the matter of the hours of work. They are working there for less wages than they should be working for, and longer hours than they should be working.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not prepared to admit that they are working more hours than they should work, or for less than they should be getting. I am prepared to admit that they are working forty-eight hours a week and that there is a feeling that men should not work forty-eight hours a week. I am not yet convinced that that is absolutely true, you know; but I am convinced that it will be necessary to have conditions there comparable with what conditions are elsewhere; and it was for the purpose of getting accurate, up-to-date information as to what should be done that the amendment to the Penitentiaries Act was made last year and that one penitentiary commissioner has been appointed. The fact of the matter is that whenever labour is at all "easy" we get a large number of applications for these penitentiary jobs. We do not always get them from the kind of people who should have the jobs. I agree with the hon. member that we should have improvement in our custodial staffs. It is something toward which we are working; and, from the reports I get about him, I have great confidence in the gentleman who has become the penitentiary commissioner, and who has already visited two of these institutions and made a thorough and careful investigation of the situation, who is proceeding to visit the others, and who will be able to make recommendations which can be implemented. When I had my conversation with him about the nature of his duties I told him that we wanted someone who would help us make in our penal system all the improvements that one could recommend to practical men as being things to be realized. I think we shall get somewhere; we have started in the right direction and we shall get results. But we shall not get at once a Borstal system controlled by a federal department, because that is something which would affect the whole of our penal institutions, and this government has control only of the penitentiaries, whilst there are certainly more than fifteen times as many institutions which are under provincial control. We have no actual jurisdiction over post-prison work. We have jurisdiction over these convicts while they are in the penitentiary, but as soon as they get out they are no longer within our jurisdiction. That does not mean that we should not take any interest in what happens; and it does not mean that we should not, with the Department of National Health and Welfare, endeavour to cooperate with the provinces and bring about, for instance, an application of the knowledge which has been acquired about mental hygiene. But that is not something which this house can deal with as its concern. We can be helpful, and we can endeavour to get the help of others, but we have not the jurisdiction to determine what is to be done in Canada about the matter. It is for that reason that I wanted someone who was recommended to me, who took all the "bugs" out of the military plans that were being prepared and had them workable before there were attempts made to implement them. I think that with that kind of advice we shall make real progress.

Mr. BRYCE: One further remark and I have finished. I am pleased that the minister has his commissioner appointed, and I hope I shall have the privilege of meeting him at Stony Mountain. I know that what I have said here to-night is true in every sense of the word, because I have visited this institution. The minister's deputy or assistant who spoke about going to Stonewall may not know that Stonewall is away in the other direction as far as the bus is concerned. The present government of Manitoba supplies a gaol bus and runs the warders to and from the provincial goal. The dominion government has far more money than the province; it should be able to do that too, until such time as material is available from the minister to build these new houses.

Mr. CHURCH: It is one of the cardinal principles of magna charta that the people shall take a large share in the administration of criminal justice. These institutions, whether rightly or wrongly managed, are managed by crown officers. I appreciate the difficulties which the minister and the officials of his department have in this connection, because, as the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe remarked, it is a work that does not bring much satisfaction; there is no occupation more open to criticism than that of those in charge, working all the time honestly, satisfying nobody.

There has been a marked increase in the criminal population. As members of the committee know, after every great war there is a great deal of trouble in dealing with this problem. Wars and rumours of wars and similar disturbances bring about a large increase in crime. The population of these penal institutions rose from 1,689 in 1919 to 3,803 at the last record, about the beginning of the war, and it is still going up by leaps and bounds.

There is an important public policy connected with this matter; so much so, that I wish to refer a few moments to-night to the inspection of these institutions. There is an act which relates to this matter; but the board of visitors, also the House of Commons and the Senate, might just as well be eliminated in this regard, because the method of inspection is a dead letter. Those confined in these institutions are forgotten. The public pay little or no attention to this problem.

I was chairman for seven years of a large police commission, and years ago, with Doctor Hastings, then the health officer, I visited one of the institutions in my own constituency of Broadview, the Toronto gaol. It was built not long after confederation. Doctor Hastings, then the health officer, and I inspected it. Talk about any law of hygiene! Every known law of hygiene was violated. It is the same in all these institutions, federal, provincial and municipal, all over our province.

As I have said before, a federal prison commission was appointed in 1936. One of the commissioners, Mr. Harry Anderson, who did much for prison reform, died shortly after his appointment. Visits by these commissioners were paid to every country in the world, and they brought in a report. The failure of the government of the day to introduce in Canada the Borstal system, which had such salutary results in the mother country some thirty years ago, has been criticized by all the synods and presbyteries in the country, by churches of all denominations, who have unanimously asked for some action. They look to this parliament for action. As I have said, the inspection is not what it should be. I appreciate the services of many of our officers. From our city we have as chief inspector, General Gibson, at the present time in Ottawa, a military man of sound judgment and good executive ability. But in my opinion the grand juries should be allowed to go once a year into these institutions that are under federal control, as they are allowed to inspect provincial penal institutions. When I was head of the police department in that city the grand jury in Hamilton on one occasion found three or four insane men in a certain institution. It is most important, in my opinion, that provision be made for inspection once a year of federal institutions by grand juries, as the late Chief Justice Meredith stated in the fall session some years ago in addressing the grand jury.

We might as well admit that we have no inspection worthy of the name. These institutions are inspected only by crown officers, and we might well inscribe over the door of everyone of these institutions the words that are found in Dante: "All hope abandon ye who enter here". I have spoken to some of the officers about the work done in these institutions, and I can find no reason why the report was not carried into effect. The war was pleaded as an excuse. I think the members of this house should take more interest in this question.

In the city of Toronto, away back in 1912, we established a gaol farm on Yonge street, North York, when we were going to close up the Toronto gaol, which was then a relic of the middle ages. The laws of public hygiene are unknown in many of these institutions. There are good officers and good men conducting that particular institution in Toronto, but they cannot properly handle all the work they have to do with the antiquated machinery at their disposal. There is one institution in Ottawa but it is in a favoured position. One of the evening papers in this city stated last fall that the $300,000 that is to be handed out to Ottawa as a subvention will be used to secure a new gaol and a new court house.

I should like to give the minister some constructive suggestions. Shortly before this house was called together there were a number of riots across Canada in three institutions. The population in one of these institutions in Kingston and Collins Bay has increased considerably. A large number of military men have been brought back from Europe, some for minor offences, some for absence without leave and others for desertion, while there are thousands of others who have not yet been rounded up. I contend that under the present law they have no right to be housed in these institutions. They have been convicted of military offences, and the various wardens across Canada have no right under the present act to admit them. I suggest that they could bring action for damages in some cases in respect of such detention.

I wish to refer to another matter, and it is this. We are away behind the times in constitutional reform, in cabinet reform and in law reform. We have had no real law reform in this country. As a matter of fact, I have seen very little law reform since I was called to the bar a good many years ago. We are thirty years behind England. Little progress has been made in Canada in that direction in comparison with the mother country, where there is real reform. I suggest that one of the meanest acts ever passed was in connection with the imposition of "indeterminate sentences". In 1939 I introduced a bill dealing with this whole question. Provincial institutions could house convicted persons only for a year and three hundred and sixty-four days. That was the situation up to 1867 when these institutions were handed over to the government of Canada. I introduced my bill for the purpose of eliminating indeterminate sentences, which I contend are unfair. Indeterminate sentences were condemned severely by Mr. Justice Middleton, as will be found by reference to Ontario Law Reports of July, 1937, in the case of Rex versus Bond, at page 538. Why should a man be kept indefinitely in prison, without hope of liberty, when he expects that in consequence of good conduct he may obtain his freedom? The fact is, however, that, under the indeterminate sentence, someone may come forward and report some conviction which the man had against him at some time or another, and the result is that the parole board turns down his application. The learned judge criticized the system in severe terms, and since that time it was also criticized last year and the year before in the court of appeal of the province. He also referred to the Guelph institution. Various judges have condemned it in the strongest possible language and urged for a new institution for younger inmates.

All these law reports have been reported to the government, but nothing has been done about the matter. As I explained in introducing my bill in 1939, the Prisons and Reformatories Act gives the court jurisdiction to impose an indeterminate term in a reformatory. The bill proposes to substitute determinate for indeterminate sentences. The several expressions relating to "indeterminate sentence" are found in eighteen sections or subsections of the act, and the draftsman considers it inexpedient to amend each of such sections by a separate clause.

This bill would revert to the old law of sentences for a definite period only. The indeterminate legislation has definite period only. The indeterminate legislation has been condemned by many judges and magistrates as inhuman and illegal.

Canada's prisons at present are filled with youth, many first offenders, who have been unable to secure work. The lack of employment by cause and effect is one of the reasons for crime. Recently the appellate division of the supreme court of Ontario questioned the legality of such indeterminate legislation, since the provinces had only the right of providing confinement for one year and 364 days, and also condemned it on grounds of public policy. The law has not acted as a deterrent, nor is it reformative. It should be repealed, because in practice it confers on officials of these institutions the right to detain those who have not influence enough to have employment awaiting them at the end of a definite period, and gives to their decisions the force of statute law.

That state of affairs should not be tolerated and, as I have already stated, it was severely condemned. The government gave a list of inspectors three years ago. A great many of them have had a college education and all that kind of thing. In other words, they learn by experience; that is all. They know nothing about the work. Just fancy bringing in some outsider to become chief of a police force! At least they have to learn the business end of it. A representative from one of the large departmental stores came to see me some time ago. I said to him: "You cannot learn one department of your store in a day or two. How can you learn this business in a day?" This is one of the most important problems in the country. The report of the minister of March 31, 1945, shows that in the United States they have developed a programme of training young officers for this work, officers who have the proper educational background. A great deal has been done in this regard. It is a most commendable thing. A few years ago the minister allowed the convicts to use the radio. That gave them some information from the outside world.

I believe that members of parliament should visit one or two of these institutions. A committee on legal law should be instituted in this house. They could make some visits and thereby strengthen the hands of the minister and his officers. I hope and trust that next year we shall not be pleading that the war prevented us from installing the Borstal system. As judges have pointed out, there is in Ontario no institution to which they can send an offender. I appreciate the good work that the minister and his officers have done, because he has a most difficult task. Anybody who has been a member of parliament for a few years must know that the hardest task in this house has been carried out by the Minister of Justice. He has given a great deal of time and thought to the matter, far more than any of us. I hope that something will be done, because I believe that this matter is one of the most important subjects with which we have to deal.

Mr. REID: I have one question to ask the minister and a suggestion to make as well. First of all, may I say that I was pleased this evening to hear him remark that many of the suggestions and recommendations of the commissions which were supported by certain hon. members to-night were exaggerated. I remember the visit of the commissioner to the Pacific coast, and I could use a stronger word than "exaggerated". Before the minister implements the recommendations made in the report, I woud suggest that he had better wait until he has a report from the new commissioner who has been appointed.

An hon. MEMBER: Appoint another royal commission.

Mr. REID: No; I am not in favour of that. Judge Archambault should never have been appointed to the job to which he was appointed. He knew little or nothing at all about penitentiaries. Many of the recommendations were ridiculous. I know whereof I speak. I do not care who appointed him; I am saying that as a member of parliament.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He was not alone in it.

Mr. REID: He took charge of it. As a matter of fact he was the chairman of the commission and took an active part too. Perhaps I had better make my suggestion before I ask my question. As a member of parliament I consider it my duty to visit occasionally the penitentiary which is located in my city. Like other hon. members I take the trouble to visit it four times a year, and I visit it without giving any warning to the warden in charge. I usually visit in time to see the convicts fed. I taste the food and examine it, and I say to hon. members that I hope I never get worse food in the remaining years of my life than I saw there. I brought a menu along with me. I wonder how many members of parliament have seen the menu. I am going to make a suggestion with regard to the utensils which are used.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Take the menu up to the parliamentary restaurant; they need one.

Mr. REID: I am glad the hon. member mentioned the parliamentary restaurant, because the food prepared in the New Westminster penitentiary is as good as any food one can get in the parliament buildings.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It could not be worse.

Mr. REID: It is as good. I am not saying it is better, but it is just as good. Here is the menu. I shall read a sample of the food served. For example, on Wednesday, January 30, the following was served for breakfast:

Wheat hearts, milk, whole orange, toast, bread, marmalade, butter, coffee. Dinner: Fried eggs, hash brown potatoes, tomato, beans, steamed chocolate pudding, chocolate sauce, bread, tea. Supper: beef stew, hot biscuits, mashed potatoes, mixed vegetables, hot gingerbread, raisin sauce, bread, tea.

You can read all through the menus and you will find the same. This one was picked at random. I got this menu from the warden and brought it back with me because comments are often made on the kind of food which is served to men in penitentiaries. I looked at the utensils on which the food is placed. Most of us, when we go to a place to eat, look at the utensils, and if they look clean, and if the place is clean, we enjoy our food. The utensils are one of the first things we look at. The utensils they have in the penitentiary are not conducive to encouraging a man to enjoy his food. They are all lumped together, and a little piece of food on a big plate does not look very much. In my opinion, the utensils could be greatly improved to the advantage of the convicts.

I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the penitentiary in New Westminster. For many years I have advocated that the penitentiary be removed from that city to a new site. Recommendations along that line were made as far back as twenty-five years ago. The department has been asked to move it to a better location than the one in which it is at the present time. Now that the war is over, what is being done about the matter? Has it been dropped or forgotten? When I last brought up the question I was told that the war was on, and of course, the penitentiary could not be moved at that time because all our efforts were directed toward the winning of the war. I am asking the question now because this matter should not be dropped. The penitentiary should be located somewhere other than right in the city of New Westminster.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The project of a new penitentiary for British Columbia is one of those which have been listed with the Department of Reconstruction, and will be proceeded with just as soon as public undertakings can be proceeded with. It may be some time before we can get to the point where it can be proceeded with. All the departments were requested to list with the Department of Reconstruction the things which they thought had to be done just as soon as it would be proper to proceed with public undertakings, and the penitentiary for British Columbia is one of those listed by the penitentiary department.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): May I suggest to the minister that we could not hear a word he said. We are as much interested in the information he gave as is the hon. member for New Westminster. I would ask the minister to repeat the information.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry. The statement I made was that the departments were requested to list with the Department of Reconstruction the public buildings they felt they should proceed with just as soon as it would be proper to proceed with public undertakings, and a new penitentiary for British Columbia was listed by the penitentiary department with the Department of Reconstruction.

Mr. LENNARD: In connection with some remarks made by the minister about twenty minutes ago. I have before me a resolution passed unanimously by the chief constables association of Canada at London, Ontario, on August 24, 1945. It reads as follows:

Resolved that, in the opinion of the conference, there is a definite need for a policy to be formulated by the government of Canada in respect to the serious problem of the repeater criminal, whose activities are so largely responsible for crime in the dominion. We further suggest that a committee representative of all the provinces be appointed to interview the hon. Minister of Justice at Ottawa to urge amendments to the criminal code to meet this menace.

I understand that this resolution was presented by a delegation of this association some time last fall. Has any consideration been given to it, or has any progress been made?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The recommendations with respect to the criminal code are among the various recommendations being considered.

Mr. LENNARD: These recommendations are among those?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, and will be dealt with in the manner I have already described. The matter of repeater criminals, as the hon. member will realize, is something that will have to be dealt with through cooperation between the federal and provincial authorities, and it is one of the aims I have set before the penitentiary commissioner. I hope it will not be very long before I may be able to report that progress is being made in bringing about that degree of cooperation which will be beneficial.

Mr. KNIGHT: I was pleased to hear the minister say a good word for his new commissioner. I believe he used the word "tactful"; he used the word "practical" and I hoped he might use the word "sympathetic," though I have no reason to believe that this adjective could not have been quite properly used also to describe the commissioner.

Perhaps some of our ideas in regard to the running of penal institutions in this country would be considered antiquated in other parts of the world. I should be interested to know from the minister the extent to which we have been appointing former military men to the top posts in penal institutions. I should like to register my opinion, for what it is worth, that the professional military type of mind should disqualify any man for the top position in any penitentiary. I say that with no desire to offend anyone. I do not believe, for instance, that the young men who volunteered to go overseas should be deprived of positions in our penitentiaries; but by the very nature of their inexperience and their youth they would not be taking these top positions to which I refer. I want to make myself perfectly clear on that. I am not saying that returned men should not take such junior positions. I think it has been well established that military discipline is not what is required in dealing with people in these institutions, where the emphasis should be upon correction; that is to say, upon correction from the point of view of reform of character, rather than mere maintenance of iron discipline. I think

I have noticed, as I expect other hon. members have, that sometimes those in charge of these institutions forget the object of them, forget the inmates and become buried in a mass of routine having to do with organization and administration, so that organization and administration become the thing and the inmates, whether of a school, a penal institution or what have you, are inclined to be forgotten. As far as I am concerned, the minister may consider this an appeal for the appointment of trained psychologists with great sympathy in their hearts for the unfortunate outcasts from society with whom they have to deal.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): To-night my mind goes back to the last session of parliament and to the day the Minister of Justice moved the second reading of bill No. 92, to amend the Penitentiaries Act of 1939. That was on Thursday, November 15, and the discussion appears at pages 2158 and following of Hansard. Lately I have been rereading those debates, in preparation for this review of the estimates of the department, and I find them very interesting indeed. The purpose of bill No. 92, as stated by the minister, was to empower the government to inquire into the report of the Archambault commission to decide what part or parts should be put into force immediately. I remember that during the debate the hon. member for Stanstead criticized and objected to the dilatory methods being followed by the government at that time, and I believe many hon. members agreed with him.

During the past years we have had a good many royal commissions instituted for one purpose and another, especially on penal reform, but little or no action has been taken. I am inclined to think that has a tendency to bring all royal commissions more or less into disrepute and disfavour. I was surprised a short time ago to hear the minister express criticism of the Archambault commission. I, for one, think one would have to go a long way to find a commission that worked as diligently and presented a report as comprehensive as that presented by the Archambault commission in 1938. The commission was appointed in February, 1936, and spent two years in the work of investigation. Its report was presented to the then Minister of Justice, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, on April 4, 1938. That the work was very well done is, I think, indicated by the fact that the members of the commission travelled extensively, not only in Great Britain but on the continent of Europe, in the United States and the various provinces of Canada. As a result of these investigations, the commission advised the setting up of a penitentiary commission of three members, with full authority over the management of our federal prison system.

As far as implementing the findings of the Archambault commission is concerned, one cannot truthfully say that nothing has been done, but one can truly say that very little has been done up to now. On Thursday, April 11, of this year the Minister of Justice informed the house that by proclamation certain portions of the Penitentiaries Act were to come into force immediately. I think the committee should be reminded of the fact that it is now over eight years since the report of the Archambault commission was published. On April 11 of this year the minister also indicated that Major General Ralph B. Gibson of Toronto had been appointed the first commissioner under the act. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister to-night if anything else has been done toward implementing the findings of the Archambault commission, other than the appointment of Major General Gibson. I should like to ask the minister also if the new commissioner has made any report to him, if any of his recommendations are to come before parliament and, if so, whether such recommendations are covered in the estimates with which we are now dealing.

In the speech of the minister last session, when dealing with the desirability of establishing a Borstal system in Canada, he indicated that one of the peculiar and particular duties of the new commissioner would be to investigate the situation in each of our federal penitentiaries and to interview all the provincial departments to see to what extent it would be possible to get some agreement or some unified system of administering the penal institutions of this country. I think we are all ready to concede that the outbreak of war did materially interfere with the carrying out of the findings of the Archambault commission. But the war has been over for some considerable time, and the country is beginning to manifest new interest in penal institutions. People are beginning to ask the question, well, what is to be done? I notice that church conferences and synods across the country are awake to the need. The Archambault commission has indicated the way in which we might go to accomplish penal reform. Now is the time for action along definite and constructive lines.

Many of us in the past have been asking ourselves the question: What is the underlying purpose of our penal institutions? Are they primarily to punish those who have broken the laws of the land, the men and women who are offenders against society? Or are they to reform and to rehabilitate those who have fallen by the wayside? I think it is generally agreed on all sides that we have three particular types of criminals. They are: first, the accidental or occasional criminals; second, the reformable, youthful offenders and, third, the hardened, persistent, recidivists. The first group does not need necessarily to be reformed. The second type is definitely reformable, unless they are soured and embittered by their contact with prison life and prison habitues. The third type, namely the hardened recidivists, are the most difficult of all; and yet even those must receive humane and kindly treatment. And here I believe in a large measure depends the responsibility of those who have been placed in charge of the lives of our prison inmates.

In this connection I may say it has been my privilege as a member of parliament to visit some of our federal penal institutions. Last February, for example, I was in the city of New Westminster, British Columbia, and took the opportunity to visit the institution at that place, in company with the representative of the John Howard society. I refer to the Reverend J. D. Hobden. Some few weeks before my visit there had been some trouble, an incipient riot in the institution, and I wanted to see for myself what it was all about.

At this point I wish to pay tribute to the chief warden of that institution, who was in charge of the penitentiary at New Westminster. He very kindly accompanied me, and showed me all there was to see. I was greatly impressed by his attitude toward those under his care. One could not call it paternalistic, by any means; but it was definitely humane, friendly and firm. One had only to listen as he talked with some of the convicts, and to hear their replies, to know that there was understanding and respect between them. I could only wish that that were the attitude in all our penitentiaries; but I know that such is not the case. My belief is borne out by the findings of the Archambault commission.

I understand that one of the pet grouches of the convicts in our institutions is against the quantity and quality of food served to them, and that this is generally the cause of the incipient riots which break out in these institutions. This matter was dealt with a few minutes ago by the hon. member for New Westminster. Like him, I want to say here and now that in the institutions I have visited I have seen the menu charts, such as the hon. member exhibited; I have seen the food actually being served both at the luncheon and evening meal, and I can vouch for its quality and quantity. I am not at all ashamed to say that I have had many worse meals in my life than those being served to the inmates of our penitentiaries. My only hope is that the millions of people in the war-torn and ravaged countries of Europe may be assured of just as good meals as are being furnished in our penitentiaries to our convicts. I do not think any man can find in any of these institutions cause for complaint about the quantity or quality of the food served.

Then, again, I appreciated the fact that I was permitted by the warden at New Westminster to speak freely to some of the convicts in that institution—in the presence of the warden, of course. I asked one young man, a recidivist, about some very young men in the institution who were serving time. I asked him how he accounted for their being at that place. He answered me frankly that the breakdown or lack of home life was the chief cause of their downfall. Usually they were the children of separated or divorced parents, children for whom no one seemed to care at all. They roamed the streets of our cities; they got into bad company and learned the ways of crime.

I know that in the past we have talked a great deal about delinquent children. But now we are becoming aware that we have a new problem—perhaps not a new one; it is one we have always had, but which we have not recognized—and that is the problem of delinquent parents. It is a problem which challenges our attention at this time.

I am convinced that there is a lot of real work to be done outside the walls of our penitentiaries, creating clean and healthful conditions of life. This is preventive rather than curative work. I have a feeling that quite often when we allow ourselves to become interested in penal reform, and interested in the welfare of these forgotten people, we are accused of emotionalism and of being moved by sob stories. Personally I resent that accusation. I like to feel that in this, as in all things, I am using sound judgment, and that both heart and mind are coordinated in their functions.

Item stands.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WARTIME WAGE CONTROL—AMENDMENT OF P.C. 9384

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table copy of order in council P.C. 2432, passed June 20, 1946, further amending the wartime wages control order, P.C. 9384.

In connection with this amendment I wish to make the following statement:

Canada's anti-inflation programme, established in 1941, can, I think, be regarded as being something in the nature of an experiment. It can now be said that many economists did not think it would succeed and would break down because it ran contrary to the economic forces. However, for the most part it did succeed. In large measure that success was due to the unqualified acceptance of the programme by the people of Canada.

While it was a difficult enough task to put into motion the machinery needed to implement the anti-inflation programme, it is equally difficult to gear down that machinery and modify the programme. On previous occasions it has been stated in this house that the government's policy is to move out of the price control-wage stabilization field just as rapidly as it is considered expedient to do so. The current problem is one of timing the steps to be taken in decontrol.

In respect of wage stabilization, steps have already been taken to modify the wages order, and a further step is about to be taken. It is concerning this latest modification that I wish to speak in particular.

The important change proposed concerns section 20 of wartime wages control order 1943, P.C. 9384. That is the section which gives war labour boards the power to authorize or direct adjustments in wage rates.

The original clause (a) of subsection 1 of the section limited the board's powers to increase wage rates only to the extent necessary to rectify "a gross injustice or gross inequality". In January of this year that section was changed so as to enable boards to authorize or direct increases in any wage rates which were found to be low in comparison with wage rates generally prevailing in the locality. The amendment further empowered a war labour board to authorize an employer to increase wage rates on such other basis, and to such extent, as in the opinion of the board is reasonable in the circumstances and consistent with the maintenance of existing prices of the goods and services which the employer sells.

While this amendment served its purpose during the period it has been in force, changing conditions during this transitional period have made it appear to us that the wage adjusting formula should be modified to permit war labour boards a wider discretion than they have had.

Under the present amendment, war labour boards may authorize or direct increases in wage rates if and to the extent that such boards find the proposed increases are "just and reasonable". The amendment cuts away from the over-all wage fixing formula some of the previously existing restrictive conditions. It places upon war labour boards a greater discretion—a discretion which, I am satisfied, will be fairly exercised by representatives of management and of the major branches of organized labour in Canada, who as members of those boards have had a vast amount of experience in administering this part of our anti-inflation programme.

Much has been said of Canada's contribution to the war effort. In my opinion this is not the time to review that contribution. This is the time to direct our thoughts to the present and the immediate future. The progress of Canada will depend largely on the process of reconverting the country from a wartime to a peace-time basis.

The next two or three years will be critical ones for the future economic development of Canada. If we fail to pursue sound economic policies during that time, damage will be done which will jeopardize our progress for years to come. I can tell you that the task of maintaining a reasonable degree of stability in our economic affairs at this time is much more complicated and calls for a much greater degree of judgment than was the case when we were fighting for our very existence.

Thanks to our policy of economic stabilization, which ultimately met with the active support of industry and of the great majority of organizations in the labour movement, we came through the war well. That has been true to date in this transition period. It is the responsibility of all Canadians, whether they be in the managerial group or the labour groups, to see to it that we do not have a repetition of the inflation that struck this country in the early twenties. We must not loss of sight of the fact that the forces which brought about the chaotic conditions of boom and slump after the last war are present in our economy now. An abandonment of control now would let loose forces which could wreck the economic life of the country at a time when an orderly transition to peace-time conditions is a primary necessity, and the country would be worse off than if stabilization controls had never been imposed.

I have been in the labour movement long enough—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait a moment. Listen to what I have to say. I repeat that I have been in the labour movement long enough to know that the real target of labour is to raise the real standard of living.

Mr. HOMUTH: What child did you bring forth?

Mr. MITCHELL: It was not my hon. friend, I know.

I know that labour has, during these last six years, made greater gains in this direction than it has in any other like period in the history of the movement. The ideal should be to consolidate those gains. What I am afraid of—and I say this with all sincerity—is that any untoward advance in the present wage structure is going to do one of two things: either it will force prices up, whereupon the increased rates will count for naught, or it could force a buyers' strike to curtail production, and of course that will mean unemployment.

This government is in favour of good and fair wages; let no one think that any member of the government holds a contrary view. Good and fair wages are just that as long as they can maintain a real standard of living.

What all should strive for is production. A normal flow of goods and services will indeed form the real income of the community. It is the responsibility of management and labour, acting as a team, to work for the maximum production of goods and services, and anything which stands in the way of this is contrary to the best interests of all, particularly the wage earner.

What I have said has been for a definite purpose. I do not want anyone to think that, because the wartime wages control order has been amended, the lid is off. The revision of the order imposes upon all a very special duty, that duty being to work together through this transition period to the end that we can come out of it with an economy second to none. That should surely be a duty which all good Canadians should be glad to assume.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the minister's statement is debatable?

Mr. SPEAKER: The statement made by the minister is not debatable.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then I raise a question of privilege on behalf of the ordinary members of the house. I protest against the minister making certain statements which do nothing but eulogize the government, when it is not possible for other members to debate those statements. On a question of privilege I protest against it.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RADIO LICENCES—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

(a) What is the number of prosecutions for failure to have a radio licence; (b) the number who have taken out licences; (c) the estimated numbers who have not, in the cities of Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Hull, Hamilton, London, Quebec, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Saint John and Halifax, for the last three years of record?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

(a)	Fiscal Year 1943-44	Fiscal Year 1944-45	Fiscal Year 1945-46
Toronto	208	392	773
Montreal	631	327	189

Halifax	14,281	14,809	14,725

(c) No reasonably accurate estimate can be attempted at the present time, due to various factors, such as—

(1) The difficulty of determining the number of receiving sets which are not in operation because they have become obsolete and cannot be replaced or because replacement parts are still difficult to obtain; and

(2) The movement of population to and from wartime industrial centres and changes in domicile of families of service personnel.

RADIO BROADCASTING—EUROPEAN SERVICES

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon):

In the matter of international broadcasting services, what European countries are included in such services?

Mr. McCANN: The international short wave service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation operates at Sackville, N.B., two 50 kw. transmitters with an elaborate antenna system permitting beaming of signals in desired directions. The European beam carries programmes in English, French, German, Dutch and Czech; the programmes being designed for the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Netherlands and Czechoslovakia respectively. Regular broadcasts to Russia are planned to commence as soon as adequate additional accommodation can be provided for Russian language specialists.

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION—DAVID MACNEIL

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Is Mr. David Macneil of Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, an employee of the War Assets Corporation?

2. If so (a) what is his position; (b) what are his duties; (c) when was he appointed?

3. (a) What salary does Mr. Macneil receive; (b) what was he paid by the way of expenses from the date of his appointment until June 15, 1946?

4. Is Mr. Macneil an ex-service man of this war? If so (a) what branch of the service did he serve with; (b) what was the date of enlistment; (c) what was the date of discharge; (d) what was the reason for discharge?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No. However, a Mr. David Chisholm Macneil of Halifax, N.S., is employed in War Assets Corporation.

2. (a) Regional personnel representative; (b) he is in charge of personnel work which includes recruiting, staff promotions, transfers and staff welfare, etc. in the maritime region; (c) April 23, 1946.

3. (a) $3,000 per annum; (b) $196.60.

4. Yes. (a) R.C.A.F.; (b) October 27, 1939; (c) September, 1941; (d) Medical grounds.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

CANADIAN ARMY BASIC TRAINING CORPS QUARTERS, PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Were any basement quarters of the 100th C.A.B.T.C. at Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, condemned at any time during the period of the recent war? If so, when?

2. What is the date and number of any order with respect to such condemnation?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No. Accommodation was, however, not considered suitable for sleeping quarters and other arrangements were made in April, 1943, providing new quarters for sleeping and using basement quarters for lecture rooms and storage.

2. Answered by No. 1.

BELLEVILLE, ONT., DOCK FACILITIES

Mr. STOKES:

1. Did the dominion government enter into a contract for the extension of the dock area at the harbour in Belleville, Ontario?

2. Were tenders called for this work?

3. If so (a)when; (b) where; (c) who was the successful tenderer; (d) how many tenders were received?

4. What is the contract price per yard for (a) the fill used near the work; (b) for fill being brought to the work?

5. If tenders were not called, how was the contract let?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned:

1. No.

2, 3, 4, and 5. Answered by No. 1.

IMPORTS OF COAL

Mr. GILLIS:

How many tons of (a) bituminous; (b) anthracite coal did the Rochester and Pittsburgh Coal Company (Canada) Limited import into Canada during the period from January, 1945 to January 1, 1946?

Mr. McCANN: It is contrary to the practice of this department to furnish information which would disclose the private transactions of importeres at customs.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION AND SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has the International Typographical Union at any time since the commencement of the present dispute with certain newspaper publishers offered to amend its provision excepting its laws, not relating to hours, wages and working conditions, in such a manner as to meet clearly the requirements of Canadian law?

2. If so, what is the nature of such amendment, and when was it offered?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

2. The amendment accepted, rather than "offered", by the representatives of the international typographical union read as follows: "Provided, however, local union laws not affecting wages, hours and working conditions, and the general laws of the International typographical union, shall not be subject to arbitration except in so far as such arbitration and the results thereof are compulsory under Canadian law". This amendment was acceptable to representatives of the union at a meeting with officials of the Department of Labour held on January 30, 1946, as a proposal relating to the Winnipeg newspaper stoppage of work which had commenced on November 8, 1945.

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any Southam newspapers indicated their willingness to sign a contract with the International Typographical Union including a provision that the union's laws, not relating to hours, wages and working conditions, should be exempt from arbitration?

2. If so, which newspapers?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. My department has received no information on this point.

2. Answered by No. 1.

WARTIME HOUSING—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. McKAY:

1. How many houses have been (a) constructed; (b) are under construction, in Saskatchewan by Wartime Housing Corporation?

2. What will be the cost to the government of each of the following types of houses (a) 4 room; (b) 5 room; (c) 6 room?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. As at June 15, 1946: (a) 424 houses; (b) 756 houses.

In addition to (b) above the construction of 250 more houses has been authorized although contracts have not yet been let for their erection.

2. Final costs to the dominion government are not yet available as only approximately 30 per cent of the house construction scheduled for Saskatchewan has been completed. The following costs therefore are estimates only: (a) 4 room, $3,330.02; (b) 5 room, $4,272.81; (c) 6 room, $4,397.22.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WAR ASSETS—PROPERTIES—RENTALS, TAXES, ETC.

Mr. FRASER:

1. What properties including office space did War Assets Corporation own or rent during the year 1945?

2. What was paid in rentals, taxes, repairs and other costs on these properties for the year 1945?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REGINA DIVISION—MEN LAID OFF

Mr. McKAY:

1. How many men have been laid off by the Canadian National Railways in the Regina division since October 31, 1945?

2. How many of these men were veterans of world war I or II?

3. How many of these men were (a) maintenance of way employees; (b) shop employees; (c) running trades?

SHORTAGE OF NURSES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government taken any action with regard to the acute shortage of nurses in Toronto and elsewhere?

2. What percentage of enlisted nurses have left the armed services since the cessation of hostilities?

3. How many of these have returned to private practice?

EXPORTS OF APPLES—SUBSIDIES

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

1. What quantity of apples was exported by Canada during each of the years 1939 to 1945, inclusive?

2. At what prices were they sold?

3. What price was paid to the producers?

4. What was the amount of subsidies paid on exported apples?

DECORATIONS AWARDED TO CHAPLAINS

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East):

1. Were any decorations awarded to chaplains who served in His Majesty's forces during the war?

2. If so, to whom and when?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ADJOURNMENT ON FRIDAY UNTIL JULY 2

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A question was asked last week whether it was the intention of the government to have the house sit on July 1, Canada's national holiday. The government have come to the decision that this year, July 1 coming on a Monday, the house should not be expected to sit on the first of July but that an opportunity be given to hon. members to participate in one or other of the numerous celebrations that are being arranged in different parts of Canada. I have asked the Clerk of the House to insert a notice on the order paper to the effect that when the house adjourns on Friday, the 28th instant, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 2nd of July.

CLOCKS IN PARLIAMENT BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. What is going wrong with the clocks around the halls of this building? They do not agree on the time.

Mr. HOMUTH: They are like the government.

Hon. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Minister of Public Works): I wish to thank the hon. member for drawing my attention to the fact that some of the clocks are running wild. I shall do my best to have them fixed as soon as possible. We are fortunate in that only the clocks around here run wild.

SMALL LOANS ACT

REDUCTION OF MAXIMUM INTEREST RATE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 140, to amend the Small Loans Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is there not to be a debate on second reading?

Mr. SPEAKER: I put the motion for second reading to the house and it was agreed to. Then I put the motion referring it to the banking and commerce committee, which was also agreed to.

Mr. HOMUTH: Is it understood that this bill is being referred to the banking and commerce committee? The minister has not said so.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The speaker said so.

QUEBEC BOUNDARIES EXTENSION

REPEAL OF PROVISION EXCLUDING, FOR PURPOSES OF REDISTRIBUTION, POPULATION OF ADDED AREAS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 156, to amend the Quebec Boundaries Extension Act, 1912.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the minister not going to explain the bill a little more fully than he did last time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I assumed that the house was satisfied with the explanation I made when the bill received its first reading on May 28. At that time I stated that in 1912—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but I put the motion for second reading to the house and it was carried; therefore the motion now before the house is to refer the bill to committee of the whole.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought I had asked the minister a question before second reading was given. However, if the second reading has been given it is all right; we can deal with it in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest to the hon. member that the discussion can take place in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The committee will remember that when I introduced this bill on May 28 I said that it was incidental to the resolution which was under debate until last Thursday night. Had I not been remiss in my duty on Wednesday last I should have announced that we would ask the house to take up second reading of this bill when the resolution was passed. It did pass the house shortly before eleven o'clock on Thursday night, and as I had not given notice that the second reading of this bill would be moved immediately afterwards I did not feel that I should do so, and I took the first opportunity then of informing the house that it would be called at this time.

In 1912 parliament passed several acts to extend northwards the boundaries of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba. In the bill dealing with the extension northward of the boundaries of Quebec it was provided that the population of the added territory would not be counted in the population to be divided by sixty-five to find the unit of representation on redistribution of the membership of this house. In view of the fact that the population of Quebec is not now to be the determining factor to fix that representation it was felt that the restrictions which had been inserted in the legislation of 1912 should be removed. I pointed out that when the statute of 1912 was passed its coming into force had been made contingent upon concurrent legislation of the Quebec legislature, and that in fact concurrent legislation had been passed. It was only after it had been passed and the increase in area and the terms of that increase accepted by an act of the legislature of Quebec that the federal act was proclaimed.

Hon. members will note that it is proposed that this act shall not come into force until proclaimed, and shall not be proclaimed unless and until there is concurrent legislation of the legislature of Quebec. As a matter of fact, before it was introduced the government of Quebec was advised of its introduction, and that the proposal would contain the section that it would not come into force except on proclamation and would not be proclaimed unless and until the legislature of Quebec had concurred in amending the provisions of legislation which had originally been made with the concurrence of the legislature of the province.

At the present time the effect is nil. At the last census the population of the area was 3,067, and in the calculation would amount to less than one one-hundredth of one per cent of the total population of Canada; therefore it does not affect the unit of representation. If it is included it raises the unit of representation from 45,566 to 45,578; but a difference of twelve in the divisor has no effect at all when used in dividing the population of the other provinces. It is really incidental to the resolution adopted by this house on Thursday evening, and if passed and concurred in by the legislature of Quebec, and proclaimed, will leave the province of Quebec in exactly the same situation as all the other provinces of Canada. It will leave the statute of 1912, which concerned Quebec, with the same conditions as those originally placed in the statute extending the boundaries of Ontario and the statute extending the boundaries of Manitoba.

Mr. MacNICOL: Should the bill not give a description of the new area added to Quebec? By the old description in the 1912 act, which covered the northern boundary of Quebec, the line commenced at the mouth of the east Main river, proceeded eastward and then up the main tributary northeastward to lake Nishikun, and then followed the fifty-second and a half parallel east to the source tributary of the Hamilton river. Since that time, however, Labrador has been set up, so I am under the impression that it would be necessary to mention that area lying north of the boundary of 1912 and eastward to the boundary of Labrador.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is not intended by this act to deal with the fact that a certain area purported to be annexed to Quebec at that time, and that since then some of it has been declared to be not within the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. All that is proposed is to delete two of the conditions which no longer apply. There is nothing in the statute of 1912 being dealt with in this amendment but the conditions that were inserted.

Mr. ADAMSON: In view of the valuable iron deposits recently discovered on the boundary of that long bit of Labrador which goes into the province of Quebec, has any consideration been given to rewriting the treaty with Labrador to include that area? A tremendous development is likely to go on there, which will be channelled down through the province of Quebec. That is really physically part of Canada, whether it is on one side or other of the height of land. I realize this bill does not deal with that, but while we are on this subject I should like to ask whether any discussions have taken place in that regard.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is a matter about which I must be rather careful in what I say. It is being dealt with by the Department of External Affairs. As the hon. member knows, just within the last few days an election has been held in Newfoundland for the purpose of constituting an assembly. The position of Canada is still as it has been stated on more than one occasion in this house. If the people of Newfoundland come to the conclusion that they would be happy to throw in their lot with Canada, their representations will be given most earnest and sympathetic consideration. But it has been said on more than one occasion in this house that this is something concerning more particularly the inhabitants of the old colony of Newfoundland, and this government would not wish to appear to be interfering in the affairs of that colony. Their delegates or representatives will be welcomed here as cordially as we can welcome them. I believe there are many Canadians who feel that it would be to the mutual advantage of Canada and Newfoundland to come closer together. Nevertheless it might not be helpful to that end to have Canada appear to be interfering with the judgment the people of Newfoundland are to express on that subject.

Mr. MacNICOL: Now the minister has mentioned that subject I should like to add a word in that regard, and I do this in the kindest way possible to all concerned. If Newfoundland should send delegates to Canada to discuss the question of the admission of Newfoundland into Canada, which I for one favour, I would strongly urge that no effort be made or no suggestion advanced to detach Labrador from Newfoundland. I made an exhaustive survey into the confederation question in Newfoundland, extending over a week or two during which time I indicated that I for one would favour such a step, and everywhere I was met with the question, "Would you make an effort to detach Labrador from our jurisdiction?" I found the people of Newfoundland almost immovable in their determination not even to discuss the question of detaching Labrador from the jurisdiction of the island. I respectfully suggest that if this matter does come up, no suggestion be put forward by us to detach Labrador from the island of Newfoundland.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure whoever represents Canada at a conference of this kind will be glad to have the considered opinion of the hon. member as to the best method of serving the mutual interests of the people of the two areas.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

NAVAL SERVICE ACT

PROVISION FOR SEA CADET CORPS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services) moved the second reading of bill No. 56, to amend the Naval Service Act, 1944.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I had better say a brief word in explanation. The purpose of the bill is to amend the Naval Service Act by adding two sections, 28A and 28B, in order to provide permanent authority for the formation, training and administration of the Royal Canadian Sea Cadet Corps. That authority exists at present by virtue of P.C. 3655 of May 26, 1941, an order in council passed under authority of the War Measures Act and continued in effect under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945. As the powers conferred by that act in due course lapse, it is necessary to provide permanent authority under the Naval Service Act. The bill is similar to sections 59 to 62 of the Militia Act, which make provision for military cadets.

The Canadian sea cadet movement is by no means new. Since 1896, members of the Navy League of Canada have contributed, without remuneration, a large part of their spare time to the sea cadet corps. The primary object of the movement was not, I think it is fair to say, to train cadets for service during war time, but rather to help direct boys and young men along the road to better citizenship.

At the outbreak of war in 1939, the Canadian navy consisted, as hon. members are aware, of approximately 1,700 officers and men. One of the lessons we learned in the course of the growth of the navy to its war-time peak of over 100,000 officers and men was the value, in time of war, of the training that had been given to the sea cadet corps. True, cadets were by no means finished seamen, but they had in the course of their training absorbed many of the fundamentals of service at sea, and also the basic features of naval discipline. The value of this training was demonstrated in every theatre of operations in which the Canadian navy was engaged. At least 6,000 cadets passed from sea cadet corps to active service during the war, and among their numbers the navy is proud to count some of its most distinguished officers and men.

It was in 1941 that the naval service first took an official part in the affairs of the sea cadets. Since then the movement has been the combined effort of the navy league and the naval service. The navy league provides the corps with training quarters and at least one summer camp in each province. The general administration of the corps is attended to by local branches and committees of the league. Interested citizens act as sea cadet officers and they, with the committees, organize public support for the corps. The naval service supervises the training of the sea cadet officers and cadets, operates the summer camps, and lends the necessary training equipment. It is intended to continue this arrangement, which has worked out most satisfactorily.

In 1942 His Majesty the King, at the request of the government of Canada, was pleased to permit the sea cadets of Canada to use the term "Royal" as a prefix to their name, so that the official name then became "The Royal Canadian Sea Cadet Corps."

During the war considerable emphasis was naturally placed upon the value of the corps as a means of training youths for eventual active service with the navy. Now that the war is over, emphasis is again placed upon the primary peace-time object of the corps which, as I have said, is to assist in the development of good Canadian citizens. Yet always in the background is the thought that should Canada again be faced with a national emergency, the training these youth are receiving to-day will stand the nation in good stead.

There are at present nearly 13,000 sea cadets, attached to approximately 100 separate corps located in all of the larger cities of Canada, as well as in many smaller cities and towns. It is proposed to increase the number of cadets to 15,000. The widespread national enthusiasm for the movement that is constantly being demonstrated makes it plain that that number could, without difficulty, be greatly exceeded. However, for the time being at least, the funds and administrative facilities that are available make it impracticable to aim at a membership of more than 15,000.

Hon. members who have, as I have had, a son in the sea cadet corps, or who have become familiar by other means with the activities of the corps, will not need to be told of the fine work that is being done in building character and in keeping the boys interested in worth-while things during their leisure time. I have been informed by officials of the Navy League of Canada that there is no record of a single serious offence having been committed in Canada by a member of the sea cadet corps. I am not in a position to verify that statement, but I am quite prepared to believe that it is correct. This record may in some measure be attributable to the fact that the Royal Canadian Sea Cadet Corps attracts a good type of young boy, but I am quite sure that the training the boys receive and the spirit that prevails in the corps has had a great deal to do with it.

I trust the house will support the amendment to the Naval Service Act which will permit this corps to become a permanent part of our naval service.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am happy indeed to support this bill. I have been a member of the Navy League of Canada, Ontario division, for the last thirty years, ever since 1917, and for a number of years have been one of the honorary presidents. In that time I have been associated with a multitude of distinguished men and women across Canada who, as the minister has so kindly pointed out, have given their services freely. They have given, too, of their time and their means to build up this great organization.

I thank the minister for the encomiums he has paid the navy league for the achievements of the young men belonging to that organization. I was amused a few days ago when I received from Toronto a pamphlet in which appeared the definition of a sea cadet boy. Perhaps the minister has read it, but I think it would be worth while to put it on Hansard. This article was prepared by the Rev. E. M. Skillen, co-padre of "Admiral Mountbatten" Navy League Sea Cadet Corps. Happily the sea cadets name their corps for admirals or ships. I have forgotten the name of the Toronto corps. The article states:

> A sea cadet is a boy. A boy was once classically defined as a "darling" at the age of two, a "nuisance" at the age of 8, at 18 "interesting," at 22 "a meal ticket," and at 25 married "and to blame for everything." The definition is humorous but superficial, for it leaves out of account the straddling age of 12 to 16, the most important time in a boy's life.

Mr. ABBOTT: The top limit is 19 years. It ranges from 12 to 19.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister referred to training. The Rev. Mr. Skillen makes reference to that feature, in these words:

> First the boy is dressed in the finest uniform in the world, a uniform steeped in tradition and honour, and he is taught to respect the uniform and what it stands for. It teaches him the first lesson of good citizenship, faithfulness to ideals.

Those are some of the reasons why in 1917 I became interested in this movement. That was about the time the late Lord Jellicoe, the victor at Jutland, came to Canada. He and those associated with him gave the movement a tremendous impetus.

As the minister has said, the corps have grown in number to almost a hundred. I believe the exact number stands at 91, and they are found in the principal cities and towns throughout Canada. The objective in membership is 15,000. I am happy to say that during the war more than 10,000 of those trained in sea cadet corps in Canada entered the Canadian navy. This number would be almost 75 per cent of the number belonging to the corps. Then, about 14 per cent joined the army, and about three per cent the air force.

But the effect on total enlistments throughout Canada in all the services, through the work of the navy league since 1917 was much greater than can be shown in the percentages I have given. Years ago, when I had more time, I visited the corps all across Canada. One expects to find the spirit of the sea prevailing in the towns and cities along our coasts, but it has always been a revelation to me to witness the ardour and enthusiasm of the sea cadets corps at inland points. I have in mind the city of Winnipeg which at that time, if not to-day, had the largest sea cadet corps in Canada. It is a large corps. Regina also had a high class corps, as well as Calgary and Edmonton.

The training that these boys had received down through the years showed results during the war. The young men of the prairies were far removed from the sea, but they were encouraged to enlist for naval and sea work. They excelled and distinguished thmselves beyond anything that anyone would have dreamed possible on the part of boys who had never seen ships and who had never had anything to do with the sea. With the minister I rejoice in the marvellous work accomplished by the navy league down through the years.

I cannot speak too highly of the navy league. Every time it was mentioned in the house, particularly during the war, many hon. members have been ready to laud its achievements. I cannot close without mentioning a few of the outstanding Ontario men and women who have taken part in this work. I am sorry I have not the names of those in other parts of Canada, but perhaps other hon. members can mention them.

Those in Ontario include the patron, His Honour the Lieutenant Governor Albert Matthews. The dominion president is Mr. D. H. Gibson, C.B.E., a retired executive of the great Robert Simpson Company. He has carried into the administration of the affairs of the navy league the same careful business administration he exercised when building up that great company. The Ontario president is Mr. Gordon C. Leitch, another outstanding business man of the city of Toronto, who devotes his whole time to the administration of the Ontario division of the navy league. I believe last year he was able to raise close to $400,000 to carry on naval work, which was to the credit not only of the Ontario division but of the whole navy league. The secretary is Mr. Victor R. Ramsay. Among the honorary presidents are Lady Eaton, Lady Kemp, Mrs. A. E. Kirkpatrick, Mrs. R. C. Matthews, and among the vice presidents are Colonel A. E. Kirkpatrick, K.C., Mr. J. C. M. MacBeth, K.C., and a long list of others.

I rise with a great deal of pleasure to support this bill. Let me close by quoting the promise made by the sea cadet. This reads:

> I solemnly promise to live up to the motto of the Royal Canadian Sea Cadet Corps for God, for King and for the empire, and further promise, as far as I am able, never to allow any one to do or say anything against my king or country.

I gladly second what the minister has said about the official figures showing that the sea cadets are never in trouble, that they are always an example to others. I have never heard of one of them being in the courts for a misdemeanor. The training is such as to make them real men in character, in deportment, in civility and in recognition of authority. Although their pledge does not call upon them to serve, they have shown that they are ready to serve.

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay this bill, nor shall I repeat the many fine things that have been said about the Navy League of Canada and the sea cadet corps in Canada. Naturally I agree with everything that has been said. I commend the interest that the minister and his department have taken in this work during the past several years. I rose simply to draw one matter to the attention of the minister. I suggest that the remuneration given to the sea cadet officers be in the form of a clothing allowance. In the past this has always been to compensate for out of pocket expenses, which may amount to a considerable sum at the end of the year.

I have in mind one chap who attended the sea cadet officers course at Cornwallis for two weeks last month. He then went to camp with the boys at Gananoque. At the end of the year he found that the amounts he received for expenses put him in a higher category and the result was he was being penalized by our own revenue department. I feel that this matter should be taken into consideration and these payments made in the form of a clothing or expense allowance.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I support what the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) has said. In my fair city there is one of the outstanding branches of the sea cadet corps. Many persons in that city have given of their substance as well as of their time to support this work, and they are finding considerable difficulty in getting new personnel to continue it. Every possible consideration should be given to continuing the interest which these young men have in this work. They have grown up over a period of eight or ten years and have now reached the point where they would be very useful to the organization, but, they hesitate to continue with the work because of financial considerations, although they have every other qualification. I feel sure the minister will give this aspect of the matter every consideration.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the Social Credit movement will be behind the proposals made by the minister in this bill. We urge that the minister be ambitious in preparing our people for an emergency. He should not be apologetic; he should tell the people that they are in grave danger of having to face another struggle at any time. It is wisdom to be prepared. We should emphasize the aspects of this movement which involve health, training, and character development, and we must be more prepared in many of these things than we were in the last generation. People get the idea that all they are doing this thing for is character development. The Social Credit movement will support the minister in an ambitious programme.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): The first question I want to direct to the minister is whether his remark about including those of nineteen years of age is correct, because I understand from the bill that it does not include those of nineteen years of age. The second point is with regard to rates of pay, accommodation and medical care, and so forth, being left entirely to orders in council. I believe that on previous occasions there have been complaints of discrimination between the various arms of the service with regard to the cadet corps, that the naval cadet corps was not receiving the same pay as cadets in the army and the air force. Are these provisions to be made uniform, or is there to continue to be discrimination in rates of pay?

Mr. ABBOTT: We are not in committee, but if no hon. member desires to speak I can deal with the matters which have just been raised by the hon. member for Yorkton.

Mr. SPEAKER: If no other hon. members wish to speak, the minister will now close the debate.

Mr. G. R. WEBB (Leeds): As the boys' sea cadet camp known as Rotary Island is located within almost a stone's throw of where I live, I should like to say just a few words. I have had the opportunity of visiting this camp on many occasions, and my impression is that good training supervision is the secret of the success of this organization. I believe that in most cases the instructors and trainers are good, and therefore I am heartily in accord with any advancement of this enterprise. It is a great work. I have a couple of questions to ask, but possibly I can do that in committee.

Mr. ALAN COCKERAM (York South): I just want to compliment the minister for bringing down this measure, and would like to suggest to him—I am sure he has taken it into consideration—that the good will and the cooperation of the provincial departments of education be obtained in order that this whole movement may be successful.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have in my riding two of the finest sea cadet corps in the country, one sponsored by the Kiwanis, and one at the Grove school. The Grove school is, I believe, one of the oldest sea cadet corps in Canada. Three hundred of its members went into the services in this war and the previous war. But since the war is over the members of the Kiwanis club of Peterborough—of which I am a member—have told me it is difficult to keep up interest in the movement, to bring the boys together. I suggest to the minister that he do everything possible to get boats and other equipment for the boys in connection with their training. They need it, and it is one way of keeping the corps together.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I will close the debate, if I may, by thanking hon. gentlemen who have spoken for their kind words about the sea cadet corps and the Navy League of Canada—all of which, of course, I heartily endorse. I did not feel that this was a bill which would provoke controversy, and I am glad that it is receiving such general support on the part of hon. members.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Royal Canadian Sea Cadet Corps.

Mr. FRASER: Has any arrangement been made that the ships' bells off the different corvettes, Fairmiles, and so forth, be sent to the cities and towns to which they belong? If the ship's bell of, say, the corvette Peterborough were sent to Peterborough, it would assist in the recruiting of sea cadets and help the morale of the boys.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not quite sure. I believe that where possible, and where the request has been made, ships' bells have been sent to the cities and towns for which the corvettes have been named, but I am not in a position to say whether that is the general rule. I am inclined to think it is not. I will take a note of my hon. friend's suggestion, and when the estimates of the naval service department are before the house I can perhaps reply in greater detail.

The hon. member for Yorkton asked, I think, as to the age limit. The ages, as I said, are twelve to nineteen, but up to nineteen. Boys over nineteen years of age are not eligible as cadets. In other words they can serve up to the time they enter their nineteenth year.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): How many training centres will there be in Canada, and where; and how long will the cadets train each year?

Mr. ABBOTT: By training centres does my hon. friend mean cadet camps?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes.

Mr. ABBOTT: There are fourteen in all.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Distributed throughout the country?

Mr. ABBOTT: Distributed throughout Canada—one at least in every province.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has my hon. friend the names of them?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes. I would be glad to put them on Hansard:

Pownal, ten miles from Charlottetown on Pownal bay.

In Nova Scotia negotiations are under way for a camp site and will be settled shortly.

Camp Brock, twenty-eight miles from Saint John, on the Saint John river.

William Ewing camp, which is near Choisy, outside Montreal.

Rotary island, Gananoque, Ontario.

Princess Alice and Queen Elizabeth, twelve miles from Midland on Minnicog and Beausoleil islands.

Kitchigami, five miles from Goderich on lake Huron.

Lake Eva, which is on Purdy island in Eva lake, near Kawene, Ontario.

Ruttan, which is near Kenora.

Shepley island, which is an island in the Saskatchewan river not far from Saskatoon.

Wabamum, which is thirty miles from Edmonton.

Chestermore, which is east of Calgary.

A camp in British Columbia on Gambier island, some fourteen miles northwest of Vancouver in Howe sound.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What will be the period of training?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I have not that information at the moment, but, judging from the experience of my own son, the camp operates during a period of two months in the summer, and the boys go for periods varying from two to four weeks.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has drawn attention to the fact that, strictly speaking, a cadet ceases to be a cadet on his nineteenth birthday. Of course after that those who show aptitude and who so desire may perhaps be granted commissions; they are extremely useful in carrying on the work of the corps, and even as instructors they are on occasion continued in the work of the corps and give very beneficial service. The great impetus which came to the sea cadet movement at the beginning of the recent war was largely due, I think, to the interest which the minister's predecessor took in this movement. Before that, in the years between the wars and particularly as a result of the years of depression, grave difficulties were encountered by those who were endeavouring to carry on the work of the sea cadet corps. A great deal of the load fell on the shoulders of those in our communities who were sufficiently interested in the work, and sufficiently appreciative of the fact that such training was of the greatest value not only to the boy himself but to the neighbourhood, to ensure that the movement was carried on. In 1941 the sea cadet corps regulations were brought out. I understand that those regulations have been amended and a new set have been prepared but not issued. I shall be glad if the minister will explain the position with regard to the new regulations. Possibly he has been waiting until this bill should become an act, but there are quite considerable modifications, I am told, in the new set, and I should like to hear when we shall have them.

In the second part of section 1 reference is made to the fact that the members and instructors shall be entitled to accommodation, medical care and pay and allowances, as may be prescribed. I should like to make this observation to the minister with regard to accommodation. In 1935 the government took over a school building in the town of Kelowna where there is a cadet corps which has existed now for a considerable number of years, a school building which was about to be demolished but which it was considered could be adapted to the use of an armouries. On that occasion I made a point of seeing to it that the sea cadet corps should have not only the use of the drill hall and of the miniature rifle range but also have a room and a storeroom. A sea cadet corps accumulates a very considerable quantity of government property, such as rifles, ammunition and various instruments used for training the boys, and prior to that time it had been very difficult to preserve these possessions of the government in the hands of the sea cadet corps. I then made arrangements that there should be two comparatively small rooms put at the disposal of the sea cadet corps, one for use as an office where the committee could meet, whose task it is to run the corps, and where the officer commanding and the petty officers could draw up their reports and fill up their forms, and next door to it a store room which could be under lock and key, the window of which could be barred. And so the sea cadet corps was for the first time in its history with something which it could call its own in the way of premises.

There must be many other opportunities for the government to provide that minimum of accommodation which in my opinion is pretty nearly a necessity if an efficient corps is going to be run. Prior to that time, that corps and another one in my neighbourhood went from pillar to post to get what premises were available at a cheap rate, and then they were turned out and had to find something else. I should like to hear from the minister something on that subject, and whether he will endeavour to see that in future, when armoury buildings are being provided, the sea cadet corps of that neighbourhood have premises provided for them.

Mr. ABBOTT: First, as to the new regulations, these have not yet been issued; as my hon. friend has intimated, they are being held until this bill has been passed. They will be issued shortly thereafter. It may be a month or two, allowing for revision and printing, but he can be assured that they will be issued promptly. On the question of accommodation, I agree with what he has said, that in making plans for the construction of any new naval division buildings, if and when we are able to proceed with them, proper care be taken to see that facilities are available for the sea cadet corps.

When I visited the naval division in Saskatoon two or three months ago—it is a modern type of naval division, a building which was constructed during the war—I was pleased to find that adequate and suitable provision had been made therein for the local sea cadet corps. The estimates for this year contain an appropriation of something over $800,000 for the support of sea cadet work, and the committee can be assured that this work will be continued.

Mr. STIRLING: Can I take it from the minister's remarks that in those centres where there is not an armoury or a national defence building or any sort, the government will look favourably on a sufficient grant of money to enable proper premises to be rented for the purpose?

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend knows, the sea cadet movement is sponsored by the Navy League of Canada, and a substantial portion of the money which is used in its activities is raised by voluntary subscriptions. The government feel that it is extremely desirable that this should be continued because it enlists the support of public-spirited and representative citizens in different parts of the country and is not solely a government-directed movement. It is most desirable that this feature should be retained. I am not prepared to say that in districts where there is no naval division available, in which quarters can be furnished for a sea cadet corps, a specific grant could be made for that purpose, but I shall be happy to take my hon. friend's suggestion into consideration and bring it to the attention of the officers of the department to see whether something of the kind would be possible. After all, it is as broad as it is long. If the moneys raised locally do not have to be used for the rental of premises, they can be used for other purposes, and therefore the amounts made available through government assistance can be used for some other purpose. However, I shall take the remarks of my hon. friend into consideration and see what can be done.

Mr. STIRLING: I warn the minister that I shall expect him to fight like a tiger when the new premises are being built, which are foretold of in the Okanagan valley. A new building is said to be in contemplation. By the way, it is the same minister, and I shall feel it all the more necessary to ask him to see to it that a sea cadet corps is properly provided for in the buildings which will probably be put up before many years are over in order to replace those that exist today. In my opinion it is essential, if the government is going to support this very worthy enterprise, that the necessary facilities be provided to enable them to carry on their work properly.

Mr. LENNARD: The corps in which I am most interested is housed at the moment in armouries under the direction of M.D. 2, and we are working harmoniously with the O.C. of the battery in charge of the armouries. Further to what the minister said about the sea cadet movement being under the direction of the Navy League of Canada and more or less on their own, I believe it remains that way to a great extent. I may add that both Hamilton and Burlington are considering the raising of considerable amounts of money—by private subscription, which is as it should be—for the erection of sea cadet headquarters in both places.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I feel it my duty to say that no one in Canada did more for the sea cadet corps than a former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). It was one of his great works. When he was minister of defence and in opposition in other days he unfailingly supported the sea cadet corps.

Mr. PEARKES: Canada now has three cadet corps, the sea cadets, the army cadets and the air force cadets. They all receive some, if not all, their financial assistance from the government of Canada. There are other boy organizations, such as the boy scouts, in Canada which in the past have, I believe, received government grants. It is highly desirable that there should be no duplication in the expenditure of this money, and that there should not be undue rivalry between these various organizations—and by undue rivalry I mean attemps made by local scoutmasters or cadet leaders to get boys to transfer from one organization to another. In order that Canada's money may be spent as wisely and judiciously as possible some coordination is required between the activities, training, terms of enlistment and so forth of these various cadet corps. Can the minister tell us whether any steps are being taken to co-ordinate the training activities of the three cadet corps? If so, is there any further coordination between the other boy movements of Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is an inter-service cadet committee in the three services. I am not able to say just how far that committee has progressed with coordinating the training in the three services. One thing that it does is to allocate corps on the basis of population, having due regard to the requests of local school boards and so forth, so that there will not be overlapping and duplication, particularly in smaller towns, as between the cadet corps of the three services. I think that is desirable. I do not believe very much headway has been made thus far in coordinating the training of the various corps. I do not know just how far that will be possible. My hon. friend could speak with greater authority on that than I can. I suppose the one purpose of the cadet corps, aside from its training value, is to instil in the member of the corps a liking for and an interest in the particular service for which he is training, and so long as it balances out fairly well throughout the country on the law of averages I suppose we can leave to each service the determination of the type of training that may be given in a particular corps in the service. But I shall be glad to look into the matter a bit further. Perhaps when my general estimates are under review I can make a more complete statement in reply to the inquiry which my hon. friend has made.

Mr. LENNARD: In my own locality some men who are in the boy scout movement are members of the sea cadet committee and, it has never been my experience that there has been any conflict between the boy scouts and the sea cadet movement. I may not be right. Some hon. member said I was wrong. But so far as my knowledge goes there is complete cooperation. We do not take boys into the sea cadets until they are fourteen years of age, and at that time they are about ready to leave the boy scouts.

Mr. ABBOTT: That coincides with my experience. In my own city Mr. R. C. Stevenson is extremely active in the boy scout movement and the sea cadet movement.

Mr. SKEY: Is the inter-service cadet committee considering the standardization of pay and allowances, uniform conditions of service, commissioning and so forth for the three cadet corps, or are they all handling their own organizations and directing them by different means?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is an inter-service cadet committee in Ottawa and one in each military district as well; but on the point just raised by the hon. member I think that is a matter which is considered not by the inter-service cadet committee but by the personnel members committee. I am not in a position to give a definite answer to that at the moment.

Mr. SKEY: Is the government considering any national youth training or cadet movement which goes above and beyond a particular service?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. SKEY: Has the government asked the inter-service committee to report on the feasibility of trying a national youth training movement?

Mr. ABBOTT: I question whether that would be the function of this committee. The function of the committee is simply to correlate the activities of the cadet movement in the three services. I would think that is a matter of government policy which would hardly come within the purview of the inter-service cadet committee.

Mr. SKEY: There are only 15,000 sea cadets authorized, and the same number for the air cadets. That makes 30,000 young men in Canada to be taken up by these two services to be given training, which is an immense advantage. The remainder is left to the army. It seems to me that it would be well for the government to consider a scheme which would take in the whole of the country, to give youth all the benefits of the type of training which the cadet gets in these two services.

Mr. PEARKES: Are the sea cadets entitled to receive benefits from the Strathcona trust? I have attended various meetings of the trust committee in various provinces, but I have never seen any representative of the sea cadet service there.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid I cannot answer that question at the moment. I shall have to make inquiries and give my hon. friend the information when my estimates are under discussion.

Mr. GILLIS: The officers who organize and largely promote the sea cadets are obliged to purchase their own uniforms, are they not?

Mr. ABBOTT: I believe that is correct.

Mr. GILLIS: Is any gratuity, allowance or remuneration given for the services of these officers? I had the privilege of attending two or three functions of the sea cadet corps in my own community, and I know that the officers who organized and promoted the cadet corps were hard workers. They were not men of means. Some of them were school teachers on a small salary. They have to dress well. I was given to understand that they have to purchase their uniform in addition to all the work they do, in promoting the organization. I thought it was unfair. The least the government should do would be to provide them with the uniform they have to wear, which is expensive.

Mr. ABBOTT: We are now making provision for pay for the sea cadet officers, something which had not been provided for in the past; but no provision has been made for uniform allowance. The hon. member for Wentworth suggested that instead of paying the sea cadet officers we should give them such remuneration by way of uniform allowance, in order that it would not be taxable, and I said I would give that matter consideration. But as things stand at present there is a new provision in the regulations providing pay for sea cadet officers, and at the moment there is no provision for a uniform allowance.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I can tell my hon. friend, from my own experience in the days before the war, how generous Canada was in regard to allowances for uniforms. We had fifteen hundred air cadets in Vancouver with no uniforms at all. I was in defence at that time, and from the quartermaster's stores we obtained men's uniforms. The boys worked overtime for two nights, and we converted these men's uniforms into uniforms for the boys.

Mr. WEBB: There has been a little confusion as to where the naval department stops and where the navy league steps in—in other words, as to where the line of separation should be drawn. The minister mentioned this in his introductory remarks. Equipment, supervision, training and so on I believe come under the navy league, but what about training grounds and matters of the kind? Are they for the navy league or for the governnment?

Mr. ABBOTT: In most centres the navy league makes the premises available. In some centres where we have a naval division, suitable quarters are made available for the sea cadets, but probably it is fair to say that in most communities the premises are provided by the navy league through subscriptions raised from public-spirited citizens who are anxious to support the movement. As I said earlier, personally I think this is a most desirable feature to be retained, because it gets people interested in the movement. You are always a bit more interested in something to which you have made a subscription, so I think it is desirable to retain it on that basis.

Mr. FRASER: It was not too hard to get money for the navy league during the war, but it is a little more difficult to get it now. Some of these premises cost quite a bit to keep up. We have one in Peterborough which cost the Kiwanis Club over $3,000 to put in shape for the boys. The cost of maintenance is heavy, and I think the government should help out to some extent.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Welfare branch—

228. Family allowances—administration, $1,961,250.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): When the committee was last considering the estimates of this department on June 17, I tabled three sets of figures showing family allowance payments month by month, statistics based on the May payments, and further statistics based on family allowance payments broken down by provinces. These appear at page 2587 and following of Hansard. At that time, in response to some requests, I promised to make a brief statement about family allowance administration, in view of the fact that we have almost completed a year.

Hon. members will recall that the act came into force on August 15, 1944. The department which was to administer it, the Department of National Health and Welfare, came into existence on October 13, 1944, and under the terms of the act payments were to begin as from July 1, 1945. We have made payments now for twelve months. The twelfth payment, in respect of the month of June, 1946, has just been issued; but the statistics are not yet available in respect of that month. We hope they will be available next week. Generally speaking the records are kept in such a way that we can have a complete breakdown of the payments, province by province, about a week following the issue of the last cheque from the regional offices at the capitals of the provinces.

Hon. members will recall that in order to effect payment in the month of July, 1945, it was necessary to conduct a registration of all children in respect of whom parents wanted to receive payments. That registration was begun in Prince Edward Island in February, 1945, and was carried on throughout the rest of Canada beginning March 22, 1945. It is now possible to say that 92 per cent of the children under sixteen years of age are registered children in respect of whom payments are made under the act. The bureau of statistics estimates that there are 3,610,000 children in Canada under sixteen years of age, and in May, 1946, payments were made to 1,420,233 families in the amount of $19,934,614 in respect of 3,330,763 children. The average allowance per family was $14.04 per month, and the average per child was $5.98 per month.

In regard to the size of families, 81·5 per cent had three or fewer children. In March, 1946, one family was paid for fifteen children; thirteen families for fourteen; 106 families for thirteen; 320 families for twelve; 1,132 families for eleven and 2,871 families for ten. Therefore some 4,443 families were paid family allowances on behalf of ten or more children. Families numbering four to nine children inclusive represent approximately 18·2 per cent of the total number of families in receipt of family allowances.

The hon. member for Eglinton last Monday asked me to produce a table to give a classification of families, by numbers of children, broken down by provinces. With the unanimous consent of the house I should like to place that table on Hansard. This gives the payments for the month of March, 1946. The breakdown I am now furnishing is prepared every three months, and consequently in about a week or ten days it will be available for June. At that time we shall be in a position to give a complete record for the whole year. The table to which I have referred is as follows:

I believe that hon. members generally are familiar with the administration. It would be surprising if they were not, owing to the fact that so many people in their respective constituencies receive family allowances. I must say that hon. members have been most considerate in dealing with regional offices and with the Ottawa departmental offices. The amount of correspondence we have received has been surprisingly small, when one considers the large number of families and children involved.

Administration has been carried on in nine regional offices situated in the capital cities of each of the provinces. At each of the regional offices is a regional director and a staff connected with family allowance administration. In addition, and in the same building there are treasury officials. We have been exceedingly fortunate in having the closest possible cooperation between the family allowances staff which registers the births and conducts the greater part of the correspondence, and the treasury staff and officials of the comptroller of the treasury, who actually issue the cheques.

As at March 1, 1946 there were in the family allowances regional offices a total of 489 employees who were either temporary or permanent; and in addition there were 492 employees who were employed on a casual or hourly rate basis. Those 492 were largely engaged in doing the work of verifying the backlog of registrations of births. Hon. members will appreciate that in the first year of administration we had a peak load in the registration of births, in that we had to conduct registrations of all children under sixteen, but we had approximately fifteen or sixteen times the task in a normal year. The work of verifying births has been largely completed.

As hon. members are aware, under our system applicants for family allowances are not required to furnish birth certificates. We make verifications in our offices in this fashion: We have made arrangements with each province under which the office of vital statistics in the province is furnished by us with Recordak equipment. That equipment is used to make microphotographs of all original records of births and deaths of children under sixteen years. The film is sent to Ottawa, where the information is put on Hollerith cards by the dominion bureau of statistics. Those cards are used to print automatically and in alphabetical order, arranged by years for each province, a register of the births and deaths of children under sixteen years in those provinces. Similar information is secured with regard to the children in the northwest territories and the Yukon, and also in connection with immigrant children.

In this way there has been built up a set of registers which, in the first instance, are kept in the family allowances offices. When an application is received, that application is checked against the register. There is written into the register the family registration number so as to prevent any double claim in respect of the same child.

The work of verification which I have just described is more than half completed. I am happy to say that thus far it has disclosed a very small number of cases of fraud. So far we have found only two cases in which there is a suspicion of fraud, in which the circumstances are such as to warrant prosecution. That is an extraordinary tribute to the essential honesty of the parents of the children of Canada, when one thinks that with almost a million and a half registrations we have so far found only two cases which appear to show fraudulent registration. Those will be prosecuted through the usual channels. In addition, there has been a number of cases of forgery. About seventy-five claims have been made on the banks thus far, and I believe all those have been recovered.

The work of registration has been greatly simplified in Canada because the registration is so very simple in comparison with other government forms, and also in comparison with family allowance application forms used in other countries. We have found that it has worked well. An unusual feature of this administration is that we use only two printed forms, one of which is an application form and the other a supplementary application form. All other correspondence is conducted by ordinary letter. This, we find, has worked out well. It makes the administration more human; it prevents any delay owing to a lack of proper forms in the proper language at any point in Canada.

As hon. members may imagine, the correspondence is of considerable volume, and refers chiefly to changes in address, reporting deaths of children, or making inquiries as to amounts of payments. Actual letter correspondence totals about 133,000 letters a month. In addition, the family allowance administration makes changes automatically in the amount of payment owing to changes in the size of a family or the age of children. There are in this way some 70,000 automatic changes each month. In addition, there are 31,000 changes of address.

Altogether this represents a substantial bulk of correspondence. The procedure for payment, after the form has been received applying for family allowance and payment is authorized, is carried out with, I believe, one of the most modern sets of business machinery ever to be assembled in Canada. Payments are made through Addressograph cheque-writing equipment. The cheques are issued on fairly stiff paper, which is punch-holed for automatic computation on International Business Machines equipment. In addition, in the larger offices there are envelope stuffers and other types of mechanical equipment which have enabled the administration to keep down the cost to a figure which we regard as reasonably good, in view of the fact that we have been operating for only a year, when the job of complete registration and verification of a backlog of sixteen years has not yet been completed.

When the bill was before the house on July 31, 1944, I was asked, as reported on page 5829 of Hansard, for an estimate of the cost of administration. Based upon the experience of administering dependents' allowances and other large scale payment operations in Canada, as well as the cost of administration of the children's endowment plan in Australia and the children's allowances in New Zealand, which were the best comparable costs, we arrived at a figure of from one per cent to two per cent, or from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000. I suggested that the figure of $2,000,000 was a target to aim at and that I thought it would be quite possible we would come within the figure of $4,000,000. Actually the cost of administration this year is higher than the $2,000,000 figure, but from the experience we have had so far we estimate that in a normal year, after the backlog is taken care of, the costs will amount to the following:

Department of National Health and Welfare, $1,850,000.

Department of Public Works for rentals, furniture and services, $80,000.

Treasury, $1,944,000.

The last item includes $636,000 a year for postage paid by the treasury on family allowance cheques. The total estimated expenditures is $3,874,000, which is 1·6 per cent of the estimated amount of the family allowances payable of $240,000,000. In other words, it comes within the figure we mentioned back in 1944 and we hope that this estimate will be improved upon.

With regard to the working out of family allowances generally, I think it is fair to say that from all the experience we have had the results have more than exceeded our expectations. While there are exceptions, as there must be in any large scale operation of this kind, the majority of parents spend the money for the health and welfare of their children. It is interesting to note that since family allowances were introduced in Canada in July, 1945, a bill has been passed through the British House of Commons providing for family allowances which will come into effect on August 6, 1946. By then we shall have family allowances in operation on relatively similar bases in New Zealand, from 1926; in Australia, from 1941; in Canada, from 1945 and in the United Kingdom, from 1946. In addition, family allowances on a smaller scale have been in operation in Eire since 1945.

Hon. members may be interested in knowing what the different payments are. They are familiar with the sliding scale arrangement in Canada whereby payments run from $5 to $8 per child, with a reduction in the case of children after the fourth. The average payment in Canada is $5.98 a month. In Great Britain the allowance is five shillings a week with respect to all children after the first, which, at the rate of exchange of $4.44 to the pound, works out to $1.11 a week. The total allowances a month amount to 21·7 shillings or $4.81 in Canadian funds. If we average that for all children in England for the purposes of making a rough comparison, we find that the amount per child a month is $2.11. In England they aim to put into effect by stages the provision of school lunches and milk for children, which will gradually build up into quite a sizable sum.

In Australia payment is made with respect to children after the first at the rate of 7·5 shillings a week which, at the rate of exchange of $3.55 per pound, works out to $1.33 a week. The monthly payments amount to 32·5 shillings, or $5.78 in Canadian funds. The average for the whole population gives a figure of $2.84 per child a month. Since the Canadian plan came into force the payments in New Zealand were increased and are now made in respect of all children. The allowance is 10 shillings which, at the rate of exchange of $3.55 a pound amounts to $1.78 in Canadian funds a week or $7.31 a month. It is difficult to arrive at an average for the whole population because the payments in New Zealand are not made in respect of all children. There is quite a high income test which along with other factors reduces the number of children from 100 per cent to something less than that figure. It will be seen that the monthly rate of payment in New Zealand compares favourably with that in Canada as they have increased the rates in New Zealand, since our legislation was passed.

The number of cases in Canada where we have found it necessary to divert the payment from the mother, or from the father in the absence of the mother, to some other parent or trustee for the child, has been found to be much smaller than was anticipated when the family allowance plan came into effect. We have had the close cooperation of provincial and other authorities with regard to the provision that payment will be made only in connection with children who attend school. In every part of Canada there has been a substantial increase in school attendance, which is one of the fortunate by-products of family allowance payments.

We receive a large number of unsolicited letters from parents telling us of the ways in which they spend the money. If hon. members are interested I can show them copies of this correspondence. These letters indicate a degree of cooperation and the recognition of the fundamental purposes of the family allowance provisions that is most moving. We hear from parents in different parts of Canada as to how they are spending the money for the welfare and health of their children. Many unusual cases are reported, many of them exceedingly moving. Altogether I think it is fair to say that, from the point of view of helping to provide for the health and welfare of children, and of enabling children to have a more equal chance in life irrespective of the size of their families, the place of their residence, or the income of their parents, family allowances have proved themselves to be a substantial contribution to that end we all have before us—of giving a better life to all Canadians.

Mr. McIVOR: I feel it my duty to say a word at this time in support of the minister, his staff, and the way they have carried out this family allowance plan. I speak from considerable experience in saying that the money has been well spent. Children are better clothed; they have better food, and I suppose that once in a while they have better entertainment. It is a large amount of money which is spent on family allowances, but compared with the amount which was spent and wasted on war, the monetary reformers who used to be in this house—perhaps some of them are lingering around yet—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Not "lingering".

Mr. McIVOR: —would say that this money has been spent in the best possible way. Keep money in circulation and you will increase employment.

However, what I rose to do was to commend the minister and his staff, and you will notice that not all his experts belong to the male sex.

I have heard criticism levelled at Doctor Chisholm, and I think it has been overemphasized. When one considers that a deputy minister whose offices occupy only a small part of the Jackson building is held up before Canada as a menace; when one realizes that there are hundreds and thousands of ministers who twice a Sunday have their opportunity to tell mothers and fathers how to train their children in the way they should go, I think the statement of the deputy minister is being overestimated. I judge men as I find them, and I feel quite keen about this. I have had some experience with the deputy minister, and I have found no deputy more experienced or efficient than Doctor Chisholm. In one hour after I got a request from Fort William I interviewed the minister; I went to the deputy minister; I had the assurance that $200,000 would be made available for the care of Indians in the sanatorium at Fort William, and I was back in the hall where I started on my mission. If you do not call that efficiency I do not know what you would call efficiency. I do not agree with all Doctor Chisholm's views, but I do not think the minister would have the right to muzzle his deputy. All of us have our own ideas about things. I have mine, and my conviction is that the minister would be making a dastardly mistake if he got rid of his deputy minister.

Mr. FRASER: But you were looking for some money.

Mr. McIVOR: I pay a tribute to the common sense of the minister in holding on to him.

Mr. FLEMING: Among the items of information for which I asked the minister when the committee was last in session were the expenditures on publicity and information contracted for from the date of the inauguration of the family allowance scheme to the present time. Has the minister that information for the committee?

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member asked for that information last week. I find it is not possible to give him expenditures on publicity and information by months in any way that would be understandable. We can provide him with a copy of all accounts paid, which would give the actual dates, or we could sort it out by the items on expenditures as I did on the other items of expenditure on publicity and information in answer to previous inquiries. I thought that was what he wanted and I have that here; I will give it to him, and if he wants anything further I shall be very glad to see if it can be obtained.

In 1945-46 there was spent on publicity and information a total of $108,341.15. In the year beginning with November, 1944, expenditures were made for newspaper advertising, $80,053.34. That was advertising in connection with registration. It was ordered from November, 1944, on. It was released to the papers in Prince Edward Island just prior to February 1, 1945, and released in the rest of Canada between March 19, and April 12, 1945. There were also advertisements regarding income tax and family allowance payments which were ordered on April 5, released between April 13 and May 19, and their cost is included in the expenditure for 1945-46 of newspaper advertising of $79,771.17. Then there were in radio advertisements in the period ended March 31, 1945: in radio announcements released in Prince Edward Island during the week of February 1, 1945 $167.87; in similar radio announc released for redistribution over the rest of Canada over thirty-nine stations during the week of March 22, $5,121.69—for the year 1945-46. There is a descriptive cartoon in connection with registration which went out with registration applications: 3,358,687 were sent out. It was ordered in January, distributed in February in Prince Edward Island, and on March 22 in the rest of Canada: it cost $3,129.01—in the expenditures for the year ended March 31, 1945. There is a booklet called "Family Allowances, a Children's Charter", which was ordered on February 25, 1945, delivered on April 10, 1945, and distributed shortly after, 250,000 in English and 75,000 in French, at a cost of $7,882.25—all in the expenditures for the year 1945-46. That is now out of print, and provision for reprinting is made in this year's estimates. There was a motion picture in connection with Prince Edward Island which was shown toward the end of February and which cost $259.82. There was a similar moving picture, a news clip, ordered on January 15, 1945, and released March 5, 1945, which cost $1,725.95—all in the year 1945-46. There was another news clip on family allowances and income tax ordered on May 15, 1945, and released on June 7, 1945, costing $1,368.79—all in the year 1945-46. Expenditures on photography—art work—in connection with news clips and posters amounted to $871.33 in 1944-45 and $134.36 in 1945-46. There was a six-page poster which was ordered on March 19 and distributed at the end of June, of which 1,500 sets were sent out in English and 250 in French and these were exhibited at established showing points, costing $919.10 spent in 1944-45, while $1,159.80 was spent in 1945-46. Cartoons and pictographs were distributed on March 15, 1945, and there was spent $478.19 in 1944-45 and $1,550.75 in 1945-46. There were graphic sheets for insertion with family allowance cheques distributed in October, 1945, December, 1945, and February, 1946, at a total expenditure, in 1945-46, of $5,204.67. A film strip was issued, ordered October 9, 1945 and distributed April 1, 1946, at a cost of $1,723.65. Of this eighty-nine copies were issued. There is a film script in course of preparation ordered in June, 1945, and on that $250.65 has already been spent. A publication, "A Good Winter Diet", was ordered in December, 1945, and distributed in February, 1946, at a cost of $195.45—all in 1945-46. A booklet "Les Allocations Familiales" was purchased for $31.75. The other item was relatively small.

Mr. COLDWELL: What has been done to inform parents as to the best use that can be made of the family allowance? The minister has spoken of films and so on. I presume some of these have that end in view. Will he tell the committee what kind of advertising, and to what extent, these films display? If we are spending money on publicity, I suggest that the best possible kind of publicity is that which will encourage people to improve the nutrition of the family.

A second point I wish to raise is this. How is a check made to see the manner in which the money is being spent in the home? That is important. We should not try to regiment or over-inspect people, but I am often asked that question with regard to family allowances: How do you know that the money is being used for the purpose for which it was intended? I heard the minister say that a majority of mothers—and, by the way, it is a good thing that the payment is made to mothers—are spending the money on additional nutrition, clothing and so on for their families; but what check is being made in this regard and to what extent is this publicity directed toward the encouragement of people to improve nutrition?

Mr. CLAXTON: In answer to the first question as to the general objects of this publicity, it was quite obvious that we could not secure prompt and accurate registration without telling the people what family allowances are, where they could obtain registration forms, what they were expected to do and how they should fill out the forms, so that a large proportion of the total expenditures on publicity and information was devoted to that object. I think it paid off in results because, instead of having twenty or twenty-five per cent of subsequent correspondence as a result of improper registration, the total correspondence amounted to something like five per cent. Incidentally, the graphic sheet issued with the application form represented the first illustrated sheet of the kind used for that purpose. It suggested how government forms should be made out. We received only one complaint about the use of that form, which was published in a newspaper, and it undoubtedly secured effective results.

The second purpose of the publicity was to bring to people's attention the relation between income tax and family allowance. That was not a simple thing to explain or deal with, and a second series of advertisements were necessary in that regard. Their purpose continued after the month of June or July, 1945, and that was almost entirely—I believe entirely—directed to the objects mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, that is to say, bringing it home to mothers and other recipients of family allowances that the money was intended for the use of children, that it should be spent on food and certain types of clothing and other things which would contribute to the health and welfare of the children. In order to do that we had two films prepared and shown partly through the commercial theatres and partly through the non-commercial, non-theatrical circuits of the national film board, and through other agencies that usually show films. Hon. members all realize what a considerable proportion of the population is reached in that way. What is perhaps more important than anything else, we inserted in each of three family allowance envelopes a graphic sheet, so that the mother, on opening the envelope and receiving the cheque, would also receive a sheet giving in graphic form suggestions as to how payments should be used so as to inure to the welfare of the child. I think it has received a favourable response. We could think of no better way of bringing it home to the families of practically all the children of Canada—as I say, of 92 per cent of the children of Canada; and we propose to issue these stuffers in one form or another about three months apart, not more often, because if they went out more often than that people would get accustomed to them and they would find their way more speedily into the wastepaper basket. On opening the cheque, they see one of these graphic sheets, it takes only a minute or less to see the whole thing, to take it in, and some part of the suggestion will remain.

In addition, there has been fairly extensive distribution of posters which we think are effective. They were shown in railway stations, banks and other public places. Distribution of these posters was small, only some 1,500 sets in English and 250 in French, but they were put in places where they would secure a great deal of attention. In addition, members of the department have been active in meeting the public and explaining the purpose of family allowances. I think there has been wide interest in the press and in all circles. Therefore we feel that there has been a good beginning made in this work of public information and of education. Hon. members will appreciate that this is probably the most effective way of reaching the families of Canada in respect of their children, by bringing home information on health and nutrition. We feel that a great deal more of this educational work could be carried on through the media I have mentioned.

With regard to how we can tell whether or not the payments are properly made, of course no system can be devised which would tell that every cheque was properly spent. In connection with the introduction of family allowances here or elsewhere, it was never the intention that there would be a policing from home to home. What was intended was that as far as possible by making payments to the mother, by relying on the good faith, the judgment and the human interest of the mother in her children and in the community conscience we would do more in that way than we could possibly do with thousands and thousands of policemen or inspectors. That, I am glad to say, has been our experience. But there does arise the case where word is brought to us, through one means or another, that the money is being misapplied. That is brought to us through children's aid societies, through some other welfare agency, through provincial government or municipal officials, through a schoolteacher, through a minister of religion or someone else having at interest the welfare of the children. When that is done an investigation is made through either the emplovees of the government or through an existing agency already in the field. Arrangements have been made with three of the provinces under which these investigations are carried on for the department in consideration of a fee. In other cases we have worked through children's aid societies and welfare organizations, and in that way a check is made.

As regards more positive evidence as to whether or not the money is doing the job, I mentioned that briefly, but with the introduction of family allowances there was a striking increase in the sale of milk in Canada. It is impossible to say what proportion of that is due to the introduction of family allowances and what proportion to other factors, including the return from overseas of soldiers which began to occur in considerable numbers shortly after that. But whereas in the first six months of 1945 the consumption of milk increased 1½ per cent over 1944 in the corresponding period, the consumption increased in the second six months of 1945 eight per cent over the corresponding period in 1944. It may interest hon. members to know that to-day Canada's consumption of fluid milk is 386·8 pounds per capita as opposed to 295·9 pounds in Great Britain and 334·1 pounds in the United States. It is a high per capita consumption.

The second indication was in the increase in the sale of children's clothing, to which hon. members have already referred. That, I think, is a common experience, but again it is impossible to allocate how much of that was due to ordinary purchasing power, of which there was a great deal at the time, and how much to family allowances. However, we are told that the relative demand for childen's clothing as opposed to adult clothing was significant.

Then there was the matter of school attendance which has been reported from one end of Canada to the other. Numerous school authorities have reported to our regional directors and other officers that the children attending school are much better clothed than they were before. We have heard from employees in the northwest territories administration, Indian affairs branch, with regard to payments to Indians and Eskimos that it is already resulting in improved nutritional standards, and that where payments are made in kind it is interesting to see that some of the Indians and Eskimos come back and spend their own money on the kind of foods they have received through the family allowances payment in kind, and that they are spending their own money on some items in quantities which they never bought before.

There is also the correspondence and the fact that relatively few complaints have been received. We have all heard the stories of people who will not work because of this payment, or people who drink the money, but I must say that where these were investigated it has been found that they were relatively few. We are prepared to make these investigations in any such cases and under the act have authority to divert the money to whoever should receive it. In that, of course, we would ordinarily consult either with the representatives of the children's aid society or other interested persons having to do with any cases in a public way. These are indications; they are not in the form of statistics, because in a great human activity of this kind it is not possible to deal with it in terms of statistics, particularly at a time of rapid transition and change. But altogether they add up to a substantial support of evidence for the statement I made, namely, that the family allowances payments are to an even greater degree than we anticipated being used for the welfare of the children of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some nutritional surveys are being conducted among children, are they not?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle has the floor.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry.

Mrs. STRUM: First of all, I wish to compliment the minister. Since I have been a member he is the first minister to recognize officially that all the efficiency and all the devotion are not confined to the male of the species within his department.

Mr. MARTIN: That is not correct. May I point out to the hon. member—and I do this with great reluctance because of my great friendship for the Minister of National Health and Welfare—that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not the first minister to recognize the female of the species. The Minister of Labour did that two years ago when he brought in Mrs. Eaton.

Mrs. STRUM: May I point out to the Secretary of State that I said, "since I have been a member", which dates from last June.

I wish to compliment the minister on the administration of his department, and I have only two or three suggestions to make. Here we have quite a substantial investment in the youth of our country, and I think it is the best investment, the best expenditure, the government makes in the course of the year. We are now investing $250,000,000 in the children, who will be the backbone of the nation. I consider it important and useful to establish family allowances to take care of that particular group because, when I consult the figures on infant mortality—and I think this is a startling comparison—I find that in the five years from 1940 to 1944 more than three times as many babies died in Canada, where there was no war, as Canadian soldiers died in overseas service. The figure given by the infant and maternal welfare branch for infant deaths in the first year of life was 130,095 during that five-year period, while the casualties of the army, navy and air force numbered 40,861. So one can see the terrific loss of lives in the first year of life, and the great need to do something to save the lives of our children. If we are to invest $250,000,000 in children up to sixteen years of age, we should go back even farther than the birth of the child and extend care during the prenatal period so that children would have the best possible chance of surviving the first year of life.

I find, too, that there is a great difference in the chances of survival as between the various provinces. In British Columbia, for instance, the mortality rate is 35 per 1,000 live births; they have the best record. That figure varies up to a rate of 77 deaths per 1,000 live births in New Brunswick. Here I must ask for some latitude and the indulgence of the minister if my remarks extend somewhat far afield. At the moment I am slightly out of order, but I want to point out that this is significant, because it proves that 77 can be reduced to 35, and it shows that it is possible to save the lives of more than half those babies who now die in the first year of life. That is the most valuable aspect of this report.

There is another report, coming from the same department, which indicates that we have reduced our maternal death rate from 10·1 in 1935 to 5·6 in 1943. I think everyone will agree that one mother dying and leaving a home broken and bereaved is a tragedy, but that the more than 800 mothers who died in one year according to the most recent survey constitute a very great tragedy indeed; and our statistics prove that more than half those mothers could have been saved if they had been given proper medical attention. So I would say to the minister that while this is a valuable step we have taken, we must protect this investment by extending our operations a little farther to take in not only the first sixteen years but also the prenatal care of the mother. We must make sure also that there is the proper publicity, the proper educational agencies maintained, so that mothers will know how to care for their children and for themselves.

I want to make just one suggestion in regard to this expenditure. I wish the period covered could be extended from sixteen to eighteen years in the cases of children taking secondary education. I speak from experience, because for the last three years my child has had to live away from home. I was able to collect the family allowance only for the matter of a few months. My child is beginning university this fall and becoming very expensive, and I have no family allowance. I shall be able to look after her, but I am thinking of mothers of large families. With six or seven children in the family it becomes almost impossible to board one child away from home, pay tuition fees, buy books and clothing and perhaps pay railway fare. So I wish the period could be extended to eighteen years to cover children who are trying to get an education. Even though they work for a short period during the summer months, it is really only casual employment. It is not skilled work; they receive very low wages, and it does not amount to very much in the year's expenditure on behalf of education.

I was interested in the comparative figures for the various countries in regard to the amount paid in family allowances. I was interested to hear Sir Wilson Jamieson, when he addressed members of this house on his recent visit. He said that in England they would rather pay a smaller family allowance and make up the difference to the individual child through school lunches and milk served in the schools. They would rather make sure that every child drank milk and had an adequate meal in the middle of the day. In a country like England perhaps it would be much easier to do that than in a country like Canada, where we have such scattered settlements and so many rural schools. However, I think it is worth noticing that milk at school can be a valuable addition to diet, and that is one way of making sure the child gets milk.

I was encouraged by the minister's remarks in relation to the integrity of the parents in the spending of the family allowance. I believe that is a hopeful sign; and I am always glad to find a man, or in this case a woman, who restores my faith in humanity. I have been interested in the results of certain public opinion polls. I have heard them on the radio several times. They start with the basic figure of so many people who spend the family allowance on milk or fruit or food or groceries, and then go on to the incidental expenditures, which I submit are just as valuable to the welfare of the child. If a mother buys a new mattress for the child's bed, I think that is part of the expenditure for the welfare of that child. If the mother adds to the comfort of her home I believe the child also benefits. I think the family allowance establishes an important principle, which I hope we may soon extend to old age pensions. That is, we pay a flat rate, and then we recover through income tax any excess in income. I hope, too, that may be extended to apply to married women seeking employment. I hope we may recognize the rights of the individual, and then recover, in income tax, any excessive family income.

[Mrs. Strum.]

There is just one more word I wish to say in conclusion, and that is in regard to the matter of publicity. I think the department has done a very good job in the matter of contact work with women's groups. I believe the literature sent out to women's institutes, local councils of women and all these other channels of information is very good, and I hope the work will be continued.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Now that we have had a testimonial meeting as to the value of social credit, perhaps it is well that I should say a word or two about the matter, and we may thank the hon. member for Fort William for giving us the text. When we Social Crediters came here in 1935 it was most interesting to see these haughty Liberals and the scornful attitude they took toward "something for nothing", $25 a month, and so forth. Now they are learning. There are many other things they must learn, too, if the country really is to be saved from disaster. Let us suppose that we have $25 a month for every citizen in Canada. I was thinking, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle made her eloquent appeal, just how many of the needs she suggested would be filled by the payment of a flat $25 a month to everybody. Recover it through income tax, if you wish. I can suggest a means: Just increase the family allowance. Such a provision would immediately give reassurance and confidence to the parents and prospective parents throughout the land. And, too, it should increase our birth rate—a most desirable objective.

When the hon. member for Qu'Appelle was talking about the large number of Canadian babies who have died, I could not help thinking about the alarming number of them who were never born, because the prospective parents just did not dare send for them. It is time that we in our wisdom as legislators gave consideration to matters like this. It is time people had the assurance that they would have for their children food, clothing, shelter, health and education. I know what it is to see my children's teeth decay because of my inability to do anything about it, at a time when I was getting a measly pittance in income which just was not big enough to cover the needs, just was not big enough to save my children's teeth. The result was that some of them lost all their teeth at a very early age, and had to have false teeth.

Things like that ought not to exist in this country. There are plenty of dentists in the land, and facilities for training more dentists. There are plenty of materials with which to make dental fillings. It is time we gave serious thought to these matters. If we had $25 a month for everybody in Canada, through increasing the family allowance, we would have immediately a market for Canadian goods and services. The hon. member for Fort William mentioned this. I find much alarm concerning the possibility of not selling the goods we can produce, and not finding work.

So that the committee may have no worry, lest I be out of order, I am going to mention $25 a month no more, but I am going to advocate an increase in family allowances. I believe I shall not be called out of order if I do that.

It is high time we began to give consideration to the matter of markets. One can read in the minutes or records of any of the meetings of the Canadian Manufacturers Association where they make repeated references to the need for increased purchasing power. What does that mean? Does it mean just eeny, meeny, miney, mo, or does it mean a request to those in power to do something about it?

Here is one way to do something about it. It would provide markets for our products and provide employment, and it would also relieve the pressure in connection with strikes. Just think what $25 a month would do in that way throughout this dominion—$25 a month as a family allowance, not as a dividend! Just imagine how it would tend to equalize the economic standard of well-being among the provinces, and the various areas in those provinces, thereby creating cooperation between the provinces and the dominion. We would have no more of these unhappy meetings between the dominion government and the provinces, if the provinces were assured that they were to be permitted to share in the good things the nation as a whole can produce.

Moreover, we would increase international trade. I hear many people talk about the desirability of increasing international trade. Well, increase the incomes of the people, and their purchasing power, so that they can buy our own goods, and they will be able to buy goods received in trade. That ought to be obvious.

Thus we shall see that the increase of purchasing power through the distribution of these family allowances would be a means of distributing goods both nationally and internationally.

I notice now that there is no more talk among these Liberals about "something for nothing." That is impressive, isn't it? Dear me, some of them almost fainted in their seats when the first mention was made about $25 a month, because it was something for nothing.

Mr. MUTCH: Not the first time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, surely they did. I could name certain members who would not be very proud of their record in that regard. And we hear no more about "inflation" to-day, because of the distribution of these moneys. We hear no more about "making people lazy". In fact, the whole talk of the minister this afternoon, so interesting, and so simple, went to show the value which would accrue from the distribution of purchasing power among the people.

I do not know whether I can say what I am about to say without being called to order; but I shall proceed to point out that the one great obstacle in the way of increasing these allowances, as I know the minister would like to increase them, is this question: Where are we to get the money? If the money is to be collected in taxes from the people of Canada, then automatically a definite limit is placed upon the extent to which family allowances can be increased. But if the amount of family allowance is to depend upon the goods and services which can be produced in this country, and the goods and services for which we can exchange our surpluses, then the family allowances can be increased to any desired degree.

The free medical care the hon. member for Qu'Appelle asked for, and the free hospitalization and free dental care can be provided, if we can only discover the financial technique which will reflect our capacity to produce goods and services, so that our money will reflect those goods and services.

I mention this once again to the minister—because, after all, he is learning. He does not need to feel ashamed, because he must remember that the Minister of Finance learned a good deal from the time we began to talk about controlling prices. Why, when we first talked that way we were told we would have to put the gestapo in every shop, if we were to control prices. The Minister of Finance almost went into a frenzy even at the prospect of the degree of regimentation which he thought would be necessary to control prices, as the Social Crediters advocated. But he learned.

And so will the Minister of National Health and Welfare, if he will just be open-minded. He will learn, too. He will learn there are many things he does not know yet. He will learn the possibility of having a financial system which will reflect our actual power of producing goods and services.

I suggest, in closing, that the minister should honestly and sincerely, as part of the heavy task his position entails, begin a conscientious study of social credit, and that before very long he come in prepared to recommend to the house that it introduce social credit.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand that the ministry is setting up some organizations in the provinces across Canada to deal with welfare work, and that he has some agreements with some of those provinces. With what provinces have agreements been made? Have you had any offers of cooperation in order to prevent duplication of work in the provinces and, if so, from what provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON: Agreements have been made with Nova Scotia, Manitoba and British Columbia. I do not know of any special offers of cooperation by the other provinces. When I made a trip across Canada in February and March of 1945 to help with the institution of family allowances and the establishment of offices I discussed lines of cooperation with every province, but the details were not discussed at that time. Since then these three agreements have been made and I think there are working arrangements on an informal basis with every province. I do not know of any respect in which there has not been cooperation by any provinces, but these are the only three with which agreements have been made. We are still working out how the matter will be dealt with in all the provinces.

Mr. COLDWELL: Have you had an offer of agreement from Saskatchewan?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not recall any offer of agreement. In my discussions with them there were offers of cooperation on both sides, by me in connection with their problems and by them in connection with ours.

Mr. COLDWELL: There has been no discussion of an agreement to avoid duplication?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know of any. We are doing everything possible to avoid duplication where these services can be furnished on an adequate basis.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not true that Saskatchewan has an adequate welfare department?

Mr. CLAXTON: That certainly would receive consideration.

Mr. MERRITT: Will the minister give the projected breakdown of the publicity item for the coming year?

Mr. CLAXTON: The total estimate for 1946-47 is $150,000. There is being provided for pamphlets for distribution largely through family allowance regional offices as follows:

Family allowances—a children's charter, reprint, 200,000 in English and 75,000 in French, $5,000.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Four leaflets dealing with child training, child care, child feeding and wise expenditure of family money, $6,500.

Family allowances, picture booklet for external distribution and display, $560.

Mr. FRASER: What does the minister mean by "external"?

Mr. CLAXTON: Outside the Department of National Health and Welfare, for distribution to other agencies. I did not mean external to Canada. The next items are:

Motion pictures—
Family allowances and welfare ..	$15,000
Child training, for use in women's clubs, et cetera	15,000
Film strips—
Wise expenditure of family money	1,800
Child care	1,800
Child feeding	1,800
Graphic or cartoon sheets for insertion in family allowance cheques, four planned for year..	12,000
Colotype posters in two colours, four planned for year	12,000
Posters in four to six colours on general theme: family allowances will help you supply your children with better food, clothing, shelter and medical care	2,000

I hope it will not be considered that the next item was included in anticipation of the budget because actually it was made up in November, long before there was any possible indication as to what the budget would be or when it would come down. It is an item of $25,000 to cover newspaper advertising in connection with family allowances and income tax. It must not be thought that because this item was included there is to be any change. The item was included in anticipation of the need that would arise should there be a change. If there is no change in the relationship a large part of that money will not be spent.

The next items are:

Spot advertising to meet emergencies ..	$4,000
Radio: distribution of recoridngs on child care and training in a family allowance series to forty private stations in a twelve weeks series	10,000
CBC semi-weekly programme, four months	9,600
Special writing, radio scripts, et cetera	2,000
Indians and family allowances—
Family allowances and Indians	10,000
News clip for commercial distribution	2,000
Simple leaflet, family allowances and nutrition	1,000
Film strips	2,000
Purchase of film strips projectors for use in educational programme.....	200
Special writing, Cree translation, et cetera	200
Unallocated	10,540

The last amount is available for use in conjunction with the regional offices to meet local needs as they may arise. For example, a local rumour may start up with regard to family allowances which may cause misapprehension and sometimes it is desirable to have a series of local spot announcements or newspaper advertisements.

Mr. MERRITT: On page 2588 of Hansard the minister gave us some statistics based on the May, 1946, family allowance payments. How many families in Canada do not participate in the receipt of family allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: Eight per cent.

Mr. MERRITT: What part of the monthly payment of about $19,000,000 is taxed back in the form of income taxes?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is an exceedingly difficult figure to estimate for reasons which must be obvious. The income position of people during 1946 is not yet known and will not be known for a couple of years, but the best estimate we are able to work out is that the pay-back by way of income tax for 1946 will be about $30,000,000. In other words, about 80 per cent of the family allowances will be retained by parents for the benefit of children and about 20 per cent of the total will be repaid in the form of income taxes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is an item of $300,000 for professional and special services; can the minister explain that?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is intended to cover payments to welfare agencies and others in connection with investigational work. The amount spent under this item for the year ending March 31, 1946, was $5,995, so it will be seen that the estimate is greatly in excess of what was needed last year. However, it must be understood that the system has not been completely established.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Last year the item was $50,000 and this year it is $300,000. Why would it be under family allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is an expense exclusively in connection with family allowances.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It should not be under that item alone; it should be under many other items.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Before the recess I asked the minister about the matter of the $300,000 for professional and special services. I think he said it came in the welfare branch. I notice in the welfare branch there is $5,000 for professional and special services. Would the minister give us a little more information about that? I do not think it should be down here in the family allowances branch if it is meant for welfare.

Mr. CLAXTON: The item of $300,000 set down here is, as I said before the recess at six o'clock, largely to pay for services in connection with investigations into family allowance payments. That surely should be under the head of family allowance administration and not under any other head.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What professional people would be required in connection with investigations under family allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the case of the three provinces I mentioned it would be a payment to them. In the case of other services it would be a payment for welfare agencies' work, work by various provincial organizations and others in connection with the possible misapplication of family allowance payments.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What kind of professionals would be employed?

Mr. CLAXTON: Almost entirely it would be paid in respect of services like those of welfare workers, either aranged for through the provinces or directly with welfare agencies or with the welfare workers themselves.

Mr. FLEMING: Taking up the last point referred to by the hon. member for St. Paul's, with all due respect I think the explanation given by the minister is anything but clear. I refer back to the explanation which the minister gave respecting a similar item on December 15, 1945, as reported in Hansard, at page 3606. He said:

> The professional assistance for which the amount of $150,000 is provided is in the form of investigations, supervison, welfare workers and similar work of that kind. We are beginning to make fairly heavy expenditures in this connection, but we have not come anywhere near the sum mentioned. That is the type of assistance we mean, social workers and the like.

The item has now doubled, although, if I followed correctly the minister's explanation before the dinner recess, only a very small part of the $150,000 appropriation has been used; I have just for the moment forgotten the figure, but according to my recollection it was very small. With all respect to the minister, his explanation is very hazy and indefinite. I question if there is an hon. member present who really knows now, after hearing the minister, what this money is to be used for. If, on the one hand, it is intended to assist the provinces to provide certain forms of social service, let us know that, and how it is to be divided among the provinces. If it is to be left in the hands of the department to be disbursed at will on social services, we are entitled to know what social services this dominion is embarking on, and we are entitled to a much clearer explanation than we have had of this item of $300,000.

Mr. CLAXTON: In this connection I should like very much to anticipate more accurately the kind of developments that are likely to occur. But the hon. member should appreciate that we are working this out. When we began, back in July 1945, the administration of family allowances we had no experience in Canada to go on in connection with services of this kind, that is investigation of cases, except, in the federal sphere, the expenditures in connection with payments of dependents' allowances and payments under the dependents' board of trustees. On the basis of that experience we made in November an estimate of the cost of investigations, and if we are high in that estimate, as we appear to be, I think hon. members should be pleased at that result. It is impossible so far to do anything more than to say that it looks now as if the estimate of $300,000 is high for this particular year. We have not been able to institute the services necessary as quickly as we had hoped, and we have not found it necessary to institute services of the kind which we thought we would need when we began. Our experience has proved to be very different from what was anticipated. That is shown, I think, by the figures I gave the committee this afternoon. The expenditures on account of this item, of just under $6,000 for the year ended March 31, 1946, are small in comparison with the item. We hope that the expenditures in 1946-47 will also be small in comparison. But if, owing to one circumstance or another, a large number of cases is reported to us requiring investigation we want to be prepared to make an adequate investigation of them. These cases cost about $5 each to investigate. It can be seen, by dividing the figure of $300,000 by $5, that it provides for the possible investigation of 60,000 cases or something of that magnitude. That number was worked out on the basis of the experience of the federal and provincial governments in connection with other administrations. It now looks as though the estimate may and probably will be high; but, if it proves to be the case that is something for which we should express satisfaction. However, we felt it our duty to seek from parliament an estimate sufficient to cover this expenditure if it should be necessary.

Mr. FRASER: Who does the investigating?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I still do not think the explanation is a satisfactory one. We have had a certain amount of experience in connection with family allowances, and $150,000 was put down for this work. Of that $150,000 only $6,000 has been spent. All I have to say is that if the rest of the estimates are as accurate as this is—that is, $300,000 is asked for when only $6,000 was spent before—there must be something wrong with the way in which these estimates are prepared. It seems to me that we should not vote this $300,000 until we know a little more about it.

Mr. CLAXTON: The estimates were worked out on the basis of the information we had in November, 1945. Hon. members should appreciate that in an administration of this kind one is face to face with two stages of the problem. The first was to get everyone registered and get the payments out, which was quite an administrative job, and the second was to set up the machinery whereby, in so far as it was necessary and no further, we could conduct investigations into those cases where it was reported that the family allowance payments were not being applied for the purpose set out under the act. We took those jobs in order. We did not set up an investigatory staff before we started making payments; we had enough to do getting staff and space and making the arrangements necessary to make the payments. But as far back as six months before we made payments we started planning for the investigation, looking into the records and experiences of other government services and into the records of the provinces, and on the basis of that examination we arrived at this figure which, as I say, is based upon the idea that there might have to be something in the neighbourhood of 50,000 to 60,000 investigations at approximately $5 each, plus some additional sums for administration.

If we do not have that experience, if we do not have that number of cases of misapplication reported to us, then we shall save the difference in the money; but we made our estimate on the basis of past experience available here and elsewhere, and if we find in consequence of one thing or another, that Canadian mothers use their family allowance payments more properly for the benefit, the welfare and the health of their children than was anticipated, thus requiring less investigation, then I think it is a gain to the people of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister says it is based on their experience. Well, his experience is represented by some six thousand dollars. It seems extraordinary to me, in view of the fact that there are 1,420,000 families and we have to investigate 60,000 to see whether they are doing the right thing or not. I still think, as I said before, that if the rest of the minister's estimates are as accurate as these they are not very accurate.

Mr. BRACKEN: Listening to the discussion of the last few minutes, I gather that the minister is asking for one item under the family allowance division, the item of professional and special services, a sum amounting to $300,000 for this fiscal year. I gather from his answers that only $6,000 was spent for this purpose in the last fiscal year and he has explained that his estimate is based on about $5 for each of these special investigations, which would represent 60,000 cases. Hon. members have questioned the necessity of so much money—$300,000—this year when so little was required last year. In that connection it would help us if the minister could say how much has been spent for this purpose in the first two months of this fiscal year. Nearly three months of the present fiscal year have passed. How much under this item has been spent in the first two months which were concluded three weeks ago?

Mr. CLAXTON: The arrangements necessary to provide for full service are still being worked out. Sometimes the work of investigation is done by a limited number of persons of our own staff. For example, in Prince Edward Island, where there is a total of some 12,000 families in receipt of family allowances, it has been found that in view of the conditions prevailing in the community, it is possible for the regional director of family allowances personally or through a reliable employee to conduct a very large part of the work of investigation. Whether or not it will be necessary to supplement that with a service which will have to look to this vote of $300,000 remains to be seen. So far we have found that our experience is so much better than that anticipated that the appropriate part of this sum of $300,000 applicable to Prince Edward Island would be very small indeed, if in fact amounting to anything.

In connection with Nova Scotia, an arrangement was worked out with that province under which it has agreed to make investigations in consideration of a payment of $5 each, and because conditions were unusual in Nova Scotia it was agreed that there should be a guarantee of $1,050 a month. I must say that, had we delayed making the arrangement with Nova Scotia a little longer than we did, it is at least possible that we would not have agreed to that minimum guarantee, although that seemed necessary in order to enable that province to do the work we estimated would be necessary.

Here hon. members must realize that we are in process of working out something totally new except for our experience with dependents' allowances and the dependents' board of trustees; and there is an important point of difference, in that in respect of virtually all the families where there were dependents or beneficiaries under the dependents' board of trustees provisions, the main breadwinner of the household was the husband, who was away from home. Here we were faced with a different social problem; the circumstances of the war created different social conditions. We are now engaged in trying to work out, on the basis of our own and others' experience, a system whereby we shall be prepared to investigate, just as economically and as effectively as possible, with the least disturbance to the individual, so that as far as possible there shall be an avoidance of duplication of services provided by the provinces. We have not yet had a full year's experience, and in regard to these services there is no province in respect of which we have had experience for any considerable length of time. We have had the experience of only part of a year and on the basis of that experience we are having to work along.

The item of $300,000 is based on an estimate of possibly 60,000 cases at an average cost of $5 a case. That did not seem too much in view of the fact that there are 3,333,000 children in respect of whom family allowances are being paid, and almost a million and a half families. If it turns out that our estimate has erred on the side of excess, then, of course, the expenditures will not be made. But we are not in a position yet to say that this is the case. We feel that the public of Canada would want to see that, while there is no police investigation from door to door, yet there is adequate machinery provided for the investigation of such cases as are reported where there is an apparent misuse of funds, and we want to be in a position to provide that service where it is necessary.

Mr. REID: When the bill was under discussion did the minister not say that he would set up voluntary committees all over the country who would see that the money is well spent? I think I remember the minister saying that. There is a great deal of truancy in certain provinces. I was wondering whether school attendance had increased since family allowances had come into effect. When the bill was before the house the minister said that attendance at school was a primary requirement for a parent to receive assistance under the act, and that the allowance would be cut off from parents who did not send their children to school. I should like to hear something in substantiation of that because $250 million is a great deal of money. I am going to check up to see whether the minister did say that voluntary committees would be set up free of charge, and that when cases were reported to the minister those committees would find out if the children were attending school and would report back to the minister and the parents would be denied their allowance. This large item is now going through, and the amount will increase.

Mr. CLAXTON: What the hon. member for New Westminster has in mind and what I had in mind when the bill was put through the house last year was a provision under section 6 of the act which provides that if any person is dissatisfied with the decision as to the right of allowance an appeal may be made to a tribunal to be set up under the act. It is planned that these tribunal committees will be voluntary. I think that is what the hon. member has in mind. These committees have not yet been set up. There has been only one appeal from a decision of the administration, and it has not yet been found necessary to set up these tribunals, but we are in process of doing so. In fact only last week regulations regarding appeals, provided for by P.C. 2316, adopted on June 7, 1946, were filed in the house. The hon. member is quite right when he says it was provided that voluntary committees should be set up which would hear appeals and advise on the administration. We are ready to set them up and have just recently adopted the regulations necessary to do so. The delay has been occasioned by the fact that only one appeal, fewer than we anticipated, was filed, and in this respect we are much better off than we had hoped for. Therefore we felt that we should work along a little longer to see what the exact nature or functions of these appeal tribunals or committees would be, how often they would have to meet, where they would have to meet, and what kind of procedure would have to be laid down for them to follow. Therefore we deliberately delayed adopting the regulations because only one application for an appeal had been made with us, and we thought it was advisable to get the benefit of additional experience before setting up our tribunals or committees.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. BRACKEN: A moment ago I asked the minister a question, and in all deference to him he did not answer it. The item before us is one for professional and special services, $300,000, to be spent this year. I have not heard anybody object to approving whatever funds are necessary for this purpose; but I have heard some honest questionings as to whether $300,000 is needed. The basis for these honest questionings of members is that last year only $6,000 was spent. The minister's excuse now for asking for $300,000 for this year is that he has not had a full year's experience at this work and does not know what he may require. I suggest that it is almost a year since the department started this work, and certainly within the first three months of this fiscal year the department ought to know what it spent on this particular item. That is the information I asked for. The minister ought to be able to supply it for at least two months of this fiscal year. If the minister would give hon. members some idea of what the government has found it necessary to spend on this item up to this time, they would know what more is needed for the remainder of the year.

Mr. CLAXTON: The item of expenditure for the year ended march 31, 1946, was, as I gave it before, $5,995, or just under $6,000. The approximate amount of expenditure for the first two months of this year is in excess of $5,000. It was suggested by an hon. member behind me that we did not spend anything on this the year before, and that is quite true. In other words, that service is just being set up. Hon. members should appreciate that this is an expenditure which is made only as it proves necessary. We expect that it will grow with the institution of effective services across Canada; but our experience so far has indicated that it is unlikely to grow to anything in excess of $300,000. That figure was arrived at in the way I have described. It seemed to be a fair estimate. If we do not spend that amount hon. members should be satisfied with the result.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not think the minister ought to expect approval by the committee from what he has said. What the minister has said is that in the first months of this fiscal year the government has spent only $5,000 on this item. That means that for the next ten months they are asking for $295,000. With all due respect I suggest that the minister ought to go back and reconsider this item. I am sure that the committee will be glad to vote him whatever fund is necessary, but he has not given sufficient justification for asking for $300,000 for this item this year.

Mr. BRYCE: Is any of this extra money to be used to increase pensions for the blind?

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. BRYCE: Does the minister contemplate increasing their pensions in the near future to take care of the increased cost of living?

Mr. CLAXTON: That will be dealt with in the next item, which deals with old age pensions.

Mr. BRYCE: I am in the unfortunate position that if I wait until then I shall miss my opportunity of asking these questions, and that is why I ask them here. I have to go to a committee at nine o'clock, and I should like the privilege of asking the questions now. I think it only fair that I should be allowed to ask the question. I am doing the business of the house.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We are on item 229.

Mr. BRYCE: Perhaps the minister will let me ask it, anyway. I want to know if it is to be the policy of his department to continue paying family allowances to Indian fathers and mothers, as they have done during the last year, where the money has been spent in a proper manner for the benefit of the children. On different reserves it has been rumoured that you are going to take away that privilege and pay the allowance in kind. I think this is one of the few times we have been able to show the Indian that he can be a responsible citizen in this country; and as long as the money is spent in a fit and proper way I believe the department should continue to pay it. If it is not properly spent, of course, it is all right to take it away; but give the Indian a good chance and I think he will spend it properly.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is the policy of the act and of the department.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Following up the statement of the minister that $5,000 had been spent in the first two months of this year, I wonder if he would give us the number of cases investigated.

Mr. COLDWELL: Might I just say that I entirely agree with the leader of the opposition. I do not think we should pass this item of $300,000. If last year we spent only $6,000 on this service and have spent only $5,000 in the first two months of this fiscal year I do not think the committee should pass an estimate so much out of line with the probable expenditure. It is asking too much of the committee. I believe the minister should withdraw the estimate and bring in something which he considers more within the bounds of probability. If the committee allows this kind of thing to be done we might have the departments putting in guesses and not making the sort of estimates we expect to be made for presentation to the committee. Certainly I support the leader of the opposition very emphatically in asking that this estimate be withdrawn and placed before the committee on a basis which will more nearly approximate the expenditure.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the minister answer my question? How many cases?

Mr. CLAXTON: Approximately one thousand.

Mr. COCKERAM: I had a series of questions on the order paper with regard to the administration of this act, and on May 13 they were passed as an order for return. That return was brought down later. Questions Nos. 7 and 8 were answered as follows:

7. How many investigators are employed under the act, and what number employed in each province?

The answer was:

Varying numbers—usually one or two—of employees from each regional office staff are assigned from time to time to do field investigations. This work is intermittent and is supplementary to the usual investigations made through correspondence.

The next question was:

8. What was the total cost of investigations for the first six months of operation of the act?

The answer was:

Since the employees referred to in (7) are members of the regular staff of regional offices and have other duties it is not possible to apportion the costs of investigation carried on by them. In the period July 1 to December 31, 1945, the province of Nova Scotia was paid $2,385 to carry out investigations in respect of family allowances.

It seems obvious that the only cost is the amount of money paid to the provinces in this connection, and I agree with my leader and with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that this item should not be passed. Later on, I intend to go into the manner in which this question was answered; but here is a case where, in reply to a question by a member of this house, certain figures were given showing that for a period of six months the cost of investigational work was $2,385. To-day we are asked for $300,000. It does not make sense. Later on, I hope to show that a great many of the figures submitted by the minister are incorrect.

Mrs. STRUM: How many additional children do we expect to pay family allowances to because of the return of soldiers from overseas? Could the minister give us any idea how many such children there will be?

Mr. CLAXTON: Under the act the children of soldiers coming back from overseas become entitled to the family allowance immediately upon their return to Canada. I have not the actual figure of the number of children born to soldiers overseas, but I would estimate it to be something of the magnitude of thirty thousand.

Mr. LOW: I strongly urge the minister to reconsider this item for investigational services. I am sure he would not want hon. members to get the impression that he is padding any of his estimates, but I get that impression very strongly, judging by the explanation he has given in regard to this item. I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that if the item is not withdrawn and revamped more in line with the actual possible expenditure for that service. I am going to have to move that the item be cut to, say, $30,000.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said he had an agreement with Nova Scotia. With what other provinces has he agreements?

Mr. CLAXTON: That has been given already; with Manitoba and British Columbia.

Mr. FRASER: This afternoon the minister said there were treasury officers in each division. Are they paid by the minister's department?

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. FRASER: They are part of this service in connection with the family allowance, are they not?

Mr. CLAXTON: They make payment of the cheques.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, I know, but that is not charged to the minister's department.

Mr. CLAXTON: Oh, no. The treasury officers who make the payments are paid out of the estimates of the Department of Finance. I gave an estimate of the amount this afternoon.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, I know, but what I am getting at is that while you have these officers in your divisional headquarters making payments, and while they are part of this family allowance set-up, you do not charge their cost up to your department, where the cost rightly should be charged.

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. FRASER: Well, that should be done.

[Mrs. Strum.]

Mr. CLAXTON: That is not the way it is or should be done in any department. There is an officer of the comptroller of the treasury, and a staff in every department, as the hon. member knows.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, I know.

Mr. CLAXTON: When I gave the details on the expenditures under family allowance administration this afternoon I was careful to specify the part applicable to family allowance administration under this department, that under the Department of Public Works, and that under the treasury. They were given in three separable items, as the hon. member will see in Hansard for to-day.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, but do you not think in the set-up for the administration of family allowances the cost of the treasury officers should be charged to the minister's. They are part of the scheme and set-up, and this department should bear the cost. It is passing the buck to another department.

Mr. CLAXTON: No, it is not passing the buck at all. The administration of family allowances has to expend money. That money is spent, and the machinery for spending it is provided by the officers of the comptroller of the treasury in this as in all other departments.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, but they have to increase the number of their officers in order to look after your department.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, of course.

Mr. FRASER: What was the increase?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is a question the hon. member would have to ask the Department of Finance. I gave an estimate of the cost of administration in an ordinary year after we took care of the backlog: for health and welfare, $1,850,000; for public works, $80,000; for the treasury, $1,944,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister mentioned Nova Scotia, British Columbia and Manitoba. What is the nature of the agreement with these provinces? Does it involve the payment of money?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can the minister outline the arrangement?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, indeed. The agreement provides for the provinces making, through their appropriate agencies, investigation of cases referred to them by the family allowance administration, in consideration of a payment of $5 per report as an over-all fee.

That report is sent in to the family allowances administration. That figure was worked out after the experience of the dependents' board of trustees.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that the extent of the payment to the provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, except that in the case of Nova Scotia which made representations that they could not do this service without being assured of certain revenues because they did not up to that time contemplate or plan to do this kind of service, they had a guaranteed payment of less than $1,050 a month.

Mr. COLDWELL: There you have a commitment out of this fund of $1,050 a month.

Mr. CLAXTON: For Nova Scotia.

Mr. COCKERAM: And only $2,385 for the first six months.

Mr. COLDWELL: How is the payment for two months to all the provinces around $5,000? Are there any other investigations?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, of course there are. But I think the hon. member is perhaps expecting too much in respect of the speed with which the accounts are rendered for investigations.

Mr. COLDWELL: I can see that.

Mr. CLAXTON: You see, we are in a pretty narrow range of time for a very large-scale operation. Payments began in July, 1945. Then, in November, 1945, after we had been making payments for four months, and before we had arrangements with any provinces, we arrived at this estimate of $300,000 as the figure which was proper to be set as a charge for investigation.

I shall be glad to tell hon. members how that figure was arrived at. It was arrived at on the basis of investigations of something like 50,000 to 60,000 cases a year. That is, 50,000 to 60,000 cases out of 3,333,000 children or about 1,500,000 families. Relative to families, this represents about three per cent of the families in receipt of family allowances.

I believe those who are familiar with the records of child welfare organizations, of the dependents' board of trustees and of children's allowance administration, say that about three per cent of the cases are cases requiring investigation. That does not mean that three per cent of the cases are cases requiring diversion of payments. It simply means that three per cent of the cases are those requiring investigation. It was on that basis that the figure was worked out in November, when the estimates were prepared.

Meanwhile we were endeavouring as quickly as possible to create machinery under which investigations could be handled. As the hon. member has said, at the outset this was very largely done through our own staff. One or two members in each office would investigate cases which were brought to the attention of the staff. Since then, we are appointing welfare supervisors in each office. Since then, we have made arrangements successively with the three provinces of Nova Scotia, Manitoba and British Columbia. But we have not yet made arrangements with the provinces having the greater proportion of the population of Canada, namely Quebec and Ontario, nor have we yet the kind of alternative facilities which would be necessary to do a complete job there.

Just as soon as Manitoba and British Columbia begin rendering accounts in respect of services which they have rendered, these items of $2,235, as mentioned by the hon. member or $5,000 as mentioned by me, will start stepping up very rapidly, until we are in a position when adequate service is being rendered in all parts of Canada.

It is because I have to present these estimates on the basis of inadequate experience, during the period of rapid growth in this service, that hon. members—quite justifiably I think—have been asking the questions which they have been asking. However, I hope this explanation will indicate to them that, while we hope this figure will not be necessary, and while we believe it will not be necessary, it is still the kind of figure which, on the basis of past experience, should be set in; and that the plan is the best kind of plan that can be arrived at to do the job we have in mind.

We aim to do it just as rapidly, as sensibly and as economically as it can be done. But I would hope that hon. members would feel that if the sum of $300,000 were not spent, this was a good thing, provided that we furnish the services desired. We aim to produce these services as soon as possible. As I say, they have been moving along stage by stage, and there has not yet been a month in which we have received accounts even from the three provinces with which we have made arrangements.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are three provinces with which the department has made arrangements, but there are six provinces where there are no arrangements. In those six provinces someone must be looking after cases of this sort for investigation. Who is doing it now? Surely the department knows what it is costing to do that in these six provinces. Who is doing it? There is no question of rendering accounts, as in Manitoba, British Columbia and Nova Scotia, because the department itself is doing the work. What has been the experience in these provinces with, as the minister says, the largest population?

Mr. CLAXTON: There is no item for these expenditures in the other provinces because, in so far as these services are necessary, and have been proved necessary, they are being done by people on the staff of the administration as part of their ordinary employment. But, as I say, that is not involving a number of people sufficient to give the kind of service we would like to see given.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am rising for a third time on this item—and I hope it will be the last time. I do so for the purpose of making a suggestion which I hope will be accepted, and which I believe will expedite the passage of the minister's estimates.

From all the information we have, in the first two months of this fiscal year he has required for this purpose $2,500 a month. He is asking, for the remaining ten months of this year, $29,000 a month. Hon. members over here question the necessity of an estimate of this size. The minister himself questions it. My suggestion—and I make it in all deference—is that the minister should say, "We will go back and review this matter. We will look at it in the light of present facts, to date, and come forward with a revised estimate." If that were done I am sure the committee would pass it. But let me say this to the minister, that if hon. members get the idea that that is the way in which his estimates are put together, they will not have confidence in the way in which these tables have been set up. That is all I have to say about the matter at the moment.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should like to be able to avoid the necessity or repeating what I have already said with regard to the way in which these estimates were prepared. On the basis of the three per cent estimate, which I believe is recognized as valid by workers in this field, this figure was arived at. Our experience in the past year has been only a partial experience. Our experience, except with one province, is not complete. We have not had accounts from the other two provinces, and we have not had arrangements worked out with the other provinces with regard to investigations in those provinces because it has not yet been decided how that problem will be met.

It seems to me that that is justification for having arrived at the estimate we did in November when these estimates were put forward. In the light of the knowledge available then, how could we conscientiously ask for any less money in view of the experience in other fields? If our experience in this field is better than that which has obtained in other fields we shall be glad indeed to look again at the whole situation. It will be continuously under review. I am quite prepared to have another look at the thing, as the leader of the opposition has said, in order to see what reasonably can be expected to be needed this year in view of our experience. But I would tell him again that, in view of the arrangements that remain to be worked out and the fact that we are at the stage of setting up services, it will be difficult indeed to make an accurate financial computation. Judgment factors will have to enter into it, but I think, on the basis of what has happened since November, it is possible to arrive at a better judgment factor than it was then. I shall be glad indeed to consider the thing in the light of the discussion we have had.

Mr. COLDWELL: When the minister is dealing again with this item I would like him to tell us what is being done in the other six provinces. It seems to me that, if arrangements were worked out with the provinces which have a department of public welfare or a department of that description, it would eliminate the necessity of setting up some other organization. In discussing this matter to-night the minister has said that we are in the process of doing this, that or the other and it seems to me that when the minister comes back again he should be able to tell us that negotiations have been undertaken with the other provinces where they have the necessary facilities and that such and such an arrangement has been worked out. It strikes me that the arrangement made with Nova Scotia is an intelligent and satisfactory sort of arrangement if they have a department that can do the work. The same thing obtains with regard to British Columbia and Manitoba. We all know that Alberta has an efficient department, as have Ontario and Saskatchewan, and it seems to me that it would be wise to endeavour to work out a plan whereby the departments already set up in the various provinces would undertake this work and prevent duplication all across Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: Has the minister any information concerning expenditures and investigations in the provinces with which no agreements have been made? I wish also to ask him if in his opinion members of parliament and lawyers have the right to represent people who have been unable to get any satisfaction from the department. I want the minister to understand that while I have written to him I realize that he has not had time to examine the matter and reply. I make no complaint about that. I wrote to him about a case where the parties had been writing to the Quebec office of the department for something over six months and had been unable to get any satisfaction whatever. I took the matter in hand and I did not get any satisfaction. I then wrote a rather earnest letter and I was informed, in courteous terms, by the head of the department in Quebec that under some order in council or regulation the records were considered to be private and could not be discussed with members of parliament. No mention was made of lawyers, but I inferred that they were included. I should like to know if there is any such regulation and whether or not the minister considers the answer I received a proper answer to give to a member of parliament who endeavours to come to the rescue of constituents who have not received for some months the bonus to which they are entitled?

Mr. CLAXTON: Under regulation 19 it is provided that no person shall disclose or communicate or allow to be disclosed or communicated any information or evidence obtained under the provisions of the act and these regulations unless the same is necessary for the administration thereof or is required by law. To the best of my knowledge that provision is strictly enforced, but it does not prevent members from taking up cases to make sure that the parties concerned are receiving consideration from the regional office, from the department or from the minister.

If the hon. member has received any communication along the lines he suggests I can only reply that probably the occasion for that refusal to disclose information would arise because there was something in the case which required that answer to be given. Ordinarily members' letters are replied to courteously by either the department at Ottawa, the regional office of myself. The matter is looked into and, when possible, action is taken at once. An effort is made to answer correspondence on the day it is received, or on the following day, and I think in only a small minority of cases is there any delay. If there is, it is on account of the fact that there must be some further investigation and the correspondent is told about that.

While the secrecy provision is there and while it is observed, it certainly does not prevent hon. members from making representations to see that cases are adequately considered. Those representations are carefully considered.

Mr. HACKETT: I am not complaining of any lack of courtesy; I simply want to know how far this matter of secrecy goes. I understand that these records are private, but I should like to know if when a lawyer receives a mandate from a client, when a member of parliament writes in at the instance of a constituent, the minister would interpret the opening of the record to such lawyer or member as a violation of the secrecy under which the work is carried on. I think we should be clear on that because, if he does, it will undoubtedly give rise to some consideration of the wisdom of revising the rules and regulations.

Mr. CLAXTON: In answer to the hon. member for Stanstead I must say that I have never had drawn to my personal attention any case in which a refusal to give information on the grounds of the secrecy required under the act was protested against. If the hon. member has such a case I would be only too glad to see that it is brought to my personal attention and I will look it up. I know that on a number of occasions regional directors have refused to give information, on grounds of secrecy; and I think that where it has been done it has usually been recognized that that is the right course to follow. I have never heard of any case in which there was a protest against that action being taken. In the ordinary course where, a member writes in, the usual kind of letter is, "Mrs. So-and-so filed her application for family allowance on such-and-such a date. The regional officer says it has not a record of the filing on that date. Would you please look into the case and see if it is not possible to give effect to the filing from such-and-such a date?" There is a well-recognized procedure in that event. If there is at the office a record which can be traced which shows the date of filing, then that is the effective date. If that cannot be shown, and there is some evidence by way of affidavit or otherwise which is reliable, then the filing of the application is dated back to that date.

Mr. HACKETT: I am quite positive that the minister will deal with this specific case, which I mentioned only for purposes of illustration, and I want to put that aside. What I want to know is, does the rule of secrecy preclude a member of parliament or a lawyer from acting on behalf of the person who is complaining?

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. HACKETT: Thank you.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a point of order, the minister said that this item would stand. I have never seen any further debate once the responsible minister suggests to the committee of the house that the item stand; it means that the item is to be considered or reconsidered; it means that the item comes back to this committee for consideration and reconsideration. Therefore I think the item automatically stands over once the responsible minister suggests to the committee that it shall stand.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think the point raised by the Minister of Veterans Affairs is quite correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Call the next item.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The suggestion was made that the item should stand; the minister consented; the item will again come up for consideration; and I would suggest that this item be now allowed to stand.

Item stands.

Welfare branch—
229. Administration, $47,410.
Payments of dominion's share of pensions, $34,538,200.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Under item 229 I notice that old age pensions are to be considered. I desire to make a few remarks regarding old age pensions. On several occasions in this parliament I have advocated that $50 a month be paid to people who have reached the age of sixty-five years, and I wish to make that request once more to the minister, that he give consideration immediately to the possibility of offering $50 a month to people who have reached sixty-five years of age.

My feeling is that the way in which we are treating our aged people is a reflection on the whole of the people of Canada. It is high time that something be done about it more than just talk. The social credit movement has committed itself to $50 a month for people who have reached the age of sixty-five. This is by no means the ultimate goal at which social credit aims. It is the limited objective, the next trench which we at present aim to take and consolidate. Let no one suppose for a moment that social credit is in favour of stopping at the relatively meagre pension of $50 a month at sixty-five, because we simply have no right at all to offer our elderly people anything less than they can live on comfortably. Certainly no ordinary person could live comfortably in any ordinary Canadian community on $50 a month, let alone the thirty measly dollars we are giving them.

When this subject was last under discussion I believe the hon. member for Vancouver East made a motion that something like this amount of money should be paid, and I wish to give him full credit for having made that motion. I supported him on that occasion. The minister at that time made a remark which I believe should be given some consideration. He said, as reported in Hansard, April 10, 1946, at page 753:

Further, there is no system of old age pensions in the world which provides for a pension of anything like $50 a month.

I am quite sure that the minister had overlooked what is going on in the state of Washington. I think it would be well for the minister to consider some of the facts which I am going to read to him, from "The Pensioner", published in New Westminster. In the issue of April, 1946, the minister will find the quotations which I give on the first page of that periodical. It says, among other things, these significant things:

There is now . . . no relative responsibility whatsoever.

That is in the state of Washington.

The department is not permitted even to enquire into how much the sons and daughters are earning!

That indicates quite clearly that there is not a means test.

Senior citizens can do what they wish to with any estate they may have!

What a glaring difference there is there between what they do and what we do. Again:

The minimum grant under the law is now $50 for those without resources and income—and that is a floor under grants. Pensioners may, and do, receive higher grants where there is need. Senior citizens found eligible receive their grant retroactively to the day they apply, and it is paid as a legal right of the pensioners.

That sounds something like a paradise for elderly people when we consider what we do here in Canada. Again:

As a result of the W.P.U.'s work, senior citizens—

Notice they call them "senior citizens" there, not old age people.

—can to-day have $200 in cash each, $500 worth of insurance, can own their car, have a vegetable garden, a cow and chickens, and still be eligible. No longer is it a disgrace to be a pensoner; instead it is recognized that senior citizens are the pioneer fathers and mothers of our state, entitled, because of their years of work, to seniority.

That is exactly the stand I take, and I believe that if a confidential roll were called of members of this house, ninety-five per cent of them, regardless of party, would support that idea. I should like to know what it is which causes it to be impossible for ninety-five per cent of the membership of this House of Commons to be able to get what they want with respect to old age pensions. There is something radically wrong. I believe every member of the house just thrills in sympathy with the statements which are here made.

. . . the pensioners to-day have, in addition to their grants, free choice of doctor and dentist, plus free medicine, free appliances—glasses, dentures, artificial limbs, hearing aids, et cetera, and are entitled to nursing care in their own home.

No member of this house would deny elderly people all these advantages. Yet think of the way we treat them in our country. It positively makes me ashamed to hold my head up when I think of the way this country deals with its elderly people. Again:

. . . the state contributes $100 to each funeral —and relatives can contribute as much additional as they wish without lessening the state's contribution!

I am sure that the minister would be desirous of knowing about that, so that he will not make again such a sweeping statement as he made on April 10. Some hon. members will wonder whether or not this article in "The Pensioner" is authentic. I wrote to the capital of Washington to find out whether or not this was authentic. We received a number of pamphlets, laws, regulations and the like, which it would take too long a time to review, but the gist of them substantiated the report which is given in this periodical. Here is the letter written on April 30, 1946, from the state of Washington's executive department, in which appear the following statements in certain paragraphs:

You will note that to be eligible a person shall have lived in the state of Washington for a period of five out of the last ten years immediately preceding the date of application—

Contrast that with the situation here.

—shall have reached the age of 65, and shall be in need of financial assistance. Persons may own the home in which they live, may retain up to but not exceeding $200 in cash resources, and may have insurance of $500 in value. There is no citizenship requirement in the Washington old age assistance law, neither is there a relative responsibility clause.

Which of course, as hon. members recognize at once, means that a child or someone else who happens to be related to the pensioner and who is in easy financial circumstances cannot be called upon to help to support the father or mother.

In the next paragraph I read:

We are proud of the provisions which have been made for elderly citizens of the state of Washington. It is felt that the way in which the grant is determined as well as the amount which is being paid to individuals is preserving both the morale and the well-being of our elderly citizens.

How fine those words sound.

We are glad that you wrote regarding our programme and hope that you will feel free to make further inquiry.

Cordially yours,
Reatha M. Chance,
(Secretary to the governor)

That, of course, makes it certain that the report is authentic and that actually there is a part of the North American continent where people have learned something about how to treat their elderly folk. I have no desire to prolong the discussion but I thought this matter ought to be brought to the attention of the committee.

There are two or three other matters which should be considered in regard to old age pensions. This afternoon, in the discussion of family allowances, it was contended that it was to the advantage of producers to have purchasing power distributed among the people. Hon. members can contemplate for a moment the difference it means to producers to have $20 or $25 a month going out to elderly people instead of having $50 paid to them. If they were paid the latter sum, how much more coal, milk, cream, butter, cheese, eggs and everything else our elderly people would be able to buy. They could get all these things if they had the money with which to buy them, and if that were the case, what an excellent market there would be right in our own country. This would be the situation if purchasing power were put into the hands of the people. This is an aspect of the question that must be considered.

There is something else that hurts my feelings terribly every time I think about it, and that is whenever I contemplate the tax structure we have in this country. It is next to impossible for an ordinary person, after he begins to earn to lay anything by, because every cent which he does not absolutely need in order to meet his current expenditures is literally robbed from him by a financial system that taxes the very lifeblood out of the people. The result is that our people cannot save. We allow them to go on in that way until they are probably forty-five years old and there is no longer a demand for their services. They cannot get jobs and, even if they do get some employment, they are unable to save anything, so that they continue in that state until they are about fifty-five years old. When we no longer need them we take them out of employment, throw them into the corner and expect them to starve until they get to be seventy years old, when they can take the meagre pittance which we turn over to them. How can intelligent men and women in an age like this and in a country like Canada contemplate such outrageous mistreatment of elderly people? There is just no logic or sense whatever in the set-up. Because of the taxation structure which exists to-day we must make some sort of provision for our elderly people. There is a fluctuation of employment, which also seriously affects people as they go along. Even if they did manage to save a little, they would presently find themselves out of work and have to spend those savings. How will they live; how will they support themselves when they are too old to find employment?

I will say no more at the present time because I am afraid I shall become rather more animated than I should be on this occasion. I have said enough, but there is one more observation I wish to make before I sit down. I wish to call the attention of the minister and of the committee to this important point. The minister absolutely must get to the stage where he does not have to depend upon the amount of money which he can wring out of the people's pockets in order to obtain the financial requirements for the things he wants to do. I commented on this aspect of the matter this afternoon with respect to the family allowance. There is not a member in this house who would not increase the family allowance to-day by 50 per cent or even 100 per cent. I doubt whether there is a single member who would object to that if the money could be obtained. But it is not a question of money; the question is whether we can produce the goods. Certainly a monetary system should reflect the actualities or realities in connection with the production of goods and services. It is utterly impossible, however, to do this with money that is wrung out of the people by taxation. Obviously, then, something must be done; and for the minister and his colleagues, in this desperately serious time in Canada, to sit by and do nothing about the financial system is virtually a betrayal of the trust which they have assumed in consequence of getting themselves elected at the last election. This condition must not go on. They have assumed a responsibility and must discharge it, and the discharging of that responsibility involves a reform of the financial system which will make that system one that reflects the facts in relation to the productive capacity of the country. Until that is done, it is idle to talk about doing any of the many things that ought to be done, including giving to our elderly people a fair deal after the lives they have lived in making this country a fit place for us to live in.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. NICHOLSON: I wish to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge in regard to the importance of granting additional amounts to old age pensioners. While he was speaking this afternoon in connection with the $25 a month, I made a rapid calculation and I found that $25 a month for our 11,566,000 people would come to about $3,469,000,000. While ten years ago people laughed at the idea of paying $25 a month, the record during the past four or five years has demonstrated clearly that we could increase the national income according to the plan advocated by my hon. friends. I want it clearly understood that I am not supporting their economic views. I disapprove their anti-Semitic and other queer ideas, but I think the argument that my hon. friend advances—

Mr. JOHNSTON: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has no right to imply that this group is anti-Semitic. Let him speak for himself.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I was thinking of some of the members of the Social Credit group.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Or even some of them. If the hon. gentleman has doubts about that, those members can speak for themselves.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If we may return to the item before us, I think the minister has a responsibility to the old age pensioners of Canada to give some indication of how soon their pensions may be increased. I have before me the proposals of the government of Canada, prepared prior to the dominion-provincial conference, on health and welfare and a labour reference booklet. In these two booklets I think it is clear that the government recognizes that $20 a month pension for citizens of 70 years of age or over is not adequate. On page 36 I find that aged persons are finding it increasingly difficult under normal conditions to retain their places in the labour market, and this condition is not likely to be reversed in the next twenty-five years. Under the heading, "deficiencies of the present scheme", it states:

> The means test is generally recognized as undesirable after a certain age. It has been noted that about forty per cent of all persons of seventy years of age and over make application, satisfy the means-test requirements and receive pensions. There is little doubt that a very considerable number in addition are not able entirely to support themselves, but are dependent upon their family, and refrain from applying for pensions because of the embarrassment occasioned by the means test.

The minimum age of seventy, though convenient as a dividing line with respect to the payment of any kind of universal old age pension, is nevertheless too high in a number of cases of actual need. A strong case can be made for reducing the age limit to sixty-five in order to provide assistance at least for those in the age group 65-69, who are actually in need.

In the other booklet which I mentioned, the legislation which has been passed in the United States, in Great Britain, in New Zealand and Australia is reviewed, to mention but a few of the countries. In these countries old age pensions are available at sixty or sixty-five years of age, and there does not seem to be any good reason why Canada should be so backward. Having demonstrated during the war years that we could surpass records which were established in many other countries, there is no reason why we might not set a different pattern in the treatment of old age pensioners. The words that we have been hearing so often during the past two or three weeks regarding the matter of consulting the provinces and the powers of the British North America Act have been a convenient excuse for failure to deal with the problem of old age pensions.

I have been reading a booklet prepared by the Department of Labour giving the history of old age pensions in Canada. According to that booklet, I find that in 1906 this question was first brought to the attention of parliament. A motion was introduced suggesting:

That in the opinion of this house the subject of improving the condition of the aged, deserving poor, and of providing for those of them who are helpless and infirm, is worthy of and should receive the early and careful attention of the government and of parliament.

After some debate the motion was withdrawn. Then, in 1908 a special committee was selected. On February 10 the first meeting was held and a chairman was selected. On July 11 it was reported that the committee had managed to have only three sittings. Apparently they were very busy in those days with other matters that were much more important than old age pension legislation. Then, in 1912 a resolution was adopted by the House of Commons which indicated that some progress was being made. However, it was not until the early twenties, when there was a lot of labour unrest and when there were labour representatives in parliament, that the old people received special consideration by parliament. I find that an interesting report was prepared of the proceedings of the committee on an old age pension system for Canada in 1924. Some of the witnesses called gave the story of old age pensions in the states of Montana and Nevada and in Great Britain. Mr. Tom Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Congress, gave some interesting evidence to the committee. On June 17 the chairman of the committee moved that the report of the committee be adopted. In speaking to his motion he made it clear that nothing very much was to be expected. He said, as reported at page 4425 of Hansard of June 17, 1925:

Hon. gentlemen will observe that the recommendation involves no expenditure and no responsibility further than the continuance of the idea of establishing in Canada an old age pension system, which the committee think is very desirable, and would like to see it proceeded with.

The hon. member for Cariboo, who was then the hon. member for Calgary East, was as impatient as he is now with this type of stalling tactic, and he moved an amendment as follows:

That this report be referred back to the committee with instructions to consider and report on a purely federal scheme.

Those who did not want to do anything argued that the federal parliament had no authority in this field; that it was clearly a matter for provincial jurisdiction. The hon. member for Cariboo at that time said:

It is surely clear that it would take the same amount of money whether the provinces came in or not, and the taxpayers of Canada are not so foolish as to imagine they pay any less if they pay part of it through the municipalities, part of it through the provincial government and part of it through the federal government.

Those remarks were made in reply to the argument advanced that we could not stand the cost of providing old age pensions. Then, in reply to those who said we could not afford it, he said:

I believe we can afford it; but if it be so that we cannot afford it, let us frankly say so and not continue making a pretence that we are on the way to obtaining old age pension legislation by referring the whole question to a conference.

There was an interesting division at that time, and I find that only seventeen stood up and supported the motion moved by the hon. member for Cariboo. There were 138 against the motion. It is interesting to note that of those who supported him two now sit with the Progressive Conservatives, the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Yukon. The Prime Minister voted against it as did most of the Conservative and Liberal members. But after a while there was an election in Canada; the voters of the country felt that if the people wanted to have old age pensions there was no reason why they could not have them, and the government which took office in the next session was prepared to proceed with and introduce old age pensions.

I might say further that before old age pensions were finally passed the members of the senate considered the matter in 1926. There was quite a heated discussion in the other place. Many were much opposed to the idea of pensions. Speaking in the debate, Senator Ross said, as reported at page 156 of senate Hansard:

> Mark you, after this bill had been passed and provided a pension of $240 a year, if I know anything about it, the aged people in this country would not be satisfied with $240, and it would not be very long until the pension would have to be worked up to one dollar a day, or perhaps doubled to $480 a year.

That was twenty years ago. The old age pensioners in Canada are very patient; they are still not receiving the $480 anticipated by the senator who was so much concerned about it. One other senator used almost violent language. He said, as reported at page 180 of the senate Hansard:

> Therefore I ask myself the question: in heaven's name, why has the present government displayed such hectic haste in bringing this legislation before parliament in order to fasten upon this country an initial expense of $25 million . . .

That was a large sum of money in those days, and we could not spend such an amount so recklessly. In the session of 1926 I find that some heated discussion took place on the question. Mr. Meighen was then in the house, and as reported at page 2474 of Hansard of 1926, he said:

> It is the result of a compact, made at the opening of the house, to get the votes of labour members, and it is not going to get any old age pensions. It was intended to secure votes and it has served that purpose already. I do not know of any much more effective step which might be taken in order not to provide for old age pensions.

He was complaining of the fact chiefly that the late Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Heaps were supporting the government headed by the present Prime Minister, because that government was prepared to introduce old age pensions. The government which Mr. Meighen would have led was unwilling to travel in that direction. This matter was up in the house the other day, and the Prime Minister correctly stated the fact that there was no compact. The labour members wanted at least two things; they wanted more adequate old age pensions and they wanted some form of unemployment insurance. The record would seem to indicate that Mr. Meighen was unwilling to introduce social legislation of either type, whereas the present Prime Minister was prepared to bring in legislation to deal with old age pensions.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

I was interested in reading the senate Hansard following the 1926 election. The first time the Old Age Pensions Act came before the senate it was defeated by an overwhelming majority. After the election, however, when the Act came up the second time, the vote was 61 in favour and 14 against. I was interested in reading the comments of one who stubbornly opposed the introduction of old age pensions on both occasions. Sir Allen Aylesworth. His remarks appear at page 167 of senate Hansard for March 24, 1927:

> I voted against the measure last year simply because, as a matter of principle, I personally am unalterably opposed to the whole idea of pensions being paid by the state. We have pensions to the right of us and pensions to the left of us; pensions very plentiful, it seems to me...

I find that the gentleman who uttered these words on that occasion is still a member of the other place. The Parliamentary Guide gives his age as ninety-two, and he does not seem to object to the compensation he receives from the taxpayers of Canada as he performs his duties in that chamber. So I think the people of this country who cleared our land, built our railroads and developed our industries, when they reach the evening of life are entitled to much more generous compensation than we have provided up to the present.

In dealing with the estimates of the Department of Justice the other evening, I found that one of the statutory items, passed without comment, provides pensions for some ninety-seven judges who have retired. I understand that later this session we are to have legislation increasing salaries of judges. I am not complaining about the judges being adequately paid, but we do pay retired judges pensions at the rate of $3,608 a year, or over $300 a month; and if it requires over $300 a month for a retired judge to get along on, after he has had a reasonably good income as a lawyer and on the bench, I do not see how our old people can be expected to balance their budgets in the cities and country communities of Canada on the very small amounts we give them.

Then a return was brought down at the request of the hon. member for York South, giving the amounts being paid to all officers retired on pension from the Royal Canadian Navy, the army and the air force since September, 1939. Again I want to make it clear that I am all for providing adequate pensions for all those who served their country in time of war. But the thirty-seven officers in the highest pension brackets receive over $400 a month, while a great many others receive somewhat less. As you look over the return you find some who receive over $6,000 and others who receive over $7,000, while a great many receive between $4,000 and $5,000. Having established the fact that we can and do pay pensions such as I have mentioned to retired judges and retired service personnel, I think the time has now arrived when we should do something better and different for the hundreds of thousands of old age pensioners in the Dominion of Canada.

The booklet I mentioned earlier estimates the amount it would cost to provide pensions for everyone over seventy years of age. This afternoon some constructive suggestions were offered to the effect that there should not be any objection to paying pensions to millionaires or those in the higher income brackets when they reach the age of seventy, because it would be an easy matter to arrange the income tax schedules in order to recover such pensions, just as is done in connection with the family allowance. So that if pensions were paid to all such people in 1948, according to the estimates it would cost only around $200,000,000. Then. if we were to carry out the dominion's plan to provide pensions on a means test basis for those between sixty-five and sixty-nine years of age it would cost another $34,000,000. That would be only $234,000,000, which is a very small amount considering what Canada did during the war years and what we must do during the years of peace if we are to avoid another depression and maintain full employment.

My deskmate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East have discussed this question frequently and fully. I do not propose to quote from any of their speeches, but I should like to remind the committee of some of the comments made by the former member for Vancouver-Burrard, now a member of the senate, who spoke on this question on July 24, 1943. I believe some of the things he said should be underlined. At page 5413 of Hansard for that year he said:

> But we have neglected to recognize the old age pensioner as a class that is worthy of just as much attention as we have extended to others.
> This year the matter came up by way of a question to the minister to ascertain whether or not the cost of living bonus could not be extended to the old age pensioner, and I must confess that I was deeply concerned with the reply that the minister gave, because I believe that in all the social reforms that are facing us today, success in dealing with them is largely a matter of attitude. The attitude of the minister to the old age pensioner seemed to be a repudiation of well established Liberal policy . . .

Later, he quoted from the Minister of Finance, who replied to one of the appeals to do something for the old age pensioners by saying:

> But why grind at the dominion government all the time, with its terrific burdens, and with its deficit of two or three billion? Why drive us, or make it almost impossible for us to carry on at all?

The former member for Vancouver-Burrard quite correctly pointed out that paying a few million dollars extra to enable the old age pensioners to have enough to eat and decent housing should not be a burden on a country the size of Canada; and then at page 5417 he went on:

> Now the minister tells us that it would be a terrible thing if we brought the old age pension up to $30 a month, because probably we would get an increasing cycle of rising prices that would spiral into an inflationary St. Vitus dance. Whoever heard of inflation coming from the expenditures of old age pensioners? Yet that is what we were told here the other night. They are fighting this war in Australia from positions more dangerous than our own, and they are putting everything they have into it just as we are. Does anyone suggest that their old age pensions scheme has injured their war effort or caused them to suffer from inflation? But Canadians are so far behind Australians that it should be an inspiration to us to move onward. The population of Canada is 11,566,000. The population of Australia is 7,000,000, so that we have 64 per cent more population than they have. The number of old age pensioners in Canada, taking the figure for 1942, is 185,000; in Australia it is 275,000. They have invalid pensioners numbering 60,000; we have none in Canada. Pensioners in Canada total 185,000, and in Australia, 336,000, so that they have 150,000 more old age pension beneficiaries, though we have 60 per cent more population. The total amount paid in pensions in Australia is $93,580,000; in Canada for this year it will be roughly $30,000,000 from the federal government, which bears three-quarters of the cost, which would bring our total up to $40,500,000. If we were paying in proportion to our population the same amount as Australia is paying, we would pay out $146,000,000 a year. Yet we tremble about inflation and about our financial position in the war when we think of going not nearly as far as Australia has gone. Our age limit for both men and women is seventy; in Australia it is sixty-five for men and sixty for women. The average pension paid throughout the dominion ranges from 61 cents a day in British Columbia down to about 38 cents a day in Prince Edward Island. Does any man in this house believe that an old age pensioner can get along in the cities of Canada on $20 a month?

The member who then represented the constituency for Vancouver-Burrard is not here to support the plea he made for more generous old age pensions. But I am sure there are many hon. members on the government side of the house who share the views expressed so well that hot night in July a couple of years ago. I know the minister has given a good deal of thought to this problem. I urge that before the item passes the minister hold out some hope to the old age pensioners in this country, to indicate to them that this is not now a financial problem. Rather, the government should ask itself, "Can we supply these people with decent housing? Can we see that they have enough money to buy flour, bread, milk and other supplies?"

The government's policy of removing price ceilings and permitting prices to follow their natural course has already placed a serious burden on old age pensioners on fixed incomes. There are nearly 200,000 people who are hoping that in this year the government will carry out the programme that was announced when the premiers were brought to Ottawa. In 1926, when the fate of a government was at stake, there was no hesitation in introducing old age pensions, although at the time there was some question as to the constitutional right of the federal government to proceed without the consent of the provinces. It took nearly ten years to get full cooperation from all the provinces. But I am sure that if to-day the federal government would indicate that it is prepared to go ahead with the plan outlined to the provinces, either with or without their cooperation, there would be very little criticism.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I rise briefly to support those hon. members who have spoken for improvements in old age pensions. It is quite unnecessary to repeat the arguments used by previous speakers.

The hon. member for Lethbridge mentioned the pension legislation in the state of Washington. I was keenly interested in what he said, because my constituency borders that state. I know it is a most progressive one, and is composed of a fine type of people. A habit has grown up between the people of that state and those in my constituency of visiting back and forth.

I was in the state of Washington at the time they were considering changing their old age pension legislation. At that time they were in very much the same position as we are in Canada to-day, because for ten years their government was stalled on the question of old age pensions. I was there on one occasion going through the forests of Washington state and meeting large numbers of the country people who were discussing this question. These were people from both the country and the cities. There was a strong demand for an improvement in their old age pension legislation, a demand which was crystallized in the plan which was read to the house this evening by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Some two or three years ago I returned to the state of Washington and met a number of the same people. While there, I took occasion to ask them what they thought of their old age pension plan, and the answer I received from the farmers and the working people was that while at the time of its passage, there were many who considered that it involved tremendous expense, they were unanimous in their statement that it was one of the finest things the Washington state legislature had ever done. Hon. members may be interested to know that the total budget for that state last year was $350 million, out of which $110 million was spent on old age pensions and social welfare. That is some indication of the progressive nature of the state of Washington.

I wish to emphasize that this advanced type of legislation was not brought in under a socialist government, but rather under a capitalist system. The natural resources of that state are very much like ours in the west. While I am not suggesting that this government had a mandate from the people of Canada at the last election to establish a socialist system, I do say that as a result of the government programme and policies announced to the people it has a mandate to establish, and to do so very quickly, an improvement in the old age pension system.

There is no group of people in Canada to-day who have been more deeply disappointed at the failure of the dominion-provincial conference than those people who would benefit by an improved old age pension system. I believe hon. members in all parties see the necessity for this move in the near future. I hope hon. members will study what has been done in other countries, without endangering economic systems. I am sure that when we do establish an improved old age pension system along the lines of that in the state of Washington hon. members, regardless of their party, will say—as they have in that state—that it would be one of the finest things the parliament of Canada has ever done for its people in this generation.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not wish to hold up the committee unduly, but I believe this is a question upon which we might well spend more time. We have spent much longer time in discussing estimates which are not as important as this one.

Hon. members who have preceded me have made a strong case for old age pensioners. I should like to bolster that case with figures, showing dollars and cents, because we are now dealing with expenditures. I feel sure that in a little while the Minister of Health and Welfare will rise in his place and, by means of statistics and dollars and cents, atempt to prove that this cannot be done. So that I am going to present by budget first.

I have worked out the budget which I believe the average old age pensioner would work out for himself, on the basis of a full pension of $25 per month, the amount payable in Manitoba. If we take the month of June as a basis, having thirty days, and divide that into that amount of money we find that we have a figure of 83⅓ cents a day. The old age pensioner knows he has to provide three essentials of life out of that sum, namely food, clothing and shelter, leaving aside all those other things which he might and should have.

If we divide that amount of money equally for food, clothing and shelter, we find it works out to 28 cents a day for each. Then, if one has a habit of eating three meals a day, this would work out to 28 cents for the three meals, or 9⅓ cents per meal. I should imagine that would be nine cents for the meal and one-third of a cent to tip the waiter.

This is on a basis of $25 a month, the maximum amount payable in most provinces. But, as the hon. member for Mackenzie pointed out a while ago, the average pension payable is not the maximum. He quoted figures from another source which showed that in British Columbia, where I believe the highest average amount is paid, it was 61 cents a day. If this is divided up in the same way as I have divided up the budget it would work out to only 6⅔ cents a meal, or a little less than the previous figure.

I have made this computation to show what would be the effect if we were to have a 60-60 plan, that is $60 a month at the age of sixty years. That would not be anything revolutionary because it would still be below the amount necessary to live on at the present time with the way prices are. Taking a $60 pension for a thirty-day month, you would have $2 a day with which the old age pensioner would have to provide food, clothing and shelter. Divide that into three equal parts and you have 66⅔ cents a day for food. Divide that into three meals a day and you have only 22 cents a meal with two-thirds of a cent left to tip the waiter. Anyone who would argue that 22 cents is too much for a meal for an old age pensioner would certainly run up against stiff opposition. With the way prices are to-day, $50 a month, the amount some one has suggested, is not sufficient. If prices continue to rise I doubt if we shall be able to rise in our places next year and say that $60 is enough. Prices seem to be going up in all directions in spite of the protestations of the Minister of Finance and others. It seems to me that this is one class of people which should not be pegged down to a certain amount which was considered sufficient some years ago, although I doubt if it was even then. I have no hesitation in endorsing everything that has been said by other hon. members.

I understand that pensions for the blind come under the same item. I have often wondered why these pensions are not payable until forty years of age and this has never been satisfactorily explained to me. I understand that there is some suggestion in the proposals of the dominion government to the provinces that the age limit be lowered to twenty-one years. That is a step in the right direction, but I see no reason why we should stop at twenty-one years. Family allowances are paid up to the age of sixteen years, and in the case of a blind person I submit that the pension should start at seventeen years, so that it would take over where the family allowances left off. This class of person has been waiting too long for the relief they require.

Mrs. STRUM: I felt that I could not let this item go by without saying something about the needs of old age pensioners because I think we are in honour bound to keep talking about this until something is done, regardless of what party we represent in this house. I was interested in the budget presented by the hon. member for Dauphin, but I think he is too generous. I think he allowed the old age pensioner far too much to spend because I did not notice that he allowed for rent.

Take a $30 a month pension, which is what is paid in British Columbia. Saskatchewan pays $28 and medical benefits. I am sure much less than that is paid in many other places. If an old age pensioner had to pay $15 a month rent, he would have only $15 left. If he were in Ottawa he would not get a room for that. The cheapest room that I have seen in Ottawa was priced at $10 a week for two people, and I would not stay in it any longer than I could help. As I say, the old age pensioner is left with $15 a month to buy his clothing and food. We will allow him $60 a year for clothing, and out of this he would have to buy his shoes, his overcoat, his suit, his underwear, and tobacco and anything else he might need. That would take $5 a month which would leave him $10 a month with which to buy food for thirty days.

An hon. MEMBER: What about heat?

Mrs. STRUM: He is supposed to have heat in that $15 a month room he is living in. To buy 90 meals in a thirty-day month would give him 11 cents a meal. I suggest to hon. members who think that $30 a month is enough that they go and rent a room and try to live for a month on the remainder. Until a person has done that he does not know what these old people are up against. The economist whom this party pretends to follow—I have in my hand the book by Sir William Beveridge called "Full Employment in a Free Society"—states that capitalist governments must be responsible for the total outlay of money in their country, and must make up the difference between what the individual may spend and the maximum expenditure required to give full employment. That is not a socialist concept. I agree with my hon. friend over here who says that this government was not elected to bring in socialism. This government pledged itself to bring in comfort and decency and until it has established a decent old age pension it will have been guilty of defaulting on the promises made just a year ago.

I hope that this government will see fit to allow old age pensioners more than eleven cents a meal, more than $15 a month for rent and more than $60 a year for clothing. I am sure that many of them have much less than that, because in many places less than $30 a month is being paid.

Mr. CLAXTON: Several hon. members have spoken about the old age pension proposals and, while the item is related to old age pension payments and the cost of administration, I think hon. members will bear with me if I reply to some of the remarks that have been made. The hon. member for Lethbridge referred to a statement which I made when this matter came up on a private members motion on April 10, 1946, when I said:

> There is no country in the world, of all those that have old age pension legislation, where there is a non-contributory system that is not on a means test. Either you have a contributory system of insurance and no means test, the people receiving the pension as of right, or else you have a non-contributory system on a means test.

The hon. member was quite right in saying that I said that. He then went on to say that apparently I had overlooked the position that obtained in the state of Washington where, according to what he had read, they have a generous old age pension. I would point out that from what he himself quoted that pension is paid to those "in need of financial assistance" and also to those "without resources or income". That would indicate that there is a means test there, and therefore my statement is still true. We have done our best to examine the systems in force in other countries and have found no case in which there is a non-means test pension payable without contribution. If there is one, I would be glad to find out about it.

The hon. member for Lethbridge said also that people cannot save under the present system, referring to people generally, not just old age pensioners. I would call his attention to the fact that on December 31, 1939, the personal savings of individuals in Canada amounted to $3,117 million, while at December 31, 1945, these had increased to $10,993 million.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How much of that is in the hands of individuals at the present date?

Mr. CLAXTON: Every cent of it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I wonder if that is correct or whether a number of individuals have cashed in their savings?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is the net increase in bank savings and similar deposits, in the holdings of government bonds and other individual savings.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that not because people denied themselves many things that they needed?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, that is true, but at the time those savings were being made the consumption of consumer goods went up about 15 per cent. Of course the cost of living indices must be taken into account, but I think the increase in that connection was much less in this country than it was anywhere else. There was a substantial amount of saving during the war, and the saving I have referred to is in the hands of individuals. That is leaving out of account reductions in mortgages, reduction in farm implement loans, the paying down of indebtedness of all kinds. There has been a satisfactory change in the position of the Canadian people as individuals.

The hon. member for Mackenzie referred to the fact that it took from 1927 to 1936 to bring into force old age pensions on the basis on which we have it now, as amended from time to time. That is quite right. The first province to come in came in in 1927, the year in which the dominion enacted this legislation, and the last province to come in came in in 1936. It took nine years, and it indicates that that is a very difficult mode of procedure to follow in bringing about a substantial change in social legislation. My belief is that measures which can be financed out of the consolidated revenue fund and which provide for a payment as of right to all the people from one end of Canada to the other can be introduced by federal legislation; but when the provision is contributory or on a means-test basis, I do not now see how it can be done by federal legislation, but should be done by agreement with the provinces. It was with this end in view that the dominion put forward the proposals to the provinces last August, with the result which all hon. members know: we had a series of discussions and an adjournment of the conference.

The proposal then put forward with regard to old age pensions has already been referred to; it was for old age pensions for everyone at the age of seventy years, without proof of need, of $30 a month; for old age assistance between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine, up to $30 a month, to which the federal government would contribute 50 per cent of the costs of the pensions. It was intimated that these measures would in part be financed out of a social security tax which would be introduced. That was part of a comprehensive system of social security and financial arrangements which were put before the provinces.

The hon. member for Kootenay West said that no one could be more disappointed at the failure to arrive at an agreement between the dominion and the provinces than the people who might have benefited from these provisions. I believe that to be true, and I would include among those who were exceedingly regretful at the failure to arrive at an agreement, those who worked for several years steadfastly to arrive at that agreement.

An hon. member referred to the "convenient excuse" of the constitutional position. I do not regard the constitution of Canada ever as a convenient excuse. I put it to hon. members that if you have an old age pension plan which is payable on a means-test basis or on a contributory basis, either one or the other, it is difficult to see how it could be introduced without a constitutional amendment or except by cooperation with the provinces, and that is the plan that we put forward.

I have briefly referred to the remarks of hon. gentlemen. I share with them the desire which many hon. members have to see to it that by one means or another our old people have more adequate provision made for them during their older years. I myself believe, as I think most hon. members do, that the best way in which to make that provision is to do it on a contributory basis under which those people who are able to do so will contribute year by year, through one means and another, so that when they arrive at the time when most of them will need assistance they will get it as a right, having built up an amount out of which the government will make the payments by means of contributions of themselves and others. Personally, so far as I have examined all the systems in force in different countries, I do not see that it matters very much whether the contributions in a national scheme are directly earmarked for each person on a strict superannuation fund basis or whether the contribution is made by a social security tax such as they have in New Zealand or Australia. The actual machinery is perhaps less important than that contributions should be made.

The situation as we have it to-day, however, is much as it was before the dominion government's proposals were made; that is, the old age pension is as provided for in the act of 1927 as amended from time to time. The attitude of the federal government with regard to this and other matters growing out of the dominion-provincial conference will, as the Prime Minister announced, be indicated at the time the budget is brought down, and I have nothing further to add at this time.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister think there would be any merit in attempting to make an agreement with the provinces on the question of old age pensions alone? There are different factors in connection with the pension which will have to be agreed upon anyway between the governments, and surely it would be worth while to attempt an agreement on the whole question.

I think no one can dispute that the present condition of many, many old age pensioners is deplorable. Surely we cannot sit back now and wait—perhaps a matter of years—for something to happen, particularly when each year means so much to these senior citizens of Canada.

There are two factors with which the minister has not dealt this evening. One of them is the manner in which the additional pension is to be paid once the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act lapses. At the present time the statutory provision for the old age pension is only $20 a month. The minister will correct me if I am wrong in that statement. A further $5 is paid by order in council originally passed under the War Measures Act, and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act picks up the orders in Council passed under the War Measures Act, so I assume that that is the way in which this extra $5 is now paid. It seems to me that this parliament must make provision for the whole old age pension on a statutory basis, and when that is being done the amount should be increased to at least the sum of $30; the minister should explain to us how he intends to get around the difficulty.

The other question I should like him to deal with is the possibility of amending the regulations. They are extremely harsh in many respects, as I pointed out to him at the session last fall. He will find that discussion at page 3610 of Hansard for the last session. In his reply to my questions at that time he intimated that he was already negotiating with the provinces for an amendment to the regulations. He said:

> I am very glad to tell the hon. member, however, that we have already inaugurated discussions with the provinces alongside the work of the dominion-provincial conference, and in their welfare officers—> —have accepted our suggestion that early in the new year we should meet together to discuss administrative problems relative to old age pensions.

I think there is a word left out there.

It would be interesting to know whether that meeting has been held, and, if so, what progress was made in changing the regulations. I do not intend to go over in detail the regulations that should be changed, but, as the minister knows, in the proposals of the government of Canada, set out for the dominion-provincial conference of last year, there is to be found the dominion's idea of what these regulations should be. At page 38 it is suggested that the residence qualification should be residence in Canada for a total period of twenty years since the age of 18. No matter at what time the applicant had been out of the country, the only requisite would be a total residence in Canada of twenty years since the age of 18. Then the dominion apparently believes that the maximum payment of pension should be reduced only by any income that the recipient actually gets. In other words, there would be none of this business of estimating five per cent of the assessed value of his home and counting that as income, whereas he was not actually getting any income from the home. The proposal reads:

> In computing the income of the recipient for purposes of this means-test, moneys received from other sources not for the recipient's own use to be excluded.

I would point out that in the proposed amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act, now being considered by the special committee on veterans affairs, provision is made for the war veterans allowance recipient to have a home of a value of $4,000 without suffering any reduction in his war veterans allowance. There is also provision, under that act as it stands at present, for the recipient to have $1,000 in victory bonds without suffering a reduction in his war veterans allowance.

[Mr. Green.]

The dominion also proposed last fall that provinces should not crack down on an old age pensioner coming from another province. It would not make any difference in which province he had been, he would be entitled to full pension; whereas at the present time, under certain conditions, the pension is reduced. The dominion further advocated wiping out the provision whereby the estate of the pensioner can be taken by the government after his death.

These are only a few of the suggested changes in the regulations. Is it not possible to have these changes made in the near future without waiting for a resumption of the dominion-provincial conference? It seems to me that the necessity for these changes is so obvious that there cannot be any argument about it; there should be some way of bringing about changes in the regulations.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. gentleman expressed the hope that we would not sit back and wait. I would point out that this government has not sat back and waited. It took the initiative with the introduction of old age pensions in 1927. It took the initiative with the amendment in 1937 and with the introduction of pensions for the blind. It took the initiative in 1943, when, by order in council, as the hon. member said, the maximum amount payable was increased to $25, and it took the initiative in August, 1945, when it put before the provinces the proposals to which I have already referred. The question of old age pensions is one in which, while there may be comparative agreement among the members of the house, there is considerable disagreement in different parts of the country, and that was brought out during the course of the discussions at the dominion-provincial conference, when the attitude of all the provinces was by no means identical. The complexity of dealing with a matter of this kind became apparent in the wide disparity of views which were expressed.

The hon. member referred to my indicating that I hoped early in the new year, following discussions we have had with provincial representatives, to call a meeting to discuss possible amendments to the old age pension regulations. We had that in mind in consequence of the discussions which took place in November and December, and it was my thought that we would have that conference early in the new year. But in view of the adjournment from time to time of the dominion-provincial conference, it seemed advisable not to have it until we knew clearly what the outcome might be. However, I should say that the interprovincial board on old age pensions has recently been reconstituted. I have sent a letter to the members of the board, which consists of the provincial ministers responsible for old age pensions administration, and the deputy ministers, suggesting to them that it might be convenient to meet on September 16.

Mr. FLEMING: Will this session be over by then?

Mr. CLAXTON: At least we shall be available. Then we shall go into among others, some of the matters raised by the member for Vancouver South. It should be remembered that the dominion's proposals were put forward as part of a comprehensive scheme, but that does not mean that if we cannot get that scheme we are necessarily tied to these proposals in detail.

Mr. GREEN: But they show what the dominion government thought would be proper changes.

Mr. CLAXTON: As part of a comprehensive scheme they showed what we thought would be desirable. If we cannot get that scheme it may be necessary to work out something else, but we propose to have this conference. I have asked the representatives of the provinces to indicate the matters that should go on the agenda, and then we shall examine the regulations and take into account all the representations that have been made in this committee and in the house.

Mr. GREEN: One point the minister did not deal with is the increase in payment.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sorry. It is proposed that during the session, despite its possible length, legislation will be introduced to carry that into effect.

Mr. GREEN: By what amount will the pension be increased?

Mr. CLAXTON: That will be made known when the legislation is brought down.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was not in the house when the hon. member for Vancouver South began his remarks, but I entered in time to get the minister's reply. He mentioned that this government had taken the initiative in 1927 to institute pensions and again in 1943 to increase the amount of the pension. I believe the records of this house show that in 1927 it was not so much a matter of this government taking the initiative as the initiative being forced on the government. That is quite clear.

An hon. MEMBER: They deny that.

Mr. MacINNIS: They deny almost anything and I do not blame them. We all deny things that are not to our credit. But these are the facts. I would refer my hon. friends to my right to the speech made by a former leader of the party and a former prime minister of this country who said that there was not the least doubt in the world that the person who was responsible for old age pensions in Canada was the former leader of this group, the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth. But the point I should like to impress upon the minister and upon the committee is that a pension at the present rate of $30 a month is wholly inadequate. It must not be forgotten that that amount is all that these people have to live on.

Mr. GREEN: They pay only $25.

Mr. MacINNIS: I know, but at least up to the present time the provinces pay an additional sum. Some pay an additional $5; some pay less than that, and some pay none at all. But in this day and generation $30 is not enough for a person even to exist on. From this point of view it is unfortunate that the dominion-provincial proposals were not carried out, because, despite the inadequacy of the old age pension proposals, they are better than those which exist to-day. The granting of $30 a month by the federal government to persons seventy years of age and over is certainly an advance on what we have now. I am sure that no member in the committee would oppose it. If the proposal had gone through, persons of from sixty-five to sixty-nine years of age would be in approximately the same position as those who are now seventy; that is, old age pensions would be granted in needy cases or in cases of actual destitution at the age of sixty-five.

May I again point out that a pension of $30 is not sufficient. I was not in the house on Friday, but it was reported in the press that it was the intention of the government to introduce a bill to increase the salaries of judges. Without waiting for that, members of this house increased their own salaries last year. In view of all these facts; in view of persons getting $4,000 and up to $15,000 having received increases to expect that people in this country who have given their lives to building Canada can live on $240 to $360 a year is just not reasonable. No intelligent parliament would even suggest it. I suggest to the minister that this country to-day can provide our old people with an income that will at least allow them to live in a way which will provide the necessities and decencies of life.

Having been brought up in poverty, having seen my parents living in poverty, I know just what it means to these old people. I know what it means to the hundreds of people who have written me during the last two or three years. I have a pile of letters several inches thick from elderly men and women. These letters have come from people all over Canada who have given their lives to the building up of this country, and yet we cannot give them more than $30 a month. Most of those people who are administering this money may spend more than that on cigarettes, cigars and various kinds of drinks. I suggest to the minister that if he wants to get the reputation of being progressive—and he has acquired that in some way or another; I do not know how—he will have to do something better than that for our old people.

Mr. FRASER: The minister has not said anything about pensions for the blind. I know that pensions are given to them, but is the department doing anything to prevent blindness and to help the blind? The minister's department should take every means possible to prevent people from becoming blind. I have not heard of anything that the department is doing in that connection. I believe this matter came up in the social security committee in a brief presented by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. The earning power of a single blind person should be increased to $660 and a married person to $1,200, and at the same time they should be permitted to retain their pension, because these blind people require people to assist them to and from work.

During the last few years the Canadian National Institute for the Blind has helped a large number of people to obtain jobs. They have shown them how to work. The blind people are doing a splendid piece of work. The Canadian National Institute for the Blind has helped the department of the Minister of Veterans Affairs to place men in jobs, and these men are doing jobs that are worth while. We have them in factories in Peterborough and they are doing jobs which are very difficult. They are doing the job as well as, if not better than, people with eyesight. Therefore I wish to impress upon the minister that everything possible should be done by his department for these blind people. They deserve it. I should like the minister to make a statement in regard to what the department is doing and intends to do in that regard.

The suggestion of the hon. member for Dauphin that the pension should start where the family allowance leaves off at seventeen years of age is a worthy one. The department should take it up, because these people need pensions at all times.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. CLAXTON: I am grateful to the hon. member for Peterborough West for his remarks. We have the interests of the blind very much at heart, and have created a new division of blindness control to inaugurate just the kind of work which he mentions. This came up in connection with the discussion on these estimates on June 14, 1946, reported at page 2525 of Hansard; also on June 7, reported at page 2303. Hon. members will not expect me to go over the same ground again. I should like the hon. member and the committee to know that it is very much in mind and that we are conducting a survey of all cases of blindness that can be made available to us in order to ascertain the causes of blindness, with a view to seeing what percentage can be prevented or cured. The proposals we placed before the provinces included an offer to pay 50 per cent of the cost of work in the direction of preventing or curing blindness. Further, the proposals included increasing the amount that might be paid to $30 a month, and reducing the age to twenty-one years.

The other proposals which have been put forward by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and other organizations have been receiving continuous consideration. I think there are only two which have not been put forward either in the dominion proposals to the conference or actually carried out by the dominion government. Those two refer to a special grant for guiding, and to relating the pension to the cost of living index. So far we have not considered it possible to adopt those, but I can assure the hon. member that they, like all others relative to this subject, are receiving careful consideration.

Item agreed to.

230. National physical fitness—administration, $50,000.

Mr. FLEMING: This item and item 231 have to do with the matter of national physical fitness, and arise out of the National Physical Fitness Act passed in 1943. At the outset I should like to observe that if there are any items above all others which should be considered only after the committee has been furnished with full information, it is items of this kind. Here the administration started out with $250,000 on hand, of which $25,000 was to be for administration expenses and $225,000 for distribution among the provinces. Six of the provinces have entered into agreements coming under the scheme, while three, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec, have refused to participate. It is now June 24, and we have not before us, in any form whatever, the report of the national council on physical fitness for the past fiscal year. Section 13 of the National Physical Fitness Act, which is chapter 29 of the statutes of 1943, provides:

The minister shall, as soon as possible—

I emphasize those words, "as soon as possible".

—but not later than three months after the termination of each fiscal year, submit an annual report to parliament covering the administration of this act for such fiscal year, and such report shall contain a statement of all moneys paid into or credited to the fund and all disbursements therefrom and shall include the regulations made under this act.

The fiscal year adhered to by the council is the government fiscal year ending March 31. Under the section I have just read, one week from yesterday is the last day within which the minister must file the report of the national council on physical fitness, even without giving any attention to the words "as soon as possible". I think the committee is entitled to an explanation of the fact that this report has not yet been furnished to hon. members.

I go on from that to offer this observation. In approaching items of this kind, having regard to its duty to scrutinize these proposed expenditures, I believe the committee needs to be certain that the activities of this national physical fitness council are really such as will contribute to the end of increasing physical fitness throughout the country. The committee will want to be very sure that what is being proposed or embarked upon here is not just a duplication of work already being carried on by the provinces. I know in the province of Ontario no occasion has been found for participation in this scheme, because it represents duplication. Just enlarging on that thought, at page 67 of the report of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, I find this paragraph:

In connection with the training of instructors and leaders under the National Physical Fitness Act, the national council passed the following resolution:

"As many excellent leaders in physical fitness and recreation are serving at present in His Majesty's services, the council recommends that the responsible provincial departments use this source of potential leaders."

I do not think we need any national council on physical fitness to tell the responsible departments of the provincial governments that in the armed forces we have a source of instructors in physical fitness. I think the provincial departments are well aware of that fact, so that it is quite unnecessary, and I suggest perhaps just a little bit cheeky, for this national council to be passing resolutions of this kind undertaking to instruct the provincial governments concerned as to how they may carry out their duties to those who have served in the armed forces. I think the provincial governments are well aware of their duties in that regard.

Lacking the report, I question whether the committee is in a position to give these two items the intelligent study which should be given. Since we are without the report, may I ask the minister if he will answer questions on the following points? In the first place, will he give the committee the expenditures for the past year? In the second place, what programme is contemplated for the present fiscal year, and what distribution among the six participating provinces is contemplated? Next, can he furnish the committee with a financial statement for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946? Next, what is the salary of the national director; and next, has the council undertaken to acquire any real property pursuant to the power contained in section 6 (2) of the act?

Mr. CLAXTON: I wonder if there are any other questions I might take up at the same time. If not, I shall be very glad indeed to answer the questions put by the hon. member for Eglinton. In the first place, the statute requires that the report be filed as soon as possible after the end of the fiscal year, and not later than three months after the end of the fiscal year. I think hon. members will agree that this period is shorter than that provided in most statutes requiring the filing of annual reports. In this case we have had the report available in draft form for just a few days. It would have been filed in typewritten form already but for the fact that there has been delay in having it translated. I think hon. members are aware of the fact that just now it is difficult to have government papers translated and printed as promptly as we would like. However, the report will be filed in accordance with the statute before the end of this month, though it will not be possible to have it printed in that period.

The hon. member asked for the expenditures last year, and I can give him those. They were as follows:

Salaries	$12,857 54
Cost of living bonus and unemployment insurance	506 62
Publicity and information	7,064 07
Telephones, telegrams, postage	328 72
Sundries	270 46
Professional and special services	31 75
Material and supplies	1,852 42
Freight, cartage and express	283 49
Transportation and travel	8,349 38
	$31,524 45

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister mind breaking down the item for publicity and information, and relating that to the proposed appropriation of $18,930?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have just been handed the table of expenditures I gave the hon. member, and I find I shall have to reconcile it with the information to be procured.

With regard to the programme covering the present fiscal year, the national council of physical fitness has had two meetings during the year. It laid down for the national director a programme which involved the preparation of a draft syllabus for a suggestion to universities in connection with the training of instructors in physical fitness. That has been distributed to the universities and it has met with a good deal of interest. It is available for them to be used, should they desire to do so.

Resolutions were adopted by the council suggesting further educational and promotional activities in connection with camps, the holding of games, organized activities in universities and schools and in connection with community activities. This act came into effect in 1943. Six provinces have cooperated actively in it.

Mr. LOW: Which provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON: All except Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick. Six provinces have cooperated actively and have all signed renewals of their agreements.

I think it should be remembered that all provinces are not in the same position as Ontario and Quebec in respect of looking after their own needs; and it has been found by those provinces which participate that they secure a contribution which enables them to assist in their own work. They have also found the services of the council and the national director useful in connection with the development of their own programmes.

The hon. member asked for the distribution between the provinces. During this fiscal year the distribution was as follows: Nova Scotia, $6,747.50; Manitoba, $2,692.44; Saskatchewan, $17,044.65 and Alberta $23,070.53. Payments to British Columbia and Prince Edward Island do not come within this fiscal period, although they obtain their payments in accordance with the arrangement.

Mr. GREEN: How much did they get?

Mr. CLAXTON: British Columbia could get up to $16,015, and Prince Edward Island could get up to $1,861. Then, I was asked what salary the national director gets.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. FLEMING: Perhaps I might interrupt at this point. I understand the basis of allotment among the provinces is a per capita basis. The second province mentioned by the minister, if I followed correctly, was Manitoba, with an allotment of something over $2,000.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, $2,692.44.

Mr. FLEMING: That is for Manitoba?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: That does not seem to compare, on a per capita basis, with the allotment read out by the minister for the other provinces.

Mr. CLAXTON: But the province draws down from the fund only on a fifty-fifty basis with the amount it spends. If a province spends a dollar on purposes set out in the regulations, it can then draw down a dollar from the fund. They do not necessarily draw the maximum. These are the actual expenditures. The amount of salary of the national director is $5,000.

I believe that covers the questions which have been asked.

Mr. FLEMING: The last question was about real estate.

Mr. CLAXTON: There is none at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps my colleague would forgive my interrupting at this point, because I believe I am the author of this national fitness programme. I regret very much that three of the provinces of Canada have not joined in the great national scheme.

Those of us particularly who come from British Columbia are keenly aware of the wonderful results effected by the Pro-Rec scheme, which was commenced under the provincial government of that province, and is now supplemented and buttressed by the provisions of the national physical fitness programme. The idea behind it was to follow what was done in Norway, Sweden, Czechoslovakia and other countries of Europe before the last great war, and to train our young men in physical fitness and give them all the benefits of the courses which were suggested and prepared. I believe that great work has already been accomplished under this legislation, and I hope that in future it will continue.

Mr. GREEN: It is for both men and women, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, indeed. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South has seen the classes in the open spaces around Vancouver, the parks. He has seen the men, women and school boys from universities and colleges take training in physical fitness. This builds up the morale of our people, and this physical fitness is always identified with intellectual and social morale.

Mr. MERRITT: The agreements of three of the provinces expired this year, two in January and one in April. These are British Columbia, Alberta and Prince Edward Island. Have all those provinces renewed their agreements?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes they have.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—

232. Assistance to schools of social work, $100,000.

Mr. FLEMING: This is a new item. Would the minister explain it?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Would he explain it particularly from this point of view: Are those schools of social work of the recognized type connected with universities?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. This vote is introduced for the first time. Whether or not it will be reintroduced will depend upon the will of the house. It is not necessarily designed to be a repeat vote. When family allowances were introduced and we discussed the situation with the provinces, and the various welfare agencies in those provinces, we found there was a great shortage of qualified workers to undertake the work of investigation. That is one explanation why we did not spend as much of the vote of $150,000 last year as we thought we would. It was represented to us that in order to assist in the accelerating of the training of an additional group of workers we should make grants available to schools and provide fellowships in the same way as had been done during the war in connection with the training of nurses for service in the armed forces. That need for nurses has ceased, but this was designed to meet a peace-time need of the same nature. The plan was worked out in connection with the representatives of the organized schools of social workers, of which there are seven in Canada. These are the Maritime school of social work at Halifax, Nova Scotia; the school of social work of Laval university; of the university of Montreal; at McGill university; of the university of Toronto; of the university of Manitoba and of the university of British Columbia. Plans have been worked out through consultation with their representatives which are understood to be satisfactory to them under which this money will be available, partly for grants to the schools and partly for fellowships. I should like to make it plain to the committee that this is being done on a one-year basis. It is not necessarily desired to repeat this, and we wish to warn the recipients that it may not be repeated in a subsequent year. We aim to accelerate the training of an additional group of workers just as soon as possible.

Mr. FLEMING: Do I understand that the seven schools of social work attached to the universities enumerated by the minister represent the complete group which will be benefited by this vote?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. FLEMING: Has the basis of distribution been worked out?

Mr. CLAXTON: An amount of $50,000 is to be used to establish 100 scholarships of $500 each.

Mr. FLEMING: Are they open to every one of the seven?

Mr. CLAXTON: On an agreed basis, also an amount of $45,000 is provided to assist the schools and $5,000 for administration.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister says, "on an agreed basis," but I should like him to indicate what the basis of distribution is among these seven schools mentioned.

Mr. CLAXTON: I will give the details, the first amount being for administration, that is assistance to the school, and the second amount to cover scholarships. The details are:

	Administration	Scholarships
Maritime school of social work	$3,400	$3,600
Laval	5,200	5,800
Montreal	6,700	7,500
McGill	7,800	8,700
Toronto	9,600	10,800
Manitoba	4,600	5,000
British Columbia	7,700	8,600

Mr. FLEMING: That is acceptable to all seven schools?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. KNIGHT: Could the minister give us the number of trained social workers who graduated from the universities this year?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sure that that figure is not available yet, even to those working in the field. When this was first discussed about a year ago we were informed that there was an immediate shortage of some 800 in Canada.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I notice all through these estimates there are amounts provided for travelling expenses. I brought up the same matter when we were considering the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. In that case I figured the travelling expenses totalled $1,360,000. I notice the total for this department is something like $300,000, with increases of $5,000, $10,000, $22,000, $30,000 and $65,000 in different branches. Can the minister give us an idea how these travelling expenses are accounted for?

Mr. CLAXTON: There are no travelling expenses under this item.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We are dealing with item 232, assistance to schools of social work.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I ask that my question stand.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants—

234. Canadian National committee for mental hygiene, $10,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: I spoke in support of item 220 covering the mental health division and at that time I mentioned the name of Mr. Morris Wilson. I should have said the late Mr. Morris Wilson, former president of the Royal Bank of Canada. During his lifetime he was one of the outstanding supporters of mental hygiene work and I understand he was president of the Montreal section. At the same time I should have mentioned other Montreal men like Mr. J. W. McConnell, Mr. Ross H. McMaster, Mr. Paul S. Sise and a few others. I merely want to say that I support this vote as strongly as I can because I am somewhat familiar with the work carried on by the committee for mental hygiene.

Item agreed to.

235. Health league of Canada, $10,000.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 25, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Ninth report of the special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INLAND NAVIGATION—SEAMEN'S UNION—EMPLOYMENT ON GOVERNMENT-CONTROLLED SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether it is true, as is alleged, that only seamen carrying a Canadian seamen's union card are being allowed aboard the ships now controlled by the government?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have no knowledge of that, but I shall be glad to look into it. I may say that they are moving through the national employment service offices on to the ships. That is the machinery which is being used.

WHEAT

NEGOTIATIONS FOR CONTRACT WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce in a position to give a report to the house with regard to the wheat negotiations between the government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I rather expected that I would be asked such a question to-day, and I came prepared to make a brief statement to the house with regard to the progress being made in negotiations looking towards a wheat contract between Canada and the United Kingdom.

For the past ten days negotiations have been carried on between experts representing this country and the United Kingdom. Substantial progress has been made in regard to the terms of such an agreement, in spite of the difficulties involved in placing the sale of a large volume of wheat on a contract basis for an extended period. A number of important considerations have now arisen which must become a matter of reference to the Canadian government and the United Kingdom government. As soon as these matters have been dealt with by the respective governments, negotiations will be resumed on the terms of the proposed contract.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

PENSION RIGHTS OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister yet in a position to make a statement to the house with respect to the conciliation officer's report on the Canadian Pacific pension dispute?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have received a reply from the company, and I also received their permission to table it, which I shall be glad to do tomorrow.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would it be possible to table a copy of the conciliation officer's report at the same time?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not customary to table the report of a conciliation officer. It is a report made to the minister. May I give an example of how careful one has to be in these things? We had two commissioners looking into the printers' strike in Winnipeg. I have received representations from the union not to table one of the reports. This thing cuts both ways. If my hon. friend would like to read the other report himself, I shall be glad to show it to him.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you.

MOTOR VEHICLES

IMPORTATION OF JEEPS FROM THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I should like to ask a question arising out of information which has been sent to me about the importation of small jeep cars from the United States. Some of the automobile employees have objected to the importation of these cars. Has the minister any knowledge of it, and if so will he give the house some information in respect to it? I have just received a telegram which states that the jeeps are coming in duty free.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I do not know that I am the minister to deal with the inquiry—it may be the Minister of National Revenue. If the hon. gentleman will send me any information which he has—it would need to be fuller than that which he has given to the house to-day—I shall see if it can be checked.

Mr. LOCKHART: I shall be glad to do that.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $136,598,972.86, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty on account for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I should like to inform the committee that I have made arrangements with the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other parties to allow interim supply to go through at this time. In doing so I wish to say that the passage of this interim supply will not prejudice in any way the rights and privileges of the members of the house to criticize and oppose any item in the estimates, and I have pleasure in giving the usual assurance in that regard on behalf of the Minister of Finance.

Resolution reported.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Before the resolution is concurred in, Mr. Speaker, I have just a few observations to make about some answers which have been placed on Hansard. On May 12, 1943, I gave a warning that millions of dollars had not been accounted for in 1943, and I asked why it was impossible to render an account for $17 million for the year 1942 and $41 million for the fiscal year 1942-43. The Minister of Finance submitted that the observation was out of order, and the chairman ruled me out of order.

To know what Canada has spent during the war we must consider first the revenue from taxation, and second the increase of the dominion debt during the war through victory loans, et cetera. In Hansard of May 27, 1946, at page 1881, the answers were given as follows:

Total revenue of the dominion from September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, was $12,681,719,279.

The net debt up to March 31, 1945 was $15,712,181,527.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but if he will look at standing order 38, debatable motions, he will see that the second reading of this resolution is not debatable.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not understand a word you said, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I asked the hon. gentleman to refer to standing order 38, debatable motions. If he does that he will see that as we are on second reading of a resolution, the motion is not debatable.

Resolution read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1947, the sum of $136,598,972.86, being one-twelfth of the main estimates, be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: In my humble view the revenue and the increase of the debt during war time, the increase of the debt through borrowing on the one hand, and on the other hand the non-war and war expenditures during that period, should balance. As a foreword may I say that the country spends the revenue which comes from taxes, and when there is not enough revenue to meet the expenditures, then there is some borrowing. During the war the borrowing was done through victory loans. The money which has been received from taxation and from victory loans should balance with the non-war and the war expenditures of the same period. This statement seems clear, and everyone may agree with it in principle.

According to the figures given by the Department of Finance on May 27, 1946, at page 1881 of Hansard, the total revenue from September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, was $12,681 million. The debt at March 31, 1945, which is the latest figure I have, was $15,712 million. If I subtract from that the debt when the country went to war on September 1, 1939, which was $3,767 million, the balance of the war debt proper up to March 31, 1945, was $11,945 million. If I add the total amount of revenue from September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, to the increase in the debt up to March 31, 1945, I get a total war expenditure of $24,626 million. No information was given for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946. The figure for the total debt at April 30, 1946, was "not yet available" on May 27 of this year.

The official figures given for non-war expenditure and war expenditure from September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, do not balance with the total increase in the debt during the above mentioned period, and the total amount of revenue. From September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, our non-war expenditure totalled $4,702 million. War expenditures amounted to $17,366 million, making a total of $22,068 million. If we recapitulate these figures we get the following result:

Total revenue from September 1, 1939 to February 28, 1946, and war debt to March 31, 1945	24,626
Non-war expenditure and war expenditure from September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946	22,068
Not accounted for	$2,558

The $2,500 million not accounted for was not a surplus. I quote from Hansard of June 12, 1946, at page 2419:

War Expenditures and Revenue

Mr. Pouliot: Referring to the statement of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance at page 1881 of Hansard, May 27, 1946, was the difference of $2,557,559,903 between the war debt until March 31, 1945, and the total war revenue until February 28, 1946, on one hand, and the non-war expenditures and war appropriation from September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, on the other, a surplus?

The answer by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance was:

Mr. Mayhew: No, a surplus is an excess of revenues over expenditures. In the period September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, total expenditures of the government were $22,069,226,313, and total revenues were $12,681,719,279, resulting in a deficit of $9,387,507,034.

I have a note here that this item does not balance with the increase in the war debt, according to the figures given on May 27. Then the hon. gentleman continued:

The figure of $2,557,559,903, which is the difference between the increase in total debt from September 1, 1939, to March 31, 1945, together with revenues in the period September 1, 1939 to February 28, 1946, on the one hand, and total expenditures in the period September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, on the other, represents an excess of receipts (including borrowings) over expenditures. This excess would be reflected in the books of the government by increases under various accounts classified as active assets (cash, loans, investments, etc.)

This leaves $7,500 million unaccounted for. The figure of $24,626 million for war expenditure was incomplete, because victory loans and extra-parliamentary expenditure during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, were an additional part of the debt and should have been added to this figure. That amount would be approximately $5,000 million. Therefore the total war expenditure, including war revenue up to February 28, 1946, and war debt up to March 31, 1946, should amount to about $29,626 million. A recapitulation of the above figures would give this result:

Total revenue from September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, and war debt to March 31, 1946	$29,626
War expenditure	22,068
Not accounted for	$7,558

This amount of $7,558 million which has not been accounted for represents $2,000 million more than all the deposits in the ten Canadian chartered banks. It is one-fourth the total expenditure of $30,000 million during the war. It is a very serious matter.

I was the only member to complain against the Bank of Canada when it was established. Now the books of the Bank of Canada apparently balance, but there is a secret; there is a mystery behind the doors of the Bank of Canada, and it is impossible to get any information about that. When the banking committee studied the Bank of Canada Act a couple of years ago the attention of hon. members was ably directed elsewhere by a discussion of the supposed hidden reserves of the banks. Much noise was made about it, but no member of parliament took advantage of that unique opportunity to get information about the Bank of Canada itself. I warned some members that a trick was being played; I warned the house and country that it was dangerous to have amounts unaccounted for when we debated the gift made in 1943. But that was a trivial matter; it was a casual matter of no importance!

Now there is an amount of $7,500 million which apparently is unaccounted for. In May I asked for information about the amount of the debt to the end of the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946. The only information I got was to the end of the fiscal year preceding. Every business man has accounts showing the operation of his business each morning when he comes to his office. He finds that information on his desk each day. I wonder if the Minister of Finance is not informed day after day as to the amounts of the debt of Canada. If we are to be the bankers of the world, then business should be done otherwise, because that figure of $7,500 million represents the amounts collected in several of the victory loan campaigns.

I do not cast any doubt upon the honesty and integrity of the Minister of Finance or his parliamentary assistant. I do not cast any aspersions of dishonesty on anyone in the Bank of Canada. But the day of mystery should be ended. The time has come when the House of Commons should scrutinize the business of the Bank of Canada; and the Minister of Finance should be responsible to the people, just as in the days of Fielding, White and Jim Robb.

Parliament is in the impossible position of being unable to get information about the business of the country. Money is spread everywhere, but when we ask for an accounting it is hard to get. Probably it will be made later. I wonder if that is the reason the budget has been delayed so long. Perhaps it may be made. As this document states:

> This excess would be reflected in the books of the government by increases under various accounts classified as active assets (cash, loans, investments, etc.)

When Mr. Dunning was Minister of Finance I asked him for information about the personnel of the Bank of Canada. But his reply was, "No, that is a secret". When Mr. Bennett, upon my advice to one of his secretaries, left for the Antipodes, he took with him a doorman from the Bank of Canada named Brooks. Upon his return I asked the government of that day if Brooks' salary had been paid by Mr. Bennett or by the Bank of Canada while he was travelling with Mr. Bennett. The answers by the Prime Minister and by Mr. Bennett were that I had been very bold in asking such a question, and that no member of parliament should inquire about the Bank of Canada. They said it was very bad manners to ask if Brooks had been paid by the Bank of Canada or by R. B. Bennett.

We are responsible to the people of Canada for the money that is spent outside and inside the country. We must be in a position to inform our constituents when they ask us for information in these matters. It is our duty; are we neglectful of it?

We live in strange times. On one occasion I complained about a man who, it was supposed, had sold the same coal three times; but no one was scandalized. Everyone considered him smart. These are the signs of the times. We are neglectful; we are careless; we pay no attention to these matters. Then, afterwards, some people will complain about taxation. They are ready to throw away their money outside, anywhere. We help the world, but we cannot look after our own business.

Sir, you will remember how many times I have insisted that the Minister of Finance bring in some reform in the matter of public accounts. The help I got was from two hon. members opposite, the hon. member for Broadview, and the hon. member for Davenport, who is now in his seat. Now when members of parliament complain about high taxation, they will remember that they made no move to reform public accounts. They voted for the loans which we had not the means to make. Having done that, they cannot complain about high taxation; it would seem that they want it. They are responsible before the people of Canada for that high taxation. I wonder if they will not realize the time has come to make a check on public business, to scrutinize the operations of the Bank of Canada and to make the Minister of Finance responsible again to the House of Commons in conformity with the old principle of ministerial responsibility.

I have asked information about government agencies, the chief of which is the Bank of Canada, including its subsidiaries, such as the foreign exchange control board. That board, it will be recalled, is operated by a man trained by Montagu Norman, and another man, who were doing so much at the Bank of International Settlements in Switzerland, and who during the war were shaking hands with Germans under the table. Those people are here. They are supposed to be internationally minded; I am not. I am nationally minded, although I am not a nationalist. I consider that the Canadians who are here should be considered first, and before any other peoples in the world. It is in their defence I speak to-day. As usual, perhaps I shall have the support of one member—or two. If there are two, there will be a crowd in support of my contentions.

I wonder what the people of Canada think about it. These figures are available; they can be collected by the Bank of Canada. It is very easy; anyone could do it. It is only a matter of bringing together the various increases under different accounts classified as active assets, cash loans and investments. Let it be done; let us place responsibility where it should be. Let us say that it has gone somewhere—to the Atlantic, the Pacific, the north pole, or the south pole; we do not know where. But the money has gone.

Let us suppose that one has an estate of $100,000, and that it is to be administered by someone who, while honest, may be incompetent. When the time comes for the rendition of accounts, they are rendered for only $75,000. Where has the other quarter gone? Where is the $25,000? No one knows. It is unaccounted for. That is the situation here.

I have simply given in miniature the true picture, which I believe to be my duty. I have informed the house. I wonder if the budget debate will simply be a matter of patting on the back, saying that everyone has done wonderful work, and that we must not disturb those gentlemen in the Bank of Canada who are so very competent and who are under such heavy strain because they work so hard!

One time I asked Mr. Dunning how much Graham Towers received. When I asked if it was $35,000 the minister was indignant, and replied, "Not at all; it is only $30,000." In spite of all this incompetence, which has scandalized me, I see a further notice in the papers that these fellows in the Department of Finance are to have a boost in salary because they have done so magnificently. Yet they cannot render accounts for $7,500 million out of expenditures of $30,000 million.

Mr. MacNICOL: A salary of $30,000 is a more pittance.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a small thing. I hope I have awakened the house to its responsibilities, and I hope that every hon. member, no matter to what party he belongs, realizes that he has a responsibility to protect the Canadian people against the incompetency of men who perhaps with the best motives in the world have ruled rich concerns in the state.

Then a word about university degrees. Oh, that is a bad thing. I remember that one of these men came to Mr. Bennett and said, "Mr. Bennett, you are not acknowledged as you should be on the North American continent. You should be made a doctor of laws in all the universities of this country." Mr. Bennett said, "Well, you are fair to me; you are a decent chap, and I appreciate what you say." Then Mr. Bennett was made doctor of laws in universities where he had never placed his foot. This is just a form of flattery. These people wear their mortarboards and they begin to think that they are held in higher esteem by the Canadian people. It is still done, and perhaps it is something that should be done more generously.

Members of parliament show a lack of courage and are unfaithful to their duty when they do not denounce those who consider themselves to be high above us and who really govern this country. If I had the proper words at my command I would tell the Minister of Finance and his assistant that I am sorry that they have not the nerve to follow what was done for this country by the pioneers and builders of the past, by men like Fielding, White and Robb. Those men were ready to defend the rights of the people within the precincts of parliament, and that is where it should be done.

At first the Bank of Canada was a private concern with individuals subscribing to some of the capital stock. Then it was taken over by the government and became a public institution. I do not know why the Bank of Canada is not abolished. I do not know why the foreign exchange control board is not abolished. I do not know why ministerial responsibility is not exercised again by the Minister of Finance, why there is not responsibility to the members of parliament who in turn are responsible to the people of Canada.

I have said this many times and I am repeating it to-day. It is pretty hard to follow figures when they are being read, but hon. members can read them to-morrow in Hansard. They will then see that there is something behind them. When I am not satisfied with an answer that is given to me I check the figures, and I felt that the discrepancy in the figures that have been given to me was so great that the matter should be brought to the notice of my colleagues in the house, which I have done.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, we in the opposition agree with the hon. member for Temiscouata when he says that parliament should have the fullest information and be able to make the strictest examination of the country's accounts. May I add that we are happy to know that the hon. member has disavowed his vow of silence and is once more giving us the benefit of his wisdom.

There is a matter I should like to bring up which has to do with the wartime prices and trade board. For some time the press has reported various small rackets in coupon distribution in different parts of the country. Only to-day La Banque Provinciale du Canada were notified by the wartime prices and trade board that after July 31 next they will not be permitted to participate in the arrangement for ration coupon banking. The announcement was in the form of a release made outside of parliament while parliament is sitting. The officials of the board explain that this bank has been warned of its method of handling coupon accounts. They say that safeguards recommended by the board to protect the public have not been lived up to by this bank; therefore in the public interest, the board has no alternative but to terminate the arrangements with them. This is the first opportunity we have had in the house to ask what irregularities have been ascertained—because they must have been widespread—how long they have been going on, and what safeguards recommended by the board were not lived up to. Recently the press reported the investigation had indicated that about a million fake or false butter coupons had found their way into the chartered banks. Apparently the bank in question was warned that its activities were illegal. What measures are being taken to ensure that in common with ordinary wrongdoers they will be prosecuted according to law? I am sure the government would wish to acquaint the country at the earliest possible opportunity with all the circumstances of this investigation and to indicate what action the government intends to take in order to prevent a repetition of any such practice. If the situation was sufficiently serious to warrant cancellation of the right of a bank to operate ration coupon banking for the wartime prices and trade board, why is the right not cancelled immediately instead of being continued for over a month?

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, this is a resolution to vote interim supply of one-twelfth, amounting to $136,000,000. Fifty years ago last Sunday, on June 23, 1896, the Liberal administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power pledged to retrenchment. The whole year's budget of the first year they were in power amounted to $36,000,000, which is $102,000,000 less than the one-twelfth that is being asked for now. We are spending billions to-day compared with millions then. There are many good business men in this house, but certainly this house does not conduct its business in a businesslike way. We are now being asked to vote one-twelfth of the whole year's supply from March 31, 1946, when hardly any estimates have been passed at all. In a few weeks another one-twelfth will be asked for, and on the 12th of July, no doubt, another one-twelfth. What we are really doing is making post mortem examinations of expenditures. We might just as well go home. John Hampden stood for an important principle when he refused ship money to the king. The hon. member for Temiscouata made a good stand last session and the session before; he was contending for a principle, and that is what we should do in this house. We should see that there is a proper examination of the estimates before they are voted.

The House of Commons has gone down in public estimation. The press came into being because of a lack of real parliamentary representation, and the press to-day represents public opinion more than do the members of the House of Commons, because our rights and privileges are continually being taken away from us, with the result that we have this way of doing business. I contend it is all wrong. The principle is entirely wrong. This is the sixty-seventh day of the session, and the budget has not yet been brought down. We shall be considering it in July and the session will go on until August, and probably September before we get through. That will mean that for six months of the year the money will have been spent, voted one-twelfth at a time, but, with very few estimates having been passed, and some of the departments have not yet been called in supply. There was some reason for proceeding in this way during the war, but the war has been over for a year, and no budget has been brought down yet.

They do things differently at Washington. There they have applied the axe to expenditures. We are a country of only eleven millions of people, with nine provincial governments and all the municipal governments. Over-government and over-taxation is the curse of this country. Expenditures are being made without public control. We used to have an auditor general. He used to have certain powers, but they have been taken away. He is picking up quite a bit after the criticism of his reports and is doing a bit of checking, but it does not amount to anything because there is an official over him called the comptroller of the treasury. You have a war appropriation bill, A, B, C, D, E, and once the accounts go through within the terms of the appropriation bill, the account is stamped and paid over the head of parliament without any control at all. The country will face bankruptcy if we continue to conduct business in that way. A number of small business men have already been driven out of business by the controllers that have been appointed. Only the other day the owner of a house in Toronto was evicted from his own home and taken to Pape Avenue police station in my constituency. Under an absurd housing regulation issued by the housing controller this man could not get into his own home. I have examined these various controllers and boards and it is time they were all wound up.

Take an institution like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It collects a licence fee of $2.50 and spends public money on capital accounts and yet it is contended that it is a private corporation, not a public corporation. Is it any wonder that the tax rate is as high as it is, and that people cannot pay their income tax? Is it any wonder that the small business man cannot continue in business? There has to be a change for the benefit of the people. Under the comptroller of the treasury we mostly have no control at all of expenditures and no control of the chiselers. There were some real Liberals in 1896. Alexander Mackenzie, it used to be said, slept on the strong-box. He has no counterpart in liberalism to-day. They have even moved his monument into the back yard. Every Tom, Dick and Harry who wants to come to Ottawa and raid the treasury finds no one guarding the nation's strong-box. The people are looking to parliament to do something, and we are doing nothing. If the municipal governments conducted their business the way we conduct ours in this House of Commons, they would be prosecuted under the Municipal Act for not having done their duty and would be dismissed at the next municipal election. We have no check on our business or on our expenditure. I do not suppose there is much use in protesting, but this is the place where the protests should be made. We cannot go on indefinitely in this way under this new 1946 type of liberalism, where we are spending money like water over the head of parliament, over the heads of the responsible ministers and without any public check at all. If this is the way we are going to conduct our business it is no wonder that parliamentary institutions are going down and down and down in public estimation.

Mr. MAYHEW: The hon. member for Temiscouata evidently believes that it is better to give than to receive, because he left the chamber after making his remarks. The only criticism I have to make is of his statement that the information was hard to obtain. He was hasty in making that statement. I do not think he had any right to make it. When he asked for information from the department it was immediately supplied to him, and the suggestion was made that if he could not then reconcile the figures given to him, we would have someone from the department visit him and try to show him exactly what was meant by the statement. As to the rest of his statement, it will be brought to the attention of the minister and of the governor of the bank.

As to the statement made by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I am not familiar with the matter, but it will also be given attention, and as soon as the information can be obtained it will be brought down. I expect that in a very short time there will be an opportunity to discuss this if it is necessary. The estimates for the mounted police will come on just as soon as the estimates for health and welfare have been dealt with, and any information we have can be given at that time. I hope that will meet the hon. member's request.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would not wish to put the parliamentary secretary in an embarrassing position. But there was a press release on this matter to-day, and I cannot see why parliament should have to wait three or four or five weeks for the estimates of the wartime prices and trade board in order to get the information. I ask the parliamentary assistant to have the information furnished to-day. Parliament is entitled to any information given in press releases and more. I do not want to be unfair to the parliamentary assistant, but I do insist on the information being given now, to-day, before this resolution is passed; otherwise it is just one more instance of parliament being ignored. The hon. member indicated that if it was necessary to give any information, possibly it could be given later. I am sure what he meant was that after the matter had been checked with the wartime prices and trade board the information would be forthcoming. I ask for it to-day.

Mr. MAYHEW: I think the hon. member for Lake Centre misunderstood what I said. I said the information would be supplied to him just as soon as possible, possibly when the estimates for the mounted police are brought down, which will be immediately following the National Health and Welfare estimates, probably later to-day, certainly not later than to-morrow. The matter can then be gone into in detail and we can furnish him with all the information in connection with it—not on the estimates of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No one knows whether the matter has been brought to the attention of the Department of Justice. All we know is that the wartime prices and trade board did certain things. The wartime prices and trade board is under the Minister of Finance, who has introduced the resolution now before us. If we wait until later in the afternoon the Minister of Justice may say; of course the matter has never been brought to my attention; you had better get in touch with Finance; and we shall be back again on the regular old performance. We are entitled to the information now. The press release issued to-day says that certain wrongs have been ascertained on the part of La Banque Provinciale du Canada, that apparently it has been neglectful of its duties and responsibilities, to such an extent that, after warning, the board has found it necessary to cancel this bank's right to handle the distribution, allocation, or cashing of coupons. If the matter is as serious as that, surely parliament is entitled to have the information when we are being asked to vote interim supply, part of which will certainly be used for the commodity prices stabilization fund and other activities of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. MAYHEW: I do not disagree at all with what the hon. member has to say. I think he is entitled to the information, and I promise to get it to him as soon as I possibly can. Evidently the Minister of Justice did not have the information when he was in the chamber a few moments ago. I have not had an opportunity of seeing the Minister of Finance to discuss with him whether he has it or not, but as soon as we are through here I shall endeavour to get the information, and if it is possible to do so it will be given to the hon. member to-day; if not, just as soon as we can get it, and there will be full opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Can we get a copy of the press release? Some of us have not seen it. The case made out by the hon. member would indicate that we should get this information at the earliest possible moment, and it strikes me that the hon. member is asking for it at the right time. Apparently even the Department of Justice and the Minister of Finance have not had time to prepare a statement for the house. I think we should have an understanding that we can go into the matter without delay.

Mr. LOCKHART: Who prepared the press release?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I do not know. I never saw it.

Mr. MAYHEW: I have promised the hon. member that I will give it to the committee just as soon as I can get it. I hope I shall be able to get it at six o'clock.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then the matter stands.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): A little while ago a return was brought down at my request showing the number of people in the employ of the government of Canada, including boards and commissions. I can understand the necessity of increases from time to time during the recent past in the number of employees in the dominion service, but the war has now been over for more than a year, and the time has come for a little economy. On March 1, 1945, we had 149,698 civil servants, including officials of boards and commissions and so on, in the employ of the government of Canada: at that time they were paid $19,158,059 per month. As I say, the war has been over for a year, and it seems to me we should have had some economy practised in that time, something should have been done; but now what do we find? The reduction in personnel is about 900; that is, on March 1 of this year there were 148,711 people in the employ of the government of Canada, and we paid them $19,949,329 per month—roughly $20 millions. There must be something wrong. The people of Canada demand economy, and we on this side of the house want to see economy practised. There is no economy in a reduction of only 900 in the number of federal employees in one year; and this return is inclusive of all the people in the employ of Canada. Not only that, but the increase in the monthly pay has been roughly $800,000. I can understand that, because there have been increases in civil servants' salaries. The government ought to get busy and start to count the pence and see if we cannot have a little real economy so that there shall be a reduction in what the Canadian people have to pay in taxes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am wondering whether we might reverse things and have those of us on this side of the house find out what has been happening, and tell the government. But speaking more seriously, it does seem to me, as the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, that this is just one of those cases which bear out what we feel very strongly, that these independent bodies are indeed independent and do all kinds of things without even bothering to take responsible ministers into their confidence. That is not certain, but it would look as if it may be so; therefore these things should be brought to notice and seriously considered; I do not think the matter under discussion should be regarded as a mere affair of routine on which we will get information. I have no doubt that the parliamentary assistant will get the information as soon as he can. But is this matter not more significant in that it indicates the degree of seriousness with which these things are dealt when they are brought before the house?

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to make a brief comment on the remarks of the parliamentary assistant in reply to what the hon. member for Temiscouata said. I warn the parliamentary assistant that the hon. member for Temiscouata is one of the greatest diggers for information in the House of Commons, and when he makes a statement he usually has the facts under his hand. If the parliamentary assistant does not remember what the hon. member for Temiscouata said—he made some startling statements which have not been answered, and my experience has been that he has always been a stickler for full information being placed before the House of Commons—my suggestion to him is that he read the statement of the hon. member for Temiscouata carefully and give us the reply at the first opportunity.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say humbly that general assent was given by the house to the granting of interim supply. As I announced last night, we intend to go into supply later to-day, when all these grievances may more properly be ventilated. May I suggest that we make progress with interim supply?

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand from that remark that opportunity will be given to the parliamentary assistant to give the information?

[Mr. D. G. Ross.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it the government's intention that there will be that opportunity?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Otherwise I was going to ask whether it would not be fitting to ask the committee to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again to-day so that we might have that opportunity.

Mr. MACKENZIE: An opportunity will be given to criticize whatever information is furnished by the parliamentary assistant later to-day, of we should again get into supply, and I hope we shall.

Mr. STIRLING: My point is that when the motion is presented the Speaker will be in the chair and there will be no opportunity for questions and answers. When the motion is carried and we get into the Department of Justice or some other department, have we assurance that this matter can be again discussed?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: With the consent of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If that is the decision of the committee, it certainly will be. I can assure the committee now that later when we reach committee of supply, every opportunity will be given to ask questions in regard to this matter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Do I understand that when we get into the Department of Health and Welfare or the Department of Justice, any hon. member will have the right to bring up this question?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: To ask questions on it; we shall not be cut off from asking questions or getting the information because of the fact that this matter does not peculiarly come under the department under discussion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Definitely, yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not a matter of just a grievance, as the minister said; it is more than a grievance; it is a serious charge against a bank in this country for malfeasance or misfeasance in connection with coupons used. Apparently the wartime prices and trade board must have acted without the minister or the government knowing anything about it, because when they read the press release which I sent over to them, they all showed that surprise which we on this side often have to show when we have not seen the matter until it comes before the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Neither did they.

Mr. PROBE: I presume the assurance given by the Minister of Veterans Affairs covers merely the matter with reference to La Banque Provinciale, which was under discussion. I should like to ask one or two questions with respect to the policy of the wartime prices and trade board. When a price is set by the board on agricultural implements, for example—because that is the thing I have in mind—is it the ceiling price at which the machinery may be sold? Must that machinery be sold at that price, or may it be sold at less than the ceiling price? If it must be sold at that price, how are the instructions sent out?

Mr. MAYHEW: The 12½ per cent increase on farm machinery was the maximum price that could be charged for machinery. They may sell as low as they wish. It is not a directive that they must sell at that price. They must not sell above it.

Mr. PROBE: A ceiling price exists, but not a floor price?

Mr. MAYHEW: That is right.

Mr. PROBE: Is that true generally of the commodity market?

Mr. MAYHEW: That is true of all.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mayhew (for Mr. Ilsley) thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 198, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1947.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. STIRLING: Referring to the matter which was brought up by the hon. member for Lake Centre, would the minister leading the government be good enough to go one step further and say that the house will go into committee of supply this evening? It is conceivable that the bills which stand between us and committee of supply may drag on, and we might not reach supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes; if it is the desire of the house we shall go into supply, and before adjournment of the house this evening we shall give ample time for discussion of the matter brought up by the hon. member for Lake Centre.

Mr. CASE: We have not a copy of the bill.

Mr. MAYHEW: An interim supply bill is never printed.

Section agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RAILWAY ACT

TRAINS OR CARS MOVING IN REVERSE OVER HIGHWAY CROSSINGS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 138, to amend the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Trains moving in reverse.

Mr. STIRLING: May I endeavour to persuade the minister to make a statement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The amendment sought in this bill is simple, and I think will commend itself to the house. It has to do with the movement of a locomotive and its tender operating in reverse. It happens from time to time that locomotives must move in reverse, and the section has always aimed at protecting the public when the locomotive is moving over unprotected crossings, by posting a man on the front of the tender. This amendment seeks to eliminate the placing of that man on the tender.

Perhaps I should give a brief history of the legislation having to do with this section.

The origin of section 310 was section 276 of the Railway Act, which was passed in 1901. The language of that section was very clear. It stipulated that in any city, town or village, on any train passing over or along a highway at rail level not headed by an engine moving forward in the ordinary manner, the company should station on that part of the train or of the tender, if that is in front, a person who should warn persons standing on or crossing or about to cross the track of such railway. The railway brotherhoods objected strenuously to the posting of that man. They did so for many reasons, one of them being that when the locomotive completed its run the engineman often was required to leave the engine, after being in a very warm temperature for hours, and come down on the tender in order to ride the tender back to the roundhouse. Over the years they objected strenuously to that. The various railway companies admitted that there was some foundation for the objections raised by the brotherhood and attempted to rectify the difficulty by having an amendment passed in 1910, which was chapter 50 of the statutes of Canada for that year. But that amendment gave a discretion to the board of railway commissioners, and that did not work out satisfactorily. It was not until 1917 that satisfaction apparently was obtained by eliminating the words, "or of the tender if that is in front" so that by chapter 37 of the statutes of 1917 it apparently became no longer necessary for a man to be posted on a tender when a train was moving backward. Perhaps here I should just read that section, because it is pertinent. Section 276 as enacted by chapter 37 of 1917 reads as follows:

> Whenever in any city, town or village, any train not headed by an engine is passing over or along a highway at rail level which is not adequately protected by gates or otherwise, the company shall station on that part of the train, which is then foremost, a person who shall warn persons standing on, or crossing, or about to cross the track of such railway.

The words "or of the tender, if that is in the front" were eliminated, so that it became no longer necessary to post a man on the tender. But following an accident which took place in the city of Hull the privy council placed an interpretation on this section which decided that a locomotive and a tender is a train. So by virtue of this interpretation it became necessary again to place a man on the tender. I say this because the intention of parliament in 1917 was quite clear. It was the intention then to do away with the posting of that man, but parliament's intention was interpreted in a different way by the privy council.

In order to meet the intention of parliament as enacted in 1917; in order to meet the wishes of the brotherhoods, of the railway association of Canada, this amendment is now sought; and it is framed in such a way that the words "or its tender" have now been added after the word "engine", the effect of this being that the legal interpretation of the word "engine" is now overcome, so that in the opinion of the law officers of the Department of Transport it will become no longer necessary to post a man on the front of a tender when the locomotive and its tender are moving in reverse.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the position if the locomotive and tender are shunting a train of three cars behind them? Does the man go on the end car?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. It is necessary for a man to be posted on the end of a number of cars if they are being pushed backwards by a locomotive and its tender. I said a moment ago that this legislation was requested by the joint legislative committee of the railway transportation brotherhoods. It has been endorsed by the railway association of Canada and approved by the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada. I should like to read an opinion of Sir Henry Drayton in which he covers the point fully. This was an opinion he gave prior to the enactment of the statute of 1917, when he said:

> In the opinion of the operating department—

That is of the board of railway commissioners.

> —a man on the tender when the engine leads the movement, although backing, serves no useful purpose. In the case of almost every engine, as a matter of fact, the engineer has at least as good if not a better view of the track in front of him as in the case of a front movement, a tender nearly always being shorter than the boiler and other engine works in front of the cab; and, in the case of a reverse movement, as a usual thing, there is no possibility of the view being obscured either by smoke or steam.
> In other words, it would appear that, if a man on the tender is necessary, a man is also necessary in the front of every locomotive operating over crossings.

Mr. STIRLING: What has become of the objection raised by the railway brotherhoods, that they did not desire their members to get out on the back in cold weather?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This meets the objection. This amendment to the Railway Act is being enacted to meet their objection.

Mr. STIRLING: How does it meet it?

Mr. CHEVRIER: By doing away with the necessity of posting a man on the tender of the train moving in reverse. That is what the amendment does.

Mr. COLDWELL: What protection is the public given in this regard?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The public does not need protection in this matter. The opinion given by Sir Henry Drayton, and that of the board of transport commissioners, is that locomotives are so long to-day that the engine man or the fireman who is in the cab of a locomotive has a much better view of objects crossing the highway than would a man posted down below at the foot of the tender.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is probably correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: What happens when a train is backing up, with the engine and tender probably a quarter of a mile away? Does the brakeman not have to be on the end of the car going forward?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; it is necessary to post a man on the rear of the train. The law remains the same in that respect as it was before. This has to do only with the tender, not with trains which might be in the front of the tender.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the circumstances set out in the act, the engine and tender if backing up would really be at the wrong end of the train.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: The engineer might be able to see just as well; however it was always my understanding that the forward brakeman was the one who stood on the front of the tender when it was backing up. I did not think the engineer or fireman did that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is what brought about the discussion in the matter. When the act was passed in 1917 the brakeman did not do it. Either the fireman or the engine man had to go down from the cab, and go out in front. Because of the protests of the brotherhoods, for a time the companies used yardmen who were doing work at the stations. They would jump on the front end of the tender. There was difficulty about that, and finally the decision was made to amend the section by doing away with the man altogether. It was not done by the brakeman.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was done by the forward brakeman.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, by the engine man or fireman.

Mr. STIRLING: It was done by the brakeman on the train, but not on the tender.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is my memory that the forward brakeman, who frequently rides in the engine, would get down and go to what would then be the front of the train, and warn the people to stand back. I am afraid if we eliminate the necessity of someone being on the so-called front of the train when it is backing up, with the long engines and long tenders now in use—some of the cylindrical water tanks are mammoth in size—the public will not have all the necessary protection required. Is the minister satisfied that there will be ample protection?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, and for more than one reason. In connection with an amendment of this nature it is customary to submit the suggestion to the board of transport commissioners. They have an operating branch which goes into these matters thoroughly, and I am informed they have approved this amendment. As far back at 1942, as a result of the demands of all parties concerned—the men and the railway association—an order in council was passed under the War Measures Act doing this very thing. It has been in effect now for at least three years.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are compelled to give ample warning with whistles and bells.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: Is there any limit to the speed at which a train is allowed to back up?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, there is a limit under the Railway Act. I do not know what it is, offhand, but I can find out.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope every consideration will be given by the board of transport commissioners and by the government to the elimination of level crossings. I have been a passenger on two trains which hit automobiles, and have seen something of the destruction caused. In one instance a priest and his driver were killed, and in the other a family were pitched out and had to be taken to the hospital. I do not know what happened to them afterwards. We have too many level crossings in Canada, particularly along the main lines of the railways. No matter how much protection we may give in circumstances such as are envisaged in the bill, we do not get to the root of the problem of level crossings. Most countries have endeavoured to get rid of them. During the period of unemployment before the war we were told that one of the projects which would receive consideration by the government elected in 1935 was the elimination of level crossings. I know of only two or three which were eliminated. Far too many of them are still in existence, for the safety of the public. These are different from the days when we had horses and buggies. Traffic moves quickly along the highways, and I take this opportunity to urge upon the government the necessity of making plans to eliminate as soon as possible the level crossing menace. I have in mind highways very close to Regina, where one drives down beside the railway and then makes a sudden turn to cross. One night while driving I saw what I thought was an automobile coming in the opposite direction. It turned out to be a train, and it was only by accelerating very quickly that I managed to get across. The train happened to be a flier, although I had thought it was an automobile on the other side of the track. I just managed to get across; otherwise I would not have been here to-day—and some people might have been thankful for it.

Mr. CHURCH: Who is asking for this legislation, anyway? Last Thursday evening I made reference to the large number of people who are killed on level crossings. A man should be on the engine tender, and I see no reason for making the change. Surely there is such a thing as public rights and safety. The people have just as much right on the highways as the railway companies, especially when the highways were built before the railways came along.

An application has been made before the board of transport commissioners for the building of a subway to eliminate the danger at the Jones avenue and Woodbine avenue crossings in the constituency I represent. That subway should be built, because there is ten times the amount of traffic at that point that there is farther down the line where there is a subway at Victoria park avenue. There is enough loss of life as it is without adding any further to the number of accidents that will happen if this amendment to relieve the railway companies of responsibility is passed. At present they are under the obligation to station a man to warn persons that an engine is moving. There is considerable traffic along the waterfront in Toronto and there is always danger in the moving of coal and other cars. The same thing applies to other parts of the city. Surely some consideration should be given to the public in an effort to prevent the terrible loss of life that occurs at level crossings. Only last week-end twenty-nine people were killed in eastern Canada from various causes, and it is horrible to see the way human life is being sacrificed at level crossings without considering the economic wastage, loss of employment and earnings which run into hundreds of millions. All this is quite apart from the human suffering that occurs.

This bill ought to go to the railway committee in order that the public may be protected. What is the use of having a committee when they never or seldom meet?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are meeting now.

Mr. CHURCH: I am not opposed to the railways because I believe they have certain rights and they do a great deal of good. In congested cities and towns and in many of the villages along the Lake Shore road there are many danger spots and we should not be relieving the railway companies of providing reasonable and proper methods of protection. In Toronto millions and millions of dollars were spent to build the viaduct. The waterfront roads were there long before the railways came, but the city paid one-third of the cost, something which they had no right to do, in order to provide the necessary protection. The cost to the taxpayers was between $13,000,000 and $14,000,000.

What has become of the policy of the government in connection with level crossings? A return was brought down this session showing that hardly any money is being spent on grade crossings. They used to spend from two to three millions a year on grade separation account, but this was permitted to become a dead letter during the war. This bill ought to go to the railway committee in order that a report may be made and municipalities and others who are aggrieved heard. They have had no notice of this bill. It may have been advertised in the Canada Gazette, but we should go slow in a matter like this when human life is involved. We are far behind Great Britain and the United States in connection with grade separation and the protection of the public. The time is coming when the public will stand for this no longer because so many of them are being killed.

Mr. BRYCE: I do not disagree with the matter because I believe he has given quite a lot of consideration to this matter, but I am a little reluctant to vote for a thing like this. I am not going to speak as a parliamentarian; I am going to speak as one who has built locomotives. A locomotive is built to go forward; it is streamlined for that purpose and the engineer can see only ahead with ease. It was expected that when the locomotive had to reverse there would be a lookout on the tender to guide the engineer.

The minister says that the brotherhoods have appealed for this. I know from my locomotive experience that there have been many men killed or maimed for life when a proper lookout was not maintained when the locomotive was just going to the roundhouse. As I understand the bill, when a train is reversing there will be the usual lookout, but this amendment applies only to an engine and tender.

Mr. CHEVRIER: An engine and a tender is a train.

Mr. BRYCE: But when there is a train attached there will be a proper lookout?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Oh, yes.

Mr. BRYCE: I think this is a mistake in the interests of safety.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The railway brotherhoods do not think so.

Mr. BRYCE: That may be so, but I would put the safety of the people before what the brotherhoods want. A lot of men have had to be out in the cold in order to protect the safety of this nation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. member for Peterborough West asked about the speed of trains moving in reverse. It is ten miles an hour across highways.

With reference to what was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Broadview, I would point out that I made a lengthy statement on the elimination of level crossings on the second reading of another bill to amend the Railway Act which was brought down by the hon. member for York West. At that time I dealt with the question of safety at these crossings.

I pointed out that a committee composed of certain members of the board of transport commissioners had been set up to go across this country to study grade crossings deemed to be dangerous, in order that they might be eliminated as a post-war project. That work is being done. While a report has not been made, the investigation is being carried on.

It has been said that no notice of this bill was given. It has been the law now for three years and there have been no accidents. It seems to have met with the general approval of all persons concerned.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are just defining the word "engine"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. With reference to the point raised that this might take away certain rights from the public, I would point out that it is the other way around if anything. The danger is to the man on the tender. Experience has shown that it is the man on the tender who finds himself in the more difficult position. He is there without any protection. Should a train moving in reverse strike a motorcar, he is more likely to be injured than the man at the wheel of the motorcar. I am not saying that there is no danger to the man in the motorcar, but that is the case.

I want to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this whole matter was thoroughly debated in 1917 and the house took from the then section 276 the words, "or of the tender if that is in front," because parliament then thought that the elimination of those words were necessary. Had it not been for the decision of the privy council which held otherwise in the case in 1922 to which I referred, there would be no necessity for this amendment. It is just to circumvent and do away with the interpretation by the privy council of section 310 as it stood that this amendment is thought necessary.

Mr. BRYCE: Perhaps I did not get my point across to the minister. When an engineer wants to move his engine in reverse he must put his head out in order to look back. He cannot sit in the position in which he usually sits to drive the engine and look back at the same time.

Mr. LOCKHART: The engineer has a tremendous responsibility if he is to be the lookout man when approaching a level crossing. I would remind the minister that both engines and tenders of to-day are much greater in length than they were fifteen or twenty years ago. Even in that short period there has been a great change in the construction of locomotives and tenders. There is increased danger of course in storms, fog and night driving when the view is obstructed to some extent. Does this relieve the railway of any responsibility for accidents at level crossings under those conditions?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The railway is relieved of the necessity of posting a man on the tender, but it is not relieved of legal liability if negligence can be shown. The common law right and the statute right still remain.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister is of the opinion that the public is as fully protected without the man being posted there?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think there is the slightest doubt about that.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister thinks the engineer can handle the situation just as well from a greater distance away?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do.

Mr. FRASER: The only protection the public has is the rate of speed of backing up?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is the ringing of the bell and the blowing of the whistle.

Mr. FRASER: You never hear them if it is raining and the windows are closed.

TRANSPORT STORES

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE ANNUAL MAXIMUM INVENTORY VALUE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill 139, to amend the Department of Transport Stores Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Inventory.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister give an explanation of the amendment? Just what are the advantages and the reasons for increasing the inventory from $1,250,000?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was just about to do that. The amendment is a simple one, to increase the inventory of stores at the end of each fiscal year from $1,250,000 to $1,600,000. When the Transport Stores Act was passed in 1937, section 6 provided:

> The inventory of stores at the end of each fiscal year after 1936-37 shall not exceed the amount of the stores inventory established as of April first, 1937, under section three of this act.

The amount of the stores inventory established on April 1, 1937, was $957,368. It was found that this section did not meet the situation, and in 1939 an amendment was sought from the house raising the amount to $1,250,000. The amendment now before the committee seeks to place the inventory at the end of each fiscal year at an amount not to exceed $1,600,000. The hon. gentleman asks the reasons for that. The reason chiefly is the expansion in the Department of Transport. The amount of inventory when the act was passed in 1937 was $950,000, and when one compares that with the inventory to-day, namely, $1,500,000, one gets an idea of the tremendous expansion in the stores from 1937 to date. The expansion in fact has been 45 per cent. It is due particularly to the expansion of the air service branch of the Department of Transport, radio and the like. It is due also, I must admit, to prices which, as the committee knows, have increased considerably since 1937. Unless the amendment is passed the Department of Transport will not be able to abide by the terms of the section.

Mr. MacNICOL: Just one question there. The minister said that the inventory to-day was approximately $1,500,000.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was in error. I wonder if I might change that. The inventory to-day is $1,374,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: That will do for the purposes of what I have to say. I can easily understand why it might be up from $1,250,000 to $1,375,000 approximately. But is there no control to prevent those in charge of purchasing from exceeding the amount of $1,250,000 until it is now $1,375,000? I can appreciate the reasons for the increase, and that makes me ask this question. The inventory at the moment is $1,375,000 and the amendment asks for an expansion of another $225,000. It is quite conceivable that even this amount will be passed shortly and that another amendment will be necessary providing for a further increase.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The only reason I can give for the increase is one of expansion. In 1939 there were not the number of divisions that there are now. Civil aviation in 1939 did not have the stores it has to-day. There is a difference between purchases and stores. The stores which we have in the Department of Transport at the end of each fiscal year are in the canal division, marine division, civil aviation, meteorological and printing and stationery divisions of the Department of Transport. Each of these divisions has increased, but none of them has increased with the celerity that civil aviation and radio have, and it is because of the expansions in these divisions that it is thought necessary to increase the inventory at the end of each fiscal year.

Mr. FRASER: It is mostly price that has accounted for the increase?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. That is just one factor. It is mostly expansion.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister give the committee a statement as to the inventory of stores at the conclusion of the last fiscal year, so that we may have some basis of actual comparison with the figure now sought?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. In order that the hon. gentleman may get the figures as I have them, on April 1, 1937, the inventory of stores was $957,000—I am not giving odd dollars and cents. To-day, by which I mean April 1, 1946, the inventory was $1,374,000 or an increase of 45 per cent.

Mr. FLEMING: Has that increase been a steady ascent in the years between 1937 and 1946?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Fairly.

Mr. FLEMING: Perhaps the minister will say if it was higher at any time than $1,374,000, or does that represent the peak at the conclusion of the fiscal year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That represents the peak at the conclusion of the fiscal year 1946.

Mr. FLEMING: I did not make my question clear. Does this represent the peak among these years for the inventory at the conclusion of a fiscal year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: My recollection is no, that it does not, that at one time it was higher than the $1,374,000, but still under the $1,600,000 which we require here.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister say something further with reference to this expansion? He has said in general terms there has been an expansion, particularly in connection with civil aviation. Would he be a little more specific and indicate what this expansion of stores consisted of? What relation has it, for instance, to Trans-Canada Air Lines? Is any portion of this inventory related to expansion in operation of Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. During the past few years the increases, as I told the hon. member for Davenport, have been confined chiefly to air services, and in air services particularly to radio and aviation materials. The table I have before me shows that the increase has been far more rapid in the meteorological and aviation divisions than in the others. The other divisions of transport have remained pretty much static. There has been a small increase but nothing to worry about. In the others the increase has been more rapid. Future civil aviation requirements are difficult to forecast. From what we know of the value of stores in aviation to-day it is felt that all this increase will ultimately be required.

Mr. CHURCH: Would the minister say what was the inventory value one year before the war? As he knows, a whole lot of dilapidated stuff and junk is kept; I have seen it in yards throughout the system. Did the minister in drafting this bill have the appraisals; and what was the book value, the market value, the par value? There will be an inventory value on the books of approximately $1,600,000. Has the minister a par value and a book value of his inventory, too; are the stores replaced, and is a definite sum set aside each year in connection with this value, because it is largely a bookkeeping item? As we know, the Department of Transport has not been spending an awful lot of money during the war in this branch of its work.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman asks what the value was in some year during the war. I cannot tell the hon. member. The only values I have are those in 1937 and those of to-day. But I can get the information for him. So far as par value is concerned, there is no such thing, but there is a book value, and I shall be glad to get that for him.

Mr. COCKERAM: Will the minister tell us how much of these stores at the end of April were expendable, and what was the amount of saleable goods; what are expendable by the department and what are saleable to the services?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are all saleable. They can all be used and sold; there is no question about that; and as far as their expendability is concerned they are there in our stores to be used. For instance, we have seven or eight marine agencies all across Canada; one of these marine agencies is at Prescott; one is at Saint John; one is at Quebec; and the stores are there to be used by various branches of the marine agency from time to time. They are expendable at any time.

Mr. FLEMING: What would happen if the inventory of stores at the conclusion of a fiscal year exceeded the limit fixed by the statute?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is not anticipated that that position will arise, in view of the statement which I gave the committee a moment ago, because the rise has been gradual from 1937 to 1946. Even if it did rise, it could only rise in the same proportion, and this amendment relating to a maximum of $1,600,000 will certainly keep it within the confines of the act. Later, we can seek another amendment from parliament if such should be necessary. The only thing I can do is to take the opinion of the officers of my department who say that this is ample for the time being and within the next few years.

Mr. COCKERAM: They have not exceeded the limit in the past?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; the limit has never been exceeded.

Mr. COCKERAM: Right now?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. Perhaps I should have told the committee that by virtue of P.C. 2589 of April 1, 1943, the inventory of stores was extended to $1,500,000, and that was then the financial limitation put upon the stores. So that at no time was the amount exceeded.

Mr. FRASER: With this act you can exceed it at any time by putting through an order in council?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. This act is simply giving statutory effect to what was done by order in council by virtue of the War Measures Act; and I need not tell my hon. friend that he would be the first to object strenuously if we attempted to hoist the inventory of stores by virtue of the War Measures Act, at any time. That is exactly what we do not want to do.

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand that at any time during a fiscal year the total amount might exceed this figure but it must be reduced to that at the end of a fiscal year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It cannot exceed this figure.

Mr. STIRLING: This deals with the end of a fiscal year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right. At the end of a fiscal year it cannot, if this bill passes, exceed $1,600,000.

Mr. STIRLING: It might have been higher than that during the fiscal year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It was not, at any time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Suppose there is an excess of that amount; do you return these stores? Let us presume that at the end of the year the inventory was $1,700,000. What machinery has the minister to take care of a situation of that kind?

Mr. CHEVRIER: We could not return the stores because they are operating stores; they are used, but we do not anticipate that that will ever arise. It has never happened since this act has been in force, since 1937.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There may be contingencies, and you should be prepared for that, I should think.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ACQUISITION OF MANITOBA RAILWAY

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of bill No. 194, respecting Canadian National Railways and the acquisition of the Manitoba railway.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Assignment of option.

Mr. CHEVRIER: When the house gave first reading to this bill I said that its object was to authorize the Canadian National Railways to purchase the railway and undertaking of the Manitoba Railway company. I went on to explain that in 1901 the Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway company, the Winnipeg Transfer Railway company, the Portage and Northwestern Railway company and the Waskada and Northeastern Railway company leased to Her Majesty the Queen in the right of the province of Manitoba what was then known as the Manitoba Railway company for a period of 999 years, giving further in the lease an option to purchase the railway at any time during the currency of the lease for $7,000,000. Later, that lease was assigned by the province of Manitoba to the Canadian Northern Railway company. In 1901 the Canadian Northern Railway company came to parliament and obtained the authority to purchase the assignment of the lease, the railway and its undertaking and also the right to take up the option of $7,000,000. The Canadian Northern assigned its lease, and later, the Canadian Northern became a part of the Canadian National Railways, and what the Canadian National Railways seeks now is the purchase of the Manitoba railway.

The lease provides that for the first ten years the annual rental shall be $210,000; the second ten years, $225,000; the third ten years, $275,000, and the remaining period, $300,000. The Canadian National Railways has been paying that rental, but it now finds—

Mr. MacNICOL: At which rate?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The last rate mentioned, namely, $300,000. By virtue of refinancing it finds it can borrow the money at an attractive rate of interest and save at least $90,000 a year. It has therefore sought the authority of parliament to purchase the railway.

The bill is very simple, and may be divided into four parts. First of all, it provides for the assignment of the option in accordance with the terms of the act which was passed by parliament in 1901. Second, it provides for the sale and acquisition of the railway and its undertaking, including certain stock. Third, it provides for clear title, as in any purchase; and finally, it provides for the method of effecting the transfer. That method may be subdivided into three parts. First, the Canadian National Railways may accept the purchase by means of an ordinary deed or conveyance or document under seal as one private individual would from another; or it may proceed again by expropriation as it does normally under section 17 of the Canadian National Railways Act; or it may proceed by deposit of certain plans in the land titles office of Manitoba.

The schedule to the bill provides for the length of line which is being purchased, which amounts to 353·17 miles. It provides for the purchase of seven branches of the Manitoba railway which are known as the Red River Valley railway, the Hope Farm branch, the Morris-Brandon branch, the Souris River branch, the Portage la Prairie branch, the Lake branch and the Winnipeg Transfer branch; all of which totalled together make 353·17 miles.

As the committee knows, a matter such as this cannot be proceeded with unless it has the approval of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. The board of directors did give this matter consideration and by resolution approved the purchase of the railway as an excellent thing for it, first so far as refinancing was concerned and, second, so far as reduction of its fixed charges was concerned. Next, it was made the subject of discussion in the annual budget of the Canadian National Railways, and the railways and shipping committee then had an opportunity of going into this purchase. In its budget for 1946 the Canadian National Railways did provide for the sum of $7,000,000 to be set aside for this purchase. The budget of the railway for 1946 has been approved by the committee on railways and shipping.

Finally, while it may not be necessary for the railway to come to parliament for the approval of this purchase, it is felt that in a matter of this kind it is far better to obtain the best possible title that can be obtained, namely, one from parliament by an act of parliament, than by accepting a deed or by filing plans under the Expropriation Act, or by simply filing ordinary plans as set out in the last part of section 4. I think I have covered generally what I intended to say.

Mr. CHURCH: This particular bill has been before the country for a great many years. I object to a public ownership body, such as the Canadian National Railways, assuming all these dead-ends. The Canadian National Railways have taken over many of these provincial roads that were practically bankrupt. Now you are going to pay $7,000,000 for this one, through the purchase of stock. Some hon. members will remember the Drayton-Acworth report of 1917. The government of the day appointed a royal commission consisting of Mr. Acworth, an eminent British engineer; Sir Henry Drayton, chairman of the railway commission, and, I think, Mr. Smith, who was then president of the New York Central. They reported on the railway situation in Canada, and they found that the growth of the three transcontinental railways had far outstripped the growth of population; that there was overbuilding, and that sort of thing, and as a result the government had to go in and save private ownership, which had failed. This was done by forming the Canadian National Railways, so called, which was supposed to be a public ownership venture.

I object to the Canadian National being loaded up with these dead-ends of provincial railways in almost every province across Canada. In this case they say the property is to be conveyed free of encumbrance, and the transfer is to be effected through a straight stock deal between the vendor and the vendee. The Drayton report condemned this way of doing things. In the first place, the railway commission, now the board of transport commissioners, should have been asked to report on this propostion before anything of the kind should be recommended to this house. Then we have a committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. What are they doing? They should be looking into this question. We have another committee on railways and shipping. I can find nothing in their report about this particular railway. You know the way Mackenzie and Mann acted out west. Theirs was a political railway first, last and all the time. They came to this parliament and got tens of millions of dollars guaranteed by the government, though there was no business for their railway because it was paralleled by two others. We had a carnival of building, of reckless waste and all that kind of thing, which cost the country a tremendous sum of money.

As I understand it, this provincial railway was leased to the Canadian Northern in 1901 for some $300,000 a year. Now we have a bill before parliament to validate all the mistakes made in that particular province in regard to railways, duplication, waste of all kinds and all the rest of it. That was a sorry day for the people of this country. They are paying for it yet in high railway freight and passenger rates. We had the overcapitalization and overbuilding of railways, with three where one would have done with branch lines running off the main line. These railway magnates went into almost every province and, then, when they faced bankruptcy in 1917 the government was compelled to take over the railways. Public ownership is not to blame in this case; this shows the evils of private ownership. I repeat that in my opinion the board of transport commissioners should be asked to report on this matter before we recommend a deal like this, because for long enough the Canadian National has been loaded up with these dead, bankrupt provincial railways and these dead-ends.

Mr. BROOKS: I quite agree with the hon. member for Broadview that we should be very careful before taking over too many miles of railway in this country. We all remember that before the war our two great railways were going behind at the rate of thirty to forty million dollars a year. During the war, of course, they paid their way and did a splendid job; but in these days, when we have transportation by truck, bus and other methods, we can see that the railways may not do as well in the future as they have done in the past. So that we may find ourselves carrying a heavier burden than we carried previous to the war. The hon. member for Broadview mentioned roads that have been taken over in other provinces. I know of lines that have been taken over by the Canadian National that were simply streaks of rust. I believe the committee should be told by the minister whether this is a paying proposition and what the prospects are for the future. I think we should know whether or not, to use a slang expression, the Canadian National are being sold a lemon.

I do not think I have anything further to say. During the war the railway line between Moncton and Halifax was so burdened with traffic that it was almost impossible to operate it efficiently. For a good many years they have been asking for a double track from Moncton to Halifax and from Moncton to Sydney but we could never find money for this purpose, though I think it is generally recognized as being very necessary. So I suggest to the minister that before we go on and buy up a lot of old, abandoned railways and branch lines throughout the country we spend some money in places where it is badly needed.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I did not make myself clear, or else hon. members who have spoken are under a misapprehension. It is said that we should not take over this road, and that we should not take over old, abandoned railways. That is not what we are doing. We have this railway now whether we like it or not. We have it by virtue of a lease for 999 years, and the Canadian National has been paying rent at the rate of $300,000 a year. The hon. member for Broadview says that this is bad business, that it is not a paying proposition. I say to him that it is a paying proposition if we can reduce the annual rental which must be paid by the Canadian National from $300,000 to $210,000. We shall save $90,000 a year. There can be no doubt that this is an excellent piece of business from the point of view of both the railway and the public.

Mr. BROOKS: Is the railway paying?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It does not matter whether it is paying or not; this bill has absolutely nothing to do with that. I say that because it is a necessary part of the national system whether it pays or does not pay. We are bound for 999 years. We can continue paying rent at the rate of $300,000 a year, but if we can save $90,000 a year, why not do so? That is the only object of this bill. This is not the purchase of an old, abandoned railway. This is a going concern which is operating into the city of Winnipeg from Brandon, from Portage la Prairie, from the Souris valley, from the international boundary at Emerson and from Hope Farm.

Mr. BROOKS: What does the minister mean when he says it is a going concern? A moment ago he told us it was not paying.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Manitoba railway is in operation. It was operated first by the Canadian Northern, from 1901 until the Canadian Northern became part of the Canadian National. It is now part of the Canadian National Railways whether the committee likes it or not, so that I can see no merit in the argument raised by the two hon. gentlemen.

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps the minister has given this information already, but could he tell the committee briefly how this lease happened to be made? Who were the contracting parties? Who was so provident on behalf of the dominion as to enter into a 999 year lease?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have already done that, but perhaps briefly I could repeat what I said, for the benefit of the hon. member. I stated at the outset of my remarks that the four railway companies, whose names I then gave, had leased what was then known as the Manitoba Railway company, its line and undertaking, to Her Majesty the Queen in the right of the province of Manitoba for 999 years at a rental of $225,000 for the first ten years, $250,000 for the next ten years, $275,000 for the following ten years, and $300,000 for the remainder of the period.

There was contained in that lease a clause under which the railway could be purchased for the sum of $7 million during any time the lease remained unexpired. The province of Manitoba assigned the lease to the Canadian Northern. The Canadian Northern became part of the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National Railways have been paying rent for the railway and its undertaking over a number of years at the rate of $300,000 a year.

This enactment is sought, not because it is necessary to come to parliament, but because it is felt that a matter of this kind should receive from parliament its endorsation by way of an act of parliament. The saving which will be brought about through this amounts to $90,000 a year.

Mr. MacNICOL: How is that saving brought about?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The annual rental for the unexpired term of the 999 years is $300,000 a year. The Canadian National Railways will purchase this line for $7 million. They can borrow the $7 million at a rate of three per cent, which will mean an annual interest of $210,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the Canadian National Railways own it now, why have they been paying that money?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They own the unexpired term of the lease, by way of assignment.

Mr. MacNICOL: To whom do they pay $300,000 a year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They pay $300,000 a year to the Manitoba Railway company, which is a subsidiary of the Northern Pacific.

Mr. FLEMING: Under the lease for 999 years I take it the taxes were payable by the lessee?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should think so, yes.

Mr. FLEMING: That is usually so in these cases.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed it is in this one.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that the Canadian National Railways are responsible for making good on the covenant of the lessee to pay $300,000 per annum.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. McKAY: May we have a report as to what maintenance has been established, and if any replacements have been made? How many terminals are involved? As nearly as I can figure, the cost of the railway runs about $23,000 per operating mile; but if terminals are involved, that is a different matter.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The railway is in good condition. Up until December 31, 1945, the Canadian National Railways had expended $966,001, or almost a million dollars by way of capital expenditure.

Answering the second part of the hon. member's question, I would point out that there are several branches. It consists of 353·17 miles, and is made up of what is known as the Red River Valley railway, which extends from Winnipeg to the international boundary line at Emerson. It consists, further, of the Hope Farm branch, which extends from mile 47·01 to what is known as Hope Farm. It consists, further, of the Morris-Brandon branch, extending from the town of Morris to the town of Brandon; it consists of the Souris River branch, which extends from Hartney to Belmont.

Mr. MacNICOL: All these are connected with the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; it consists, further, of the Lake branch, from Portage la Prairie to Delta; and further, of the Winnipeg Transfer railway, which is in the city of Winnipeg, and which is a small line connecting the Canadian National Railways with the Canadian Pacific Railway in that city, for a distance of 1·21 miles.

Mr. McKAY: I was more interested in the terminals involved than in the various branches. Are there any roundhouses or shops involved?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know the answer to that question.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are there any other agreements of this description made with the railways?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Does the hon. member mean the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. COLDWELL: One can scarcely understand how an agreement of this kind, for almost a thousand years, could be made, one which commits this country for 999 years, in the sum of nearly three hundred millions of dollars. The bill before us, which saves $90,000 a year, will save in the remaining length of time between eighty-five and eighty-six millions of dollars. Surely leases of this description are almost an insult to the intelligence of parliament.

I agree that the Canadian National Railways were loaded up with a lot of lines; and I have always felt that if we want to be fair to the national system we should examine its capital structure and see to it that we remove from it a load which it is unfair for the railway to carry, especially in view of deals of this description made in the past. In days gone by, always to the disadvantage of the Canadian National Railways, when making comparisons with the Canadian Pacific Railway company, reference has been made to the tremendous capitalization of the national system. The result was that it was impossible to make a fair comparison between the two systems.

I wonder if there are any more of these improvident agreements. A lease of this description almost staggers the imagination. Just imagine committing a country to pay nearly three hundred millions of dollars over a period of 999 years! I congratulate the company and the minister for coming to us and suggesting that the country should save between eighty-five and eighty-six millions in the remaining period of time, and stretching to a time when most of us will not be here to endure the heat of a June afternoon in the House of Commons.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why did the railway company not bring in a bill like this years ago? It is quite clear that if everything is according to Hoyle, as it appears to be, it is a good bill for the country.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is.

Mr. MacNICOL: Only two years ago the house voted a billion dollars to the Canadian National Railways by way of wiping off debt that the railways owed the country. This bill looks like something from which the country will derive some good.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no question about it. The answer is that they could not borrow money at three per cent. That is why the bill was not brought in sooner.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised a pertinent point when he said that this almost insults the intelligence of parliament.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not mean the bill; I was referring to a deal of this description.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Let me point out that parliament gave its approval in 1901 to this very lease, by virtue of chapter 53 of the revised statutes of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not here then.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were the members all sober? It was still a Liberal government.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Parliaments change from time to time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister in his practice ever heard of a lease that was to run for 999 years, or has he heard any other legal lights speak of such a lease?

Mr. STIRLING: There are plenty of them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I shall have to answer yes to that. I have heard of a number of such leases.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING RATES OF INTEREST

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Soldier Settlement Act to provide that a soldier settler within the provisions of the act who served in world war II who has not abandoned his land and whose agreement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned, and a soldier settler who did not serve in world war II who has not abandoned his land and whose agreement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned, shall be charged in the case of the soldier settler of world war II a rate of interest of three and one-half per centum per annum in respect of his agreement made under the act after the standard date in the year 1942 or the date of his enlistment whichever is the earlier and in the case of a soldier settler who did not serve in world war II a rate of interest of three and one-half per centum per annum after the standard date in the year 1944.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, for a number of years past we have heard a lot about the sanctity of contracts, but in my opinion the contract being amended by the bill to be founded on this resolution is one of the most flagrant impositions that has been inflicted upon any group of people in Canada for quite a long number of years. I am not going to take the trouble to read the resolution, because in my opinion it should never have been placed on the order paper. It would have been much better if the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) and the government had seen fit to place on the order paper a resolution to precede a bill that would give the veterans of world war I who held contracts with the soldier settlement board on March 31, 1944, clear titles to their land. I have said what I have said, and I am going to say what I intend to say before this passes because of a solemn pledge that was made by the Prime Minister of Canada in 1917 to the members of the Canadian expeditionary force. I have placed this on the record before but I am going to do so again. One should always have a foundation for any case he wants to put forward, and for that reason I am placing this on the record once again. Sir Robert Borden had this to say:

You are men actually facing the enemy day and night. You are suffering greatly from fatigue, over-strain, and lack of rest. The marvel of it is that men could undergo such a strain without breaking; but you have never yet broken, and history will appreciate that in days to come.

You men are about to enter one of the most serious engagements that ever faced the Canadian corps. I cannot, at this moment, give any information as to where this attack will be staged, whether it be successful or not, it is to be borne in mind that it will not be an easy success . . . We feel confident that you will succeed where others failed; for you have never yet failed in anything you have set your hand to, as a Canadian corps.

He then went on to make certain promises in the name of this country, promises which the government of that day and this government as its successors should not hesitate to make good. However, as I see things at the present time, that is not being done. Sir Robert Borden continued:

You can go into this action feeling assured of this, and as the head of the government, I give you this assurance; that you need have no fear that the government and the country will fail to show just appreciation of your service to the country and empire in what you are about to do and what you have already done.

The government and the country will consider it their first duty to see that a proper appreciation of your effort and of your courage is brought to the notice of the people at home, and it will always be our endeavour to so guide the attitude of public opinion, that the country will support the government to prove to the returned man its just and due appreciation of the inestimable value of the services rendered to the country and empire; and that no man, whether he goes back or whether he remains in Flanders, will have just cause to reproach the government for having broken with the men who won and the men who died.

We all know that after the first great war the government of the day decided to do something for veterans who wanted to settle on the land, but from our experience and the figures I have produced here we find that they were trying to do the men who settled on the land for something. On a number of occasions we have discussed this matter in the house and I am going to place some figures on the record. I hope hon. members will not concur in the report of the special committee which was set up to deal with veterans affairs, in which report they refused to recommend clear titles. I hope they will give expression to their own honest opinions, that is, that this resolution which I shall read in a short time will be assented to and that these old settlers will be given clear title to their land.

After quite a selection had been made, the total number of settlers placed by the soldier settlement board turned out to be 25,017. The total amount advanced by way of credit to those 25,017 settlers was $109,034,331. The rate of interest charged was five per cent on current accounts and seven per cent on arrears. Perhaps I should stop here to comment on charging veterans of great war I or any other veterans an interest rate of five per cent. If we want to use it we have the sole right to issue credit on our own account, so why should we go to some private institution and pay them a rate of interest which compels us to charge the veterans who settled under the old soldier settlement board, or those veterans who are settling under the Veterans Land Act, these high rates of interest? Five per cent is a steal from these veterans of great war I, and seven per cent on arrears is a still greater steal. This country should not tolerate steals of that kind.

The total amount of principal repaid at the end of March, 1944, was $50,507,493.20. I am dealing only with what was paid by soldier settlers; I am not taking into consideration the amounts paid by civilian purchasers to whom the land was sold at a much lower price than it was contracted for by the veteran settlers after they either had decided on their own accord to get off the land or were kicked off by the administration. The total interest paid was $25,381,060.13, making a total of $75,888,553.33.

I should like to refer to the conditions under which these men tried to get along. Mistakes were made in settling these men and live stock and equipment were purchased at very high prices. Because the government policy did not provide for costs of production, prices of agricultural products dropped to a very low level. The government has seen fit from time to time to cancel certain amounts of these contracts and the total cancellation of principal amounted to $24,867,637.64. Interest cancellations amounted to $19,234,239.77, making a total of cancellations of $44,101,877.41.

Then we come to the cost of administration. Somebody has been trying to put across the idea that the cost of administration runs to only $100,000 a year, but the figures brought down in the house showed that the cost of administration up to the end of March, 1944, was $27,340,763.64. That is the cost of administration of the soldier settlement part only of this board from the inception of the scheme. That works out to an average annual cost of $1,100,000 for administration.

Going a little farther, we find that at the end of March, 1944, the total amount outstanding so far as the soldier settlers were concerned was $7,715,954.01. The total amount of arrears at that time was $1,054,269.30—I am still speaking only of the soldier settlement part of the programme. At that time 6,153 soldier settlers remained on the land; that is approximately 25 per cent of the original number. The average original amount of credit advanced to the settlers was $4,358.40. The average balance of debt of the settlers on March 31, 1944, was $1,254. That is equal to 29 per cent of the original amount of credit advanced.

The number who acquired title during that 25-year period was 4,130, or approximately 16 per cent of the original settlers who made contracts with the government. I think there are in this house a number of business men; and I am going to ask any one of them, even the poorest business man in the house, whether that is a good business proposition and whether under those conditions they would force these settlers to continue to carry on, persecuting still further these soldier settlers of world war I.

Before going farther, may I state that the settlers who are now being settled under the Veterans Land Act, taking advantage of the full amount of the grant and engaging in full-time farming, receive $2,320 by way of grant. This amounts to 39 per cent of the total credit extended.

The settlers I have spoken of owe at the present time only 29 per cent of their original credit. Those of us who have been in the house for some little time realize that the settlers have been trying to do something for themselves for a long time. Back in 1936, in Lloydminster, which is within thirty miles of my home, the soldier settlers' union was formed; and in 1938, as a result of their work, a brief was presented by the union to the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, of which I hold a copy in my hand. On the outside cover I find this:

To the Honourable the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada

Honourable Sirs,

In presenting this brief, our endeavour has been to draw attention to our unavailing efforts to bring about a conference between government officials and representatives of returned men on the land, which will have as its result the permanent solution of the soldier settlement problem without imposing on the taxpayer of this country further large expenditures, as occasioned in the past by abortive relief measures.

We submit that the evidence contained herein will be found, by any impartial investigation, to be conclusive in support of their claims, and we respectfully request that they be given every consideration by the government, which will lead to a conference at which all soldier organizations interested in soldier settlement be fully represented to bring about a permanent solution to the soldier settlement problem, based on the recommendations of the soldier settlers' union convention, 1936, and the resolution passed at the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion, 1936.

Most respectfully yours,

R. J. Stewart, President,
H. G. Mitchell, Vice-President,
H. S. Packman, General Secretary,
Soldier Settlers' Union.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Fair.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FAIR: When the house took recess at six o'clock I had just stated that for a number of years the old soldier settlers have been making attempts in vain to have something worth while done to relieve them of the load of debt which was placed upon them by the different governments since the end of the first great war. I also placed on record the introduction to a brief which was presented to the Senate and the House of Commons by the soldier settlers' union away back in January, 1938. Nothing of course was done at that time, and the settlers were disappointed then as they have been disappointed ever since. In 1939 the second great war broke out. At that time a number of old settlers were still badly in arrears, and the soldier settlement board, realizing that sooner or later it would probably be called upon to perform another duty, in the way of settling another group of veterans after the war which began in 1939 was concluded, decided that they had better start in and clean up the mess, get rid of some of the land and also get rid of some of the settlers on the land who were not able to make their payments.

Some people do not believe that this government and previous governments have taken any action to dispossess old veterans of the first great war; but the record shows that, from 1930 to 1942 inclusive, 1,006 settlers signed quit-claim deeds, and during the same period nearly 1,000 were served with thirty-day notices to get off or pay up. In most cases the settlers had to get off, because they did not have the wherewithal to pay up. We have been told that in the case of those who signed quit-claim deeds the action was as a rule taken voluntarily, but I believe that anyone who takes the trouble to investigate many of these cases will find that plenty of pressure was applied to make these men sign quit-claim deeds. That was common knowledge at the time. After the last war broke out, many of these old settlers sent their sons and daughters overseas to do the fighting so that Canada could continue to live in peace and prosperity, while they themselves were producing food, working as many as sixteen hours a day in food production; yet between April 1, 1942, and March 31, 1943, the board had 253 settlers sign quit-claim deeds, and 108 settlers were served with thirty-day notices to get off or pay up. This is the treatment which was handed out to men who, after having done their best, in many cases were not able to make good, not because of conditions over which they had any control but because of prices they had to pay at the beginning and because of an agricultural policy which was not in the interests of the producers. As a result these same veterans were thrown out in the gutter who went over between 1914 and 1918 and helped to keep Canada on the map under the union jack.

Then again we find that after the second world war broke out, numbers of these settlers who were in sufficiently good health to serve in that war found themselves under such a load of debt that they were not able to make a living for their wives and families, and decided to enlist a second time and offer their lives if needs be as a sacrifice. The government, finding that these men had left and that in some cases the land was not being farmed properly, and finding that in some cases it was so poor that it could not produce enough to pay the taxes and accrued interest, passed, on the advice of the former minister of mines and resources under whose direction the soldier settlement board was then administered, an order in council so that the interests of the board would be protected. The order in council was passed on March 19, 1941, and is known as P.C. 138-1936. It had the effect of taking away the very bread and butter from the wives and families of the veterans of the first great war, veterans who were not able to keep up their payments and who had gone overseas to fight again. Lest there should be any misunderstanding I am going to read the effective part of the order in council. It is as follows:

> Accordingly the board recommend that notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any of the regulations providing for payment of dependents' or marriage allowance in respect of dependents of members of the Canadian armed forces, that in all cases where the dependents of an enlisted person continue to occupy the farm for which such person is indebted to the director of soldier settlement and in respect of which the contract terms are not otherwise satisfactorily provided for, there may be deducted from the dependents' or marriage allowance amounts sufficient to provide for payment of taxes levied by the local taxing authority in respect of the property in question and interest accruing annually on indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement, such deductions to be made monthly and in no case to exceed $20 per month except with the consent of the dependents concerned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is a shame. He ought to be ashamed of himself.

Mr. FAIR: That is the stand taken by this government, the government which claims credit for the good things it is doing for the veterans of this war. What has it done for the veterans of the first great war? Remember that the men for whom I am speaking are also veterans of this war; that is, those who were lucky enough to come back. The government, in order to satisfy the treasury board, perhaps, and our monetary greed, takes away from the wives and families of those men who were over there fighting, the wherewithal which was provided by the government in order that these wives and families might live at least in decency while their men were away. Very fine treatment, indeed!

Again, a little later on we find that another order in council was passed whereby those settlers who were still in debt could make application to a board which was set up to have the terms of their agreement extended for another twenty years and also to have their indebtedness reduced. What is the effect of that? In the first instance the contract was for twenty-five years, and with the additional twenty years it means forty-five years that the settler must serve and pay the soldier settlement board a price far in excess of the value of the land and equipment he received. He has the opportunity to do that for the sake of what? That is praise for having gone over and fought in the first and second great wars. It is a shame that any government should impose a penalty of that kind on its soldiers.

Knowing these conditions, the soldier settlers could not carry on because our wheat prices until August, 1942, were down to seventy cents a bushel, f.o.b. Fort William, which is below fifty cents on the farm in western Canada. This is a price which did not exist previously except for a short time in the depths of the depression. The soldier settlers could not carry on. In April, 1943, they met at Saskatoon to try to do something for themselves. In November, 1943, they held another meeting at Saskatooon and at that time they decided to circulate a petition to have clear titles granted. No expenses were incurred in the circulation of that petition so far as the government was concerned. Veteran settlers and civilians alike took copies of the petition, drove around the country over snow-blocked roads, obtained signatures to the petition and at the same time collected dimes and nickels from people in order that a delegation might come to Ottawa to present the petition.

On May 23, 1944, a delegation of nine representatives from that organization presented a brief to six members of the cabinet here in Ottawa, presided over by the then minister of mines and resources, who is now in another place enjoying all the cream which can be provided for him. These members were cordially received, and after having been given a fine reception and told that their request would receive sympathetic consideration the men went home feeling that at last they were going to have some justice meted out to them. I may say that was before the election took place. We expected an election that fall, and honeyed words were handed out at the time. The house was in session until August of that year, and no report was made to the house by the responsible minister. But some of us had hardly got home when an announcement came over the radio and was issued in the press that the government would not grant this request. At the time the delegation came to Ottawa we found that the director of the soldier settlement board had inserted in The Legionary—I think with the permission and perhaps on the instructions of the then minister of mines and resources—a report dealing with these clear titles, setting out in detail one side of the case, which, I might say, has been torn to ribbons in this house since that time. The concluding paragraph of his remarks reads as follows: The gentleman to whom I am refering is none other than Mr. Murchison, the director of the soldier settlement board. He said:

> In conclusion I am authorized to say that the proposal is not deemed to be in the public interest and, consequently, it is not being entertained by the government. Therefore, the best advice I can offer to the soldier settlers concerned is to get into step with those who manifestly prefer securing title to their farms by complying with the terms of their agreements.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Who is he?

Mr. FAIR: He is the director.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I thought he was a Hitler.

Mr. FAIR: The man with whom the new veterans will have to deal unless something necessary is done.

Then, feeling that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not know of the treatment which was being handed out to these old veterans, I made a special trip to Ottawa and visited the Prime Minister early in October, 1944. The Prime Minister listened carefully to what I had to say. I left a copy of the case with him, and he told me then that within a week or so the new Department of Veterans Affairs would be set up headed by the present Minister of Veterans Affairs and that he would turn the matter over to him. Having had conversation with the present Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), I felt that at last we were going to get a square deal for the old veterans. The department was set up and no clear titles were forthcoming. Therefore, in March, 1945, the president and secretary of the soldier settlers' association accompanied me to Ottawa. We visited the Minister of Veterans Affairs and had quite a long talk with him. We presented our case and he listened attentively. Then he gave us objections which were prepared for him, I believe, by the director because the words of the director were in the statement of the minister. They were to the effect that payments and pre-payments were being made; that if titles were granted to old soldiers the new veterans would not pay, and so forth. Payments and pre-payments were being made for a great many reasons. The sons and daughters of these old settlers had gone overseas. Some of them had gone to work in war factories. Some of them were receiving dependents' allowances on account of their sons and daughters who had enlisted. As a result of pressure, and plenty of it, which was being put on by the board, these old soldiers turned in every penny they could get hold of. As a result payments were coming in freely, and that is the way things were going. We were told that if titles were granted to the old soldiers the new soldiers would not pay. I wish to advise the government now that if they impose on the new veterans conditions such as were imposed on the old veterans we shall have a revolution in this country before long. Make no mistake about that. They may blame the communists for it, too, but they are the ones who will be to blame if these conditions occur once more.

Then we went to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in connection with the same request, and he also told us that payments were coming in freely, and that he believed in the sanctity of contracts. All these old veterans believe in the sanctity of contracts and they proved it by going overseas to fight for the country which is giving them their living. They came back and they were sold land, live stock and equipment at prices far in excess of their value. In my home district one half-section was sold by a father to his son for $8,000 at a time when prevailing prices of land in the territory were $1,000 to $1,200 for a quarter section. Needless to say, that land is not yet paid for.

When the government made the contract with these old settlers it was made on the basis of prices which existed at that time. We might say that during the years after the war wheat went up to $2.50 to $3 a bushel. Later, we find that the settlers were compelled to pay their debts when wheat went down as low as 38½ cents at Wininpeg. That meant a breaking of the contract by the government. When they sold land, equipment and live stock to these men they should have seen to it that prices were upheld. Proper floor prices should have been established until these things were paid for. That was not done, and yet the Minister of Finance believes that contracts should be maintained and honoured. We believe that too.

Some of our bureaucrats say that this is just the request of a few disgruntled veterans around Saskatoon. I want to contradict that statement flatly. The petition which was circulated contained some 12,500 signatures and was representative of the three prairie provinces. The request for clear title was also supported by the Alberta legislature, the Saskatchewan legislature, the Alberta farmers' union, the Saskatchewan association of rural municipalities, the Saskatchewan wheat pool, the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, United Farmers of Alberta, the Alberta branch of the Canadian Legion, the executive of the British Columbia branch, and last, but not least, the dominion command of the Canadian Legion. In order that there may be no question as to the authenticity of these, I should like to read just one or two. At a meeting of the Alberta provincial council, held in Edmonton from June 6 to June 9, 1943, the soldier settlers' committee presented a report, and the resolution adopted was as follows:

Whereas the majority of original soldier settlers, who are still endeavouring to carry on under the soldier settlement scheme have now found it, owing to advanced years and the adverse conditions prevailing in agriculture, particularly the lack of parity prices, increasingly difficult to liquidate their indebtedness to the settlement board.

And whereas the settlers have struggled on through the years of drought conditions and low prices unprecedented in the agricultural history of this country and have now nothing to show for their years of toil and struggle but whatever equity they may have in the land which is liable to foreclosure.

Therefore be it resolved that we now petition the government to relieve the soldier settlers of any further payments and that they be given the title deed to their land or, failing this, that a parliamentary committee in conjunction with representation from the dominion command of the Canadian Legion, review the whole situation of the soldier settlers with a view to alleviating their present financial difficulties.

That resolution was sent here, but of course nothing was done about it. Then not very long ago, on October 26 of last year, the head of the Canadian Legion, Mr. Alex. Walker, presented a brief to the committee on veterans affairs, and under the heading "Soldier Settlement Act" he had this to say:

The bill under consideration lowering the interest rate for soldier settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act of 1919 meets one of the recommendations of the soldier settlement report of the dominion convention of the Canadian Legion held in Vancouver in June, 1944, in that it proposes to lower the interest from 5 per cent to 3½ per cent.

A further proposal recommended by this committee relates to the granting of clear titles to aged settlers or to those who had reduced their indebtedness to 25 per cent of the original purchase price. A great deal of discussion has been carried on during the past few years respecting soldier settlers of the last war and strong representations, from time to time, have been made from various sources to solve the problem of these veterans by granting them clear title to their farms. A debate occurred in the House of Commons recently on this subject and many members spoke in favour of the proposal. Representations by soldier settlers through the legion have followed similar lines and the following resolution is submitted for the consideration of this committee:

Therefore be it resolved that, in order to be fair to our ageing veterans and to bring the old and the new settlement acts more into line, the dominion government be asked to readjust the debts of the 6,153 original soldier settlers who have not paid for their lands, such readjustment to take into consideration the difference in interest rates charged under the said acts; and that following such readjustment the government be further asked to cancel the debts of those original soldier settlers whose debt has been, or may hereafter be, reduced to 25 per cent of the original purchase price or the reduced purchase price.

Right here I would say that if consideration were given to the difference between the interest rates charged the new veterans and the old veterans, all these old settlers would have been out of debt many years ago. After that brief was completed, the hon. member for Acadia had this to say, at page 315 of the proceedings of that committee:

On page 11 of the brief there is a reference to the old soldier settlers, and the recommendation there is that clear title be given provided a soldier reduces his indebtedness to 25 per cent of the original purchase price of the reduced purchase price. I do not think that will go far enough to satisfy the organization that calls itself the old soldier settlers' organization, because they are asking for a clear title for all soldier settlers of the last war. I think we must all agree that the soldiers who are in the most difficult position of all are those soldier settlers who have had no chance of reducing their indebtedness to that 25 per cent, the ones who have been up against bad luck. Some of you may call it bad management, perhaps, but we know that the situation these men went through in the depression years put them in a position where they could not get the money to buy the farm. I should like very much to see that 25 per cent taken out of your recommendation, making it wide open so that title can be given to the old soldier settlers, whether in the fortunate position of being able to reduce their indebtedness to 25 per cent or not. I wonder if Mr. Walker would comment on that?

The Witness: I am sure it will not hurt our feelings if you do give them clear title.

Then on October 1 of last year I moved a resolution in this house, which I shall not take time to read now since I see my time is flitting away. More than twenty members took part in that debate, and with the exception of two or three all were in favour of the resolution, some saying that it did not go far enough. After the resolution was talked out one evening, it was sent to the veterans affairs committee. That committee then received a brief from the representatives of the settlers' organization; that was on May 6 of this year. Then at a meeting on June 18, 1946, the following members were present:

Messrs. Abbott, Adamson, Ashby, Baker, Belzile, Benidickson, Bridges, Claxton, Cleaver, Cockeram, Croll, Cruickshank, Dion (Lake St. John-Roberval), Drope, Emmerson, Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), Gibson (Hamilton West), Gillis, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Herridge, Jutras, Langlois, Lapointe, Lennard, Marshall, Mackenzie, Macdonald (Halifax), MacNaught, McKay, Moore, Mutch, Quelch, Tremblay, Tucker, Viau, Whitman, Winkler, Winters, Wright.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Speaker, I am presenting the case for the old soldier settlers, and I should like to be able to finish it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. gentleman has the unanimous consent of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FAIR: Thank you.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member has not the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Certainly he has.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman shall have an opportunity to finish his remarks?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has not unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: A recorded vote!

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. gentleman the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those against will please say nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: The yeas have it.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. FAIR: When the brief was presented to the committee in May some hon. members wanted to deal with it at once, but there was not time that day. It could not be dealt with the next day because other business had been set down by the steering committee and as a result it was held over until June 18. When the matter was finally taken up by the committee the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) moved:

(a) That all soldier settlers who took up land under the Soldier Settlement Act of 1919 be granted clear title to such land as of March 31, 1944.

(b) That clear title—

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood that the hon. gentleman was going to conclude his remarks. If not, I shall be obliged to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. FAIR: This is the wrong place in my remarks to bring the argument to a head, but I shall do so anyway. I can give the rest when we come to second reading, or in committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a rule which is well known to the hon. member. If he has not the unanimous consent of the house he is obliged to resume his seat. I wanted to be generous to the hon. member, to give him an opportunity to conclude his remarks; but if he does not conclude his remarks I must ask him to resume his seat and conclude at another time.

Mr. FAIR: Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, and finding that we have some hon. members who want to pound into the gutter some of our old veterans, I shall conclude my argument in forty minutes when the bill is up for second reading.

Mr. TUCKER: I was not one who objected to the hon. member's continuing beyond forty minutes, but because some object to his exceeding forty minutes I say he has no right to say that they wish to pound the returned soldier into the gutter, and I ask him to withdraw that statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON: We got that from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). He used it the other night.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order. You are the worst offender in the house.

Mr. TUCKER: The remark is a reflection on certain members in the house; it might just as well be upon hon. members on the other side as well as upon this side. It is a reflection upon various members in the house, an unfair and improper reflection, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it, without any qualification whatsoever.

Mr. QUELCH: On the point of order, I do not think there is anything unparliamentary in suggesting that certain people are advocating that the veteran be pounded into the gutter. The hon. member does not suggest that other hon. members, themselves, get down into the gutter. If he had, there might be some grounds for complaint.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It seems to me that the hon. member was speaking from his natural environment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) at least to be kind enough to modify his expression.

Mr. FAIR: I shall be very glad on second reading to explain it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, no.

Mr. FAIR: I did not cast any reflection upon any hon. members in the house, not one.

Mr. TUCKER: Whom were you referring to, then?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member definitely said that members of the government were pounding the veterans into the gutter.

Mr. FAIR: He did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. FAIR: The Minister of Veterans Affairs cannot put words into my mouth. I did not say "members of the government".

Mr. MACKENZIE: You said "government".

Mr. ROWE: No, he did not.

Mr. FAIR: I did not.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sure the hon. member who has just resumed his seat will do everything possible to help the Speaker to keep things in order.

Mr. FAIR: I cannot hear you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sure the hon. member will help Mr. Speaker to keep dignity and decorum. Certain hon. members are under the impression that, since they are veterans, the remarks by the hon. member referred to them. I am sure the hon. member could modify his expression. I would not insist upon a withdrawal of it, but I would ask him to be kind enough to modify it.

Mr. FAIR: I did not refer to those hon. members who are complaining, or to any other hon. members in the house.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak on this resolution, but rather to speak on second reading of the bill. However, in view of the debate which has developed, I feel I must say a few words.

The resolution has been on the order paper since April 12, and we were beginning to think it was going to be almost a fixture. The committee on veterans affairs has been sitting for forty days or more, during which time it has had many matters before it. Very little from that committee has been brought to the house, for which possibly there is a good reason.

However, I am pleased indeed that at last a subject has been placed before the house, and that we shall have something definite to show for our work. This matter, in itself, is not contentious. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has criticized it, not on the ground of what it does, but rather on the ground of what it does not contain. As I have said, there was unanimous consent in the veterans affairs committee in respect of the matter contained in the resolution itself.

As hon. members will see, the proposed bill ratifies two orders in council which were passed some months ago. As a matter of fact one was passed in November, 1942, and the other in March, 1945. The intention of the bill is simply to ratify these two orders in council.

P.C. 10472 provided for two things. It authorized the director of the soldier settlement board, with the approval of the treasury board, to make capital reduction in the debt of certain soldier settlers. This, as we know, has been done. I believe there has been a reduction in the debt of old settlers to an extent of something like a million to a million and a quarter dollars. There is general approval among the soldiers and, I am sure, among civilians as well, from one end of Canada to the other, of that procedure.

The other provision in order in council P.C. 10472 was a reduction in the interest rate from five per cent to 3½ per cent. This, too, has general approval.

Veterans are now taking up land under the Veterans Land Act. They are borrowing money and having land allotted to them on the provision of paying 3½ per cent. Strong representations were made to the government in 1942 that the interest rate charged the old settler should be the same as that charged the new settler under the Veterans Land Act. This also is provided for in the bill, and was given unanimous approval by the veterans affairs committee.

Order in council P.C. 8346 not only provides that the old soldier shall have a reduction in his interest rate from five per cent to 3½ per cent, but also provides that all settlers under the Soldier Settlement Act shall be treated in the same way. So that there is a general reduction in the interest rate from five per cent to 3½ per cent. I might say that this, too, has received the unanimous approval of the veterans affairs committee. It also fixes the date upon which this reduction of interest is to take effect, namely either the date upon which the soldier settler enlisted, or 1942, whichever is the earlier date.

I do not think it is necessary to make further comment because, as I say, there was unanimous consent in the committee. However, since the hon. member for Battle River has introduced the question of giving clear title to old soldiers I feel that as one of the members of the committee I should say a few words on the subject. First, I wish to commend the hon. member not only for his action upon this occasion but also for his actions in the past six or seven years, during which time he has fought what he and a good many others of us consider to be the battle of the old soldier. He is to be congratulated upon the interest he has taken.

The hon. member has mentioned that this matter was discussed by the veterans affairs committee for a considerable length of time. I do not think it is incumbent upon me to review the different arguments used by hon. members. The ground has been thoroughly covered by the hon. member for Battle River this evening, as it was covered in his former speeches.

I have felt that we might very well give special consideration to the old soldiers who took up their land in 1919 and 1920 and who for the last twenty-five or twenty-six years have been struggling to pay off their debt. It has seemed to me that, now that they have reached ages ranging from fifty-five to eighty years, we might give them some consideration.

We are told by Mr. Murchison, director of the Veterans Land Act, that there was now due from these old soldier settlers something less than $5 million. In 1919 there were some 25,000 soldiers of the last war, men who had come back from overseas who were anxious to take up farms in this country, but to-day there are only 4,276 of those still remaining on their farms. They have paid many millions of dollars off their indebtedness to the soldier settlement board. As was pointed out this afternoon, they worked under terrible handicaps. First, they went through the great war. Next, they took over farms when prices were greatly inflated and they had to buy cattle at the rate of $100 to $150 a head. Prices of farm machinery were much more than they were in normal times. Besides that, these old soldiers passed through the worst depression this country has ever known. From 1929 to 1938 Canada, along with the rest of the world, passed through a depression unknown to any other generation. Then along came the second great war. Many of these men enlisted for service and those who did not had sons and daughters enlisting in the service. Taking all these things into consideration, I submit that these men have a strong claim upon the generosity of the people of this Dominion of Canada.

When we compare it with the billions and hundreds of millions of dollars that are passed through this house, five million dollars is a small sum to pay for the sacrifices that these men have made during the past twenty-five years. This would not be a total loss. As the hon. member pointed out, we are paying for the supervision and direction of the soldier settlement board a sum amounting to well over $100,000 a year. The hon. member for Battle River said that it has cost $27,000,000 to administer the Soldier Settlement Act. I doubt if it is costing anywhere near that sum to-day, but there is no doubt that it is costing well over $100,000. If we washed out these debts and gave clear title to these men we would not be losing any great amount of money because we would save in the cost of administering this act.

As I pointed out a few moments ago, many of these men served in the last war and many of their sons and daughters have served. Some of these men are now sixty, seventy or even eighty years of age. They have lived on their farms for twenty-five years. What man living on a farm for twenty-five years has not the hope that before he passes on to the Great Beyond he will be able to leave a clear title to his land to his widow and children? It would be impossible for these men to do that at the present time. They are too old to make a success of farming. Without going into the arguments which have been so well advanced, I submit that we could afford to be generous to these men to that extent.

As far as the committee was concerned, we were not unanimous in turning this down. I think the vote was seventeen to twenty-one, and I was one of those who supported the motion of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright). If it had not been that the government brought in what I would term their tactical reserve for the vote it would have been carried in the committee and there would have been a direct recommendation from the committee that these old soldiers be given clear title. I am not going to labour the point any further because I do not think it requires any additional argument.

There are some other matters I should like to mention while I am on my feet. One of these is brought to my mind by an article which appeared some time ago in the Globe and Mail. As I said at the beginning, there have been very few opportunities in this house during the past five or six weeks to bring up veterans affairs. This particular matter has reference to a soldier who joined up in September, 1939. He spent five years in the army and, while overseas, took four courses in agriculture. He hoped that when he came back to Canada he would be able to get a farm in this country and follow the vocation for which he had prepared himself and which he liked. When he came back to Canada he did obtain a farm. After seven months he found that it was impossible to get the loan under the Veterans Land Act for which he had hoped.

I do not want to criticize the director of the Veterans Land Act because I do not think there is an official in any department of government who is worked harder. Not only is he overworked, he is an harassed man. As my hon. friend has said, the conditions imposed upon these men made it almost an impossibility for them to make a success of their farming. They could not sell a cow or a pig; they could not buy a piece of machinery; they could not turn around without having to consult a representative of the soldier settlement board. Let us be careful this time. This letter from a young soldier which appeared in the Globe and Mail indicates that there is a tendency along that line. We should watch ourselves. I warn the minister and the department to be careful to see that technicalities do not interfere with the proper administration of the act.

For instance, a man who has been overseas may want to take up farming. He is told that his wife must be interviewed, but his wife may still be in England. She may have to remain there for five or six months and during that time the man will be unable to get a farm. His wife must be interviewed, I suppose given the once-over as we say, by the officials administering the act. These things react against the success of this scheme. Again I say to the minister that he should be careful to see that such things are not carried to an extreme. I brought up this matter of the letter which was reported in the Globe and Mail because there was an editorial in that paper, not only condemning the government but condemning the opposition because matters of this kind are not brought before the house and because there is no general airing of these matters before parliament.

Along the same line I have received a letter from a legion representative in Nova Scotia protesting the appointment of legal representatives to search titles and do other general legal work under the Veterans Land Act who have not seen any service at all. That is absolutely contrary to what we understand is the policy of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Where is that?

Mr. BROOKS: Windsor, Nova Scotia.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What position?

Mr. BROOKS: It is a legal appointment by the Department of Justice. I will read the letter if the minister wishes. It is addressed to the hon. Minister of Justice, Ottawa, Canada and reads:

Dear Sir:

By order of the executive of Hants county branch, Canadian Legion, I am directed to enter a strong protest against the appointment of Mr. William R. Lawrence, LL.B., of Windsor, as administrator of the Veterans Land Act for Hants county. My instructions are that there are in Windsor two barristers with war service. One Mr. A. G. Macdonald had overseas service in the recent world war and the other Mr. C. Wray Townshend is a veteran of the great war.

We feel that the announced policy of the government to give preference to veterans and particularly in all matters relating to the Department of Veterans Affairs should be strictly adhered to and we demand that an appointment be made in accordance with the merits of the case.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Robert C. Mills,
Secretary.

Hants county branch, No. 9,
Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would my hon. friend send a copy of that letter to me?

Mr. BROOKS: I shall be very glad to, but I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) could furnish his colleague with a copy because he received one.

I know that our ministers are very busy and that it is very difficult for them to find time to attend to all these matters. I also know something of the situation in Windsor, Nova Scotia. So far as Mr. Lawrence is concerned I have nothing to say against him. He is an estimable young man. But the point is that soldiers in soldier matters wish to deal with soldiers, and they feel that there is a breach of faith by the government unless they are allowed to deal with soldiers in soldier matters. They lose confidence in what the government tells them. They lose confidence in the government's assertion that soldiers will receive a preference in civil service appointments. This is not an isolated case. I could quote others. The other day I asked how many employees of Wartime Housing Limited in a town in Nova Scotia were war veterans, and the answer I received was that there are eight full-time employees, five men and three women employed by Wartime Housing Limited in Pictou, Nova Scotia, and that one male employee was a veteran of world war I—only one returned soldier. There is not a town anywhere in the maritimes that sent more soldiers overseas in proportion to population than the little town of Pictou, Nova Scotia, and no town where there would be more soldiers to draw from in appointing men to these positions. It is not my intention to labour this point further. I had not intended speaking at all until my hon. friend brought up the question of giving clear title to the old soldier settlers. If that would cost this country any great amount I would be opposed to it at this time, when we should conserve all our resources. But it would not cost this country any great amount. On the contrary, we would be saved the expense of administering the act for possibly a great many more years.

My hon. friend has quoted the Canadian Legion. One of the arguments used in the committee was that the Canadian Legion was not in favour of granting clear title. I could quote what my hon. friend quoted, if it were necessary, but at page 1010 of the proceedings of the veterans affairs committee I did quote it and I shall not take time now to quote again the views of the Canadian Legion. I believe that this request is a pure matter of justice and that we could very well include it in the bill.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, when the resolution was introduced it was suggested that it was non-controversial. I am afraid that that has not proved to be the case. But if the government want a resolution such as this to be non-controversial they have it within their power to make it such—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is my hon. friend opposed to this?

Mr. WRIGHT: I am saying that it certainly does not solve the problem.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is my hon. friend going to vote for or against it?

Mr. WRIGHT: I say that it does not solve the problem and that it is controversial.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is my hon. friend against reducing the interest rate from five to 3½ per cent?

Mr. WRIGHT: I am in favour of that reduction.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: We shall see when the test comes. We shall have the buttons off the foils pretty soon.

Mr. WRIGHT: A delegation of old soldier settlers came to Ottawa in 1944 and interviewed some members of the cabinet. These soldier settlers were assured that their problems would be given sympathetic consideration. Of course, that was before an election. In the committee the other day the minister made this statement:

> As long as I am in charge of the administration, I will not stand for the destruction of that principle.

The principle he was speaking of was the principle of granting to these old soldier settlers clear title to their homes, as they should be granted.

The only principle involved here is the principle of justice. These men, if that principle had been observed, would have been granted clear title long ago. They were settled on land, as has been explained by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), under conditions where there was no possible chance of them succeeding. I know those conditions. I have lived amongst these men. I know the struggle they put up over the years to meet their obligations. In 1940, when I first came to this house I spoke to certain members of the soldier settlement board, and they told me that many of these old soldier settlers who had not paid their debts and are still on the land are the hard core of those who, the implication was, would under no circumstances meet their obligations. Yet in 1944 over 95 per cent of these men whom the officials of the soldier settlement board said were the hard core of those who had no intention of meeting their obligations were meeting them because economic conditions in the country had changed and made it possible for them to do so. These men had to struggle for years against circumstances over which they had no control. What would any hon. member do if he had to make a choice between educating his family and meeting his payments? I know one of these soldier settlers on a quarter-section of land. He had three boys and two girls, very bright children indeed. He had to make a choice between meeting his obligations to the board and giving his children a chance to go to high school. He gave his children that chance. He sent them to high school and he was unable to meet his obligations to the board. What happened? A few years later, when this country needed men, two of these boys responded to the call to the colours and joined the flying corps and one of them did not come back from overseas. Did that father not serve his country better by giving his children their chance for an education than if he had met his obligations to the board?

There is now a small group of these soldier settlers left who, because of adverse circumstances, for family reasons perhaps, sickness, drought, poor land or other circumstances over which they had no control, have not been able to meet their obligations. Surely to-day the people of Canada can afford to give them clear title to their land.

There was no unanimity in the committee about bringing in this measure.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. WRIGHT: The hon member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) moved this resolution in committee:

(a) That all soldier settlers who took up land under the Soldier Settlement Act, 1918, be granted clear title to such lands as of March 31, 1944;
(b) That clear title be also granted to the widows, children or dependents of such soldier settlers;
(c) That in the case of veteran settlers who have been dispossessed of their land during the period between September 3, 1939, and March 31, 1944, either such lands be restored and clear title granted to the settler or adequate compensation made to him.

That was an expression of opinion of a group in that committee, and that resolution was lost in the committee on a vote. After it was lost, I brought in a further resolution which stated:

That the write-down of the indebtedness of soldier settlers, as recommended by the committee, provide that the settler be granted an equity of 33⅓ per cent of the 1940-41 value of his land, irrespective of any payments made to him.

I am going to say this, that if the members of that committee had voted according to their consciences and not according to party lines, in all probability that motion would have passed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of order. Every hon. gentleman who is a member of that committee is an hon. member of this House of Commons too, and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) has said that if these gentlemen had voted according to their consciences something different would have happened. That is a complete reflection upon the privileges of hon. members of this parliament, and should be withdrawn.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Veterans Affairs—

Mr. MACKENZIE: If he is only speaking for himself it may be true.

Mr. WRIGHT: If the minister considers it a reflection I am prepared to withdraw it. Nevertheless, I say that it would have been only doing for these old soldier settlers exactly what we are doing for our veterans to-day under the new Veterans Land Act. It was stated in 1942, when that act was brought in, and it is also stated by mortgage companies throughout this country, that to make a success on the land the loan must not exceed 50 per cent of the value of the land, and that was the basis on which the new Veterans Land Act was originally drawn up. Later, because of the increase in the price of land in Canada, we had to, or did, abandon that 50 per cent, and under the act as it stands to-day the new soldier settler is getting a 33⅓ per cent equity in his land. Surely any member of that committee should have been prepared at least to give these old settlers an equal start with the young chaps who are settling under the Veterans Land Act to-day. That would seem, if they followed their consciences, to be the logical conclusion. If these young chaps are going to find it difficult, as many of them will, to meet their obligations with a 33⅓ per cent equity, what of the case of the old veteran, whose average age to-day is fifty-six years and who finds himself saddled with a contract to last over the next twenty or twenty-five years? I am saying that it is not justice. What would it mean to this government of Canada to give clear title? Something over $5,400,000—an extremely small amount to-day in our national budget. We were spending that in a couple of hours during the war. This grant of clear title would give to these old veterans some security in their old age. That equity is necessary if these men are to carry on.

The veterans committee in 1942 were sympathetic to the idea of granting the old soldier settler an equity in his land equal to the equity being given to the new soldier settler. If you go back to the proceedings of that committee, you will find that view expressed in no uncertain terms both by members of the government and by members of the opposition. I am sure that there is nothing new about this. It is simply doing what has been recommended by not only a committee of the house but by the legion themselves. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) was quick to pick up a resolution passed by the Saskatchewan legion last year which opposed the granting of these clear titles. I know that hon. members are not so naive as not to know that there are certain things which take place in connection with resolutions brought before the legion. As a matter of fact this—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Saskatchewan is a pretty good province, is it not?

Mr. WRIGHT: It certainly is a good province, and we have a very good legion there. But, just as in a lot of other places we find some people working behind the scenes.

Mr. ABBOTT: Surely not in Saskatchewan.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. WRIGHT: No; I can assure the minister of that. However, there was a feeling there that the old soldier settlers' organization should have worked through the legion, and the fact that they came direct to the government here instead of working through the legion branches—and I agree that they should have worked through the legion branches; I think one returned men's organization in the country is enough—prejudiced their case with the legion. I tell the minister this, that I am quite sure that if we were to take a vote of the rank and file of the legion in Saskatchewan he would find that they are in favour of granting a clear title to the old soldier settlers.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They said the very opposite.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am sure of what I say, because of the circumstances under which that resolution was placed before the legion. Moreover the dominion command of the legion did express in no uncertain terms that these men should receive more consideration than is being given to them in the present bill.

There is no need of carrying on this argument at any great length. Apparently the government are not prepared to give these old settlers a fair deal. That is their responsibility, but that does not make it right. As far as we of this group as concerned, as far I think as most members of the opposition are concerned, and as far as hon. members on the government side of the house are concerned, they would like to see something better than is being proposed in this resolution.

I can only urge that the minister, when he drafts his bill, does not follow the lines of the resolution but does give a fair deal to our old soldier settlers.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): In rising to support the remarks of the three previous speakers this evening, may I add, like the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), that this resolution itself is probably not contentious but it does not go far enough. May I commend the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) for the consistent stand and fight he has put up on behalf of these old settlers, I think every year since I have been a member of this house.

As a member of the veterans affairs committee, I was impressed with the brief and the arguments put forth by the executive representing the old settlers to the committee in the railway committee room during this session. I thought they advanced some sound and strong arguments as to a further adjustment, if not the granting of clear titles at this time.

I do not want to repeat many of the figures and arguments which have been advanced this evening, but I want to endorse what the hon. member for Royal has so well said, that after these many years these old settlers, whose sons and daughters went overseas and did a grand job for us in this war, are certainly entitled to more consideration than they have received at this time, and I am satisfied that many of them find themselves in financial difficulty to-day through no great fault of their own.

We have done a lot in the way of lending money to other people. The great loan, of which I was heartily in favour, to Great Britain runs for five years without any interest and for fifty years at two per cent interest. Had these settlers received the same rate of interest, I do not believe any of them would have been in debt to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who was in power then?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not care who was in power then. I have criticized in the house and in committee on more than one occasion what was done for these soldier settlers and the people responsible for it. I say we have to do much better for the settlers of to-day than we did for the old settlers. I am fair about it; but I am not at all satisfied with what is being done to-day.

Yesterday we listened to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) taking advantage of the orders of the day to deliver political propaganda in this house in talking about inflation. Will anybody tell me that we have not inflation to-day? I have argued consistently in the veterans affairs committee that the director has too great a burden and too much responsibility to-day in trying to settle full-time farmers and also to carry out the small holdings project.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Given to him by a parliamentary committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I realize that, but I say I am not satisfied. I have raised objection repeatedly in the committee, and the more I am able to find out in the country, the more I am convinced that the method is wrong. Some hon. members have spoken of a vote which took place on June 18, a vote of seventeen to twenty-one. I am sorry I was unavoidably absent from the house that day and did not attend the committee.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Out on political propaganda.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was endeavouring to assist to save democracy in this country. I say to the hon. member for Vancouver North—

Mr. MACKENZIE: We try that occasionally ourselves.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): While I was out there, I had an opportunity personally to visit one of these centralized small holding projects of ninety units under the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): It must have been close to Winnipeg.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It was five or six miles out from the city limits of Winnipeg.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The hon. member would not go any farther than that.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What that land cost per acre was startling to me. There were ninety units of a half acre each, and the point which alarmed me was that right now, despite inflation, the great majority of these ninety settlers and their families are dissatisfied. The workmanship and the materials do not satisfy these people at all. They showed me through their homes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Can they buy houses cheaper anywhere else?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Where?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Right in Calgary.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): According to one of the administrative officers of the department to-day these houses have cost from $5,900 to $7,000 apiece, and they are still working on them. The cost is not yet complete.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): What do they cost the veterans a month, $23?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): My hon. friend knows all about this. He says $23. The director gave us a different figure the other day in the committee. The figures which I have from the administrative officers show that while they cannot yet make arrangements for the purchase of these houses, they are paying $25 a month for the four-room unit, and $30 a month for the five-room unit, and that in all likelihood the rent would be immediately increased from $5 to $10 a month.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, $22 to $23.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am talking about the rent for these units to date, and these settlers—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Wartime housing.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member for Vancouver North will have an opportunity—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): We are now discussing the Veterans Land Act, not wartime housing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. May I remind the house that we are discussing a resolution with respect to the Soldier Settlement Act. The remarks of the speaker should be directly relevant to that act.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I have the permission of the speaker to ask a question?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did he say that the figure was $30 a month under the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, the small holdings scheme. This was one of these units which have not been adjusted under this order in in council for the million dollar write-off.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Why is the—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): My hon. friend over there who has been so ambitious to become a parliamentary assistant should hold his peace. I was only making a comparison here, and I say that the letter points out—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The figures are wrong.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That may be so.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I think the house will agree with me that an hon. member should not be interrupted or asked questions without his permission.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not mind it at all. I was simply making a comparison.

Mr. TUCKER: May I rise to a point of order? I did not raise it with the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) and I hate to raise it now.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. TUCKER: I believe there will be a bill brought before the house on the Veterans Land Act. I suggest that the session is running on long enough without having two debates on the Veterans Land Act. I suggest that a debate on the Veterans Land Act at this point, when we are dealing only with the Soldier Settlement Act, is out of order. As I say, I hate to raise the point, but we wish to have the debate concluded, and to do so we had better try to keep to the point at issue before the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I quite agree. I was simply trying to make a comparison to prove that we have more inflation to-day than we had when the old settlers were settled. I am thoroughly convinced that the units in Charleswood, which I have spoken of are not worth 50 per cent of the cost put into them on a cost-plus basis. I have inspected them and gone through them with the settlers.

I shall return to my original argument. As has been so well said, stock and equipment cost these old settlers a great deal in 1919 and 1920, following the last war. In other sessions I have given concrete examples in my own community. One of these settlers failed during the drought periods and signed a quit-claim deed to the board. He had agreed to pay approximately $5,000 for his half-section, which is around $15 an acre. He did not have a chance to re-buy that farm when it was re-sold. It was sold to a citizen, a speculator, who was not even a British subject at that time—but that does not matter—for less than $500, less than 10 per cent of what the original settler had agreed to pay for the farm; but the board would not give the settler a chance to buy the farm. In fact, if rumours are correct the same speculator is endeavouring to sell that farm back to the board to-day. I point that out as one of the examples of what the settlers had to contend with through no fault of their own. I thought that was unfair at that time. That is what we have been doing, and we are now in an inflationary period despite what the indices show—

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The hon. member and his party want to remove the price ceilings.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think we can still make these adjustments for these old settlers. May I ask the hon. member for Vancouver North, who has been so keen to take part in this discussion, if he is opposed to giving further adjustments to these old settlers?

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): It is not a case of further adjustments. May I ask the hon. member a question? If you cancel these loans to the old settlers how are you going to collect the present loan to the settlers under the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was making that very argument, that already under the small holdings units an order in council has been passed to write off $1,000,000 without the settler having a contract to purchase these homes. This write-off is being made before they are in there.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is an adjustment, not a cancellation. There is a great difference between an adjustment and a cancellation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That has nothing to do with this bill. Why hold up this bill which reduces interest?

Mr SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): You are better on the black market than you are on this.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have never been closer to the black market than the hon. member for Vancouver North. In fact, I do not profess to know as much about it as he does. The point is this. My hon. friend—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the house that it is necessary to have some limit to the interruptions.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The point is that to-day these settlers are given a grant of $2,300 and some odd if they fulfil their contract, which was not the case with the old settlers. My argument is that the old settlers are entitled to at least as much as the present veterans, because in something over 90 per cent of the cases their families did make a great contribution in the recent war. They are the type of citizens who should be encouraged in this country to-day; and without repeating other arguments that have been advanced, I may say that at the proper time I am going to support the hon. member for Battle River and continue this fight until these old settlers receive a better deal for themselves and their dependents.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and has been for some considerable time that the veterans who were settled under the old act of 1919 and who are still indebted to the federal treasury should be granted clear title to these lands as of March 31, 1944. In the first place, as has been said already to-night, when the loans were made no gifts were made to these veterans, as is being done to-day. Under the Veterans Land Act of 1942 a gift of $2,320 is made; and if that gift had been made to the veterans in 1919 I doubt if there would be any indebtedness whatever against their land to-day. After twenty-seven years of struggle with the elements and the federal treasury these people are still in debt. To-day, as has been indicated, the gift from the treasury amounts to 39 per cent of the loan. We will admit that some concessions have been made to these old veterans of world war I, in the matter of reduction of principal and reduction of arrears, but that will hardly compensate for a gift of 39 per cent of the original indebtedness.

In the second place, the interest rate on veterans' farm loans of 1919 was five per cent, with seven per cent charged on arrears. This was another factor which militated against the ability of these veterans to meet their obligations and reduce their indebtedness. The rate to-day of 3½ per cent under the Veterans Land Act is still too high, but it would have enabled the veterans of the first war, had it been applied to their contracts, to meet their instalments without so much difficulty. Had the gift been granted, together with the lower rate of interest, on the loans of 1919 it is probable that there would be no demand to-day for cancellation of debts, since those debts would have been liquidated long ago.

It has been suggested that it would be unfair to the soldier settlers who have obtained clear title to their land to wipe out the indebtedness against the 4,200 parcels on which the debt is still outstanding. We have three soldier settlers in the house, at least three to whom I have spoken, though there may be more. Those three, all of whom have paid off their indebtedness, are in favour of cancellation of debt for these other unfortunate veterans. I cannot accept the view that any of the veterans who have paid off their indebtedness would be opposed to a fair deal being offered to veterans still in debt. I have not yet run across any who hold that view; I have yet to find a single man with a clear title who takes that attitude. Why should they? These men were comrades in arms. Some have been a little more fortunate than others. Some obtained good land, while others were placed on poor soil. It was not any fault of theirs. Some had good fortune, with substantial crops over a period of years, while others had misfortune dog their path year after year, with poor crops owing to drought, hail, pests and so on; and frequently they had family illnesses which held them back. To say that by cancellation of the debt on these particular lands we would not be treating these settlers all alike is probably true, but we have never treated them all alike. Had they all obtained good land in 1919, the story to-day would be different. They are not treated all alike to-day, either. Some receive university grants which in all probability will run into thousands of dollars. That is an excellent thing, but other young veterans are only receiving the civil reestablishment grants amounting to a few hundred dollars. We are not treating them all alike to-day; and we did not treat them all alike in 1919. To argue that we must treat these veterans all alike sounds very fine, but the fact is that this has never been done.

The veterans who are requesting clear title to their lands have laboured for twenty-five years and more to obtain that title. We should not concern ourselves particularly with regard to those who have been fortunate enough to secure clear title. Our concern must be for the old veteran or his widow, who is still struggling to secure a clear title. It is a race against time. Their average age is around sixty, while a few are in the eighties. To illustrate how the old settlers feel about this matter may I quote from a letter I received from one of them out in Saskatchewan:

> I served in France and Belgium in the first world war. Came home to find that while I was in hospital . . .—a hospital in England—my half-section had been sold to a German. One-quarter was my homestead and I owed for part of the other. I had to start all over again with the soldier settlement board.
> I am in my seventieth year and after twenty-five years I find myself still owing the soldier settlement board almost a thousand dollars. I would like to have the satisfaction of having my land clear before I die, but if I continue to have hailed and dried out crops as in the past, I can expect to have a supervisor come and ask me to sign a quit-claim as others have had to do.
> My only two sons volunteered and gave their services in this war. I have worked hard for them all these years and feel that I have surely earned the deed of my land.

No doubt all hon. members have received similar letters. Most of these settlers were industrious enough, but misfortune came their way. By granting them clear title to-day we would be righting a wrong and rectifying a grave injustice which has been allowed to continue altogether too long. It has been objected that to grant these clear titles would involve $5,000,000 in cancelled debts. When one considers that the administrative cost of the Soldier Settlement Act has exceeded $27,000,000, the $5,000,000 does not appear so very great. Neither does it seem so great when one considers that we expended much more than $5,000,000 a day during the last war. But now we are at peace, Mr. Speaker; the story is different, and unfortunately our attitudes are different. If this country is spending too much money in some respects or under certain departments, let us practise economy, but not at the expense of these old veterans. I feel we owe them a great deal; so let us give them justice now.

It has been said also that by granting clear titles administration of the Veterans Land Act would be made more difficult, and I have heard it said that young veterans of world war II would take advantage of the situation and stall in their payments, so that twenty-seven years from now they might get title from a humanitarian government of that day. I have too high a regard for these young veterans to think they would take advantage of a situation brought about by the misfortune of these elder veterans. More than that, it seems most ridiculous to me that anyone would wish to carry a burden of debt for twenty-seven years, just in the hope of getting clear title in the year 1973.

I am convinced that free title should be granted to every one of these old soldier settlers, or to their widows, who are still owing money to the federal treasury. It is the duty of all of us to give this subject our careful consideration. If that be done, I am certain we shall do justice to the old soldier settlers of a generation ago, who are fast disappearing from the scene.

Mr. J. O. PROBE: (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken often during this session—

An hon. MEMBER: A pity.

Mr. PROBE: Yes, it is a pity. However, I feel I would not be doing my duty as a veteran of the last war, as a citizen of Canada or a representative of my constituency if I did not bring to the attention of the house some of the material which I, too, have received from soldier settlers who took up land following the first great war. Last autumn there was sent to me a series of photographs of homes of soldier settlers who had taken advantage, as they thought at that time of the settlement scheme following the first world war. I do not intend to show these photographs to hon. members, but I should be very glad if some of them who have not yet realized that these men have had to battle against untold difficulties and disappointments, would come up to my office and take a look at them. I have had them posted on the walls of my room for some months, as a reminder to me that I have a job to do here on their behalf.

However, I intend to read to hon. members the captions which appear over these various photographs. The heading on the frame on which the photographs are posted is in these words:

[Mr. McKay.]

Soldiers' homes after twenty-five years of the worst kind of drudgery, coupled with an endless battle with hail, wind, drought and grasshoppers.

And with true soldier-settler wit we find repeated on the second line the statement by Sir Robert Borden following the last war:

Our soldiers shall never want after fighting so gallantly; the pledge of Sir Robert Borden for Canada; will it be honoured now?

Attached to these sheets are ten photographs showing ten soldiers' homes in one district. These are not in my constituency, and I am not now speaking from any political desire to obtain votes. This does not concern me particularly, because mine is an urban constituency. Opposite the first photograph is this caption:

No. 1 is the home of Frank Smith, who had to move out and make a living elsewhere.

What a hovel it appears! Then:

No. 2 is the home of Hugh De Blaquire, a man who was very badly wounded, and a 100 per cent pensioner. There is no water on his place, caused by the indifference of the board. The soldier settlement board even tried to compel him to make payments out of his pension.

No. 3 is where Herbert Darling was first located on a very poor quarter. The hole in the ground indicated by the arrow was where he lived for ten years. The bottom of an old bundle rack—

A hay rack, to any who are not farmers.

—formed the roof of his abode, while the sides were any old rough lumber. Eventually two of his good neighbours assisted him financially to purchase No. 8 where he now lives. Darling is a very good worker but has had very bad luck. He was severely kicked in the face by a horse.

No. 4 is the home of Ronald McDonnell, a front-line man. He and his wife and three children had to exist in this hovel.

I hope some of the members will look at it some time.

The soldier settlement board even tried to sell his place away from him while he was away trying to make a dollar on the side.

No. 5 is V. Castiglioni's home. This is the worst case of all. Eight children were raised in this hovel. There is only a quarter-section with 30 acres of waste land on the quarter. After being hailed out, dried out and blown out over a period of twelve years he was put off with a very sick wife and three children of school age. The soldier settlement board knew he had no place to go. This is the most dastardly piece of business on record.

No. 6 is the home of George Lobbans, a front-line man. This is a disgrace to Canada.

The picture here would indicate that that is no overstatement.

No. 7 is the abode of R. Hunter, another front-line man. After being hailed out five times in succession he was evicted because he refused to pay the board his last dollar.

Then, Nos. 8 and 3 were described in connection with No. 3.

No. 9 is the McNaughton home—

An hon. MEMBER: General McNaughton?

Mr. PROBE: No, not General McNaughton; he is provided for.

A family of five lived in this dump.

No. 10 is Mike Robins' home, a front-line man and very badly wounded. This is how Canada shows her appreciation for another veteran. Surely there are some gallant gentlemen in our house of parliament.

This has all been quoted from the group of photographs I have before me.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but may I call his attention to the fact that it has always been the practice in the resolution stage to discuss only the principle, and to reserve to committee of the whole a discussion of detail.

Mr. PROBE: I am in hearty accord with every word you have said, Mr. Speaker. I am trying to discuss the principle which underlies the resolution introduced by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) to collect another sum of money from these people who are now old and should have been pensioned off many years ago, and given title to their places.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is the hon. member in favour of or opposed to the resolution?

Mr. PROBE: I am opposed to the resolution as it now stands. I thought an entirely different form of settlement should be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Is the hon. member prepared to vote against the resolution?

Mr. PROBE: It is possible that I may vote for it, if I am forced to.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, no; there is no forcing here.

Mr. PROBE: At present I am not discussing whether I shall vote for or against it. I was hoping to open the heart of the minister so that he might bring in a resolution more in keeping with the necessities of the case. I realize that the minister is introducing a resolution which will give something better than that which now exists in the form of contracts.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And you are going to support it.

Mr. PROBE: If the minister will just watch when my vote is recorded he will understand what I am going to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sure I will.

Mr. PROBE: I should like simply to draw two facts to the attention of the minister. Some seven or eight years ago a calamity occurred which affected the lives of the people of an entire province. In fact, it extended beyond the boundaries of one province. At that time when Saskatchewan asked for national assistance—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I think he will agree with me when I say that he should not go into details on the resolution. When the resolution has been adopted the house will go into committee and the hon. member will then have an opportunity to question any minister of the crown. When the resolution is accepted by the committee, it will be reported and a bill will be introduced. The hon. member will have an opportunity on the second reading to discuss the bill and then, when it is in committee, it will be discussed clause by clause. The hon. member knows that if an opportunity is given to discuss, on the resolution, all the details of a bill to be introduced there would be no use in introducing resolutions into the house.

Mr. PROBE: I am heartily in agreement with every word that you say and I congratulate you upon making your case so clear. What I was trying to do was to discuss the principle of this matter. As I say, when we have calamities at home in the form of drouth which affect a large section of our people there is a demand made nationally for a pound of flesh. But when there is a calamity far away —and I happen to know the extent of that calamity, we generously say that we as a Canadian people will do everything to alleviate that distress. Why was it that the people of Saskatchewan were turned down in one case, while the people of Great Britain were supported in the other case? The Canadian people were ready to support a loan to Great Britain, but the fact is that a little extra profit would be made to our exporters who were going to provide the goods. Therefore the representatives of those exporters were entirely in accord with the provisions of that loan.

I voted for that loan, but it was not in order that we might make money out of the misery of the British people or take it from the pocketbooks of the Canadian people. Along with other members, I supported it from a humanitarian point of view. Whenever there is a calamity such as the one which affected the people of Saskatchewan, or the one which affected the people of Great Britain, or the one which affects the soldier settlers at this time, we should search our hearts and not our ledgers in order to find out whether or not the need is worthy of support.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) asked me whether I would support his resolution. I appeal to him to wipe out this debt which has been paid in hardship, in toil and in suffering. If he refuses to do that, then of course I shall still have to support the resolution. I must do that if we are going to be too hard or too calloused to do the thing that is right. But it is better than nothing and for that reason I will support it. However, I appeal to the minister to withdraw this resolution and replace it with another giving title to those soldier settlers who still have not paid the Canadian people the money that they nominally owe.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what my hon. friend has just said. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) will give the details in connection with the 200 settlers whose claims have been advanced by a method which it is not desirous should be used in this house. If there is any further delay we will withdraw the whole measure and then the onus for its withdrawal will rest upon those who have—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PROBE: I am not concerned about political manoeuvring. I said that I would support this as a half measure, but I appeal to the minister to do something better.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not expect that this resolution would take the time it has in view of the fact that it was passed as a unanimous recommendation by the select committee on veterans affairs which is composed entirely of veterans of the last and previous wars.

Mr. BROOKS: It was not a unanimous recommendation. The committee felt that they should go farther and make additional recommendations, but since they did not do that there was no objection to what was done already. That is how far it was unanimous.

Mr. TUCKER: My statement is correct. In committee certain things are agreed upon and recommended. Obviously everyone in committee cannot get everything he wants. If everything that is discussed in committee is to be the subject of extended debate in this house, then the situation will become very difficult. I would point out that this is one of the smallest of the fourteen bills that will be coming before this house.

I understood that the whole point in referring these matters to a veterans affairs committee composed entirely of veterans was to have the details threshed out and get a recommendation from the committee upon which this house could act with a great deal of assurance. I submit that this house could leave these matters in the hands of a committee composed entirely of returned soldiers without expecting to debate fully every detail that is not agreed to in the committee. I suggest in all seriousness that if we are to follow the practice which has been indicated to-night of debating everything we do not happen to agree with we shall have to spend all the rest of this session until September on veterans legislation alone. I point that out to members of the house and I think most members of the committee will bear me out. If a matter which is recommended unanimously—

An hon. MEMBER: Not unanimously.

Mr. TUCKER: The reduction in the interest rate was recommended unanimously. There was a controversy in the committee over whether we should give clear title, but that is not the question before the house to-night. The question before the house to-night is whether we are in favour of ratifying a reduction in interest from five per cent to 3½ per cent. The question of clear titles has been raised by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), and there were other questions raised in the committee as to what should be done. If every hon. member raises those questions which did not find approval in the committee and they are the subject of extended debate in this house, then I submit that we may just as well not have a committee at all. I think my argument will carry the conviction of the house.

Mr. PROBE: I do not want to be controversial, but how are those hon. members who were not on the committee to discuss these matters?

Mr. TUCKER: Naturally those things which are suggested by the committee as being worthy of passage by this house should be discussed, but if everything that happens to come in front of the committee is to be seized upon and fully debated in this house I doubt whether we can get through the essential legislation that the committee has agreed upon. That is a question of simple common sense.

I think hon. members of the committee will bear me out when I say it was expected that when this resolution was called to-day it would meet with such approval that it would go through in a few minutes, but the debate was precipitated by the speech of the hon. member for Battle River. The hon. member brought up a subject in which he is interested, and other hon. members have brought up other matters which did not find favour with the committee. Each hon. member feels that he has the right to bring up these matters and have them debated extensively. But I ask in all seriousness; are we going to get through this tremendous body of veterans legislation consisting of at least fourteen bills if every piece of legislation is to receive the treatment received by this resolution? I repeat, we might just as well have no committee at all if we are to debate here everything that is brought up in the committee regardless of what the committee recommends. That is not meant as any criticism of those who have taken part in this debate. I appreciate that the question was raised by the hon. member for Battle River and that other members felt that they had to say something about it. But I suggest in all kindness to the hon. member for Battle River that there were on the committee from his own group two most able and conscientious members. I would say that there was no member of the committee who was more conscientious or more able or more anxious to do something for the returned soldier than those two members of his own group, and I submit that the hon. member for Battle River might have left it to his two able colleagues to press his viewpoint.

It is most significant that this matter was brought up and fully discussed in a meeting of the Canadian Legion, Saskatchewan command; and I ask those hon. members who suggest that the members of the committee who voted against this proposal were not conscientious, would they say that the leaders of the Saskatchewan command of the Canadian Legion who last fall also voted against this proposal were not conscientious in serving the returned soldiers, their own comrades? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to get along in this house and win the approbation and approval of those we represent here, the less we bandy about suggestions that only "we" are interested in the fate of our comrades who served in the last great war and in the first great war and that the others were not conscientious but voted from some ulterior motive, the better it will be. Otherwise we shall not get very far in settling these great problems.

I have some knowledge of what happened at the convention of the Canadian Legion, Saskatchewan command. The matter was thoroughly discussed there, and I am told that when the question was put to a vote no one rose and voted for it after it had been fully explained to them. A vote was called for again, and still not a man rose. To suggest that any member of the convention who did not approve the proposal was not working in the best interests of their comrades from Saskatchewan will not get us very far.

It was suggested by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) that the proposal would have been carried in the committee if the government had not brought in their tactical reserves.

Mr. BROOKS: I still contend that.

Mr. TUCKER: Many members of that committee are very busy and not able to attend all the meetings; nevertheless they have the right to attend and express their opinions and the right to vote. I submit that to suggest that they had not the right to vote and express their own honest opinions because they were not able to be in the committee all the time is nothing more or less than an attempt to establish that a minority of the committee is to control and decide what the policy of the committee should be.

Mr. BROOKS: I never suggested that they had no right to vote. I did suggest that they came there just when the vote was on. You can draw your own conclusion.

Mr. TUCKER: I submit in all friendliness that it should not be a matter of scathing comment that members of the cabinet, who are very busy, should attend the committee and exercise the right to vote which this house conferred upon them by membership in the committee. They had a right to be on the committee and vote as they felt best.

We have had a most marvellous relationship between all the members of the committee. It has been one of the finest experiences I have had to sit on that committee and enjoy the comradeship which I have had the privilege to enjoy during the two years I have sat on our veterans affairs committee.

As evidence of the fact that there is no attempt by the government to control the committee, the members know that we have a steering committee upon which the government, if every member is there, is in the minority. The members of the steering committee know that there has been no attempt at any time to force any decision upon them. Everything has been discussed and agreed upon unanimously. The opinions that come out of the committee I can assure the house are the honest opinions of the veterans of that committee, or of a majority of them, after thorough discussion. Any suggestion that everything that comes out of the veterans committee is to be rehashed and threshed over at length in this house would be to stultify the committee and should be opposed by every member of it.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. MACKENZIE: This is good for you. Take your medicine.

Mr. TUCKER: That committee has a tremendous amount of work still in front of it. It still has to report eleven bills. The greatest good feeling should prevail in that committee. If there is the thought that every word dropped in that committee and every suggestion made must be the subject of extended debate in this house it must be clear to anybody that the hope of putting through this volume of legislation might as well be abandoned to-night.

I have mentioned the fact that the Canadian Legion, Saskatchewan command, did not approve this resolution. I must confess that when people of the standing in the returned soldier movement of some of the members of the Canadian Legion, Saskatchewan command, after thoroughly considering this proposal came to the conclusion that their responsibility to their comrades required them to vote against it, it had a tremendous effect on my attitude toward the proposition.

We have heard it said that returned soldier organizations will vote for anything that they are asked to vote for so long as it means giving some advantage or money to the returned soldier. I should like to pay a tribute to some of the people in the Canadian Legion, Saskatchewan command, for whom I have the most profound admiration for the way in which they have served their comrades, in the first great war and in the recent war. In taking the stand they did on this question, a stand which could be attacked, they showed that they could approach the question in a statesmanlike manner in the best interests of their comrades. There has been the unworthy suggestion that there was manipulation behind the scenes.

Mr. WRIGHT: I did not state that. I stated that there was a certain feeling in the legion that the old soldier settler orgainzation should have acted through the legion rather than on their own, and their case was prejudiced in the convention because of that fact.

Mr. TUCKER: Any man who suggests that men of the type who lead the legion, Saskatchewan command, would let a little pique influence them in deciding what they thought was best for their comrades is to do them far less than justice. I am astonished at my hon. friend throwing out that suggestion, knowing the members of the legion in Saskatchewan as he does. I am sure he knows in his own heart that men of the type they are would not let a little pique influence them and would not permit themselves to be manipulated behind the scenes.

There is another matter which I find quite significant. It has been suggested that the legion as a whole is in favour of this programme. I may be wrong in what I am going to say, and I can be corrected if I am; but I have gone very carefully through the Legionary of June, 1946, and read the resolutions passed at the last national convention of the legion, on May 19 to 23, and after all, if there is one authentic way in which the legion speaks it must be through its national organization meeting in biennial convention. I have examined the resolutions from start to finish to see if the national convention followed the lead of the Saskatchewan command or if they followed the lead of my hon. friend the member for Battle River. I was interested to see that, as far as I could find, this matter into which some hon. members have gone with—I do not know what I should call it; not ecstasy, but the very opposite—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hysteria.

Mr. TUCKER:—was apparently of so little importance, in the view of the legion, or was actually regarded as detrimental—it must have been one or the other—that it found no place in the resolutions of the Canadian Legion at its national convention.

Mr. BROOKS: May I ask the hon. member this question: is it not true that, when the Canadian legion presented their brief to our committee, they made a recommendation that the soldier settlers get clear title?

Mr. TUCKER: I would point out to my hon. friend that the head of the Canadian Legion before their convention made a presentation on pensions. I find a resolution of the convention on pensions. I will read part of it:

> We hereby endorse the presentation made by comrade Hale on behalf of the dominion command of the legion to the special parliamentary committee on April 9, 1946.

In other words, as to the matter which had already been presented by Mr. Hale to our committee on pensions, they endorsed that, but I can find no endorsation of the submission in regard to these clear titles. I draw a conclusion from that. It cannot be that this great convention would overlook something which is alleged here tonight to be so important to the welfare of the returned soldier. I can only draw the conclusion that it was brought to their attention, and that they must have endorsed the position of the Saskatchewan command of the Canadian Legion.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to correct the hon. member on that. I think if he refers to page 1259 of the proceedings of the committee in 1945, he will find that the Canadian Legion did make the recommendation which has been mentioned here to-night.

Mr. TUCKER: I am saying that I take it that the legion would speak through resolutions passed by their membership. This is the way, when they have just had a convention, to find out what they are really in favour of; and when they do not pass a resolution in a matter I think that fact should have some significance.

Mr. BROOKS: Well, would not the hon. member—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that we are not in committee, and no hon. member should interrupt without his permission the one who has the floor.

Mr. TUCKER: A statement was read by one hon. member that this particular person would not object if we went ahead and did something he wished. But has that person a right to enlarge on the decisions of the Canadian Legion in convention assembled? What is the purpose of that convention if the resolutions are not to be taken as worth something in showing the wishes of the convention?

That is all I wish to say about that, that if it were regarded as in the best interests of the returned soldiers of Canada that this matter should be dealt with in the manner suggested by the hon. member for Battle River, it would, I feel certain, have found a prominent place in the resolutions of that convention.

Mr. PEARKES: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Has he received a copy of the resolutions which were passed, from the legion?

Mr. TUCKER: This publication containing the resolutions was handed to me.

Mr. PEARKES: I am not interested in a printed newspaper. That has nothing to do with the matter.

Mr. TUCKER: This is the official organ of the legion.

Mr. PEARKES: But surely the official record—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Order.

Mr. PEARKES: My question is, has the hon. gentleman received a copy of the resolutions which were passed at that meeting, from the legion?

Mr. TUCKER: I will answer that in this way. I have read from the June issue of the Legionary, which bears this on its first page:

Official national magazine of the Canadian Legion, published by the Canadian Legion Press, Ltd., a dominion-chartered company owned by the Canadian Legion and operated by a board of trustees appointed by the dominion executive council of the Canadian Legion.

This particular issue was handed to me, as I remember it, by the newly elected president of the Canadian Legion as containing the resolutions which they passed at the last convention. He handed this to me, and there is not much more I can do than to accept their newly elected president's indication that therein I would find the resolutions of the Legion in regard to the various matters we were considering. As I say, I have gone through this as carefully as I can, and I cannot find anything on this matter. It may be that some hon. member, speaking later, may find something on it. I find something in regard to the Veterans Land Act, but on this particular subject there is nothing that I can find.

In regard to the situation generally, I do not intend to take up more than a few minutes, but I think there are a few figures which the house would like to have laid before it with reference to this matter. At least, I should like to refer to some significant figures. If hon. members will look at page 337 of the proceedings of our committee they will find a statement which is certified as correct by A. G. Woolsey, the chief treasury officer; it is the balance sheet of the soldier settlers of Canada as of March 31, 1946. The total amount of interest charges was $42,572,000. There have been deducted by various legislative enactments from soldier settlement loans alone an amount of $49,190,000. In other words, there have been deducted by legislative enactments of this parliament more than the total interest charges which have accumulated on the soldier settlers' debts since the inception of the scheme. I find another interesting statement. The suggestion has been made that seven per cent interest was charged. Well, very shortly after the first war there was provision for a remission of interest charges. It was actually provided that there should be a remission of 40 per cent of the amount due for stock and equipment in the case of stock purchased prior to October 1, 1920, and 20 per cent on the cost where it was purchased between October 1, 1920, and October 1, 1921; I find the total amount of interest which was not charged in this statement to settlers was $10,269,000. I must confess that, listening to hon. members who have spoken to-night and the suggestions that parliaments ever since the first great war have not made any really serious attempt to deal with this problem, their contention in the light of these facts did not sound fair to me. After all, the parliaments since the first great war have had men in them who were interested in returned soldiers; there were parliaments which had representatives of all the present parties except the Social Credit party, and I think these members gave some consideration to the problems of the returned soldiers.

I will not go into all the various ways in which write-offs have occurred, but the most recent was that which took place under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, through which nearly $7,000,000 was written off. Later, order in council P.C. 10472 was passed which provided that, based upon 1940-41 land values, the land obligation should be written down, or a reduction made in the soldier settlers' indebtedness based upon those values. We were assured by the director of the Veterans Land Act that he had gone beyond that to make sure that there would be a substantial equity in the land to the soldier settler. That assurance can be found in the minutes and proceedings of our committee. If any hon. member is interested in it, it can be found at page 1017 where it is pointed out there was a reduction over and above what was provided for strictly in the order in council, even providing an equity of as high as 50 per cent in exceptional circumstances. I am assured that that order in council was administered in a generous way. I have been assured of that even by members of the committee who are not of the Liberal party, and I have no reason to disbelieve their assurance.

Our committee has recommended, and it has been tabled in this house, that the time to apply under that order in council shall be extended to September 1 of this year in order that everybody shall get the benefit of the write-off. I should like to refer hon. members to one further set of figures, which are found at page 326 of the minutes and proceedings of evidence. Appendix A shows the loans repaid in cash. It shows that 5,662 loans have been repaid in cash up to date. But a surprising feature of that statement is the number of pre-payments which have taken place. On that point I should like to refer hon. members to a few figures which I am sure they will find interesting. I have already said that 5,662 have repaid their loans in full. On March 31, 1940, that number was 2,592, less than half of the number who have now repaid in full. Since 1940, 3,070 have repaid their loans in full. That is, prior to 1940, 2,592, and, since then, 3,070.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Has the hon. member the figures of those who lost their farms prior to 1940?

Mr. TUCKER: I have them and I can give them to the hon. member in committee, but I do not wish to take up the time to go into great detail now. These various loans were graded and the grading will be found at page 340 of the minutes of the evidence. There is a table which shows the standing on March 31, 1946 and a table which shows the standing on December 31, 1941. There is one interesting comparison which I wish to draw to the attention of the house. Grade 4 indicates no equity. On December 31, 1941, the number who had no equity amounted to 2,723. By March 31, 1946, that number had shrunk to 203. In other words, of all those soldier settlers numbering 2,723 who had no equity less than six years ago, the number had shrunk to 203, a reduction of over 2,500.

Hon. members may be interested in the number who had an equity of under 20 per cent. On December 31, 1941, the number who had an equity of 20 per cent or less was 1,078. They were classified as grade 3. According to the last return that number had shrunk to 518. That group had been cut in half. The number who had an equity of over 40 per cent in 1946 was 2,953. We have been assured by the director that practically all of them, except in the two lowest categories, those under 20 per cent who now number 203 and 518, actually 721, will have no difficulty at all in meeting their payments. This is the situation in regard to the 203. It seems to me that the situation ought to be weighed carefully. Those people who were put on land where they could not honestly pay for it, numbering apparently 203, can now apply, if they have not already done so, under this new order in council and have their debt written down under the generous provisions and administration of the order in council. The alternative suggestion was that we give these gentlemen clear title. There is no reason to give clear title to others, to people who are prepaying their land and will have no difficulty in paying for it. It was suggested that it should apply only to those who cannot pay without a great deal of hardship. I submit that the order in council will take care of most of them, and that way of handling it is probably better than to create the impression that at some time, through sufficient pressure brought to bear, agreements made under the Veterans Land Act will likewise be cancelled. That will not have to wait twenty years if the precedent is set. It would be just a matter of getting sufficient political pressure brought to bear to have many feel they would not have to pay their contracts under the Veterans Land Act.

I do not doubt that, within the next year, people would begin to take up the case of the Veterans Land Act if this were to go through. If that precedent were set, Mr. Speaker, what effect do you think it would have upon the successful administration of the Veterans Land Act? We expect to settle in homes in this country over 100,000 families in full-time farming and small holdings. It is recognized by all parties in the house that anyone settled under the Veterans Land Act at the present time and under the present circumstances has a better deal than the average returned soldier will get on his discharge. Eighty per cent of the returned soldiers will have to be content with a reestablishment credit which now averages about $421. Ten per cent will get the benefits of the Veterans Land Act which will probably average over $2,000. Four per cent will get the benefit of university education which will cost around $163,000,000, or about $4,000 apiece. Six per cent will get the benefit of vocational training which will cost around $1,100 apiece. That being the case, and this Veterans Land Act being something which every veteran in this country is anxious to have succeed in order to place 100,000 veterans in homes of their own under circumstances under which they can hope to pay for those homes in a reasonable time, I suggest that it would be a bad precedent to start giving titles now to people who have not been able to pay for their lands. I believe that is one thing which weighed with the veterans of Saskatchewan. I think that perhaps this thought weighed with the dominion command of the legion and I suggest that for any member of this house to wrap himself in a robe of greater friendship, greater devotion to the cause of the veterans than the people who serve the veterans in the great veterans' organizations of this country is attributing to himself too much virtue in that regard.

There is one other figure which I shall take the time of the house to give, and which I think would be of interest to hon. members, namely, the number of pre-payments. I have already said that in the four-year period 2,621 have paid in full a total of $5,476,489. During that time only 121 holdings have reverted due to death or abandonment of the $5,476,000, $2,183,000 has been prepaid; in other words, almost half the amount paid during that four-year period was prepaid.

As I have already said, I feel that the details of this measure can be given better in committee. I urge the house to pass this resolution which has for its purpose the reduction of the rate of interest from five per cent to 3½ per cent from the standard date. And I urge the house to leave something to the veterans affairs committee. If we hope to get through this great programme, as I think everyone agrees it should be put through for the veterans of this country, at this session if at all possible, I urge hon. members to cooperate with the veterans affairs committee in trying to put through the programme which they report to this house, with a reasonable amount of debate but without considering it necessary to discuss at length every single thing brought up in that committee.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Since my name has been mentioned several times during the debate, Mr. Speaker, I feel it necessary to say a few words. Let me say this to console the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), who does not like the debate held up. I suggest that owing to the fact that we are discussing these matters at this time, probably there will not be so much debate in the later stages. As far as the other fourteen bills are concerned, many of them will, I believe be non-controversial. I must admit I was surprised when I read the statement made last evening that this bill was not controversial, because to my mind this was bound to be a highly controversial measure.

As a member of the veterans affairs committee I appreciate very much the work that has been done by the chairman, as I think all hon. members appreciate it. But I say to him that when members of that committee work for two or three days on a certain measure and arrive at what they think is an agreement; and then, just before the vote is taken, the chairman marshals in his reserves in order to swing the vote another way, it is only natural that some of the other members should resent that action. I am not criticizing the chairman in these remarks, because that has been the practice in the past and no doubt will be the practice in future; but it is only natural that there should be some resentment felt since those hon. members who came in and swung the vote had not listened to the debate and had not the slightest idea what they were voting about.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) has referred to the fact that in committee this bill was carried unanimously, but he ignores one important thing. When we voted on this measure it was with the distinct understanding that further consideration would be given the old soldier settlers later on. Therefore we had hopes that additional measures would be brought in to take care of these settlers. But here we have a measure which represents the sum total of what the government intends to do for them. So it is only natural that our attitude toward the resolution to-day should be different from our attitude at the time it was discussed in committee, because at that time we thought further legislation would be brought down. The hon. member for Rosthern has had a great deal to say about the decision of the legion convention in Saskatchewan, but I am sure he will admit that at times the people of Saskatchewan do funny things.

Mr. TUCKER: I am forced to admit that; but not often.

Mr. QUELCH: Let me remind the hon. gentleman that the legion command in Alberta voted that clear titles be given these soldier settlers. The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) placed that resolution on record some time ago, and referred to it again to-night; but I cannot take any responsibility for what the legion does in Saskatchewan. What probably happened there, I think, was this. At that convention I believe that there was a good deal of lobbying, and that it was explained to the delegates that if they asked that clear title be given the old soldiers it might prejudice government action in regard to soldier settlers under the new bill. I have no fear that just because we may give clear titles to the old veterans of the first war, the new veterans will cease to make their payments. I think it is utter nonsense to suggest that any soldier of this war would wait for twenty-seven years in order to get title. He wants his title just as quickly as he can get it; and I think the records have proved that whenever a soldier settler has had the money to pay, he has paid. So that if to-day we gave clear title to these old veterans I am sure there would be no question of the soldier settler of this war wanting to wait for twenty-seven years in order to get clear title also. However, I believe it may have been argued at that convention that this action would be detrimental in this way, and I think that may be why they took that stand.

We frequently hear members of the government eulogizing the government programme in regard to the rehabilitation of veterans of world war II, and I will agree that this programme is good. There may be exceptions to that statement, but I think it compares favourably with the programmes of other nations. On the other hand, however, I would say that the government's programme in regard to the veterans of world war I is altogether inadequate. To-day veterans of the first war are old men. What chance, for instance, will the men coming out of the veterans' guard have to get back into industry? The ages of these veterans range from fifty-five to eighty, so they have not a chance. It is all very well for the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) to be so optimistic about the four thousand soldier settlers on the land to-day and to say that men who have an equity of 30 per cent are almost sure to be able to pay for their land. Let me remind the hon. member that in 1929 there were many farmers who did not owe a cent; who had paid up their life insurance and had money in the bank, but who lost their farms five or six years later. If men in that position can lose their farms I suggest that we should not be overoptimistic about men who have only a 30 per cent equity in their farms and who, in many instances have nothing but old machinery.

As we know, the history of the old soldier settlers has been tragic. Of the 25,000 who settled on the land, in the neighbourhood of 16,000 lost their land. The hon. member for Rosthern stated that 5,600 have paid up, but we still have some 4,000 who, generally speaking, have only a small equity in their land. The resolution before the house is based upon order in council 10472, and for a little while I wish to deal with the history of that order in council, the reason it was brought forward and to what extent it covers the needs of the soldier settlers. P.C. 10472 came into being very largely as the result of a recommendation of the committee on veterans affairs that sat in 1942. I want to read to the house the recommendation of the legion to the committee at that time, which recommendation is to be found at page 158 of the committee's proceedings for Friday, July 10, 1942:

> The legion, therefore, recommends that the principle contained in section 9 of the new bill, respecting the veteran's debt should, as far as possible, be applied to soldier settlers under the old act and that the director be given power to rewrite contracts accordingly.

On page 162 of the same proceedings I find this statement by the chairman of that committee:

> I was going to point out that failures have been largely due to circumstances over which the settler had no control. What we should attempt to do, I think, in making a report, or suggested amendments, is to try to bring this situation of settlers in distress in conformity with the present bill 65.

I do not think the hon. member for Rosthern or the minister would try to argue that order in council 10472 did bring the old Soldier Settlement Act into conformity with the new one. It is only necessary to read the two recommendations to see that in reality the order in council was the negation of the recommendation made by that committee. I say that because in the recommendation of the committee we find it recommended that soldier settlers be given equity in their land. When that recommendation was made it was the general understanding of the members of the committee that the equity would be along the lines of that given under the new act. I could quote member after member speaking in the committee who advocated that the principle of the new act should apply to the old. I have already quoted the chairman as saying that the aim of the committee should be to give to the soldier of the last war the same benefits as received by the soldier of this one, under the act.

So, when the recommendation read that equity should be given, the understanding was that the equity would be along the lines of that given in the new Veterans Land Act. But what do we find in the order in council? We find in it that there is no provision for any equity. I quote section 1 (b):

(b) make application to the director for a reduction of his indebtedness to the director, and the treasury board may on the recommendation of the director confirm or reduce such indebtedness, provided, however, that the recommendation made by the director shall be based upon the amount which in his judgment constitutes the present and prospective productive value of the land; the effective date of reduction if any shall be the standard date in 1942.

In other words, if the director had followed out the order in council in detail he would have reduced the debt of the soldier settler only down to the actual value of the land. The soldier would have had no equity in the land at all. Fortunately, I believe, for the veterans, the director of the soldier settlement board did go beyond the order in council, and he did provide some equity.

On the other hand if, when the adjustments were made, the old soldier settlers had been given equity to bring them into line with the soldiers settling under the new act, they would have been given an equity of at least 33⅓ per cent, because that is the equity so granted under that act.

Under the new act the veteran is given an equity of 23½ per cent, and he pays down 10 per cent himself, so that he has an equity of about 33⅓ per cent. In addition, he is given a grant of $1,200 for machinery. So that actually in land and machinery he has an equity of 46 per cent.

If a soldier settler had been given an equity of 33⅓ per cent four years ago, then naturally, after four years of war and good prices for farm products one would expect to find that soldier settler in far better shape than merely having an equity of 33⅓ per cent. If a soldier settler cannot increase his equity considerably during a period of high prices, what chance would he have to increase it in later years, when prices may have fallen?

In spite of the fact that the soldier was supposed to have been given an equity of 33⅓ per cent, we find that to-day there are 1,446 settlers with an average equity of only 30 per cent. So that apparently they made no progress at all. We find there are 518 with an equity of only 14 per cent. If they were given an equity of 33⅓ per cent they must have gone back. Then there are 203 with no equity at all. Surely these figures are evidence that the intentions of the 1942 committee were not carried out.

I hold in my hand sessional paper 125B. In this paper the question is asked:

How many of the 3,800 soldier settlers classified in grades 3 and 4 as at March 31, 1942, have had their debts adjusted under P.C. 10472?

The answer is:

1,739 debt reductions have been approved by treasury board to May 31, 1946; further 72 cases are under review.

The second question was:

How many of the above failed to make an application under this order?

The figure given in reply was 1,787. I think the reason is obvious. Forms were sent out, and it is stated on those forms that their debts would be readjusted so that the amount of the debt would be equal to the value of the land. Then they were asked to sign the forms for another twenty-five years. A lot of them said, "Thank you for nothing," and made no application at all.

Then the third question:

How many of those, whose debts were adjusted, had their debts reduced to the point where they had an equity in their land of (a) over 30 per cent; (b) over 15 per cent; (c) under 15 per cent, based upon 1941-42 values?

The reply is that only 377 were given an equity of 30 per cent, 1,298 an equity of 15 per cent and sixty-four an equity under 15 per cent.

These figures prove conclusively that the intentions of the 1942 committee were not carried out. I am not blaming the director of the soldier settlement board, because he went farther than he had a right to go under the order in council. I am, however, criticizing the government for passing an order in council that was a direct negation of the recommendation of the 1942 committee.

When the question of giving clear titles to veterans in the last war came up in committee there was a good deal of discussion, and I think that generally the committee was sympathetic to it. But as I have said, however, when the time for the vote came the forces were marshalled so that there was no chance that those who were in favour of it would win out. But what I am surprised at is this, that when a motion was put to grant the soldier settlers of the last war an equity of 33⅓ per cent, the committee turned it down by a vote of twenty-one to thirteen. Again, of course, that was the direct result of bringing into the committee all the reserve army of government members. Four cabinet ministers were included in that reserve, just to make sure that it would carry out the wishes of the government in that regard.

The government could have at least given soldiers of the last war that much consideration. It would have been right in line with the recommendations of the 1942 committee. Mind you, the whole basis of the new Veterans Land Act is that a soldier has no chance ever to pay for his land unless, when he starts out, he has an equity of 33⅓ per cent. The mortgage companies take the stand that a man must have an equity of 50 per cent in his land if he is ever to pay for it.

If it is necessary for soldier settlers under the new act, men who are young, men who, generally speaking, have fairly new equipment, to have an equity of 33⅓ per cent to pay for their land how much more necessary is it for old soldier settlers ranging in ages from fifty-five to seventy years to have an equity of 33⅓ per cent if they are to pay for their land.

Yet, strange as it seems, the committee recorded a vote against giving them that equity. The minister repeatedly asks the question: Are you in favour of the present resolution? I would reply in this way: If you find a starving man and someone offers him a small crumb, even it be a small crumb I would say by all means give it to him. Therefore I shall support the resolution as being just one small donation; but it does not begin to meet the need.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I gave an assurance this afternoon to the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that an opportunity would be afforded of discussing the questions raised this afternoon by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Perhaps the house would consent to have the debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Merritt the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

CASE OF SERGEANT T. BUCK SUZUKI

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I should like to bring before the house a case which is dissimilar to those that have been discussed this evening but which I think should be presented to the house. This is the case of Sergeant T. Buck Suzuki, No. B-90180. This is a case of real injustice. This man served with distinction in the Malaya command. After the outbreak of the Pacific war he was moved out of the coastal area in British Columbia and his wife and baby are in Ontario. I may say that he has never seen his child. His parents are naturalized Canadians and his wife was born in this country.

I have communicated with the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) regarding the disposal of this man's property. We have heard a lot about the property of soldier settlers to-night. This property was sold for $1,963.33 by the custodian and I am told that that is considerably below its actual value. There is an insurance policy of $3,000 covering the house, and furniture to the value of $500. I am trying to summarize this as quickly as I can. There were over seven acres of land which were never assessed below $100 an acre, and the house was rebuilt in December, 1941. This man states that he can obtain from a builder a statement that a house similar to his would cost between $4,000 and $4,500.

To-day I had from the Secretary of State with whom I have been communicating a letter which really does not answer my questions regarding the disposal of this property of a man who served creditably in the armed forces. It merely states that the property belonging to this man was one of those acquired under the Veterans Land Act, that the amount realized is standing to his credit in the Vancouver office, and that it is a very small amount. In addition, the evacuation section of the Department of the Secretary of State have told this man whose property has been sold that a small amount for legal fees in connection with the conveyance of the property will be charged later.

I am bringing this matter to the attention of the house because here we have a man who served with credit. He happens to be a Canadian of Japanese origin who rose to the rank of sergeant. He comes back to this country and finds that during his absence his property—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Did he serve with the Canadian forces?

Mr. COLDWELL: With the Malayan command. He found that his property had been sold for a sum of money which, on its face, was ridiculously low and, in addition, he is faced with having to pay legal fees in connection with this sale. I am placing this case briefly before the house because I believe it should be drawn to the attention of the house being, as I contend, a matter of injustice.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be very glad to see that the case is investigated by the veterans affairs committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Miscellaneous grants—

Grant to Health League of Canada, $10,000.

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, this afternoon on the debate on the interim supply bill the hon. member for Lake Centre raised the question of a press release dealing with the suspension of ration banking facilities at La Banque Provinciale du Canada. I promised to give a statement this evening on this matter.

The system of ration coupon banking is a convenience to business introduced so as to simplify the handling and distribution of rationed commodities. The chartered banks are used as agents of the wartime prices and trade board to centralize the accounting of coupons deposited and to enable ration cheques to be used by business men in settling for purchases of rationed commodities and thus avoid the repeated handling of large quantities of individual coupons. Naturally it is necessary under the system that the banks provide a service to include the careful checking of coupons and operation of the ration coupon accounts in accordance with regulations of the wartime prices and trade board. For these services the banks are paid a fee, depending on the nature and volume of the transactions.

In the case of La Banque Provinciale du Canada there has been considerable difficulty in obtaining a proper operation of the system and the bank does not appear willing to provide the services required. As a consequence, the regulations of the board respecting the safeguarding of the coupons and the accounts have not been observed. A number of prosecutions are now pending against some individuals on the staff of La Banque Provinciale du Canada. The charges include the facilitating of black market operations. It is not possible to state precisely how long these particular irregularities have continued, since the investigations on which prosecutions will be based are not yet completed. In all the circumstances the board has reached the conclusion that the services of the bank will not be utilized in this connection after July 31. It is necessary to provide some advance notice of this intention in order that transactions pending or in process may be properly completed.

While the decision may cause some inconvenience to the ration coupon accounts affected, it should be remembered that these accounts are not part of the ordinary banking accounts, which are, of course, not affected in any way by the action taken by the board or the irregularities mentioned. Moreover, the board would be willing to reinstate La Banque Provinciale du Canada if adequate assurance can be obtained that they will provide the services required.

The hon. member asked why this statement was not made in the house instead of by means of a press release. The action taken by the board followed considerable discussion with senior officials of La Banque Provinciale du Canada, as a part of the administrative duty of the board. It is also part of the administrative duty of the board to enforce its regulations wherever violations are discovered, and it was not considered that this instance constituted a matter of policy which needed to be brought to the attention of the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly the hon. gentleman will be able to give additional information because the information he has now furnished is indefinite. Will he be able to advise the nature or degree of the irregularities in black marketing that have been ascertained as a result of the investigation, also the number of prosecutions that are being taken and the number of informations that have been laid as of this time?

Mr. MAYHEW: I have learned a great deal about this transaction since I left the house about 4.30 p.m., but not being a lawyer I hardly know how far I can go without doing an injustice to those who are being charged or to the cause of other governments. But I can go this far. There are at least four, three of whom have already admitted their guilt.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly the minister could go a little farther and indicate the depth of the ramifications. Is it widespread or narrow in compass?

Mr. MAYHEW: There are four banks in Quebec, nine chartered banks altogether. This has affected only one bank. It would not be wise for me to go any farther at the present time. There will be other occasions for giving information. I shall be pleased to give it personally to my hon. friend if he wishes.

Mr. FULTON: The bank coupon system referred to by the parliamentary assistant is run, I understand, very much like a checking account, except that the currency is ration coupons instead of money. It is fairly easy for a bank to make an honest or a dishonest mistake, just as it is easy for a merchant to make an honest mistake. I should like to know if the ramifications include only bank officials or extend to merchants who have had transactions with the bank.

Mr. MAYHEW: It affects both.

Mr. POULIOT: As a matter of personal explanation, may I say to the parliamentary assistant that I did not run away from the battle this afternoon. He did not answer me at once and unfortunately I had to leave the chamber. I would say that what I want is not discussion in my office with anyone from the Bank of Canada. I want a public explanation in the house. That is all.

Mr. MAYHEW: I assure the hon. member for Temiscouata that I was not reflecting in any way upon him because I realized fully that he was looking for information. So far as the answer to his question is concerned, it will be given to him in the budget debate.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have a few more questions to ask, and possibly it would be better if I just read that portion of the press release to which I intend to make reference:

Officials of the board explained that they had repeatedly drawn the bank's attention to irregularities in handling coupon accounts and had recommended safeguards to protect the public.

Would the parliamentary assistant be able to advise how many branches of this bank were involved, where they are located, for what period of time the irregularities had been brought to the attention of the board and the bank warned that a continuation of them would not be permitted?

Mr. MAYHEW: In my statement I said that I could not advise the house how long these irregularities had been going on because it was felt that might prejudice the case so far as the government was concerned. If my memory serves me aright, more than one branch of the same bank is involved. Naturally, in a transaction of this kind where there is crooked work it takes more than one man to be crooked, and there had to be men outside the bank as well as inside the bank.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is now almost eleven o'clock. Possibly between now and to-morrow afternoon the hon. gentleman will be able to procure certain further information, because it appears that as yet we have not received very full information. I do not want to bring up any matter that would in any manner prejudice the case, but surely the house is entitled to know something of these irregularities, their extent and the degree of enforcement by the board, for apparently this has been continuing for a considerable period and must have had wide ramifications. Certainly it deserves a wider and better explanation than the hon. gentleman has so far given.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. St. Amour, formerly of La Banque Provinciale, is one of the bigwigs of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is a very fine lawyer and knows that it might be embarrassing at the moment to disclose certain information which might prejudice the processes of justice in the prosecutions that may be pending. But any information that may properly be given will gladly be given.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would it be possible to give at the same time the scale of salaries paid by this bank to its employees so that we may know whether they were paid a sufficient amount of remuneration to remove them from temptation in responsible positions?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think that is a reasonable request.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 26, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Government House
Ottawa, June 26, 1946.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Thibaudeau Rinfret, Chief Justice of of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, June 27, at 5.50 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

DISCOVERY OF LIBERATOR BOMBER LOST IN 1943—REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): I should like to make a statement concerning an article which appeared in the Montreal Herald yesterday morning with a front page headline which said: "Bodies Looted in Air Crash."

Yesterday I arranged a press conference at 10.30 a.m., at which the search party which had just returned from the scene of the crash gave full details to the press as to what they had found. Squadron Leader Cobb, the leader of the party, denied the reports that the wreck had been looted, and said he was positive that he and his party were the first to reach the wreck. In spite of that statement last night the Evening Citizen published on the front page a report from the Montreal Herald, and beside it the accurate report from the press conference. The heading for both articles was "Bodies Looted After Crash," followed by a question mark. I do not want to give my opinion of this type of journalism, but I must say it appears to me that the feelings of the relatives of those who lost their lives received little consideration.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

MALTON AIRCRAFT FACTORY

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. What was the total dominion government outlay on account of Malton airplane factory?
2. What types of planes and how many planes were built at the said factory?
3. What was the total cost of such planes?
4. How many have since been disposed of and how much has been realized from the sales?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. $7,243,410.75.

2. 197 Lysander aircraft; 422 Lancaster bomber aircraft; 8 Lancaster transport aircraft; 1 York transport aircraft; 736 Avro Anson aircraft; total—1364. (Together with spare parts).

3. $153,681,723.67.

VETERANS LAND ACT—PURCHASE OF FARMS IN HASTINGS COUNTY, ONTARIO

Mr. STOKES:

1. How many farms were purchased in Hastings county, Ontario, by the Soldier Settlement Board?

2. Where were they situated and what was the acreage in each case?

3. From whom were they purchased and what was the price paid in each case?

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member indicated that he wished an answer in regard to the lands purchased under the Veterans Land Act instead of the soldier settlement board. There is no answer to the question as to the prices paid, in accordance with the principle set out at page 951 of Hansard of April 17, 1946. Subject to that reservation the answers are as follows:

1. Nine farms in Hastings county have been purchased under the Veterans Land Act.

2 and 3. Location—Acreage—Vendor:

S.E. ¼ lot 14, lot 13, S. ½ of N. ¼ lot 12 and N. ½ lot 14, Con. 11, Twp. Elzevier, 329, Giles W. Shields.

Lot 10, Con. 4, Twp. Madoc, 200, Ben Miller.

Pt. lot 20, Con. 1, Twp. Rawdon, 65, H. C. Martin.

N.W. ¼ lot 24, Con. 4, Twp. Rawdon, 50, R. I. and E. C. Clancey.

E. ½ lot 21, Con. 6, Twp. Rawdon, 100, Geo. D. Watson.

N. ½ lot 8, Twp. Thurlow, 98, Samuel E. Townsend.

Pt. lot 13, Con. 9, Twp. Thurlow, 90, Mrs. Leah Easson.

N. pt. lot 3, Con. 4, Twp. Tyendinaga, 79, John A. Ross.

Pt. lot 11, Con. 8, Twp. Tyendinaga, 100, Wesley Crawford.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—JOHN FISHER

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is Mr. John Fisher of Toronto employed there by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

2. If so, what is his salary and other allowances?

3. How long has he resided in Toronto?

4. What various offices has he held in the corporation and what experience or knowledge had he before appointment?

5. Is he employed by any other broadcasting system or programme? If so, in what capacity?

Mr. McCANN:

1. Yes.

2. It is not the policy of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to make public individual salaries.

[Mr. C. W. G. Gibson.]

He receives no allowances, but is reimbursed for out-of-pocket expenses.

3. Since January, 1943.

4. Mr. Fisher is an LL.B. of Dalhousie university. Before joining the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation he had been engaged in legal research for the Rowell Sirois commission in public relations work for the Halifax Herald (four years) and for the wartime prices and trade board. Some broadcasting experience in Halifax.

5. Mr. Fisher has a weekly commercial programme for Purity flour.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION AND SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Have any contracts between the International Typographical Union and Canadian newspaper publishers, prior to November, 1945, contained a clause providing in any way for the excepting of the union's laws, not relating to hours, wages and working conditions, from arbitration?

2. If so, with what newspapers and dating back how long?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSTON:

N.E.; D. Moss, 535 25th avenue, N.E.; E. K. Elton, 419 27th avenue, N.E.; D. Dahl, 602 25th avenue, N.E., Calgary, Alberta.

2. A statement with respect to each of the above, showing (a) total expenditure to date; (b) further expenditures committed to; (c) contractors bid according to plans and specifications; (d) purchase price charged veteran.

3. A copy of the inspection report made by Mr. W. D. Mackay, member of the Calgary regional advisory committee on March 29, 1946, on veterans homes in Calgary, Alberta, in the Tuxedo park area.

Mr. TUCKER: Paragraph 1 of this motion has to do with the report of the building inspector to the district construction engineer of the province under the Veterans Land Act administration. These are reports of an officer of the department to his superiors, and I understand that such reports have always been considered privileged. With the exception of paragraph 1, however, there is no objection to the motion being adopted.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not desire to get any secret documents that have passed between departments of the government, but I take it this is not a confidential report at all. It is the mere acceptance of the buildings on behalf of the government, and I do not think that would be betraying any confidence at all. It is a straight business contract, a question whether or not the houses have been accepted by the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. These motions are not debatable. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the reservation mentioned?

Motion agreed to.

TIMBER BERTHS

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

For a return showing (a) the number of feet of lumber and/or other timber products taken by the individuals and firms listed below, from their respective timber berths, to date; (b) the amount of money received by the government from each firm or individual for such products; (c) area of each berth; (d) amount of ground rent; (e) royalties or other fees paid annually by each of the following:

Wilfred Davidson, Sturgeon Falls, Ontario; Rudolph-McChesney Lumber Company, Limited, Timmins, Ontario; Bloedel, Stewart & Welsh, Limited, Vancouver, British Columbia; R. D. & K. R. Brooks, Prince Albert, Saskatchewan; Howard W. Brown, Flagstone, British Columbia; S. S. Clapperton, Port Loring, Ontario; Standard Logging Company, Nanaimo, British Columbia; The Imperial Lumber Company, Limited, Edmonton, Alberta; Cranbrook Sash & Door Company Limited, Cranbrook, British Columbia; A. H. Brunne & Company, Port Loring, Ontario; Pacific Mills Limited, Ocean Falls, British Columbia; Brown Corporation, Bersimis, Quebec; T. L. Garner, Westholme, British Columbia; Charles Q. Cox, Port Arthur, Ontario; The London and Western Trusts Company Limited, London, Ontario; The Ontario-Minnesota Pulp & Paper Company Limited, Kenora, Ontario; P. H. Barnett & T. B. Barnett, Vancouver, British Columbia; Kishan Singh Parhar, Ladysmith, British Columbia; Fred W. Kirkland, Vancouver, British Columbia.

[Mr. Johnston.]

ADJOURNMENT ON FRIDAY UNTIL JULY 2

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved:

That when the house adjourns on Friday, June 28 instant, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, July 2 next.

Motion agreed to.

RATIONING

CIRCULATION OF FORGED COUPONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Last evening at the conclusion of the sitting I asked the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance whether he would furnish further information than he had given at that time in regard to the forged coupons that had passed through La Banque Provinciale du Canada. Is he in a position today to say to what extent these false or forged coupons were circulated through the bank, particularly in view of the fact that the administrator of consumer rationing of the wartime prices and trade board, speaking in Montreal yesterday, said it had been ascertained that a million and a half pounds of butter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —were covered by false coupons?

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): I do not think it would be advisable for me to say anything more on this subject than I said yesterday. There will be ample opportunity for further discussion when the estimates of the Minister of Justice, particularly those dealing with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, are under consideration. Any information it is considered advisable to give can be given on that occasion.

PACIFIC COAST COMMUNICATIONS

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE SERVICES IN RURAL BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Reconstruction, notice of which I have sent him, dealing with a matter of immediate and urgent importance to a large number of citizens of British Columbia. What arrangements have been agreed upon to make available the telegraph and telephone services in rural British Columbia recently disposed of to private interests? The services to which I refer are those formerly operated under the dominion government, known as the Pacific coast communications system.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I received notice of the question by my hon. friend. It has been necessary to send a teletype to Montreal to obtain the information, and the reply has not come to hand. If I may accept this as notice of the question I shall be glad to answer it to-morrow.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In reply to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) about arrangements for the return to the lake ships of crews recently on strike, I will outline the instructions given in this connection covering both those who previously manned the ships and new men the companies might require.

The order issued by the government requires every unlicensed man, that is a man below officer rank, who was a member of the crew of a boat at the time of the stoppage of work quoted, to return to his boat and duties. If the master of the ship finds it necessary to increase his crew he is required to obtain men from the nearest national employment office. If and when an employment office obtains a request for men from the master of a ship the staff shall follow the normal procedure, and in respect to union membership that procedure is to check to see if the shipping company has an agreement with the union and to comply with the terms of the agreement. If, for example, as is the case with some of the companies, the agreement requires that only members of a certain organization shall be employed, it is the duty of the employment office to assist in seeing that the agreement is carried out. This is customary practice and one which is well understood by our officials and others concerned.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY EMPLOYEES—PENSION RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I desire to lay on the table copy of a letter received from Mr. W. Manson, vice president personnel, Canadian Pacific Railway company, dated May 26, 1946, together with copy of Mr. Manson's memorandum commenting on Mr. H. S. Johnstone's report to the Minister of Labour on pension rights of certain employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway and associated express and steamship companies. I promised to do this for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. COLDWELL: Have you the comments also of the men affected?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think that is pretty well covered.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

AMENDMENT AFFECTING RATES OF INTEREST

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 25, consideration of the motion of Hon. Ian A. Mackenzie (Minister of Veterans Affairs) that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Soldier Settlement Act to provide that a soldier settler within the provisions of the act who served in world war II who has not abandoned his land and whose agreement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned, and a soldier settler who did not serve in world war II who has not abandoned his land and whose agreement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned, shall be charged in the case of the soldier settler of world war II a rate of interest of three and one-half per centum per annum in respect of his agreement made under the act after the standard date in the year 1942 or the date of his enlistment whichever is the earlier and in the case of a soldier settler who did not serve in world war II a rate of interest of three and one-half per centum per annum after the standard date in the year 1944.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, certain remarks were made last evening by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) which I feel should not be permitted to pass without being elaborated upon or explained and the other side of the picture presented to this house. I regret there was not time to do this last evening, when we were all in the mood to continue the discussion. The hon. member for Rosthern mentioned that if we were going to discuss all the details of veterans affairs upon which agreement had not been reached in the veterans affairs committee, we might be here until next September; in fact he suggested that the whole time of this house might be taken up with veterans affairs from now until September. I should like to point out that the house has had very few opportunities during this session to discuss the affairs of the returned men and women. Many of us on both sides are here because at the time of the last election we were interested in trying to do something for our comrades, and I am quite certain that was the main motive which prompted many new members to seek election. I do not think I am exaggerating if I say that the reestablishment of our ex-service men and women, both of this war and of world war I, is one of the main issues of the day. I pine for the cool breezes of the Pacific coast and I am anxious to get home, just as are the majority of members here. But if it is necessary for us to stay here until next September in order that we may get well-deserved benefits for old soldiers, what of it?

Mr. REID: Why September? We will go to Christmas. I am willing to go to Christmas. I am here to stay, to the last shot.

Mr. PEARKES: If that is the only interruption to-day, I shall not mind.

Reference was made to the method of conducting the business in the committee of veterans affairs. I wish to have the record straight in this respect. While the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) gave his impressions and his interpretation of how the business of that committee is being conducted, I do not think all members see that business being conducted in quite the same way as he did.

I hold in my hand an article written by Mr. Walter A. Tucker, the chairman of the parliamentary committee—who, of course, is the hon. member for Rosthern—published in Veterans Affairs, which is a publication under the authority of the Hon. Ian A. Mackenzie. This copy, dated December 15 of last year, contains the following:

> Throughout its proceedings the committee has adopted a purely non-partisan approach to all questions.

Mr. TUCKER: In effect, I said the same thing last night.

Mr. PEARKES: This was an article explaining the purpose of the committee on veterans affairs. It gave the same impression as the one I had received up to last Christmas. On numerous occasions I quoted that same paragraph. I quoted it, and with pride, when I was speaking to the various branches of the Canadian Legion in my own constituency at Christmas time, because I believed it reflected the true attitude of the committee on veterans affairs up to that time. But there has come a change in the attitude adopted in the committee—or perhaps I should say by certain members of the committee—during this session. I think one might divide the committee into two parts. There are what I would call the regular attendants, those who are able to put to one side their other parliamentary business in order to devote their main attention to the matters affecting the veterans whose affairs are being discussed by the committee. I say that those regular attendants are still adopting a strictly non-partisan attitude. Liberal members have spoken against other Liberal members. C.C.F., Social Crediters and members of the Progressive Conservative party have not been afraid to express views different from those held by other members of their own particular political persuasions. I believe each man has spoken in the light of his experience. I believe each has voted, when votes have been called, in accordance with his own good, sound judgment.

Those regular attendants have listened to briefs presented by various veteran organizations throughout Canada. They have heard hours and hours of evidence given by officials of the different departments. They have listened to speeches by their chairman which have been both tense and sincere. If at times they have been rather long and perhaps a little difficult to follow because of repetition, we have always credited our chairman with great sincerity and earnestness of purpose.

After serious discussion, various recommendations have been made, not always unanimously but always with the vote of the majority of those attending that committee. Then, on some occasions the committee has gone into camera sittings, when the attitude of the government has been explained.

Mr. TUCKER: I dislike rising on a point of order, but I do suggest to my hon. friend that a discussion of what the committee has done, in general, is out of order in the debate on this particular resolution. If we are to get this work done, then I submit—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is speaking to a point of order, and I would ask other hon. members to hear him state it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You talked all over the show last night for forty-five minutes.

Mr. TUCKER: I would say, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to debate the general proceedings of the committee, every member has the same right to go into it as the hon. member who is now speaking.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You did last night.

Mr. TUCKER: There is no question that if we are going into this at great length, we shall not be dealing with the resolution now before the house, which has as its purpose a reduction of the interest rate from five per cent to three and one-half per cent. I just bring this matter to your attention, sir. If it is the desire of the house to debate the proceedings of the committee in a general way, without relationship to the business now before the house, then personally I have no objection. It is just a matter of observing the rules.

Mr. STIRLING: If that be the point of order I have a remark to make. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. We listened to the chairman of the committee at considerable length, and he most certainly dealt with what had happened in the committee.

Mr. TUCKER: Only, if I may say so, in reference to this resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: I asked hon. members last night to discuss only the principle of the resolution, because afterwards the house will go into committee. There will be opportunity to discuss the matter in detail in committee on the resolution and on the bill. Therefore I would ask hon. members to be kind enough to confine their remarks to the principle of the resolution before the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. PEARKES: In order to make clear my attitude respecting the principle involved in the resolution, I should like to point out that after these camera sittings of the committee to which I have just referred, and the proceedings of which I pass over without comment, the government came down and explained its attitude. The committee then reassembled and conferred with the idea of seeing whether it was possible to come to an agreement, because the Minister of Veterans Affairs repeatedly asked the committee if at all possible to reach a unanimous opinion. There was a desire in the committee to cooperate. Unfortunately some of the later conferences reminded me of conferences I held when I was in the army, which were more on the type of an order group than what is generally meant by a conference in which discussions are held. At those meetings I would adopt the attitude and say, "Gentlemen, I have told you my plan, are there any questions? If not, thank you very much, that is all." In other words, take it or leave it. If, however, the committee was not prepared to accept all the recommendations of the government, then there would be whining and bellowing much the same as there was last night. Questions which had been settled would be reopened. The Liberal whip would appear at the door, heads would be counted, and back-benchers and cabinet ministers would slide into their places. New recommendations were made. I realize that some hon. gentlemen could not give as much time to the work of the committee as others, but they still remained on the committee. They came forward. The only thing that really counted was their vote; it did not matter whether they had heard any of the previous arguments. Their votes were urgently required. Last night an hon. member said something about their voting against their conscience. I do not think he meant that, and I certainly would not go as far, but I must admit it was a source of amazement to me that their conscience allowed them to vote at all.

Mr. TUCKER: I am surprised—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: On a point of order; the procedure referred to by the hon. member was not adopted in regard to this particular bill in any way, shape or form and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what conceivable connection it can have with this resolution? My hon. friends opposite can applaud and defend a breach of the rules if they wish, but I again ask you, sir, to apply the rules to the hon. member the same as to any one else.

Mr. SPEAKER: Last night when this resolution was discussed it was said that it had been prepared with the unanimous consent of the committee. I understand that the hon. member was answering some of the questions that have been asked. I have permitted some hon. members on both sides of the house to discuss what happened in the committee before the resolution was introduced in the house, and I think I should allow the hon. member for Nanaimo to do the same.

Mr. PEARKES: I do not intend to take much more of the time of the house on this argument, because I think I have already made my point. It is idle and futile to say that the decision made by the committee after the mobile reserve had been called in was the unanimous opinion of that committee. I suggest that the government is attempting to use the committee on veterans affairs as a shock absorber, just as it attempted to use the dominion convention of the Canadian legion.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have permitted the hon. gentleman to answer other hon. members who spoke about what happened in the committee, but I believe now he should confine his remarks to the principle of the resolution before the house.

Mr. PEARKES: I shall come definitely to the principle of the resolution. We were asked repeatedly last night whether we were in favour of the resolution. I am not in favour of the resolution. We were asked last night whether we would accept the responsibility of asking to have the resolution withdrawn. I accept the responsibility of asking to have the resolution withdrawn, provided that the government will give an honourable understanding that before the close of this session it will bring down a new bill giving more generous terms to these old soldiers whom we are now considering. I am not in favour of any bill that is only a half measure.

I ask the parliamentary assistant to notice the words I used, "giving more generous terms." I do not know how far he and the government are prepared to go in that respect. It has been suggested that these old soldiers be given clear title after twenty or twenty-five years to the land they obtained through the soldier settlement board. All the arguments in favour of granting such free title have been presented, such as the age that these men have reached, their inability to find a place in the labour market and the fact that many of them left their farms to serve in home defence units, such as the veterans guard and security guard and so forth, and rendered valuable service during world war II, but suffered additional infirmities because of the exposure they underwent. All these have been advanced.

It has been pointed out also that partly because their service was in Canada only, partly because they have already received some consideration from the soldier settlement board, and partly because of their age, they are not entitled to receive all the benefits of the Veterans Land Act. The attitude of the government in this connection is having an effect upon young veterans of this war who are considering going on the land. That statement is borne out by the figures which were tabled last March showing that up to March 31 only 5,000 out of hundreds of thousands of returned men had actually taken out the full farm benefits under the Veterans Land Act. This is attributable to many causes, one of which is the feeling that their fathers did not get a square deal from the soldier settlement board.

I take it the government is anxious to establish on the land as many veterans as possible. Let us give them encouragement. It has been suggested that these young men will prefer to wait for twenty-five years knowing that they will receive something for nothing, and because they have the example of some poor old soldier of the first great war who lived in hardship for that length of time and who had some of his indebtedness remitted by a generous government I do not believe that those who advance that type of argument are in touch with young Canada at all. I think they have failed entirely to interpret the determination of the veteran of this war to get reestablished and to continue to do something for the service of his country.

The government may not feel inclined to give clear title. The government may feel that it cannot write off all the soldier settler's indebtedness. We are having examples of the government writing off very considerable sums, examples of government moneys being spent to buy equipment which afterwards was sold for a song. Be that as it may there are other ways in which more generous treatment could be accorded to these old soldiers. Their indebtedness might be reduced. There is plenty of time yet to reconsider during this session the bill which is to be placed before the house. Other bills far more complicated than this one have been withdrawn at the eleventh hour of the session, rewritten, brought down again and passed. Therefore I ask the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs whether he is prepared now to withdraw the resolution, on the understanding that it will be brought down again this session in such form as to give more generous terms to these old soldier settlers. If he is not prepared to give that undertaking, then it may be that I shall be forced to vote for the resolution, because I do not want to stand in the way of any soldier getting even the small additional advantage that this meagre resolution offers to him.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I fancy that I am in a unique position in rising to speak on this resolution, not because of my attitude toward the resolution itself, but because of the fact that so far the discussion has had little or nothing to do with the subject matter of the resolution.

I am one of those who in this house a year ago advocated the granting of clear title, for reasons which I gave at the time. I think it is uneconomic to send good money after bad. If we are not going to leave it to the house and the people of this country to read the proceedings of the committee, I am entitled to say on my own behalf that when a member of the committee brought forward a resolution to grant clear title I supported it. I think that was the only recorded vote that has taken place in the veterans committee in the last two parliaments. My word on that cannot be questioned. While I lost my vote on that resolution, I was one of those who, in spite of all the whining and bellowing which the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) mentioned, and now the braying which has followed it, accepted unanimously this much, that we have in the resolution now before us.

I have been a member of the veterans' committee since it was first established after the elections of 1935, except for a few breaks during 1941 and 1942. I have boasted across this country to the legionnaires of Canada and their families and friends that the veterans' committee was one committee in which members drawn from every corner of the house had sat together and done their best to interpret the generosity and good will of the people of Canada to the veterans of Canada without any resort to politics. I will say that with certain lamentable exceptions we have been singularly free from party politics in the veterans' committee, and I am proud of that.

I have to agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo when he says that party lines have frequently been cut across in the veterans committee with respect to soldier legislation. Why in heaven's name, when we have before us now a resolution embodying a concession to the soldier settlers which I admit is less than on two occasions I advocated in the veterans committee, there should be an attempt, as there has been in the last fifteen minutes, to play politics, a bald-faced attempt to play the cheapest electioneering kind of politics, is something I cannot understand. I have no hesitation in saying that. I invite anybody to read the record. This is my thirteenth session; I have been completely free from personalities in this house, and I want to keep my record that way. I have given most of my time outside of the chamber to the veterans committee, and I have been proud of the associations I have had with the friends of the soldiers who have been members of that committee.

This resolution, unsatisfactory as it was to some of us, was adopted unanimously. Why should a resolution adopted unanimously by the committee be used as an opportunity to bring on a political Donnybrook in this house at the expense of the people to whom we owe so much? That is not good enough, and I protest against it with all the sincerity of which I am capable. I understand the game of politics, and I am perfectly free to meet my hon. friends opposite on any committee dealing with any subject other than soldiers affairs, but in the veterans committee politics has been excluded and we have made a contribution that has been worth while to the welfare of the soldiers. I resent most keenly, as most members of the committee will resent and the veterans themselves who understand what is being done for them in this resolution will resent, the tone and tenor of this whole debate.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, not being a veteran I think you should hear a word from me on this subject. I am amazed at the attempt of members on the other side of the house to shift the responsibility on to the shoulders of others when they themselves were responsible for giving these settlers the worst soldier rehabilitation legislation this country ever had. They placed these soldier settlers on land that was growing nothing but jack-pine. The soldier settlers had to cut the jack-pine for a living, and when the jack-pine ran out they had to snare rabbits. Placing the veterans on such poor land, with such poor machinery, and under such poor conditions we could not expect them to be in any other position than the one they are in now. I feel that the government is doing everything possible for these veterans in the circumstances in which others have placed them; therefore I resent the attempt at this time to infringe on the right of the government to accept the responsibiliy which has been placed upon them by the people of this country.

It just shows you the difference. It shows you the advantages which the boys of this war have, and proves that the government of to-day has the war veterans at heart in every respect. Care has been taken in the purchase of the farms with which these men have been provided, to see that they are productive. Throughout the neighbourhood in which I live they have been bought at prices not exceeding $30 an acre; in the last war, on the other hand, prices were paid all the way up to $50 and $60 an acre. Now the boys have not had to pay as much, and their circumstances are altogether different. It has also been provided that out-of-work benefits shall be given the men so that they may not have to spend their gratuities, and those who were obliged to suspend their education are now enabled to resume it.

Once more, to cut the matter short, I would say that this matter has been dealt with in the committee; therefore it would be advisable for us to refrain from threshing old straw so that we shall not be here until Christmas.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Since this matter has been brought up, I should like to make plain the position of a number of members in this group in regard to the resolution. As one who is a veteran of the first world war, I took a great interest in the soldier settlement scheme. I have lived among, and on occasions I have lived with, members of the fighting forces who took up land under the old soldier settlement board scheme, and resolution after resolution has appeared on the order paper of this house asking the government to grant free title to the soldiers of the last war who are still on the land. Now, in order that the house may get a proper picture of the success or failure of that scheme, I would ask the parliamentary assistant, who is now piloting this resolution through the house, to put on the record the number of men, originally 25,000, who under the old soldier settlement board scheme have lost their farms through foreclosure, or deserted them entirely, or were compelled to sign quit claim deeds. The fact that a very small percentage, about twenty per cent, now remain on the land, many of them still in debt, is an indictment from which no government can escape by argument. It is the failure to make that old soldier board settlement scheme work that we protest against.

I know that since this war started these men, who are now approaching the last years of their lives, when they can do little actual hard labour on the farm, have done a remarkable job, and the little group who are left are paying off what they can with the returns they receive, which have been somewhat increased as a result of the war situation.

Let me give some actual cases from my own constituency. First I will take the case of a man near the town of Raymore. These are his cash returns over a period of years. According to the contract he had, he was supposed to pay to the board every year the sum of $225. In 1935 his gross receipts were $350. His harvesting and threshing expenses and taxes amounted to $150, leaving him, for the maintenance of his home and to carry on, the sum of $200. In 1936 his gross receipts were $396, and his expenses were $150, which left him $240 for maintenance of the home. In 1937 his total receipts for the whole farm amounted to just $33, while taxes and repairs —there was no threshing bill because the crop was so small—left him with a loss of $50 on the year's operations. In 1938 he had an income of $274 and expenses of $150, so that he had $124 for the year to keep his family. In 1939 his gross receipts were $620, and he was repaying relief obtained during the years when he tried to carry on with practically no farm income. After paying for repairs to barn and so on he had net proceeds of $354. Imagine that man trying to carry on over the years on less than $1,000 a year! And the next year we find the soldier settlement board clamping down on him, sending inspectors to investigate. I took the matter up because this man was in despair. They were advertising his land for sale because he had not paid the $225 every year.

Mr. TUCKER: Did he apply under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act or under P.C. 10472?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What good does that do? He is losing his land.

Mr. TUCKER: Others who did apply were given a very good adjustment. I wondered whether the hon. member had advised this gentleman to take advantage of the assistance provided either by legislation or by order in council.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: If I had thought he could maintain control of his land and have an equity in it with any future hope of getting title to it, I would so advise him.

Mr. TUCKER: Did you?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes, I did.

Mr. TUCKER: And did he get a satisfactory settlement?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He got a partial settlement, but not before his land was offered for sale. I have another case before me. Apparently the records got twisted in the central office in Saskatoon, and they sent a letter to this man on January 16, 1941, pointing out to him that the amount of his arrears in taxes was $458. But he had cash receipts for taxes or had worked them out in labour; nevertheless they concluded their letter as follows:

> We are definitely notifying you now that if this quit claim deed is not completed and returned to this office prior to the 13th of February that you will leave us no option but to recommend to our head office the immediate rescission of your contract. We are, therefore, hoping that you will return quit claim deed as soon as possible.

Another man encountered difficulties, after doing the best he could. He received particularly embarrassing instructions when he had the sum of $130 left from the year's operations and found it necessary to take his wife to hospital because she was suffering from cancer. She had to receive treatment every month, and this used up practically all the resources he had; then he received from the soldier settlement board notification to the effect that he must try to make further payments. Going back to the year 1925, this man has had gross receipts of $1,491 and payments to the soldier settlement board of $237 each year. His average income has been $783, while he has made payments in other respects each year amounting to $170 from the very small crops that he has had. Having a family to support, he found it almost impossible to carry on the year's operations, and yet the soldier settlement board hounded him from day to day, taking advantage, as it appeared to him, of the situation in which he found himself, to press him when he was least able to pay, thus humiliating him and putting him in a position where he nearly lost his land.

Near the town of Togo one man took up land with two other veterans of the last war. The boys on either side of him gave up in despair because they could not make a go of it, but this man carried on. His wife stayed on the farm, and he filed on another homestead in the north. He operated his little farm as best he could. He went out and proved the other land in the northern part of the country. He finally sold that and took all the money he had and put it in the quarter-section which he had near Togo. He still found himself terrifically in arrears. The administrative office must know that the men who are left on the land cannot now carry on the necessary work and make their proposition pay. To give a reduction of interest rates under the new contract for twenty years is not giving very much to men who are sixty-five years old. Surely for the remainder of the veterans it is not asking for a hand-out; it is asking only for justice that these men be granted a free title to their land. After all, these men have suffered much. I have talked to men who were turned off their land in the bad years by the soldier settlement board. The bitterness in their hearts about the treatment they received from governments over the years when income was small is something which will live long in their memory and in that of their children and their children's children. They will never forget the treatment which has been handed out by this board.

If this scheme is as successful as the parliamentary assistant seems to imply, where are the 15,000 men who started out on it? They gave to it the best years of their work, and they have nothing. Of the 25,000 who started out, 5,000 are left, but I am talking of the 15,000 to whom this scheme was nothing but complete failure. What they think of the treatment accorded to them by the governments of this country is something which one would hate to express. These men gave the best of their lives in the last war; they worked through years when there was no possibility of anyone making a sufficient income even to maintain himself, to say nothing of being held responsible for large payments on the land. I know that reductions were made; I know that certain adjustments were also made. Although the burden was lifted, there was still too much left upon them to make it possible for them to carry on, and the failure of the vast majority is the thing to which we must give our attention.

I am suggesting that you cannot always take the decisions of one particular province. The parliamentary assistant made some reference to the representatives of the British Empire Service League and what conclusions they had arrived at in one particular province. I have found on examining these things that very often in the smaller centres the soldier settler could not make his voice heard. He did not have the opportunity to go to his veterans' meeting or to carry his story to the central organization. In the larger centres it often happened that government officials took charge of the work and gained control of many of the official positions in the British Empire Service League; therefore government policy was always protected. But the boys in the remote areas had no means of making their voices heard, and in a good many cases the problems of the soldier settlers have not been heard. Many of these boys are now scattered and employed in various parts of Canada, and they have no voice in the decisions of the British Empire Service League. The British Empire Service League may pass resolutions at provincial convention which do not take into account the representations of these men who suffered and are now passing out of the picture. I had one case drawn to my attention of a soldier who had bought one of the soldier settler farms. He was receiving a pension on account of an amputation or disability incurred during the war. This pension could not be touched in any way so far as payments were concerned, but he was asked to assign a part of his pension to take care of the rent for his farm, since he had not been able to make the ordinary payments. That is the kind of treatment which makes the opposition in the house demand that the government recognize the failure of the scheme and grant these burnt-out men clear titles to their land, so that in the few remaining years of their lives they may live in peace and without worry.

Mr. BROOKS: I rise to a point of order. On several occasions last evening the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) said that the committee was unanimous in reporting this resolution. The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) made the same statement to-day. I should like to call the attention of the house to the fact that this resolution has been on the order paper since April 12, which is over two and a half months ago. I understand that the reason it was not brought before the house sooner was that the committee had hoped to include other recommendations in this resolution. As the parliamentary assistant knows, two or three other proposals were made in the committee, and the committee had hoped they would be included in the resolution. After two and a half months we find that the resolution now appears before the house in the form in which it was presented on April 12, in spite of the fact that considerable discussion has since taken place in the committee, and in spite of the fact that hon. members made certain motions to have other principles included in the resolution. That, I am sure, is a clear indication to the house that the committee was not unanimous as far as this resolution is concerned. We wanted more included. I make this statement to keep the record straight. We are in favour of the two matters which are raised in the resolution, but we did want and we insisted in the committee that other matters be included. I do not think it is fair to hon. members of the committee who fought to have other principles included to say now that we were unanimous on this resolution.

Mr. MUTCH: On the point of order, since the hon. member has quoted me with respect to this resolution, I was careful to say that this resolution did not embody all that some members of the committee, including myself, wanted. But having failed to achieve that, I said, and I repeat, that having decided in the committee that we were not going to get all that we asked for, the committee unanimously agreed to request that which this resolution asks for.

Mr. BROOKS: The hon. member cannot put that on the record—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. There is no point of order before the house.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to place before the house my views on this matter, because I happen to be the sole Progressive Conservative member for Saskatchewan. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) has given the government's point of view, and other members have expressed the views of the C.C.F. party. The stand taken by the Progressive Conservative party in Saskatchewan is that there should be a discharge of the indebtedness of all soldier settlers holding contracts since the first great war.

Some hon. members say that the Canadian Legion in Saskatchewan is not in favour of that. I realize that the provincial association did not support it, but individual branches all over the province have supported it. The branch in Prince Albert, to which I belong, supported it, and the president of the provincial command is Mr. Walter Whalen, one time president of the Prince Albert branch, and latterly the representative there.

I can see no argument against granting this right to men who have suffered as few others have suffered under similar circumstances during the last twenty-five years. I have visited with them, as have other hon. members. They have gone through difficulties the like of which those who are not acquainted with the circumstances under which they live do not appreciate. There can be no argument against it on the ground of repudiation of debt, because we have the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which regularly reduces and often entirely discharges debt.

So far as any saving to the country is concerned, last evening the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) stated that the director had said in evidence that the cost of administering the soldier settlement indebtedness amounted to some $100,000 a year. Certainly it must have decreased recently, because in a return brought down in 1944 the cost of administration of the soldier settlement indebtedness in the preceding year was given as $646,000. If the remaining indebtedness is amortized over a period of twenty-five years under the order in council pertinent to this matter is will cost to collect the balance of the indebtedness three times as much as is actually owing to-day, on the basis of the figures given in 1943.

There is one other matter I want to mention. I may be in disagreement with other hon. members on this side of the house, but I do not believe the Veterans Land Act is being administered as it should be in the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Or any other province.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Or any other province. I hear more criticism of this department than of any other department. It seems to be paralysed by red tape. I know in my own province those who administer it are discriminating as against certain productive sections. It is impossible to get any action—and any criticism I have to offer I express when the person concerned is present. I have often said to the minister, "You accept the recommendations we make. You give them every consideration. You turn them over to the administrator of the Veterans Land Act, and there they die." Let me give an example. In my constituency, areas that have been productive ever since the C.P.R. came to western Canada are denied the privilege of having soldier settlers.

Mr. TUCKER: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not like to bring this point of order up again, but I put it to you that if you permit the hon. gentleman to proceed I shall be in the dilemma of either undertaking to answer the allegations of the hon. member as to the administration of the Veterans Land Act, which has nothing to do with this resolution, and which would put me out of order, or of letting them go unanswered rather than be out of order myself in speaking to them. In any case it would mean entering upon a debate for which I did not come prepared. I do suggest that the rules of this house are laid down in order that debate may be carried on in an orderly way, and that in debating the administration of the Veterans Land Act on a resolution which has to do with the Soldier Settlement Act the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have followed the lead of my hon. friend. I thought he understood the rules, and last evening he covered the whole ground. Apparently the situation is different to-day.

Mr. TUCKER: I did not mention the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Through you, Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. gentleman that he mentioned everything he could possibly bring in. To-day, however, he objects when we on this side of the house endeavour to answer the charge he made indirectly, and that was made directly this afternoon, that because we want to see certain things changed in regard to veterans affairs we should be charged with partisanship. We are placed in a certain position before the house and the country, and we are answering any suggestion that we who are not members of the committee should be bound by its findings, though to our surprise, as members of the house, that committee apparently did not come to the unanimous decisions that my hon. friend the parliamentary assistant would have us believe. If we are to be bound by a committee—

Mr. TUCKER: Now my hon. friend is suggesting that I made a mistake.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: On the point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I undertsood the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking to a point of order, but I think I have heard enough on this point. Last evening I drew the attention of hon. members to the fact that the house was considering a certain resolution to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, and requested hon. members to make their remarks relevant to that act. All I can do is repeat that request this afternoon.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With the greatest deference, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. I was trying to show that if the same people are administering the present act who administered the Soldier Settlement Act, one can well understand the difficulties some of these soldier settlers have experienced in recent years; and I was just trying to discuss the principle before the house at the moment.

So far as the resolution is concerned, I advocated this in the house in 1941. It is not something new. I believe the first person to interest himself in behalf of the old settlers, in securing a reduction in the interest rate from 5 per cent to 3½ per cent in order to place them on the same basis as those coming under the Veterans Land Act, was Mr. Campbell of the Edmonton Bulletin, who urged this action over a very considerable period of time. We are in favour of this resolution as it stands, but surely we are permitted to say that it does not go far enough.

There is just one other point in that connection. In your experience, sir, have you ever heard a responsible administrator on the government side of the house say that when the opposition says, "We support this as far as it goes but it does not go far enough," they then should be told that the government might take away the resolution because we ask for more than it covers? That is a denial of the independence of parliament and of the rights of members of parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes; my hon. friends have used threats like that before; that is why they are so jocular about it, but we are not one bit frightened by threats like that. So far as we are concerned we believe this is a proper resolution. We feel that it does not go far enough, and we are not going to be intimidated by any suggestion that if we ask that it go farther, the resolution will be withdrawn.

Mr T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have not taken part in the discussion of these matters for some years, because we now have in the house a large number of returned men who have been overseas and who know something about the condition of those who went on the land after the first war, as well as those who have gone on the land since the end of the last war. I have received a large number of letters, however, from soldiers who were told wonderful things about what the dominion and provincial governments were going to do for those who went on the land. I thought the committee would have brought in a report which would be much more liberal toward those concerned, because as you know, Mr. Speaker, between the two wars there was continuous complaint about the difficulties and hardships of those who had gone on the land.

This idea of granting land was first carried out, I think, after the northwest rebellion, and was continued after the Fenian raid, when grants of land were given by the dominion and the provinces. Some of those people, however, never saw the land and got shabby treatment, though in Ontario I understand they were given 160 acres. As everyone knows, the soldier who goes on the land has a hard job. Many of them had not been farmers; many had to put up with conditions which no individual should have to endure. I used to visit this committee once in a while, and in other years it was one committee which left out politics and thought first, last and always of how the returned men could be helped. These people suffered greatly through the lack of transportation and the lack of proper appliances and conveniences with which to work, though this condition has been helped through the rural electrification movement in one or two of the provinces. I was in hopes that the committee would cut out all this red tape and the technicalities which we have seen since the debate started, and that the matter might be referred back to the committee so that it could make a more liberal appropriation.

True, some help has been given by way of a reduced rate of interest. I have had letters from some who wanted to go on the land but who, after they had written and taken the matter up, declined to go any further.

I hope we shall have better success in putting men back on the land after the second war than we did after the first one, because conditions have been growing worse, in geometrical progression, ever since the first war. Complaints have been made by one and all who went on the land. We hear talk about going back to the land; well, who is going to go back to the land, after serving in the second world war, if he has to put up with the intolerable conditions suffered by those who went back to the land after the first war?

While undoubtedly the chairman of the committee is most active, I suggest he is too technical; and if he wishes to have this resolution passed he is going the wrong way about it. I can tell you this, that I receive as many letters from soldiers as any other member and many of them refer to this particular matter. These men have come back from the second world war. I do hope the committee will consider much more liberal treatment of those who wish to go back on the land after fighting a second world war.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take any considerable time in what I have to say, because I shall subscribe to what other hon. members have said. I am a member of the legion, and also have been on a soldier settlement farm, so I know something about it.

I do wish to go on record, however, in support of what the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair), the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and other hon. members have said. I have letters from members of the legion in Manitoba complaining repeatedly about the Veterans Land Act. There seems to be something wrong there. Men who wish to come under the settlement scheme have difficulty in buying farms in communities where they have lived all their days. Surely there must be something wrong with that. If anyone knows conditions in a community, surely it must be the man who was born and raised there.

When a man reaches the age of twenty-four or twenty-five he finds that he wants to buy a farm, but the administrators of the Veterans Land Act say, "No, you cannot settle here." Surely the young man himself should be the best judge of that. I do not wish to take further time, but desire only to support what other hon. members from Manitoba have said.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, despite the numerous occasions upon which attention has been drawn to the terms of the resolution, the fact remains that the debate has hinged on the question of free titles being given to veterans of the war of 1914-18, who settled under soldier settlement legislation of that time. The debate has revolved almost completely around the refusal of the government to accede to that request. The government, apparently having decided definitely against that course, I would ask them at least to give to these old soldiers some better treatment, some better reward than that provided in the resolution before the house. Requests from a considerable number of these veterans that they be given free title to their lands have originated, I believe, from the fact that many parcels of land after being taken back from settlers by the soldier settlement board were then resold to civilians on much better terms than were given the soldier settler. I believe that has been the cause of much of the trouble.

In my view most soldier settlers would be reasonably well satisfied if the Soldier Settlement Act were amended in such fashion as to give them as good treatment respecting their debts on their farms as ordinary civilians have received after those farms have been taken away from the soldier settlers.

I have here from a soldier settler in Alberta a letter which, I believe, illustrates extremely well what has been going on and the reasons for discontent which now exist. This letter is dated March 7, 1946, and states:

During the month of April, 1943, the soldier settlement board sold the above parcel of land to Mr. X of Lougheed, Alta., for $160 cash and Mr. X assumed the outstanding taxes which amounted to $70. In other words he receives a clear title to this quarter section for $230 or 17 per cent of its assessed value. Below is a general description of this quarter, and also a few facts concerning this case.

1. It contains 160 acres assessed at $1,340.

By the municipal assessors.

2. Of this amount there is from 110 to 115 acres of fairly level medium black sand loam with a clay subsoil. There is also another 15 to 20 acres of very heavy rolling land of the same type in the north and east portion, making a total of at least 125 acres of arable land.

3. The balance is classed as pasture land of varying contour; but for the most part low-lying land of mixed soil furnishing a good natural pasture.

4. There is also a spring on this quarter, an unfailing source of fresh water.

5. At present there is about 45 acres cultivated, but the balance of the arable land can be easily broken as it is practically free of rock and contains only about 15 acres of light willow and poplar brush which can also be easily broken up.

6. This quarter is situated in the municipal district of Asquith, about 125 miles southeast of Edmonton. It is five and one-half miles from a village with six grain elevators and a full grade 12 high school, three and one-half miles off of provincial gravelled highway No. 13, two and one-half miles from a rural school.

7. It is fully fenced and is bounded on the south and east by rural telephone line.

This farm was originally under contract by a veteran of the first great war, who together with one of his sons, served overseas on active service, in this second war. I've inquired of the board if he or any of his family was given the chance to repurchase this farm at this price. From their reply they have a quit claim from him and so far as he was concerned the incident was closed. No other vet of either the first or present war was given an opportunity to purchase this farm at this price. I have also asked the board if the same reduction in value would be given the soldier settlers.

That, I think, would solve this whole question in a fairly satisfactory way, namely, if in cases of this kind the same reduction in land value were given as is given when the land is subsequently sold to an ordinary civilian. Then, to continue with the letter:

From their reply this can't be done. They can't lower the valuation to a settler, but once they receive a quit claim they have the power to revalue and can sell it to some other party for any price they mutually agree upon.

Mr. TUCKER: The hon. member knows, of course, that under P.C. 10472 that is incorrect.

Mr. HARKNESS: That is not the case. I took up this matter with the director of the soldier settlement board, Mr. Murchison and was informed by him that this statement is correct when it states that the soldier settlement board is not able to lower the valuation to a settler, although once they have obtained a quit claim from the settler they can sell the land for any figure they please.

In this particular case I made a further request that Mr. Murchison look into the matter, and the application of P.C. 10472, to which the parliamentary assistant has just referred, in order to have a revaluation and a reduction in this man's indebtedness. I have not the figure here, but I believe it stands at about $2,000. This was done, and the reply from the board was that it was impossible to make any reduction other than that which had already been made. At the same time this man offered the board $500 as a settlement of the amount owing them. That was more than twice the amount that the neighbouring quarter-section had been sold for, after it was taken away from another veteran.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Will the hon. member tell me when the quit claim was given in the first place, and the name of the writer of the letter?

Mr. HARKNESS: I shall be glad to give all the names, if you wish. The writer of the letter is Mr. E. M. Petersen. The first paragraph of the letter stated that the land was sold in April, 1943. If the hon. member had been listening a little more closely he would not have needed to ask the question. To continue with the letter:

This is certainly a ridiculous state of affairs and leaves everything open to graft and favouritism. Now, who is the purchaser to receive a plum of this kind? The party in question came to this country about 25 years ago. He is considered to be a good farmer, a good neighbour and has a good eye for bargains. If he is naturalized it wouldn't be until 1935, at which time many were debating whether to qualify for the $25 per month or retain the status of citizenship of the country of their origin.

He goes on to tell more about this man which I do not think is of any particular interest; then he says:

The S.S.B. sells him this farm at a time of guaranteed prices for farm products. Any of the following items gave him a clear title to this land: two two-year old steers, nine hogs, 250 bushels of wheat, 400 bushels of barley or 500 bushels of oats which gives him an ideal mixed farming half section. It will be hard to convince him that there isn't a Santa Claus from now on as long as there is a S.S.B. in Edmonton and especially since he has resold this quarter for $1,350 cash. This deal was also negotiated at a time when the government was proposing various plans for rehabilitation of vets of this last war. From any report I have been able to get they are asking the present vets more for one or two acres of land adjoining some city or fifteen times as much for a quarter section as what the S.S.B. asked and received from this party, while they were away fighting for this country of which it is doubtful if he has become a citizen.

Mr. TUCKER: Has the hon. member looked into the facts alleged in this letter, and does he say on his own responsibility as a member they are correct, or is he just reading something that has been written to him?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I can give you one exactly the same.

Mr. HARKNESS: I have looked into the facts, and I have had a solicitor in Calgary look into the facts, and I am prepared to state on my responsibility as a member that they are correct. I took this matter up with Mr. Murchison some six weeks ago, and he did not dispute the facts which I have given. I am not blaming Mr. Murchison in the slightest, and I want that understood. Mr. Murchison's position is that he must administer the act under the provisions as laid down. The provisions of the act do not permit the soldier settlement board to write off a man's indebtedness to the figure which his land would bring in the open market. They just cannot do that, and that is what is required. This man goes on to say:

Personally, I'm taking the stand that if the government can afford to take a loss of several thousand dollars to supply Mr. X with a quarter section, I feel that we, the old settlers, should be dealt with on the same terms and do not intend making any further payments until I get a satisfactory answer on how these values were arrived at not only in this case but also in regards to the sale by the S.S.B. of S.W. quarter of Section 11-43-11 west of the 4th which took place about the same time only in this case, the party purchasing same while he also was military exempt in both wars, buys this land, 187 acres with buildings and a well, for $200 or for about one-sixth of the assessed value which in this case was $1,158, as in the previous instance the board took a loss of several thousand dollars.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Petersen, who writes this letter, is not asking to have his debt forgiven. He says that most of the soldier settlers in his area and other men whom he knows are not asking to have their debts completely forgiven. What they want is a reasonable deal. What they want is a deal as good as that given to the ordinary civilian, as good as that given, according to information, the corrections of which I do not know, to men who actually fought against them in the last war, members of the German army. Those men came to Canada and are able to buy land from the soldier settlement board at a much lower figure than a soldier settler can buy it for himself. That is what these men want. In most cases they are not asking for the total obliteration of debt; they just want a square deal, which they have not had.

I call upon the government, as the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) has done, to write into the Soldier Settlement Act provisions which will enable a soldier settler to obtain land held by him for an amount equal to what the land would sell for if taken away and sold to an ordinary civilian.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): I rise simply to apologize to the hon. member for interrupting. I thought the crux of this particular case was the length of time the land was in the hands of the board, and I asked for the date of the quit claim.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. TUCKER: I could not answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Yorkton until we were in committee. I have a statement, it is not as complete as I would like. However, I think it will be of interest to the committee.

There were originally 24,793 soldier settlers with contracts. Of that number, 6,635 contracts were terminated either by voluntary abandonment, by notice of rescission by death, or because of domestic difficulties, up to January 1, 1926. From that date until January 1, 1932, there were another 6,244 terminations. Of the original 24,793, there were therefore 12,879 whose contracts were terminated by January 1, 1932. From that date to the present, that is during the past fourteen years, there have been 946 terminations of contracts. Of the 946 terminations, five took place during 1945 and 1946. My hon. friend is interested to know how many of them were voluntary, how many were actually based on rescission, and so on. I am told by the board that it is utterly impossible to provide that information, that during the difficult thirties, particularly the early thirties, there were so many settlers who could not possibly make a living on some of these farms that they left them and they could not be found to ascertain whether they were willing to give a quit-claim or not, and so to clear up the situation formal notice of rescission had to be given. I understand that many of these were actual cases of abandonment and that a good proportion were quit-claims.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does that include the number who gave a quit-claim and then returned and rented the farm?

Mr. TUCKER: It includes the entire number who signed quit-claims. If they entered into a new agreement I could not say for certain whether they are included in the number of those who actually threw up their land. The figures that were most interesting to me were those which showed that during the last fourteen years actually less than one thousand gave up their lands. These figures were quite a surprise to me, that such a large proportion of the rescissions and cancellations took place in the first twelve years of the administration of the Soldier Settlement Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Were those rescissions?

Mr. TUCKER: Rescissions, cancellations, quit-claims, and so on. There are at the present time 4,276 active accounts, and 6,692 have repaid their loans. That gives a total of 24,793. I am glad that the hon. member asked those questions because I think the committee will be pleased to have the information.

I find it difficult to follow the hon. member for Calgary East in what he claims the director told him, because P.C. 10472, which was in force until March 31 of this year and which our veterans affairs committee recommended be extended until September of this year, must have been in force during all the time to which he referred. That order in council provides as follows:

On or before December 31, 1943—

That was extended later to March 31, 1946.

—a settler as defined by section 2 of the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919, whose agreement with the soldier settlement board or the director of soldier settlement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned, may

(b) make application to the director for a reduction of his indebtedness to the director, and the treasury board may on the recommendation of the director confirm or reduce such indebtedness, provided, however, that the recommendation made by the director shall be based upon the amount which in his judgment constitutes the present and prospective productive value of the land.

It definitely provides that the price may be reduced. The hon. member will recall that in giving evidence the director said that he had undertaken with the committee that the write-off should be based on 1940-41 land values, which were quite low. The director in answer to a question said this:

I suggest to you, Mr. Minister, that the manner in which that order in council was administered finds its answer in the response by soldier settlers themselves who have benefited under that order. I gave an undertaking to the first committee on veterans land settlement that we would use 1940-41 land values in carrying out these adjustments. As I said in a meeting some time ago that undertaking was carried out right to the letter. I make no secret of the fact that we deliberately discounted 1940-41 values by 15 per cent to make sure that the spirit of the order would be observed.

I can also confess now, and I have no regrets whatsoever, that in many cases we have discounted these 1940-41 values by as high as 50 per cent in exceptional circumstances.

He goes on to speak about the adjustments under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and further adjustments under this order in council. I take it from his evidence that the very thing was happening which the hon. member for Calgary East says would be satisfactory to members of this house, namely, that values were being written down to below the 1940-41 land values, in some cases 50 per cent below. That was a far better deal than was given to civilians. If my hon. friend says that he will be satisfied if the soldier settlers got as good an arrangement as was given to civilians under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, I say to him that my understanding is that this order in council was interpreted generously and that the land values were written down under the order in council very much below their actual values in 1940-41, which enabled the settlers in many cases to pay a very small amount to get clear title. That is the understanding I got as a member of the committee, and I can only say that what the hon. member said just now was a big surprise to me. It certainly will be brought to the attention of the director, who will be asked to explain, because if he said what the hon. member says he said he was saying, he was saying that he could not enforce an order in council which he told the committee he was enforcing.

Mr. HARKNESS: If I might say a word or two, it is all very well for a general statement to be made, but when you come to a particular district you find out what is actually being done and how the thing is working out. In the particular district that I have mentioned there are three farms, close to one another. Their assessed value by the municipal assessor was comparable. The assessment of the man I mentioned this afternoon was higher, but not very much higher, than that of the other two, chiefly because at his own expense he had put up considerably better buildings. As the thing actually worked out, this land was sold in 1943, when land values should have been higher than in 1940-41, at the figure which I mentioned, as nearly as I could determine, and which was not disputed by Mr. Murchison. I think that is evidence in itself that the soldier settler has not been given the deal which you and I and probably many others thought he was being given under the order in council. The land is only worth what it can be sold for in the district on the open market, and apparently all that could be got for these two quarter-sections, according to the director's statement, was $200 and $230 respectively. At the same time the other man's assessment was reduced $500. As I understand it, he owed less than either of the other two men, who had been induced to sign quit-claims and had left the land.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I want to thank the parliamentary assistant for giving me those figures. In 1942 there was placed on the records of this house, in reply to a question of mine, the following facts with regard to Saskatchewan. I believe there were 6,164 settlers settled in Saskatchewan under the Soldier Settlement Act and at that time they incurred an indebtedness of $25,576,000 in rough thousands. In 1942 there were 2,308 still on the land. I asked for the original indebtedness of the 2,308 still on the land and was advised that the information could not be obtained but that they could give it for the accounts from one office, namely, 730. The figures regarding these are interesting. For the 730 accounts they gave me, the original indebtedness was roughly $2,839,000. Then I asked how much in the form of payments these men had given up to date. For these 730 accounts referred to, the information was that they had made payments of $1,508,000. I asked what was the present indebtedness of these men, and I found that in spite of the fact that they owed only $2,830,000 and they had paid $1,508,000, their indebtedness as at January 1, 1942, was $3,864,000. They were indebted originally in the sum of $2,800,000, had paid $1,500,000 or a little over half, and now they were $1,000,000 more in debt than when they started.

I put these figures on the record so that people can see the type of burden under which these men have been carrying on and the reason why they lost hope, and therefore why special consideration should be given to such people, in view of all the hardships they have gone through. It must have been because of the burden imposed upon them that they found it impossible to carry on. Had they been given an opportunity of paying the debt which they had incurred, and which they wanted to repay during those years from 1936 to 1940, it is quite evident that, if they could pay $1,500,000 up to 1942, they would have paid off the whole thing. What they are now asked to pay represents a burden of $1,000,000 more than that with which they started; that is, speaking of the 730. That is an example of what I mean when I say that this sort of thing requires special consideration at this time. Had they been paying off in ordinary times, their indebtedness would have been more than paid.

Mr. TUCKER: What page is the hon. gentleman referring to?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I will send a copy to the minister. It was tabled in 1942. That is the basis on which we make our request. It is not a matter of political pressure, as the hon. member tried to imply last night. It is a matter of seeing that justice is done. These men do not ask for a hand-out; they are asking for a square deal. Certainly, after what they have done, they are entitled to such a deal and their case should be taken into consideration.

Mr. FAIR: Last evening my time had expired before I was able to conclude my presentation of the subject and I should like now to continue it. I wish to refer to page 1007 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the special committee on veterans affairs of Tuesday, June 18, when the following resolution was proposed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay):

> That all soldier settlers who took up land under the soldier settlement board be granted clear title to such lands as of March 31, 1944; that clear title be also granted to the widows, children, or dependents of such soldier settlers; and that in the case of veteran settlers who have been dispossessed of their lands during the period between September 3, 1939 and March 31, 1944, either by quit claim or by eviction, such lands be restored and clear title granted to the settler, or adequate compensation made to him.

Immediately after this the Minister of Veterans Affairs had this to say, as reported at page 1009:

> Mr. Chairman, I should like an opportunity to say a word. Speaking on behalf of the government, we are definitely opposed to this clear title suggestion for several reasons, and I will state them very briefly and very succinctly. In the first place, the concession of $2,320 given the settlers under the present act is not equal to the various repeated concessions that were given to the old soldier settlers after 1919.

My reply to that argument is that the concessions given to the settlers under the soldier settlement board can never compensate for the disadvantages under which they were placed. By that I mean that when the settlers bought the land, live stock and equipment, wheat was worth from $2.50 to $3 a bushel, milch cows from $125 to $150 apiece, and work horses, which most of the settlers used at that time, were worth from $350 to $400 a team. Shortly after that, however, the price of wheat had dropped away below the dollar mark; the price of milch cows was $25 each, and you could get all the horses you wanted at $25 each. At the same time the interest of five per cent on current accounts and seven per cent on arrears went on and was carried on the books against these farmers. So that the concessions which were granted would not compensate for the differences in valuation, over which the government had complete control if they wanted to exercise it. Going on, the minister said:

I admit with my friend that prices were too high. I admit that the interest rates were too high. But concessions were made, and I think that the suggestion contained in the amendment is absolutely unfair and inequitable. It is not fair to the boys who have paid up and who are paying up to-day in advance. They are paying up hundreds of thousands of dollars in advance, the old soldier settlers, the men who have really worked and are working upon their farms.

That statement, I suggest, is too small for a big man like the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I find in it the insinuation that the fellows who have not yet paid their debts are not working as hard as they should. Well, as one who has lived under similar conditions and who has pleaded before for these men, I can say that they work from twelve to sixteen hours a day, work harder than any of us around here have ever worked in our lives and under worse conditions, and they were much more poorly fed than a number of us who are here. Continuing, the minister said:

If you give clear title to the men who have not worked so hard, you are working an injustice upon the fellows who worked hard upon their farms.

In answer to that, I would say that you are imposing just a little less injustice upon the fellows who would receive clear title than those who have already paid. By giving clear titles as of March 31, 1944, you will be easing up a little on the hardship that has been inflicted upon them during the past twenty-seven years. To continue with the minister's statement:

Secondly, you are wrecking the whole system of administration under the present Veterans Land Act if you are going to give clear title to the old soldier settlers.

Mr. McKay: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. Mackenzie: Oh, yes, you are.

Mr. McKay: In what respect?

Hon. Mr. Mackenzie: You are held up in this case because they may not struggle so hard upon their farms with the hope that the same thing will be done for them that you are suggesting to-day should be done for the old soldier settlers, or a few of them who did not do so well upon their farms, possibly not through any fault of their own. I am not suggesting that for one second.

Thirdly, in your own province, sir, the legion last year at the provincial convention turned this proposal down cold in Saskatoon; and they, I think, are friends of the soldier settlers. For these reasons I think this committee should turn down the suggestion.

I was not at the Saskatoon convention. I do not know the officers of the legion in the Saskatoon area, but I happen to know personally some of the men who belong to that organization, and I feel quite satisfied that if they were given the true picture which we have given here from this side of the house and the other side of the picture from the government side, the men would be in a position to come to a fair decision. If that were done I am sure it would be entirely different from that given by the minister.

A little further down the minister had this to say:

Mr. Chairman, I should hate to intrude upon the discussion unduly, and I appreciate very strongly, as much as anyone in this committee, the sentimental appeal of those who have advocated this principle. But this principle will destroy the administration of the land settlement of veterans of the present war. I am convinced of that, and I am charged with a certain amount of responsibility in that. In the first place, there was a revaluation of the land prices mentioned by my friend, Mr. Wright. There was a revaluation time after time of the stock and equipment of the soldiers of the old war. The old soldier settlers are paying up to-day not only their actual debts but they are paying up by prepayments, hundreds of thousands of dollars, upon their settlement. There are only three hundred settlers in Canada who have asked for this concession, which means the destruction of a principle. I will not, as long as I am in charge of the administration, stand for the destruction of that principle; that is fair and clear.

I think that argument can be easily taken care of. On different occasions I have pointed out, particularly since the last war broke out, that much pressure has been brought to bear on the settlers. I also pointed out that the sons and daughters of many of these settlers have gone overseas and sent home part of their pay, and in some cases dependents' allowances have been awarded to parents. In many cases children of the veteran settlers went to work in war factories and collected good pay, and in order that their old folk might be protected in their declining years—and many of them have only a few to enjoy anyway—they sent home their money with which, along with all the pennies which the old folk could scrape together, the settlers have made these payments and prepayments. Many of us do not realize the anxiety facing these old people. Many of them are afraid of having the sheriff at the door. Quite a number of them have had that experience. They have had the experience of collectors coming around year after year, and in some cases the sheriff as well.

These people had money to spare because they were not able to buy machinery; they were not able to hire the help they needed; they could not buy materials which they should have had for their buildings. If one went around their farms and looked at their buildings, their homes, their farm equipment and their live stock he would see what I mean. I think he would agree that much of the money which has been paid in as advance payments, and which was advanced by the minister in his argument that clear titles should not be granted, should have been spent in building up the homes, farms and equipment of these old settlers.

The minister said that only three hundred settlers in Canada have asked for this concession. I pointed out last night that the petition was circulated, and I believe the minister obtained his figures from that petition. Incidentally I should like to know what it cost the soldier settlement board to get that information, to peruse the petition, to look over the names and find out who was asking for it. I wonder whether it did not cost more than $2,000 to obtain that information for the minister. We have not heard anything in the press about that. That may be worth while investigating in the Department of Veterans Affairs when they have the time to spare.

The petition was not circulated through all sections of the prairie provinces where most of these settlers are located. I pointed out that no pay was given to anybody; that those civilians and veterans carried the petition around over snow-blocked roads during the winter months and did not have the time thoroughly to cover the country. Had they had that time, I am quite satisfied there would have been a large number of settlers' names on the petition than the three hundred mentioned by the minister.

Later on, the minister said:

> It is my duty to point out to the committee that the equity granted in varying ways at varying times to the old soldier settlers is $2,800 up to $4,000, and in some cases up to $6,000 instead of $2,320 under the present act.

If these amounts had been granted, then I say shame to any administration which would stick any settler with debts of that kind, if it was necessary to make up the $6,000 reduction.

It would appear that no opportunity was given to the committee to vote on whether or not clear titles would be granted, because we find the following at the bottom of page 1006:

> Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a certain reluctance on the part of members present who have spoken in favour of this cancellation of the indebtedness to speak up at the moment.

If that remark did not appear I might have suggested that perhaps the members did not feel that they had full opportunity to vote; but Mr. Harris pleasantly took care of that for me. He went on to say:

> My own views on the subject are well known. Therefore I move that this committee recommend that the period for applying for a write-down be extended to 1st September and that otherwise the committee take no action.

That had a negative effect on the motion. Before that amendment was carried a subamendment was moved by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), which reads as follows:

> Mr. Wright: I wish to move a subamendment to the last amendment that the words "that otherwise no other action be taken" be struck out and that it read that an equity equal to that granted to the soldiers of the present war be granted to those applying for a write-down.

That subamendment was seconded by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch). When the vote was taken we find that the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) was the only member on the government side who voted in favour of the subamendment. However, because of the mustering of the reserves the motion was voted down. The recorded vote can be found on page IV of the minutes of proceedings of that day. I am not going to take the time and trouble to place on record the names of the members who voted for or against the subamendment as I have already placed on record the names of those who attended the meeting, and all government members except the hon. member for Winnipeg south voted against.

May I now deal with the request of the delegation of the soldier settlers? These men left here on May 7 with the expectation of having some favourable word sent to them either by wire or by air mail that something worth while was being done. I know they felt disappointed when the result of the committee's vote was transmitted to them. Personally I am disappointed and I believe that many hon. members, including members on the government side of the house, are also disappointed.

For some time I have had a resolution on the order paper, and I may say that at the next session I intend to place on the order paper another resolution which will have the same effect. I had intended to place this resolution back on the order paper, but because it contains certain statements which perhaps are not agreeable to the government I am not permitted to do so. However, I shall have another one prepared which will have the same effect. The resolution which I had on the order paper reads as follows:

Whereas veterans of great war I who settled on land under the soldier settlement scheme as well as their wives and families, have in many instances suffered severe hardships because of purchase of land, live stock and equipment at inflationary prices, and low prices received for farm products brought about by lack of adequate policy for agriculture;

And whereas we are now embarking on another land scheme for veterans of the present war, under a government policy that does not guarantee cost of production, the success of which scheme may be jeopardized by the apparent failure of the former soldier settlement board scheme.

Therefore be it resolved,—that, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of giving clear titles to all soldier settlers who on March 31, 1944, held land under contract with the soldier settlement board.

This resolution was discussed on October 1, last, the first time we had a private members' day since the outbreak of the war. By means of a prolonged argument, including family allowances and other matters, the debate on the resolution continued until eleven o'clock and then it was sent to the committee. I am disappointed in the findings of that committee.

In conclusion, I wish to say that I, and the old veterans, do not ask for one cent of charity. I believe Canada owes those men a debt of gratitude as well as a square deal in connection with the land, live stock and equipment they have bought. They have asked for simple justice, nothing more and nothing less, and I believe they are entitled to it. Simple justice should be placed before monetary values or anything of that kind. There were 25,017 settlers placed on the land, and the average credit extended was $4,358.40. As of March 31, 1944, some 6,153 settlers, or 25 per cent of the original number, were still on the land with an average debt of $1,254, which represented 29 per cent of the average loan, after twenty-five years of heart-breaking work which would not have been necessary if a proper economic system had been organized and the affairs of the country properly managed. After twenty-five years some 4,130 settlers, or 16 per cent, have secured title. That is quite a record. The rate of interest of five per cent on current account and seven per cent on arrears should never have been charged anyone in this country. If we would only take the trouble to study the source of money and the backing of money I think we would agree that these things should not be allowed. Some day sooner or later, perhaps too late, this will have to be changed.

Under the Veterans Land Act the maximum loan available for full-time farming is $6,000 at 3½ per cent. Here again, I believe the rate of interest is too high, particularly when we consider the fact that only a short time ago we made a loan to Great Britain on which no interest is to be paid until 1951, after which the interest is at the rate of only two per cent. Do we owe our own men as much as we owe Great Britain? I am not opposed to the loan to Great Britain, but I say we should extend to our own war veterans the same rate or an even better rate. Again, many of the men coming under the Veterans Land Act are sons of veterans of the first great war. Why should they receive preferred treatment? Why should the old veterans not receive treatment as good as that being given their sons at the present time? If a settler takes full advantage of the credit extended under the Veterans Land Act he may get a clear grant of $2,320 on certain conditions, which is equal to 39 per cent of the total credit extended. At the end of March, 1944, the average debt of the old settlers was 29 per cent of the original amount. I do not think we are asking anything out of the way when we ask that this be wiped out. These men are all Canadians. I am not dealing with them as Liberals or Conservatives or supporters of any political party. I am dealing with them as Canadians, men who went overseas to save Canada.

Some of these men failed because they were entirely unsuited to farm life. They paid far too much for their land, live stock and implements. In some cases they were given land in dry or frost areas. At the time they bought their land prices of agricultural products were high. They paid high prices for the land and implements, which in many cases deteriorated until they were worth only ten per cent of what they cost when the deals were made. It has been admitted by the former minister of mines and resources that this was a hastily improvised scheme. From the information we have obtained and from the results we have seen, I do not think we could disagree with that statement by Hon. T. A. Crerar. It was intended as a rehabilitation measure, but actually it turned out to be a way of persecuting our old soldiers. At present the average age of the settlers is nearly sixty, and we find some still operating at eighty years of age and over. Take any member of this or the other house sixty or seventy years of age; put him on a poor farm, with poor equipment, with some debt to carry and an uncertain market for his products. He will find out just how he feels about it. I think we can use our imagination a little along that line. If these men could not pay off their debts in twenty-five years, covering the prime of their lives, how can we expect them to pay up now? Again let us use our imagination. Some of these old fellows will be over a hundred years old by the time the twenty-year extension of their contracts will expire, and I do not think we are going to have very many of them around at that time. As I have pointed out already, they are in need of better homes, better buildings, better equipment and some of the comforts of life, as well as medical and dental care.

As I pointed out earlier, the treatment we are giving the old veterans will have a detrimental effect on the settling of young men under the Veterans Land Act, because any man who sees his father threatened with eviction will wonder whether he should undertake a contract and also run the risk of being kicked out on the road after a certain time. Again—and this is a point I brought up on another occasion—we sold land to the old soldier settlers at values based upon prices of farm products at that time. When those contracts were made no clause was written into them providing that prices of farm products would remain at that level until these debts were paid off. This is one reason why the present Veterans Land Act may also fail; and when the proper time comes to discuss that matter I am going to suggest again that a clause be written into the contracts guaranteeing these men the same prices for the products they raise, whatever they may be—wheat, live stock or whatever it is—until the contracts are cleared up. The settler is bound by contract, and I think the government should be bound in exactly the same manner. Surely that is not asking too much.

There is one more reason why we might claim this write-off, or adjustment or settlement, call it what you will as long as we get the result. Only yesterday we were told that a million dollars or more would be written off homes now being built for veterans of the last war, even before they have moved in. That is one more argument to support our claim. The cost of collection has been given as $100,000 a year. I should like to see audited figures bearing out that statement, because I do not believe it is correct. If it is accurate, why did it cost an average of $1,100,000 a year during the first twenty-five years this scheme was in operation? Where did the waste come in, and where is it coming in at the present time?

We believe the resolution on the order paper at the present time precedes a bill that will be final as far as the old settlers are concerned. We are not satisfied with it. I do not think many hon. members on the government side are satisfied with it, and I am sure all the members of the opposition are dissatisfied. As I suggested in beginning my presentation yesterday, I should like to see this resolution withdrawn and another brought forward preceding a bill that would give clear title to all the old settlers who had contracts with the board at the end of March, 1944. I am sure that would receive the unanimous support of the house. If there is some influence outside parliament opposing this, I think we should be able to dispose of it. In my opinion we owe a debt of gratitude to the men with whom we are dealing at the present time. The government should certainly see to it that the promise made by the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden in 1917 to the Canadian expeditionary force should not be dishonoured, even though this government is not of the same political stripe as was that right hon. gentleman.

Mr. LENNARD: I do not propose to hold up matters this afternoon; but, following the debate, one might be led to believe that this hardship was experienced only in western Canada. I wish to dispel that thought, because I know of many cases in Ontario. I have one in mind particularly respecting a young man who was buying a piece of property for $2,800, but who fell behind in his payments, with the result that a quit-claim was executed. Later, that land was sold by the department to a private individual for $1,400, just half the amount the veteran was supposed to have paid for it.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr Mackenzie thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 199, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ENTITLEMENT OF CERTAIN WOMEN'S SERVICES TO REHABILITATION BENEFITS, ETC.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to provide that the members of the women's royal naval services and the South African military nursing service shall be entitled to the rights, privileges and benefits enjoyed by Canadians serving in His Majesty's forces other than Canadian forces during world war II under the Veterans Land Act, 1942, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1942, the Civil Service Act, the Pension Act, the Income War Tax Act, the Department of Veterans Affairs Act and the War Service Grants Act.

Mr. BROOKS: Would the parliamentary assistant give an explanation?

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this measure is something with which I am sure all hon. members will be in agreement. It was found that Canadian girls who went into the women's royal naval services actually had not the same rights as if they had gone into the branch of the air service in Great Britain, or the branch of the army. By some ruling of British law the women's royal naval services were not actually part of the military forces of Great Britain, and for that reason they did not get the benefit of the act which conferred rights on Canadians who went into His Majesty's forces, other than Canadian forces.

The purpose of this measure is to give to Canadian girls who were domiciled in Canada at the time they entered the women's royal naval services the same rights as if they had gone into a similar branch of the army or air force, namely all the rights of anyone who went into His Majesty's forces, other than Canadian. Those rights are set out in the resolution. Any rights which are given to them by British law will be supplemented up to the level they would have had, had they been in the Canadian forces. That is set out in the resolution as rights which they will have under the Veterans Land Act, 1942, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1942, the Civil Service Act, the Pension Act, the Income War Tax Act, the Department of Veterans Affairs Act and the War Service Grants Act.

The same is true in regard to Canadian girls who went into the South African military nursing service. It was found that under South African law they were not members of His Majesty's forces of South Africa; so that they did not get the benefit of our legislation which conferred these rights on those who went into His Majesty's forces, other than Canadian forces.

The purpose of this bill is to give Canadian girls domiciled in Canada, who went into the South African military nursing service, or who went into the women's royal naval services the same rights as if they had gone into an actual branch of His Majesty's forces, other than Canadian forces. It will put them in that position. The matter has already been covered by order in council, so far as the South African military nursing service is concerned. It was passed after a resolution recommending it by the veterans committee of the house.

The provision respecting the women's royal naval services has not been brought into effect, and will become effective only after this bill has been passed by parliament, and becomes law.

Might I emphasize that the order in council respecting the South African military service requires domicile and residence in Canada at the time of going into this service. The bill will require only domicile at the time of entering the service. In order to get the rights they must have domicile and residence at the time of applying for these rights. In other words, they must come back to Canada.

The only other matter which perhaps I should mention would have reference to Canadian girls who went into the voluntary aid detachment, who served in Red Cross work overseas or who served in the St. John Ambulance Corps overseas. The problem of what should be done in connection with these people was referred by our committee to a subcommittee of that committee. A study is being made, and the recommendation by the subcommittee will be considered shortly, I hope, by the main committee, at least when an opportunity presents itself. I can say, too, that the matter is receiving the active study of the government. It has not been overlooked, but is a matter the solution of which requires some time.

I hope that this bill which gives these rights to Canadian girls will meet with such unanimity of support that perhaps we might advance the measure some considerable distance this afternoon.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I agree with what has been said by the parliamentary assistant, namely that this bill simply carries out a matter of justice to these two branches of the services, namely the Wrens and the South African nurses.

It does not concern very many people; I believe there were only about fifty Wrens concerned, and about 298 South African nurses. Had it not been for a technicality, both the Wrens and the nurses would have been members of His Majesty's forces. The South African nurses were recruited in Canada at the request of the Canadian government and sent to South Africa to assist our sister dominion. The report from South Africa is that they did splendid work, and there is no reason why they should not be treated the same as nursing sisters who served in other parts of the world.

There is one matter I should like to raise in connection with the Pension Act. I should like to know if it is intended to amend this act in order to extend the insurance principle to the South African nurses? Perhaps the parliamentary assistant can give me my answer later on. I brought up this matter in the committee and at that time the minister said that he thought it would be looked after. However, we did not have a definite answer. There was also considerable anxiety among committee members as to whether the Red Cross, the V.A.D., the St. John Ambulance Corps, the merchant marine, the firefighters, the auxiliary services and others would receive consideration. The committee did not feel like recommending this bill until they had some assurance that these other people would be looked after. As the parliamentary assistant has said, bills are being prepared to cover the firefighters and, I believe, the auxiliary services, while the V.A.D., the Red Cross, the St. John Ambulance Corps, the merchant marine and others are being considered by a subcommittee of the veterans affairs committee and we have the assurance of the minister that their cases will be given every consideration.

Mr. TUCKER: That is correct.

Mr. BROOKS: That being the case, we are in accord with this bill which will follow this resolution now being presented by the parliamentary assistant.

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire about Canadian nurses who enlisted for service in South Africa. Some of these nurses have complained to me that they did not receive the remuneration they were told they would receive when they enlisted for service in South Africa. After they had entered into the agreement, and even while some of them were on the boat, they were told that while they would receive the amount they were told they would receive, it would be subject to certain deductions. The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has said that these nurses were recruited by the Canadian government.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is not accurate. These nurses were not recruited by the Canadian government; they were recruited by the South African government, and the Department of National Defence acted as agent for the South African government in presenting the conditions of service and in arranging for the enlistment of these young ladies.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. BROOKS: Indirectly.

Mr. ABBOTT: It was not indirectly. The Canadian government did not recruit them and their enlistment was neither at the desire nor request of nor on conditions laid down by the Canadian government.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand from the minister that the Canadian government acted as agent for the South African government?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. HAZEN: To put it mildly, there was a misunderstanding about the matter and these Canadian nurses did not receive the payments that they understood they would receive. It seems to me that as a matter of equity they are entitled to receive what the South African government agreed to pay them and what they expected to receive. No doubt some of these complaints have come to the attention of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and I should like to ask his parliamentary assistant if they are being considered and if the bill that is to be brought in will remedy what these people think is an injustice.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of hon. members to the rules which state that the proper place to ask questions of the parliamentary assistant is in committee.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. KIDD: If no legislation is to be brought down this session to take care of the Red Cross workers, then I want to impress upon the committee the importance of giving consideration to these people. The question of Red Cross nurses was brought up last fall, and I brought it up in the committee on veterans affairs on April 5. This resolution was introduced on April 12. The hon. member for Vancouver North followed me and he tried to impress upon the committee the importance of giving consideration to the members of the St. John Ambulance Corps.

I do not think this resolution goes far enough. Will these people be considered this session? I would emphasize the fact that these girls signed attestation papers and they were discharged in the regular way. Girls who attended universities and schools last fall and finished the term are being denied the recognition that is given to others.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Royal asked whether girls who entered the South African nursing service would have the benefit of the insurance principle. I think everybody in the committee wanted them to have that benefit, but the question that arises in connection with this matter can be placed quite easily before this committee. The purpose of this legislation is to bring the benefits up to a level of those given to people who served in the Canadian forces. For example, a person who served in the forces of the United Kingdom would, if his entitlement were approved by the United Kingdom, have his pension rights brought up to the same level as though he had served in the Canadian forces. In the first instance, because the service documents and everything else that has to do with the matter are in the possession of the United Kingdom government, the matter is left to them for a ruling whether there is entitlement or not. After they have made a ruling for entitlement, we supplement the payments. It has been brought home to us that the system has worked satisfactorily. Since the first great war there has been great harmony and cooperation between the representative of the British pension ministry in Canada and our own pension commission. They point out that that is probably the only way to handle it, because the British pension people have to rule on entitlement in the first place.

Mr. BROOKS: This has to do with South Africa.

Mr. TUCKER: I am coming to that. If the British authorities gave a ruling which did not satisfy the applicant and a separate application to the commission was possible, our pension commission would become a sort of appeal board from the British pension authorities. They say that if we do not follow the same principle in regard to the South African nursing service, namely, leave it in the first place to South Africa for a ruling, the same difficulties will arise. They further point out that if we did not leave it in the first instance for a ruling by the South African authorities we would be introducing a precedent that might cause difficulty in carrying on as satisfactorily as we have done in connection with those who served in the United Kingdom forces. The matter can be further discussed in committee on the civilian pensions bill. I must say that it looked to me as if it would be a difficult thing to do otherwise than as suggested. However, the door is not closed. But it is a matter of difficulty.

The hon. member for St. John-Albert brought up the question of the benefits the South African nurses expected to have received while serving. Of course this bill deals with them only at and after their discharge, so that I hope he will not mind if I suggest to him that he direct his shafts in some other direction.

Mr. HAZEN: I was asking if it had been brought to the attention of your department.

Mr. TUCKER: It may have been. There are so many things come in that I would not want to say that it has not, but I have not it very clearly in my mind that it has. At any rate, if it did come in, I would pass it on probably to the Department of National Defence.

In regard to what the hon. member for Kingston City has mentioned, I can only repeat to him what I said at the start. The veterans affairs committee has still eleven bills to consider. It has a very heavy task ahead of it. For that reason we referred the question of the Red Cross nurses, the V.A.D.'s and the St. John Ambulance workers and other people who were not actually in the armed services, including the fire fighters and supervisors to a subcommittee of our committee for study. They are studying it and are, I understand, on the verge of making a report. I think I can say to him, and he will bear me out in this, that the committee will try to get through all the work it possibly can before prorogation. That is all I can say about the matter. The order in which the work will be taken will be decided by the committee itself. If we can get through all the work we shall certainly make some recommendation in regard to these Red Cross nurses, V.A.D's and St. John Ambulance people. It is just a matter of what we can physically do. If we can possibly do it, I can assure him that the committee will consider the matter and make a recommendation.

Mr. KIDD: I hope the parliamentary assistant will realize that there is a hardship on these nurses who have attended schools and universities on the understanding that they will be granted the same conditions. The fall term is coming along and they have to pay their own fees. I hope the minister realizes the seriousness and importance of the matter to these girls.

Mr. MacNICOL: Everyone seems to be in favour of the principle. May I ask how many girls are involved?

Mr. TUCKER: There is no certainty as to the exact figures, but I think there are approximately 300 in the South African nurses group and from fifty to sixty in the women's royal naval services group.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think the lack of debate reveals general agreement on this resolution. I would point out, however, that it includes only the women's royal naval services and the South African military nursing service. It has been intimated that later on other groups will be brought in. There is already on the order paper a resolution to bring in a bill for the benefit of the fire fighters, but the acts under which these groups are going to benefit are not set out on the order paper. Will there be some difference between the treatment of the firefighters and these other auxiliary services?

Mr. TUCKER: The committee made a recommendation in regard to the firefighters and supervisors. Then the government decided to introduce legislation in regard to these two groups. Various members of the committee then pointed out that in their opinion the nurses who served in the Red Cross and in the St. John Ambulance Association were just as much entitled to consideration as the firefighters and supervisors, and that if we went ahead with legislation for the firefighters and supervisors it would lead to a debate as to why these other groups should not be included. So that the whole matter was referred to a special committee for study and report to the main committee. The understanding was that in the meantime, until a decision was arrived at in the light of the report of the subcommittee by our main committee, the government would not proceed with its bill for the firefighters and supervisors. That is why they are not being proceeded with although they are on the order paper for the resolution stage of course.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Tucker thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 200, respecting benefits for those serving in the women's royal naval services and the South African military nursing service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE ACT

PROVISION FOR AIR CADET SQUADRONS

The house resumed from Monday, May 20, consideration in committee of bill No. 57, to amend the Royal Canadian Air Force Act—Mr. Gibson (Hamilton West)—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): This bill was considered on May 20 and a good deal of discussion took place on that occasion. Since that time, a similar bill has been passed to provide for the naval cadets, and this contains much the same provisions in relation to the Royal Canadian Air Force. It is a very similar measure, providing for air cadets, and I hope that it will be possible to get it through to-day.

[Mr. Castleden.]

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the ages be the same as in the bill introduced by the minister's colleague?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The age limit is from fifteen to eighteen inclusive.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe the other was from sixteen to nineteen.

Mr. ABBOTT: From twelve to nineteen.

Mr. SKEY: I wish to ask the minister one or two questions. The first has to do with the administration or direction of air cadets. I understand that the sea cadets are directed almost entirely by the sea cadet league and supervised by the naval service, but that the air cadets are directed to a large extent by the R.C.A.F.

Mr. ABBOTT: I was not paying attention. Did I understand the hon. member to be addressing his remarks to me? If so, will he repeat what he said as to the manner of handling sea cadets.

Mr. SKEY: I was speaking of the direction of the sea cadet movement, I believe the navy league have greater power and authority than the air cadet league. From my own knowledge of the subject, I believe this to be the case. I feel that if the air cadets are to progress, as we all want them to progress, and to be a strong and thriving body in peace as they were in war, they are faced with a problem of direction that calls for solution. I refer particularly to the dual authority from which they have suffered during the war years, one authority originating in the service with air cadet league liaison officers and the second authority originating with the provincial governments and their departments of education, which should have a certain amount of jurisdiction over air cadets in school squadrons. I would ask the minister to define for us the powers of the service, the R.C.A.F., the air cadet league and the provincial departments of education with regard to the cadet squadrons we propose to continue in peace.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The distribution of authority as between the R.C.A.F. and the air cadet league was set out in the various letters written by the Minister of National Defence for Air in 1942, dealing with the division of authority between the two bodies. The Minister of National Defence for Air approves the formation of air cadet units, prescribes qualifications as to medical fitness, and appoints such persons as may be necessary or desirable to commissions in the Royal Canadian Air Force for the purpose of serving as air cadet instructors. He prescribes the terms and conditions under which air cadets may be provided uniforms, provides for medical care and hospitalization for air cadets undergoing training at camps, prescribes a course of training for air cadets and for instructors and officers.

The league is responsible for maintaining headquarters at Ottawa to assist the air force and encourage, by publicity and other means, the formation of air cadet units, subject to the concurrence of the minister, and makes such recommendations of suitable persons to serve as officers in the units and for appointment to His Majesty's commission, also as to promotions or retirements, and to enrol as air cadets such lads as are desirable for the units which have already been authorized. The air cadet league also looks after the award of trophies, badges and other awards considered suitable, and administers all funds received by the league.

Mr. McKAY: What provision is made for uniforms and for equipment for the air cadet squadrons?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Up to the present the cadet squadrons have received a clothing allowance and also maintenance allowance of $1.25 a year to maintain uniforms. Consideration is being given at the present time, in negotiations with the league, for changing that provision and having the uniforms provided by the R.C.A.F., the units to be responsible for maintaining them.

Mr. SKEY: I have no desire to hold up the passage of this measure, but I thought we should hear from the minister regarding one or two points and perhaps the committee might sit a few minutes after six o'clock. I wish to repeat my question because I feel that the very survival of the air cadet corps depends on the manner of direction, and if authority is to be divided between the R.C.A.F. the air cadet league and the provincial departments of education there is this difficulty, that they have to agree with everybody and there will be confusion. There will be no singleness of command. I suggest that a clear chain of command is most essential to the survival of the air cadet league and the squadrons in the way in which we wish them to continue.

I would also put to the minister a question which I asked the Minister of National Defence. That question was: Is the inter-service cadet committee considering standardization of pay and allowances and uniform conditions of service and commission for all three cadet corps, or are they all handling their own organizations and conducting them by different means?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): At present they are all operating separately under the guidance of the three defence departments, but the inter-service cadet committee was asked recently to make recommendations as to the conditions of service and regulations applying to the various cadet corps so as to provide as far as possible for the same treatment as between the army cadets, the navy cadets and the air force cadets, but all will receive approximately the same support as far as that can be arranged.

Mr. MacNICOL: I attended the annual meeting of the navy league which was held some time ago, and the matter was mentioned up there. I have forgotten what was said on that occasion. I have a friendly feeling for the proposed air cadet corps, but my memory is—and I am not clear on just what was said—that there should be no rivalry between the sea cadets and the air cadets. Is the minister able to tell us the number of air cadets in Toronto and at other similar points? Without passing judgment on this matter, because I have nothing tangible in front of me, will there be any conflict in the method of organization of the air brigade or corps, or whatever it may be called? Will there be a voluntary band of men and women behind this organization, such as is behind the navy league?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): It is already in being; this is not new. The air cadets were formed in 1940, but they were operating under the War Measures Act. It is now necessary to provide a bill in order that their future may be assured. At the present time the air cadets have about 289 squadrons throughout Canada. They plan to maintain a strength of about 15,000 air cadets in time of peace. That is about the same number as the navy has under contemplation.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not going to oppose this bill, because I realize that a development along this line would likely have the same beneficial effect on the young people as the navy league has had. It would train them to love the air service, to be young gentlemen, to be civil and courteous, to be active and to attain the other characteristics which go with the training in any well organized youth organization.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 27, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

VETERANS' QUALIFICATIONS

TABLING OF THIRD REPORT OF COMMISSION

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the third report, which is also the final report, of the royal commission on veterans' qualifications. Included are two supplements of the second report which was tabled last session, on October 19, 1945. The third report and the two supplements are the result of sittings held in the province of Quebec during January and February, 1946.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

RESIGNATION OF MR. JUSTICE M. B. ARCHIBALD AS CHAIRMAN

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to table copy of order in council P.C. 2583 of June 25, 1946, by which the governor general in council accepts the resignation of Mr. Justice M. B. Archibald as chairman of the national war labour board. After more than two years in that position Mr. Justice Archibald felt it necessary to relinquish it in order to devote his whole time as a member of the Nova Scotia supreme court.

I take this opportunity of paying warm tribute to Mr. Justice Archibald for the conscientious, able and wholly valuable manner in which he has filled a very difficult position. The administration of the wartime wages control order has not been easy, calling for a combination of fairness, good sense and understanding of the vital importance of economic stabilization. In every way Mr. Justice Archibald measured up to the qualifications of the position. I am sorry to see him go, but felt I could not press him to remain after giving so much of his time and energy.

Mr. C. A. L. Murchison, secretary of the national war labour board, has been appointed vice-chairman, and we shall carry on with alternate chairmen, Mr. Justice D. A. McNiven, Regina, and Judge J. C. A. Cameron, Belleville.

QUESTIONS

MILITARY WOOLLEN UNIFORMS

Mr. LOW:

Are military woollen uniforms being manufactured in Canada at the present time for shipment to foreign countries? If so (a) for which countries are they being produced; (b) how many are contracted for each country?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MAYHEW: The wartime prices and trade board has investigated and finds that no military woollen uniforms for shipment to foreign countries are being manufactured in Canada.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FISHERIES RESEARCH BOARD

Mr. REID:

1. What have been the total expenditures in each of the fiscal years 1935 to 1945 by the fisheries research board?

2. What was the number of permanent and non-permanent employees of the fisheries research board in the fiscal year 1935, and in in each year up to 1945?

3. How many scientists have been employed by the said board in each of the years 1935 to 1945?

DISTRICT AND COUNTY COURT JUDGES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. (a) How many judges in the district or county courts who have resigned from the bench are now in receipt of annuities under section 26 of the Judges Act; (b) what are their names and present addresses?

2. (a) How many judges of the district or county courts now living resigned after thirty years in office; (b) what are their names and addresses?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: To answer this question requires a long list of names and addresses, of which I have given a copy to the hon. member for Lake Centre. Perhaps the question might be made an order for a return, which I now table.

BONDING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. REID:

1. What is the number of government employees bonded or covered by insurance for the faithful performance of their duties?

2. What is the number in each department?

3. What is the annual cost of such insurance??

4. With what firm or firms is such insurance carried?

5. Has any claim been made by the government during the past ten years for default of any employee covered by such insurance?

6. If so (a) were any such claims made good by the companies carrying the insurance; (b) what sums were received by the government for default of any employees during the above years?

THE CIVIL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO EARLY CLOSING FOR SUMMER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): I should like to ask the Secretary of State if the government would not consider extending the privilege of the early daily closing to the civil service starting July 2. I would ask further if in his opinion the civil service should be penalized because this house chooses to remain in session all summer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the question should be placed on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MEASURES TO AVOID STOPPAGE OF PRODUCTION IN STEEL INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I sent him notice. In view of the importance of endeavouring to prevent a stoppage of production in the steel industry, has the minister or his department received any definite proposals from the companies in reply to the union proposals, the forty-hour week, or union-management proposals for settling the dispute in the industry? I have tried to summarize the questions.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was kind enough to give me notice of these three questions. In reply may I say that the matter of wages and hours of work in the steel industry is now being dealt with by Mr. Justice W. D. Roach, of the Ontario supreme court, as an industrial disputes inquiry commissioner. The points covered by the questions are under consideration, and I am advised by the commissioner that a meeting of all parties concerned is to be held to-morrow. I do not think there will be any undue delay in the report of the commissioner.

PACIFIC COAST COMMUNICATIONS

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE SERVICES IN RURAL BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Yesterday the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) asked a question about the disposal of the Pacific communications system. The question of the disposal of the Pacific communications system was discussed at a meeting between officials of War Assets Corporation, together with representatives of the R.C.A.F., the British Columbia Telephone company, Canadian National Telegraphs, Canadian Pacific Telegraphs and Dominion Government Telegraphs, and it was agreed that the surplus communication system should be sold to the proper parties and in the best interests of the public and all concerned.

The ultimate disposition of the Pacific communications system has been adhered to in accordance with the agreed requirements necessary to operate this high grade telephone and telegraph service in the best interests of the public in the areas covered by the system.

As a result of the sale of the Pacific communications system, wire facilities between Hope and Ashcroft, British Columbia, are composed of one circuit between Hope and Lytton and four circuits between Hope and Ashcroft. Complete telephone facilities at Ashcroft are provided by the British Columbia Telephone company, and telegraph services by Canadian National Telegraphs, Canadian Pacific Telegraphs and Dominion Government Telegraphs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUMMER WEIGHT UNIFORMS FOR MESSENGERS AND PROTECTIVE STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question that I wish to ask should be directed to you. Last year the Department of Public Works supplied the elevator operators in this building with summer uniforms. Would it not be possible for you as Speaker of the House of Commons to see that summer weight uniforms are supplied to the messengers and guards in this building? The men are now wearing winter weight uniforms.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING

REPEAL OF ACT—CONSOLIDATION OF STATUTORY PROVISIONS

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of bill No. 17, respecting the marking of articles containing gold, silver, or platinum.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. FRASER: In view of the fact that this bill is a redrafting of the act, perhaps it would be well if the minister were to make a brief statement. Will he tell the committee whether jewellery manufacturers and dealers had any say in the redrafting?

Mr. MacKINNON: Mr. Chairman, the Precious Metals Marking Act was passed, under that title, in 1928. Since then a number of amendments have been made, and it was found advisable to make some further amendments at this time. Instead of asking simply for the amendments it was considered advisable to rewrite the statute; therefore the bill being presented to-day contains the provisions of the original act, with the suggested amendments. The amendments are only of a minor nature, following experience in the working out of the act. The original act was passed for the purpose of giving protection to the public when purchasing articles of carat gold, silver or platinum. It is my understanding that officials in my department have consulted with the trade in respect of the proposed amendments. To speak frankly, the bill is largely routine, and a process of tying in the amendments which have already been passed.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On section 6—Quality mark.

Mr. ADAMSON: I understand that by this section the minister is doing away with the English or heretofore commonly known marking by carats, and is ordering a substitution in the nature of a decimal fineness. In other words under this bill one will be able to refer to gold as having so many carats or so much fineness. I see nothing in the bill which states that when, for instance, a metal is marked ·680 of fineness a statement shall be made as to the other metals in the alloy. This point may or may not be important, but I believe the committee would like further information as to why these changes are being made.

Mr. MacKINNON: An officer from the department will be here in a moment or two, at which time I shall be in a better position to answer the question. Perhaps the section might stand, so that we could return to it.

Mr. STIRLING: Speaking to this section, will the minister explain what is now required on silver articles manufactured in Canada? They are not covered by the United Kingdom gold mark. What does Canada require to designate the pureness of silver?

Mr. MacKINNON: This is a change in our act to conform with international usage, and with the system that has been in practice in England. I am informed that the silver marking is exactly the same as that used internationally, showing pure silver to the extent of 925/1000ths.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. STIRLING: What mark on a piece of silver would designate that?

Mr. MacKINNON: The mark would be the word "sterling," or the words "sterling silver," or the word "silver". It is to protect these markings that this legislation has been introduced.

Mr. CASE: Is this legislation intended to make the markings now used more readily understood? Why is the previous method of marking in carats being departed from?

Mr. MacKINNON: We are not getting away from the carat marking system. The explanation I have just given shows that the marking designates the actual silver or gold content.

Mr. STIRLING: Is a mark required on a plated article?

Mr. MacKINNON: That is permissible, not compulsory.

Mr. ADAMSON: Under the act as it now reads, nothing under nine carats can be designated as gold.

Mr. MacKINNON: That is correct.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is now in the bill.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am told that is not new.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Marking silver articles.

Mr. ADAMSON: I suggest that it might be advisable to provide for a date along with the Canadian national marking of a lion's head surrounded by the letter "C". We are endeavouring to establish a silversmith's industry and have gone quite a way in that direction. Silver gains in value as it ages. Georgian silver is much more valuable than Victorian silver, and I suggest that it would be advisable particularly on flatware and other silver household articles, to have near the "C" a date mark, which could be changed slightly every five or ten years.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have just discussed the point raised by the hon. member for York West, and I am told that his suggestion is an interesting one and was given consideration by the department just prior to the war, and was again considered when these amendments were under consideration. I should like to have the departmental officials go into the matter a little further.

Mr. STIRLING: Subsection 3 reads in part:

—there may be applied to the article a national mark authorized under licence . . .

Is this system to be adopted so that in future will these articles be marked with a lion's head?

Mr. MacKINNON: This has always been optional, as is indicated by the words "may be".

Mr. STIRLING: Has it ever been used?

Mr. MacKINNON: I am advised it has been used to a considerable extent.

Mr. JACKMAN: If I understand subsection 1 correctly, an article could be described as a silver article, even though it contained a base metal, as long as the silver was ·925 pure. Is subsection 1 drawn as carefully as the minister intends it to be? Reference to the definitions of "silver" and "silver article" in the interpretation section would not seem to disabuse my mind of the interpretation I have put upon this subsection.

Mr. MacKINNON: International custom in the manufacture of silver has called for a silver content of 925/1000ths with 75/1000ths copper. That is the only other metal commonly used in the manufacture of silver articles.

Mr. JACKMAN: I take it the minister is referring to sterling silver, not to plated silver. It does not seem to me that this section gives the public the protection which I am sure the minister intends them to have. The wording would indicate that an article could be described as a silver article—the definitions in the interpretation section are by no means limited—as long as the silver in the article is ·925 pure. Surely greater protection should be given to the public than appears to be given by this section.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am advised that this is considered as giving the public all the necessary protection. Ever since the sixteenth century 925/1000ths fine has been considered pure silver. In the great majority of cases copper has been the other metal used, but even if some other metal were used, if it were 925/1000ths fine it would still be classified as pure silver.

Mr. HAZEN: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Rosedale is worthy of consideration by the Minister of Justice. It depends upon the interpretation of section 8 of the bill, which says:

Subject to subsection two of this section the mark "silver", "sterling" or "sterling silver" or any abbreviation thereof may be applied to a silver article containing at least nine hundred and twenty-five parts by weight of pure silver in every one thousand parts of the silver in the article.

Then if you turn to the definition clause, 2(p):

"silver article" means an article wholly or partly or purporting to be wholly or partly composed of silver.

Therefore it would appear that any article with silver in it is a silver article. Section 8 might be interpreted to mean that the silver in that article must represent 925 parts by weight of pure silver in the article. I may be wrong; I have not studied the point at all, but I think the wording of section 8 is worthy of consideration, particularly when you look at section 2(p).

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will look at subsection 2 of section 8 he will find that the only deviation permitted from the 925/1000ths is to the extent of ten parts in one-thousand when solder is used and four parts when solder is not used. The definition in clause 2 reads:

"silver article" means an article wholly or partly or purporting to be wholly or partly composed of silver.

But the only thing that can be marked "silver", "sterling" or "sterling silver" is something of which 925/1000ths is pure silver, with the permissive deviation provided for in subsection 2 of section 8. It may be that an article of which a part is silver would not be wholly of silver. The head of a cane may be of silver. A certain portion of the cane may be of ebony or something else. In order to mark that part which purports to be silver with the words "silver", "sterling" or "sterling silver", that part must contain at least 925/1000ths of pure silver, subject to the slight deviation provided for in subsection 2.

Mr. HACKETT: Is that the international standard for sterling silver?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Articles to which applicable.

Mr. FRASER: Subsection 2 says:

Except as authorized by sections ten and eleven of this act, a mark other than a mark authorized by this section shall not be applied to a plated article.

But section 10 permits the use of a trade mark, without waiting for official registration, once application has been made.

Mr. MacKINNON: Delay is sometimes unavoidable in authorizing the granting of the proper marks, and this is intended to cover the case where an application has already been made.

Mr. FRASER: How long a delay is allowed?

Mr. MacKINNON: It is a departmental delay. It might be very short, or it might run into a few weeks.

Mr. FRASER: It would not go over a month?

Mr. MacKINNON: I could not guarantee that. It all depends on the state of affairs in the particular branch of the department which receives the application.

Mr. FRASER: What I have in mind is that a number of articles which were not up to standard might be marked and sold before the department caught up with them.

Mr. MacKINNON: There is a close inspection, and we have had very close cooperation from the trade generally. It would be a very rare case in which advantage would be taken of that situation.

Mr. FRASER: This is a safe clause to have in the bill?

Mr. MacKINNON: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 15 inclusive agreed to.

On section 16—Time for laying information and complaint.

Mr. HAZEN: This section says:

In the case of any offence punishable under this act the complaint shall be made, or the information shall be laid, within one year from the time when the matter of complaint or information arose.

Why is one year allowed? Why all the delay?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it was not expressly provided for in the bill the delay would be two years. The criminal code provides that in all cases not provided for by statute the proceedings to recover a penalty must be brought within two years from the time the offence is alleged to have been committed.

Mr. HAZEN: But this section also permits the information to be laid within one year.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I take it that means that a complaint is made under oath for a warrant and that an information is laid for a summons.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am told that under the criminal code action must be started within six months. The department wanted a longer period, and asked for this alteration to one year.

Mr. HAZEN: There seems to be a conflict of opinion between the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think it should be a shorter time. I do not see why the time should be extended, particularly in view of the provisions of the following section.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry; I had possibly in mind the provision of our Quebec statutes, which I remember having had to seek to have applied in several instances, where the period is two years if no special time is set. I see in the criminal code, in the case of any offence punishable by way of summary conviction, if no time is specially limited for making any complaint, or laying any information, in the act or law relating to the particular case, the complaint shall be made, or the information laid, within six months from the time when the matter of the complaint or information arose, except in the northwest territories and the Yukon territory.

On section 17—Power to enter, inspect and seize.

Mr. HAZEN: Apparently power is given in subsection 1 to enter and seize, and under subsection 2, to hold the articles for ninety days, or almost ninety days, and then proceedings can be instituted. Subsection 2 says:

Any article seized pursuant to subsection one of this section may be retained for a period of ninety days and if before the expiration of such period any proceedings in respect of such article are taken under this act may be further retained until such proceedings are finally concluded.

In other words, they can seize the articles, they can hold them for practically ninety days, and then they can commence proceedings. Why do they not have to commence the proceedings when they seize the articles? Why are they permitted to wait ninety days?

Mr. MacKINNON: This extra time is frequently needed. There are, I am told, only two points in Canada where the proper assay can be made to determine the quality of the goods seized, and it is found that this extra time is necessary. It is for the protection of the department that this extra time is provided.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to say another word about section 17, subsection 1. From a note on another page I find that before it was amended the section provided that any officer appointed under this act or any regulation should have power during business hours to enter the premises of any dealer. Now it is proposed to delete those words "during business hours" and substitute the words "at any reasonable time". It would appear that this is being done merely to meet the convenience of some inspector. He may go into some city and want to get out before the man's store is opened, or he may arrive after it is closed and he does not want to stay there. So to meet the convenience of some government inspector this amendment provides that he can enter a man's premises "at any reasonable time". Why should that be permitted? Why is the act as it stands not satisfactory? It must have been satisfactory to everybody except some government inspector; at least that is the way it impresses me. It seems to me that no government inspector should be permitted to enter business premises at any time that he considers reasonable, and that is all this section is going to amount to if it is changed as proposed. I think we should have some explanation. I may be putting a wrong meaning on the amendment; there may be some other reason why this is being done, but I do not think a government inspector should be permitted to enter a man's premises except during business hours, while he is carrying on his business there.

Mr. MacKINNON: This clause is introduced to cover a point which the hon. member has not thought of. Across the country many people keep their merchandise not only in their business premises but also in their homes. This is to allow an inspector to make an investigation and get possession of these articles at any reasonable time,—not merely during business hours, which may be from six to eight—where part of the merchandise may be in the merchant's home.

On section 18—Certificate of master or assayer of Royal Canadian Mint.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think it is reasonable that a certificate signed by any assayer of the mint shall be evidence of the facts stated therein. It is the standard certificate, the only possible certificate of fineness. The question I want to ask is this. Is there a definite Canadian marking, as there is in silver, with regard to platinum articles? We are probably the greatest producer of platinum; if not, we are very nearly so, and it seems to me that we should have some specific Canadian marking for platinum goods.

Mr. MacKINNON: In Canada there is a definite marking for silver and gold only, but not for platinum.

Mr. ADAMSON: I suggest to the minister that he consider a definite Canadian marking for platinum, in view of our particularly large production of platinum, iridium, and other metals which are in so much greater demand now than heretofore on account of their great strength.

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall see that that is done.

Mr. FRASER: There is no decimal point used either in regard to platinum?

Mr. MacKINNON: No.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

106. Penitentiaries branch—administration, $133,499.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): When the debate was adjourned last Friday evening I was commenting on the fact that people like myself who take a deep and keen interest in penal reform are often criticized. It has been said on more than one occasion that we are a people who are swayed by emotionalism and by sob stories, and I for one have resented that, because I think I can say rather that we are men and women who are motivated by the dynamic of righteousness. It will be a sorry day for Canada, and a sorrier day for the inmates of our federal penitentiaries, when our hearts fail to be moved by the needs of these unfortunate members of society.

I have seen men working in prison gangs garbed in prison clothing, guarded by men armed with rifles, and I have said to myself, as I suppose many another hon. member of the house has said to himself: "There I go but for the grace of God". For my part, I do not want ever to condone wrongdoing, no matter where it is found. I fully realize that men and women with criminal tendencies need to be taught that crime does not pay and that certainly the way of the transgressor is hard. But when all that has been said, I believe we still need to temper our justice with mercy.

As I read carefully the report of the Archambault commission, I find that it has some scathing things to say about penal administration in the past, and it emphasizes the need for a humane and brotherly understanding of these unfortunate people. I am inclined to think that the criticism of the Archambault commission's report made by the Minister of Justice last Friday evening had to do with these particular assertions on maladministration. I notice that the minister very graciously admitted that there is very much that is good in the report itself. Then he went on to say at page 2739:

There are certainly some assertions in it that are exaggerated.

That to my mind is a very serious reflection to pass upon esteemed persons whose judgment and ability have been so highly praised during the course of this debate. Speaking to the member for Selkirk, the minister qualified his criticism, when he said:

I have not had time to verify all the conditions described in the report.

And later on in the discussion, speaking about Stony Mountain penitentiary, the minister said—page 2740:

I have not been there myself. In fact, I have not been anywhere else since I came to Ottawa four and a half years ago.

I am satisfied in my own mind, Mr. Chairman, that when the minister made that statement he was not offering it to the house in any way as an excuse, because I do not think he is that type of person at all. But the people across Canada read Hansard, and they are going to read those remarks that the minister made and that other people are making. I know they read them, and I believe that a great many people will say to themselves it is about time the Minister of Justice got around a bit and visited some of these institutions that are under his care.

We who are here in the house from day to day and see the minister sitting in his place know that he has a most difficult task to perform and is giving himself to that task most diligently. It seems to me however that he ought to visit the federal penitentiaries as occasion offers, possibly between sessions of parliament, and acquire for himself first-hand information of the conditions that exist in those institutions, because I am satisfied that many of the conditions that have been complained about still exist, and they form the basis of our modern appeal for penal reform. Not punishment, but reformation, not revenge, but redemption: that, I believe, should be the keynote of our penal institutions to-day. And here I would place on the record an item culled from the Vancouver Sun of June 17, entitled "Contrast in Crime":

Education minister G. M. Weir said in Burnaby a few days ago that reestablishment of the Borstal home at New Haven "likely will be considered soon." It would be more reassuring if he had said that this matter is already receiving the earnest consideration of the provincial government. The record of both provincial and federal governments with respect to the treatment of delinquents and any real farsighted attack on the problem of crime, is disheartening. The public had a right to expect action earlier than this from Attorney-General Wismer, who is known to have the right idea but who seems, since his reappointment to his high post, to have let the matter sleep. The Department of Justice has issued a report which shows that 78·4 per cent of the 1945 penitentiary population were repeaters. This is an increase of 10 per cent in the last decade. What a terrible indictment of the existing penal system and of governmental sloth! Society is not getting the protection that a decent penitentiary system would give. The penitentiaries supply no corrective, they afford no deterrent. They are making criminals instead of curing them. The Sun, long an advocate of the reintroduction of Borstal, has pointed out before the sorry contrast the Canadian record offers when compared with that of Britain. An article in the current issue of Maclean's magazine highlights this contrast. Between the two wars Canada's serious crime rate multiplied three times while Britain's rate dropped one-quarter. In 1942, for example, the forty-one million people of Britain committed 4,000 indictable offences. In Canada, the same year, our twelve million people committed 46,723. What does Borstal purport to do? Maclean's article gives the answer. Regarding the years between 16 and 23 as the most critical in the life of the criminal, its sponsors try to give youths in this group a treatment that will "turn one kind of human being into another kind of human being." All but those who have demonstrated themselves as hopelessly vicious morally or defective mentally go to Borstal for a term of three years—that being the length of time that it takes to do what Borstal aims to do.

The system works. Four out of five Borstal graduates go straight, and Britain is able to get along with 39 prisons and jails for forty-one million people, while Canada maintains 147 corrective institutions of various kinds.

Before I bring these remarks to a close I want to offer a couple of suggestions to the Minister of Justice. First I suggest that he give serious consideration to the possibility of granting an amnesty to those whose conduct shows them to be deserving. By the grace of God we have been granted victory in a world shattering war. As nations and as individuals we have celebrated, and have expressed our joy and thankfulness. In some lands I believe it is customary at such times to mark the occasion by the granting of an amnesty to certain groups of prisoners. While it may not be feasible, and may not even be desirable, to grant a general pardon, surely something can be done, such as the partial remission of sentence, to mark this great victory.

My second suggestion may be more far-reaching, because it would entail a radical departure from our present system of administration. I realize that as a suggestion it may appear to be one born out of due time, but in my own mind I am convinced that it is sound and that time and the evolution of circumstances will bring it into being. To-day an arrested person is brought before a court of justice and tried. If found guilty of a serious crime he is sentenced to a period of imprisonment, and if that period exceeds two years he is confined in one of our federal penitentiaries. My suggestion is that after a man has been arrested, charged, tried and sentenced, the court of justice has done its work. From the moment a prisoner enters the gate of a prison he should no longer be under the law, which has been applied in the past in military form. He should be under the care of social and redemptive agencies, persons specially trained in reform work. It should be made quite clear to the prisoner that part of his punishment is the curtailment of his liberty, but that the period of his incarceration will afford him opportunities to regain his lost manhood.

I realize that I have spoken at some length, but the subject is one in which I am deeply interested. For long enough we have contented ourselves with talking about penal reform. Now may God give us grace and strength to go ahead and do something about it. In closing I should like to read a clipping from the Christian Science Monitor of a few weeks ago, written in connection with the revolt at Alcatraz prison:

> The revolt at Alcatraz prison caused five deaths and hundreds of war-sized headlines. The only corrective result so far reported is a plan to repair the cell block which gave a desperate convict a chance to get weapons. Will that be the total product of the headlines? Or will the attention focused on Alcatraz prick the public conscience a mite?
> What is Alcatraz? Is it simply an "escape-proof" prison set on a rock amid the rip tides of San Francisco bay? Or is it a spectacular symbol of society's failure to deal adequately with crime? It is not a place for reform or rehabilitation; most of the 277 there society has given up. Most of them are "lifers" the public did not wish to execute and dared not give any chance at freedom. At Alcatraz they are safe—and comfortably forgotten.
> George Bernard Shaw has a new book called "The Crime of Imprisonment," in which he says: "In imprisonment, the public is seeking its own salvation, not that of the lawbreaker." Perhaps this is the best our society can do at present—seek protection for itself from such desperate enemies as it sends to Alcatraz. Prisons are easier to repair than men. But the method is costly and does not provide any protection from new crops of criminals—it is not even a sure deterrent. If we could not put such men out of sight in the Alcatrazes, would we make more effort to remove the causes of crime?

This, sir, I contend is a question that society as a whole must answer, and that very soon.

Mr. CROLL: Mr. Chairman, I realize that prison reform is not a new subject, for it has been under review in this country for well over a hundred years. The most recent review was conducted by the Archambault commission in 1938, when the problem was explored and reexamined and many valuable recommendations put forward. In the light of these researches it is interesting to examine the statistics on crime in Canada over the past forty years. From 1900 to 1943 the number of crimes increased from 5,768 to 41,752, an increase of 642 per cent. The increase in population during the same period was 120 per cent, so we see that the increase in the crime rate was more than five times the increase in population. A further breakdown of the statistics is even more revealing. Convictions for all offences in 1905 numbered 62,559; in 1925 they were 177,783, and in 1943 they numbered 517,363. Or to consider the ratio of crimes to population, convictions for all offences were 1,042 per 100,000 of population in 1905, 1,913 per 100,000 of population in 1925, and 4,379 per 100,000 of population in 1943.

As far as juveniles between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one were concerned, the same trend is apparent. To consider only major offences, or what would be equivalent to indictable offences when referring to adults, the convictions of juveniles were 238 per cent per 100,000 of that age group in 1911, 708 in 1937, and 900 in 1943. I presume hon. members may ask, can that be true? Well, those are the figures; they may be found in the Canada Year Book and in the publications of the statistics bureau, and they are true. I think it well that this house should realize these figures are an appalling reflection upon the moral therapy of our prison system, particularly when we consider that a great proportion of the crimes were committed by repeaters. These figures are very interesting. Of the 1,335 males committed to the seven dominion penitentiaries during the year ended March 31, 1945, 1,050, or more than 76 per cent, three out of every four offenders, had been in prison before. Of the 42,000 men sentenced for indictable offences of all types in the same year, more than 13,000 of them, or one out of every three, had been in prison before. The Archambault commission of 1938 reported that there were 188 prisoners then in confinement who had been convicted an average of nineteen times each, and had cost the taxpayers of this country an average of $25,453.24, without taking into consideration the loss occasioned by the crimes which they committed.

Mr. FLEMING: They cost that much each?

Mr. CROLL: Yes, each. No hon. member will deny that these figures represent a staggering defeat of crime prevention. I think we ought to ask ourselves: Why have we failed to keep crime under control? In my opinion —and I think it is the opinion of the Archambault commission—no cause is more influential than the prison system itself. Because, as the hon. member for Kootenay East has said, while Canada's rate of serious crime was increasing threefold between the first and second great wars, under another system the British rate has dwindled by four. In twenty years, in conjunction with the Borstal system for young offenders, Great Britain reduced the population of her prisons from 186,000 to 46,000. More significantly, in the year 1942 there were 47,000 indictable crimes committed in Great Britain, which has a population of 41 million; and in the same year in Canada, with a population of 12 million, there were 46,723 indictable offences.

Chief Justice J. C. McRuer, who was a member of the Archambault commission, said in a public address in May, 1942:

> Why we should have 46,723 persons convicted of serious crimes in Canada in one year, while in Great Britain with nearly four times the population the annual convictions were approximately 47,000 is a matter for careful consideration and profound examination.

Well, the explanation it seems is quite clear. There are two methods of handling lawbreakers. One decreases violation of the law, and the other seems to increase violation of the law. An examination of the Canadian penal system, as reported by the 1938 Archambault commission, discloses deep-rooted and yet remediable defects. These defects are:

1. Staffs are inadequately trained, sometimes unsuitable for their duties, and generally underpaid.

2. Any individual attempt to ameliorate conditions is frustrated by a multitude of detailed regulations.

3. The prisoner is cut off from the rest of the world by walls and by regulations which deny him newspapers and restrict his correspondence and visiting privileges.

4. He is treated as one of a disgraceful class of persons to be denied any humanizing contacts.

5. He is allowed only one half hour of daily exercise in the open air, consisting mainly of walking in a ring with no conversation allowed.

6. His work is unproductive and insufficient.

7. Generally, trades are not taught.

8. A great proportion of the prisoner's time is spent in idleness.

As for youthful offenders, the commission reported that—

> Contrary to the general public belief they have not the least opportunity to learn a trade—

—to fit them for employment on discharge. It also appears that—

> Education has been largely neglected in all Canadian penitentiaries, and no real interest has been taken in this important feature of reformative treatment.

Further:

> The school rooms are all poorly equipped . . . accommodation is meagre and unsuitable . . . there is no vocational education worthy of the name . . . there is little use of the library as an agency of education . . .

And all this in a penitentiary in which——a large proportion of the population is illiterate.

In spite of the obvious opportunities for agricultural work the commission found that—> —the farms are not exploited or cultivated to the extent of their possibilities . . . are inefficiently operated and there is no one connected with the penitentiaries branch who has the required experience to direct the operation of farms which total over 1,000 acres.

Something has already been said about the Borstal system. I looked through Hansard and I did not see there a clear statement of what the Borstal system consists of, so I now quote from a report respecting the Borstal system by Barman of London, in 1934:

> Borstal is not a boys' prison. To collect all prisoners under twenty-one and confine them in a corner of a large gaol and call the result a Borstal institution is a sham and a pretence, a piece of administrative complacency defrauding a credulous public. A Borstal institution is a training school for adolescent offenders, based on educational principles, pursuing educational methods. To be sent there is a punishment, for the training involves a very considerable loss of liberty, but to stay there is to be given a chance to learn the right way of life and to develop the good there is in each.

The English Borstal system which deals with young offenders over the age of sixteen years was instituted by the Prevention of Crime Act, 1908. The act recognized for the first time that youthful adolescents, whatever their crimes may be, were to receive special treatment adapted to their needs. Subsequent legislation increased the age from twenty-one to twenty-three, and extended the possible period of detention from one to three years.

Young offenders between the ages of sixteen and twenty-three were divided into three classes (1) those who are not bad enough for Borstal and can be dealt with by probation or other non-institutional treatment; (2) those who are too bad for Borstal, and (3) the remainder, mostly repeaters, who are selected for Borstal. As a rule first offenders are not sent there.

The Borstal sentence is ordinarily three years, of which two are spent in the institution, with one year at liberty under supervision. In the eight Borstal institutions, some are locked up at night, and some are locked neither day nor night. The institutions offer a graded system of supervision and restriction according to the character of the inmates. Some exercise no more restraint than there is in an ordinary boarding school—in fact the boarding school principle is extensively used. In each institution the boys are divided into houses, in charge of a housemaster and his assistant. They progress from grade to grade, promotion being governed by good conduct and industry, until they are trusted to work without supervision and then without escort.

Industrial training and vocational guidance play an important part in the Borstal system. Through hard work, physical training and planned recreation, delinquent boys are thus able to reshape their lives. Much of the credit for their success is due to the unusually high calibre of the Borstal staffs, who are given the widest possible scope in dealing with their charges, and to the Borstal association which supervises and assists boys who have been discharged from one of the institutions. The success of Borstal is shown by the fact that two-thirds of the boys who are discharged do not again appear at any time during their lives in prison; and fewer than twenty per cent are repeaters. Almost all youngsters, with few exceptions, develop sufficient strength of character to take their places in the world as useful citizens. Such is Britain's very wise investment in youth. It seems to me that where we cannot lead, we can at least follow.

The report of the Archambault commission proved conclusively that the present system in Canada is fifty years out of date physically and morally. To remedy it requires more than the handful of amendments which have followed this indictment. In my opinion the need is for a thorough change of perspective on the part of the government and on the part of the people of Canada. Many of the vices of the present system have grown up because of the complete indifference of the public in general. This mentality is undoubtedly a hangover from the Victorian era, where a prison was the place to which you sent lawbreakers and forgot all about them.

Five of the seven penitentiaries in Canada were built upwards of sixty years ago, and the way of thinking that conceived these gloomy buildings still governs the treatment of their inmates. But if the physical constitution of our penitentiaries is antiquated, the penal therapy practised in them is equally obsolete. Yet it is useless to change one and not the other. It is useless to develop modern methods of treatment if young and reformable offenders are to be given a complete education in crime through enforced and indiscriminate association with experienced criminals. As it works out in practice, the first offender is a better citizen when he goes in than when he comes out. To remedy this situation, the Archambault commission made some eighty-eight recommendations. I shall not read them all, but I should like to refer to a few.

1. A centralized prison system under one federal government authority.

2. A classification system to separate young and salvageable prisoners from repeaters and the mentally deficient.

3. Stress on education and vocational training.

4. A new approach to prison discipline.

5. Facilities for helping released prisoners take their place in civilian life.

6. Institutions patterned after the Borstal system for young offenders from sixteen to twenty-three years.

7. Better training and pay for prison officers.

8. Thorough medical and psychiatric examination.

9. A merit system for reformables on the model of the English system.

10. More outdoor games and exercises.

11. Reorganization of prison industries.

12. Installation of parole officers.

The committee may or may not agree with the Archambault report, but I think we must all pay our respects to the intelligence and probity of the commission. But what has been done in the eight years since their report was submitted can only be put down as insignificant. In fairness it must be said that in six of those years we were involved in a horrible struggle and not much could be expected, but that is finished. We ought to be ready now to make progress. Some small reforms have been made, and credit must be given. These reforms include permission to the prisoners to have playing cards in their cells so that they can amuse themselves. They are allowed to have puzzles and drawing materials. They are permitted to hear a slightly wider selection of radio programs, and to see one moving picture per month. They bathe more often than they used to. One penitentiary has installed mechanical dishwashers. The rule of silence is now enforced only between the hours of seven and eight in the evening. Only a short time ago a psychiatrist was assigned to the penitentiary at Kingston, but there is still none in the other six penitentiaries.

But the rest remains practically as before. There is still the hole, the strapping bench, the thirty minutes of exercise a day, and the necessity of prisoners spending fifteen hours of each day alone in their cells. Prisoners still earn five cents per day in old and badly equipped shops. Virtually nothing has been done to facilitate the classification of prisoners, to supply vocational training, or to segregate and supply curative treatments for young offenders. In the words of the 1913 penitentiaries commission:

> The old and the young, the bad and the well disposed, the hopeless and the hopeful, all are treated as so much human waste in a common heap.

I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that penal reform is not a matter of amending one or another of the seven hundred odd regulations which have accumulated since the original Penitentiaries Act was passed in 1868. It is a question, first, of recognizing and, second, of applying, well established principles. The cornerstone of modern penology is classification, segregation and after-care, none of which is adequately practised in Canada.

Criminals may be divided into three main classes, as the hon. member for Saskatoon City has said. They are, first, accidental or occasional criminals; second, reformable criminals, and, third, habitual criminals. In Canadian prisons these types are thrown together in hopeless confusion, and when to them are added the criminally insane, for whom no separate provision is made, if they become insane more than three months after they have been committed to prison, the reason for Canada's failure in crime prevention becomes apparent.

Only adequate classification and segregation will avoid this evil, and these are almost physically impossible in the Canadian prison system as at present constituted. Sheer lack of facilities prevents the separation of the young from the old, the reformable first offender from the hardened repeater, the weak from the vicious, and the moron from the wayward intellectual. The only solution, as the Archambault commission realized, is to centralize penal control. I can see some difficulties about that. They recommended that the reformatories and provincial gaols must be brought under the same jurisdiction as the penitentiaries so as to develop a coordinated system of classification and treatment for all except short-term offenders. Instead of automatically sending a man to the nearest penitentiary following a conviction of two years or more, as is done at the present time, it should be made possible to put him through a screening process that will permit the segregation in various prisons of the habitual offender, the young prisoner, the mentally deficient, the incorrigible, and the insane.

The Archambault commission recommended a six-point programme of classification designed to remove many of the evils of the present system. This recommendation must be implemented, but its functioning is predicated on centralized control. But a just and humane prison system in itself does not complete the picture. The after-care of discharged prisoners is fully as important. The Archambault commission concluded that the alarming increase in repeaters was chiefly due to two factors:

> First, the absence of any serious attempt to effect the reformation of the prisoner while he was incarcerated . . . and
> Second, the failure to provide him on release with adequate assistance . . . to obtain honest work and support himself and his dependents.

It costs this country $4,000,000 a year to keep 3,000 men in penitentiaries, but when a prisoner is let out, he is on his own. He faces an unfamiliar and hostile world with a railroad ticket, a few dollars earned at five cents a day, and a suit of prison-made clothing which he gets rid of at the first opportunity. Through enforced isolation from the outside world he has lost touch; his unproductive, rigidly controlled life in prison has left him badly handicapped in his efforts at rehabilitation. Sooner or later ninety-five per cent of our penitentiary inmates are released, and the 1938 commission was convinced that with proper after-care the vast majority of them could become useful citizens. Instead, as we have seen, three-fourths of them commit further crimes and are returned to prison.

At the present time there are eight prisoners' welfare associations in Canada. They have done invaluable, if unpublicized, work, for which this committee will, I am sure, commend them whole-heartedly. Yet they are gravely handicapped by lack of adequate financial support—no regular contribution is made by the federal government—and without coordination it is difficult for them to pursue a uniform programme throughout the country. By contrast the state-controlled and financed rehabilitation of ex-prisoners is one of the most profitable features of the British penal system. There the Central Association for the Aid of Discharged Convicts, whose president is the Home Secretary, is financed by the treasury to coordinate the work of all the societies engaged in assisting ex-convicts. When a prisoner is released, one of the organizations takes charge of his maintenance for at least two weeks, helps him to find a job, and even buys tools for him if necessary.

No fewer than four recommendations were made by the Archambault commission to set up a coordinated system of after-care for rehabilitating released prisoners. They saw that prisoners have to be helped to face the problem of their reentry into society, and that the solution lay partly in coordinating all the prisoners' aid societies under government sponsorship, and partly in enlisting the cooperation of the public to assist discharged prisoners to find employment and resume their place in the world.

In general, what is needed is a complete change of mind and a change of heart in dealing with crime. We must recognize it for what it is—a disease born of social conditions for which the country as a whole must accept greater responsibility. And like a disease, crime can, in most cases, be cured. The offender against the law must be punished for his transgression—that is the basic principle of any system of justice. But more important, he must be prevented by positive treatment from continuing in the way of lawlessness.

So far we have confined ourselves to punishing law-breakers by taking away their liberty for a period of years and then returning them to the world more anti-social than they were to begin with. That this method has been a complete failure is apparent from the statistics of crime to which I have referred. It remains to try another course. We have before us, in Britain, an example of what can be done, given an understanding of the nature of the problem and a real desire to remedy it.

The treatment of crime must be brought out from behind the hundred-year old walls of Kingston penitentiary, Dorchester and Stony Mountain into the light of modern science. The country at large must be taught a sympathetic and intelligent approach to crime and its prevention. Only by facing up squarely to the facts can we hope to provide a remedy. Until we do, and so long as we attempt to cope with the situation by antiquated methods, we may expect the present trend in lawlessness to continue.

I started out by saying that prison reform was not a new problem in this country. The first commission to inquire into it was appointed in 1832. It met and made a recommendation, which was tabled. Sixteen years later, in 1848, another commission was appointed. It too met and made a recommendation, which also was tabled. In 1867 another commission was appointed. It met, made a recommendation, and the recommendation was tabled. Forty-six years later, in 1913, another commission was appointed. It met, made a recommendation, and that recommendation was tabled. Seven years later, in 1920, another commission was appointed. It too met, made recommendations, and again the recommendations were tabled. Then in 1938, eighteen years later, another commission was appointed. It too met and made a recommendation, and now we have that recommendation before us, eight years later.

We cannot solve the problem we have been discussing here by ignoring it. We have to face up to it. It is long overdue for our attention. Mr. Chairman, we must do something about this problem, not to-morrow, but to-day. The Archambault report was a splendid one. All I ask is that the minister and his department apply themselves immediately to it and bring into effect recommendations in that report that will change the system to the benefit of the people of Canada generally.

Mr. McKAY: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to what has been said by the hon. member for Kootenay East, and by the hon. member for Spadina who has just taken his seat. Both speeches have been most informative. This discussion, while it has gone on for some considerable time, is one of great importance to this country. Last year we discussed penal reform at some considerable length. Some of us were not particularly satisfied with what had been done following the report of the Archambault royal commission, and we are still not satisfied.

I propose to deal at the outset this afternoon with the matter of crime prevention. It seems obvious that there has been neglect and failure to work out any national technique under the Department of Justice, or for that matter anywhere else, for the prevention of crime among our youth. The field—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would the hon. member—

Mr. McKAY: Would the minister wait until I am finished?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not like to leave the imputation unanswered that there is failure on the part of the Department of Justice to institute methods for the prevention of crime among youth. That is not within the jurisdiction of the department, or within the jurisdiction of the House of Commons or of the hon. member who is now speaking.

Mr. McKAY: I said, and I repeat, that there has been a failure to work out any national technique anywhere for the prevention of crime among youth, and I referred to the Department of Justice and added, or for that matter anywhere else. I cannot see any particular objection to that statement, Mr. Chairman. The field has never been explored, so far as I can find out, and no machinery for dealing with potential offenders and for the liquidation of crime-producing centres has from the national viewpoint ever been conceived, much less standardized and set up for service. The dominion has left it in large part to the provinces, and the provinces have left it to the dominion, with the result that next to nothing has been done.

The child who has been raised in a slum home, under bad housing conditions, and in miserable surroundings, often undernourished in mind as well as in body, has been robbed of his rightful chance, and such conditions will breed delinquency as long as the state sits back and placidly allows such conditions to exist. We hoe out weeds in our gardens and fields, but the elimination of the evil which surrounds our youth has been largely left to a few churches and community-inspired organizations, who cannot hope to cope with this problem.

The house should take cognizance of the situation and proceed to eliminate crime by removing its most obvious source.

The minister is unquestionably aware of the wave of crime that is sweeping this country from coast to coast at the present time. Newspaper reports indicate that the perpetrators of these innumerable offences against the law of the land are in most cases young persons in their early twenties. Too often these young men and women have previously served time in penal institutions. It appears obvious to the most casual observer that, this being the case, our penal institutions have little rehabilitative or redemptive value. As a mode of treatment for offenders against the law, incarceration in our gaols and prisons without a programme of rehabilitation appears most ineffective. Many of Canada's outstanding leaders in education, in the church, in the legal profession, believe that a more sympathetic and above all scientific approach to the problem of youthful delinquency is most urgent. Acts of terrorism throughout the country continue, while the major recommendation of the Archambault royal commission of 1938, the establishment of the Borstal system in Canada, remains unimplemented. The United Kingdom has, by the establishment of this system, most satisfactorily met the problem of juvenile delinquency. The number of young people who are rearrested after completing a term in Borstal institutions is very small. It is so successful that more than seventy per cent are never reconvicted. Youth have gained confidence in the administration of justice in the old land through the introduction of the Borstal system. There is a grave need of something of the same sort being established here in Canada. This house should insist that action be taken at the earliest possible moment to establish Borstal institutions in this country. It is recognized by many states, including England, the United States and France, as the most efficient agent of reform which has yet been devised for young offenders against the law.

A commissioner has now been appointed as authorized by section 4(a) of the Penitentiary Act of 1939, as enacted by section 2 of chapter 28 of the statutes of 1945. The house should be deeply concerned with regard to the activities of this commissioner. Most students of penology who have carefully studied the report of the royal commission of 1938 which investigated Canada's penal system are agreed that the report was a most noteworthy document, exhaustive in detail and on the whole generally satisfactory. Why, in the face of the opinions of these experts, are such statements made from the government benches as appear in Hansard, page 2744, and as have occurred during this debate? I quote remarks made by the hon. member for New Westminster:

> Mr. Reid: I have one question to ask the minister and a suggestion to make as well. First of all, may I say that I was pleased this evening to hear him remark that many of the suggestions—

Note the word "many".

> —and recommendations of the commission which were supported by certain hon. members tonight were exaggerated. I remember the visit of the commissioner to the Pacific coast, and I could use a stronger word than "exaggerated." Before the minister implements the recommendations made in the report I would suggest that he had better wait until he has a report from the new commissioner who has been appointed.
> An hon. Member: Appoint another royal commission.
> Mr. Reid: No; I am not in favour of that. Judge Archambault should never have been appointed to the job to which he was appointed. He knew little or nothing at all about penitentiaries. Many of the recommendations were ridiculous. I know whereof I speak. I do not care who appointed him; I am saying that as a member of parliament.
> Mr. Castleden: He was not alone in it.
> Mr. Reid: He took charge of it. As a matter of fact he was the chairman of the commission and took an active part too.

I submit that to say that many of the suggestions and recommendations were exaggerated, and to add that many of the recommendations were "ridiculous", and more, that the chairman, Mr. Justice Archambault, should never have been appointed, in effect amounts to a virtual repudiation of the work of this commission. It is a strange thing indeed that the government should appoint men in whom they had no confidence. If the commissioners were incompetent to conduct a survey of this country's penal system, why were they permitted to spend two years studying prisons in Canada and overseas, at a cost to the Canadian taxpaying public of $108,000? There can be only one answer: the government does not approve the report; it was not to the government's liking, because it spoke frankly and told the truth. The truth occasionally hurts, Mr. Chairman. It is most apparent that it is now the government's intention to ignore these suggestions and recommendations, because a commissioner has been appointed—

An hon. MEMBER: Another one.

Mr. McKAY: —who, as the minister states, and to use his own words, will "be able to make recommendations which can be implemented." After spending thousands of dollars of the public's money to produce it, the royal commission report of 1938 appears destined for the wastepaper basket to which so many other royal commission reports have been relegated in the past. And a new commissioner has been appointed—a military man, no less—who, the minister states, is to obtain accurate and up-to-date information as to what should be done with regard to our penal institutions. I am not questioning this man's qualifications, but I do hesitate, and I believe Canadians generally will hesitate, to accept one man's word against that of three men who were experts in their own field of endeavour for years and because of the very nature of their professions have been closely associated with the subject of penal institutions and penal reform throughout their long and varied careers. It is not inconceivable, Mr. Chairman, that should the new commissioner not recommend changes to the liking of the government, his report too will be thrown in the discard and we shall wait for another half century or more for satisfactory penal reform.

Last session the minister stated, as reported in Hansard of December 12, page 3353, that the recommendations of the Archambault royal commission dealing with the establishment of a Borstal system—to use his own words—"cannot be acted upon until there is some change in our constitution."

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH: Good old constitution!

Mr. McKAY: This seems to me a further excuse for government inaction. If the constitution must be amended to meet the situation—and I maintain that conditions with regard to crime among the youth of this country are serious enough to warrant that change—surely our constitution can be amended for that purpose. The public are demanding that something be done. Our constitution, unlike the laws of the Medes and Persians, is not unalterable: it has been changed before and can be changed again. May I suggest that the minister take the initiative and at the earliest possible moment call a conference of provincial and dominion officials who are interested in prison reform to consider this whole subject. There is ample evidence that the provinces are greatly concerned about the increase in crime throughout the country. They ought to be, because it is costing provincial treasuries millions of dollars. Everyone is concerned because everyone, by one means or another, is paying taxes to provide for these ever-increasing expenditures. I do not believe the provinces will stand in the way of amending the constitution if it needs to be amended in order to cope with this serious problem. I have every reason to believe the minister is sympathetic to the suggestion that Borstal schools be established in Canada, because he must know the record of these schools in the United Kingdom. Someone must assume responsibility for dealing with the situation.

In the discussion of this subject last year, figures were placed on the record—I do not propose to repeat them now—to show that crime among our youth was increasing at an alarming rate, while in the United Kingdom, since the inception of the Borstal school system, it had shown a steady decline. Canada must grapple with this serious social problem. The public is demanding that something be done, because the situation is appalling. I submit that the minister has within his power the remedying of the situation, which has been altogether too long a festering sore on the body of our social structure.

Mr. KIDD: I should like to bring to the minister's attention another angle of the penitentiaries question, and that is the present position of men who resigned as guards to go overseas. When war broke out in 1939 many of these men, returned soldiers from the last war, immediately enlisted. They joined up in 1939, 1940 and 1941, and particularly would I draw attention to Kingston, Portsmouth, and similar penitentiaries. The same applies no doubt to other penitentaries across Canada. Some of these men went overseas, others gave valuable service in the veterans guards. Some have not come back; others are now returning. Naturally when they enlisted their places had to be filled, but I would make a strong appeal to the minister to see to it that those men who are now being taken on the staffs again do not lose their seniority by reason of their service overseas. Some of those who were taken on to fill the places of the men who resigned to go overseas have been confirmed in their positions. Some were temporary. At any rate, on behalf of these particular men of whom I speak, who made such a splendid contribution to the war effort, I ask that every consideration be given their cases when they come up for review by the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is a matter that has received very serious consideration. When the war broke out my predecessor gave instructions to the wardens to release all those who could be spared and who wished to enlist in the forces. Then, after the staffs were cut to the smallest possible number that could cope with the job that had to be done, the others were told that it was felt their services were essential to the administration of these penitentiaries at home, and that if they remained with the service they would get first consideration, subject of course to the restoration of the rights of those who had obtained leave to enlist. There were very many who did remain, and who felt that they would have been more comfortable in the uniform of the fighting men. Some of them chose to leave, and they resigned. They were told, "If you do that, we shall have to give consideration to those who stay with us." Now the war is over and some have returned. Wherever it is found possible, without breaking a promise to those to whom promises were made to restore full rights to returned men, sympathetic consideration is being given. There are some cases, some specialized jobs, where you could not take back a man who resigned and left, in spite of the representations made to him that his services were required, without breaking a commitment that was made at the time to the one who took on his work. The hon. member would not like, any more than I would like, to have the department break commitments that were made at that time. That is the only qualification there is. The department is doing its best, because it appreciates that that is what every right-minded person would wish to have done, but it cannot go to the extent of breaking commitments that were made when there was this great need of retaining essential men in the service of the penitentiaries.

Mr. COCKERAM: With reference to those who have been taken back, may I ask whether they are being reinstated in the pension fund having regard to the services they rendered in the army?

Mr. ST, LAURENT: Those who went on leave return under the ordinary conditions not only of being kept in the pension fund but of having their position in the superannuation fund improved by the statutory increases they would have obtained had they remained here. As to others who left without leave, some of them withdrew their gratuities. I cannot say how each individual case is being dealt with. The only thing I have said that we could not do is to breach commitments which we made to those who replaced these men. But, provided that we do not have to breach commitments made to others, we will give the returning men just as generous treatment as the regulations will allow.

Mr. COCKERAM: If a man who resigned his position to serve in the forces is taken back on the strength of the penitentiary staff, I would ask the government to allow him to pay into the superannuation fund for the time he was away, so that we will not lose the benefit of those years of pensionable service.

Mr. KIDD: I would reinforce what the hon. member has said in that regard. Different points of view were held in 1939 and 1940 with respect to these men, but the men had the good will of everyone when they left to join the forces. When they went, some of them took their five per cent, and now that they are back, when they are taken on the strength of the penitentiary staff, they should be allowed to pay back into the fund what they have withdrawn so that their pension position will not be impaired.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The most I can say is that the only restriction I have imposed is that we must not break commitments made to others. Apart from that, these men will get as sympathetic consideration as it is possible to extend to them.

Mr. HAZEN: I have a case which I do not regard as a closed book, although I have not got very far with it, and I hope the minister will not regard it as closed either. I do not ask him to deal with it this afternoon, but it has to do with a warden who got leave to enlist in 1940. He enlisted in the armed services, and after discharge he wrote to the acting warden informing him that he was not coming back, although this letter has not been discovered among the files of the warden. He had served as a warden for about nine years, I think, during which period he had contributed five per cent of his salary toward the superannuation fund. Because of the fact that no word had been received that he was coming back, an order in council was passed which deprived him of the amount he had contributed to the pension fund over that period of years. Under the act I believe there is a provision that a man must contribute for ten years before he can have the amount he has contributed returned to him in case he leaves the service, though I believe an amendment has been made to that provision. This man served for some nine years. He got leave to enlist, and because when he got out of the armed forces he did not go back, an order in council was passed depriving him of this amount. But he points out to me that if a man who is employed as a warden is dismissed after being employed for several years, he receives back the amount he has contributed to the fund. To me it seems hardly fair or right that a man dismissed from the service should have his contribution to the fund repaid while a man who volunteered to go overseas is deprived of the amount he contributed.

As I say, I do not regard this matter as closed. I hope the government will see its way clear to do something about it, and I propose to take it up further with the minister, though I do not ask him to deal with the matter this afternoon.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think I know the case to which the hon. member is referring. All I would care to say at this time is that this man was not a warden, and I believe that correction should be made. The warden is the person in charge of the penitentiary, and I do not think the impression should be allowed to go abroad that the person the hon. member has in mind is one of the seven wardens.

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He was another, lower official.

Mr. HAZEN: Perhaps I should have said a guard.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, in fact I think he was an assistant.

Mr. FLEMING: I have a few remarks to offer in connection with this item, Mr. Chairman, particularly in the light of some of the statements made in the chamber to-day and on June 21 in relation to the matter of penitentiary reform.

We have heard an extended discussion of the recommendations of the Archambault royal commission. I do not know whether the Minister of Justice intended, when he spoke on this subject on June 21, to leave the impression some of us have drawn from his words. Certainly I hope he did not intend to give the impression which I think is given by his words in this respect. I believe many reading what he said will form the impression that the minister was throwing at least some cold water on hopes that the government really means to give effect to the recommendations of that commission. As a matter of fact there was much more reason for hope in the remarks of the minister when he spoke on this subject last fall, hope that the government really intended to implement the recommendations of the Archambault commission, than one would be warranted in drawing from his remarks of June 21. So before this item is passed, in the light of the study of conditions now being made by the commissioner, General Gibson, I hope the minister will give the house an assurance that there is no thought of delaying action on this report or giving to the recommendations therein contained anything less than meaningful action as soon as conditions permit.

It appears that others on the government side drew a similar impression from the remarks of the minister. That was evident in the address of the hon. member for New Westminster, who took occasion to question the capacity of Chief Justice Archambault to head such a commission. I do not feel called upon to justify the qualifications of Chief Justice Archambault for this work. I think his qualifications and those of his associates are abundantly demonstrated in the contents of the report itself. It is a remarkable document, one of the finest services of its kind to be performed by any royal commission in the history of this country. I for one am satisfied that the conscience of this country, now that the war is over and all excuses for delay are removed, will not permit dilly-dallying with the recommendations made by that commission. Chief Justice Archambault was supported by two eminent colleagues, Mr. R. W. Craig, K.C., former attorney general of the province of Manitoba, and Mr. J. C. McRuer, K.C., now chief justice of the high court division of the supreme court of Ontario. Both these gentlemen are eminent jurists, and it cannot be denied that they have had a broad experience with men who have found their way into these penal institutions. Nor can it be denied that they gave intensive and most intelligent study to the problem referred to them. They travelled widely; they studied other systems, and I think the report they wrote is the most comprehensive document of its kind to be produced in the history of this country; and we have had not a few documents of a similar nature.

Let it not be said that the need for reform of our penal institutions is any less urgent now than it was in 1938, when that report was written by the royal commission. I am not going into statistics; the committee has had ample statistics this afternoon. But I should like to refer to the press report of an address delivered by one who has had much to do at first hand with conditions in Kingston penitentiary. I refer to Canon W. E. Kidd, who for some time was protestant chaplain at this institution. In addressing a church assembly in Kingston on May 10 of this year he is reported as follows:

. . . members of the Christian church should see that men who are sent to penal institutions get treatment leading to reformation.

He said such treatment was not possible under the present system.

Think of that, in this year of grace 1946!

Canon Kidd said he spoke as a chaplain who had seen thirteen years' service at the Kingston penitentiary. He said whatever is done with regard to reformation in penal institutions the Christian church should see that new regulations are satisfactory.

Many articles are being written about prison reform, he said, adding that Kingston penitentiary had a splendid staff, but it was hampered by government regulations. It is the general feeling that lack of reformation at the prison is not due to the staff, he said.

Canon Kidd suggested that the deputy warden and senior officers of institution should get together occasionally to study improvements in the penitentiary system. "The regulations," said he "are formed in Ottawa, and the local authorities have nothing to say about them."

"Men who are serving time in these institutions are entitled to more than they are getting. There are many things that can be done. I think they should get more pay, so they can have sufficient money when they complete their sentence," he said. He charged that there was a gulf between the penitentiary branch and the remission branch at Ottawa, and that many recommendations are not acted upon at the right time.

Canon Kidd also referred to Ontario reformatories, and said that in his opinion a full-time chaplain should be employed and not a part-time minister as at the present time. He said the inmates at the Kingston penitentiary had manufactured a large amount of war supplies during the second great war, and had given 3,000 blood donations.

I believe I need say nothing more on that subject, but I feel called upon to say a word concerning the commissioner who has been appointed by the government. I speak in the light of some of the suggestions from certain quarters of the house to the effect that General Gibson, because of his military experience, is disqualified from carrying on efficiently and sympathetically the duties which devolve upon him as commissioner.

I speak as one who knows General Gibson personally, as one who has known him for many years. May I say to the Minister of Justice that he made an excellent appointment. That is one reason I rise at this late stage in the debate. General Gibson is a man of a most sympathetic and understanding nature. No one need have any doubts or misgivings on that point. I make that statement directly and emphatically to those hon. members who expressed misgiving because General Gibson had had a long military career. His military career was one which brought him distinction and honour. He served in both wars, and was active in the non-permanent militia between the two wars.

Mr. PROBE: Is he humanitarian? Does he understand juvenile and adult psychology?

Mr. FLEMING: He understands human nature. I do not know whether the hon. member for Regina City and I would understand the same thing from the use of the word "psychology". I say that General Gibson understands human nature, and that is the most important requisite in the position to which he has been appointed. He has had a long and distinguished career at the bar in Toronto, and is a man with a humanitarian and sympathetic outlook. Let there be no misgivings or doubts on that point. I repeat that the minister made a most happy choice in his selection of General Gibson, and I look forward to the time when the commissioner's report will be placed before parliament.

The hon. member for Kootenay East, in his excellent review of this problem on June 21, asked the minister if he would give the house an interim report on progress made to date by General Gibson in the study of the problems assigned to him. I hope the minister will give hon. members the benefit of that report, as it may be received from General Gibson. I believe that the house would receive such a report with interest and profit, and that its presentation might very well not be delayed until the report is complete—unless there is some very good reason why such interim report should not be presented at this time.

The minister has emphasized the fact that the problem of penal reform is not one which concerns the federal government alone, but has pointed out that it concerns as well all the provincial governments. I, for one, am happy to report that in Ontario leadership has already been given in this field with the appointment of a minister of reform institutions. This is a new portfolio established in Ontario, and is being filled by Mr. Dunbar, the former provincial secretary. Already extensive reform of the penal institutions of the province is under way. I hope that the energetic action by the Ontario government by way of reform of the penal institutions within that province will be matched by equally energetic action on the part of the federal Department of Justice.

In closing, I feel called upon to comment upon certain remarks made by some hon. members during the course of the debate. From what was said one might draw the inference that the problem of crime in Canada to-day is simply one of reforming penal institutions. That is just not so. The reform of penal institutions is but one phase of that problem. It is an important phase; let there be no doubt about that fact, but it is not the whole problem. We can have an extensive measure of reform of both of our provincial and federal penal institutions, and still fail to come to grips with the problem of crime at its source.

A discussion of causes of crimes at their source will probably not find all hon. members in full agreement. Attention has been called this afternoon to what has been described—and I think extravagantly—as a wave of crime in Canada. I for one want to state my opinion to this effect, that the essential cause of a great deal of that serious crime—indeed, the greatest cause of it—is the break-down in the home life of this country. One can talk endlessly about other factors which enter into this problem; but I repeat that the greatest cause of crime in Canada is the breakdown of family life.

Not long ago we had in Toronto a great tragedy arising from the slaying in cold blood of a merchant engaged in business in my riding. His store was entered by four youths of twenty, nineteen, eighteen and seventeen years of age respectively. Two of them entered with drawn guns, one shooting the man to death in cold blood. These youths were tried on a charge of murder, and the jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter.

What was the headline in the Toronto newspapers after that conviction? One of those headlines was based on statements given to the press by the parents of those unfortunate boys. "Unfortunate boys"—yes; but criminals, too. What did those headlines contain? Here is the headline which appears at page 3 of the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 17, "Gangster movies, depression, lack of housing blamed by parents of boys for Tobias slaying".

I would agree that quite probably each of those factors entered into the decisions of these boys to embark upon crime—gangster movies, depression and lack of housing. But the staggering fact, as anyone who reads the article containing the statements of the parents will find, is that not one parent took the slightest responsibility for what had happened. They blame these things outside the home. True, they referred to unemployment as having created unrest in the home, and undoubtedly that is so. I do not wish to be misunderstood on that point. I am an advocate of social reform, and hope I always shall be. But, to my mind, the shocking thing was that not one of those parents took the slightest blame or responsibility upon himself or herself for what had happened. Not one said, "Well, probably we should have done more to bring that boy up in the way he should go. Probably if we had spent more time with him, been more careful in our training of him, had seen that religion entered into his training and that he had gone to Sunday school and church it would have been different." But one finds not one word of that kind in the press conference held with the parents of these boys.

As against that I should like to read to the committee what I believe is sane and commonsense language as it is found in the statement made to these boys by the hon. Mr. Justice Keiller Mackay, a very distinguished jurist on the Ontario supreme court bench, when he passed sentence on them. I quote from the remarks of Mr. Justice Mackay as they appear in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, May 18:

"After a fair trial on an indictment of murder," said His Lordship, "you have been found guilty of manslaughter. Because of the vigorous defence accorded you and chiefly, to my mind, because of your youth, you have been narrowly saved the awful spectre of the gallows.

"During the last score and a half years, 100,000 Canadians have laid down their lives, and 200,000 more have been broken and bruised in defending the honour and maintaining the defence of this country, whose laws you have defied and whose institutions you have sought to debauch.

"Nor, indeed, can any thinking person blame the newspaper press, the theatre or literature for causing your crime. Nor is it the fault of the times. Never in history have there been so many opportunities for education and for social and other advancement. And in the last few years, there have been agencies looking for young men to employ. Attempting to lay the blame on the press, the theatre or literature is sickly and sloppy sentimentality.

"What is to blame is the criminal instinct and a craze for money and corrupt impulses. These must and will be restrained. I can hear someone say those are harsh words, but let that someone reflect that if his or her or their father, husband, mother, wife or child, was by a group of armed robbers ushered into eternity in a twinkling, probably those words might not seem so harsh.

"You, one and all, engaged in a dreadful enterprise. I must and will do my duty as a judge and not permit sentiment to interfere with my judgment. You have been found guilty of a ruthless invasion and a ghastly crime."

I have touched on this subject to emphasize that important and urgent as is the need for reform of our penal system, it is not the whole answer to the problem of crime in this country. The problem of crime in this country cannot be resolved into mere questions of social influences outside the home. Those influences can be combatted if some attempt is made in this country to return to the sound standards of the Christian home.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not intend to rise this afternoon, but in view of the discussion I thought I should like to say a word on this matter in connection with which I have had considerable interest ever since coming to parliament. Some of my colleagues have placed the views of this party before the committee and there is no necessity for me to reiterate what they have said. However, I should like to comment on what the last speaker has said.

It is quite true that the home has not played its part as it should have in the bringing up of families, but let us bear in mind that the destruction of home life in this and many other countries is not due entirely to the individuals who form those homes. It is due to the industrial and economic conditions amid which those homes have to exist at the present time. To my mind, society has a responsibility equal to that of the home. When I go into some of our cities I find that there are no places where boys and girls of adolescent age or young men and women may mingle together and engage in cultural activities. During the war I met many young western boys and girls who came to this city and who complained bitterly about how different it was from the small western communities from which they had come. There they could go to the schoolhouse in the evening and have a dance under decent conditions, whereas there was no place in this city to go except to some night club where the dancing was accompanied by liquor and all the rest of it.

During the war we did nothing to provide the kind of entertainment under the right circumstances that these young people need, and this has had something to do with the loosening of morals we have witnessed during the past few years. I am not disagreeing with my hon. friend, because I think the responsibility on the home is very great. As one who had something to do with young people for many years before coming to this House of Commons, may I say that I think the school also has some responsibility in this regard. Our educational system should provide more centres of community activity. We keep our schools closed after four o'clock and over the week-end; they are not used as they should be or as they are in some places.

I agree largely with what my hon. friend has said, but there are one or two comments I wanted to make. To-day we are not dealing with crime so much as with the penitentiaries. I was glad to hear what my hon. friend said about the new commissioner of penitentiaries, General Gibson. My hon. friend described him as being a man possessing broad human sympathies. That is a first requisite for this position. I do not know General Gibson, and I do not know what his qualifications are other than that he has had a distinguished career in the army, but I must confess that when the announcement was made I was disappointed because I had hoped that this appointment would be filled by someone trained in penology. An understanding of human nature and the possession of broad human sympathies may counteract any disability that General Gibson may have in regard to training, and I hope that this will prove to be the case.

I do not want to say anything derogatory about the staffs of our penal institutions, but there is another feature that I had in mind. These guards are chosen largely because they possess certain physical attributes and have had certain physical training. Probably a good physique is necessary for this work, but there is something more important. A guard in a prison should be trained in the handling of human beings just as an attendant in a mental hospital or a nurse in an institution is trained. After all, the cure of criminality is sometimes akin to the cure of a disease. Quite often a little human understanding and psychology will assist those who are engaged in this kind of work to help a criminal overcome his criminal tendencies.

I have had some experience in the handling of people generally and particularly younger people, and I know that you will quite often find young people who are not amenable to discipline, who are sometimes inclined to do things they ought not to do. I found that punishment was not the best way to handle delinquency. Quite often punishment raises in the mind of the individual punished a resentment and sometimes that resentment is carried into the wider field of the community. Instead of there being a personal animosity against the one who inflicts the punishment, quite often that animosity is against the whole community. I never believed in corporal punishment and during my many years in educational institutions I did not use it. I have found that an understanding of psychology is the essential thing in the handling of any individual. I had hoped and I still hope that we shall be able to incorporate into our penitentiary system by and by men and women who will have been trained to handle the people in these institutions.

When I was in Great Britain a year or so ago I had the privilege of speaking to several people there who were interested in prison reform and had been to a large degree instrumental in bringing about reforms in the British penal system. They told me what they were doing in this matter. In recent days young university graduates who have made a study of psychology among other things, instead of volunteering as some of them did years ago to go down to Church House in Limehouse and give their lives to the underprivileged in the distressed slum areas, are devoting their lives to helping the people in the penal institutions. In accepting positions in these institutions they are doing the kind of job for society which in former days was done by ministers of the Gospel and by laymen, members of the priesthood, and others. The value to society of their contributions to the reclaiming of criminals cannot be overestimated. I hope that more and more in our penal institutions we may find a desire to train the personnel that we need. I do not say that all the personnel needs to be trained, but among them there should be at least a sprinkling of those who have made a study of psychology and personal relationships and can give leadership in the reclaiming of those who have been convicted of criminal offences.

One other thing I was going to say, and this does not affect the Minister of Justice to the same extent as it does the Ontario department. I have been disturbed over what I have heard from juvenile court judges and others of the lack of accommodation for adolescent delinquents. I am told that in this province, during the war particularly, when many of the government buildings were being used by the military, first offenders were often mixed with others who had quite a record of offences. That is something we should guard against. We should see to it that first offenders at least are given an opportunity of rehabilitating themselves and that they are kept segregated from confirmed criminals. Penal institutions for offenders serving short sentences should be so organized that young delinquents are not subjected to influences which tend to confirm them in a life of crime.

Mr. KIDD: If I may correct the hon. member, in Ontario hardened offenders serving two years less one day go to Burwash and the others go to Mimico or Guelph.

Mr. COLDWELL: During the war my understanding is that that was not possible.

Mr. KIDD: I served on a parole board for four years and I saw the men going to Burwash. They were the hardened offenders, drug addicts, and so on. The first offenders in nearly every case were segregated from the hardened offenders and sent to Mimico or Guelph.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope the hon. member is right.

Mr. GILLIS: He is not right.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope he is right, but some of those trying juvenile cases have told me to the contrary. This, however, is getting out of the minister's department. The plea I am making is that we endeavour to get on the staff of our penal institutions trained men and women who will make that their life work, not only because of the security that is offered to them but because of the opportunity they will have there for service to humanity, after training with the definite idea of going into these institutions and doing the job which I think should be done.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have been talking for some time of great things to be done by and by. I wonder if we now might give a little attention to some of the smaller things we might do to-day. I have been sympathetic with the observations made thus far in the debate because I was really shocked not long ago to read a press dispatch from Montreal, dated April 14, 1946, which reads:

> Canadians were described as the "most cold-hearted people in the world" in their attitude toward prison reforms, in an address here by Judge Allan J. Fraser, judge of the Ottawa family court.
> Judge Fraser said Canadians are indifferent to prison conditions and neglect to give sufficient support to former prisoners trying to start life anew after serving their sentences.
> He vigorously condemned the Canadian prison system, especially the large number of inadequately equipped "county jails."
> Judge Fraser said a federal commission has been investigating penal institutions for a number of years but nothing has been done and deplorable conditions continue to exist. "Now I understand that a commission is investigating that commission," the Ottawa judge said.

Having read that, I thought I had been neglecting too much this matter of our penitentiaries, and therefore I have been giving it a little attention. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice several questions on details of the internal administration of our penitentiaries. First, I would ask concerning the treatment of convicts in our penitentiaries who are mentally ill. I find on page 15 of the annual report of the superintendent of penitentiaries for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, this statement by R. M. Allan, warden of Kingston penitentiary:

> The situation governing facilities for the treatment of those suffering from mental diseases still remains a difficult and regrettable problem. This has developed due to the inability of the provincial authorities to accept convicts certified as mentally ill—they having to remain in the prison for extended periods without being able to receive proper and adequate treatment.

I take it that these words by the warden of Kingston penitentiary are probably applicable to a large percentage of the penitentiaries throughout the country. Is the minister in a position to tell us how many convicts in our Canadian penitentiaries have been reported as mentally ill? Has he an estimate of the cost of providing adequate facilities for treating them either by (a) grants-in-aid to certain of the provinces or by (b) erecting federal hospitals for mentally ill convicts? Has the minister any plans of his own for dealing with this problem? Would the minister care to comment on that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would rather hear the list of matters the hon. member wants dealt with, and then deal with them seriatim. He asks how many mental cases there are in the penitentiaries. I would have to get that information. I know there are a certain number, but for most of these cases we have had valuable cooperation from the provincial health authorities. We have given consideration to the establishment of a ward in a penitentiary where treatment might be given to those mental cases, but there are not so many that it would be possible without very great expense per unit to provide all the treatment which it is advisable to have them receive, and up to the present time we have been able to make arrangements with the provincial governments to receive at our expense the persons who are our responsibility and to give them the treatment that is available in their mental institutions. I am informed that forty-five convicts are now receiving care in provincial asylums at our expense. In my experience of the last four and a half years there have been two or three occasions where the provincial authorities have advised us that they were overcrowded and could not at the time take prisoners who we felt should be removed to a mental hospital. I remember that on one occasion we were able to have the convict accommodated in the asylum of another province. At that time the matter of seeing if we could not provide for ourselves was gone into, and we came to the conclusion that while we would have to have such provision for care of various kinds the cost per unit would be very much more than it proved to be when that overhead could be spread over the patients who were a provincial responsibility as well as over those few who came from our institutions.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I believe that it would be quite advantageous to the committee if the minister would prepare a little fuller account of this matter and give it to us at a later time. What was going through my mind as the minister spoke was this: We will suppose there is a convict who is mentally ill; he is consigned to a penitentiary for three years. He serves his term, and he comes out of the penitentiary still mentally ill. That convict is likely to commit another grievous crime, and he must be taken care of by some provincial institution. Well, why not allow him to receive that mental treatment while he is serving his term, being punished perhaps for an aberration which was originally traceable to the existence of his mental disability?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have just endeavoured to make clear that that is what is done. As soon as it is ascertained that a prisoner in a penitentiary is in need of mental treatment efforts are made to have him taken into a provincial institution and receive that treatment at the expense of the federal authority. That is what is done. It sometimes happens that there is a little delay, but the hon. member knows that is true not only of convicts, but also of ordinary mental patients. Most of the mental institutions in this country are or have been during the last few years taxed to almost their capacity of accommodation, and it sometimes happens that there is some little delay; but a constant effort is made, as soon as it is ascertained that a convict requires care or mental hygiene, to have him accepted at a provincial institution at the cost of the federal authority.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The reason I mentioned the matter to the minister was, of course, as I indicated, that I found it in the report of Mr. R. M. Allan, warden of Kingston penitentiary, the statement I read into Hansard, indicating that in his opinion our treatment of the situation was not adequate. I will leave the matter at that. I think, though, that this is a matter which should be regarded with considerable seriousness; and evidently, from the minister's remarks, it is so being dealt with.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have engaged a psychiatrist who is constantly attending to the population of the penitentiaries of Kingston and Collins Bay; elsewhere we have ordinary medical attendants, and whenever the medical attendant feels that there is occasion for it he is supplied with the assistance of a psychiatric expert.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was not desiring to criticize the minister unduly. I realize that he is coping with a very big problem. It is one thing to tell about how these matters ought to be taken care of; it is another thing to get on the inside, looking out, and take care of them. I know that; I have had enough experience as a principal of schools to know something of the nature of this sort of thing.

There are one or two matters for which the minister should be highly commended or as to which his conduct of the penitentiaries should be commended. I noticed some matters of great interest to me pertaining to industry in prisons. It is my opinion that one of the best ways to keep anybody out of mischief, and one of the best ways to restore his poise and his health, physical, mental and spiritual, is to give him good, interesting work which he realizes is profitable. I find that a measure of attention has evidently been given to this matter in the penitentiaries. I find in the report on Kingston, at page 16, this statement, which I think is worthy of note by the members of the committee:

> As the policy of the department has curtailed construction generally, our shops have been geared to war work, and we have been fortunate in obtaining a sufficient number of government contracts to keep all convicts busily employed at useful and interesting work. With the end of the European war in sight, I have no doubt, difficulties will arise in retaining this market, however, it may be possible to arrange for the continuance of many of these contracts after the end of hostilities.

I believe the members of the committee will be quite interested in extended comments on the part of the minister with respect to policy concerning industry within the gaol. I wonder if I might ask him two or three questions bearing on this matter. Is the government actually curtailing construction at this time of shortages of goods? When all over we are talking about shortages and about the danger of inflation arising from these shortages, can it be that we are curtailing production in our penitentiaries, as is indicated by this statement? Of what kinds of goods is production being curtailed, and what plans has the government for keeping convicts busily employed at useful and interesting work when their efforts are no longer required in filling war contracts? I realize that this again takes the minister at a disadvantage, but it deals with matters which I find extremely interesting.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am glad to be able to say to the hon. member that the construction which we are curtailing is construction which would require the use of building material. We gave instructions to curtail to the greatest possible extent the acquisition of building material, because we believed that it was more urgently required for other purposes. There has been no curtailing of the production in the manufacturing efforts of those confined in the penitentiaries.

I fully agree with the hon. member that one of the best things to do is to keep the men busy and you cannot keep them busy just tearing up things. You must make them feel that they are doing something that is worth while. On the other hand, we cannot, of course, incur the reproach of having prison labour compete with industries outside. But there is at the present time such a shortage of goods of all kinds that we can keep our population in the penitentiaries fully occupied even if everything they produce were going only to government agencies, and I feel no hesitation whatsoever in supplying government agencies with things produced in the pentitentiaries.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I entirely agree with the minister and I believe the time has probably come when we must use a sort of educational propaganda to cause the people to be less resistant to the products of prison labour. The people must come to understand that there is a problem in the prisons that calls for solution. I am still a little disturbed because the writer of this report said he wondered whether the government would be able to find markets after the war, but the minister has reassured me that all the product of the penitentiaries can be used in supplying the needs of government departments, and I wish to express commendation to him for his answer in that respect. I should like very much to see the good and useful work of prisoners extended so that skills can be acquired and the joy of accomplishing things can be learned in prison. I have an idea that one of the causes of crime is the fact that people have never learned the sweetness of service and how good it is to do well a job that is worth doing, to be able to look back after the day's work upon the thing accomplished. If men had done that I do not believe they would have gone into crime.

There are two or three things I should like to point out in connection with the report. I have found certain things particularly interesting with respect to certain penitentiaries. I believe that those men who are conducting the penitentiaries, living a life of sacrifice and almost of ostracism by the community roundabout, feel a sense of frustration because no one ever knows about the good work they do. I think it is in order that the pages of Hansard should record some of what is set out in this report on penitentiaries. I should like to draw attention to some of these things but I do not know whether there is time now. If there is not I can wait until we are discussing the matter again, because it looks as though we shall soon hear from the Black Rod.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would ask that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. STIRLING: This day?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This day if there is time after the speech of the Minister of Finance, but I do not anticipate there will be.

Mr. SPEAKER: Later to-day. As the Speaker has to come back to the house from the senate to read a message I would ask hon. members to be good enough to return in order that we may have a quorum.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Bonner Larose, Esquire, acting as assistant to the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name royal assent to the following bills:

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in presenting the last budget to this house on October 12, I emphasized that, although hostilities were over, it must still be regarded as a war budget, providing as it did mainly for war expenditures during the fiscal year 1945-46. The budget which I now have the honour and duty to place before the house is essentially a peacetime budget, providing for the financial needs of the first post-war year which is wholly a year of peace, although these needs include also certain remaining costs of demobilization and heavy costs for gratuities and other benefits to our veterans, costs that will not recur on a similar scale in subsequent years.

In reviewing the background against which this budget is projected, I do not propose to look further back than the period of demobilization and reconversion. A review of our war finance and of our other economic policies and activities during the war would remind us of many achievements in which Canadians may justly take pride. I referred to some of them briefly in the budget of last October. We plan to provide the important figures of our war finances in convenient form for reference in the next issue of the public accounts. The data regarding government financial operations during the last fiscal year, that is to say, the year ending March 31, 1946, I have set forth in a white paper which I shall table at the conclusion of my remarks and which will be printed as an appendix to the budget for the convenience of the house and the public.

As this white paper gives voluminous detail in regard to the revenues, expenditures and the other transactions and accounts, it will be necessary for me to refer only to some of the highlights in the record for the past fiscal year. The figures quoted, by the way, will not be the final figures; they are close estimates subject still to certain minor adjustments and to one major alteration in connection with the United Kingdom financial agreement, which I shall explain in a moment. In this connection, I should perhaps mention that the accounting adjustments and offsetting transactions required to complete the settlement of various war accounts have been particularly numerous this year, including for instance many transfers of payments originally made as advances on account or out of working capital funds to the final account to which they should be charged in our books.

Total revenues, including refundable taxes, amounted to $3,028 million, a slight increase from the revenues of the previous year. Accounting in part for this high total is the sum of $593 million under the heading, "Special receipts and other credits". While this includes some such readily understandable items as the net income of the Canadian National Railways, the earnings of Park Steamships Limited, the proceeds of sales of surplus crown assets, etc., it is made up in considerable part by refunds of previous years' expenditures and other essentially bookkeeping transactions arising out of the war. For instance, amounts previously paid by the Department of Munitions and Supply to contractors as advances or working capital are now being finally charged to the department or agency which received the supplies. Such refunds of previous expenditure must be brought into revenue but at the same time there are some corresponding and offsetting increases in expenditures. Too much significance therefore must not be attached to the over-all total of revenues, and the deficit is, of course, not affected by these offsetting transactions.

More significant is the total of ordinary revenues which amounted to $2,436 million, a decrease of only $84 million from the previous year. Total tax revenues are now estimated to have been $2,275 million, which is about $100 million less than in the preceding year. However, this figure includes only $73 million of refundable taxes as compared with $220 million in the preceding year, so that if we consider net taxable revenues we obtained about $48 million more in 1945-46 than in 1944-45, despite the substantial tax reductions made in the budget of last October. If we look at the yield of individual taxes, we find decreases in the revenue from the personal income tax, the corporation tax and excise taxes, and increases in the yield of the excess profits tax, succession duties, customs import duties and excise duties. But I shall not weary the house with the statistical details. The decline in the yield of excise taxes was more than accounted for by the abolition of the war exchange tax; most of the other special excise taxes showed increases, offsetting to a considerable extent the decline in the sales tax, which arose from the broad exemptions introduced last year for building materials and various types of goods entering into production costs.

Non-tax revenues increased by about $15 million to a total of $160 million. As the house knows, most of this revenue is derived from post office receipts and from the return on investments, both of which sources of revenue have shown a steady increase in recent years.

Ordinary expenditures for the year are estimated at $1,062 million, an increase of $295 million from the preceding year. This substantial increase is largely accounted for by an increase of $97 million in the cost of servicing the public debt and by the introduction of family allowances, which involved a cost of $173 million during the fiscal year.

War and demobilization expenditures for the year are shown at a total of $3,558 million. This total includes the offsetting bookkeeping charges that correspond to refunds included in special receipts arising from the adjustment of earlier expenditures made as advances by the Department of Munitions and Supply and finally charged to the departments and agencies receiving supplies. Expenditures by the army, navy and air force amounted in the year to $1,707 million, as compared with $2,938 million the previous year. These service expenditures included heavy costs of repatriation and demobilization, as well as settlement of arrears of charges incurred in previous years of active warfare. The expenditures of the Department of Munitions and Supply and Reconstruction amounted to $263 million, including the item of $145 million for the costs of termination of war contracts following the end of hostilities. Expenditures to provide Canada's contributions to UNRRA amounted to $143 million, completing the total of $154 million which we agreed to provide. Mutual aid expenditures, including the settlement of outstanding accounts for deliveries in the previous year and the cost of some supplies and aircraft on hand and surplus at the end of hostilities, amounted to $772 million. Expenditures for supplies for military relief amounted in the year to $34 million, for which bills are being rendered to the governments of the recipient countries by the combined military authorities. War expenditures of the Department of Veterans Affairs (including the costs of gratuities, reestablishment credits, rehabilitation benefits, treatment and pensions) amounted to $328 million, nearly three hundred million more than in the previous year. All war expenditures other than those already mentioned amounted to $311 million, of which various subsidies on agricultural products and subsidies to maintain ceiling prices amounted to about $192 million.

We have not as yet included in the figures of war expenditure the $425 million represented by the cancellation of accumulated liabilities of the United Kingdom under the British commonwealth air training plan. Although this was provided for in the financial agreement with the United Kingdom, the relevant article of the agreement and the section of the act implementing it have not yet been put into effect, pending action by the United States Congress on the Anglo-American financial agreement. They will be put into effect, however, immediately after approval is given to that agreement, which is now at an advanced stage of congressional consideration. The result will be to extinguish this item now listed on our balance sheet as an advance to the United Kingdom, and to increase the figure of war expenditures for 1945-46 by a corresponding amount. This is the major change which I expect to see in our final accounts for the year, as compared with the estimates now presented.

Special expenditures increased by about $10 million, largely due to an increase in advances to the prairie farm emergency fund. Capital expenditures, losses of and non-active advances to government-owned enterprises and other charges remained practically unchanged. For the sixth year in succession an amount of $25 million was added to the reserve for possible losses on ultimate realization of active assets.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The grand total expenditures for the year amounted to $4,691 million, a decrease of $555 million from the preceding year. As total revenue, exclusive of refundable taxes, was $2,955 million, the over-all deficit for the year was $1,736 million, a figure approximately $822 million lower than the deficit of the previous year. This amount is, of course, the extent of the increase in the net debt during the fiscal year.

Our financial requirements for loans, advances and investments, which amounted to a total of $666 million, are set out in some detail in the white paper. This was more than $200 million larger than in the previous year, due to very large advances to the foreign exchange control board and loans and advances to allied governments.

Total borrowings during the year, excluding the renewal of treasury bills, deposit certificates and short term notes held by the Bank of Canada, amounted to $3,750 million. Of this huge total, the great bulk was obtained from the two highly successful victory loan campaigns. In the eighth victory loan, during the spring of 1945, a total of approximately $1,564 million was obtained, made up of 3,178,275 subscriptions. In the ninth loan, floated in October and November, total subscriptions amounted to $2,025 million and numbered 2,947,636. These two highly successful loans marked the climax of the work of the national war finance committee, to whose able leadership I have frequently paid tribute. Our other borrowing during the year took the form of refundable taxes, an increase of $70 million in treasury bills, the sale of war savings certificates and stamps, and a modest increase in the floating debt. During the year we redeemed for cash securities of a par value of $916 million, including $155 million in U.S. dollar securities. Details of borrowing operations and redemptions are given in the white paper. Our holdings of cash in Canada increased by $536 million during the year, accounting in considerable part for the large total of borrowings. The cash deficiency during the year—that is, the net amount borrowed to finance expenditure, loans and investments, and not to redeem debt or add to balances in Canada—amounted to $2,452 million, as compared with $2,955 million the previous year.

There was one important development in our borrowing operations and policy which should be mentioned. As I announced on February 27, the government reduced the rate of interest on deposit certificates sold to the chartered banks after that date from $\frac{3}{4}$ of 1 per cent to $\frac{5}{8}$ of 1 per cent, and has arranged with all the chartered banks that the holdings by each bank of government securities other than these deposit certificates and treasury bills or notes will be limited in amount to the equivalent of 90 per cent of its Canadian personal savings deposits and will be so selected as to maturity as to yield on average an interest rate which gives them only a moderate profit margin over the cost of interest and other operating expenses on these savings deposits. This constitutes an important development in monetary policy and government finance; it means that monetary expansion through the purchase of government securities by the chartered banks will not result in more than a modest profit margin for the banks on such new assets and liabilities. During the war we were able to accomplish this objective, in substance, through the large scale use of deposit certificates and informal arrangements for their distribution to the various banks. This new development will enable us to continue to obtain in peace time the advantages of low cost short term borrowing from the banking system.

As at March 31, 1946, our total unmatured funded debt, including refundable taxes, amounted to $16,807 million as now estimated. The net debt was $13,034 million, which reflects, of course, an increase during the year of the amount of the budgetary deficit. The funded debt carried annual interest charges of $436 million. The average rate of interest was 2·59 per cent, as compared with 2·51 per cent as at March 31, 1945, the slight increase being due to the fact that most of the addition to our debt during the year took the form of 3 per cent victory bonds.

The white paper which I am tabling to-night and which will amplify the brief summary which I have just given, deals at length only with the government accounts. Next year I hope to be able to present additional information of broader significance, showing how the government accounts and activities have fitted into those of the nation as a whole. Already the house will probably have noted the interesting and significant figures of national income, production and expenditures which have recently been prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics in cooperation with other departments and agencies of the government. By next year I hope we shall have both the basic statistical data and the staff necessary to prepare for presentation at the time of the budget figures showing the way in which the government expenditures, revenues and financing relate to the accounts and economic activities of the nation as a whole, and this should help in understanding and appraising the effect of the government's expenditures and its budget proposals upon the economic life of the community.

I have so much else that I must speak about in this budget that I propose to comment only very briefly on the economic situation. In any case, immediate economic considerations are of less importance in determining our present proposals than longer term economic policy and the necessities of dominion-provincial relations.

We find Canada to-day more prosperous and further along the road of reemployment and reconversion that we could reasonably have expected last autumn when I presented the previous budget. Despite many shortages and interruptions, our economy as a whole has turned with remarkable speed from war service and work to peacetime jobs and objectives. We are enjoying a level of employment and prosperity that we have never experienced before in peace time. For that, in the hungry and devastated world of to-day, we should be thankful. On the other hand, we do not have the spirit of agreement, of cooperation and mutual confidence that we had hoped for; on matters of public policy we do not seem to have found the peacetime equivalent to the "win-the-war" objective that kept us united and strong during the war and enabled us to reach high levels of national achievement. I need not comment on the international or industrial difficulties and disagreements. In a field much closer to home, and immediately affecting this budget, we find now that our previous hopes for a comprehensive agreement between the Canadian and provincial governments have not been realized. Lacking an agreement that would have enabled us and the provincial governments to make plans with confidence and boldness, we must now proceed more cautiously, thankful that the present prosperity makes many of our problems less urgent for a short time.

When the war ended in Europe, slightly more than a year ago, there were three-quarters of a million men and women in our fighting forces. Now there are only about one hundred thousand; in little more than a year we have released about six hundred and fifty thousand. Of these, the large majority have found employment, or are taking university or vocational training, or have gone into business for themselves, assisted by their wartime savings and the many benefits provided for veterans. In the same period—but even more suddenly—our workers in war industry were released upon the labour market. The number is roughly the same as that of servicemen demobilized. All told then, about one Canadian in four who work for a living has been released from war activities. Several hundred thousand of them—married women, old people and students—have left the labour market. Some others are unemployed, unable to find work which they can and will undertake—although there are more than one hundred thousand unfilled jobs. The rest—the majority of the servicemen and war workers—are busy at work now in industry, trade, farming or elsewhere. Despite shortages and interruptions, peacetime production and trade have expanded rapidly and absorbed most of those seeking work with remarkably little difficulty. The number of unemployed is only about 200,000 at last report, and with the best season for employment still ahead. This compares with about 75,000 unemployed and seeking work immediately after the end of the war in Europe. This 200,000 is only about 4 per cent of our total labour force, at a time when changes in occupation are going on rapidly, and when it is difficult for men to move to the jobs that are now available.

The rapid and successful demobilization and reemployment of man-power has been accompanied and, to some extent made possible, by the rapid technical reconversion of industry. War equipment was removed and replaced by equipment for civilian production in a great many plants with relatively little delay or difficulty. When the change-over has involved or been accompanied by modernization or extension of civilian production facilities, there has been greater difficulty and delay, due to shortages and competing demands in the United States and abroad.

In 1944 the total market value of all our current production and services—what the statisticians call our "gross national product"—reached a wartime peak of about $11¾ billion, compared with a value, at lower prices, in 1938 of about $5·1 billion. Thus, the effect of the war, including the effect of price increases, was to more than double our gross national production. We do not know, of course, what the final figure will be for the current year, but so far it has been running at about $11 billion—although that level may be pushed down as a result of interruptions to production.

Our present prosperity and employment are also on the whole well distributed throughout the country. There are some areas which have suffered from crop failure or from the disappearanee of unusual wartime industrial or other activity, and which are experiencing temporary difficulties or a period of readjustment to more normal conditions, but there are surprisingly few of them.

The reason for the continuing high levels of production, employment and incomes, is that the demands of war, represented by war expenditures which have fallen from a huge total a year ago to a small fraction of that to-day, have been replaced by other demands which, though less insistent and insatiable, are nevertheless large and urgent and backed by effective purchasing power.

Our income from exports is the most important factor determining our prosperity and employment in peacetime. During the war our exports reached fantastic levels, largely financed by war expenditures directly as through mutual aid, or indirectly, through what our forces spent abroad. These war exports included many of our staple products—foods, metals and other raw materials—but consisted largely of war products, guns, planes, ships, vehicles, ammunition, radar sets and other manufactured war equipment. Now, of course, the exports of these war supplies have almost entirely disappeared. But the exports of food and raw materials continue at high levels, and exports of civilian manufactured goods—locomotives, trucks, railway cars, ships, and machinery—are replacing those of war supplies, and helping to maintain our export trade, and therefore export incomes, at levels far above pre-war even though below the wartime peak. This is the main factor in the maintenance of our national production and employment.

While the need of overseas countries for our exports is enormous and urgent, most of them can only buy from us on credit. It is vitally important for the future development of our trade that these countries, particularly Britain and the countries of western Europe, should be able to buy our foodstuffs, metals, other raw materials and some of our new manufactured products, in order to reestablish their economic life and emerge as great trading nations providing markets for our goods. On our side, it is important to maintain export production and income while war expenditures decline and until normal trade, both domestic and international, is fully reestablished. Therefore the government has undertaken a large programme of export credits, which from the economic point of view is replacing our war expenditures by government investments, on which we shall earn a return in future years.

The second powerful influence maintaining employment and production, despite the decline in war expenditures, is private expenditure of a capital nature, including building and construction, the purchase of new equipment and machinery, and the accumulation of stock in trade. In this general field there has apparently been a substantial increase in expenditure over the levels of last year. There is a large amount of private capital seeking investment in new building, plant and equipment, but the amount of expenditure of this kind is severely limited now by shortages of materials, parts and manufacturing capacity. In the building and construction field particularly, shortages of building materials, and to a lesser extent the shortage of skilled labour, are seriously restricting the provision of housing that is most urgently needed, as well as other forms of construction, particularly commercial and industrial buildings. It is to be hoped that this industrial and commercial expenditure that cannot readily be made now will be deferred a year or two, when it will help in sustaining high levels of employment and incomes after other temporary stimulants are less strong.

The third offset to the decline in our war expenditures has been a substantial increase in the expenditures of consumers. At present a great many consumers have on hand large reserves of savings which they accumulated during the war, and some of which they wish to spend when the goods they want become available. Moreover, the proportion of their incomes which people have spent on consumption during the war has been abnormally low and will increase—both because they will not try so hard to save as under the pressure of war and because the proportion of income taken as taxes has been abnormally high. Now we may expect people to spend more of their incomes—and they are trying to do so. In addition, there has been the effect of the expenditures on family allowances, to which I have already referred. These payments commenced shortly after the end of hostilities in Europe, and immediately offset a part of the rapid reduction which then took place in our war expenditures. Of even greater importance in its current effects, we have been operating a comprehensive and generous system of gratuities, benefits, reestablishment credits and other assistance for those leaving the armed services. I doubt if the house or the public realizes the large size of the sums involved in this programme. During the fiscal year for which we are now budgeting, these various payments to or on behalf of veterans as already provided for in the estimates, will add up to $620 million, and this figure omits the amounts paid by the services themselves for leave on discharge, deferred pay, clothing allowances and similar benefits. Nearly a quarter of all our expenditures this year will be directly for the benefit of veterans and their families. This year, of course, is the peak period, but these veterans' expenditures have been building up rapidly as war expenditures proper have declined, and have constituted a powerful influence increasing the total of what consumers have been trying to spend.

In fact, of course, consumers' expenditures continue to be limited and determined by the goods and services that are available to meet the demands. The available information indicates a moderate increase in these expenditures during recent months and a more substantial increase in employment in the industries supplying the consumer, particularly in trade and the service industries.

The fourth influence offsetting the decline in our war expenditure has been a modest increase in the non-war expenditures of governments and municipalities—and in this I refer to their expenditures on supplies and services. In the case of the dominion government we have deliberately endeavoured to keep this increase to the minimum required by urgent post-war projects, and in particular we have pruned our public works and other construction programmes drastically in order to avoid demands on building materials and building labour urgently required for housing. I hope that provinces and municipalities will find themselves able to follow a similar policy at this time when the housing situation is so acute. Apart from projects that compete with building, however, there are many increased expenditures by governments and local bodies which it is important to proceed with as soon as possible after the war, and the result has been a gradual increase since last summer in government expenditures that give rise to employment and production.

While I hesitate to venture into the field of forecasting economic developments in a world as chaotic and eventful as the one we are living in at the present time, it appears that these major influences which have maintained a high level of expenditures for Canadian goods and services despite the reduction in war expenditure will persist for the remainder of this fiscal year, and beyond it, unless further difficulties arise to retard production. If these difficulties can be avoided, then I think we may reasonably expect a level of expenditure adequate to maintain a high level of employment and production through the year. Indeed, the pressure of expenditure at the present in many fields is so great that action by the government and others is needed to prevent rapidly increasing prices and the development of inflation.

The pressure on prices is still very strong. The scarcity of goods in relation to spending power is less than during the last few years, because there are more goods and services available for sale, both from larger production and imports and from the decline in the purchases of goods for war purposes. On the other hand, purchasers have incomes nearly as high as in wartime, accumulated savings on hand at levels never before approached, and a greater disposition to spend now that the war is over. All this tends to pull prices up. Prices are also getting pushed up from below by increases in costs, increases in the cost of imported materials and parts, increases in fuel costs, increases in wages, and higher overhead costs when output is restricted.

We must resist this pressure towards higher prices and keep the increases within reasonable limits. During the war, as a result of strenuous efforts and the effective cooperation of the Canadian people, we succeeded in keeping prices under control and avoiding inflation. It would be the greatest folly now to dissipate the fruits of our efforts by letting prices get out of hand, by letting inflation set in when the battle is nearly over. Adjustments are necessary now, and many of them have been made. Some increases in prices and wages have been essential, and some others have been tolerable. We believe it is wise, and practically necessary, gradually to relax and remove the controls which made up our stabilization programme. Price ceilings are being raised here and there where conditions permit, and suspended altogether in some cases where no serious harm seems likely to result. Wage and salary control has been made more flexible to permit adjustments that are necessary, or that are justified on grounds of equity. But this relaxation is intended as a deliberate, orderly programme of decontrol and not as an invitation to a mad scramble for higher prices and wages in which we shall all suffer. So far, most Canadians have on the whole shown a sensible restraint in seeking adjustments of prices and wages. Now that we are relaxing our controls, we must look to all important groups and their leaders to act with sense and discretion and a due regard for the results of their actions upon others. I am sure that all members of this house would regard inflation now as a dismal tragedy, coming at the end of what has been an outstanding record of success in dealing with the economic problems of war.

The real answer, the constructive answer, to the inflationary pressures existing at this time is to work and produce the goods that are wanted in greater volume, so that our greater buying power will result in more goods at reasonable prices, rather than fewer at higher prices. To business men in particular I would like to address a plea that they do all in their power to hold prices down and get volume up, over this next critical year. The purchasing power represented by wartime savings will go further and our prosperity will be more permanent, if prices can be kept down. Canadians, before long, must expect to meet competition in export markets and in their own markets from the exports of other countries. We wish to enter that long period of competition with the advantages of low costs and volume production, so that high employment can be maintained and a high real standard of living.

Production then should be our primary objective both for its own sake in a world that needs goods so badly, and as a safeguard against the present danger of inflation. We should aim now at high volume production for civilian purposes despite shortages, strikes, delays and uncertainties, high volume production rather than high prices as a source of income and profits. No longer must civilian production be restricted in order to conserve resources for war. It can now receive first priority.

BUDGET FORECAST 1946-47 AND FINANCIAL PROPOSALS

It is with this view of the current economic situation and the prevailing trends that I have approached the primary purpose of this budget, namely, the formulation of financial proposals to meet the requirements of the current fiscal year 1946-47 and the months immediately following the close of the year.

As the house knows, the main estimates for the current fiscal year, covering both ordinary expenditures and expenditure chargeable to demobilization and reconversion, involve an expected outlay of $2,769 million. We have found from experience, however, that there are likely to be savings in any financial programme of that magnitude, although of course it is impossible to say beforehand in respect to what items the savings will actually be made. On the other hand, payments to veterans, chiefly veterans' credits, have been running in recent months at higher levels than were anticipated when the main estimates were prepared. My own forecast is that apart from any substantial increase in this item and assuming no new commitments of a major character, the total savings will be sufficient to allow for any supplementary and further supplementary estimates which it may be necessary later in the year to ask the house to approve.

On the revenue side, it is estimated that under our tax laws as they now stand, total revenues in 1946-47 will approximate $2,510 million as compared with $2,956 million in the last fiscal year. I shall place on Hansard a table showing the details of this estimate in comparison with the revenues of 1945-46:

	Forecast Fiscal Year 1946-47 (millions)	Actual Fiscal Year 1945-46 (millions)
Customs duties	$ 183	$ 129
Excise duties	195	187
Sales tax (net)	250	212
War exchange tax	...	41
Other excise taxes	259	244
Income tax:
Personal	640	692
Corporate	210	218
Excess profits tax	340	494
Interest and dividends	30	28
Succession duties	24	21
Miscellaneous	9	9
Total tax revenue	2,140	2,275
Less refundable taxes	...	73
Net tax revenue	2,140	2,202
Non tax revenue	170	161
Total ordinary revenue	2,310	2,363
Special receipts	200*	593
Total revenue	$2,510	$2,956

* Arbitrary estimate.

On these estimates which are believed to be conservative, there will be a decline of $446 million in our revenues this fiscal year compared with last, but most of this expected decrease comes from assigning to special receipts an arbitrary estimate of $200 million as compared with last year's corresponding figure of $593 million which, as I have already explained, is inflated by abnormal bookkeeping transactions. The more significant comparison relates to ordinary revenue, the estimate for which shows a decline of $53 million from last year. This expected decrease is largely attributable to the reductions in personal income and excess profits taxes announced in last year's budget. Substantial declines in the yields of these two taxes are not expected to be fully offset by moderate increases in the returns from customs and excise duties, the sales tax and the special excise taxes.

These revenue estimates of course are based on the assumption of no changes in our present tax structure. They indicate that if no such tax changes are made and if our total expenditures do not exceed the estimate given a few minutes ago, we may expect a budgetary deficit for 1946-47 of roughly $260 million. Measured by standards of the past, that is still a not inconsiderable deficit but it is in pleasing contrast with the deficit of $1,735 million which I have already reported for the last fiscal year.

It is possible that some of the revenue figures given above may prove to be underestimates if economic conditions remain as prosperous as at present, and in particular, special receipts, swollen by large scale disposals by War Assets Corporation, may be higher than the $200 million figure quoted. On the other hand, as I have already indicated, expenditures in the form of payments to veterans have been running ahead of earlier estimates. I think we can best accept the relatively conservative estimates that I have given above, in the expectation that there may be offsetting increases on both sides of the account, leaving the deficit roughly at the level forecast, subject, of course, to the tax changes which I shall propose.

The financial requirements for which we must provide during the present fiscal year include not only our budgetary expenditures but certain disbursements outside the budget for the acquisition of active assets. For this purpose, during the present year we shall have to raise a substantial amount of cash, as in addition to the normal increases in loans, advances and investments, resulting from ordinary government activities, including the financing of the foreign exchange control board, the export credits programme and the United Kingdom loan will require the disbursement of governmental funds in very large volume. We estimate that during 1946-47 the total of these disbursements which create active assets may be in the neighborhood of a billion dollars. This will bring our total financial requirements on the basis of present commitments and present estimates during the year to roughly 3¾ billion dollars.

Financial requirements of this magnitude do not of themselves suggest a reduction in taxes. Moreover, as I have already indicated, the current economic situation in respect of the available volume of purchasing power and current spending trends is not such as to provide an economic justification for reducing taxes at the present time. Lighter taxes are not needed now for the purpose of permitting or encouraging additional private spending in order to maintain employment this year. In fact, if only immediate economic conditions were involved, one could make a case for temporary higher taxes in order to curb the excess of spending in some directions that is tending to pull prices up.

There are, however, other important considerations to be borne in mind. In the first place, the action we take now in regard to taxes should provide whatever stimulus is possible to increased production. If we can encourage hard work and efficient production at this critical time, we shall be assisting greatly the effectiveness of our other actions to overcome the inflationary influences left behind by the war.

Secondly, in shaping our tax policies at present we should be moving toward our normal post-war tax policy, and we should therefore bear in mind the long run problems we shall face once the huge, temporary post-war demands have been satisfied and it becomes necessary for us to maintain and stabilize national expenditure and employment. When that time arrives, we must depend on steady, large scale capital expenditures by private business, and on our ability to sell our products abroad (and at home, too) in competition with other countries, if we are to succeed in maintaining a high level of employment and a high standard of living. To secure these conditions of stable prosperity we must revise our wartime tax system in such a way as to preserve essential fairness in the distribution of the total burden and avoid any serious deterrent to hard work and efficiency.

It will therefore be my pleasant duty in a few minutes to announce reductions in taxes on personal and corporate incomes which are based upon these longer run considerations as well as upon the desire to increase immediately the incentive to produce, even though we recognize that such reductions at this time may possibly increase some of our difficulties during the period of shortages and inflationary pressures.

The effect of the tax reductions which I shall propose to-night will, I believe, depend to an important degree upon what provincial governments do when the wartime tax agreements expire. These agreements were made in order to provide a necessary increase in over-all taxation from imposing intolerable inequities and hardship. Unless new arrangements are made to enable provinces to meet their requirements without a free-for-all scramble to exploit the major tax sources, I am convinced that this country will lose much of the economic advantages which should accrue from the over-all tax reduction which is now envisaged. Before outlining my tax proposals in detail, I must, therefore, refer to the problem of dominion-provincial financial relations.

This problem is far more than one of taxation alone. What is at stake is Canada's ability (a) to have an effective anti-depression policy and to maintain full employment and a high national income after the present abnormal transition period is over; and (b) to achieve a reasonable standard of economic security for all Canadians no matter in what part of the country they may live. It was with these broad objectives in mind that the dominion government put forward its proposals to the dominion-provincial conference which began its sessions on August 6 last.

These proposals outlined a coordinated programme by which the dominion and the provinces could most effectively work together to provide high and expanding employment and national income, a wide measure of economic security and a less burdensome, more efficient tax system. The proposals formed an integrated whole but for purposes of the present outline can be grouped in three categories: those relating to public investment, those relating to social security and those dealing with tax reform.

Obviously at the present time of many continuing shortages and pressing demands it is not opportune to consider launching a large public investment or public works programme. Nevertheless the wartime depletion of many of our assets and depreciation of many of our public works make it imperative that we now prepare plans for greatly expanded activity in the whole field of public investment when the employment situation and other conditions should make that desirable. In the August proposals emphasis was laid in particular on two aspects of public investment. One was the desirability of regulating the timing of public investment in so far as that was practicable, with a view to levelling out booms and depressions. The second was recognition of the need for increased expenditures on the conservation of our soil and forests, and the economic development of our resources. To these ends the government outlined a substantially expanded programme of resource development and conservation services and construction projects which it was prepared to undertake itself, and also a broad list of services and categories of projects under provincial jurisdiction which it was prepared to assist. There were in addition grants proposed to provincial governments, and through provincial to municipal governments, to assist in meeting the cost of advance planning of projects with a view to building up a reserve shelf of useful works for time of need, and to encourage the best timing in relation to the general employment situation for carrying out these planned works. The programme as a whole was designed to develop and conserve the productive wealth of Canada to assist in stabilizing employment, and to widen opportunities for private investment and employment. The character of investment proposed was one complimentary to private investment rather than competitive with it and was designed to be, when not directly self-liquidating, of real economic and social value to the nation.

The various social security proposals had also broad economic as well as broad social objectives. They were planned not only in relation to the needs of individuals suffering from the distress of unemployment, illness and old age, but also with a view to stabilizing the income of the lower income groups of the population and consequently that of the community as a whole.

The proposal for unemployment assistance was designed to care for the great bulk of able-bodied workers who might be unemployed through no fault of their own. This extension of dominion responsibility would remove the overcharging menace to the ability of provincial and municipal governments to finance themselves, and in particular the threat and uncertainties facing real property owners, inherent in the present responsibility for relief. In addition, proposals were made for expanded vocational training and other rehabilitation services designed to fit men for their most productive work and to prevent deterioration arising from idleness.

The old age pension proposals, including as they did, an increase in benefits and abolition of the means test for all persons aged 70 and over, and with provision for assistance to provincial schemes for persons from 65 to 69, recognized the claims and needs of our old people with which there seems to be general sympathy. The qualifying age for federal assistance for pensions to the blind was to be lowered to 21.

In the important field of health the proposals provided for substantial dominion assistance to provincial public health and preventive medicine activities, for tuberculosis, mental disease and venereal disease prevention and cure, and for other health services. In addition an offer was made to meet approximately 60 per cent of the cost of provincially administered health insurance schemes within a national framework. The health insurance offer was an optional rather than obligatory part of the proposals and the programme was to be developed progressively by stages and areas. It was believed that it would contribute a great deal to relieve individual suffering and improve the health of the nation, and would ultimately pay substantial dividends in financial as well as human terms.

As in the case of Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, it was proposed that these expanded social services would be financed in part by direct personal contributions. These might be likened to modest insurance premiums paid by each individual in order to make systematic provision against risks or contingencies which might otherwise fall with crippling force upon the family budget, as for instance the cost of medical care does to-day. There were no hard and fast provisions laid down as to the financing of the province's share of health insurance except that there was to be a registration fee which was not specified.

The tax proposals which have been the subject of so much controversy were in reality two-fold, and there is some danger that sight may be lost of the second and more important of these aspects. As a necessary preliminary, the government proposed that it should have exclusive occupancy of the personal income, corporation, and succession duty tax fields, compensating the provincial governments by annual rental payments. The August proposals were subsequently modified in respect to the succession duty tax to provide for continued exercise, by any province which so wished, of its succesion duty rights, with compensating credits to individuals paying provincial taxes and compensating adjustments in the annual rental paid to the provincial government. The government then outlined the policies which it proposed to follow if an agreement had been reached giving it a free hand in these fields, including reduction in personal income taxes and elimination of a portion of the existing element of double taxation in the corporate tax. The government attached great importance to the benefits which would be possible through a single administration of these important tax fields, arising from simplification and reform of the tax system on a scientific basis to reduce the total tax burden, from the removal of existing inequities, from greater efficiency of administration and collection, from reduction in the cost of tax compliance by the taxpayer, and from the means it would have available through appropriate changes in policy to help offset fluctuations in the business cycle. Of particular importance was the belief that the right tax policies, varying with the needs of the times, would lead to broadening and expansion of the tax base, that is to say, the size of personal and national incomes, and consequently reduce the real burden of taxation. These taxes which were once relatively trivial in amount have of necessity become far too large to allow conflict, confusion and overlapping of policy to thwart investment, retard industry and depress employment. They are far too important adjuncts of economic policy to be exercised in different and uncoordinated ways if we are to achieve our objectives of high and stable income and employment.

A word should be added on the fiscal position in which the dominion's proposals would have put the provincial governments. In the major expenditure fields of public investment and social services, the government was prepared to assume responsibility for the most sharply fluctuating items and to assist the provincial governments substantially in expansion of their own services. Municipal budgets would also have been relieved of both substantial current and potential expenditures. The annual rental offered the provinces to vacate, for the proposed three-year term of the agreement, certain direct tax fields was not only generous in relation to any amounts which the provincial governments had hitherto derived from these fields, or could expect to derive in the light of the necessary post-war level of dominon taxes, but could not fall below a guaranteed minimum and would rise proportionately with increases in gross national product. The net effect would have been to put all provincial governments in a much stronger and more stable fiscal position than they had ever enjoyed before or than there was any prospect of their achieving in a return to the general free-for-all of pre-war. At the same time it was believed this could be done at a reduced over-all cost to the taxpayers, and would provide positive incentives to industry and a greater degree of security for all Canadians in all parts of Canada.

The conference which met last August, decided to accept the dominion's proposals as a basis for discussion and a continuing co-ordinating committee was appointed consisting of the Prime Minister and the nine provincial premiers. This coordinating committee met in camera from November 26-30, from January 28-February 1, and on April 25 and 26. Most of the discussion at these meetings took place within the framework of the dominion proposals. Modifications were suggested by provinces and a good many substantial revisions were made by the dominion at the January and April meetings, so many indeed that we were charged with "constant and drastic revisions" while at the same time we were also accused of "uncompromising rigidity". It is fair, I think, to add that no alternative to the broad outlines of the dominion's proposals was discussed at the coordinating committee meetings held in camera.

I shall not attempt to analyse the stand taken by each province. The published record of the open meetings which took place from April 29 to May 3 speaks for itself. I am convinced that in the case of at least a majority of provinces an agreement could have been reached along the broad outlines of the dominion's proposals. However, at least two provinces appeared to be definitely opposed to an agreement of the character and scope offered by the dominion. In the case of Quebec, it was never at any time made clear just what changes in the dominion proposals would be necessary to make them acceptable to that province. Ontario, it is true, did offer a proposal which was an alternative to the dominion proposals, but it was not until the closing hours of the conference that the financial implications of that proposal were revealed. These involved so large a net increase in total cost to the dominion as to put the proposal beyond the possibility of responsible consideration.

Under the Ontario proposal we were asked to forego revenues from which we estimated we would receive $102 million per year and to accept an increase in our obligations amounting to at least $32 million and perhaps to as much as $100 million, as compared with those assumed under the dominion's finally revised proposals. In other words, the Ontario proposal would, according to our estimates, have involved an additional net burden on the dominion treasury of at least $134 million a year, and perhaps $100 million in addition to that. These figures have been disputed, but they cannot be successfully refuted. At that stage the dominion felt it had made as comprehensive an offer, and had undertaken to assume as great a financial burden, as it could possibly justify to the people of Canada. The negotiations had extended over nine months and during that period of time the dominion had repeatedly revised its proposals in an endeavour to meet the several requests made by the provinces. We were still willing to accept suggestions for modification of our proposals provided they did not further increase the burden upon the taxpayers of Canada. In particular, we were willing to rent for a temporary period our rights to use certain fields of excise taxation, in the same way as we were asking the provinces to rent to us temporarily their rights in certain fields of direct taxation, provided the provinces could agree amongst themselves with respect to the rental consideration. However, none of the suggestions to this end made by ourselves or by some of the provinces, was acceptable to the provinces generally, and when it became clear how wide was the gulf between the dominion and at least one of the provinces, the conference adjourned sine die. There is nothing to be gained by post mortems or recriminations. We must now get on with our tasks as best we can.

The inability to reach a final agreement with the provinces has, however, greatly complicated my task in formulating this budget. The budget obviously cannot be based on the assumption that a general dominion-provincial agreement will still be reached. In my opinion the differences are far too great, not only between some provinces and the dominion but also between some provinces and other provinces to permit of reconciliation at an early date. I have had therefore to prepare this budget upon the assumption that no new general tax agreement could be made in the near future. Accordingly, in keeping with the terms of section 20 of the wartime tax agreements, I am proposing that the dominion's flat rate of tax on corporate incomes be reduced from 40 per cent to 30 per cent as from January 1, 1947. I am also proposing, as I shall explain in detail a little later, a substantial further reduction in personal income taxes, effective in 1947, which will enable the provinces which so desire to re-enter the personal income tax field. With these proposed reductions and with the payments to the various provinces of certain holdbacks within thirty days of the termination of the present agreements, we shall have fully carried out all our obligations under those agreements.

Nevertheless, we have all along been acutely conscious that the mere carrying out of the terms of these agreements would not enable us to remain indifferent to the problem of provincial finance and taxation. The agreements will all expire by next spring, three of them this fall, and without a new agreement several provinces are going to be faced with a difficult budget problem, and a chaotic tax situation is likely to arise.

If no new agreements are made, the provinces will again become dependent upon what they can collect from income and corporation taxes. Unfortunately, the income and corporation tax base is very unevenly divided as between provinces. Even before the war those provinces which were less fortunately placed in this respect were driven to uneconomic methods of taxation in attempting to meet their budget requirements. Apart from duplication and overlapping of taxes, provinces were forced to adopt arbitrary and makeshift devices which bore heavily on costs and hampered production. In spite of this, some provinces could not meet their minimum requirements without loans and temporary subsidies from the dominion. Their autonomy and their ability to discharge their constitutional responsibilities were seriously threatened.

If the pre-war situation was unsatisfactory, the post-war position will, in the absence of new agreements, become intolerable. Provincial expenditures have expanded greatly. Overall provincial budgets, brought down for the current year, call for expenditures higher by about $200 million than in 1940. This is an increase of roughly two-thirds. If the provinces again become dependent on income and corporation taxes, some will be forced to adopt taxation expedients far more drastic than those employed before the war. Financial pressure on the less-favoured provinces will give rise to increasingly arbitrary and discriminatory taxation, will lead to interference with interprovincial trade and to the extension of government ownership and operation of business merely in order to obtain additional provincial revenues which of course would mean loss of revenues to the dominion. Even with all this, it is difficult to see how some provinces could retain their solvency and any degree of financial autonomy. Moreover, the arbitrary and discriminatory provincial taxes would come on top of dominion taxes which, while substantially less than at present, would still be considerably higher than before the war. The dominion cannot stand aside and allow such a situation to develop. It would seriously impair the capacity of private enterprise to provide high and expanding employment. It would weaken and perhaps destroy our federal system.

The government has reached the conclusion that it would be irresponsible in the extreme if it allowed such a situation to develop without a further attempt to prevent it. It has been convinced that it would be shirking its responsibility to the people of Canada if it did not seek to devise some modified proposal which could be accepted by those provinces which wished to accept it and be left aside by those which did not desire it or felt they had no need for it. Such a modified proposal we have devised.

While it is to be regretted that it was not possible to reach agreement with all the provinces at the conference, it would be a mistake to say that the conference itself had not been of the utmost value in making clear to the governments of all the provinces as well as to the dominion government the problems with which each is faced, and the factors of which full account must be taken if immediate pressing situations are to be met and any practicable solution is ultimately to be found. Our modified proposal has been devised in the light of the conference discussions. I wish now briefly to outline its terms. It is, as I have indicated, wholly optional. Any province which wishes to do so will be perfectly free to remain out of the agreement and deal with its own problems in its own way. With those provinces which accept it, an agreement will be signed which will terminate five years after the termination of the present agreement. This is a longer term than the term of three years provided in our original proposals. It is, however, expected that some provinces may wish to sign immediately and others, if they sign at all, may not sign for one or two or more years. Having this in mind, it seems inappropriate to suggest a term shorter than five years.

The essence of our proposal is that in return for specified unconditional annual payments and other benefits, the agreeing provinces would undertake to restrict during the term of the agreement their use of the three fields of direct progressive taxation as follows:

(a) The agreeing provinces would agree not to levy any taxes on personal income nor permit their municipalities to do so. There would, of course, be double taxation of personal incomes in those provinces which did not wish to enter into the agreement and proceeded to levy their own taxes on personal incomes, but in order to help reduce the burdens of such duplication the Dominion would be willing to give a tax credit to the individual taxpayer of the amount of the tax he had to pay to the province, up to 5 per cent of the tax payable to the dominion by such taxpayer. Any increase in financial burden on the individual taxpayer would thus be avoided if the provincial tax did not exceed 5 per cent of the dominion tax. The provincial government would, of course, have to remain the sole judge as to the amount and nature of the tax it imposed on its own people, but obviously the inconvenience to the individual taxpayer involved in filling out two sets of income tax returns and calculating tax on two different bases would be decreased if the provincial tax were imposed as a fixed percentage of whatever tax might be payable to the Dominion by the individual taxpayer. In order to be of assistance to that end, the Dominion would be willing to make extra copies of its forms available so that when filling out his dominion tax return the taxpayer could merely make an additional copy and mail it with his cheque to the treasurer of his province.

(b) An agreeing province would undertake to levy a five per cent tax on net corporate income within the province and would also agree on behalf of itself and its municipalities to impose no other corporation tax or tax on corporations except corporations engaged in mining or logging operations. For this purpose, a corporation tax would have the same meaning as under the existing agreements. The province would also agree to discontinue the special five per cent tax mentioned above at such time as all provinces had made a tax agreement with the dominion. The five per cent levy would be based on taxable income as defined in the dominion income tax law, and allocation between provinces would be made on the basis of uniform rules worked out between the dominion and the provinces making an agreement. The dominion would collect the five per cent tax for the province and the dominion's annual payments to the province, as specified below, would be reduced by the amount of such collections. Any province not signing the agreement could levy such taxes as it pleased on its corporations, but any such taxes defined as corporation taxes or income taxes under the existing agreements, other than taxes on corporations engaged in mining and logging operations, would not be regarded as a deductible expense for the purpose of calculating taxable income under dominion tax laws.

(c) For the duration of the agreement also an agreeing province would either undertake not to levy succession duties at all or if it wished to continue to do so, it would agree to accept an appropriate reduction in its annual payments due from the dominion. In the latter case, succession duty amounts payable to the province would be treated by the dominion as a credit against amounts due under the dominion succession duty but the credit would be limited to one half the succession duties payable to the dominion. The dominion's annual payments to an agreeing province so continuing to impose succession duties would be reduced by the aggregate amount of such credits. This proposal, of course, will involve a doubling of the rate of succession duties now in effect under the dominion act but because of the system of tax credits already described, the general burden of the combined dominion and provincial succession duties in those provinces which continue to levy succession duties will be the same as at present.

In return for these undertakings, the agreeing provinces would receive annual payments from the dominion along the lines of the proposal made by the dominion to the provincial premiers at the conference held two months ago. For the term of the agreement the dominion would undertake to supplement the present statutory subsidies in such a way as to provide that each province signing an agreement with the dominion would receive a guaranteed minimum annual payment, including statutory subsidies, equal to $15 per capita based on the 1941 actual or the 1942 estimated population of the province, whichever is the greater. The actual payments to be made in any year would be equal to the guaranteed minima increased in proportion to increases both in population and in per capita gross national production and would be based on the average of payments as determined separately for each of the three preceding years. In no case would the dominion's payments to a province be less than 150 per cent of that province's annual receipts under its wartime tax agreement (excluding guarantee of gasoline tax revenue). For no province would they be less than two million dollars. In addition, all provinces would be free to tax profits from mining and logging operations and any such taxes would be treated as a deductible expense for dominion tax purposes. Finally, in the case of companies whose main business is generating for distribution to the public or distributing to the public electrical energy, gas and steam, the dominion would pay to the provinces concerned one-half the dominion's net corporation income tax collections from such companies in respect to such business. This payment to a provincial government would be reduced by an amount equal to any taxes which the government of that province levied on such companies. If a provincial government or one of its municipalities should take over a tax-paying corporation (other than one of the category just mentioned), the specified annual payments to that province would be reduced by the amount of the tax loss sustained by the dominion. The provisions regarding the allowances for taxes on mining and logging operations and half the tax on certain public utility companies will apply to all provinces, whether or not they sign an agreement.

I have had prepared a table showing the guaranteed minimum payments for all of the provinces and the payments presently estimated for the year 1947, assuming all provinces accepted the agreement, together with the provincial revenues received from comparable sources at the present time. With the consent of the House, I shall place this table on Hansard:

(1) Average collections in latest five-year period for which data are available, viz., 1940 to 1944 inclusive.

(2) Excludes interim subsidies of $275,000 (P.E.I.), $1,300,000 (N.S.) and $900,000 (N.B.) which are included in the previous column under Wartime Tax Agreement receipts and which will become statutory upon expiration of the Wartime Tax Agreements.

NOTE: The table does not take into account the effect on provincial revenues of the dominion's proposals in regard to taxes on mining and logging operations and the contribution of half of the dominion's receipts from the taxes on certain public utility companies. Nor, of course, does it take into account any reductions in payments due to collections of the special five per cent provincial tax on corporations or the credits allowed to taxpayers where the province continues to collect succession duties. These last two factors merely change the name of part of the payment and not its total amount.

Analysis of the table will reveal that the nine provinces are now receiving from statutory subsidies, payments by the dominion under the wartime tax agreements, and succession duties, a total of $124·5 million a year. Under the new proposal, if all provinces should accept they would receive as now estimated, a total payment in 1947 of $198·2 million, and no matter how low the national income might fall at any time during the next five years they would always be sure of the minimum payment of $181.4 million.

If any province did not wish to enter the agreement it would need to raise the amount of revenue shown in the following table by personal and corporation taxation, or some other form of taxation, to have the same revenue as that estimated for 1947 under the agreement:

	million
P.E.I.	1·2
N.S.	7·4

B.C.	15·8

I cite these figures to show the budgetary problems with which the nine provinces will be immediately confronted if no new agreement is made and also to suggest the probable resultant pressure on the tax system of Canada. The budget problems of these provinces must be solved in some way if we are to build a strong and united Canada. Is it not far sounder that they should be solved by a system of automatic payments objectively determined and made in return, so to speak, for the rental of an asset rather than by a system of outright subsidies or handouts? The latter, on the scale indicated, would either encourage irresponsible expenditure in the hope that any additional assistance required would always be forthcoming, or alternatively involve a control by the dominion over provincial administration, which is neither desirable nor practicable.

It has been said that the proposed payments by the dominion to the provinces are not based on the principle of fiscal need. That criticism fails to grasp the true facts of the situation. What is essentially valid in the position taken by the financially weaker provinces is their claim that the great bulk of the wealth and income of the country is concentrated in the two or three large provinces, that most of the head offices of the corporations doing business all over Canada are situated in Ontario and Quebec, and that the larger provinces, therefore, get an unfair share of the tax revenues which are based on the corporate profits and the personal incomes and estates resulting from the business done throughout the country. Now, what the dominion's proposal does is to provide a method whereby the three maritime provinces and the three prairie provinces will be enabled to derive from these sources the same per capita revenue as Ontario and Quebec. By selling certain rights to the Dominion for the term of the agreement, they are put in a position of sharing with the two central provinces equally on a per capita basis the productivity of the three great fields of direct progressive taxation—corporation taxes, taxes on personal incomes and succession duties. Surely this is going very far to meet the test of fiscal need. If, in spite of such assistance, any one province should still find itself under normal conditions faced with a fiscal problem, that could only be due to a higher relative level of expenditures or a failure to tap other sources of tax revenue to the same extent as other provinces. In such a case, a further fiscal need subsidy would be impossible to justify, although this does not of course mean that occasionally a province or region may not be affected by a calamity which might justify special temporary assistance.

Another merit of the proposal is the greatly increased measure of stability which it would assure for the revenues of an agreeing province. The province would of course benefit from any increase in its population and in per capita gross national product but its revenues from the three tax sources would never fall below the guaranteed minimum, no matter what happened to business conditions. It would be dominion revenues which would have to bear the shock of an economic recession but the dominion government is in a far better position to carry a large deficit for a time than is any provincial government. The high floor which would be set under a substantial part of the revenues of the agreeing provincial governments would enable them to plan their developmental programmes with greater assurance and give them a financial responsibility and freedom of decision in the matters entrusted to them by the constitution not previously known. In this way also would the federal system be strengthened.

In addition to assuring to agreeing provinces a specifically and objectively determined annual revenue, adequate in amount and stable in character, the arrangement which we are offering to make with each province should go a long way toward avoiding the overlapping, discriminatory and uneconomic methods of taxation which will otherwise result when the wartime tax agreements expire. Throughout the agreeing provinces there will be uniformity of over-all income and corporation tax and probably of succession duty rates as well. There will be only one agency collecting such taxes in these provinces and any differentials in the over-all rates as between agreeing and non-agreeing provinces should not be of major proportions.

The proposed arrangements represent, I believe, the closest approach which can be made under present conditions towards an efficient system of income, corporation and succession duty taxation. The way in which, and the rates at which, these taxes are levied have such a bearing on enterprise, on the incentive to work, and on national income that I would urge every province to give our offer the most careful consideration. There are, of course, additional and substantial benefits which can only be achieved if and when this interim arrangement can be made with all provinces. Only then will the dominion be in a position to implement its undertaking made at the conference to reduce the element of double taxation on distributed corporate earnings, which has a tendency to discourage risk-taking investment.

Perhaps a more important point is that if and when tax agreements can be made with all provinces and the dominion has exclusive use of the three tax fields in question, it will be able to co-ordinate the management of these taxes with its employment and economic policy as a whole. If I may quote from what I said to the conference on May 1 last, social justice requires that these progressive taxes be used to the fullest extent possible; economic common sense requires that they be limited to rates that will not stop people working hard and taking those risks which are necessary if we are to produce effectively and make progress. It requires the most careful judgment to balance these conflicting considerations under all the changing economic conditions and political pressures which a modern nation must face. Yet success is vital if we are to maintain employment and economic progress. Success would be made very much more difficult, and perhaps impossible, if it required the joint action of ten governments rather than one. The dominion is prepared and is best able to carry the responsibility of seeing that these progressive taxes are fully used, but not used so much that they do more harm than good. If, however, the provinces are also in this field, there will be a natural tendency for them to take a narrower view, a purely financial view, and to force the total of their taxes and dominion taxes to uneconomic levels. If, for example, experience showed that the corporation income tax, at some time in the future, was so high that it prevented the proper expansion of industry and employment in the nation as a whole, in the judgment of the dominion government, it would be proper to reduce it; but if the provinces were also using that tax, some of them, if not most or all of them, would be likely to raise their corporation taxes to take advantage of the reduction made by the dominion. The provinces might feel, quite rightly, that they could not afford to take as long range a view as the dominion, and if they were in need of revenue, they would probably find it difficult to reduce their taxes or to refrain from increasing their taxes because of the possible effects upon general employment and economic development in the country as a whole. This argument would be especially strong in times when employment and incomes were declining and when vigorous efforts were needed to encourage private expenditure and the expansion of industry. In such times, provinces would naturally be faced with declining revenues in other fields, and would be understandably reluctant to join in a programme of reducing income or profits taxes which however beneficial its long-run effects might be, had the immediate result of reducing substantially the revenues on which provincial expenditure depended.

For the information of the house I may say that I am mailing tonight a letter to the premier of each province, outlining the offer which I have just described and discussed.

It will be desirable if those provincial governments which wish to enter into such an agreement indicate their acceptance at an early date. Arrangements can then be promptly made for getting the agreements into a final form agreeable to all provinces which propose to sign. In some cases special arrangements to take care of special circumstances will have to be made. For instance, it is understood that the western provinces may not wish to sign a new tax agreement until a collateral agreement has been reached in regard to the refunding of their outstanding treasury bill indebtedness to the dominion. In the case of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, should they desire to accept the present proposal, it might also be necessary to consider an extension for a few months of the present wartime tax agreements which expire on October 31, November 30 and December 31 next respectively, if the necessary authorizing legislation in respect of the annual payments cannot be prepared in time for enactment at the present session of parliament. These and other matters of a similar kind will be the subject of discussion with representatives of the provincial governments concerned. It is my hope, however, that all points of principle can be agreed upon in sufficient time to submit the necessary legislation to parliament at an early date.

The house will have noted that the proposal I have outlined is limited strictly to matters of finance and taxation. That is an inevitable result of the failure thus far to achieve agreement with the provinces. It is obvious that the dominion cannot, for instance, assume responsibility for unemployed employable persons in some provinces but not in others.

Nor can it introduce the over-all plan of social security we had contemplated without at the same time reaching a satisfactory financial agreement with the provinces. Several of the major objectives of the comprehensive dominion proposals which were announced last August must therefore be held in abeyance for the time being. They remain, nevertheless, an essential part of the programme of this government. We continue to be ready to proceed with these or similar measures as and when arrangements can be worked out which will enable us to carry them out satisfactorily. We earnestly hope that those who have it in their power to make agreement possible will not long delay in making it possible to consummate the objectives we have in mind.

Obviously, the interim programme which I have outlined will represent not an ideal solution but only a second best. It is, however, the only solution which at the moment appears to be practicable. Moreover, it is one which is capable of growth. Several provinces will, we hope, be prepared to enter into an agreement at once. Others may do so next year or the year after. In due time we expect that all provinces will see that it is to their advantage to enter into the agreement. However, any province which believes, as I think erroneously, that such an agreement would weaken autonomy or lead to undesirable centralization or would for any other reason be against its best interests will be perfectly free to remain out of the agreement and deal with its own problems in its own way. We, for our part however, believe that unanimous agreement is the effective way to assure full employment, a high standard of living, and a wide measure of social security for the Canadian people.

PERSONAL INCOME TAX

I wish now to speak in more detail of the tax on personal incomes. As I have already said, we are proposing a substantial reduction in rates under this tax, effective from January 1, 1947. In addition we are proposing a thorough reorganization of the whole structure of this tax. Our personal income tax is now unnecessarily cumbersome, in part because the refundable tax requirement, though obsolete, is still a part of the basic tax law, and in part because it has been necessary as an interim measure to introduce a supplementary rate schedule in order to remove the duplication of benefit between family allowance payments and income tax allowances for the same child. It will also be recalled that our income tax in its present form embodies two separate taxes, namely, the normal tax, which developed from the national defence tax, and the graduated tax. Each of these taxes has its own set of allowances and credits, which are a blend of deductions from income and credits against tax. Not only is the tax structure itself complex but as the house well knows its drafting leaves much to be desired. We have already begun through an interdepartmental committee a much-needed rewriting of the entire statute but this process will not be brought to completion in time for action at the present session of parliament. However, the amendments which I am about to outline will not only reflect a radical revision and simplification of the present pattern of the income tax but also offer an important instalment in the process of re-writing and clarifying the legislation itself.

The exemption limits under the present tax are $660 for single persons and, in effect, $1,200 for married persons. As a major part of the present revision we are proposing that the exemptions be raised to $750 for single persons and $1,500 for married persons without dependents. This measure, taken in conjunction with the proposal I shall make in a moment regarding allowances for dependents, will remove entirely from the income tax roll between 550,000 and 600,000 taxpayers, or about one-quarter of the present number. The proposed exemptions will be in the form of deductions from income in the manner of the pre-war exemptions, and the $1,500 deduction will replace the combined income deduction of $660 and the tax credit of $150 granted the married man under the present law.

I am aware of suggestions, made by persons who may not be familiar with all the facts, that the exemption limits be raised to $1,000 for single persons and $2,000 for married, or even to $1,200 and $2,400. We have carefully examined these and other suggestions and have come to the conclusion that exemptions of $750 and $1,500 are as high as can be reasonably proposed under present circumstances.

In the first place, we must still raise very large amounts of revenue. Even if no tax reductions were made, our revenues will fall considerably short of our expenditures and far short of our total financial requirements for the current year. Moreover, as I have outlined, there is already a great excess of purchasing power and we must not add unnecessarily to it. In addition to these immediate considerations, we must bear in mind that the government and parliament face a post-war period in which events are likely to move swiftly and in respect of which we have accepted a large measure of responsibility for maintaining high employment. Under the circumstances we cannot afford to reduce our revenues too drastically.

Secondly, we are all, I believe, agreed that the income tax is the fairest and best tax on which to rely for the bulk of our revenue. More than any other, it takes ability to pay properly into account. We must, I consider, rely upon it as heavily as we can, subject to the limits imposed by its effects on incentive and efficiency. This applies as well in the lower brackets as in the higher. We cannot secure proper equity and fair treatment if the exemptions from income tax are so high as to exclude most of those receiving incomes. It is just as important to be fair in the distribution of taxation between persons earning $1,500 and $2,400 a year respectively as it is between these persons and those earning $5,000 or $10,000 a year. I have said that we cannot afford to reduce our revenues beyond reasonable figures. In these circumstances, if we raised unreasonably the exemptions for the income tax, or lowered the rates of income tax too drastically, we would only make it necessary to impose other less equitable, even regressive, forms of taxes.

Comparison of our proposed exemptions with those of other countries indicates clearly, I believe, that the figures now proposed are as high as Canada can reasonably go. The suggested exemption of $750 for the single person compares with one of $700 in Australia and New Zealand, of $500 in the United States, and of $490 in Britain. Similarly, the proposed exemption of $1,500 for a married person compares with $1,077 in New Zealand, $1,000 in the United States, $931 in Australia, and $800 in Britain. In addition, Britain, Australia and New Zealand have substantial social security taxes which apply at much lower levels than the exemptions I have given for income tax alone.

We are, I believe, fortunate in being able to afford after the war income tax exemptions as high as three-quarters of what they were before the war, despite the enormously heavier burdens which the war has thrust upon us. The amount of revenue that can be raised, indeed the amount of income to be taxed, in the higher brackets is disappointingly small. If we are to take a serious view of our financial responsibilities in this house, we cannot, I believe, urge such extravagant exemptions in our income tax as to lead inevitably to other less fair and open measures of taxation.

As a companion measure to the increase in the basic exemptions for single and married status, it is proposed that the present tax credits of $28 allowed against normal tax and $80 allowed against graduated tax for dependents of the taxpayer be replaced by deductions from income, and that the temporary measure by which family allowance payments are now adjusted to the income tax allowances for a child make way for a solution that will be simple and permanent. It will be recalled that under the present method of adjusting the tax of a parent in respect of whose children family allowances are paid, the parent is allowed to obtain both the family allowance and the income tax credits for the same child, but an amount of the family allowances corresponding roughly to the value of the income tax credits for the child must be repaid to the government. This method of adjustment requires that each taxpayer receiving family allowances must report the amount of such allowances to his employer in order that his tax deductions be adjusted accordingly. This method is cumbersome and complicated for the taxpayer, the employer and the income tax administration.

To overcome these complications, it is now proposed to allow a single, simple deduction from income of $100 for each child eligible to receive family allowances, and to regard all taxpayers having such children as receiving the family allowances for their children. For other dependents not eligible for family allowances, there will be allowed a straight deduction from income of $300. This step will provide a workable and permanent solution and at the same time will preserve the principle approved by this house when the Family Allowances Act was passed, namely, that a taxpayer who received family allowances for his children would not also receive a full allowance for the same children under the Income War Tax Act. The value of a deduction from taxable income of $100, plus the family allowance, will exceed the equivalent of a $300 deduction from income for nearly all taxpayers, particularly in the lower brackets, where the excess is considerable.

I should make it clear that this proposal assumes the universal payment of family allowances to all taxpayers with eligible children from January 1, 1947. A taxpayer with a child eligible for family allowances will be assumed for purposes of income tax to have received family allowances, and will be given the deduction from income of only $100 in respect of such child. Taxpayers who are not now claiming family allowances for children eligible for them should make application for them to commence in the new year when the proposed measure will take effect.

We are also proposing a complete overhauling and simplification of the rate schedules and a substantial reduction in tax liability. The present normal tax, the graduated tax, the formula for calculating the refundable portion which is no longer collected, and the family allowance recovery tables will be replaced by a single schedule of graduated rates applying on the excess of income over the new exemptions. Under the new schedule the initial rate will be 22 per cent on the first $250 of income in excess of the exemptions, the next rate will be 25 per cent on the following $750 of income, the next 28 per cent on the next $1,000, and the rate will rise gradually until a rate of 85 per cent is reached on income in excess of $250,000. The investment income surtax will be retained at the rate of 4 per cent, but as a measure of alleviation for the lower income groups the exemption for this tax which is now $1,500, will be raised to $1,800.

In revising a tax structure so complicated as our present one, it has not been possible to assure that all taxpayers will receive the same relative amount of tax relief. We have, however, tried to make the new schedule as fair and equitable as possible. As I have said, something over 550,000 persons now paying income tax will be wholly exempt under the new law. For taxpayers immediately above the new exemptions, the reduction in tax under the new schedule is of the order of 50 per cent to 75 per cent, and this scales down to about 10 per cent to 15 per cent for the majority of taxpayers.

To illustrate in detail the effect of the new exemptions and rates, there have been prepared tables comparing the present and the proposed tax at selected income levels for single persons, married persons without children, and married persons with two children receiving family allowances. I shall now place these tables on Hansard for the information of hon. members and the public at large.

Married Person with Two Children of Family Allowance Age

The table below compares the position of a taxpayer with two children of family allowance age under the new tax rates and the new treatment of family allowances proposed for 1947 with his position in 1946. To make this comparison the combined effect of the receipt of family allowances and payment of income tax must be shown in each year. This combined effect is shown in the columns headed "Net Position". Plus figures in this column indicate that the amount of the family allowance exceeds the amount of income tax payable by the amounts shown. The other figures indicate a net liability after offsetting the family allowance against the income tax. Comparison of the "Net Position" figures for 1947 with those for 1946 will give the taxpayer the net improvement in his position in 1947, reflecting either an increase in net benefit or a reduction in net liability. This computation assumes a family allowance payment of $72 for each child, which is the average payment under the family allowance scale.

(a) Includes the family allowance recovery where the family allowance is shown in the next column. It is assumed that family allowances are not generally now received above the 100 per cent recovery rate. In any case where they are received to obtain the correct amount of present income tax the full amount of the family allowance should be added to the figures shown in the first column for incomes of $4,000 and up. The net position would, however, be unchanged.

Note: In calculating the income tax payable it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total.

The over-all effect of the proposals I have outlined will be to reduce income tax revenue in a full year, assuming the present level of incomes, by approximately $143 millions, or about 23 per cent, and will involve the payment of additional family allowances in the amount of $12 millions per year, making a total cost of $155 million, about one-quarter of our expected revenue from this tax before the proposed reduction. This illustrates the thorough-going character of the revision and the importance of the reductions which we are now making. It will be recalled that the reduction now proposed is to be added to the flat 16 per cent reduction in income tax rates announced in last year's budget. However because the new rates will take effect only as from January 1 next, the loss of revenue in the current fiscal year will not be large—it is now estimated at about $25 million.

In addition to the over-all revision of the personal income tax structure I have just outlined I am proposing several other amendments in particular provisions of the law. One of these affects the taxation of husband and wife where both have incomes of their own. Prior to 1942 where husband and wife each had incomes in excess of the exemption limits the husband lost the marital allowance and he and his wife were taxed as single persons. As a means of encouraging married women to take employment in wartime the law was amended in 1942 to allow the husband to retain the marital allowance if his wife's income represented earnings received from an employment. I am now proposing that effective January 1, 1947, we return to the position as it stood prior to the enactment of this war-time measure, with the result that in 1947 a husband and wife each having incomes in excess of $750 will each be taxed as a single person.

I am also proposing a further change that will place the taxation of husband and wife on a more equitable basis than it has been in the past and bring our law into closer conformity with that of other countries. The effect of the change I am introducing will be that when a taxpayer's wife has income of her own in excess of $250, the marital allowance of $1,500 claimed by the husband will be reduced by the excess of his wife's income over $250. This rule will apply where the wife's income is $750 or less. If her income is in excess of that amount, as I stated a moment ago, the husband and wife will be taxable as single persons on their own separate incomes. If the wife's income is less than $750, then the husband may claim the married allowance of $1,500 but he must reduce the $1,500 by the amount by which his wife's income exceeds $250. In effect, the husband will be given the full marital allowance, which is granted in consideration of his wife's dependence on him, only when his wife's income does not exceed $250 a year. When the wife's income exceeds this amount, however, the $1,500 allowance granted the husband is reduced in proportion to the excess of her income over $250. This amendment will apply from January 1, 1947.

There are certain minor amendments which I should like to mention now without, however, giving complete details regarding them. For example, after January 1 of next year members of the armed forces will be treated for tax purposes on the same basis as civilians except those outside the western hemisphere who have not by that time gone into the permanent force. Also, the special provisions relating to the merchant marine will be withdrawn at the end of this year.

During last year's budget debate I said that the government would give sympathetic consideration to the suggestion that farmers and fishermen whose incomes tend to fluctuate widely from year to year should be permitted to pay tax on the basis of their average income over a period of years. We are now prepared to propose a practical method of putting the averaging principle into effect for these particular groups of taxpayers.

The proposal involves giving the farmer or fisherman the benefit of having his income taxed on the basis of a three year moving average. For the year 1946 and subsequent years, all farmers and fishermen who wish to take advantage of the right to average their incomes for tax purposes over a three-year period will be required to file returns each year whether or not they have taxable incomes. In 1948, all farmers and fishermen who have made returns for 1946 and 1947 will be entitled to average their incomes for the three years 1946, 1947 and 1948 and to pay in respect of 1948, not the tax for that year, but the tax which would have been payable over the three-year period had they earned the average income in each of the three years less the amount of tax actually paid in respect of 1946 and 1947. This means, of course, that in some cases the farmer or fisherman may be entitled to a refund in respect of 1948 of some of the taxes he has paid in respect of 1946 and 1947.

There will be no compulsion on a farmer or fisherman to accept this method of calculating his tax but it will almost certainly be to his advantage to do so. I say this in order to impress upon both farmers and fishermen the importance of making returns each year from now on. When the committee stage is reached, I shall outline the method in more detail.

Another problem affecting farmers to which a great deal of consideration has been given is the treatment of the "basic herd" in the case of a live stock farm or a ranch. The Department of National Revenue has, I believe, been following the practice of allowing adjustments of income over the preceding five-year period in the case of abnormal dispersal or liquidation sales. The general adoption of the three year forward averaging system which I have just announced should be of great assistance in more normal cases where a live stock herd is being maintained but annual live stock sales may vary from year to year. Several suggestions for carrying the basic herd principle further have been made and in this connection I must acknowledge the help received from various hon. members. Most of these, however, involve maintenance by the farmer of accounting records of greater or less complexity and whether they will prove practicable from the standpoint of both the farmer and the tax administration is a matter which will have to be worked out by the administrative officials in consultation with the Department of Agriculture.

There are certain other amendments which I can only mention. An alternative formula to that now in the law will be provided for determining the tax exempt portion of pensions received from pension trust funds formerly under section 5 (1) (h) of the act, and a change will be made in the method of taxing lump sum payments from superannuation funds, other payments received on retirement and payments received for loss of office. A method will be adopted for spreading the return from the sale of literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work over the period in which the author was engaged in its composition. There will also be a revision of the present law as it applies to a person resident in Canada for only a part of the taxation year, and finally there will be an amendment providing that where an elected member of a provincial legislature is paid an allowance for expenses incidental to the discharge of his duties the allowance will be deemed not to be taxable income to the extent of not more than one third of the aggregate of his normal sessional indemnity as a member and the expense allowance.

CORPORATION INCOME TAX AND EXCESS PROFITS TAX

Turning to the taxes on corporations and the profits of business enterprises, the house will recall the general reduction I announced a few minutes ago when referring to the implementation of our obligations under the war-time tax agreements. Under those agreements the dominion's specific obligation is "to reduce its rate of tax on corporation incomes by at least ten per cent of such incomes." To-day the ordinary corporation income tax is 18 per cent and there is also a minimum tax on all corporate incomes of 22 per cent under the Excess Profits Tax Act, making an aggregate flat rate tax of 40 per cent. In addition, the excess profits tax takes 20 per cent of any income in excess of 116⅔ per cent of standard profits. The proposal we are now making is to reduce the flat rate tax from 40 to 30 per cent and to make it all corporate income tax rather than an aggregate of the two types of tax.

I had hoped to be able to announce in this budget the repeal of the Excess Profits Tax Act, in its entirety, effective as of January 1, 1947. As I explained last year, this tax was designed as a war measure and has received overwhelming support as a necesasry instrument of war finance, but it has distinct weaknesses and limitations in normal times and is not to be accepted as a permanent part of our tax structure. Experience, however, has shown that we are still living in highly abnormal times, the shadow of the war is still upon us, and as I have shown the financial burdens on the dominion budget arising out of the war are still of huge proportions. After careful consideration the government has reached the conclusion that the act should stay on the statute books for another year unless provision is made at the next session of parliament for its earlier repeal. However, we are proposing that it be further amended in such a way as (1) to make it apply solely to corporations, thus releasing from its provisions all partnerships and sole proprietors; and (2) to reduce the rate of tax applicable to excess profits from 20 per cent to 15 per cent.

These changes in corporate income and excess profits taxes are estimated to result in a reduction in tax revenues of $135 million for the full year 1947. However, as they are to become effective only in respect of profits earned or deemed to have been earned after January 1, 1947, the loss in revenue during the present fiscal year is likely to be small, perhaps of the order of $5 to $10 million.

Certain minor amendments will also be made affecting the corporation income tax and the excess profits tax. One of these relates to the provision introduced in 1944 for permitting half the expenditure on maintenance and repairs in an early post-war period to be charged back to the income of the war period, in order to compensate for maintenance that had to be deferred under war conditions and which had thereby increased artificially the income subject to excess profits tax. For reasons which will be discussed when the resolution is reached in committee, the time has not yet arrived when we can proclaim the period in which this provision can be applied, and we propose to restrict its use to those who have paid tax on profits in excess of standard profits.

Other minor amendments to corporation income and excess profits taxes will provide for the extension for another year of the tax credits now granted in respect of exploration expenses incurred in the petroleum, natural gas and mining industries, with an adjustment in the amount of the credit appropriate to the reduced rate of corporation tax and an extension of a tax credit for expenditures incurred in deepening an existing oil well. The exemption from excess profits tax given certain classes of mines will be continued and exemption will also be granted from one-half the 30 per cent rate of corporation income tax on the first three years' operations of mines of this class coming into production in the three year period commencing January 1, 1947. The special limitation on the deductibility of charitable donations in computing the taxable income of corporations will be rescinded with respect to fiscal periods ending after June 30, 1947, and certain adjustments will be made in the taxation of investment trusts and non-resident-owned investment corporations.

TAX TREATMENT OF COOPERATIVES

I come now to the tax treatment of co-operatives. Hon. members will recall that in November, 1944, a commission under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Errol McDougall of the court of king's bench, Quebec, was appointed to inquire into this thorny question, and that the commission made its report a very short time before the presentation of last year's budget. Accordingly, it was decided to defer action until there had been an opportunity for all concerned to give the report thorough study.

I am now in a position to say that in general the government accepts the commission's report as the basis of its proposals with respect to the taxation of trading cooperatives, credit unions and mutual insurance organizations.

The first recommendation of the commission is that we should repeal section 4 (p) of the Income War Tax Act, the section which was inserted in the act in 1930 to authorize an exemption for specified classes of cooperatives under certain conditions. The reasons for this recommendation are summarized in the report as follows:

> As a result of the ambiguities of language and the difficulty of administering the section, and because we are of the opinion there is no general class or group of cooperative associations in Canada to-day whose income should be declared not to be liable to taxation, we are of the opinion that the section in its present form cannot survive the attacks made upon it.

The government accepts this recommendation and, accordingly, proposes that section 4 (p) be repealed. Apparently the section has little or no value in any case, for whatever the original intention of parliament may have been, the methods of doing business followed by our ordinary types of cooperatives are not such, in the opinion of the law officers of the crown, as to enable them to secure exemption under this section.

The commission recommended in effect that cooperatives be placed in a position of tax equality with other forms of business enterprise. This principle is sound but it is by no means easy to apply. What is the taxable income of a cooperative? There may be some cooperatives which so conduct their affairs as to have no taxable income within the meaning of the Income War Tax Act. There may be others which so conduct their affairs as to have a very limited income within the meaning of the act. There are, moreover, a variety of payments in proportion to patronage, which for want to a better term I shall call patronage dividends, the status of which is by no means clear. Let me quote a passage from the report of the McDougall commission:

> . . . the (cooperative) association is, to some extent, obligated to make return to the members in proportion to patronage. These returns resemble in part an ordinary price rebate or discount. However, their amount is affected by the efficiency of management of the association and a variety of unpredictable circumstances beyond its control. It may be affected also by revenue from the investments of the association in bonds or other securities. It may be influenced as well by the policy the association follows with respect to engaging in business with non-members and granting patronage returns to the latter. On the other hand, if satisfactory returns of this kind are not made, it is probable that the membership and the business of the association will decrease. Functionally, then, the so-called patronage dividends may partake of the nature of a return of profits to the members, or a return of excess charges, or a return of investments, or an expense of the association.

While it will be seen that the commission recognized the complex and ambiguous character of these so-called patronage dividends, it took the general position that such of these payments as are made readily available to the members or customers should be considered income of the members or customers and not of the cooperative association. To avoid discrimination it advised that a similar attitude be taken towards patronage dividends distributed by ordinary companies, partnerships or individual business enterprises.

These simple rules for the tax treatment of patronage dividends would appear to offer the basis of a reasonable solution for an extremely vexatious problem. It will be observed, however, that they involve a departure from one of the cardinal principles of our tax system, for they recognize as a deductible item a distribution which represents in some cases and to some extent at least, as the commission pointed out, a distribution of trading profits. In other words, if all distributions in proportion to patronage are wholly freed from tax, a cooperative association or an ordinary company could reduce the taxes it might otherwise have to pay by distributing its income in one form rather than another, for example, in the form wholly of patronage dividends which would be non-taxable rather than in the form partly of patronage dividends and partly of dividends on share capital which are taxable. The trading cooperative which recognized an obligation to pay interest or dividends on its capital prior to the distribution of patronage dividends would under such conditions pay a greater proportionate tax on its income than the trading cooperative which did not recognize such an obligation. It will be agreed that a tax law having such a discriminatory effect and which could be used to reduce taxes that would otherwise be payable under our law is to be avoided if at all possible.

One possible alternative would be to dispense with any special legislation with regard to these so-called patronage dividends, relying on appeals to the courts to establish the status of the payments under the general tax laws. But this might mean prolonged litigation during which cooperatives and other companies would be in a very unhappy position and it is doubtful whether in the end any principles of wide and ready application would be established by the courts.

After careful consideration, the government has, therefore, come to the conclusion that it should accept the commission's recommendation that patronage dividends and similar payments be treated as a deduction from income subject to one relatively minor limitation designed to avoid at least some of the discriminatory effects I have mentioned. The limitation is this: that no company or association shall be able to go so far in its distribution of tax-free patronage dividends as to reduce its taxable income below a reasonable return on capital employed in the business. This reasonable return will be defined as three per cent on the capital employed, including borrowed capital, less the interest paid by the company or association on borrowed capital that is allowed as an expense in the computation of the taxpayer's income. The principle underlying this rule is that amounts set aside out of taxable income to be distributed in proportion to patronage by a cooperative or company which does not pay at least three per cent on the capital employed in its business contain earnings which arise from the employment of capital and ought not to escape tax entirely. For many cooperatives which pay patronage dividends this modification of the commission's recommendation will have little or no effect, for they already recognize an obligation to pay interest or dividends equal to at least three per cent on capital or retain undistributed income on which tax will be payable. Share capital with a limited dividend and with limitation of voting to one share per member rather than one vote per share was a characteristic feature of the plan of organization of the Rochdale Equitable Pioneers Society, the real founders of the cooperative movement. Cooperatives of this character will usually be able to claim the full amount of their cash patronage dividends as a deductible allowance. Any cooperative which does not set aside as taxable reserves or pay as interest or dividends a total amount equal to three per cent of capital employed, will find itself subject to tax on a portion of the amount it had set aside out of its income to distribute on the basis of patronage.

It is proposed that this provision relating to the deductibility of patronage dividends shall come into effect for taxation years ending in 1946.

The first step in determining the tax liability of a cooperative or any other company will therefore be to compute its taxable income in the ordinary way. In this computation the cooperative or company will continue to be able to claim as an expense payments that are found to be enforceable obligations of the cooperatives and not profit-sharing distributions. Having determined its taxable income the cooperative or company will then be able, if the proposed amendment is adopted, to deduct distributions in proportion to patronage paid out of income in that year subject to the limitation I have outlined above.

The government agrees with the commission that to qualify as a deduction from taxable income, patronage dividends should be paid shortly after the end of the fiscal year and on the same basis to members and customers alike. Some cooperatives which finance on the so-called "revolving fund" principle allocate their surplus each year in proportion to patronage, but make the cash distributions in respect of such allocations in a later year. Patronage dividends allocated but not paid in years subsequent to 1941 will be allowed as a deduction to the extent previously indicated in any year from 1946 on during which they are paid.

Following the commission's recommendation, the proposed amendment will also make it a condition of deductibility for the future that the cooperative or company shall hold forth the prospect to its customers prior to the commencement of its taxation year that distributions will be made on a patronage basis. In the case of a cooperative, it will be sufficient that the statute under which it is organized, its charter, its by-laws or a contract with its customers holds forth this prospect. In the case of any other company, the requirement will be an advertisement in a newspaper circulating in the area in which the company does business.

Finally, the government accepts the commission's recommendation that newly-formed cooperatives which commence business after December 31, 1946, be exempt from tax for a three-year period. This concession is intended to assist only bona fide cooperatives consisting entirely of individuals organized under provincial cooperative law going into business for the first time which do not acquire directly or indirectly the assets or good will of an existing business, and there will be other suitable safeguarding provisions to assure the true intent of the provision.

I am not sanguine enough to believe that these proposals will meet with complete approval, either in this house or outside. Some will continue to urge complete tax exemption for cooperatives or an even more liberal attitude than has been proposed with respect to patronage dividends. Others will contend that we are going too far in allowing patronage dividends as a deduction from taxable income under any circumstances. As long as it is necessary to retain a tax on corporate profits it will be impossible completely to reconcile these conflicting points of view. In the meantime the best that can be hoped for is a reasonable working arrangement which preserves substantial equity between competing forms of enterprise and safeguards the essential interests of the treasury.

So far I have been dealing with proposed changes in the law to clarify the tax position of cooperatives and patronage dividends for the future. Even if these are adopted, however, cooperatives and ordinary companies which have been paying patronage dividends during the past few years will still be uncertain as to their position under the present law. This is purely an administrative matter, but it is so important to the interests concerned as to call for some statement of government policy.

From 1930, when the section was enacted, until about 1940, section 4 (p) of the Income War Tax Act was interpreted by the tax officials as giving complete exemption to the vast majority of cooperative organizations. During 1940, however, serious doubts were raised as to the correctness of this view and in January, 1941, the Department of Justice was asked for a ruling in the cases of the Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta wheat pools. In the opinion of the department all three wheat pools are taxable under the present law. This opinion was notified to the parties concerned during 1941 and 1942. Immediately thereafter the Department of Justice was asked to consider whether patronage dividends paid by the wheat pools, the United Grain Growers and certain other elevator companies were allowable deductions in the computation of income for tax purposes. In February, 1943, the department gave its opinion that in none of the cases submitted were patronage dividends an allowable deduction.

In view of these opinions the government felt it desirable to bring the wheat pool cases before the courts for final determination, and the Department of Justice advised that the most practical method of doing so was to issue an assessment which the pools might appeal. This was done. The pools thereupon appealed but when the McDougall commission was appointed further proceedings were stayed.

The commission was not asked to make recommendations with regard to the obligations of taxpayers under the existing law but it did feel called upon to make a general comment, which I shall quote:

> One proposal made to us was that any recommendations for taxing cooperative associations should apply retroactively. Were it not that this point was pressed upon us with some insistence, we would pass it in silence. We do not regard it as any part of our function to make any recommendations which, if enacted into law, would affect the rights or obligations of taxpayers under the existing law. It is the duty of those charged with the responsibility of administering the Act to apply its provisions as they understand them. If doubt or uncertainty arises, the courts are always available both to the taxpayer and to the crown to establish their respective rights and obligations. Having regard, however, to the ambiguities contained in section 4 (p) of the Income War Tax Act and the resulting (though understandable), hesitant administrative practice in applying it, we are of the opinion that cooperative associations have so conducted their affairs that great hardship would result should our recommendations be made to apply retroactively. We also feel that many of them would be prejudicially affected if the existing law should be interpreted so as to make them liable for payment of taxes for the period subsequent to the enactment of section 4(p). Believing as they did, and not discouraged in that belief by the administrative attitude, we venture the hope that those cooperative associations which have, in good faith, conducted their affairs in the light of a possible, even plausible, construction of the section in question will be accorded relief from payment of taxes on patronage dividends actually or constructively paid to their members or customers, since the enactment of section 4 (p).

In general, the government agrees with the position taken by the commission and it proposes, therefore, to act on the principle of good faith in assessing cooperatives which are found to be taxable under the existing law. Acting on this principle, provision will be made whereby the income tax administration will not be required to collect tax from any cooperative in respect of any year during which it had reason to believe it was exempt and in respect of which it was led to believe by the income tax administration that it was exempt. While this means that the great majority of cooperatives will be substantially relieved from tax obligation with respect to years subsequent to 1930, the government agrees with the commission that to revive at this late date tax claims in cases such as those mentioned above might cause great hardship to hundreds of small enterprises.

As I have indicated, however, there are some cooperative organizations, notably the wheat pools, which have had reason to believe for some years that they would be subject to tax. The administration will endeavour to apply the same principle of good faith in making assessments in these cases. To be specific, the government is willing to relieve the wheat pools from any liability for tax for fiscal years earlier than those ending in 1942. Furthermore, the government is willing to allow as a deduction from taxable income patronage dividends, refunds of excess charges, and similar amounts actually paid in cash by the wheat pools in fiscal years ending in 1942 and 1943, but not in 1944 and 1945 because well before 1944 these organizations were aware of the legal opinion of the Department of Justice. Patronage dividends distributed or set aside for payment pending settlement of the tax issue by the private elevator companies and the United Grain Growers will be accorded the same treatment as similar payments made by the wheat pools, that is, if the wheat pools accept the foregoing basis of settlement, they will be allowed as a deduction from income for the taxation years up to and including 1943 but not for later years.

Under all the circumstances, the government believes this is a most reasonable compromise and offers it as a basis of settlement. If it is not acceptable to the organizations concerned, the courts must determine the legal position.

Before I leave the subject of cooperatives, I may add that we are accepting the main recommendations of the McDougall commission regarding the taxation of mutual organizations carrying on the business in Canada of fire, casualty and automobile insurance. Such organizations will henceforth be subject to income tax but dividends on or refunds of premiums to policyholders, whether paid in cash or applied against renewal premiums, together with any unabsorbed premiums or premium deposits returned to or payable to policyholders, and any other amount credited to a policyholder or subscriber in such a way that it is exigible by him on giving reasonable notice may be deducted in computing taxable income. To prevent discrimination, joint stock companies carrying on the same line of business will similarly be allowed to deduct dividends paid or refunds of premiums to policyholders in computing taxable income. Credit unions which derive their incomes primarily from loans made to members and federations of credit unions will continue to be exempt from tax. Also the tax free status of organizations which derive all their premium income from the insurance of churches and schools will be preserved.

APPEAL BOARDS

There is an important announcement I should like to make with regard to a proposed new feature of our income tax system.

As the house is aware, there has been an increasing demand from taxpayers for a less expensive and more convenient method of appeal from income tax assessments. A special committee set up in another place to examine into the provisions and workings of the Income War Tax Act, has made a careful study of the present appeal procedure and some recommendations which are extremely useful. Their main suggestion was for the setting up of a board of tax appeals. It is proposed to accept this suggestion with certain modifications.

The proposed board will be appointed by the governor in council and will consist of a chairman and two assistant chairmen, having specified legal qualifications, and not less than three nor more than nine other members. The board will be a court of record and will hear in various parts of Canada appeals from income tax assessments for the year 1946 and succeeding years. Appeals may be taken from decisions of the board of tax appeals to the exchequer court. The rules of procedure before the board will be such that taxpayers will, without great expense to themselves, have a convenient method of obtaining judicial decisions in disputed income tax matters.

The proposed board will decide questions of fact and law in the same manner as any other court. It will not, however, have the power to exercise or review the discretions vested in the Minister of National Revenue by the Income War Tax Act. It is proposed to provide for the review of these discretions in a different way.

There is some complaint about the existing provisions of the law in so far as these discretions are concerned. After careful consideration, the government has concluded that an advisory board, separate altogether from the appeal board to which I have referred, should be set up to advise the Minister of National Revenue upon the exercise of certain of his discretionary powers. The house will recall that under the Excess Profits Tax Act a board of referees was set up to advise the minister with regard to standard profits. The government's proposal is to establish an income tax advisory board, consisting of a chairman and not less than two and not more than six other members, to which a taxpayer may require the Minister of National Revenue to refer for hearing, consideration and advice, decisions made by the minister in the exercise of specified discretionary powers. I may add that instructions are being given to the interdepartmental drafting committee to explore carefully the possibility of reducing the number of discretions now vested in the minister or at least of providing for their exercise under regulations approved by the governor in council.

SUCCESSION DUTIES

The only changes proposed in the Succession Duties Act are the new schedule of rates and the provision for the system of tax credits which I have already described. The new rates will apply in the case of deaths occurring on or after January 1, 1947. It is estimated that the new rates will yield a gross revenue of $48-50 million in a full year, which will, of course, be reduced by the amount of the credits allowed against the dominion duty in any province which wishes to remain in the field.

EXCISE TAXES AND DUTIES

In the general field of excise taxes only minor changes will be made. The tax on cigars, for example, will be revised by replacing the present graduated schedule of excise tax rates by a flat ad valorem rate of 25 per cent and reducing the excise duty from $3 per thousand on cigars to $1 per thousand. This revision will place the cigar tax on a more equitable and more efficient basis and will result in a slight increase in revenue. Consequent upon the adoption of the McDougall commission's recommendations in regard to the application of the income tax to mutual fire and casualty insurance companies, the rates of premium tax on the various classes of such companies will be reduced as set out in the resolutions.

TARIFF

Members of the house will recall that in connection with the budget resolutions of last session I referred to the then impending trade discussions of an international character and went on to state that "the present is not the time, by isolated or unilateral action, to change the existing tariff in any particular." Although six months have elapsed, I am to-day in much the same situation as I found myself in last November. The proposed international negotiations on various aspects of commercial policy, including tariffs, are still ahead of us. But the time-table that had appeared feasible last fall has proved impracticable, having in mind the large number of governments that have indicated a desire to participate in what are bound to be complicated and protracted discussions. In the interval there has been a quite important change in the setting of the proposed negotiations, in that these are now directly under the ægis of the united nations organization, through its economic and social council. The council has appointed a preparatory committee for an international trade conference, on which committee are represented those countries which intend to take part in the negotiations.

In the circumstances I have deemed it inadvisable to introduce at this time anything in the nature of comprehensive or important tariff changes or changes of a type that may soon be the subject of tariff negotiations with other countries from which we may desire and reasonably expect tariff concessions. Subject to this general principle there are proposed a number of minor adjustments in the tariff to which I need not refer in detail. No increases are proposed. Some changes are to facilitate administration, some embody the provisions of outstanding orders in council passed under the War Measures Act, some reflect small changes in wording of items resulting from technological advances, some affect reductions designed to reduce costs in cases where the item amended would have virtually no importance in trade negotiations and one is related to a reduction being proposed in excise duties.

CONCLUSION

The proposals which I have now announced will, it is estimated, result in a reduction of our tax revenues by about $254 million in a full year under economic conditions similar to those at present, and an increase in family allowance payments, directly related to the tax changes, of $12 million, making a total cost of $266 million. This does not take into account any further reductions due to income tax and succession duty credits that will be given to taxpayers of provinces remaining in these fields. These and other effects of the offer to provinces cannot, of course, be estimated until we know what provinces plan to accept it.

For the current fiscal year, the tax reductions and the other proposals I have announced will have only a relatively small effect on our revenues and expenditures because the important tax changes become effective only as of January 1 next, and the new agreements with the provinces will commence, at least in most cases, only at the beginning of the next fiscal year. There will probably be a reduction of personal income tax revenue of about $25 million, an increase of about $3 million in the cost of family allowances, and a decrease in excess profits tax and corporate income tax revenue, taken together, of about $10 million.

The house will recall that on the basis of the present tax structure I forecast a budget deficit for the current year of roughly $260 million. As a result of the changes proposed in this budget, the deficit appears likely to be increased to roughly $300 million. This means that we will be covering nearly 90 per cent of our expenditures from revenues, a more rapid approach to the balancing of the budget than I expected to be possible some months ago.

While it is too early to predict the situation in the following fiscal year, that is, 1947-48, we may reasonably look forward to a further substantial decline in our expenditures, particularly for national defence and for veterans' benefits, and as a result of the termination and liquidation of war contracts. There may be some moderate increases in certain other expenditures and perhaps also decreases in certain revenues such as special receipts, but if we succeed in maintaining high employment and income we should be able to look forward to something like a balanced budget in that year.

Of course, in that year, as in this one, we shall need to borrow in order to finance loans and investments. But the scale of our borrowing should be smaller than in the current year. This year we must finance not only the anticipated deficit of $300 million but also the large programme of loans, advances and investments which, as I have already indicated, may involve a sum in the neighbourhood of a billion dollars. While we began the year with a large cash balance, a considerable portion of it was in currencies other than Canadian and government requirements will necessitate a fairly high cash balance at the end of the year. Apart from refunding or repayment of debt, borrowing requirements for the year may be estimated at roughly a billion dollars. This is a great deal less than the figure for last year but it is nevertheless a substantial part of the total savings which the Canadian people and their institutions will make during the year. We must therefore continue our efforts to encourage savings and their investment in government securities, including the proposed Canada saving bonds which I announced last week.

In conclusion, I would like to stress one thought. We Canadians can achieve great objectives if we can agree among ourselves upon those objectives and devote our energies to reaching them. That is clearly shown by what happened in the war. Now that the war is over, we have an opportunity to select and to achieve objectives just as challenging, just as exciting as those of war, but of a constructive and progressive nature. I believe that the Canadian people, if properly informed, are prepared to agree, by and large, upon great peacetime objectives and to devote to their attainment something of the same spirit and energy which made our war achievements possible. It is the duty of all of us in government, in business, in labour, in agriculture, to do all that we can now to make possible that agreement upon ends and upon means which will enable Canada in peace to be worthy of the record of Canadians at war.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the present rules for computation of personal income tax be replaced by the following schedule of graduated rates:

On the first $250 of income or any portion thereof, 22 per cent per annum; or

$55 upon the income of $250; and 25 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $250 and does not exceed $1,000; or

$177,312.50 upon the income of $250,000 and 85 per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $250,000.

2. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the following deductions from income be allowed:—

(a) $1,500 in the case of married persons and persons allowed a deduction equivalent to that of a married person and $750 in the case of all other persons;

(b) $300 in the case of dependents not eligible for family allowances, $100 in the case of children eligible for family allowances and amounts not exceeding $300 contributed to the support of partial dependents.

3. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the deduction of $1,500 from the income of a married person be reduced

(a) where the spouse has an income of more than $250 and less than $750 by the amount by which the spouse's income is more than $250, or whether or not the wife's income is earned income.

(b) where the spouse has an income of more than $750, to $750

4. That in respect of income earned after December 31, 1946, the ordinary income tax rate for corporation income be increased from 18 per cent to 30 per cent and from 20 per cent to 32 per cent in a case where a company and its subsidiaries file a consolidated return.

5. That the exemption of investment income for purposes of the 4 per cent tax on investment income be increased for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years from $1,500 to $1,800.

6. That a deduction from tax be allowed in the 1946 and subsequent taxation years to a taxpayer who resides or is ordinarily resident in Canada during only a part of the taxation year of a portion of the tax that would otherwise be payable upon his income during the taxation year that bears the same relation to the whole tax as the period in the taxation year during which he is not resident or ordinarily resident in Canada bears to the whole taxation year.

7. That there be established, with provision for the expenses thereof, an income tax appeal board consisting of a chairman and two assistant chairmen having specified legal qualifications and not less than three nor more than nine other members appointed by the governor in Council, as a court of record, to hear, in any part of Canada, appeals from assessments made by the Minister of National Revenue in respect of the 1946 and subsequent taxation years and that an appeal may be taken from a decision of the appeal board to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

8. That there be established, with provision for the expenses thereof, an income tax advisory board consisting of a chairman and not less than two nor more than six other members appointed by the governor in council to which a taxpayer may require the Minister of National Revenue to refer for hearing, consideration and advice a decision to which the taxpayer objects made by the Minister in the exercise of specified discretionary powers in respect of an assessment for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years.

9. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, a taxpayer, other than a corporation or joint stock company, may deduct from the tax otherwise payable by him the amount of tax on income paid by him to the government of any province in which he resides not exceeding five per cent of the tax otherwise payable by him.

10. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, a corporation other than a corporation whose income is primarily obtained from mining or logging operations shall not be allowed to deduct from income any corporation tax as defined in the existing wartime tax agreements paid to the government of a province.

11. That there be allowed as a deduction from income earned after January 1, 1947, of a corporation whose income is primarily obtained from mining or logging operations taxes paid by it to the government of any province including income tax on income earned after January 1, 1947.

12. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, the provision exempting the income of certain cooperative companies and associations be repealed and that for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years provision be made that there may be deducted from a taxpayer's income the aggregate of the payments made.

(a) in the taxation year or within six months thereafter to his customers of the taxation year; and

(b) in the taxation year to his customers of a previous taxation year after the 1941 taxation year and not previously deducted under paragraph (a) in respect of specified allocations in proportion to patronage for the said years the prospect of which was held forth

(c) by the statute or by-laws under which the taxpayer carries on business or by his contracts with his customers, or

(d) by the taxpayer in a specified manner prior to the commencement of the taxation year except that portion of such payments as would if deducted leave the taxpayer with an income less than an amount determined by deducting from three per cent of the capital employed in the business, including therein borrowed moneys, the interest paid by the taxpayer on borrowed moneys and deductible as an expense in computing his income.

13. That for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years, paragraph (q) of section four which exempts from taxation the income of credit unions be amended to exempt the income of any credit union or any corporation or association the members of which are credit unions which derives its revenue primarily from loans made to members residing within the province to which it is restricted for carrying on its business.

14. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, the provision exempting from tax the income of mutual corporations not having a capital represented by shares be amended to remove therefrom mutual insurance corporations except mutual insurance corporations which derive their premiums wholly from insurance of churches, schools or other religious, educational or charitable institutions.

15. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years, there may be deducted for the purposes of this Act, from the income of insurance companies, other than life insurance companies, whether mutual corporations or joint stock companies, amounts credited to policyholders by way of dividends or refund of premiums or refund of premium deposits and either

(a) paid to the policyholder,

(b) credited to the policyholder on account of premiums for renewal of policies or

(c) credited on terms under which the policyholder is entitled to or may obtain payment thereof within a period not exceeding thirty days after demand for payment by him and if notice of crediting on such terms has been given to the policyholder.

16. That the income of a corporation or association commencing business after December 31, 1946, incorporated or registered under provincial cooperative legislation and organized and operated as a bona fide cooperative for the purpose of marketing natural products of or acquired from its members, or of purchasing supplies, equipment or household necessities for, or to be sold to, or of performing services for, its members be exempt from taxation during the first three complete taxation years following the commencement of business.

17. That a farmer or fisherman be permitted for the 1948 and subsequent taxation years, at his option, to compute his liability to pay tax on the average of his income for the taxation year and the two preceding taxation years.

18. That for the 1946 and subsequent taxation years, the service pay and allowances, other than travelling allowances or separation allowances in place of travelling allowances, of a member of the permanent Canadian naval, military or air forces paid at the new rates of pay and allowances established for the said permanent forces be taxable income of a member irrespective of

(a) whether he is serving within or outside of Canada; or

(b) whether he receives the pay and allowances during the first six months after his return to Canada.

19. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years the pay and allowances of a member of the non-permanent Canadian naval, military or air forces other than the pay and allowances received by a member serving outside of the western hemisphere or within six months of his return thereto be taxable income of the said member and that the provisions for (a) a tax credit in respect of pay and allowances exceeding $1,600 as provided by rule 2 of section 3 of paragraph A of the first schedule; and for (b) taxation of a member serving outside of Canada in the western hemisphere at one-half the effective rate of tax applicable to his total income be repealed.

20. That the exemption of amounts received by members of the merchant marine as war risk bonuses in respect of service in a war risk zone and of the value of board and lodging received on shipboard, while performing service in respect of which such bonuses are payable be repealed for 1947 and subsequent taxation years.

21. That, where an elected member of a provincial legislature is, under an act of the provincial legislature, paid an allowance for expenses incidental to the discharge of his duties as a member, the allowance received in the 1946 or a subsequent taxation year be deemed, to the extent of not more than one-third of the aggregate of his normal sessional indemnity as a member and the said allowance, not to be salary or taxable as income.

22. That where the author or joint author of a literary, dramatic, musical or artistic work on which he was engaged for a period of more than twelve months assigns the copyright therein wholly or partially and has in the 1946 or a subsequent taxation year received within one year of the assignment in consideration therefor an amount, the whole of which would otherwise be included in computing his income during the taxation year a specified part or parts of the consideration may, at his option, be attributed to his income during certain previous taxation years.

23. That the special rates provided for non-resident-owned investment corporations be reduced for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years from 22½ per cent to 15 per cent but that such corporations be taxable on all income received in Canada subject to deductions from the said income in respect of interest and dividends received from other such corporations and foreign taxes paid by the corporation.

24. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years investment corporations whose profits are now exempt from tax under paragraph (f) of section seven of the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, be exempt from tax upon income and that such corporations that would be so exempt except that they have outstanding bonds, debentures or other securities evidencing bonded indebtedness pay tax upon income at one-half the rate for corporations.

25. That for taxation years ending after June 30, 1947, a corporation be permitted to deduct from income amounts paid to charitable organizations not exceeding 5 per cent of the income of the corporation subject to taxation without the limitation presently thereon.

26. That persons entitled to a payment out of an employee's superannuation or pension fund or plan, the investment income of which has been exempt from taxation by reason of an election for such exemption by the trustees or corporation administering the fund or plan, be allowed in the 1946 and subsequent taxation years as an alternative to the present deduction from the pension or superannuation payment, an amount computed on the basis of the amounts paid by the employee together with simple interest on such amounts at 3 per cent per annum.

27. That the special provisions with regard to

(a) payments out of a superannuation or pension fund plan upon the death, withdrawal or retirement from employment of an employee or former employee in full satisfaction of all his rights in the fund or plan,

(b) payments by an employer to an employee upon retirement in recognition of long service, and

(c) payments by a person to a former employee in respect of loss of office or employment be replaced by a provision for the taxation of amounts so received after June 27, 1946, at the option of the taxpayer either as income for the year in which he received the amounts or at a rate equal to the percentage which the tax upon the taxpayer's income during his last full year in the employment is of that income.

28. That for 1946 and subsequent taxation years the provision under which the minister may allow double depreciation in respect of plant or equipment built or acquired as a new investment in a period to be fixed by the governor in council be amended to provide that the allowance be made only in respect of such classes of plant or equipment as may be determined by the governor in council.

29. That the deduction in respect of income for a taxation year ending between the last day of December, 1942, and the first day of the year of expenditure in respect of one-half of expenditures made

(a) in connection with maintenance or repairs by a taxpayer carrying on a business, or

(b) on underground development by a taxpayer operating a mine, in a period to be fixed by the governor in council, be restricted to an amount

(c) if the year for deduction is the 1946 taxation year not greater than the taxpayer's excess profit in that year as defined for the purposes of the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, or

(d) if the year for deduction is a taxation year prior to 1946, not greater than the taxpayer's profits in the said year above the point at which the tax calculated for the said year under the first part of the second schedule to the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, was equal to the tax calculated for the said year under the second part of the second schedule to the said Act and that no such deduction be allowed in respect of the income for a taxation year commencing after 1946.

30. That a corporation or joint stock company shall pay a tax at one-half the ordinary rate of income tax for corporations upon income derived on or after January 1, 1947, from the operation of a mine

(a) that has come into production during the period commencing January 1, 1944, and ending December 31, 1949, and

(b) that, in the case of a mine that has come into production before January 1, 1946, is a basic metal or strategic mineral mine and in the case of a mine that has come into production after January 1, 1946, is a metalliferous or industrial mineral mine, during the first three complete taxation years after the mine comes into production.

31. That the deductions from tax allowed to a corporation whose principal business is the production, refining or marketing of petroleum or petroleum products in respect of drilling and exploration costs be extended to oil wells spudded in during the year 1947 and the deepening of oil wells which is commenced in 1947 but that in respect of such well the deductions be reduced from 26⅔ per cent and 40 per cent of the cost to 20 per cent and 30 per cent respectively.

32. That the deduction from tax allowed to a corporation, association, syndicate or exploration partnership formed for the purpose of exploring and drilling for oil in respect of exploration and drilling expenses be extended to expenditures incurred during the year 1947 but that in respect of expenditures in that year the deductions be reduced from 26⅔ per cent to 20 per cent thereof.

33. That the deduction from tax allowed to a corporation, association, syndicate or exploration partnership formed for the purpose of exploring and drilling for natural gas be extended to expenses incurred in the year 1947 but that in respect of such expenditures the deduction be reduced from 30 per cent to 22½ per cent.

34. That the deduction from tax allowed to a corporation, whose chief business is that of mining or exploration of minerals in respect of prospecting, exploration and development expenses incurred in searching for minerals be extended to expenses incurred in the year 1947 but that in respect of the expenses incurred in that year the deduction be reduced from 26⅔ per cent to 20 per cent.

35. That the deduction from tax allowed to a corporation, association, syndicate or exploration partnership whose principal business is production, refining, or marketing of petroleum or exploration or drilling for petroleum in respect of expenditures made in connection with a deep-test oil well, be extended to expenditures made in connection with deep-test oil wells spudded in during the year 1947.

36. That no interest shall be payable on unpaid taxes upon incomes of the 1945 or a subsequent taxation year in respect of a period commencing twenty months after the day fixed for filing the return for the taxation year and ending one month after the sending of the notice of assessment.

37. That the provision for payment of interest by corporations on the amount of taxes unpaid after payment of instalments of estimated tax commencing six months after the end of the taxation year be amended to require payment of interest on the said unpaid amount from the end of the taxation year.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to provide:—

1. That the provision for taxation of excess profits of every person residing or ordinarly resident in Canada be amended to exclude therefrom in respect of excess profits earned after December 31, 1946, persons other than corporations or joint stock companies and to reduce the rate of tax on excess profits earned after December 31, 1946, from 20 per cent to 15 per cent.

2. That with respect to profits earned after December 31, 1946, the provision for taxation of profits of every corporation or joint stock company be repealed.

3. That for the 1947 and subsequent taxation years investment corporations that have outstanding bonds, debentures or other securities evidencing funded indebtedness be exempt from excess profits tax.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act and to provide:

1. That rates of tax upon or in respect of any succession upon the death of a person after

December 31, 1946, shall be twice the rates presently in force and that the tax paid to the government of any province in respect of the same succession be allowed as a deduction from the tax payable under the Dominion Succession Duty Act up to but not exceeding one-half of the tax otherwise payable under the said act.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide:

1. That the securities transfer tax be extended to apply to rights to receive shares of stock;

2. That the present graduated excise tax on cigars be changed to an ad valorem tax of 25 per cent;

3. That any enactments founded on resolutions Nos. 1 and 2 shall be deemed to have come into force on June 28, 1946 and to have applied on all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on or after that day and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day;

4. That the rate of premium tax payable by mutual insurance companies other than life insurance companies and companies carrying on business under the premium deposit plan be reduced from 3 per cent to 2 per cent, and in the case of exchanges from 4 per cent to 2 per cent in respect of premiums received after December 31, 1946;

5. That the rate of premium tax payable by insurance companies carrying on business under the premium deposit plan be reduced from 4 per cent to 3 per cent in respect of premiums received after December 31, 1946; and

6. That a deduction be allowed to insurance companies from the premium taxes payable under the act of the taxes on premiums, paid to the government of any province in respect of premiums received after December 31, 1946.

EXCISE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excise Act and to provide:

1. That the excise duty of $3 per thousand on cigars be reduced to $1 per thousand.

2. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-eighth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six.

THE CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Comparative Summary Statement of Revenues and Expenditures

1. Although the dominion's fiscal year ends March 31, the books of the dominion for each fiscal year remain open for some time thereafter in order to record expenditures made to April 30 as provided by section 32 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, and to provide for adjustments which affect revenue and expenditure accounts as well as asset and liability accounts. Final figures for the fiscal year 1945-46 are not yet available, and accordingly the statements which follow, in so far as they relate to 1945-46 revenue, expenditure, investment and balance sheet items, must be regarded as preliminary. In particular they do not reflect the cancellation of $425,000,000 of accumulated liabilities of the United Kingdom under the British Commonwealth air training plans, which are provided for in the financial agreement with the United Kingdom. The relevant article of that agreement and the section of the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, implementing it have not yet come into effect, pending action by the United States Congress on the Anglo-American financial agreement. If and when the Anglo-American financial agreement is approved by congress, immediate action will be taken to implement this provision of the Canadian-United Kingdom agreement. This would result in a cancellation of the item of $425,000,000 listed in the balance sheet given on page 46 of this appendix under the heading of "Loans and Advances." It will also result in an increase of $425,000,000 in war expenditures and total expenditures and a similar increase in the deficit.

2. The following tables show, by main categories and in detail, revenues, expenditures and the increase in net debt for the fiscal year 1945-46 together with comparable figures for the four preceding fiscal years:

ANALYSIS OF REVENUES, 1945-46

3. The grand total of revenues of the dominion government for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, are estimated to amount to $2,955,604,000, representing an increase of $268,270,000 from the previous year. Revenue from tax sources declined by $99,267,000 from 1944-45, reflecting reductions in tax rates made after the end of the war, but increases of $15,217,000 in non-tax revenues and of $205,320,000 in special receipts more than offset this reduction. A table on page 2951 gives a detailed comparison of the actual revenue results with the forecast presented in the budget speech of October 12, 1945.

4. Tax revenues again reflected the predominance of direct taxes on incomes and profits characteristic of the war years. Of total tax revenue in 1945-46, almost 64 per cent arose from direct taxation as compared with 32·6 per cent in 1938-39, the last pre-war year.

5. The amount of reserve established in the fiscal year under review for the refundable portion of income and excess profits taxes was $72,500,000, of which $5,000,000 was in respect of personal income tax and $67,500,000 in respect of the excess profits tax. This has been deducted in arriving at the revenue total given above. When added to the reserves previously set aside, this addition brings the gross total liability established at March 31, 1946, to $265,000,000 for refundable personal income tax and $252,000,000 for excess profits tax, or a gross total of $517,000,000. After deducting repayments of refundable taxes made to March 31, 1946, the net liability as at that date amounted to $515,737,000. The distribution of the gross reserves of the two taxes by the taxation years to which they relate is now estimated as follows:

Taxation Year	Refundable Personal Income Tax	Refundable Excess Profits Tax
1942	58,000,000	31,200,000
1943	135,000,000	67,500,000
1944	72,000,000	72,700,000
1945	.....	70,500,000
1946*	.....	10,100,000
Gross Total	265,000,000	252,000,000
Less repayments	1,259,382	3,783
Net Total	263,740,618	251,996,217

*Corporation fiscal years ending in 1946 prior to March 31st.

ORDINARY REVENUES

6. The personal income tax, which yielded $691,586,000, was again the largest single source of tax revenue, although yielding $76,169,000, less than during the previous year. This decrease reflected the 16 per cent reduction in tax effective from October 1, 1945, as provided in the budget of last fall, and in part also the moderate decline in incomes which followed the end of the war. The decline due to these causes was, however, partly offset by the recovery of family allowance payments from taxpayers through deduction at the source which was in effect during nine months of the fiscal year 1945-46.

Mention has been made previously of the reserves now established for the refundable portion of the personal income tax. The additional amount of $5,000,000 set aside in 1945-46 represented an increase in the reserves provided previously against the years 1942, 1943 and 1944, when this tax was in effect and brings the net total liability at March 31, 1946, to the amount of $263,740,618.

7. Corporation income tax and the excess profits tax are both levied on business profits and may appropriately be discussed together. The yield of the corporation income tax revenue amounted to $217,834,000, and revenue from the excess profits tax to $494,196,000, giving a combined total of $712,030,000, compared with a combined total of $742,209,000 in the previous year. This decline reflected principally a moderately lower level of corporation profits in 1945 and to a minor degree the changes in the excess profits tax introduced in the 1945 budget. The nature of these changes was such that their main effect will be felt in the fiscal year 1946-47.

The amount of refundable excess profits tax reserve has been shown previously in tabular form by the individual taxation years to which the total applies. The liability to pay this tax has been lifted in respect of profits earned after January 1, 1946, but must be paid by any company having a fiscal year ending after that date on the proportionate part of its profits falling in the calendar year 1945. The full final liability for the refundable excess profits tax, therefore, has not yet been established as companies having a part of their fiscal year falling in the calendar year 1945 will be required during 1946 to pay this tax on a part of their profits proportionate to the portion of their fiscal year which was included in 1945.

8. Revenues under the headings "Taxes on Dividends and Interest" and "Taxes on Rents and Royalties" are derived from special taxes imposed largely on income going to non-residents of Canada under authority of section 9b of the Income War Tax Act. In 1945-46 revenue under these two headings amounted in total to $28,310,000, and was derived principally from the 15 per cent tax on interest and dividends paid to non-residents.

9. Succession duties, which have been levied only since 1941 by the dominion government, have shown a gradual increase from year to year since their inception. The revenue from this source was $21,448,000 in 1945-46, compared with $17,251,000 in 1944-45, $15,020,000 in 1943-44, $13,273,000 in 1942-43 and $6,957,000 in 1941-42.

10. Gross revenue from customs duties in 1945-46 amounted to $174,076,000 compared with gross revenues of $173,730,000 in the previous year, while net revenue after deducting refunds and drawbacks amounted to $128,877,000 compared with $115,091,000 in 1944-45.

As explained in the appendix to the 1945 budget speech, very substantial amounts of customs and excise revenue have been remitted in recent years in respect of munitions and war supplies exported from Canada to allied governments either as cash sales or under the mutual aid acts. These remissions reached their peak in the fiscal year 1944-45, and their decline to a lower level in 1945-46 accounted almost entirely for the increased net revenue in the latter year. In the fiscal year 1946-47 refunds and drawbacks of customs revenue will return to a normal level with the cessation of the shipment of war supplies abroad.

11. Excise duties are levied exclusively on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products under the Excise Act. Total revenue in the fiscal year 1945-46 amounted to $186,726,000, an increase of $34,804,000 over the previous year. Of this increase alcoholic beverages, due to an increase in consumption following the rescinding of the restrictions imposed by the dominion government under the wartime alcoholic beverages control order, contributed $19,142,000, while tobacco products contributed $15,086,000. The extent of the smokers' contribution to the federal treasury is indicated by the over-all revenue from tobacco products (including the yield of the additional taxes imposed under the Special War Revenue Act on tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, cigarette papers and tubes, pipes and smokers' accessories) which amounted in the fiscal year 1945-46 to over $174,000,000, a sum equal to about 40 per cent of the total tax revenue of the government in the last pre-war year, 1938-39.

12. Under the heading "Excise Taxes" are included the wide variety of taxes on commodties and services levied under the Special War Revenue Act, of which the sales tax and the taxes on tobacco products were the largest sources of revenue in 1945-46. Gross collections of $610,915,000 were lower by $126,869,000 than during the previous year, due in substantial part to the exemption of building materials from sales tax in May, 1945, and the further exemption from sales tax of machinery and apparatus and the rescinding of the war exchange tax in the budget of October 12, 1945. Refunds of excise taxes declined from $194,719,000 in 1944-45 to $114,005,000 in 1945-46, however, due to reduced remissions on munitions of war exported to our allies, with the result that the net revenue declined by only $46,155,000 as compared with the decline in gross revenue of $126,869,000.

The tax sources which showed the largest reductions in 1945-46 and the amounts by which revenue was reduced in each case are set forth below:

Sales tax	$ 77,856,000
War exchange tax	56,966,000
Beverages	2,785,000
Electric and gas appliances	2,785,000
Sugar	1,769,000

Curtailment of available supplies of sugar accounted for the decline in the sugar tax and the tax on beverages. The tax on electric and gas appliances was repealed in May, 1945, and was, therefore, not in effect during the greater part of the fiscal year. The reason for the reduction in sales tax and war exchange tax receipts has already been mentioned.

Tax sources from which increased revenue was derived, and the amounts of the increase in each case were:

Cigars, cigarettes and tobacco	$7,922,000
Stamps, including taxes on jewellery, chinaware, cabaret attendance, etc	3,401,000
Transportation and communication	2,688,000

13. Small amounts of tax revenue are derived from the tax on the note circulation of the chartered banks, which decreases from year to year with the decline in such notes as provided by statute; from taxes on the net premium income of insurance companies; from a tax on the export of electric energy from Canada; and from a tax on the export of furs from the Northwest Territories. Revenue from all these taxes amounted to $8,972,000 in 1945-46.

14. Non-tax revenues for 1945-46 are estimated at $160,688,000, an increase of $15,217,000 over 1944-45. Receipts from the post office amounted to $68,613,000, an increase of approximately $2,557,000. These receipts exceeded the cost of operating the post office by about $10,883,000, if we take no account on the credit side of the value of services rendered free of charge to other departments and on the debit side, of rentals and other costs of premises occupied by the post office. It will be recalled that postage rates were increased in 1943 to obtain additional revenue. Return on investments realized $70,915,000, an increase over the previous year of about $10,166,000. The larger items making up this total are: interest on advances to Canadian National Railways, $18,400,000; Bank of Canada profits, $22,542,000; interest on loans to foreign exchange control board, $8,155,000; interest on bonds held in securities investment account, $9,555,000; interest on loans to national harbours board, $3,950,000; interest on loans to provinces, $2,762,000; interest on loans to Canadian farm loan board, $746,000; soldier land settlement loans, $588,000; and interest on advances to Canadian National Railways for purchase of railway equipment, $2,155,000.

SPECIAL RECEIPTS AND CREDITS

15. The unrevised total of special receipts and credits for the fiscal year 1945-46 is $592,557,000 as compared with $387,237,000 for the previous year. Of this total, $569,150,000 represents receipts developing from war expenditures and consists of refunds of previous years' war expenditures, $454,549,000; sale of surplus war assets, $44,950,000 and miscellaneous war revenues, $69,651,000.

A breakdown of refunds of previous years' war expenditures by departments, with details of the larger items follows:

Canadian Mutual Aid Board	$ 3,716,000
National Defence—Army	13,888,000
National Defence—Navy	6,660,000
National Defence—Air—proceeds from sales of equipment, material and supplies furnished and services rendered, $20,101,000; savings on civilian operated air training schools, $2,890,000; refunds on contracts after cost audits and re-negotiation, $4,017,000; refunds on joint operations R.C.A.F. station at Gander, $926,000; sale of surplus and condemned stores, $3,566,000; sundries, $577,000—total	32,077,000
Reconstruction and Supply—Credit from munitions production allotment fund representing mainly return of working capital advances from pre-financed plants, $310,000,000; refunds on contracts in connection with cost audits, re-negotiation, and voluntary refunds, $12,700,000; amortization of government capital on War Supplies Limited contracts, $55,000,000; amount transferred from suspense upon liquidation of government equity in plant of Sorel Industries, Ltd., $10,000,000; sundries, $5,353,000—total	393,053,000
Sundry departments	5,155,000
Total	$ 454,549,000

It should be noted that most of these refunds of previous years' war expenditures are made out of current war expenditures of other departments, and that consequently the bulk of these transactions are merely bookkeeping changes and not actual refunds of expenditures. There are offsetting items in the expenditure accounts corresponding to most of the refunds listed above.

In connection with the amount of $44,950,000 realized during the year through the disposal of surplus war assets, it might be mentioned that it does not include residual cash balances or value of inventories in the hands of War Assets Corporation as at March 31, 1946.

The larger amounts making up the total of miscellaneous war revenues, $69,651,000, are from the departments of national defence—army, navy and air services, $3,646,000; reconstruction and supply, $62,100,000; transport, $2,030,000; and sundry, $1,875,000. Included in the total for reconstruction and supply is the sum of $50,000,000 derived from the operation of Park Steamships Limited.

The remaining large item of special receipts and credits is the sum of $22,631,000 which represents the net result of the change in the government's equity in the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1945. This arises from the government being the owner of the railway company at a time when the latter is using its surplus earnings to reduce its debts. The surplus earnings of the railway company, amounting to $24,756,000, were paid to the government and show up in the accounts as a repayment of active advances (see paragraph 36 on page 2964). This reduction of debt increases the net book value of the government's investment in the railway company by a corresponding amount. It is offset, in part, by a book loss on capital abandonments of $2,125,000. The remainder, $22,631,000, is the net increase in the book valuation of the Canadian National Railways' Securities Trust capital stock. This is carried on the books as an inactive asset, and the increase in it is shown here as a special receipt. It is offset, however, by a contra item of the same amount on the expenditure side, appearing under the heading "Other Charges."

16. The table which follows gives a summary of the forecast made at the time of the last budget of the probable receipts from the various sources of revenue during the fiscal year 1945-46, and a comparison of these forecasts with receipts for the fiscal year.

ANALYSIS OF EXPENDITURES, 1945-46

17. Expenditures are dealt with under the usual classifications of ordinary, capital, war and demobilization, special, government-owned enterprises and other charges. All disbursements under these categories with the exception of active loans and investments charged to war appropriations are included as expenditures in arriving at the over-all deficit or increase in the net debt.

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

18. Ordinary expenditures are estimated at $1,061,845,000 compared with $767,376,000 in the previous fiscal year, an increase of $294,469,000. The largest increase was in the payments of family allowances which reached a total of $172,632,000 in 1945-46—the first year in which such payments were made. Other estimated increases over 1944-45 are as follows:

Increased interest and public debt charges	$97,438,000
Increased compensation[1] paid to provinces under wartime tax agreements for vacating income and corporation tax fields $11,366,000, less reduction of $6,648,000 under guarantee of gasoline tax revenues	4,718,000
Increase in chief electoral officer's expenditure due to 1945 general election	2,910,000
Increase in Post Office expenditures	3,101,000
Increase in Public Works expenditures	3,094,000
Increase in cost of treatment and after-care of returned soldiers	8,686,000

[1]An amendment of the agreement with the province of Alberta as authorized at the last session of parliament resulted in an increased payment to Alberta of $11,394,000.

Other increases as well as decreases effected during the year are revealed in the five-year table.

It might be noted that of the aggregate estimated ordinary expenditures during 1945-46 of $1,061,845,000, the larger contractual and uncontrollable items total $887,143,000 or 83·5 per cent of the total. These items are: interest and other charges on the public debt, subsidies and payments to provinces under the dominion-provincial taxation agreements, family allowances, premium discount and exchange, unemployment insurance, post office and pensions.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

19. Estimated capital expenditures totalled $4,603,000 in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, compared with $3,164,000 in the previous fiscal year. The main items are costs of dredging the St. Lawrence ship channel, improvements in connection with civil airways and airports and the construction of the new Prince Edward Island car ferry.

WAR AND DEMOBILIZATION EXPENDITURES

20. Under the authority of the War Expenditure and Demobilization Acts and the War Appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) Acts an estimated amount of $3,570,666,000 was disbursed. Of this amount $12,212,000 was for loans, advances and investments treated as active assets, and the remainder, $3,558,454,000, was classed as war and demobilization expenditures. The following table gives the corresponding figures for each fiscal year from the beginning of the war.

Fiscal Year	Charged to Active Assets	War Expenditures	Total
1939-40	9,092,742	118,291,022	127,383,764

Total estimated war and demobilization expenditures	$3,558,454,000

ACTIVE ASSETS
Purchase of railway equipment—1945 orders	$ 11,399,000
Construction of dock and rail facilities for Steep Rock Iron Mines, Limited	778,000
Loan to village of Dawson Creek for construction of a sewage disposal system.	35,000
Total estimated active loans, advances and investments from the war expenditure and demobilization appropriations, 1945-46.	$ 12,212,000
Total estimated disbursements from the war and demobilization appropriations, 1945-46	$3,570,666,000

22. The table in the preceding section does not include recoverable outlays made under the provisions of section 3 of the War Appropriation Acts which are classed as active assets rather than expenditure. Under this section, the government of Canada may act as the agent of an allied government for any purpose which will aid directly or indirectly in the prosecution of the war and any obligations or costs incurred temporarily or assumed may be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. Futhermore, any expenditure required to be made by the government under any contract for war supplies entered into for the purpose of enabling any company wholly owned by the government to fulfil its obligations in respect of orders received by such company from an allied government may also be paid out of unappropriated moneys.

23. The principal items of war expenditure for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, and the four preceding fiscal years are detailed on pages 2943 to 2946. The expenditures for 1945-46 include both war and demobilization costs and while there were substantial reductions in actual war costs, these reductions were offset in a measure by new items of expenditure more closely associated with demobilization. The net reduction last year over 1944-45 amounted to $859,992,000. Some of the larger reductions are accounted for by: National Defence, army $321,286,000; National Defence, naval services $175,299,000; National Defence, air services $734,849,000; agriculture, $5,076,000; finance, $32,160,000; national war services, $11,736,000. Some of the services showing increases are: Reconstruction and Supply, $44,639,000; National Health and Welfare, $9,440,000; Trade and Commerce—Canada's contribution to UNRRA, $131,759,000 (including that under mutual aid) and Veterans Affairs, $295,656,000, including increases of $219,364,000 in war service gratuities and re-establishment credits, and $29,663,000 in post discharge rehabilitation benefits. Not including the amounts paid to UNRRA from the war appropriation (United Nations Mutual Aid) acts, the amount expended for mutual aid was $771,920,000 compared with $792,253,000 in the previous year. Details of war and demobilization expenditure by departments and services for 1945-46 follow:

Special Expenditures

25. Special expenditures are estimated at $17,358,000 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, an increase of $9,852,000 over 1944-45. The increase is mainly accounted for by the advance of $12,052,000 to meet the deficit in the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund. The amount required to meet the deficit in the preceding year was only $1,295,000.

GOVERNMENT OWNED ENTERPRISES

26. The classification of expenditures entitled government owned enterprises comprises the losses of and non-active advances to government owned enterprises which had been established before the war and are operated as separate corporations. As the Canadian National Railways has shown substantial annual surpluses since 1940, expenditure under this heading since the fiscal year 1940-41 has been of minor importance, the total for 1945-46 being $1,334,000.

Canadian National Railways

27. The operating revenues of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1945 totalled $433,773,000, a decrease of 1·7 per cent from those of 1944. Operating expenses of the railway amounted to $355,294,000, or 2 per cent less than in 1944.

The net operating revenue of the railway was $78,479,000 and after deducting $10,601,000 for taxes, equipment and joint facility rentals, there remained a net railway operating income of $67,878,000. Other income, less deductions, totalled $3,206,000, resulting in $71,084,000 being available for interest. After payment of $26,022,000 in interest on debt held by the public and $20,306,000 in interest to the government in respect of temporary loans for capital and refunding purposes, there was a net cash surplus of $24,756,000. This cash surplus was paid to the government in redemption of temporary loans for refunding, as shown in paragraph 36.

The operating deficit of the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals for 1945 was $688,000 compared with $773,000 in the previous year.

Canadian National Steamships

28. The Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, in the calendar year 1945 had an operating surplus of $1,563,000 and earnings from the vessel replacement fund totalled $217,000. From this total income of $1,780,000 there was paid $521,000 for bond interest and exchange and $143,000 for interest on government advances, leaving an income surplus of $1,116,000. This income surplus was utilized as follows: $632,000 was paid to the government in final discharge of all capital and working capital advances; $217,000 was retained in the vessel replacement fund; and $267,000 was set aside as additional depreciation in view of the decision to dispose of certain of the older vessels in the immediate future.

National Harbours Board

29. The operating income of the National Harbours board for the calendar year 1945, after payment of interest to the public but before depreciation, reserve for replacements and interest on government advances was $5,596,000 compared with $5,581,000 in the previous year. Interest paid to the government in the fiscal year totalled $3,950,000.

Financial assistance provided by the government to the National Harbours board and charged to expenditure under the category of government owned enterprises totalled $646,000, divided as follows: $86,000 for the operating deficit of Churchill harbour; $558,000 for non-active advances to meet the deficit of the Jacques Cartier bridge at Montreal; $1,000 for capital expenditures at Halifax harbour; and $1,000 for capital expenditures at Three Rivers harbour. Details of expenditures charged to the war appropriation are given under "War Expenditures."

The elevators at Port Colborne and Prescott operated at a profit during the year and $233,000 was paid to the government.

OTHER CHARGES

30. Total expenditures in this final category are estimated at $47,713,000 compared with $47,762,000 in 1944-45.

The sum of $25,000,000 has again been added to the debt of Canada and credited to the reserve to meet possible losses on the ultimate realization of active assets, bringing the total amount of the reserve to $150,000,000. The annual write-off of soldier and general land settlement loans and Canadian Farm Loan board capital stock, amounting in all, to but $37,000 for the fiscal year 1945-46, resulted in a similar increase in the dominion's net debt, as the write-off is from active assets. The yearly established loss of $45,000 on seed grain and relief account administered by the Department of Mines and Resources does not increase the net debt as the write-off is from an amount already set aside in the non-active accounts to provide for revaluations and losses.

The dominion's equity in the Canadian National Railways as reflected in the Canadian National Railways securities trust stock increased during the year by the amount of the surplus earnings of the system for 1945 of $24,756,000 less line abandonments of $1,167,000 and retirement of rolling stock of $958,000 resulting in a net increase of $22,631,000. This amount is shown as the final item under other charges and as it is also credited to the consolidated fund on the revenue side of the dominion's books, the net debt of Canada is not affected by these transactions.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

31. The estimated grand total of expenditure for the fiscal year 1945-46 under the various categories enumerated, namely ordinary expenditures, capital expenditures, war expenditures, special expenditures, losses of and non-active advances to government owned enterprises, and other charges, was $4,691,307,000.

32. The following table shows the percentage distribution of estimated revenues and expenditures for a number of important items. Receipts from various taxes and other revenue sources, after deducting the $72,500,000 of income and excess profits taxes estimated as refundable after the war, are shown as percentages both of total revenues and of total expenditures. Similarly, several of the main items of expenditure or groups of such items are shown as percentages both of total expenditures and of total revenues. The purpose of this table is to enable broad conclusions to be drawn as to the relative burdens imposed on the public treasury by the war and the main services or obligations of government.

OVER-ALL DEFICIT

33. As total revenues for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, were $2,955,604,000 and expenditures aggregated $4,691,307,000, the over-all deficit or increase in net debt for the year was $1,735,703,000.

LOANS, ADVANCES AND INVESTMENTS

34. In addition to the expenditures already detailed, the government makes disbursements for the acquisition of investments which are treated as "active" and are deducted from total gross liabilities in arriving at the figure of net debt. The net increase in loans, advances and investments for 1945-46 was $666,055,000 compared with $457,458,000 in 1944-45. Details of these increases together with those for the four previous fiscal years will be found in the table on page 39.

RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP COMPANIES

35. The net increase in this category in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, was $43,163,797, and relates to transactions with the Canadian National Railways, and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited.

36. In the fiscal year the government made net payments to the Canadian National Railways in the amount of $43,613,797 classified as follows:

Advances—
Under Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1944 for retirement of called or matured issues	$	65,500,000

37. During the fiscal year the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited repaid from its surplus an amount of $450,000 advanced to it in 1937-38 for working capital purposes.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL BOARD

38. During the fiscal year $700,000,000 was advanced to the foreign exchange control board to enable the board to finance the purchase of gold and foreign exchange.

SUNDRY GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

39. The net change in advances to the National Harbours board during the year was a reduction of $66,000. Advances of $22,000 were made for capital purposes at the port of Montreal, while a capital refund of $88,000 was received from Vancouver.

40. The net increase in the fiscal year in advances for soldier and general land settlement aggregated $18,677,000. This increase was occasioned by net advances of $24,012,000 under the Veterans' Land Act, less net repayments by settlers and $36,000 written off and charged to Consolidated Deficit Account.

41. Net advances to sundry crown companies decreased during the fiscal year by $8,486,000. Repayments of $6,500,000 by the Canadian Wool board and $5,946,000 by various companies operating under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply were partially offset by advances of $2,000,000 to the Export Credits Insurance Corporation for capital surplus and $1,960,000 to the War Assets Corporation.

UNITED KINGDOM AND OTHER GOVERNMENTS

42. Net advances under this heading increased by $91,886,000 during the fiscal year. The Canadian dollar obligation of the government of the United Kingdom under the authority of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, was reduced by $63,946,000, leaving a balance outstanding at the fiscal year end of $538,564,000. The government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics repaid $2,500,000 of the $10,000,000 loan made for the purchase of wheat. Advances made to the government of the United Kingdom under section 3 of the War Appropriation Act for the purchase of food and other essential supplies decreased during the year by $9,841,000.

43. Advances made to foreign governments and their agencies pursuant to agreements made under the Export Credits Insurance Act totalled $67,412,000, as follows: Belgium, $25,000,000; Czechoslovakia, $3,192,000; Netherlands, $25,150,000; Netherlands Indies, $1,800,000; Norway, $9,495,000, and Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, $2,775,000.

44. Other large advances made under Section 3 of The War Appropriation Acts and outstanding at the end of the year were as follows: Belgium, $2,159,000; France, $88,346,000; Netherlands, $12,442,000; Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, $8,819,000; and the United Kingdom, $32,123,000.

45. Under the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan No. 1, which terminated on June 30, 1942, there was established during the fiscal year 1943-44 a net liability of the United Kingdom to Canada of $200,000,000. This amount has since been maintained as a book debt owing by the United Kingdom. Under Plan No. 2, in effect from July 1, 1942, to March 31, 1945, the net accumulated amount owing to the government of Canada was shown as $249,504,000 as at March 31, 1945. After eliminating expenditures properly chargeable to other appropriations and making allowance for various adjustments, in accordance with the terms of the Agreement, some necessarily on an estimated basis, the net liability of the United Kingdom was finally agreed to be $225,000,000.

The Financial Agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the United Kingdom, dated March 6, 1946, provides that the combined total obligations under the two plans, namely, $425,000,000, will be cancelled. The article of the agreement providing for this cancellation, however, and the article in the United Kingdom Financial Agreement Act, 1946, to implement it have not yet come into effect, pending action by the United States Congress on the Anglo-American Financial Agreement. If and when that agreement is approved by Congress, immediate action will be taken to implement this provision of the Canadian-United Kingdom Agreement. This will result in the cancellation of this item in Loans and Advances, and a corresponding increase in War Expenditures for the year 1945-46.

Investments—

46. Under the provisions of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, $25,000,000 was paid to the corporation for capital purposes. The corporation in turn paid the government $14,721,000, representing outstanding balances of loans made under the Dominion and National Housing Acts (shown under Loans and Advances—Miscellaneous). The corporation also paid $250,000, representing the capital stock of the Central Mortgage Bank.

47. The government's investment in the Canadian Farm Loan board decreased during the year by $2,401,000. The board purchased out of surplus funds $4,500,000 of its 3½ per cent bonds due January 2, 1960, and approximately $1,000 of the board's capital stock was written off to Consolidated Deficit Account. On the other hand, the dominion purchased from the board $2,100,000 of 3 per cent bonds due January 2, 1970. At the end of the fiscal year the government's investment in the Canadian Farm Loan board totalled $21,623,000.

48. During the fiscal year a further $2,000,000 of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation's capital stock was purchased by the dominion.

49. Miscellaneous investments decreased by $183,544,000. The main item in this category is the Securities Investment Account, consisting chiefly of the cost of acquisition of dominion government direct securities, which decreased by $184,382,000 during the year. Other miscellaneous investments increased by $838,000.

50. The following table gives the details of the annual changes in loans, advances and investments in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, and the four previous fiscal years.

LOAN FLOTATIONS

51. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, the dominion issued securities in the domestic market in an estimated amount of $4,565,703,898. This amount includes the net increase of $70,000,000 in treasury bills outstanding, but does not include the amount of the recurring issues of treasury bills and deposit certificates issued to refund similar securities maturing during the year. In the fiscal year $1,813,748,885 of dominion obligations matured or were called for redemption, leaving $2,751,955,013, less cost of flotations, available for government expenditures. During the year, no issues were sold to the chartered banks except renewals of deposit certificates and treasury bills. Since March 5, 1946 deposit certificates have been issued bearing an interest rate of $\frac{5}{8}$ of 1 per cent as compared with the former rate of $\frac{3}{4}$ of 1 per cent.

52. The following table gives the details of issues sold during the year, classified as to original issue by sales to the Bank of Canada and the general public (excluding the $33,293,471 4 per cent school lands debentures held by the prairie provinces which were renewed for one year).

(1) Preliminary figures, subject to revision. Amount issued includes only the actual amount received to the close of the fiscal year.
(2) Yield to investor if held to maturity, seven and one-half years after issue date, amount issued includes interest accrued during the year on outstanding certificates.

53. During the fiscal year 1945-46, the Eighth and Ninth Victory Loans were sold, both being larger than any previous Canadian loan sold for cash. The Eighth Victory Loan was sold entirely for cash in the amount of $1,563,619,350, the number of subscriptions being 3,178,275. The Ninth Victory Loan was sold entirely for cash in the amount of $2,024,711,200 (the figures for the Ninth Victory Loan include only the actual amount of cash received at the close of the fiscal year and are not final), the number of subscriptions being 2,947,636.

54. The following table gives the details of Dominion of Canada bond redemptions during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946:

(4) Maturity date January 15, 1958 called for redemption on January 16, 1946.

(5) These issues were vested by the Treasury of the United Kingdom in August, 1941. The amounts (at par of exchange) purchased in the fiscal year 1945-46 were cancelled.

(6) Total from previous table $864,000,000 and School Lands Debenture Stock, viz. $33,293,471.

55. The fortnightly issue of three months' treasury bills was continued during the year and the amount outstanding was increased by $70,000,000 to $450,000,000. The last issue in the fiscal year was sold at a discount of 0·371 per cent.

56. The average rate of interest on the dominion's direct funded debt (including treasury bills and deposit certificates) outstanding at March 31, 1946 was 2·59 per cent. This figure compares with 2·51 per cent on the debt outstanding at the close of the preceding year, the increase being accounted for by the amount of Eighth and Ninth Victory Loan bonds issued which bore a three per cent coupon.

CASH DEFICIENCY

57. The total cash deficiency of the government for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946, is estimated at $2,451,600,000 compared with $2,955,000,000 for the previous fiscal year.

It should be noted that while the budgetary deficit for 1945-46 is estimated at $1,735,703,000, the cash deficiency (that is the excess of cash requirements over receipts other than borrowing) exceeded this amount by $715,897,000. Thus borrowing from the Canadian people supplied the total cash deficiency of $2,451,600,000 although a large portion of the cash thus raised was required, not to finance expenditure but to finance the net increase in assets.

Cash requirements for this latter purpose were much heavier in 1945-46 than in the preceding fiscal year as can be seen from the fact that while the budgetary deficit for 1945-46 was $822,575,000 less than for 1944-45, the cash requirements decreased by $503,400,000, a much smaller amount.

58. The following table sets out requirements for and sources of cash as estimated for the fiscal period ended March 31, 1946.

(1) "Cash" and "non-cash" transactions are sometimes difficult to define; for example, interest payments to certain trust and other accounts are left on deposit with the Receiver General. Those here treated as non-cash are limited to adjustments to the valuation of assets and liabilities, and the amortization of loan flotation charges.

(2) Excluding the amortization of bond discounts and commissions, $14·9 million, and premium, discount and exchange, $14·9 million.

(3) Excluding the write-down of assets $25·1 million and adjustments of the valuation of C.N.R. Securities Trust Stock due to net income surplus less capital losses, $22·6 million.

(4) Includes $82·8 million re U.K. Settlement—War Claims—previously classified as Active Assets.

(5) Includes $71·3 million re U.K. Settlement—War Claims—previously classified as Active Assets.

(6) Computed by adding the 10% exchange premium to the change during the year.

(7) Excludes $154·1 million U.K. Settlement—War Claims—transferred to war expenditure.

(8) Excludes entry recording increased value of C.N.R. Securities Trust Stock, adjustment re Crown plants and write-off of Seed Grain and Relief Loans.

(9) The over-all requirements and sources are considerably inflated because the greater proportion of special receipts included as a source of cash consists of credits to certain departments where expenditures initially charged to them and requiring cash at that time, later became charges to other departments. These credits do not constitute new sources of cash nor do the corresponding debits constitute new requirements for cash; but information is not presently available to offset them in this statement.

NATIONAL DEBT

59. It is estimated that the gross unmatured funded debt (including deposit certificates, treasury bills and the estimated refundable portion of personal income tax and excess profits tax) of the dominion outstanding at the close of the fiscal year 1945-46 will amount to $16,807,178,000. Other liabilities consisting chiefly of deposit and trust accounts, insurance, pension and guaranty accounts are estimated at $2,198,478,000. The gross liabilities of the dominion on March 31, 1946, therefore, are estimated at $19,005,656,000. On the other side of the balance sheet there are active assets estimated at a total of $5,971,591,000 consisting of cash loans and advances and investments less a reserve of $150,000,000 for possible losses on their ultimate realization. If the amount of net active assets is deducted from the amount of gross liabilities, there results a figure of $13,034,065,000 representing the estimated net debt of the dominion as at March 31, 1946. The increase in the net debt for the year is estimated at $1,735,703,000, or the amount of the over-all estimated deficit for the fiscal year 1945-46.

INDIRECT LIABILITIES

62. Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the dominion and outstanding in the hands of the public, totalled $541,000,000 at March 31, 1946, a decrease of $65,665,000 from the amount outstanding at the close of the preceding fiscal year. This decrease is occasioned mainly by the redemption of two Canadian National Railway bond issues one of which in the amount of $50,500,000 was to come due December 15, 1950, but was called for prior payment on December 15, 1945, and the other, in the amount of $15,000,000, came due on January 15, 1946, and was paid off. The funds required to meet these maturities were loaned to the company by the government.

63. There were also outstanding at the close of the fiscal year, other contingent liabilities authorized by various statutes.

64. Pursuant to the terms of an order in council dated August 11, 1943, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, a government-owned corporation, guaranteed certain advances, obtained by any person engaged in the production of logs or lumber, from a chartered bank. The liability of the corporation is limited to twenty-five per cent of the aggregate advances made by each bank. The contingent liability of the corporation at March 31, 1946, was $1,515.

65. Under the terms of an order in council dated April 17, 1945, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation was authorized to guarantee certain advances and interest thereon obtained by any person from a chartered bank in order to purchase coal, coke or briquettes in the summer of 1945. The liability of the corporation is limited to ten per cent of the aggregate amount of advances made by each bank, but the maximum amount of guarantee is $500,000. The contingent liability of the corporation at March 31, 1946 was $32,032.

66. Under the terms of an order in council dated May 4, 1943, the government guaranteed bank overdrafts obtained by certain crown companies and management-fee companies doing business under the Department of Munitions and Supply. Prior to the establishment of this system of financing, funds advanced by the government to the contractors remained idle for considerable periods. The amounts of the various overdrafts are repaid monthly, so no liability is outstanding at the close of the fiscal year in connection with this guarantee. The maximum amount of guarantees authorized at March 31, 1946, was $23,590,000.

67. Before operations under the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act were discontinued (October 30, 1940) 125,720 loans had been made by banks and other approved loaning institutions to home owners under the terms of this act and the total amount of such loans was $49,959,055. The dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by approved lending institutions, but as the balance of these loans on March 31, 1946, was $98,667, the contingent liability of the government is limited to this amount. Up to March 31, 1946, 1,268 loss claims for an aggregate amount of $462,873 had been paid. In terms of total losses to total volume of loans, this loss ratio is only 0·93 of one per cent.

68. Under the provisions of the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1942, the home extension plan was started. It provided for loans not exceeding in the aggregate $2,000,000 by banks under regulations similar to those of the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act for the purpose of financing the creation of additional self-contained housing units by alterations or additions to a building used solely or partially as a dwelling at the time application is made for the loan. To March 31, 1946, 59 loans for a total amount of $109,238 had been made. The dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans amounted to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by the banks or $16,309. There have been no claims for loss made by the banks.

69. Under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, the National Housing Act, 1938, and the National Housing Act, 1944, the dominion has accepted and is accepting certain obligations arising out of its contracts with approved lending institutions which, while not expressed in the form of a guarantee, may nevertheless be regarded as contingent or indirect liabilities. On January 1, 1946, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, 1945, was proclaimed and since that date the corporation has been acting as the agent of the Minister of Finance in connection with loans under these acts.

The manner in which losses in respect of any loan are to be shared by the dominion and the lending institution was fixed by the contract. The general principle under the Dominion Housing Act and the National Housing Act, 1938, was that the dominion bears two-thirds of the loss, if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount of the loan repaid, less any other amount due, is equal to or less than the amount advanced by the dominion and one-third of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount repaid, less any other amounts due, is more than the amount advanced by the dominion. In the case of small loans (that is, loans not in excess of $4,000 in the case of single family dwellings or not in excess of $700 per habitable room in the case of multiple family dwellings), the share of the loss to be borne by the dominion is not more than 80 per cent and not less than 50 per cent of the loss. Under the National Housing Act, 1938, a new provision was added to encourage the making of small loans in such small or remote communities and in such districts or other communities as may be designated by the Minister of Finance in any contract. In respect of such loans, the dominion has agreed in contracts with certain lending institutions to pay losses sustained by any such lending institution up to certain amounts determined by the contract which are not less than 7 per cent and do not exceed 25 per cent of the total amount of such loans made in such areas by each such lending institution. Under the National Housing Act, 1944, the dominion bears the first one-quarter of the loss and agrees to pay losses sustained by any lending institution up to fifteen per centum of the total amount of loans made in any area by each such lending institution.

Loans to the number of 27,368 covering 32,612 dwelling units have been approved as at March 31, 1946, under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, the National Housing Act, 1938, and the National Housing Act, 1944, the total amount of such loans being $113,617,150. Losses recorded and paid to March 31, 1946, amounted to $2,644.78 covering the dominion's proportion of the loss on seven loans. This amount represents total losses to that date under both the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and Part I of the National Housing Act, 1938. These losses are offset in part by a profit of $497.74 realized by the sale of eleven properties. The net loss to March 31, 1946, is therefore only $2,147.04. There have been no losses under the National Housing Act, 1944.

70. Under the terms of two orders in council passed under the Export Credits Insurance Act, the dominion government guaranteed the payment to certain contractors for goods sold to V. O. Machinoimport, an agency of the government of the U.S.S.R. The maximum amount authorized was $236,000. Payment having been made for these goods prior to March 31, 1946, there was no liability to the government.

71. Under the provisions of the Farm Improvement Loans Act, 1944, the government guarantees loans made by chartered banks to farmers for authorized purposes. The amount of the guarantee is limited to 10 per cent of the aggregate principal amount of the guaranteed farm loans made by each bank. At March 31, 1946, 6,156 loans had been made by the chartered banks in the amount of $4,726,153.

The contingent liability of the government at that date was $472,615.

72. Order in council dated May 22, 1945, P.C. 3636, passed pursuant to the War Measures Act, authorized the guarantee of bank loans to merchants or business men in Halifax and Yarmouth whose places of business were damaged or looted in the disturbances on May 7 and 8, 1945, in order to enable them to make essential repairs and replacements of premises and fixtures and to purchase stock-in-trade. Sixteen loans totalling $68,000 were made under this authority, all of which had been repaid by March 31, 1946.

73. The following is a statement of bonds, debenture stocks and other indebtedness guaranteed by the dominion outstanding on March 31, 1946:

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the adjournment of the debate, I shall begin by making a remark which I am sure will carry the approval of everybody in this house; I shall be brief. I should like to begin by congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on the comprehensive statement he has made. First, we should all congratulate him upon his capacity as a long-distance reader. It is certain that this monumental document, whether for better of for worse, will be remembered for a long time. I do not know whether it is the quality of the minister or whether it is the qualities of the taxpayers; but it is a remarkable thing that, to use a vulgar phrase, when the minister takes our shirt he still manages to retain our good will. It is even worse than that, because he does not enable us to buy another one. As far as I can discover, all the king's horses and all the king's men of the wartime prices and trade board will hardly enable us to do that at the moment.

The minister takes credit, and I am not surprised that he does, because he has an estimated deficit of only $300 million. Three hundred million is a lot less than $1,700 million; there is no doubt about that. However, I think the people who are disappointed that they have not had a greater tax reduction will wish that somehow or another that deficit might have been brought down a little by one method to which I should like to refer for a few minutes, the method of economy.

I know that economy is a dull word. We only like it for other people; we like it for our wives and our children, but we do not like it for ourselves, and governments do not like it either. Speaking last December in this house, the minister spoke about economy in a way which I think carried the conviction of everyone who heard him. Nevertheless it is a remarkable fact that this document which we have heard read speaks of borrowing, taxing and expenditures, but I did not hear the word "economy" mentioned. It may have been there, and I will not say it is not, but I do say that there was virtually nothing said about economy.

I would remind the minister of what he said last December. To use almost his own words, he said, "I feel when I am trying to keep down expenditures that I have the whole world against me." I sympathized with the minister when he said that. I noticed that when Sir John Anderson was speaking on the British budget the other day he said that one of the great duties, perhaps the greatest duty, of a minister of finance was to keep down the spending departments. Therefore I am going to say one word about economy because I think the people of this country are going to be disappointed in this tax reduction. They are going to be disappointed in finding out how little of their own money the Minister of Finance will allow them to keep. They are likely going to say to themselves, "If we could only have had a little economy, perhaps we could have had a little of our own money back."

I wish to refer to two things which took place in this house, the first being the reference by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) to the civil service. He pointed out that in the year after the war, apparently with government activities petering out to some extent, the number of civil servants had gone down from a total of 150,000 by how much? Nine hundred is the figure. I will not say that the minister was not serious about economy—I think he was—but I think if he had tackled the matter of economy in the way it should have been tackled, that is by rationing the spending departments, we would have had a somewhat different situation.

Let me mention a thing that took place in this house the other day when for once we found ourselves in agreement with the hon. gentlemen to our left. We had before us an estimate of $300,000. I know that amounts like $300,000 have become so small that it is difficult for people to think about them. What was the result? We found that, in spite of all the Minister of Finance could do—and I am sure he does all he can—that item of $300,000 wangled its way into the estimates. On inquiry it turned out that last year some $6,000 had been spent. It is only fair to say that this item is for new purposes. Further inquiries showed that in the first two or three months of this year some $5,000 had been spent out of the $300,000 which had been put in. I think it is fair to assume and for the people of Canada to conclude that when $300,000 can find its way into the estimates in that light-hearted fashion, other items of $300,000 might be treated in the same way.

I want to say a word about tax administration. If I remember aright—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—last autumn he gave a firm assurance that he was going to take full cognizance this year, not merely of taxing statutes, which he has dealt with at some length to-night, but with the method of taxation. If I understood this document which he has presented to the house to-night—and I do not pretend to have taken it all in—there is no indication in it, apart from this appeal board, of any comprehensive effort to reorganize the whole method of taxation and collection. When I ventured to say something on that last autumn it received general approval even from newspapers supporting the government, and I believe it is something that is deep down in the feelings of the people of this country. I should like to read a short extract on that from a letter I got to-day:

> It is my firm opinion, and I think you will find it shared by the vast majority of those who are close to the picture, that the administrative machinery is bogged down in a mass of obsolete and unbusinesslike rulings and methods, and that efficiency and equity will be achieved only by a major reorganization of the whole set-up.

As I understood the minister to-night, he did not suggest a complete reorganization of the whole machinery of tax collection, and it is collection that I am talking about. Again, if I am correct, he indicated last autumn that that was to be done, and I beg him to see that it is done as soon as it can be done. Let me give a small illustration that came to my attention to-day. I had a letter from a man in western Ontario. He was acting for a man in the fishing business, who had just got his assessment for 1943, $5,500. He thought it was going to put him out of business. He had not the money to pay it, and he thought he would have to close down his business—that was his assessment for 1943—1943, 1944, 1945, 1946—three years ago. I know the difficulties in war time, but I put this to the minister, that this illustration shows that the thing he undertook to do last autumn is long overdue and I hope that it will be done as quickly as it can be done.

I want to say a word about what the minister had to say about the dominion-provincial conference and the offer that has been made to the provinces. I do not propose to attempt to assess the offer; I cannot take in figures as quickly as that. I am not going to speak of the merits of the offer. I hope the offer is so good that it will be accepted by everybody, because I agree with the minister on the importance of trying to find out how to work together. I think it was the premier of Saskatchewan who, during the dominion-provincial conference, used words that I wish I could remember, but they were to this effect: We have been fighting together against outside foes, and it is a pity that we now have to begin fighting with each other. For that reason I hope that this offer can be accepted.

I should like, however, to say a word about the method that is now being used, because it seems to me here to-night that we have seen the big stick used, and a very, very big stick. I venture to ask the minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether that is the way to get agreement. I want to direct the attention of the house to one or two things that happened at the conference. The conference was perhaps a little late in being called together, for reasons which some of us may irreverently think had to do with the welfare of the party across the way rather than with the welfare of Canada. But I pass that over. The conference met last summer, and then met again and again, and progress was made. Then we had that five-day meeting. Then it came to the last day, and it is that I want to speak about.

On that last day and in the very last half hour the premier of Saskatchewan, again in a temperate and reasoned speech, urged that a further attempt be made to get together. The premier of Nova Scotia almost pathetically—I do not think that is too strong a word—urged that there be an adjournment to a fixed date. The premier of Ontario said, as he had said before, that it was not "take it or leave it." The premier of British Columbia, if I remember aright, indicated the hope that there might be a further meeting. Then the Minister of Finance put thumbs down on it. He moved the adjournment of the meeting sine die, or, in other words, indefinitely, and said that the government would decide. I remember reading that at the time, and I did not understand it then as well as I do now. I thought it surprising that he did not say there would be another meeting. He said that the government would decide as to the future procedure.

The Prime Minister was there all that time. Whether we go along with the Prime Minister or whether we do not, whether we have liked all the compromises he has arranged or whether we have not I think any man would say that the Prime Minister has shown great gifts for getting people together. We may not always have liked what he got them together for. But he has had that great gift. What did the Prime Minister do on that last afternoon? I will tell you what he did. I will read the words he used. Since the early part of the afternoon he had sat there as chairman, which was all very right and proper, and then in the last half hour of the day this situation arose. There were nine provincial premiers there and all wanted the conference to succeed. There is evidence of that. Some of them had made great concessions that it should succeed. Others were in urgent need of help. They all wanted it to succeed. Nobody need doubt that. But let me read the Prime Minister's contribution. After the finance minister had moved that the conference adjourn, the Prime Minister said:

> Gentlemen, it has been moved that the conference adjourn sine die. All those in favour of the motion will please say "aye."
> Some hon. Gentlemen: Aye.

The Chairman: Those opposed please say "nay."

(No replies)

The Chairman: I declare the motion carried unanimously.

I am rather young and innocent in political matters and I could not understand that day why the Prime Minister did that. But it is clear now to anyone who is compos mentis. I did not understand then what the Prime Minister wanted, but anyone who was in that room could not have doubted that the Prime Minister did not want that conference to succeed at that time. That is the only conclusion I could come to.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am only saying that is the conclusion I came to, and I believe that is the only conclusion that anyone in that room could come to. And I did not understand it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend if he was aware that the premier of one province had already left and said that he would not return?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I was in the room.

An hon. MEMBER: You did not mention that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): And I did not mention that I was born either. I was there watching what was going on, and I am giving my impression. I was perplexed; I could not understand it. But I am not perplexed to-night because it has been made perfectly clear. Let me put it in this way. What would have been the natural thing to happen after that conference broke up? I submit that the natural thing would have been a discussion among the parties. I submit that this unilateral way of dealing with the provinces which has been proposed to-night is not the natural way; it is not the way that friends have of dealing with each other. Let me say this. The Prime Minister, if he had tried then to get those men together—

Mr. ILSLEY: We tried nine months to get them together.

Mr. ROWE: You postponed it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want now to say something to the Minister of Finance. I have a weakness for the Minister of Finance which I have to struggle against. But I think the minister was not at his best to-night when, after rather scolding the provinces for well over half an hour, he said that there is nothing to be gained by post mortems or recriminations. I thought that was disappointing. I believe the wrong way has been taken; the big stick has been used. I still hope that this offer may be so good that it may be acceptable. But I felt as I read it and listened to the minister that the provinces were being asked to toe the mark and sign on the dotted line. It seemed to me that it contained a great many stiff stipulations, and that it went quite a long way to justify the suspicions of those who felt that the conference was to some extent a struggle for power and not a struggle for money.

Mr. ROWE: Centralization.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): However that may be, I wish to say in conclusion that in spite of that I hope this may succeed. But those who are presenting it have taken an unnatural course. Not having followed up that conference, as was desired by several of the people who attended it, they have now come here and wielded what I call the big stick. If this does not succeed, it seems to me that they have taken a very heavy responsibility on their shoulders. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before my hon. friend concludes, may I ask him just one question? I was presiding as chairman of the meeting at the time, and I gave the decision—and I conceived it to be correct—that the adjournment sine die was carried unanimously. Was there any exception taken by anyone to that statement? It was made publicly, and all present agreed that I gave the only decision which could be possibly made.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I did not question the Prime Minister's decision. All I said was that a man of the Prime Minister's gifts might then and there have tried to do what several of the premiers asked to have done, that is, to try to rescue the conference. To me it seemed like a man sinking below the waves and another man refusing to put out his hand to pull him out.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Penitentiaries branch—

106. Branch administration, $133,499.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to say a word or two about production in the penitentiaries. I believe it is fitting that the men who are taking care of this work should be remembered for the kind of work they are doing. I was surprised to find how much war effort our penitentiaries made. I find in the report of the superintendent of penitentiaries, at page 21, these remarks, relating to St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary:

He has administered in a very satisfactory manner, keeping the machinery in good working condition, having in mind the production end and the training of convicts. The total production for the year amounts to $117,113.76, which is an increase of over $21,000 when compared with the previous year. There is a large increase, ($11,000), in the canvas working department, and over $9,000 in the tailor shop. Customers' work amounts to $84,654.65, and institution, $32,207.76. The blacksmiths', carpenters', shoe shop, shop M (camouflage nets) have been kept very busy with war contracts.

As I was saying before we discontinued our discussion at the dinner recess, the minister ought to have credit given him for the good things which are being done under his administration. I like to give a person credit where credit is due. It is one thing to criticize all the time and find fault. I am not so sure that that method always obtains the best results. I should like to commend the minister for this work which was done in the penitentiaries.

I notice in connection with Dorchester penitentiary, as recorded on page 22, that the following articles were manufactured for the armed services—which matter completely surprised me: twenty map cases, 2,000 paint kettles, 4,858 white cotton sheets, 8,000 soap bags, 46 filing cabinets, 2,000 pairs felt mitts. There were repaired: 813 ammunition boxes, 200 army jackets, 175 pairs army pants, 1,451 pieces R.C.A.F. furniture, 234 bed springs repaired, 4,169 pairs army shoes. Then, articles manufactured, repaired, et cetera, for other government departments, including penitentiaries branch: St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, 2,691 pairs army pants dyed, 1,000 army blouses dyed. Department of Mines and Resources, 75 army blouses dyed, 75 pairs army pants dyed, 51 army greatcoats dyed, 2,331 pairs army shoes repaired. Post Office Department: 15,260 mail bags made, 41,294 mail bags repaired.

I would suggest to hon. members who may be interested in the matter and may wish to pursue this study somewhat further that they might read about the production in the Manitoba penitentiary, on page 27; in the British Columbia penitentiary, on page 29; in the Saskatchewan penitentiary, on page 30; in the Collins Bay penitentiary, on page 33. Then, if the committee will allow me, I will read on page 40 a statement which I think it is well to have on the record, after the war:

The 1,106 convicts employed in manufacturing produced articles valued at $429,650.26, an unprecedented figure. The production of the 1,041 convicts employed in building trades and productive service divisions, including farms, steam plants and bakeries, amounted to approximately $559,865.94.

What I am wondering about is the matter I raised just before the dinner recess. I wonder how the minister will manage to dispose of such production as this, now that there is no longer a war. The minister is engaged in conversation with the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario. I am sure the latter gentleman is an engaging conversationalist, but—

Mr. LENNARD: Can the hon. member speak louder? We cannot hear him.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I could have spoken louder, but, judging from the noise that hon. members were making, it would ultimately have been to blow the roof off this house.

An hon. MEMBER: We cannot hear you now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can you not hear me?

An hon. MEMBER: Now, but not a moment ago.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I can easily make you hear. There is no difficulty about that, but sometimes I am accused of speaking too loudly. The question was this. Here is a remarkable production for the penitentiaries of the country. I do not wish to read again the passage that I quoted, but since hon. members did not hear me it might be a good thing for me to read it once more.

An hon. MEMBER: Dispense.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I know that some hon. members are weary after listening to the discussion, but this is a matter which in my judgment should have some attention, and I should like to remind some of those who glibly talk about dispensing that I have not used more of the time of the house than I am entitled to. The matter is worthy of attention. The men in charge of these prisons, who have brought about such production, ought to be given credit in this house, for one thing; and besides that, the question of what we shall do to dispose of such production, now that the war is over, is something that is of interest to all hon. members, or ought to be. I will read the passage again:

The 1,106 convicts employed in manufacturing produced articles valued at $429,650.26, an unprecedented figure. The production of the 1,041 convicts employed in building trades and productive service divisions, including the farms, steel plants and bakeries, amounted to approximately $559,865.94.

To me that is a most commendable achievement in the war effort, but it is a challenge when we ask ourselves what will be done with that production, now that the war is over. The minister, in answering the question before the dinner recess, said that he believed all the production of the penitentiaries could be used by the various departments of government. Does the minister believe that all this amount can be used by the departments of government?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am convinced that a production of commodities of even greater value than those listed on pages 40 and 41 of the report can be absorbed by the requirements of other departments of government. There may have to be some change in the quantity and kind of things produced, but I do not think we have yet reached the maximum of production that will be possible and practical in the penitentiaries. There may have to be some features of encouragement introduced, but I do not think we have yet reached the point where we are getting interested, active work from all those who would be capable of performing such work, and I believe that for themselves it will be a very good thing to bring about that situation. I believe in the value of the feeling that one is doing something worth while as an element of rehabilitation, and as we develop that we can increase the productivity of the shops we have in these penitentiaries. That is only one of the things to which the commissioner of penitentiaries will give attention. We have been employing those who have been giving training in vocational schools to give training to our foremen of shops in the penitentiaries. We have recourse to the Department of Agriculture to advise us on the development of agricultural possibilities on the penitentiary farms, and I am not concerned about that so much from the point of view of dollars and cents represented by the production, as I am about what the production means in its value to the men themselves when they become interested in doing something that is worth while.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And becoming skilled.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am interested to see them develop their skill and their confidence in their own ability to produce things that are worth while and thus to be useful members of a productive community. I think that is one feature that has been receiving attention and should receive further attention. I receive a large number of requisitions for machinery and implements to improve these factories. Sometimes I hesitate over the cost and compare it with the amounts provided in the estimates, but I get explanations from the engineer and from the purchasing agent, and every time they have convinced me that they were going to make it more probable that the particular shop would turn out things well done. In those cases I have felt it was my duty to approve the requisitions. That is only one aspect of the problem we have to deal with.

This problem of handling the seven penitentiaries is a full-time job and no Minister of Justice can do it himself. He cannot devote enough of his time to it to do personally all that has to be done, and when I asked parliament to authorize the selection of one commissioner it was to try to get someone who would go about and investigate and then advise in a practical way regarding the things that would be helpful in creating an atmosphere where men would be interested in developing their skill and proving to themselves as well as to others that they can be useful.

I do not want to take too long in replying to the hon. member's question. I thank all hon. members for the contribution they have made. The commissioner will read with a great deal of interest everything that has been said in this debate on our estimates, and I wish particularly to thank the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) for the testimonial he offered here to the good work being done in the New Westminster penitentiary. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) had made similar comment, but a testimonial coming from an hon. member on the other side in a confirmatory way does much to assist us. I also extend sincere thanks to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) for what he said about Major General Gibson. I did not know Major General Gibson, but I got from gentlemen in whom I have confidence a description of his qualifications, which the hon. member was kind enough to confirm by what he put on record this afternoon. I was told that Major General Gibson was not only a good administrator but a man with broad human sympathies, one who could select proper assistants; that he was a good judge of human character, and the kind of man who would take a plan and think it right through to the end, visualizing what the doing of certain things would produce in results. I thought that would be the kind of man who would set us on the right path to make such improvements in our penal system as we could make pending the getting of more cooperation or coordination of the efforts being carried on in our institutions and in the provincial institutions. There is no doubt that the principal recommendation of the Archambault commission would be for, if not necessarily a centralized penal system, at least a coordinated penal system for the whole of Canada.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the government initiate any plan of production in the penitentiaries? I was under the impression that some years ago a fully equipped binder twine factory was installed at Kingston but that as a matter of policy the government had to stop manufacturing binder twine there, and that some other activities of that sort had to be abandoned because labour felt that the competition of prison labour was unfair and undesirable.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know particularly about the incident referred to by the hon. member for Stanstead, but I know that labour objected to the production for sale, in competition with its own labour, of that which might be obtained in the penitentiaries by the use of prison labour that was not paid for; and I can quite appreciate that viewpoint. But I would have no hesitation whatever in producing in the penitentiaries as many of the things used by the other agencies of this government as could be properly produced there.

Mr. HACKETT: They used to make boots.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They make boots.

Mr. HACKETT: For policemen.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They have repaired vast quantities of discarded army boots for use by the penitentiary population. For a long time they have been making mail bags for the Post Office Department. I do not think there can be any valid objection to the production in this way, for the Canadian government, of things that otherwise would have to be paid for out of taxation. I think it is in the interests of the whole public, including the labour group, to have the expense of government kept as low as possible; and if the sums that have to be expended in these penitentiaries could be, to a certain degree if not wholly, compensated by the value of things produced in the penitentiaries for use in other services of government, I think even the labouring class of our population would be benefited thereby.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the minister think there could be acquired in the penitentiaries any skills which would help a man when he had to return to civil life again?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. The value of the product is important, but that is not the main feature. The main feature, I think, is to get a man convinced that he is capable of doing useful things and of providing for himself. I have seen, in certain places of detention, people who were just breaking up stones with hammers. You cannot get a man interested in doing that. I have seen them picking oakum. You cannot make a man feel that he is doing something useful when his hours are spent in that kind of work.

Mr. MacINNIS: But was that not considered part of the punishment, the breaking of the stone and the picking of the oakum?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was a part of the hard labour, because there was no other hard labour available at which to set these men.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not approving it, but that is what I understood it was.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think hard labour can be made interesting labour, and can be made educational labour as well; and I believe the job the commissioner has set himself to do is a start in the right direction. There has been complaint that this report was made a long time ago. That is quite true; and during the war I made no effort toward additional expenditure to implement the report, though we have had a number of the things recommended done. But immediately the war was over, I asked parliament to authorize the appointment of one instead of three commissioners. This gentleman is taking a keen interest in the work he is doing. He has already visited St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, and the penitentiary at Kingston. At present he is in Halifax attending a meeting of social services which is to be addressed by Mr. Bennett, head of the Washington bureau of prisons; and he is going to take advantage of his trip to the maritimes to spend a few days at Dorchester. Later he will see the others. I have asked him to see not only the penitentiaries, the lay-out and so on, but to see those who are employed from the wardens right down through the whole line, to be able to make an appraisal of the possibilities of the personnel in these penitentiaries. I think there would be useful work to be performed in the penitentiaries even by university graduates, but all the personnel need not be university graduates. Quite a large proportion of those who are on the staffs at the present time may be proper personnel, and we cannot change over all at once. But I think an appraisal of the personnel is quite as important as an appraisal of the bricks and mortar, the yards, farms and shops; and I believe we are taking the right way to get palpable results.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to ask the minister if he will convey my congratulations to the gentlemen who are in charge of these penitentiaries, because I have some sort of idea what it means to them. I should like to go on with this discussion a little further; but in order that the committee might make some progress, how would it be if we passed the one item, and then continued the discussion on the next item?

Mr. FLEMING: I have a question about one matter which will take only a minute. In the details of this item appearing at page 121 of the estimates I notice provision for a chairman of the penitentiary commission at $9,000 and two commissioners at $7,500. Does that carry with it the implication that the minister is contemplating the appointment of the three man commission this year?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. That item has been in the estimates and has been voted every year since 1938. The salary that has been fixed for the commissioner is $12,000, and I do not think it will be possible to make any other appointment of additional commissioners in the course of the present fiscal year.

Mr. HACKETT: They may not be necessary.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think it would be possible to have another commissioner who would be helpful in the course of this fiscal year. These estimates were prepared before the commission was appointed. As the hon. member knows, by order of the treasury board there can be changes. The amount voted cannot be increased, but there can be changes in the allocation of the amount. What is here will be more than sufficient to cover the additional expense which will result from the appointment of the commissioner.

Mr. FLEMING: Within what time does the minister think the commissioner will have completed this preliminary survey?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think he will have completed his survey as long as he remains commissioner. I think this is something which is capable of constant improvement. He will have made a preliminary survey within the next three or four months.

Mr. HACKETT: And advise as to some parts of the commission's report which will become effective?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 11:05 p.m.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

ACT TO BE PROCLAIMED JULY 1 AND BECOME EFFECTIVE JANUARY 1

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, among the bills to which royal assent was given yesterday afternoon was the act respecting Canadian citizenship. The government has felt that hon. members would no doubt like to have this symbol of nationhood associated with the seventy-ninth anniversary of confederation, which comes on Monday next.

The government has therefore decided to have the bill proclaimed on July 1 of this year. I might say however that while the bill will be proclaimed on that day, its provisions will not go into effect until January 1, 1947. A number of technical matters have to be worked out in connection with the provisions of the bill, and as this cannot be done either here or in our offices abroad in that brief space of time, it has seemed appropriate to fix January 1, 1947, as the date upon which the provisions of the act will come into force.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKENZIE KING—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "FINANCIAL POST" OF JUNE 29

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my attention has been drawn to an article appearing in the issue of the Financial Post, dated June 29, and which is headed, "Canada 'Another Belgium' in U.S. Air Bases Proposal? Hear Washington Insists Dominion's Northern Frontier be Fortified—'Atomic Age Maginot Line' is Feared". This wholly misleading article contains so many serious inaccuracies that I am bound to take exception to it in the strongest terms. Amongst other things the article alleges that a virtual ultimatum from the United States calling on Canada to fortify her northern frontier is reported to have hastened my return from England this month.

It is, of course, absurd to imagine that the government of the United States would present anything that could, by any stretch of the imagination, be described as an ultimatum, and there is no foundation whatever for this allegation. It is also untrue, as claimed in the article, that the United States government has presented a plan for northern air bases. In view of what I have said, I perhaps need hardly add that my return from the United Kingdom was in no way influenced by any such imagined developments.

It is a fact, of course, that the permanent joint board on defence is charged with studying the defences of North America which includes our northern frontiers. The extent to which their vulnerability may or may not have been increased by reason of technological developments in recent years, and the measures which should be adopted for their protection are proper subjects of study by the board. The board is therefore examining them, and would be remiss in its duties if it did not.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ENTITLEMENT OF CERTAIN WOMEN'S SERVICES TO REHABILITATION BENEFITS, ETC.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 200, respecting benefits for persons who served in the Women's royal naval services and the South African military nursing service.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. GILLIS: I was of the opinion that all the auxiliary services were to be brought within the scope of existing legislation for the benefit of veterans and that this matter is now in the hands of a subcommittee of the veterans affairs committee. I understood it was intended to bring in an all-inclusive bill to cover all auxiliary services. Why is it that this bill is introduced while the subcommittee is studying the matter?

Mr. TUCKER: What the hon. member has said is correct; the intention is to try to embody in one bill whatever has to be done in regard to those who were not actually members of the armed services. However, these personnel are in a slightly different position. They were deemed to be members of the armed services until it was found that the South African military nursing service was not a part of the armed services of that country and because of that technicality the members of that service were not entitled to the benefits they would have been entitled to had they been members of the armed services. The hon. member will remember that last session the veterans affairs committee recommended that an order in council be passed giving them those rights, and it was of course understood that a bill would be introduced to embody those rights in legislation by parliament.

With regard to the women's royal naval service personnel, it was found that because of a naval rule of the United Kingdom these women could not be considered as members of the armed services as were the members of the women's auxiliary air force and the women's branch of the British army. These particular women therefore were not able to get the benefits of our legislation which extended to those who had joined His Majesty's forces other than Canadian, and the bill is to take care of this situation. As I explained at the resolution stage, it is the intention to try to get legislation before the committee and have a recommendation from the committee this session if possible in connection with the other groups not actually members of the armed forces.

Mr. GILLIS: I am quite satisfied with the bill. I was simply calling attention to the fact that the case of the women who served with the V.A.D., the Red Cross and other auxiliary services was being considered by the veterans affairs committee. I did not want the impression to get abroad that we were granting rights to only two classes of women who had served and were neglecting others who deserve consideration. I want to make it clear that the subcommittee of the veterans affairs committee is now considering an all-inclusive bill which will include the other categories.

Mr. MUTCH: As chairman of the subcommittee which is considering other civilian personnel with respect to war service benefits, I should like to try to make it clear why these two groups are being considered now. The committee recommended that an order in council be passed to assure these benefits to these women. I think the hon. gentleman who has just spoken will remember that the matters referred to the subcommittee had to do with those who had not yet been granted any rights. The duty of the subcommittee is to recommend to the main committee such benefits as they can agree upon. There is no question at all of the others being ignored; their position has been considered and is being seriously considered, and in the course of time a report will be made to the main committee.

Mr. CHURCH: I agree with the principle of this bill dealing with the South African nursing service and the women's royal naval services, but there is one question I should like to ask. Is the committee considering the provision of nursing services which are so badly needed for soldiers in their homes, and in civilian hospitals? The former hon. member for Parkdale pointed out when he was here that even at Sunnybrook nursing services may later have to be used to aid soldier families. I was on the board of the Toronto general hospital for years and I know that recently they have had to close down one or two floors because of the scarcity of nurses. Is anything being done to provide nursing services for soldiers and their families?

Mr. TUCKER: We have so much on the agenda that if I were to try to deal with it all it would take the whole of the afternoon. As has been explained, we have eleven bills still to be reported to the house. I think the question the hon. member asked would come more properly under the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. CHURCH: We had a large meeting in Maple Leaf Gardens, Toronto, recently attended by several thousand soldiers who complained that they cannot get housing, nurses or anything. I would like to see the committee do something to provide the services and accommodation which the soldiers need.

Mr. HAZEN: Was this bill considered by the veterans affairs committee? I was not a member of the committee, and I do not know what the procedure was.

Mr. TUCKER: It was considered by the veterans affairs committee and recommended —I hesitate to say unanimously, but I believe it was unanimously—to the house in exactly the form in which it appears to-day.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—P.C. 6938 revoked.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are benefits given under any acts to the Canadian Wrens which are not made available to the women's royal naval services and the South African military nursing service?

Mr. TUCKER: This bill gives the same rights to these Canadian girls as they would have had if they had been men and had gone into any of His Majesty's forces other than the Canadian forces. In other words it brings the rights of those who were domiciled in Canada when they went into these services and are now domiciled and resident in Canada up to the same level which they would have enjoyed had they gone into the Canadian forces.

Mr. CASE: Do the members of these forces receive the same benefits under this bill as they received under P.C. 6938?

Mr. TUCKER: They receive exactly the same benefits.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of bill No. 199, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is good business to pass this bill in its present form. We have discussed this subject in the house for quite a number of years, and I think most of the members have admitted that we are not giving a square deal to our old veterans of the last war who settled on the land.

We had a discussion in the house in October last, in which more than twenty members took part, of a resolution to grant clear title to those who were settled on the land at the end of March, 1944, and only two or three members opposed that resolution. We are spending vast sums of money trying to be fair to people of other countries and improve their standard of living, and I think it would be very good business for us to begin at home. The amount required to grant clear title is $7,715,954.01, which is less than we spent on half a day of war. Divide the total up among the people of Canada and it would mean an assessment of sixty-five cents each. After the budget news we had last night I do not think the people would be shocked if even at this late date we passed this bill with an amendment to give these old veterans at least something approaching a square deal. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden):

(a) Striking out the word "sections" where it appears in the third line and substituting therefor the word "section."

(b) Adding after the word "where" in the first line of the section the words, "on March 31, 1944."

(c) Striking out subsections (d) (e) and (f) of section 76.

(d) Striking out section 77 and substituting the following as subsection (d):

"The government shall cancel all remaining indebtedness on account of the purchase agreement, and shall render to the persons so indebted full title to the said land," so that the bill will now read:

1. The Soldier Settlement Act, chapter one hundred and eighty-eight of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, is amended by adding thereto the following section:

76. In any case where at March 31, 1944,

(a) a person is indebted in respect of any agreement made under this act;

(b) a person has not abandoned his land;
(c) the agreement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned;
(d) the government shall cancel all remaining indebtedness on account of the purchase agreement, and shall render to the persons so indebted full title to the said land.

Mr. TUCKER: I suggest to Your Honour that the amendment is out of order in that it would impose a charge on the public revenue. Furthermore this is the first time that I have ever heard of a motion being made to amend a bill on the second reading. I submit that on both these grounds the amendment is not in accordance with the rules. My motion was that the bill be now read a second time. The effect of the amendment would be to substitute an entirely new bill altogether. It is in effect a negation of the motion for second reading. I submit that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Speaking to the point of order, the first part of my hon. friend's argument may or may not be valid. The money that might be collected from the settlers would naturally come into the public revenue, but against that there is the charge of collecting the indebtedness, and it is conceivable that the cost of collection might easily equal the revenue received. The amendment if passed would bring justice to men who have been settled on their lands so long that they are now entitled to them. As to the second point, if you, Mr. Speaker, rule that this is the wrong place to move this amendment, we should be pleased to move it in committee of the whole.

Mr. HANSELL: On the point of order as to the amendment involving expenditure of money, that cannot possibly be so, because the money has not yet been collected to be spent, and all that is proposed in the amendment is to give clear title. If this were an amendment directly involving the expenditure of money—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You will save money on administration.

Mr. HANSELL: —I could understand it, but giving them a clear title does not involve the spending of money at all. They pay for the title themselves. They have paid already.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member who moved this amendment will look at Beauchesne, third edition, article 658, he will see that—

A motion opposing the second reading of a bill must not anticipate amendments which may be moved in committee. Alterations which may be effected by amending the clauses of the bill cannot be moved on the second reading.

[Mr. Fair.]

So I declare that the amendment of the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. FAIR: May I ask one question? Will it be in order to move the amendment in committee?

Mr. SPEAKER: It will be the privilege of the hon. member to present his amendment when the house is in committee on the bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Reduction of interest rate in case of a settler, veteran of two wars.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, since this resolution was considered the other day I have been looking up the records of the house in the last few years. I take it that the committee must be an impartial committee. I believed it was; I visited it the other day, but I was persuaded that there must be something else behind it. We know what happened after the last war when soldiers went on the land. I am not blaming now any one government, because it seems to me that as regards treatment of the soldiers they are all alike. That is one of the reasons I came here in the first place; I think I made a mistake in coming here at all. By way of contrast, consider what this country has done for the builders of the trans-Canada railways—the C.P.R., the C.N.R., the Grand Trunk Pacific—the Mackenzie and Mann system. What they received from this country, including the grants of land, the numerous sections along the lines of railway handed to them as a favour, without any consideration for the taxpayer at all, runs into millions of acres on the broken and unbroken rights of way of each.

Then consider what we have done for the builders of character over Canada from the time immemorial—the rural school teachers engaged to teach in our country schools, who are left to starve on $300 a year. Finally, consider how the soldiers have been treated. I have seen a good many ex-service men who were stationed during the war at the Canadian national exhibition grounds in Toronto. Large numbers of them were collected at a sort of central Canada concentration camp for the whole of the west and all Canada. These men came from as far east as Halifax and as far west as Vancouver. I have talked to them. Some came in to see me, some wrote me letters, some of the men who were in this plight served in the last war and some are veterans of this war. I consider that on the question of soldier settlement some of them have received pretty shabby treatment. I have the utmost respect for this committee of veterans and for the various governments which have had to deal with these problems, because we have to consider also the taxpayer, but I want to draw attention to the position of a large body of people who, except for what the minister did in 1945, which applied to only a few, have never got so much as a snap of the finger by way of consideration from any government since the time when, enrolled in the Northwest Field Force, 1885, they marched across lake Superior in the time of the Riel rebellion. Some of them were Haligonians; there was a large contingent from the midland district, from Trenton, and neighbouring cities and towns; there were the Royal Grenadiers, and in Toronto the Governor General's bodyguard, the battalion commanded by that great police magistrate, the late Colonel Denison, one of the pioneers of this country, the Queen's Own, and many other units.

Where are these men to-day? They never got a cent. I admit that they were given a grant of land which they never saw and was of no use to them. The soldier land settlement schemes began, in fact, at the time of the northwest rebellion in 1885. Some of these men received grants of land in the northwest; some, up in new Ontario, and half of them never saw their land. They were in their day the backbone of the present Canadian militia. They and their children served in the South African war and they or their children and grandchildren served in the two great wars which followed it. How were they treated? As to old age pensions they were subjected to the means test—and it is very well named; it is a mean thing; it is the meanest and most contemptible thing I have ever known. In connection with the case I mentioned the other day to the committee, what did they do? They simply did nothing, and I made up my mind that I would speak in this chamber when this particular bill came up, because if this is the way the veterans committee conducts its affairs, the remnant of these old soldiers—nearly all of them are gone now, I think there are only three or four thousand left—will get scant consideration. As a matter of fact they never got a nickel out of parliament. They never even received uniforms. All they got was $6 a year for attending drills in the militia, and they had to put the money, in 1881 and 1885, in the company funds. The way they have been treated since is shabby and contemptible.

I commend the action of the hon. member for Battle River. I do not often agree with some of the views of the hon. gentlemen of his group, but there is one thing to be said for them: they stand for the underdog and they support the mother country first, last and all the time; it is not with their consent that the Suez canal will be given away or India abandoned and the dominions separated from the empire.

I repeat that I am disappointed with the present bill. I believe it should be referred back to the committee to see if they cannot make a more liberal recommendation. I was surprised to some extent by what occurred when I attended a meeting of the committee the other day. They heard what I had to say; the chairman called me his "colleague," and I am a colleague of his. I have no antagonism to anybody. But I do repeat that these 1885 veterans have got shabby treatment from all the governments. I was accused away back in 1915, 1916 and 1917 of attacking my own party when it was in power, and I admit that when I saw the shabby treatment the veterans were getting I protested against the government of which I was a supporter. When I saw the disgraceful hospital conditions that prevailed at the time of the terrible influenza epidemic, when men were forced to live out in tents in cold and rainy weather. I attacked my own party, who were then in office. I know a good many of these land settlement soldiers; I come in contact with many of them every day, and I have yet to see a returned man who has made anything out of it.

The night before last there was a big parade of soldiers to the Maple Leaf Gardens in Toronto. I was not there, because members of parliament from Toronto cannot very well be there and here at the same time. There was a tremendous torchlight procession, and the men were discussing the housing shortage for veterans, the very question that I am now dealing with. They had great banners and they marched up to the Maple Leaf Gardens where they hoisted their banners, and I saw a report in the newspapers that a Scottish alderman, John Innes, and acting Mayor McCallum and Controller McKellar were among those present. The member for Davenport was not able to be there but he was represented by another Scotsman, John Innes. Well, these men wanted to know what the government was going to do about a number of things. They wanted to know something about housing; they wanted to know what was going to be done for those who were coming home; they wanted to know what plans the government had for adequate hospitalization of the men, and for nurses. I am glad I did not have to answer for all this. They spoke the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth as to conditions under which the veterans have to live to-day, and those conditions are certainly intolerable.

I am not blaming the chairman of the veterans affairs committee. I have linked up in the past all governments with the shameful treatment that has been handed out to our soldiers. I have known something about all the governments we have had; I have known some of them a long time, too long as a matter of fact; and I know that the soldiers get nothing much out of them. Last June there was a gathering of veterans of the 1885 Northwest force from all parts of Canada, about 217 of them, many of them well up in years, and they came to Toronto for a final dinner. What did they get? Nothing. The committee before whom I appeared on June 11 have as yet not recommended anything for them. I know the reason, and some day I will state it very emphatically and clearly in this house. Some day, right in this chamber, I am going to tell why the veterans of the northwest rebellion never got any direct aid except a little under an order in council in 1944-45, for which few could qualify. I have seen their wives and children actually passing the hat. I am sorry to have to say this, but it is the truth. Why should this state of affairs go on when we have a veterans affairs committee that might be doing something for the veterans?

When I visited the committee I was greatly surprised, and I could then realize fully the truth of what has been said so often by two of the best soldiers of our country, two Victoria Cross men sitting here modestly, and raising their voices all the time on behalf of the veterans. I have no doubt that what they say is quite correct. I think the veterans committee ought to do something for these men, who went on the land after world war I, and for that reason I support the recommendation that has been made in regard to the quit claim deed. I have listened to what has been said not only by members of the house and members of the committee but by those who support the government, and I am ready to admit that the government have done a great deal for the veterans in the way of pensions and in other directions. What they have done in that regard is laudable, and in some respects it leads other countries. I was in hopes therefore that when I went to the committee I would see them making an earnest effort to redress the grievances of the men. That is what the veterans affairs committee is for, to redress the grievances of veterans not only of this war, not only of the last war, but of every other war in which Canadians have fought for their country. The Canadian people do not expect this parliament to act simply as a dead-beat in relation to the men who gave up everything and went overseas in the last war, or the men who took part in the Fenian raid, in the South African war and in the northwest rebellion. At that time they marched along the shore of lake Superior in the depth of winter to save that land from dislocation. They had to live on hard-tack, and they got nothing out of it. They bought their own uniforms and did not receive a nickel. The people are not going to put up with this sort of thing much longer. The government can vote a billion and a half in civil estimates. We all heard the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance last night. When we consider these things, it is about time that private members got up and spoke on behalf the just grievances of the soldiers.

I believe in the sincerity of the present minister, who has done so much, and that of the chairman of the committee. I have no doubt he wishes to do the very best he can for the men, and so I suggest that the government reconsider the suggestion that has been made in regard to the veterans of the last war who went on the land. I admit what was done for Mackenzie and Mann by the government that I supported, but the other government and this government did a great deal too. Those people got a hand-out from our various legislatures of millions of acres of land. They were well treated by the province of Manitoba and by other provinces. If the country can do so much for these people, why can we not do something for our own land settlement veterans? The committee would be well advised to reconsider the matter, and I hope that when the minister comes back he will take it into further consideration.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I wish to support what my colleague the member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has said concerning the bill. I trust that the member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) will press his amendment; for I certainly believe that these old soldiers should have further consideration. Speaking on the measure the other day I pointed out what had happened in my own community, where one settler agreed to pay $5,000 for a half section, which was subsequently sold to a man, not a British subject, for less than ten per cent of that figure, and the settler himself was not given an opportunity to repurchase the farm. I told of the excellent brief that had been presented by the executive of the old veterans to the veterans committee in the railway committee room this summer. At that time I questioned some of the officers, and in this morning's mail, as a result of that, I received a letter from one of the old settlers in which he states:

During the recent visit I note that on page 381 of minutes of May 6 you asked Mr. Sibley, our secretary, if he knew of any case where the dollar for dollar was conceded to civilian repurchasers, some being German ex-servicemen who had fought against us.

The chairman will remember that they made this representation in their brief, and when I questioned the witness he said he was not sure, but it was his understanding. My correspondent writes further:

At the time I was down in 1944 I addressed the cabinet, Conservative and Liberal caucuses, and stated flatly that I could provide them with proof of its having been done right in my own district.

This settler was forced to sign a quit claim deed, and the board in turn sold the land to a German ex-serviceman who had fought against us and later had come to this country. Later over the years when adjustments were made to settlers, granting them a credit of two dollars for every dollar paid, this German settler who had fought against us received the same consideration. He received this consideration because he had come to this country and purchased that settler's farm. This man gives the evidence in a letter, and he also says that he had made the statement publicly before officials of the government of the day. Surely our settlers are entitled to at least as much consideration from the government as German ex-servicemen.

Much has been said about the veterans committee. I do not know whether the public realizes just how difficult our task is at times, because the reestablishment of soldiers involves various departments of government. This morning I received a letter from one of my constituents. He encolsed a copy of a letter which he had received from the wartime prices and trade board, sugar administrator. The letter reads as follows:

The Wartime Prices and Trade Board
Sugar Administration,
Area Sugar Office
Power Building,
Winnipeg, Manitoba

Mr. E. A. Tate,
Killarney, Man.

Dear Sir:

That part of your letter dated 12th June, with reference to sugar for use in curing of meats has been referred to this office for attention.

In reply, we would advise that since all industrial sugar users are rationed on a percentage of 1941 usage, during which time you were not in business, it is impossible for us to establish an industrial sugar quota for you.

We regret that present regulations do not allow any deviation from this policy.

This veteran served in the armed forces for between five and six years, four and a half years of which he served overseas. I have sent a copy of all this correspondence to the Minister of Finance under whose jurisdiction the wartime prices and trade board operates. I do not know whether I shall be permitted to put on Hansard the language he uses in regard to the wartime prices and trade board, but I shall read the letter which he asked me to send to the proper authorities.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member carries out his threat I would ask you to consider whether it is pertinent to the bill now under discussion. The letter has to do with the administration of the wartime prices and trade board regulations.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): On the point of order, this matter has to do with the reestablishment of veterans of the recent war.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The bill before the committee is in regard to the Soldier Settlement Act, which affects soldiers of the first war, and I would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks to the bill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was comparing the settlement of soldiers under the bill with the old Soldier Settlement Act. In making adjustment to these soldiers we should be governed by what is being done here. In that sense it is relevant to the discussion. The letter is headed: "Killarney, Man., June 23, 1940."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I ask for a ruling whether the administration of the wartime prices and trade board regulations can be discussed under this bill.

The CHAIRMAN: I think it is clear that a discussion of the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board would be out of order. I think it is equally out of order to discuss veterans' affairs generally. It was decided previously when the resolution was before the committee that while it was before the committee, and likewise while the bill is before the committee, the committee will discuss matters strictly affecting soldiers who served in the first great war and took land under the Soldier Settlement Act.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Your ruling is that I cannot quote this letter now?

Mr. MITCHELL: It will keep.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, it will keep for quite a while. Let me say to the minister that the quick-freeze plant is to be operating by July 15. He cannot tell his prospective customers whether he cannot get the materials to operate the plant. If I had been allowed to do so I would have raised the question on the orders of the day. But I did not do that. Veterans cannot be reestablished unless they can get the materials they need. The difficulties of veterans have been aired in the veterans committee—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend knows the rules of the house, as pointed out by the Minister of Justice. When an hon. member gets a request such as the one referred to by the hon. member for Souris, he makes a great deal more progress if he goes to the minister concerned instead of spreading it all across Hansard. In a large organization such as that which the Minister of Finance has under his jurisdiction, hundreds of matters such as the one referred to crop up. That is true of my own department. My hon. friend, who knows the rules of the house, should comply with them.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I say to the minister that if he had been listening to me a few minutes ago he would have known that I prefaced my remarks by saying that I sent a complete copy of this correspondence to the Minister of Finance for his consideration. Some of my colleagues have done the same thing, and they have not received a satisfactory answer.

Coming back to the main argument, may I say that relief should be given to that young man. I hope that the member for Battle River presses his amendment as indicated, and I shall support him at every opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There is no amendment before the committee.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There probably will be one in a few minutes. I realize that I am not permitted to anticipate. In view of the letter from one of these old settlers, which I read, and the financial consideration that the taxpayers of this country have given to the German veteran who fought against these old soldiers and who came to this country later, I say that these old soldiers are entitled to some further consideration. I do not think there is any doubt about that. I do not know why there is a concerted effort on the part of the government to dispose of this matter as they are attempting to do at this time. If we are to consider—I was going to say—almost squandering huge sums of the taxpayers' money in every direction, why should we be so niggardly toward these old soldiers? It was they and their dependents who made it possible for us to enjoy our present way of life in Canada. We should give them some further consideration at this time and thereby enhance the welfare and the future of this nation.

Mr. MacNICOL: At first I had not intended to take any part in the discussion, but I must confess I was greatly impressed by the remarks made by the hon. member for

[The Chairman.]

Battle River (Mr. Fair). They recall to my mind a case which I had before the house on two or three different occasions. It was that of a young soldier whose name I shall refer to as Lieutenant Frank M., of the county of Wellington, Ontario, who during the first great war won the military medal, and who later went to Saskatchewan and took up land. He was financed by his father, who at that time was financially well-off in Ontario. Later because of drought and depression this young man went through trying times. I received many letters from him at that time and I brought his case up in the house and pressed for relief to be given to him so that he might hold his land. I am sorry to say that in the end he signed a quit claim deed and lost not only what he had put into the farm but what his father had put in. He then left that part of the country, and the father afterwards died.

After listening to the hon. member for Battle River present his plea I had hoped that the parliamentary assistant to the minister, who is doing a good job in piloting the bill through the house, would give some relief to these people. I do not suppose any relief can be given to the young man I mentioned, because he lost his land some time ago.

Mr. TUCKER: When did he lose his land?

Mr. MacNICOL: It might be two or three years ago. If the parliamentary assistant is interested I may be able to get him the information. I believe I took the matter up with him.

Mr. TUCKER: I do not remember it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall send the particulars to him, to see if any relief can be given to this young man who lost everything he had in the world. As I said, he won a decoration in the last war. I trust that something may be done for him, by way of either a position in the government, or something else. During the past war he acted as a guard in one of the prisoner of war camps at Lethbridge. What I started to say was this, that the parliamentary secretary is a westerner, sympathetic, and he is a former soldier. As such he must be thoroughly conversant with the trials and troubles through which many of these people passed during those terrible days of depression. I urge upon him that he use his influence with the minister, so that the minister may give a sympathetic ear to the submissions made by the hon. member for Battle River.

Mr. BAKER: Mr. Chairman, I have sat as long as I can listening to hon. members on the other side of the house talking as though they were the only ones interested in veterans affairs. I do not like using the first person pronoun, and seldom do; but I served in the armed forces for six years, as did a good many others on this side of the house, as well as on the other side.

The veterans affairs committee has been coming in for a bit of battering, and I do not care for it. We have enough fighting among ourselves, because where one finds soldiers he generally finds fighting. Eventually they get together. But when it all has to be fought out again in the House of Commons, I resent it.

I resent, too, the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview, much as I respect his age and his great knowledge. He has been in parliament a long time. I saw him here over twenty years ago, when I was a small boy. We were good enough to allow him to come to our committee so that he might present his case. I was there at the time, and with the others listened with keen interest to what the hon. member had to say. The ideas he advanced were duly considered. But for the hon. member to come here and make the remarks he did about the veterans affairs committee is just a little too much, and I resent it.

I will tell you this, that I came back from the war, but I have not yet been able to get into business. I came to the House of Commons, telling my constituents that I was coming here to try to help the veterans. I am not a professional parliamentarian; that is obvious. But if this sort of thing continues I personally am going to resign from the veterans affairs committee, because I have heard accusations coming from the opposite side of the house which I strongly resent.

Here we have bill No. 199, which purports to do something for the veterans. I am not objecting to what the hon. member for Battle River has said. He has been fighting this matter for years, and fighting for what he believes is correct. I have no recrimination whatsoever to lodge against him; he is doing what he believes is right. I am not saying I think it is right; neither am I saying anything against the hon. member. That is another story. But I do maintain that this bill is going to help the veterans—that is, if we can get it through. So why not deal with what we have before us now? Get that through; and if there is anything else to be brought up, bring it up. It is obvious that the government is willing to put this measure into effect as soon as it can.

I know the hon. member for Battle River is in dead earnest in what he has said, and in the amendment he has said he will move. I know many other veterans think the same as he does. I am trying to be frank, because I am not a politician. In my view the $5,000,000 item is not a very serious one. But I do feel that in view of what we might run into in the future, it would be a dangerous precedent to establish. We must remember that a great percentage of our national revenue is going to veterans and veterans affairs. We must keep the public in a state of mind in which they will favour supporting veterans affairs, and in which they will see that veterans get the best possible deal. The only way we can do that is to produce legislation which the public will think is fair, and which will leave them with the feeling that we are doing the right thing.

Mind you, I think the general public would probably favour what the hon. member for Battle River has said; but from what I have seen in parliament, if we start on a procedure of that kind it is apt to grow and grow. We may not feel the full effect of it at the present time. My view is, however, that in ten or fifteen years we will be going through harder trials than we are to-day, in connection with making readjustments and that sort of thing. I may be wrong in that, of course; it is only my opinion.

I do suggest that in future we ought not to lose our tempers—as I did just now—but that we should forget about the veterans affairs committee as such in this debate. We are in there, trying to do a good job; do not criticize it. We are working hard all the time—I believe it is the hardest working committee in the House of Commons. Further, we will do our best—and if there is any political finagling it certainly is not all on one side, I can tell you that. Let us get on with the business, and try to get this bill through.

Mr. FAIR: I thank the hon. member for the sympathetic and fair-minded view he has taken. I would also point out to him that so far as I am concerned I have no interest in politics. I have a much better home on the farm than I ever had here in Ottawa. I am quite satisfied that our climate in Alberta is much better than the climate here. So far as I am concerned I should be quite willing to stay at home as soon as the people in my constituency think I have given them sufficient service. But realizing that forty-eight per cent of my constituents voted for me, from a field of five, I feel that what I have carried on in the past has been along the right line, and that they will want me to carry it through to a finish.

I assure the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare that I have no political interest at all, because I managed to make a living through the depression years, and did not have to come to Ottawa to get it.

I do not wish to disappoint the chairman or the hon. member for Souris, so I shall move my amendment. Before doing so however I should like to read a copy of some correspondence which came in the mail to-day. I may say we have had several other letters along the same line. The veterans affairs committee knows at least some of the particulars of this case. I make no charge against the committee, because I know they have done a large amount of useful work, and I hope they will so continue until their job is successfully completed. What I am about to read is a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Tucker, M.P., chairman, and Mr. A. L. Burgess, clerk of the special veterans committee at Ottawa. It reads:

Dear Sir:

In reply to yours of the 3rd December, 1945, as to evidence I wish to submit to the veterans committee re the administration of the S.S.B.

(a) I accuse the S.S.B. administration of operating the S.S.B. as a criminal racket defrauding both the soldier settlers and the dominion treasury.

(b) I accuse the administration, by its actions, of openly and deliberately defying the provisions of Soldier Settlement Act and the criminal code of Canada, on not less than twenty major charges of violation.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. From what the hon. member has already read I realize that he is reading from a circular letter which was sent, I believe, to practically all members of the house, making virulent charges against the soldier settlement board. That letter was considered by the veterans affairs committee. For reasons which I do not wish to give on the floor of the house, the steering committee of the veterans affairs committee decided they would not hear the writer of that letter, and decided also that he should be asked to make his charges in a proper court, where the matter could be properly aired. I suggest that it is out of order for the hon. member to read a letter like this without taking any responsibility for it at all, a letter which has been before our committee, which they have considered more than once, and which, by unanimous consent, they decided should not be dealt with in the committee and preferably not in parliament.

I know that is not binding on the hon. member. I can see quite well that he has no confidence in the veterans affairs committee.

Mr. FAIR: I object, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw what he has said.

Mr. TUCKER: I am just making an observation.

Mr. FAIR: I ask that that statement be withdrawn, because it is not correct.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. TUCKER: I am just making an observation based upon the hon. member's action and his statement.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not necessary to have anything withdrawn. The hon. member for Rosthern must accept the statement of the hon. member for Battle River that he has confidence in the veterans affairs committee. The hon. member for Battle River has stated that he has confidence in the committee, and that statement must be accepted.

Mr. TUCKER: I am glad to hear him say that. To continue the point—

Mr. FAIR: I ask that the hon. member withdraw his remark.

Mr. TUCKER: I am not through speaking on the point of order. As a matter of public decency, here is a letter making virulent charges against a prominent public servant. The hon. member does not undertake to vouch for the correctness of these charges. I submit to you, sir, that it is improper, that it would be a shame and a disgrace if the hon. member, without taking any responsibility for what he is about to read, should be permitted to spread upon the pages of Hansard an unjustified attack upon a prominent public servant of this country from a source whose reliability we do not know. I submit that under the rules laid down an hon. member has no right to read a letter reflecting upon the proceedings of the house and containing scandalous or scurrilous matter. I submit that he is out of order. If he would consult with the other members of the veterans affairs committee I think they would advise him that in fairness to the director and officials of the Veterans Land Act he should tell the man who wrote this letter that he should have recourse to the courts and not continually spread such propaganda. The hon. member should not himself endeavour to spread this upon the pages of Hansard without having any proof of its truth.

Mr. FAIR: Now that the hon. gentleman has got rid of some of his excess speech, I should like him to withdraw the statement he made that I have no confidence in the veterans affairs committee. I ask for that withdrawal right now.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Rosthern has accepted the hon. member's statement.

Mr. REID: Have we in this house—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I ruled that the hon. member for Rosthern must accept the statement of the hon. member for Battle River when the hon. member for Battle River said that he had confidence in the committee.

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. member for Rosthern has stated that this came before the steering committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I want to get this point settled before we get into another question. The hon. member for Rosthern, I believe, did accept the statement of the hon. member for Battle River.

Mr. TUCKER: I said that I was glad to hear what the hon. member had said. I accept the fact that he said it, but I still have my own beliefs in this connection and nobody can change them so easily. According to the rules of this house, if I am pressed to say that I heard him say he has confidence in the committee, I will do so, but I have my own firm beliefs in that regard, based on the attitude he has displayed in this debate.

Mr. FAIR: I still demand a withdrawal by the hon. member.

Mr. REID: There is nothing to withdraw; I would not withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a matter of the withdrawal of a statement that has been made. There is nothing unparliamentary about what has been said. It is a matter of fact that the hon. member for Rosthern has accepted what the hon. member for Battle River has said.

Mr. LENNARD: He may have accepted it, but—

Mr. FAIR: I still demand that that statement be withdrawn. Then there is still another insinuation that has been made. I want to have that withdrawn before I proceed.

The CHAIRMAN: My hon. friend may think there is an insinuation, but I do not. There is nothing before the committee to be withdrawn. Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. FAIR: Not yet.

I ask, therefore, to be allowed to attend and testify in person in regard—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Rosthern has raised a question with regard to the contents of the letter the hon. member for Battle River is about to read. I have not seen the letter, and I do not know its contents; therefore I cannot rule upon it. If the letter has been considered already by the veterans affairs steering committee, and it was decided not to consider it, I think the hon. member for Battle River might agree not to proceed with the reading of it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The fact that it has been considered in the committee does not prevent any member of the committee from bringing it up in the house.

Mr. QUELCH: This came up before the steering committee on two or three occasions and we felt that it would not do any good to allow the man who had written the letter to come down. It was thought that if we allowed individual cases to come before the committee we would never get through the business. The procedure in the veterans affairs committee has been not to deal with individual cases. That is why we did not take up this particular case. However, I do not remember its being stated in the steering committee or in the veterans affairs committee that this matter could not be brought before parliament. As a matter of fact we would not have the power to rule that a letter sent to a member should not be brought before parliament. In view of the fact that every hon. member has received a copy of the letter, I cannot see what harm would be done if the hon. member should read it. It was definitely the opinion of the veterans affairs committee that this matter should not be dealt with by the committee, otherwise we might be bogged down with a lot of individual cases.

Mr. MUTCH: On the point of order raised as to the inadmissibility of this letter, is it not a fact that any hon. member rising in his place to quote from a letter which contains charges or allegations must vouch for that letter on his responsibility as a member? If that is so, I think it should be clearly understood by the hon. member for Battle River that in repeating the contents of this letter, which by the way I have seen, he would be assuming responsibility for the letter as a member of this house. If that is according to the rules, then I think it should be brought to the attention of the hon. member.

Mr. FAIR: I believe the members of the veterans affairs committee and the members of this committee are conversant with the case with which I was about to deal. I am not fussy about putting the whole thing on the record, because it would not look very good. If I did put it on, it would not be on my own responsibility, even though that is suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg South or the parliamentary assistant to the minister.

Mr. MUTCH: I did not make a suggestion; I asked a question.

Mr. FAIR: Having heard a little about this case perhaps hon. members will interest themselves in the particulars of it and try to learn about the kind of house this man is living in, and what kind of bedding he has in the winter time, and whether he has to sleep in a fur coat in order to keep warm. They may then decide whether that is good enough treatment for a veteran of great war I. Having said that, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton:

That Bill 199 be amended by:

(a) striking out the word "sections" where it appears in the third line of section 1 and substituting therefor the word "section."

(b) adding after the word "where" in the first line of the section the words "on March 31, 1944."

(c) striking out subsections (d), (e) and (f) of section 76.

(d) striking out section 77 and substituting the following as subsection (d):

"The government shall cancel all remaining indebtedness on account of the purchase agreement, and shall render to the persons so indebted full title to the said land," so that the bill will now read:

1. The Soldier Settlement Act, chapter one hundred and eighty-eight of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, is amended by adding thereto the following section:

76. In any case where at March 31, 1944,

(a) a person is indebted in respect of any agreement made under this act;

(b) a person has not abandoned his land;

(c) the agreement has not been terminated, rescinded or assigned;

(d) the government shall cancel all remaining indebtedness on account of the purchase agreement, and shall render to the persons so indebted full title to the said land.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I happen to be in the unfortunate position at this moment of leading the house on behalf of the government, and it is my responsibility to point out to you that this proposed amendment is absolutely unconstitutional. It is not a matter of order; it is a matter of attempting to do something which the constitution says cannot be done. Sections 53 and 54 of the British North America Act, by which we are all bound and which cannot be changed by any vote of this house, provide:

53. Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

54. It shall not be lawful—

That is the constitution:

—for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the governor general in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

We all listened with very much interest, and with sympathy as well, to the arguments adduced at the resolution stage when it was suggested that it would be the proper thing for this country to forgive the indebtedness still due by the settlers under this Soldier Settlement Act. It was pointed out that it would amount to a little more than $5,000,000, and not more than that, as a direct remission, and that that was a small enough contribution to make for the relief of the veterans in question. But that is what this proposed amendment to the bill would do directly. It was pointed out in the course of debate that it would probably destroy the effectiveness of the administration of the Soldier Settlement Act at the present time if a sum, even if it be only $5,000,000, were forgiven at this time because it had not been paid at the moments when under the contracts it would have become payable. But that just cannot be done. Citation 549 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms says:

The rule—

That is the rule of the constitution:

The rule also applies to releasing or compounding any sum of money due to the crown and to the imposition of any state tax upon the people, but not to pecuniary penalties necessary to the operation of a bill.

I appreciate that there are many hon. members who wanted to have their views on the record as being favourable to the course proposed. But under the constitution as we have it, the house cannot do what is proposed unless there is brought into the house a resolution recommended by His Excellency the Governor General. That is the situation under the constitution. I submit to you, sir, that it is not a question of order. It is not a question of a standing order of the house that can be varied by the majority. It is a positive impediment—

Mr. BURTON: Was this bill preceded by a message from His Excellency?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, yes.

Mr. BURTON: I do not recall it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was a resolution recommended to the house by the governor general and it was debated at considerable length. In the course of that debate it was pointed out that the forgiving of this indebtedness would mean directly only $5,000,000 odd; that was the amount of indebtedness which those supporting that view would like to have the country give up. But the house cannot do it under our constitution until it is recommended to the house by His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Section 54 of the British North America Act refers to the appropriation of any part of the public revenue. Is this public revenue? What about the cost of collecting it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The cost of the administration of the government of Canada frequently more than equals the revenue of the government of Canada, but that does not mean that what is collected is not a part of the revenue of Canada. That is an appropriation proposed of a part of what is due to become a portion of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It may be revenue in the future; it is not revenue now.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is an asset, for whatever it is worth, that belongs to the government of Canada, and that asset cannot be disposed of by the house without a message from His Excellency the Governor General recommending a resolution to that effect.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It just says revenue.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not going to redraft it. I am submitting that it means that anything belonging to Canada cannot be disposed of without its disposal being recommended to the house by the governor general.

Mr. FLEMING: On the point of order I would point out that Hansard does not record a message from the governor general, either at the resolution stage, at page 2818 of Hansard, or on the first reading of the bill, at page 2868. In neither case was the house informed that the contents of the resolution or of the bill had been communicated to His Excellency and that His Excellency had approved its submission to the house. Is it the fact that His Excellency gave that permission before the resolution was introduced?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member will find that in Votes and Proceedings. The practice is that notice of the intention to introduce a resolution is placed on Votes and Proceedings and there is a similar one on the Votes and Proceedings to-day. On the orders of the day it will be inscribed as a notice of government motion and it will be called and the Speaker will declare the minister moves that at the next sitting the house go into committee of the whole to consider the terms of the resolution, and at that moment the minister in charge of the resolution gets up and declares that the resolution has been communicated to the governor general and that he is pleased to recommend it to the consideration of the house. Then next day or at some later day it is called to be considered in the committee. I will find for the hon. member the reference in the Votes and Proceedings to the declaration by the minister in charge that this was recommended to the consideration of the house.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think the argument of the Minister of Justice is very strong. We have no proof, as far as I can see, that this is going to cost the country any money; in fact I think it would save the country money, and, what is more important, it would save a whole lot of suffering to the old veterans who fought in the first great world war.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Would the hon. member permit me to give the hon. member for Eglinton the reference? It has now been turned up. The consent of His Excellency the Governor General was communicated to the house by the Minister of Veterans Affairs on April 12 last; and that report is to be found at page 137 of the Votes and Proceedings of this session.

Mr. FAIR: Carrying on, Mr. Chairman, I was trying to point out that there is a question of justice to these old veterans which has never been recognized during all this time. A concession has been made—I am quite willing to admit that—but I must also point out that the concessions never caught up with the disadvantages under which these men have worked all these years. I think we should take into consideration, as well as the legal aspect, some of the humanitarian considerations.

The second argument advanced by the Minister of Justice is that this proposal would destroy the administration of this particular board. I do not think that that is quite correct, because taking this as a precedent, a man settling under the Veterans Land Act cannot claim any such deal as we are proposing for the old veterans until twenty-five years after he has settled on his holding; and I hope that this country will not impose upon veterans of the last war conditions which will prevent them from paying their debt for a term of twenty-five years, because I think you all realize that a whole lot of suffering can be packed into twenty-five years, even when these people are in the prime of life.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Apparently under section 54 of the British North America Act it is not lawful for the house to pass any such resolution or bill for the appropriation of any tax or impost to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the house by a message of the governor general in the session in which the vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed. I can assure hon. members that a recommendation will be asked for from the governor general, and that a request or resolution from the soldier settlers who are affected in this respect will be sent to the governor general from that organization. Whether he will act upon it or not I do not know. By this section, of course, the government itself must sponsor any such motion, and I appeal to the members of the government who have the interests and the welfare of these men at heart, to exert their influence along that line.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. member for Battle River, in view of the remarks made by the Minister of Justice, is withdrawing his amendment?

Mr. FAIR: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Then it is necessary for me to consider the remarks which have been made by the Minister of Justice, and also by the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Yorkton, with respect to this matter. The Minister of Justice has raised the question whether the amendment can be considered in the committee in accordance with the constitution. He has referred to the British North America Act, section 54. Before reading that section I shall read, not the whole of the proposed amendment, but the last clause, which states:

The government shall cancel all remaining indebtedness on account of the purchase agreement and shall render to the person so indebted full title to the said land.

Section 54 of the British North America Act reads:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

Now I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms", third edition, paragraph 436, where it is stated:

The recommendation of the crown is needed for such measures as bills relating to the extension of time for the repayment of the deposit which has become liable to forfeiture in the case of a private bill;

And I would ask hon. members to note the following words:

the release or compounding of sums due to the crown;

This amendment proposes that there should be a release of certain sums due the crown. It would therefore appear that it would first have to have the approval of His Excellency the Governor General. If it has not that approval it would be beyond the powers of even the government itself to make such an amendment, and I would say that the government itself could not advance a bill of this nature unless the government had first obtained the approval of the governor general.

Might I draw to the attention of hon. members a ruling which was made by the Hon. Mr. Lemieux on February 15, 1923, as recorded in Beauchesne, 3rd edition, page 541. I will just read the headnote:

A resolution that the government relinquish certain specified claims cannot be considered on a private member's motion but must be taken up in committee of the whole upon the Governor General's recommendation.

It is necessary for me to consider whether or not this amendment comes within the powers of this committee; and I have come to the conclusion, after hearing the remarks of the hon. members to whom I referred a minute ago, that it is clearly not within our jurisdiction and that it is impossible for me to allow a question to be proposed upon the motion. Again I would refer to Beauchesne, 3rd edition, at page 168, where it is stated:

"If any motion, or bill, or proceeding is offered to be moved, whether in the house or in a committee, which requires, but fails to receive, the recommendation of the crown, it is the duty of the Chair to announce that no question can be proposed upon the motion . . ."

That is an extract from May, page 505.

And I see in Bourinot, at page 179:

In accordance with his duty he (the Speaker or Chairman) declines to submit to the house motions which obviously infringe the rules of the house or privileges of parliament, such as a motion which would create or increase a charge upon the people and is not recommended by the crown or a motion of which proper notice has not been given and in such case he shall apprise the house immediately as to the rule or authority applicable to the case.

I am therefore compelled to state that the amendment is obviously beyond the powers of the committee and I cannot propose it to the committee.

Mr. FAIR: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I challenge your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no appeal. I have not settled any point of order. It is my duty, before any amendment is considered in committee, to satisfy myself that it is within the jurisdiction of the committee. If I am of the opinion that it is not, there is no further debate upon it and there is no appeal. I would remind hon. members that standing order 12, section 1, provides that Mr. Speaker shall preserve order and decorum and shall decide questions of order, subject to appeal to the house without debate. I have not decided a question of order. The matter before the committee is bill No. 199, section 1. Shall the section carry?

Mr. STIRLING: Would you be good enough, Mr. Chairman, to say under what standing order you take the view that although you have not declared the amendment out of order you stand on the constitution. I take it your ruling is that you have not declared the amendment out of order, but because in your opinion it is contrary to the constitution you have made a decision which cannot be appealed. Would you be good enough to tell the committee under what standing order you take that position?

The CHAIRMAN: I have cited standing order 12, which makes the rulings of the chair subject to appeal on points of order. This is not a point of order. It is a question whether or not the amendment comes within the jurisdiction of this committee. If it is clearly not within our jurisdiction I have not the power to put it to the committee, and it is beyond the power of the committee to consider it. I declare, therefore, that the amendment is not before the committee. The matter before the committee is the bill.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely you have either to declare the amendment out of order or you have not. If you have declared it out of order it is open to the committee to challenge your ruling. If you have not ruled it out of order, if you have raised a question of the constitution, there must be somewhere in this book a rule upon which you stand.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, did you not just a moment ago read to the committee the doctrine, as expressed in May, that if a motion is made that requires a recommendation and it is not preceded by that recommendation, the Chairman cannot put to the house any question in relation to that motion?

The CHAIRMAN: That is taken from Bourinot, at page 179 and from May, at page 505, and it is referred to in Beauchesne, third edition, at page 168. I am following the procedure therein set forth. The matter before the committee is bill No. 199, section 1. Shall the section carry?

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Miscellaneous grants—

235. Grant to Health League of Canada, $10,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is one matter of great importance to the people of Canada as a whole which I should like to discuss for a few moments, and in order to do so properly I propose to begin by referring to the subject of cancer. This subject has been discussed by members on several occasions and it will do no harm to review some of the facts pertaining to that dreadful disease.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): With all respect to the hon. member, I would raise the point that we are on item 235 which provides for a grant to the Health League of Canada. I do not know of any way in which that grant is associated with cancer. When the estimates were under consideration before, on two separate occasions, we had lengthy discussions on cancer, and I would submit that, unless there is something in the hon. gentleman's remarks to show a greater relevancy than now appears, a discussion on cancer would not be in order on this vote.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Considering the fact that the health league is to-day engaged in a life and death struggle against cancer, above all things in Canada, the minister's remarks are astonishing. There is hardly an issue of the health league magazine that is not almost filled with discussions on cancer.

Mr. CLAXTON: I would submit that the time to discuss cancer is on something related to the general functions of the department, and not on a grant to the Health League of Canada. As part of its activities the Health League of Canada may do some educational work in connection with cancer, but I would submit that this discussion should have taken place when the administration of the department was under discussion and when we had a rather full discussion of the matter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I presume that the publication of the health magazine is part of the activities of the Health League of Canada. Am I right?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very well. I am going to discuss one of the issues of the Health League of Canada's magazine.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am not going to give a ruling definitely on the point raised, but I think all hon. members will agree that if we discuss cancer under the heading "Health League of Canada" we can probably discuss it again under practically all the items. The next item is "Canadian National Institute for the Blind". If cancer is discussed under the Health League of Canada it could be discussed under the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, or under the Victorian Order of Nurses, or the St. John Ambulance Association, and so forth. We did have a fairly general discussion on that subject when the estimates were before the committee previously. I ask the committee to endeavour to confine its discussion to the definite vote. The hon. member for Lethbridge saw something with respect to cancer in one of the magazines put out by the Health League of Canada. Of course he can discuss that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I bow to your ruling quite readily, Mr. Chairman. Before I go on with the discussion I wish to suggest to the minister that this appropriation of $10,000 is either too much or it is not half enough. If the Health League of Canada is performing the function which hon. members of the committee would normally expect it to perform, then $10,000 is not nearly as much as it ought to be given. If it is not performing that function we ought to cut down this appropriation to $100 or so. I think the Health League of Canada is performing, so far as it possibly can, the function which we would wish it to perform. If I am to be barred from the privilege of discussing the magazine—and I admit I am completely in the hands of the Chairman—then probably I shall have to find ways and means of accomplishing my objective without discussing cancer.

Let us take it for granted that the dreadful aspects of cancer are all known, and that its seriousness is well known. I wish to draw the committees attention to the fact that strange maladies are developing in our society, in Canada and in the United States. Men do not understand these maladies. The discussion on arthritis, which was carried on earnestly some time ago, indicates how completely bewildered the medical profession on the American continent is with respect to arthritis. The cause of cancer is, of course, completely unknown to us at the present time. Probably there is one thing which is standing in the way of our making effective efforts to discuss the nature and the causes of these maladies. I wish to give some attention to that to-day. There is an influence standing directly in the way of the discovery and introduction of adequate treatment of some of these dreadful diseases.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I cannot see how his remarks are directly related to the Health League of Canada, which organization is getting a grant of $10,000. I think it is the wish of the committee at this time that all remarks should be strictly relevant to the vote under consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister tell us what the Health League is for and why a sum of $10,000 is to be given to it? Apparently it is not attempting to do anything, because if it does not try to find the causes of and remedies for such things as arthritis, cancer and other serious ills, what is the use of having the league? Will the minister tell the committee what the Health League of Canada is, why this committee should be giving it $10,000, and why it should not be giving it $25,000 if it is worth supporting?

Mr. CLAXTON: The Health League of Canada has been in existence for twenty-five years. During that time it has carried on exceedingly valuable work—

Mr. BLACKMORE: In connection with what?

Mr. CLAXTON: Will you please let me go on without interruption?

Mr. BLACKMORE: You interrupted me a few moments ago, stopped me from talking.

Mr. CLAXTON: I did that in accordance with the rules of the house in order to raise a point of order which I thought it was my duty to do. The Health League of Canada is an educational organization. I do not think it does any research work; I have never heard of its doing any research and it is not part of its functions to do any research. When it was first established its work was largely concentrated on educational activities in connection with the reduction of venereal disease. That field of activity was broadened out subsequently, and it did a great deal of work in connection with immunization, particularly of children, so as to prevent their taking a number of diseases which could be prevented by that means. For example, in November of last year they put on a campaign from one end of Canada to the other which secured highly favourable results. It has also done special work in connection with industrial health, with nutrition and with securing the pasteurization of milk. It is in these five fields that the Health League of Canada has specially operated. Incidentally it may have done promotional or educational work in connection with cancer, but it is no part of its function to do any research. Grants to the Health League of Canada were commenced in 1919, when $5,000 was given. They have been carried through at various figures.

In addition to the money received from the federal government, the Health League of Canada receives grants from other bodies and from the general public as well. It has a wide influence in promoting interest in health. It has public meetings; it distributes its magazine, shows, films, distributes pamphlets, and at the request of local authorities directly carries on such campaigns as that to secure the introduction of laws requiring the pasteurization of milk. Altogether it is a most useful organization, doing great work. As hon. members who are interested in health matters are well aware, it has always taken an active interest in the voluntary health committee of the Senate and the House of Commons It has been very useful indeed in helping the chairman and officers of that committee in securing desirable speakers for the various meetings of that committee which are held throughout the year. I support what the hon. member for Lethbridge said as to its being a desirable institution and I hope the committee will pass this vote.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the Health League of Canada carrying on a national campaign throughout Canada at the present time with respect to cancer?

Mr. CLAXTON: No. I think the hon. member must have in mind the Canadian cancer society, which has been carrying on an effective campaign throughout Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has the Health League of Canada anything to do with that organization, directly or indirectly?

Mr. CLAXTON: No connection whatsoever. It is possible that the health league or some of its officers may have been helpful in the inauguration of the Canadian cancer society in 1938, and suggested its formation. But I do not think its activities with regard to cancer go any farther than that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We must take it from what the minister has said that he desires no further discussion in the house this year on the matter of cancer. He does not want any discussion in any way whatsoever as to the seriousness of the disease, any discussion as to the possible means of finding a remedy, any discussion as to the activities his department should take in order to make sure that a remedy may be found, or that it would be publicized, introduced and applied throughout Canada when it is found. Do I take it from what the minister has said that from this time forward there is to be no more discussion in this session on the matter of cancer, under any heading?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is not for me to say what the house shall or shall not discuss. That is for the house to say, in accordance with its rules. Certainly the rules are clearly laid down, and the hon. member well knows that when we are in committee of supply only those matters pertinent to the item before the committee are to be discussed. The hon. member for Lethbridge must know that better than I do, because he has been here longer than I have. If there is an appropriate time for the further discussion of cancer, I would welcome it. But with all respect I must say, and I think the hon. members who have been here during the discussion we have had on cancer will agree, that we have already had a very full discussion of cancer in connection with these estimates.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I believe that the Health League of Canada is deserving of the support of all parties in the house, and that the increase in this year's estimates will have the support of all. The league is doing outstanding work, a work which I believe is not equalled in any other country. I believe that at this time branches have been established in all the provinces.

Its great work has been in the field of adult education, and its success in securing the support of the daily and weekly newspapers in practically all cities across Canada is some indication of the value of its work. I believe, too, that it has received free advertising on Canadian street cars which could be valued at some tens of thousands of dollars. Its works in matters of nutrition and in public education based on good health seem to be sound, and have received the approval of the general public.

The committee has had ample opportunity to see some of its work. Through its efforts and those of the government we have had the privilege of hearing such men as Doctor Sigerist of Johns Hopkins university, Sir Wilson Jamieson from the British government and, more recently, Professor Tisdall of Toronto. The committee will welcome this increase in the vote, and we would hope that in the near future it might get back to the figure of $20,000, at which it stood some years ago. I should be remiss if I did not pay tribute to Doctor Gordon Bates, who has been in Ottawa frequently urging members to show an interest in this matter, because the league knows that the support of public men in Canada is most valuable to it in carrying on its educational work.

Mr. HAZEN: What is the membership of the Health League of Canada? How many branches has it, and where are they located? What is its annual income? How many of its officials are paid, and what are their salaries?

Mr. CLAXTON: The latest statement in my possession shows an income of $78,811.51. I believe it has branches in several provinces.

Mr. HAZEN: One or more?

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe it is organized on a basis of provincial branches. It has a small staff of paid full-time workers.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There were two or three extremely important matters pertaining to the study of cancer and the seeking of a cure which I wished to discuss this afternoon. The minister has prevented my discussing that matter, and from bringing in matters which I consider of great importance. I want it to be known, and to be recorded in Hansard that the minister is responsible for preventing that discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: Order; I think the Chairman must assume the responsibility. It is the Chairman who must see that the rules of the committee are followed by all hon. members. Standing order 58 (2) states:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

It is my responsibility to ask hon. members when in committee to direct their remarks to the item under consideration.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I grant that, and bow to your ruling. But I draw attention to the fact that if one will go right through the items listed under the Department of Health and Welfare he will find that cancer is not mentioned in any one of them. I think that makes it clear that you, Mr. Chairman, if you so chose, could rule out a discussion of cancer under any of these items. That is a serious matter. The result is that the interpretation of items is left in the hands of the Chairman—and I have noticed that the Chairman is generally guided by the minister whose estimates are before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: I must correct the hon. member for Lethbridge. My actions are guided by no hon. member, whether he be a member of the government or any other hon. member. I am in the hands of the committee, and it is my duty—and I hope I am performing it—to follow out at all times the instructions and wishes of the committee.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not going to say more, but I just wish to have it clearly understood that it is either you, Mr. Chairman, or the minister who has prevented a discussion of cancer, and prevented the bringing forward this afternoon of matters which, in my judgment, would be of great importance in connection with the discovery of a cure for cancer.

Mr. HAZEN: I asked two questions to which I did not receive answers. What is the membership of the league; what are the names of the paid employees, and how much are they paid?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not the names nor salaries of the employees. The support of the Health League of Canada is to a large extent on the basis of affiliated organizations. A large number of organizations support it, receive its publications and the like. I have not a note as to the number of members, nor do I think there is any such record here. It is not an organization which charges a membership fee of a dollar or ten dollars. It is a voluntary organization primarily for educational purposes, and very largely supported by other institutions.

Mr. HAZEN: The committee would be interested to know the size of the league. We are asked to vote money for it, and we should have some idea of how it is constituted and of what its membership consists. What is the total amount paid in salaries by the league?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not that information, but I am sure that by using the long distance telephone I could secure that information before eight o'clock.

Mrs. STRUM: The other night Doctor Bates mentioned that a film was to be made in connection with the pasteurization of milk. Will some money be transferred from this vote, or will the cost be borne wholly by the film board?

Mr. CLAXTON: If a film on pasteurization is decided upon it would be financed by the Department of National Health and Welfare out of one of the votes for information. The film would then be shown by various means throughout Canada and one or more prints of it would be made available to the health league of Canada. The health league would also assist with technical advice in the preparation of the film. It is planned to have such a film at the present time.

Mrs. STRUM: If the health league of Canada considers that this vote is sufficient, I am happy to support it, but I think it is a small sum to vote to such a valuable organization. The results it has achieved, particularly in connection with publicity, have been remarkable.

Mr. CLAXTON: I agree emphatically with what the hon. member has said. I would point out that the work of this organization should not be measured by the size of this grant. While the grant is substantial in itself, it is perhaps more important in showing the interest of the federal government in the work, and it may be that this is useful as a spark plug in assisting the organization to secure a large part of the support it gets. For instance, in connection with its campaign on immunization it was able to secure many tens of thousands of dollars worth of free publicity because of donations made by national advertisers and others. It has an active executive head in Doctor Gordon Bates, and I think we can look forward to its doing valuable promotional work in this field.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants—

236. Canadian National Institute for the Blind, $18,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is this the same amount as was voted last year for this institute?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In view of the excellent work done by this institute is there any thought of increasing the grant?

Mr. CLAXTON: This same grant has been paid since 1931. The Canadian National Institute for the Blind, and the other institutes for the blind which are mentioned, have done exceedingly fine work, particularly in training the blind to look after themselves. This is only part of the money they receive, and the work they do must not be measured by the size of this grant.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I notice that the three other organizations which I assume carry on in the province of Quebec are receiving a total of $12,000, while only $18,000 is being given to the Canadian National Institute for the Blind which carries on work throughout the whole of Canada, including Quebec. Everybody knows about the excellent work it is doing and it is finding it a little hard to get sufficient money with which to carry on. Does the institute receive anything from the Department of Veterans Affairs for the work it does in connection with blind veterans?

Mr. CLAXTON: I cannot answer that. I would point out that the income of the Canadian Institute for the Blind is considerable, being something close to $700,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is more than that; it runs to between two and three million dollars because of its commercial work.

Mr. CLAXTON: The last statement we have shows its total income for the year ended March 31, 1944, as $675,901.20.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That would be subscriptions and donations only, but the rest of its total income is from commercial work. It gets a couple of million dollars from that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I believe the value of this vote is in the impetus it gives to a large number of men and women who are associated with the Canadian National Institute for the Blind across Canada to carry on its efficient and splendid work. I believe the head of this institute, Lieutenant-Colonel Eddie Baker, was the founder. Lieutenant-Colonel Baker had the grievous misfortune of having his eyes drawn out by the suction of a shell that passed near his face during the first great war. Fortunately the shell did not hit him or he would have been killed. I believe he has been given some other title, an O.B.E. or something like that, and he is certainly worthy of any title this country can give him.

He has done marvellous work in connection with the national institute for the blind and the department is to be complimented upon supporting the work even to this extent. I presume if they had to have more the department would give them more. I agree with the hon. member for St. Paul's who states that many generous men and women throughout Canada are happy and willing to support this institute with time and means. We have all seen examples of their work. They have placed many blind men in booths in hospitals, city halls, public buildings and other places where they are able to make their own living. They have been given some purpose in life and it is interesting to note how happy they are. This wonderful work is worthy of support by the government.

Mr. PROBE: I notice there are grants to four institutions for the blind and I presume the minister can explain why four grants are necessary. Can he tell us something of the welfare work being done by the different institutions? I know something about the work being done by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind but I know nothing about the other three. I always thought the Canadian National Institute for the Blind was all-inclusive, but apparently it is not and perhaps the minister could give us a brief outline of the work done by the other organizations.

Mr. CLAXTON: Hon. members are familiar with the fine work done by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, and I think I should say a word about the other three organizations. L'Association Canadienne Française des Aveugles is established in the province of Quebec, largely in Montreal. It carries on work corresponding to the work done by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. It assists the blind by giving instructions in the manufacture of fibre brooms, whisks, mops and all that kind of thing. Training is given in piano tuning, and employment is found in this kind of work. The association also provides the blind with free transportation and provides meals for blind workers. It organizes social activities for the blind. The grant to this association was first made in 1927. It was carried on until cuts were made, as in all these grants, in 1932, and it has since been at the present figure. This association is also assisted by the province of Quebec, the city of Montreal, and Federated Charities.

The Institut Nazareth is an organization established in Montreal. It has to do primarily with hospitalization of the blind and the education of the blind in music, classical studies, vocational training, and reading Braille. It supplies Braille books for the blind. Grants have been made to this organization from 1928 until they were reduced in 1932. Since then, the grant has remained at the same figure. This organization also receives a grant from the province, the school commission, and the city of Montreal.

The third organization, the Montreal Association for the Blind, carries on in Montreal activities similar to those carried on by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. It has workshops where instruction is given in vocational training and in Braille. There is a school for the blind, particularly for blind boys and girls. It has a home teaching and social service department. This organization has received a grant from 1927 up to 1932, when like the others it was reduced. It also receives grants from the province of Quebec, the city of Montreal, and Catholic Charities.

I am in a general way familiar with the work of all these organizations, which are doing very good work. There is, I believe, no overlapping or competition between them, and the grants have been made to them, as I have said, for a number of years past.

Mr. PROBE: I am pleased with the minister's explanation of the need for these grants. I think we are all satisfied with his explanation, and with his assurance that there is no overlapping because that is exceedingly important. Those of us who do not live on the island of Montreal, when we see these three organizations centred in the island of Montreal, naturally hope that they are not getting special favours, and the minister has given us that assurance.

A query enters my mind in connection with the Canadian grants to institutions for the blind. Does the department make compensatory grants in all provinces for educational purposes for the blind and, if so, under what vote might such items be found? People in the city of Montreal are favourably situated for receiving musical instruction and the other advantages mentioned by the minister. Do the blind in other parts of Canada receive equivalent training through institutes for the blind, that might be available to them? How are these particular grants reconciled with the needs of the blind in other parts of Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: My understanding is that the Canadian National Institute for the Blind does the job for all the rest of Canada. These three organizations in Montreal and the province of Quebec have gone on for some time, and two of them may have developed because of the difference in language. Of course, the majority of the people in the province of Quebec are French-speaking, and that may make a difference. I know that the Canadian National Institute for the Blind does give service in Quebec, but the same services are not, so far as I know, given to the same people who are served by other organizations.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I just wanted to point out the extra work that has been taken on by the Canadian National Institute for the Blind in caring for the blind casualties of the war. That is why I brought the matter up. They have a new hall in Toronto near where I live, Baker Hall, with room for fifteen or sixteen returned boys from overseas, but they have not room for the others whom they wish to take in and they have to make other arrangements. That costs money. The people of my city are very glad, of course, to subscribe. Many splendid subscriptions have come in from individuals, but it would encourage the organization if they were given a larger grant.

Mr. CHURCH: This institute, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, was the pioneer in Canada in doing this wonderful work. It is headed now by Lieutenant-Colonel Edward Baker, a much decorated soldier and patriot. He was a brilliant engineer, a graduate of Queen's university, who went to the first great war and lost his sight. He has also lost a very fine young son serving as a brave officer with the navy in the second world war. This institute for the blind is largely dependent upon subscriptions, tag days and that kind of thing. But the time has come when this country should do more for the blind. We who sit around this building, costing $22,000,000, will be blind if the lighting conditions are not improved soon because we cannot see here without artificial light. I am afraid the minister is a little blind as to what this institute is doing. It has had a hard, uphill fight, but the directors with the aid of a very fine newspaper have carried on this work right along, without the recognition it should have from the public or governments. Many of the school children of our cities and towns have defective vision. The board of education in Toronto conducts special classes for those with defective vision, and the health department of our city has spent a vast sum of money for medical services and for care for those with defective vision and other complaints.

This matter of the blind is a national question affecting every country in the world. Blindness is the worst affliction that can happen to anybody, and all we are granting is a measly $18,000. A deputation going to New York over the week-end would spend that much. Every Tom, Dick and Harry, who wants to, can take a joy ride at the public expense nowadays. I am not objecting to trips. I have no time for any myself. We had a parsimonious controller, Controller Foster, afterwards mayor, in Toronto at one time. He was a member of this house for some time, and he used to call these trips "joy rides". They may not be altogether joy rides. Some of those going on these joy rides ride in chariots, others in planes, others in trains, none on foot. We cannot afford to spend all the money we do on conventions and curtail necessary work such as for the blind with pin-money. In last night's Citizen there is a picture of the Minister of Health and Welfare going to a convention in New York, accompanied by a whole retinue of A.D.C.'s, and so on. I do not object to trips, but I think they have been overdone, especially when people want retrenchment. I wonder whether parliament has any conception of its obligations to the men, women and children of this country who are suffering from the disease of blindness, and the number of soldiers and soldiers' children who require help. It is a national problem. I am not opposed to large expenditures for this national health department. It should be one of the main departments of the public service because, after all, what is life to anybody who has lost his health? This department should be expanded until it becomes the main department of the public service.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have had to remind other hon. members—

Mr. CHURCH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for calling it to my attention. It is a measly $18,000; it should be $180,000.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants—

241. Victorian Order of Nurses, $13,100.

Mr. LENNARD: Having had a great regard over the last few years for the splendid work which is being done by the Victorian Order of Nurses, knowing what a magnificent work they are doing across Canada, I should like to draw to the attention of the minister one or two facts in connection with this organization.

First, I feel that the grant is altogether inadequate. It was instituted some ten years ago and has never been increased; at least I believe the grant was the same in 1934 as it is to-day; and the order has increased considerably since then, and deserves far greater support.

Let us for a moment consider the following facts. The number of Victorian Order branches is 101. Of these, twenty-seven have been organized during the last ten years since the grant was set up.

The number of patients served during 1945 was 100,118. The number of visits made during that year was 756,984; of these 50 per cent were free and 18 per cent were part paid.

Home nursing service is provided for patients on returning from hospitals, thus releasing hospital beds for more acutely ill patients.

The federal grant has been $13,100 per annum since 1934. The number of branches has increased by 36 per cent during the last ten years. Revenue has been considerably reduced by declining interest rates and more especially by depletion of capital funds to cover operating deficits. Expenses have increased sharply with expansion of service, and it has been necessary since 1934 to offer scholarships and uniform allowances in excess of $70,000 to attempt to maintain and build up a force of skilled public health nurses to ensure an efficient and adequate nursing service throughout Canada.

The Victorian Order of Nurses is financed by assistance from several sources, such as fees from patients, fees from insurance companies, government grants, public and private subscriptions and donations; and to give the committee some idea of the necessity of more funds to carry on this great service, the financial statement shows that in 1945 excess expenditure over revenue was $42,575.38. Just at this moment it is possible to carry on by making up this amount by using capital from endowments.

To save time, and with the unanimous consent of the committee, I have a financial statement which I should like to place on Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. LENNARD: The statement is as follows:

Victorian Order of Nurses for Canada
National Office
Ottawa

Excess Expenditure over Revenue—General

Year
1936	$4,114 90
1937	6,775 17
1938	8,022 71
1939	1,978 13
1940	566 89
1941	66 49
1942	3,277 52
1943	7,504 28
1944	11,772 12
1945	42,575 38
1946 Estimated deficit	46,550 00

Sharp increase in deficits from 1942 were chiefly due to payment of:

Scholarships	$ 4,800
Scholarships	6,150
Scholarships	24,350
Uniform allowances	5,025
Scholarships	25,000
Uniform allowances	6,000

These deficits have had to be covered by drawing on capital, thus depleting one of the main sources from which operating revenue is obtained.

I would urge the minister to give further consideration to increasing this grant when he is considering the estimates for next year.

Item agreed to.

General—
244. General administration, $94,369.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps we might revert to item 228.

The CHAIRMAN: Before we proceed with item 244 does the committee wish to revert to vote 228?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Item stands.

Welfare branch—
228. Administration, $1,961,250.

Mr. FLEMING: When the committee rose on this item on Monday last there was a suggestion that the minister might review the item of $300,000 to be found on page 168 of the estimates under the heading "professional and special services." Is the minister now in a position to make a statement with reference to that item?

Mr. CLAXTON: When this item was before the committee before, I did endeavour to explain, to the best of my knowledge at the time, how it was arrived at. I might tell the committee that at that very moment the deputy minister of welfare was in Halifax meeting a number of representatives of welfare organizations and some of the provincial officers and was actually discussing the organization of this work.

This vote is designed to cover payments not provided for in other votes for salaries but largely to be made to people outside the government services in connection with the investigation of cases where it has been reported to us, or where we have got knowledge, that the family allowance money is not being properly applied by a parent. Hon. members will appreciate that, with 1,420,233 families in receipt of family allowances, there is bound to be a number about which the information on file is not complete, so that a further investigation is required. There are also cases about which there has been a suggestion or a report that the money is not being applied for the welfare of the child. If we did not have a service to do this work I am sure hon. members would feel that we were neglectful of our duty. I think all hon. members see the necessity of having an item of this kind, and the one question really is, how much is needed for the purpose?

The basis on which the estimate was prepared—and I would recall again to hon. members the fact that estimates are prepared in November of each year—was this: the dependents' allowance board and the dependents' board of trustees were agencies of the federal government which had under administration large sums of money which were paid to dependents of members of our armed forces. At one time the figure was as high as 550,000 to 600,000 recipients. It was a large-scale operation, and there it was found necessary to investigate a considerable number of cases. The basis of payment for these investigations varied, but usually it was $3.50 for each report, plus seven cents a mile for travel necessitated in making the report. It was figured that the average cost of making reports was $5, and when the dependents' board of trustees came into existence it made a standard payment of $5 for each report. That figure was taken by the officers of the department and discussed with welfare workers and others who had expert knowledge; it was found to be a suitable figure, and in arriving at our estimates in making the arrangements which we have already made it was done on the basis of $5 a report.

The next question was, how many cases would we be likely to have? In discussions with those who had the most experience in this field, it was found that we might expect to have as many as three per cent of the total number of families about whom reports would be required each year on one ground or another. That figure was considered to be a good estimate. The dependents' allowance board had in one year 38,000 referals, as they are called, or 7½ per cent. We estimated, however, that it would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of 3 or 3½ per cent. On that basis we entered into an arrangement with Nova Scotia on the 1st of November under which the province undertook to make these investigations in consideration of a payment of $5 for each report, and it received a guarantee of $1,050.

Mr. BRACKEN: For what time?

Mr. CLAXTON: Per month. In Nova Scotia we are making payments to 76,473 families, and this payment of $1,050 a month represents about 3·3 per cent of the families there. On that basis we would require $230,000 yearly for reports across Canada. The figure of $300,000 was set down as including not only that $230,000, but also payments that might have to be made in connection with the administration of family allowance payments where there was no father, no mother, no children's aid society or anyone else responsible for the child. In such cases it has been found necessary to make some payment to an individual or to an agency for making a report and for handling the money, and on the basis of experience in this field it was considered that might amount to $50,000. The balance was considered as needed for administration.

When hon. members call attention to the fact that our expenses during the year ended March 31, 1946, were only about $6,000 under this item, I would point out that these expenses were only made in respect of the province of Nova Scotia and only made for a period of four months. If you apply even that expenditure of $6,000 to Nova Scotia for the full year and then take that figure as the one which is proper for all Canada, you have to multiply the $6,000 by 50. In other words, the payment to Nova Scotia is for about one-third of the year, and it is in respect of something like one-twentieth of the population. So that, to apply the Nova Scotia payment to all of Canada for a full year we should multiply the expenditure for Nova Scotia by 50. This brings us the figure of $300,000 which we seek for this year.

Hon. members will appreciate that this is not an easy service to establish on a sound basis. We gave it careful consideration before making the agreement with Nova Scotia and did not proceed with agreements with other provinces, or undertake to set up services in other provinces, until we had gained more experience. On the basis of the experience we have, we have now made arrangements with Manitoba and British Columbia and are considering what should be done in the other provinces. Our experience, I should tell the committee in all frankness, is that this figure of three per cent which we estimated might be the proportion of cases requiring investigation seems to us now, on the basis of our experience so far, a high estimate. It certainly will not be exceeded and we hope it will be very much reduced. I believe that the amount sought now in the estimate, in the light of this explanation, is justified in view of our lack of experience of anything that would warrant less. In other words, the figure is arrived at on the basis of past experience available. If our experience proves better than past experience, then we shall certainly not spend this sum and shall come back in another year and ask for less.

Mr. FLEMING: With all deference to the minister, the statement he has given us to-day has not, I suggest, contributed very much to the real information of the committee concerning the item. What the minister has said to-day has been largely a defence of the fact that he brought the item into the house in this large amount, and as to how it came about. The factors on which he has proceeded were taken into consideration seven or eight months ago, but that is not the situation with which we are dealing at the present time. It is not what was in the minds of the officials when they made up the item in November, 1945. The committee is going to consider the situation as we find it to-day. What is the situation? The fact of the matter is that, for the months of the last fiscal year during which this money was being used, a total of $5,995 was expended. We had it from the minister on Monday last that in the first two months of this fiscal year a total of $5,000 was expended out of $300,000. But what advantage do we derive from the minister's multiplication exercise on the basis of this service being in operation in all provinces for twelve months of the year? That is not the situation that exists. The minister has sought to defend the miscalculation in the need in this respect by saying that he had an agreement with only one province in the fiscal year 1945-46. But at the present time the dominion has agreements with only three of the provinces, and they are not the largest provinces, at that. We are not told what type of investigation is planned by the dominion in respect of the provinces with which the dominion does not sign agreements. Are we to infer that this money is to be required only in the case of provinces with which the minister enters into agreements? If so, the case that the minister has made out is a case for a very small amount indeed.

May I say with all possible emphasis that the case made out to-day in substantiation of an estimate of $300,000 is a case which, on examination, will not justify the expenditure of more than $25,000 or $50,000. We are not concerned with multiplication on the basis of a situation which does not exist; we are concerned with the situation as it exists to-day. Agreements have been made with three provinces. One-quarter of the fiscal year has passed. This investigation service has not been established in six other provinces. In the face of that the minister still asks the committee to approve the appropriation of $300,000. For my part I wish to protest against an appropriation being sought in that way.

Mr. GILLIS: May I get a little information from the minister on the matter just discussed by the hon. member for Eglinton. Is he right in assuming that the investigations referred to will be carried out only in provinces where there are agreements?

Mr. FLEMING: That is not so.

Mr. GILLIS: That is the whole basis of his argument.

Mr. FLEMING: No, it is not.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not quarrelling with the hon. member; I merely wish to get the record straight. The minister defends the estimate on the basis of the fact that the agreement will be extended to include all the provinces. That is what he said the other day. To-day the hon. member for Eglinton comes back and says that the appropriation is too large and that there is no agreement with six of the provinces. It is possible that there will be no agreement with Ontario and Quebec, particularly if they follow the attitude adopted at the dominion-provincial conference. As I understand it, the Family Allowances Act applies to all the children of Canada with one exception, and I shall argue that point with the minister at some future time. Whether there is an agreement with the provinces or not, I think the investigations set up by the government are necessary, and family allowances should be applicable to all provinces whether the premiers of those provinces like it or not. Am I right in assuming that?

Mr. CLAXTON: Certainly. I must say I can understand the attitude of the hon. member for Eglinton, but he says that the estimate is not dealing with the situation which exists to-day. The item is to cover, not the service we have to-day, but a system which is in full operation, and which we are aiming to put into full operation as soon as we can do it in a sensible way. I must say that we are glad we did not go ahead and set up the kind of system we had in mind at one stage, which would have led to great expense, much more than $300,000. We were cautious about it and worked it out with one province. I think we gave them too high a guarantee. We do not expect to give any further guarantees.

But just take it as it is. The payment to Nova Scotia will be $12,600 per annum. Nova Scotia represents one-twentieth of the population of Canada, and we have to provide a service for all of Canada. In provinces other that Nova Scotia, Manitoba and British Columbia, we do these investigations now, in so far as they are necessary, through our own staff. But we believe that with changing conditions and the continued payment of family allowances, we ought to give a better service. We intend to give a service which will go right across Canada and which will, by one means or another, get precisely the same type of report in every part of Canada. In some provinces it will be done directly through the provincial agencies; but some provinces have not agencies of the kind which can do that work. In other provinces it will be more economical for us to make arrangements either with individual agencies directly or else even conceivably to employ personnel of the federal government. We want to do what is sensible and do the job with as little expenditure of money and as little trouble to the people as we can.

When the hon. member suggests that $25,000 or $30,000 would be enough—

Mr. FLEMING: I said $25,000 or $50,000.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. I have to point out that we are spending $12,600 in Nova Scotia, a province having one-twentieth of the population of Canada. With all respect, I point out that the amount mentioned by the hon. member is not enough. If we can get this service established just as quickly as we can on the basis of our experience, then we are going to need a large sum of money. How much it is I do not think anyone can tell on the basis of experience to-day. But for a full year it will be $300,000, or something in that neighbourhood. How much less than $300,000 it will be for this year I just cannot say, because it depends on how quickly we can get the job done and how cheaply we can do it. Therefore I would ask the committee to pass this vote in the light of the explanation given. To set down a lesser sum than $300,000 would be misleading. I can assure

hon. members that we shall spend just as little as we can to do the job as speedily as we can.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has made reference to the agreements with Nova Scotia, Manitoba and British Columbia, and said that they provided for an investigation service at an agreed fee per case. I do not think he has said that that was all that the agreements provided for.

Mr. CLAXTON: I think that is all.

Mr. FLEMING: Do the agreements not go any farther than simply providing for an investigation service at a fee per case?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. FLEMING: The next question has to do with efforts made to negotiate agreements with the other six provinces. Would the minister tell us briefly what negotiations have been undertaken in that respect, and what progress has been made?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Welfare branch—
228. Administration, $1,961,250.

Mr. FLEMING: I had asked one or two questions before six o'clock. Is the minister in a position to answer?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. The hon. member for Eglinton asked about the situation with regard to possible arrangements with provinces other than Nova Scotia, Manitoba and British Columbia, where we already have arrangements for family allowance investigations.

As hon. members know, the situation in each province differs in some respects at least from that in other provinces, with regard to the kind of organization they have set up to deal with social welfare problems. Just as the laws themselves differ, so do the organizations differ. It is not possible for me to go any farther than I have in describing the kind of arrangements we hope to make so as to secure adequate service in this respect in every province in Canada and in every part of Canada. In view of the variations between provinces it is not possible to arrive at identical agreements with regard to each province. All I can say is that discussions are taking place and the matter is being considered so that by one means or another we shall have adequate service provided in each province.

The hon. member for St. John-Albert asked questions about the Health League of Canada which I promised to answer. There are fifty-one organizations which have representatives on the council of the Health League of Canada, and a number of additional associations have close affiliation with branches of the league in different parts of Canada. I was asked by him, too, about the size of the staff. I find there are approximately twenty-five members on the staff of the Health League of Canada, with a payroll of about $40,000 a year.

They have divisional heads dealing with the five main objects of the association, namely venereal disease control, industrial hygiene, pasteurization, nutrition and immunization.

Since we are now dealing with family allowances, with the consent of the committee I should like to complete the information I put on Hansard last week regarding family allowance payments and statistics during the first eleven months of operation. At that time I said we hoped to get the figures for the final month, that is June, 1946, at a date which I thought might have been some time next week. I am happy to be able to say that we have those figures this evening and, with the unanimous consent of the committee, I shall place on Hansard the one table of statistics based on June, 1946, with respect to family allowance payments; in a second table, statistics showing the distribution by provinces, and in the third, a classification of families by number of children, based on family allowances paid in June, 1946. This information is given by provinces. The tables are as follows:

It is only right that I should say it is really a remarkable feat of the treasury officials who are primarily concerned in the preparation of this material that when the last cheque was issued from regional offices in the nine provinces on June 22, making the twelfth payment of family allowance cheques, the information should be available in this form to-night, six days later, so as to complete the record for the full year. We will, as soon as we can, relate the additional figures I have just filed to those filed with regard to the first eleven months, and issue those so as to give a complete statistical account of family allowance payments for the first year of operation.

If I might, I would make a further comment on something said this afternoon by the hon. member for Broadview. Ordinarily one would not take the time to comment on anything he might say with regard to representation at an international conference, or anything of that kind. However, in view of his remarks and the newspaper photograph he was showing, which I understood was a photograph of the Canadian delegation to the world health conference which is now being held at Hunter college in New York, I wish to say this. His references to joy rides or something of that kind might ordinarily be ignored, but on this particular occasion there were included in the Canadian delegation three distinguished doctors. I refer to Doctor Charles W. McMillan, president of the Canadian Public Health Association; Doctor T. C. Routley, executive secretary of the Canadian Medical Association, and Doctor Groulx, health officer of the city of Montreal. Everyone who knows anything about public health in Canada will recognize them as being outstanding in their fields.

These gentlemen consented to become part of the Canadian delegation. They went to New York without remuneration and arrived there before the conference began so as to become familiar with its work. They have put in long hours in loyal service to the people of Canada. I would not mention this except that I have worked with them and I feel that they might misconstrue what has been said by the hon. member for Broadview. I am sure the hon. member had no such intention. In referring to this department he stated his desire to see it become the major department in the service of the people of Canada, which I think indicates his intentions.

When conferences such as this are being held, at which representatives of Canada work with representatives of other nations to arrive at a basis of international cooperation, it is important that on technical subjects we should be able to secure the attendance of not only representatives of the government and of the civil service of Canada but outstanding representatives of other fields of endeavour. It will not be easy for any government in Canada to secure that representation if remarks such as those that were made this afternoon are allowed to go uncontradicted.

These gentlemen are outstanding. They have worked long hours day by day through the heat of New York and they have done an outstanding job for Canada. We hope we shall be able to secure the services of equally distinguished people to assist Canada in making an effective presentation of her case at world conferences when it is our duty to attend such conferences. To serve Canada these gentlemen have sacrificed time that would have been spent on their own businesses or a well-earned holiday.

Attendance at one of these conferences is nothing in the nature of a "joy ride." Nor is it a joy ride to spend two or three days in New York and then try, during the remainder of the week, to do the work which would ordinarily be done in the whole week. It is no joy ride to work long hours with representatives of other countries, and it is no joy ride to spend yourself, as these gentlemen have been spending themselves, in the interests of their fellow Canadians and of mankind.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has not told us what steps are being taken by the department in the absence of agreements with the other six provinces with reference to investigations. I would ask him to tell us briefly of the plan he is following in provinces with whose governments there is no agreement.

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe I said this afternoon, perhaps not sufficiently fully, that in each province we have a regional office which has to do with family allowance administration, and in those offices are a number of people who deal with these cases. In Prince Edward Island most of the cases have been dealt with by Major Nicholson, the regional director. In the larger provinces welfare supervisors have been appointed and these investigations are made by permanent employees under their direction. We are assisted greatly by the voluntary work of representatives of children's aid societies, welfare organizations, churches, municipalities and other bodies. So far, this voluntary assistance has enabled us to do part of the job, but as we go along we shall either make arrangements with the provinces that have welfare organizations or engage our own staff to complete the picture so as to give service in every part of Canada.

Mr. PROBE: On May 31 when the estimates of this department were before us the hon member for Yorkton brought to the minister's attention what looked like a case of maldistribution in departmental personnel across the country. He pointed out that of 197 persons in one branch of the department there was only one stationed in Saskatchewan, a province that is trying to take large forward steps in the field in which the minister is interested. We have in Saskatchewan one-half of one per cent of the staff doing this type of work throughout the dominion, for a population totalling seven per cent of the country as a whole. That does not suggest a fair distribution of the department's personnel.

I cannot find fault with the Minister's explanation to the hon. member for Yorkton, but his reply made me curious about the staff in Regina which handles family allowances. I happen to know a number of the persons employed in that branch and I can say that many of them have not had previous experience in national health and welfare work. I presume they have been selected for their administrative qualities.

The details of this item show an amount of only $63,270 for the permanent staff in the family allowances division, while $774,480 is being provided for temporary assistance and $225,000 for what is called casual labour. Is provision to be made in the future for a larger proportion of permanent employees? It seems to me that we have too much of the temporary and casual type of help in a large number of departments. The establishments are not sufficiently well organized that permanent employees can be appointed after examination by the civil service commission. Would the minister give the number of persons employed by his department at Regina, both permanent and temporary employees, together with any recent figures he has on the employment of casual labour?

Mr. CLAXTON: The number of employees in the health branch of the department in Saskatchewan is four on a permanent basis and ten on a temporary basis, making a total of fourteen. In the welfare branch, all related to family allowance administration, there are thirty-eight temporaries, and the establishment of that regional office is forty-five.

As I have explained before, and as hon. members know, in a department which is just being set up the practice is to create almost all positions as temporary until it is found that they are really necessary to do the job. Then they are made permanent positions and permanent appointments are made to those posts. The reason why we have a considerable number of casual assistants was that in undertaking the work of registration and verification of families for the family allowance we had to deal right at the outset with all the children in Canada under sixteen years of age, that is with sixteen years of children, whereas once the system gets going we have only to deal with the children born each year. In other words, the administrative problem at first was one of dealing with something like sixteen times the normal load.

Mr. PROBE: Did not the women's voluntary services assist considerably in that work?

Mr. CLAXTON: Very much so. But as I was going on to say, in order not to create a permanent establishment very much larger than was necessary to do the job, we employed people in every regional office on a casual basis, as it is called. The hon. member for Regina City has referred to the great help given by various agencies, particularly women's voluntary services in the different capitals of the provinces of Canada during the time of registration, and I myself have already referred to that in previous discussions of this subject. We were very fortunate to secure in every province the assistance of large numbers of women volunteers to assist in the preliminary work of opening envelopes, sorting applications and doing the preliminary processing of them. The number of people who assisted in that way was several thousand. Had it not been for that assistance it would have been difficult indeed to begin payments as we did on July 18, 1945. Once the preliminary work of processing applications was done, however, we did not look to voluntary assistance any further. But again I pay tribute to the great help we received in that way.

Mr. PROBE: There is another feature I would mention. In some of the offices casual labour in certain age groups is employed which perhaps is not entirely justified by labour market conditions. For instance, a person was employed who was seventy-eight years old, and another was drawing the children's allowance while employed by the department, if my information is correct. I think some regard to age should be paid in taking on even casual assistants. I presume that all those appointed to the temporary staff in the Regina city office have qualified by passing civil service examinations?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right. As to casual assistants, if the hon. member has any names or suggestions as to people who are not efficient, I shall be glad to have them. But at the time when this job was undertaken more than a year ago it was not so much a question of selection as it was of getting almost anyone who could do almost any kind of work at all. Gradually the staff has been worked into a pretty coherent whole and it is doing a good job.

Mr. PROBE: I presume the fact that one of the casual assistants was receiving the children's allowance in her own behalf would not be a bar to employment?

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. PROBE: What about the employment of persons in the very senior age group, say a person of seventy-eight?

Mr. CLAXTON: I must say that I have never heard of anyone who was seventy-eight in any civil service position.

Mr. PROBE: I should like to discuss that with the minister some time.

Mr. CLAXTON: Hon. members know it is difficult for some of those who are sixty-five years of age or so to secure appointment to any position in which there is any competition at all, because of the retirement at age sixty-five rule which ordinarily applies.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister put on the record the numbers on the temporary and permanent staffs for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia for the two branches of his department?

Mr. GILLIS: Why not make a job of it and give the figures for all of Canada.

Mr. CLAXTON: With the consent of the committee I shall be very glad to do that.

The CHAIRMAN: Has the minister unanimous consent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. CLAXTON: This table shows the staff distribution by permanents and temporaries as at March 31, 1946. I gave a figure of thirty-eight a little while ago as the total of permanents and temporaries for Saskatchewan. That was as of March 15, 1946. The figure in the table for March 31, 1946, is thirty-six, showing a decline of two in the total staff in those two weeks. I should make this further explanation, that the table includes the total staff of the department. The figures for the welfare branch include the headquarters staff and the staff additional to that engaged on family allowance. In all the provinces the figures for the welfare staff are the staff exclusively engaged on family allowance administration. We have no welfare staff in any province beyond that engaged in family allowance administration.

Mr. FLEMING: On another aspect of this item, it will be recalled that at page 2764 of Hansard, the minister, in dealing with costs of administration of family allowances, included costs from three departments: his own, $1,850,000; Department of Public Works, $80,000; treasury, $1,944,000; or a total of $3,874,000, including $636,000 for postage paid by the treasury on family allowance cheques. I should like to ask the minister if that is a complete summation in all respects of the cost of administration. Is there no cost, for instance, in the Department of National Revenue in connection with the adjustment in respect of income tax exemptions? Is there any cost in the Department of Trade and Commerce, either there or through payments made to the provinces, in connection with vital statistics information and birth certificates? Is there any expense in connection with the administration of the Department of Mines and Resources on family allowance work—or in any other department?

Mr. CLAXTON: With regard to the Department of National Revenue, that is not an expense against family allowance administration. There is, as the hon. member knows, a pay-back by some of the recipients of family allowances on account of the adjustment between income tax and family allowances, but there is no additional cost of family allowance administration there. With regard to the Department of Trade and Commerce, in respect of the vital statistics branch of the dominion bureau of statistics, all the items which relate to family allowances are paid for out of the family allowance vote. We make a payment to the dominion bureau of statistics for the services they render in this connection. With regard to Mines and Resources, in connection with family allowance payments to Indians and Eskimos, there is no additional payment. We have at Ottawa a regional office of family allowances dealing with family allowance payments for the northwest territories and the Yukon, and we there record the registrations, verify the births and issue the payments. It is of course possible that the burden on the Mines and Resources staff has been increased by reason of the fact that they have to help in the administration of family allowances payable to Indians and Eskimos in the northwest territories and the Yukon and also in other parts of Canada. They have assigned one of their officers to act as liaison officer in this connection, but he was previously an employee of the department. Consequently there is no additional expense in Mines and Resources, identifiable as such, though possibly it could be worked out that some part of the overhead of the department might be applicable to this extra work.

Mr. FLEMING: Has any thought been given to compensating the private welfare agencies for the additional work which has been cast upon them in the course of administering family allowances? I am thinking in particular of children's aid societies. Undoubtedly in the administration of family allowances through these societies there has been a great deal of extra expense incurred by them, and it would be only fair that they should receive some compensation for their extra work.

I have before me an extract from the report of the Children's Aid Society of the city of Toronto for the year ended September 30, 1945. Mr. Mills, the general superintendent, after speaking approvingly of the recent increase of $4 a month in the rate for the foster homes made possible by the family allowances, said in his report to the annual meeting that, "other than this, the family allowances have brought little, if any, relief to our funds, as they are deposited in a trust fund for each child, expenditures from which are required for additional benefits. The bookkeeping and other services in connection with the allowances are colossal and especially embarrassing at a time of acute shortage of both clerical help and office staff." May I ask the minister if any thought has been given to trying to assist in easing the burden of cost on these welfare organizations?

Mr. CLAXTON: I should like to say that the department and the family allowance administration have the closest and most cordial relations with all welfare agencies throughout Canada, and particularly the children's aid societies, and I should like to link with them the name of Mr. Robert Mills, who has been particularly cooperative. The question the hon. member raises is one which has been put to us by the children's aid societies, and it has received a great deal of consideration and has been the subject of discussion with them. We think that, whereas it is pretty clear that the administrative costs of the societies have gone up owing to their being so useful in connection with family allowance administration, on the other hand the charges on the funds of the societies must have been relieved directly or indirectly, by an offsetting amount. This, I may assure the hon. member, is receiving consideration and will continue to do so. It would be difficult to work out a scale of payments, and our view so far is that what has been added to administrative expenses has been more than offset by the benefits to the wards of the children's aid societies themselves.

Mr. FLEMING: One further question. The family allowance regulations, as I understand it, were passed in part under the authority of the War Measures Act. Has the authority given by the Family Allowances Act itself been exercised in connection with the regulations promulgated in relation to family allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: I was not aware of the fact that any part of the family allowances regulations was passed under the War Measures Act. The preamble to the regulations does not refer to the War Measures Act. The operative part of the order in council, which was passed on August 3, 1945, P.C. 5093, reads:

> His Excellency in Council, on the same recommendation and under the authority of the Family Allowances Act, 1944, is further pleased to make the family allowances regulations hereto annexed and they are hereby made and established accordingly.

Further, the regulations which were adopted under order in council dated November 6, 1945, P.C. 6588, refer again to—

> . . . the authority of the Family Allowances Act, 1944.

Finally, the regulations adopted on June 7, 1946, by P.C. 2316 refer again to—

> . . . the authority of the Family Allowances Act.

So that I do not know of any regulations whatever adopted under the War Measures Act.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to get a little further information on the question as to where the children's aid society fits into the mechanics of the provincial organization administering the act. I understand that there is a head office in Halifax.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. GILLIS: In the rest of the community, what machinery has been established that is directly under the control of and paid for by the department, directed by the Halifax office? The children's aid society is kept up largely by a grant from the provincial government, is it not?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know about that.

Mr. GILLIS: And the function they now perform across the country is that of carrying on the work of investigation about which the minister was speaking. The federal government, by agreement, is paying Nova Scotia $5 for each report submitted by whoever is making the investigation, and if that is true and children's aid societies are used in the communities to carry out investigations, and there is not much travel involved, I think $5 per report is of considerable assistance to the organization. Personally, I think that, while these voluntary organizations may be doing some useful service, that kind of thing is not satisfactory. If the federal government undertakes to pass a statute laying down certain regulations it should be responsible for the administration of the machinery and should have adequate staffs in each province to carry out the work. I do not think that any voluntary organization, no matter how honest or sincere it may be, has either the time or the facilities to do the kind of job that should be done. I recognize that the department started this thing and has made very good progress, and it is necessary to use various agencies because of shortage of man-power and woman-power. But in the final analysis, this being a permanent act, it will have to be administered by permanent officials. To have this work done by people who are on the job eight or nine hours a day doing their own work and who then try to carry on with other work in the evening or on an afternoon when they happen to be off duty is a method that does not make for efficiency. I should like to have the minister outline the mechanics in Nova Scotia, from the head office into the community, explaining how he gets the report back and exactly what part the children's aid society plays in the administration of the act in the province.

Mr. CLAXTON: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Cape Breton South. The set-up with regard to the family allowance administration in Nova Scotia is this. Family allowances come under the director of family allowances, who is located in Ottawa, and there are nine provincial offices. In Nova Scotia, as in the other provinces, the provincial office is located in the capital of the province. When the family allowance office there receives an application for registration which may not give satisfactory information and this cannot be obtained by correspondence, which is the ordinary method used first, or if a report is received from one source or another indicating that someone is not applying the money for the benefit of the child, then in either event, the family allowance administration, under the arrangement worked out with the province of Nova Scotia, sends a request for a report on the matter. That is sent to the welfare department of Nova Scotia. That department then gets a report either through its own employees or through the children's aid society, if there is one in the locality. Not all the territory of Nova Scotia is covered by children's aid societies.

The hon. member suggested that we should have our own officers in every part of Canada to do this job. There is a lot to be said for that; but had we started to do it in that way and had set up that scheme back in July, 1945, we would have found it exceedingly difficult to get adequate staff and there would have been a great tendency to have at least one inspector for each electoral division across Canada. That would have been an easy way to deal with the matter administratively. It is followed in the case of the census and other things and that would have been the natural pattern. Moreover, that kind of set-up would not have been out of line with our own preliminary estimates of the need. Had we done that, I feel that, so far as we can see the need now, we would have spent a lot of money that we did not need to spend. We are still looking at the whole problem—that is what the hon. member wants us to do—and as I explained earlier to-day we hope to have an adequate service for every part of Canada worked out in the best possible way for that particular part and at the lowest possible cost to the people of Canada.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not want the minister to think I am critical of what has been done in Nova Scotia. He has there one of the most efficient set-ups in the dominion. They have done a marvellous job in the short time they have functioned. I have not received a complaint in any form, and I have had much to do with the Halifax office. It is, in my opinion, one of the most efficient offices the government has set up.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. GILLIS: My point, however, is that I am a stickler for permanent officials where there is a permanent act to be administered. Under those conditions I do not believe in voluntary effort.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and Reconversion — National Health and Welfare—

572. —Old age pensions and pensions to the blind, $9,274,050.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister able to give the committee any hope that within a reasonable length of time the age limit for the reception of pensions by our aged folks will be reduced from seventy to sixty-five, and can he say whether the amount given to the old age pensioner will be raised to a living allowance?

Mr. CLAXTON: When this item came up in the main estimates I did refer to the dominion government's proposals to the dominion-provincial conference. I do not think hon. members would wish me to refer to it again. In his budget speech last night the Minister of Finance dealt with the policy of the dominion government with regard to social security measures. Hon. members will find that in Hansard for yesterday at page 2992, where the attitude of the government is stated. In supplementing the answer, I might say that some time ago the Minister of Finance, who was then administering old age pensions, expressed the willingness on the part of the federal government to consider reductions in the age limit, quite apart from the dominion-provincial proposals. I cannot add much more except to say that, as I stated earlier in the week, we have arranged to call a conference of the inter-provincial committee on old age pensions, which we suggest should meet at Ottawa on September 16. It is not intended that the committee should deal with fundamental questions of policy, but with the application of the regulations as they exist.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is aware that in England, New Zealand and Australia the age limit of men and women for the receipt of old age pensions is much lower than it is in Canada. I believe it is sixty-five for men and sixty for women. Hon. members are frequently asked by pensioners and those who are anticipating receiving pensions if and when Canada is to be put in a position to do what other countries are doing in that regard.

Mr. CLAXTON: The situation with regard to the countries mentioned by the hon. member is that in the United Kingdom old age pensions are payable to males at age sixty-five and to females at age sixty without a means test. That is a retirement pension. It is compulsory for everyone having income of over £75. It is going into effect this year, 1946-47.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is going into effect?

Mr. CLAXTON: The measure which has been adopted and which is now going into effect.

Mr. MacNICOL: In Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the United Kingdom. That, of course, is on a contributory basis. It is included in the total social insurance contribution which is paid by practically the whole population.

In Australia they have a means-test plan under which pensions are payable to males at age sixty-five and to females at age sixty. The pension is 32s. 6d. per week, or $5.77 at the current rates of exchange. It is payable out of the welfare fund to which there is a substantial contribution paid by individuals. It is 7½ per cent on incomes of most individuals and it is payable in respect of incomes over $360.

In New Zealand there is a dual system; one payable without a means test to males and females at the age of sixty-five, and a means-test plan payable to males and females at the age of sixty. It is going to take some time to put both plans into effect. There again, it is payable out of a social security fund, to which individuals pay 7½ per cent on their total incomes from the first dollar.

In the United States there is a plan of survivors' insurance, payable without means test to men and women at the age of sixty-five. The amount payable is related to the average wage. About three-fifths of the gainfully employed people are covered and the employers and employees each contribute one per cent on the first $3,000 of wages.

Mr. MacNICOL: The first $3,000?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not very many workingmen in Canada get $3,000 a year.

Mr. CLAXTON: The employer and the employee each contributes one per cent on the first $3,000 of wages, so that practically everyone who is gainfully employed contributes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not understand the minister. Does he mean $3,000 a year?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, up to $3,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not very many Canadian workmen get $3,000 per year.

Mr. CLAXTON: The employer and the employee each contributes one per cent on the first $3,000 of wages. If a man earns $2,000 he pays one per cent. He pays one per cent on anything up to $3,000 of wages. If he earns $1,500 he pays one per cent.

In the United States there is a plan in effect whereby the federal government contributes to the state governments' provisions for old age assistance on a means-test basis to males and females over sixty-five. That is payable to needy aged. All together in all these four English-speaking countries, in respect of which there is a comparable standard of living, there is an old age pension plan, and all four of them are on a contributory basis.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister the situation in respect of South Africa?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not that before me. My recollection is that they are working on a new plan there.

Mr. FLEMING: My question has to do with items 572 to 580 inclusive under demobilization and reconversion on page 72 of the estimates. We have nine items that fall under the Department of National Health and Welfare, followed by three which relate to the national film board. The nine items total some $9,500,000 and, with the additional amount for the national film board, the total is practically $10,500,000. Having regard to the statement made in the house last year by the government as to its intention to eliminate the demobilization and reconversion items from the estimates as soon as possible, why has it not been found possible to group these items with the items in the regular estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare? I should like to know if this is merely temporary and, if so, what the particular reason for it is.

Mr. CLAXTON: Much the biggest item in the items referred to by the hon. member for Eglinton is the item covered by vote 572, old age pensions and pensions to the blind. This was introduced by order in council passed under the War Measures Act in 1942 and was designed to provide, in respect of old age pensions, something corresponding to the cost of living bonus. As I announced earlier this week, it is the intention of the government to bring in legislation at this session to put that change in the Old Age Pensions Act on a permanent basis.

The next item is for the treatment of Canadian fishermen and seamen. That is to provide for payments for the cost of treatment required by persons employed on ships of Canadian registry and seamen of Canadian citizenship sailing on vessels of any of the allied nations. That has been carried on, and it will not be continued beyond the period of reconversion.

Mr. FLEMING: What does the minister construe as the period of reconversion?

Mr. CLAXTON: Treatment may be claimed within a period of twelve months after the end of the war, and for injuries or illnesses originating prior to January 1, 1946.

Item 574 is a similar item. It is to provide treatment for non-resident merchant seamen while awaiting deportation, such deportation being impossible for the time being owing to shipping conditions, or to conditions in their countries of origin. So that, too, will totally disappear within the same period. It is decreased $10,000 from last year.

Item 575 is to provide a health unit at Prince Rupert, British Columbia. This is an amount of $4,080 furnished to the city of Prince Rupert to pay the salary of a medical officer whom the armed forces found it desirable to have at that point during the war. The amount of $2,040 will, we anticipate, be sufficient to cover the fiscal year, and there will be no continuation after that.

Item 576 covers health services in Halifax. This is an annual amount to assist the city of Halifax in maintaining and improving health conditions. Hon. members are aware of the fact that Halifax had an enormous increase in population, not only members of the armed forces, but also merchant seamen during the war. It was found essential to improve health services in connection with sanitation and so on during the war. This was a place where the increase in demand was peculiarly brought about by war conditions. Consequently this payment was provided for. It is a decrease from the amount which was previously paid. In 1945-46 the amount was $66,743.72, and it will stop this year.

Items 577 and 578 relate to payments for the chloramination of water systems at these points on the Pacific coast. During the years 1942-43 it was found necessary, to meet the requirements of our own armed forces and those of our allies, and the naval and merchant shipping, to instal chloramination systems in these localities. The cost of installation was borne by the federal government. The cost of operating the installation was also borne by the federal government. We have now worked out with all the localities arrangements under which the federal government will not carry on the cost in any event after the end of the present fiscal year.

In three cases the localities are acquiring chloramination plants from War Assets Corporation on terms which seem to be fair, and our obligations in this respect will totally end at the end of the calendar year.

Item 579 deals with the treatment of repatriated merchant seamen. This is an amount of $5,000 to provide treatment for those repatriated merchant seamen who have been prisoners of war, and not otherwise entitled to treatment. There was a provision, as hon. members know, for the treatment of deep-sea sailors and interprovincial sailors, under the Canada Shipping Act. This provides similar treatment for those sailors who were unfortunate enough to be taken prisoners of war. It will certainly terminate at the end of this year.

The final item in this category is No. 580, for the women's voluntary services. This is an amount of $7,000. During the war the Department of National War Services had a women's voluntary services division which did good work in organizing women across Canada to perform voluntary services. That division was transferred to the Department of National Health and Welfare not long ago. We anticipate that its work will not be continued by the department. We regard it as peculiarly a wartime activity, and our thought is that the functions which were hitherto carried on by that branch might more properly be carried on by voluntary organizations. This item of $7,000 is put in to cover the expenditure necessary on this division, pending its probable liquidation.

Altogether, items 572 to 580 amount to a total of $137,080, apart from the old age pensions provision. We anticipate that no part of these expenditures will be carried on after the end of the present fiscal year. These are definitely expenditures on demobilization and reconversion.

Mr. FLEMING: Without reference to items 572 to 580 inclusive, I take it that they are to provide for services which owe their origin to orders in council. This, I understand, will be the last year when such items will be found under the heading of demobilization and reconversion?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is correct.

Mr. FLEMING: Hereafter, if there are any services of a similar nature, they will be provided for in the ordinary votes?

Mr. CLAXTON: Completely correct.

Mr. PEARKES: Could the minister say with what three of the six areas indicated in items 577 and 578 agreements have been made?

Mr. CLAXTON: Nanaimo, Victoria and Prince Rupert have so far made arrangements of that kind.

Mr. REID: What is the position regarding chloramination for the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster? There was some controversy a number of years ago, and I am wondering if assistance is still being carried on. I believe the Greater Vancouver water district wanted to get rid of chloramination. Has the minister any information on the point, now that the heat has died down?

Mr. FLEMING: Not around here.

Mr. CLAXTON: The situation regarding the Greater Vancouver district as last reported to me is that there was an agreement dated December 15, 1942, under which the federal government installed the plant and paid the cost of operation. The approximate yearly cost of operating the equipment was $30,460. We have worked out with the municipality an agreement under which the federal responsibility for the operation cost will be ended as of March 31, 1946. With regard to the district of North Vancouver the situation is approximately the same. The agreement was dated February 18, 1943, and was terminated on March 31, 1946, by mutual arrangement. The approximate yearly cost of operating the equipment was $2,170.

Mr. REID: A short time ago the minister referred to some conference which was to take place this fall with regard to amending the old age pensions regulations. Last evening the Minister of Finance stated that letters had gone out to the provinces asking if they were willing to agree to certain suggestions made by the dominion government. If a province is willing to accede to the request of the dominion government, will that permit it to come in under any social security scheme such as was outlined at the dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. CLAXTON: I think the hon. member will find his answer in the statement of the Minister of Finance as reported at pages 2907 and 2908 of Hansard.

Mr. SKEY: Does the minister propose abandoning the whole scheme of old age pensions proposed at the dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. CLAXTON: At the dominion-provincial conference in August, 1945, the dominion government put forward a comprehensive programme for full employment, high national income and social security. The implementing of that programme is dependent upon agreements with the provinces, and those agreements have not been achieved. The present situation is as outlined by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. HARKNESS: The minister stated, when dealing with the item of $9,274,050 for old age pensions and pensions to the blind, that this was definitely a matter of demobilization and reconversion.

Mr. CLAXTON: If I gave that impression I certainly did not mean it and I do not see how any one could possibly take it from what I said. I said that that item would be carried into permanent legislative form by an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act which we propose to introduce at this session to do just that thing. At that time that item will disappear.

Mr. HARKNESS: I understood the minister to say that it was definitely a matter of demobilization and reconversion, but if he says that it is not I am satisfied. Something was said about the age limit for pensions for the blind and I am sorry I did not get what the minister said. Is the present age limit for pensions to blind persons to be continued? I could never see how any age limit was justified. A person who is blind is handicapped whether he is ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty or eighty years of age.

Mr. CLAXTON: In its proposals to the provinces the federal government proposed that the pension of $30 a month to the blind should be payable to all blind persons who could qualify from the age of twenty-one years. In other words, we proposed to reduce the age from forty to twenty-one years, and increase the amount which might be paid from $25 to $30. We also proposed to provide half the cost of treating those whose blindness might be prevented or cured by treatment. As the Minister of Finance declared, the social security programme of the federal government remains part of the policy of this government, but how and when it can be implemented will depend upon the willingness of the provinces to work out agreements.

Mr. SKEY: When the minister answered my question a moment ago I believe he tied in his answer with the fact that he did not propose to go any farther with dominion-provincial agreements because the dominion-provincial conference had been adjourned. I cannot see why provisions for old age pensions could not be dealt with at a separate conference. Also, I cannot see how a taxation agreement between a province and the Dominion of Canada could be related to an old age pension agreement which might be arrived at. Will the minister correct me if I am wrong?

Mr. CLAXTON: It must be within the knowledge of everyone who has studied old age pensions—and most hon. members have—that old age pensions are paid either on a means-test basis or as of right. The proposals made to the provinces provided for a payment of $30 a month to everyone at the age of seventy as of right, and payments of half the cost of pensions up to $30 a month in respect to people between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine based on a means test.

I think I am right in saying that in every country where a pension is payable as of right it is paid by virtue of contributions made by the individual, either in the form of a social security tax such as that of 7½ per cent as is imposed in Australia and New Zealand, or in the form of payments out of wages as is the case in the United Kingdom, or in the form of a one per cent payroll deduction paid by the employer and employee as is the case in the United States. Our old age pension proposal was part of a comprehensive set of proposals, and it will be found that the proposals made to the provinces in August, 1945, contemplated a contributory old age pension scheme.

Mr. SKEY: What amount was it anticipated would be paid by the individual?

Mr. CLAXTON: That was never definitely arrived at. It was discussed, and the kind of discussion was—I hope I am not revealing confidences, but this has been spread around a good deal—that there should be a social security tax of something in the neighbourhood of three or four or even five per cent.

Mr. SKEY: On income?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. We have given every possible consideration to this question of old age pensions, and I must say I do not see how the federal government can pay old age pensions which will be contributed to by the people except on a nation-wide basis. It is difficult to see how it could be done without either a constitutional amendment or by agreement with the provinces. I am not expressing any final opinion on that, but that is the view we have after the consideration we have given to it. If that is so, and I believe it is so, I do not see how we can have a system of old age pensions such as the hon. member seems to have in mind except on the basis that all the pensions are paid out of consolidated revenue. If the hon. member wants to propose that as the attitude of his party, it is an interesting point of view, but I do not think he does.

Mr. SKEY: I am only seeking information.

Mr. CLAXTON: The Minister of Finance in his budget speech last night referred to this as one of the social security measures which the federal government had as part of its progamme, but we cannot work it out in the existing situation. We hope to work it out just as soon as it is possible to do so.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Have the provinces been approached to see whether they would agree to this tax of three or four or five per cent as the case may be? What is to prevent the minister from going to the provinces and asking them if they are opposed to this social security tax being imposed? It does not enter into the general taxation agreement picture at all so far as I can see.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I should have said a word on that in answer to the hon. member for Trinity. In our view these things cannot be separated. If you are to have a budget which provides for $150,000,000 for health insurance, $200,000,000 for old age pensions of $30 a month at the age of seventy for everyone, a 50 per cent contribution by the federal government to the cost of old age pensions between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine for those needing it, at a minimum cost of $17,000,000, plus the dominion assumption of unemployment assistance at a rate of 85 per cent of the amount payable under the unemployment insurance provisions now in force, plus health grants which may run from $13,000,000 to $19,000,000, all in addition to the family allowance and the present unemployment insurance provisions, and on top of all that the provisions regarding public investment contained in the dominion government proposals, then I say you have a programme which can be made to work and which is workable and comprehensive. But there is no way that I know of, of assuming responsibility for carrying out that programme unless the rest of the dominion government proposals are substantially agreed to. Any government should have the power to discharge its responsibilities.

Mr. BRACKEN: You have power to impose this tax now.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, I will correct what I said. There is no restriction on the legislative jurisdiction of the federal government with regard to taxation, but there is, I think, a real desire on the part of the people of Canada to see that the dominion and the provinces work together so that these things may be worked out through cooperation and agreement, as we had hoped and still hope they will be, rather than in any other way.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is interesting to hear the minister talk all around the question and give some kind of analysis of last night's budget. But the fact remains that the social security measures of the dominion, which he says cannot now be undertaken, are to be paid for by a tax of three or four or five per cent on all incomes. There was no kick from the provinces over putting unemployment insurance into force. That is something that carries itself, and the dominion government went to the provinces and got permission to institute unemployment insurance. Is there anything to prevent the minister or the government from going to the provinces at this time and asking them whether they would like to have these social security measures put into force? The minister just skated around the whole question. Just because the dominion government cannot get its whole social security programme through now, it is going to deprive the people of Canada of what could go into force at the present time. There is no use in the minister talking like that. It just does not make sense. The dominion government has power now to impose this tax of three or four or five per cent and put these social security measures into force. So that it has no excuse for not going on with these measures if they are considered advisable. If the government considers them advisable, why not go ahead with them and get permission from the provinces to do so, get the consent of the provinces. I do not think they will kick about it. But certainly that has nothing to do with the general framework of taxation in this country.

Mr. CLAXTON: I should like to traverse the hon. member's remarks as flatly and directly as I possibly can. Any item which requires the expenditure of $200,000,000 a year has a good deal to do with the general economic structure of this country. I shall not try to add anything to what has been said before, what was said by the Minister of Finance last night and what is contained in the dominion government proposals.

Mr. CASE: The discussion has been most interesting. The fact remains that the dominion government made the largest social security commitments that ever were made in this country without ever consulting anyone. If they are prepared to go to the provinces now, they are going after the commitments have already been made, and asking the provinces to agree to something which the government have already done.

Mr. CLAXTON: If the hon. member and the committee will look at the text of the dominion government proposals, at the speeches from the throne in which they were first anticipated in January, 1944, and referred to in January, 1945, at the speeches of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and myself, I venture to say that they will find no place where it was not clearly stated that this was a comprehensive plan and that the dominion government was prepared to go forward with it, upon our working out the arrangements with the provinces. You will find that stated again and again in the documents to which I have referred. That was made perfectly plain.

Mr. CASE: Are you going to say you consulted the provinces before you introduced family allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: There was no need for us to consult the provinces before introducing family allowances.

Mr. CASE: That is a large measure to which you committed yourselves.

Mr. CLAXTON: But if we had had family allowances on a contributory basis I do not see how we could have done it without consulting the provinces or securing an amendment of the constitution. That is the fundamental difference between the position with regard to what we did for family allowances and what was proposed to be done regarding old age pensions provided that we got an agreement with the provinces.

What was the purpose of the conference in August, 1945? It was to consult the provinces. Did we have to consult the provinces before we put forward a proposal? What we got them together for was to consult them, and we had that consultation at the conferences from August, 1945, on. I do not think hon. members would wish any government to say to another government, "Before we even discuss a thing with you, have we your permission to discuss it?"

Mr. CASE: But you did it on unemployment insurance.

Mr. CLAXTON: We did exactly what we did here; that is, we called them in to consult them. That is what we did in regard to old age pensions, health insurance and the whole of the dominion proposals. The purpose of the conference was to consult them, and we had that consultation.

Mr. SKEY: The question we originally asked with regard to old age pensions was, is the minister seeking any arrangement or agreement with the provinces separately with regard to old age pensions? I still cannot see why he cannot seek a separate agreement with them, or call a conference of the health ministers with regard to this subject and have them go back and ask their governments whether they are in favour of having such a social security tax as he spoke of earlier in his remarks. Just in case I may be misunderstood, I should like to put myself on record as being heartily in favour of old age pensions on a much more liberal scale than $30 a month.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have been very much interested in the comments of the Progressive Conservative party, particularly having in mind the comments made by their financial critic last night following the presentation of the budget by the Minister of Finance. He emphasized again and again that now is the time to economize.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about false economy?

Mr. MERRITT: Are you for or against old age pensions?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I made my position quite clear, that I am in favour of them.

Mr. MERRITT: Then why attack us?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The Conservative party stubbornly opposed the introduction of old age pensions in the first place.

Mr. MacNICOL: You are just talking through your hat. I was here in 1930 and was one of the supporters and advocates of the whole business.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I want to remind the committee that, before the hon. member for Davenport came here, the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Yukon were the only two Conservatives in the whole House of Commons who supported old age pensions in 1925.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. MERRITT: Do not try to lift yourselves on our shoulders. Go after the government yourself.

Mr. SKEY: Are you in opposition here, or are you for the government?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am just drawing attention to the fact that we are hearing a great deal said about old age pensions by people who did very little about the matter when they were in a position to do so.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Your party will never be put in that position.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like to say to the minister that I think nearly 200,000 old age pensioners in Canada will be disappointed with the speech of the Minister of Finance last night—

Mr. MERRITT: Now you are saying something.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —and the minister's statement to-night. I cannot think that even though it did take $200 million a year to provide $30 for all the old age pensioners in Canada, as was suggested in the dominion proposals to the provinces, that should stop the government of Canada from making this gesture to the people in those brackets. When the family allowance proposal was brought down the expenditure was larger than this, and there have been very few criticisms across the country about that expenditure. Taking into account Canada's contribution during the war, when one considers that more than a million of our young people were in the services, that we gave away over four billion dollars worth of our materials in the form of mutual aid, and that we enjoyed a higher standard of living than ever before in the history of Canada, I think it is unfortunate that the minister is not in a position to say to-night that something more definite will be done this year for the old age pensioners of the country.

Mr. CHURCH: The city of Toronto had old age pensions twenty or thirty years before there was ever a C.C.F. party. It paid $12 a week, when it could get no federal or provincial aid, to those who were unable to work, and in addition it maintained a contributory system in the fire department, the police department, the school board and other departments. The principle of this old age pension and health legislation is that we are to consult the provinces. People are dying every day while the government are consulting the provinces about health and old age pensions, and nothing can stop it, because the undertaker is there while all these consultations are going on.

Sooner or later we as a parliament must do something for these people, and at the same time have some check on departmental expenditures. Departments are spending money like water; yet we see no improvement in public health; the old age pensioners are not getting fair treatment, and they are subject to a means test which is the meanest thing ever created in the history of the country.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I thought it would not be very long before the chickens of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario would be coming home to roost. I do not know when the Conservatives will learn to stop talking about "economy" in an age when we want anything but economy as far as expenditures on public services are concerned. I am not criticizing the Conservative members particularly, except that I do hope that they will begin to see the light after a while. I do not believe there is one item which has been presented in this house which the Conservatives have not been as eager to extend to those concerned as have the members of the C.C.F., the Social Credit, or the Liberal party. They have been eager to have better prices for farm commodities, better wages and all that sort of thing. To get up after that and talk about the need for economy is so grossly inconsistent that they make themselves ridiculous. The colleagues of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario should really take him off into his room some time and give him a fatherly talking to.

What I rose to say was this. It must be obvious to the members of the committee that the minister has succeeded pretty well in talking himself into a state of helplessness. In effect he says, here are these provinces; if they would only come and cooperate with the dominion we would be able to pay all these things we want to pay, but they won't. So this big powerful Canada with its wonderful resources, and this great big Ottawa government here, with all the power in the dominion—

Mr. MacNICOL: And the big stick.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —just can't pay. Well, that is one of the most foolish attitudes which can be taken, and one of the most impotent! I believe the day will come when the minister himself will laugh at the stand he is taking to-night.

May I just propound a simple question for the members of the committee to contemplate? Even if the provinces came to Ottawa and abjectly accepted every single proposal the dominion government offers, would the dominion then be able to offer old age pensioners in Canada $60 a month? I think the minister would say, "No; we cannot do that." Well, would they be able to offer that $60 a month at the age of fifty-five? I presume the minister would again say no. Or would they be able to give the blind anything like the pension they ought to have? Again the answer would be a pathetic no. Is that not enough to show that the whole method of approach of the dominion government is wrong? It is wrong because obviously the amount we can give to our elderly citizens depends on the goods we can produce, not the taxes we can collect, and in 1945 we were producing ten billion dollars' worth of goods. If we undertook to distribute that amount of goods so that the people could use them, $50 a month to people of sixty-five years of age would be no more than small change. Let us contemplate that seriously and then set about some modern way of learning how to distribute those goods. We must do it.

I want to lay down three or four points for the minister to consider, if the committee will bear with me.

The minister must not give up his old age pension proposals, nor must he give up his proposals in connection with pensions to the blind, simply because the provinces saw fit not to cooperate in the gigantic scheme of centralization of power which the dominion contemplated and endeavoured to bring into existence at the various conferences with the provinces.

Mr. REID: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Certainly; any question at all.

Mr. REID: I am wondering how he arrives at the age of fifty-five. Why not fifty?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will answer the hon. gentleman's question. Ultimately the age at which the old age pension must be paid is going to depend on the age at which industry is going to have no use any longer for the individual; in other words, the age at which he is going to be put out of his job.

Mr. REID: Why not fifty?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The age will probably have to be fifty. If I were to say fifty now, however, I have no doubt that 50 per cent of the Liberals would go on a campaign and get up on platforms throughout the country in an endeavour to make my remarks look ridiculous. Therefore, until the Liberals become a little more advanced in their ideas, I have to be somewhat reserved in what I say. Obviously the day will come when a man who has reached the age of fifty—that day has already come for the woman who has reached the age of fifty—will not be in any preferred position when it comes to obtaining employment in any concern in the country. Obviously, therefore, if we are to deal with the old age situation, we must be prepared to give the individual enough to enable him to live a life of dignity just as soon as the society in which he lives has no longer any need for his services. That, I think, is self-evident.

With that as the fundamental principle on which to work, let us go forward realistically, facing the facts. I maintain that the scheme which the dominion offered the provinces simply would not cope with the situation at all. They seek to bind the provinces hopelessly to a system of centralization and regimentation; and, notwithstanding that, they would not be able to deal at all effectively with the problems confronting the country. That being so, let us see if we cannot find another approach that will at least give some prospect of holding possibilities. The minister, I repeat, must not abandon his ideas with regard to old age pensions and pensions for the blind. He knows the kind of thing he would like to do. He is as forward-looking a man as there is in this house and just as desirous of seeing that things are done well in this country, and just as sympathetic and tenderhearted, just as considerate of humanitarian ideas as anyone else. Surely, then, he can go forward with his ideals, the ideals which his heart dictates, and see whether he can attain them without the kind of measures he has been thus far contemplating.

First of all, I would suggest, the contributory system for old age pensions is false. It is unsound. Just as soon as the productive agencies within the country catch up, there will be a surplus of every kind of goods and services. That is number one. The thing which we shall need in this country above all others will be purchasing power among the people, and how can you distribute purchasing power among the people if you take some away from every cheque they get in order to build up a fund with which to pay old age pensions? As soon as any Progressive Conservative or any other progressive in the house gets the answer to that question I invite him to call me up and tell me.

I say, therefore, that the contributory system is out in any genuinely progressive, streamlined, modern system of dealing with our situation.

What must we say next? The taxing system will be out. When we tax people in the way we tax them now we take from them the very purchasing power which they need in order to live, and which the producers of goods need to have the people receive if they, the producers, are to sell their goods to the recipients of purchasing power. In other words, by our taxing system we are destroying the home market and destroying the distribution system. Clearly, then that method of approach is unsound, and that is the next fundamental principle to lay down.

May I say to the minister and to the members of this committee that there is no need of any change in the constitution of Canada. All these ideals we entertain with respect to old age pensions and pensions for the blind as well as other social services can be attained without in any respect destroying the constitution of the country.

May I say, in addition to that, that there is no need for centralization. Already several progressive ministers have begun to see that centralization is unsound. The Minister of Labour, on several occasions in the house this session, has pointed out that fact. Then why consider any scheme of centralization such as the dominion proposed at the conferences? Centralization is simply out. It must not be contemplated. I honour the provinces that have insisted that it shall not be brought about. If Premier Drew had done less than he did he would have betrayed his trust in these times. There may be ulterior motives in Premier Drew—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am trying to be fair; I am not saying that there are; nor am I saying that there are any ulterior motives so far as Premier Duplessis is concerned. I take the conduct of these two gentlemen at its face value and I say that they have merited the honour of this dominion for the stand they took against centralization. It is a good thing that they did take that stand, because they are the premiers of two provinces which are so big that they cannot be taken into the woodshed and spanked. It is their responsibility to stand up and look after their weaker fellow provinces.

An hon. MEMBER: What item is this?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The item under which the minister was discussing the dominion-provincial conference. I, too, am discussing the dominion-provincial conference. Surely the hon. member for Saskatoon city is keen enough to see that; I do not need to give him a talking to. We listened for fifteen minutes to a talk clearly intended to indoctrinate into the members of the house and into the people of the country the idea of centralization. I am answering that argument. As I said a few moments ago, there will soon be a surplus of goods and services in this country, a surplus with which we shall not know what to do. Already we are contemplating going out and seizing markets in South America and in other places.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. We are discussing old age pensions and pensions for the blind.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is exactly what I am discussing, Mr. Chairman. Just as soon as there is a surplus of goods and services in this country—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. The question of marketing goods and all that sort of thing has nothing to do with this item.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have left that matter, Mr. Chairman. May I suggest that while we were discussing old age pensions it was not in order to spend a lot of time on the dominion-provincial conference any more than it is out of order for me to talk about what I am talking about. What I am talking about has a definite bearing on old age pensions. I was going to say that as soon as a surplus arrives there will be a tendency for wages to fall and for the price of goods to fall; there will be a tendency to go into a depression, and just as soon as that time comes, then will come the time for the creation of debt-free money in this country to represent that surplus of goods and services.

I warn the members of the committee that if they do not come to realize the soundness of what I am saying they are going to head this country straight into disaster. If the minister and his colleagues do not base their policies on the fundamental principle of debt-free money they will be responsible for leading this country into disaster, and we shall not have to wait many years to see the fruits of their good labours in that regard. That is important to bear in mind. Normally the production of the state, even before the war, increased year by year three, four and five per cent. When production increases in the state the amount of money in the state has to increase. Who is to supply that increase of money? I maintain that money must be supplied by the state with debt-free money and not by banks which lend money. Just as soon as the state begins to create debt-free money as tickets to represent the surplus goods and services which are in the country, that state will have found a new source of income, a new source of revenue with which can be paid the old age pensions and the pensions for the blind without additional taxation, without centralizing power, without modifying the British North America Act, for this Ottawa government has control over the banking and financial system of this country, and it has the power to create an issue of debt-free money just exactly as the treasury board did create twenty-six millions of debt-free money during world war I, and use it. This can be done.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And it is the solution of the problem.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I would ask the hon. member to try to keep to the item.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am sorry; I could not hear what you said.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would remind hon. members that this is not a joking matter. We are trying to deal with this item in an orderly way. I would suggest to hon. members that they support the Chair and endeavour to stick to the rules.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Where the difficulty lies is, as you, sir, must see, that the members of the committee have talked themselves into a state of impotency, of absolute ineptness. Until I started to speak there was not a suggestion as to what could be done from either the C.C.F., the Liberals or the Conservatives. Certainly the time had come for something progressive to be enunciated before them, and that is all I am doing. I am talking about how old age pensions can be paid without all the ruinous proposals which the minister has been contemplating all during the time that he has been defending himself before this committee.

I emphasize that point. When that is done we shall be going into a new order of debt-free money created by the state to represent the surplus goods and services which the state is able to produce as a result of the tremendous mechanization and the marvellous knowledge and technological skill which have come into this generation's possession.

Mr. CLAXTON: The printing press.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister talks about the printing press! Why not? All the money the minister has in his pocket came out of the printing press. There is not a dollar of currency that ever came out of a bank in Canada that did not come out of the printing press. What is the matter with the minister? Why does he make a remark like that? He is moreover, entirely overlooking the fact that at least 97 per cent of the business of this country is done with bank credit. Why does not he recognize the fact—and in fact it is more than a fact—that bank credit can be used as the new money that is debt-free and interest-free just as well as the printed money?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I could get up and make a propaganda speech on all these things and I could make a good job of it too.

Mr. CHURCH: We have been dealing with old age pensions. Before the next item is brought before the committee, I would suggest that the government should lay down a policy of abolishing the means test which is just charity. They should set an example to the provinces by making a larger contribution themselves because they have unlimited sources of finance. The minister is fond of consulting the provinces. We shall soon be in the position where we shall have to consult the provinces to play "the wearin' of the green" on the bagpipes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Were not the provinces originally independent? They were independent when they entered confederation. What is the matter with the hon. member for Broadview?

Mr. HARKNESS: I was going to ask the minister a simple question, but I think I shall now have to make a speech. I was sorry to hear the fallacious arguments of the hon. member for Mackenzie, who said that because we spent several billion dollars in the war we could now spend several billions more on various schemes of social security, and there should be nothing to it. It reminds me of the story of a man who had $1,800 in the bank and who was suddenly stricken with the terrible disease of cancer. He had an expensive operation which cost him $1,500. When he got out of the hospital he said, "I could afford to spend $1,500 to get rid of that desperate disease which I had and which I did not want, and I certainly ought to be able to afford to buy a new automobile, a new washing machine for my wife, refurnish the house and spend $3,000 or $4,000 more on other things without any trouble at all." I think that is what that argument amounts to.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Which argument?

Mr. HARKNESS: I was referring to the hon. member for Mackenzie. So far as the hon. member for Lethbridge is concerned it has always been a marvel to me how he and the members of his party can come out with so many exceptionally sound statements which I can follow and agree with and at the same time advocate policies which in their essentials come down to the point of supporting old age pensions where the baby bonuses stop.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: Tell us how you would do it?

Mr. HARKNESS: It might be quite possible to do it; but having spent several years of close association with the founder of the Social Credit party in Alberta, and having had many hours of conversation with him while he was directing the group—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I ask the hon. member to stay with the item.

Mr. HARKNESS: I am sorry; I was just replying to the question. I am sorry to say that after all that discussion and argument he was pleasant; but I was still absolutely unconvinced of the soundness of his ideas.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can you see a solution of the problem? That is what we want.

Mr. HARKNESS: To come more particularly to the old age pension matter, may I say that during the present session of parliament I have received somewhere in the neighbourhood of twelve to fifteen hundred cards from old people who wish to receive a higher old age pension. These cards are put out by an organization called the social security council of Alberta, which advocates $60 a month as the first principle for men at the age of sixty and for women at the age of fifty-five. The first card that was put out had the amount and urged the member to whom it was sent to carry that policy into effect. Then they put out a new card which threatens the member that if he does not put forth his best efforts, if he does not get this thing into operation, he will be defeated at the next election; they will make sure of that. I object to putting over some particular idea by making use of a cheap card through the mail, particularly when it comes without a stamp on it, and the government gets no revenue from it. I object to being threatened by these people.

But one point I should like to make is this, that so long as the old age pension situation remains in anything like its present state, there will be constant demands to increase the amount of that pension and to lower the age. That will go on and on and on; there will be constant demand and constant pressure.

As a result of having had all these cards, I have given considerable thought to the problem. In my view the only permanent solution is to place old age pensions on a straight insurance basis, and to institute a system of contributory old age pensions to which people will be obliged to contribute. I do not like the minister's idea of having a social service tax for this purpose of old age pensions, or for this or that other purpose. I think it should be on a straight insurance principle, and on a sound actuarial basis. As soon as a man comes into employment he would start to make payments to the old age pension fund, or the old age pension insurance scheme, whatever you wish to call it. Then, upon reaching the age provided under the scheme—and that could be made anything within reason—he would receive an amount in proportion to what he has paid in. In my opinion that is the only way we can satisfactorily solve the old age pension situation.

Has the government given any thought to setting up an old age pension insurance scheme along these lines?

Mr. CLAXTON: A great deal of consideration has been given to that and to all other old age pension plans. It will continue to be given. Regarding the plan such as the hon. member has suggested it must be remembered that in a country like Canada about half the population are self-employed. This makes it very difficult to relate a payment directly to the amount to be received. Further, if that is done you still have to provide pensions for those needing them but who have not contributed. So that you have to have a means-test plan supplementing the other. We have reached the conclusion that, having regard to the particular situation in Canada, the most effective and the fairest way is the one I have described, and that is, cover part of the cost with a tax, which we thought might amount to three per cent, and which would be paid by everyone able to pay.

Mr. QUELCH: One of my chief objections against a contributory scheme is that those who need pensions most are, generally speaking, unable to contribute, and therefore not in a position to benefit. I have in mind especially the workers in primary industry.

I recall that before the war we in this group were urging the payment of a pension of $50 a month at the age of sixty, and that in those days we were told time and again that the government could not possibly afford to pay out so much money, and that it had not any money for that purpose. I also recall that within six weeks of the declaration of war the government had the chartered banks create for its use over $200 million. I would remind the Minister of National Health and Welfare that when that $200 million was created for purposes of the war, it was not printing press money. That amount of money was created by the chartered banks, without the printing of a single dollar; it was cheque book money.

Let me again remind the minister that we would never have had the war effort we did have, had it not been for the fact that four billions of dollars in new money was created—and it was created by the banking business, without printing. It was cheque money.

Mr. Graham Towers warns us that in the very near future we shall be passing into a time where there will be a lack of effective markets. I would suggest that one of the best ways we can create in Canada good markets would be to help the old age pensioners by paying them an adequate amount of money, so that they can buy goods. As the governor of the Bank of Canada has pointed out, one of our great troubles in the future will not be the fact that we cannot produce, but the fact that we have produced goods which we cannot sell.

The minister may suggest that we shall have goods but we shall not have the money. I ask him this question: Did he ever once during the war hear it said that we could not have a battleship, or could not have aircraft, or could not have material for the army because we did not have the money? He knows very well that the only thing that hindered the war effort was the mere matter of production of goods and services. Where those goods and services were available, money was made available to buy them.

What did we fight for? We were told that we were fighting for a new social order. Surely the old age pensioner should have a new social order. If we can create money to win the war to achieve a new social order, then I say that we should be able to create money to enjoy the benefits of that social order after we have won the war. Any government which suggests for one minute that it cannot get money for that purpose is fooling the people of the country, and the people will not be fooled. The people are not going to be willing in future to be told that we are going to have to do without things of this kind because the government is still hanging on to some old-fashioned money system which has no relationship whatsoever to the productive capacity of the country.

Mr. SKEY: Will the Minister of National Health and Welfare say whether, if all the provinces had agreed to the proposals submitted by the federal government at the dominion-provincial conference, he could have carried out his complete national scheme for old age pensions without further taxation of the Canadian people?

Mr. CLAXTON: No. Pensions have to be paid for by people.

Mr. SKEY: In other words, the minister would have had to impose a further tax on the people of Canada.

Mr. CLAXTON: The cost of carrying out the scheme would have had to be borne by the Canadian people and by Canadian production in one way or another. It would be for the Minister of Finance to say whether or not an adidtional tax or a smaller reduction in taxes would be necessary.

Mr. BRACKEN: We are discussing an item of $9,274,050 for old age pensions and pensions for the blind. The statutory appropriation as it appears at page 28 of the estimates is about $35 million. I understand that the former item is one provided by order in council during the war to increase the amount paid to old age pensioners because of the higher costs of living. I came in to-night after this discussion had started and the minister was explaining why he could not provide a better old age pension service. He went on to say that this was because of the failure of the provinces to agree to the major proposals advanced by the government. The minister gave some estimates of the cost of the government's proposals. As I remember, he suggested a figure of $200,000,000 for old age pensions, $150,000,000 for health insurance and something extra for unemployment insurance. Can the minister say now what additional amount over the present estimates these various schemes of social security, as covered by the dominion government's proposals to the provinces at the dominion-provincial conference, would cost?

Mr. CLAXTON: The dominion's share of old age pensions and pensions for the blind, both under the statutes and under the order in council, amounts to approximately $43,000,000. The proposal at the conference by the dominion for old age pensions to everyone at the age of seventy of $30 a month would cost $200,000,000, and the dominion's share of 50 per cent of pensions up to $30 a month for those between the ages of sixty-five and sixty-nine who were in need would be at least $17,000,000, or a total of $217,000,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: That would be $174,000,000 more than at present.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. That is a minimum difference because it was recognized that the $17,000,000 was a minimum estimate. It was thought that it would more likely be $20,000,000, or even more.

Mr. BRACKEN: What would be the additional amount required for health insurance?

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. CLAXTON: The dominion's share of health insurance, when fully introduced, was estimated to be $150,000,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: That would be a new item altogether.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, additional to any they now paid. Then otherwise the health grants would vary depending upon what a province spent. To a considerable degree they would be matching grants, and their total would have been under $19,000,000. That was the maximum which would be reached only after a number of years. I would point out that the health insurance proposals could be arrived at and fully worked out and implemented throughout the whole dominion only after a considerable period of time. We offered assistance to the provinces in connection with the introduction of health services which they might introduce by stages or within certain areas. It was a very flexible plan and, while the dominion would be contributing something from the first year in which the plan came into effect, it would not be called upon to pay the full amount estimated until all the provinces had fully implemented the health insurance proposals.

Mr. BRACKEN: The ultimate cost would be about what?

Mr. CLAXTON: It was estimated at $150,000,000.

Mr. BRACKEN: In a Canadian publication recently it was estimated by one whom we would regard as a reliable authority that the expenditures arising from the dominion government's new proposals would be in the vicinity of $600,000,000 per annum, whereas at the present time under the war-time tax agreements the payments to the provinces are about $124,000,000. Is that statement substantially correct?

Mr. CLAXTON: I think the leader of the opposition should properly put that question to the Minister of Finance, but my impression is that that estimate of the cost to the dominion of its proposals is substantially as I have stated it. The benefit to the Canadian people would be equally great.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and Reconversion — National Health and Welfare—

573. Treatment of Canadian fishermen and seamen, $15,000.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: In connection with this item, I should like to refer to part V, sections 304 to 308 inclusive of the Canada Shipping Act, with particular reference to section 305.

This section discriminates against the treatment of certain seamen engaged in coastal traffic, especially those sailing along the coast of British Columbia and between ports in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Section 305 reads:

(1) There shall be levied and collected on every ship arriving in any port in the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia or in any port on Hudson bay or James bay in the provinces of Manitoba or Ontario, hereinafter called "the provinces," a duty of two cents for every ton which such ship measures, register tonnage, unless

(a) the ship is engaged in the coasting trade of Canada and arrives at any port in any of the said provinces from any other port in the same province, or arrives at any port in the province of Quebec from any port in the province of Ontario, and has not during the calendar year made a payment on account of such duty; or unless

(b) the ship is a ship which came from a place out of Canada and has paid duty on the same voyage in a previous port of call in Canada.

Under that section seamen engaged along the coast of British Columbia or in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec do not have the benefit of hospital treatment which is provided for seamen on ships plying between different provinces. In British Columbia we would like to see the act extended so that seamen engaged in the coastal trade in that province could receive treatment. These exceptions should be done away with. During the war, part V of the act, principally section 308, was amended by order in council P.C. 164/6991, but this amendment has since been rescinded on the pretence that it was just a war measure. That order reads:

Free medical treatment and care may be provided by the Department of Pensions and National Health for any sick or disabled seaman not entitled thereto under the provisions of part V of the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, if such seaman is suffering from sickness or disability with respect to which entitlement to a pension has not been conceded under any existing law, where such sickness arose or disability was incurred on a ship of Canadian registry, or is a seaman of Canadian nationality serving on a ship of other than Canadian registry, while the ship was operating in such waters as may be determined by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, on the advice of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, to be particularly liable to enemy attack.

Surely these social services should have been maintained on the books in peace time. If they were desirable in time of war, surely they should be maintained in time of peace. Under the Canada Shipping Act, if a man is taken seriously ill or meets with an accident on a vessel and is hospitalized at the first port of call and should later be released as fit to be returned home, he is then thrown on the mercy of his Britannic Majesty's consul, who sees that he is returned to his home port. He may even travel home in the company of some cattle that are being shipped in the same direction. If, on arrival at his home port, the man should still require medical attention he is denied such attention under the terms of the act for the reason that he did not return on the same vessel. In other words, a man must avoid treatment in a foreign port, even if he is dying, to assure himself of medical attention when and if he is lucky enough to survive and reach his home port on his own vessel. By the same token, if a man were injured or suffered illness through shipwreck he would have to refuse being rescued and endeavour to salvage his vessel and bring it back with him in order to receive the medical attention he would require. This is covered in part V, section 308, and, to say the least, is nonsensical.

In this connection, dealing with the health of seamen I should like to deal with section 288. This section allows for treatment of venereal disease in any Canadian port whether a man is ashore or on shipboard, but if a man on a Canadian vessel contracts venereal disease in a port other than a Canadian one he is responsible for his own treatment. In this connection, it is to be noted that Canadian vessels are the only vessels in the world to-day where this is still the practice. Even Great Britain changed the clause in the British Shipping Act, and to-day treats venereal disease in the classification of general illness. On November 10, 1943, four members of the crew of the sailing vessel, the City of Alberni, contracted venereal disease while their vessel lay in the port of Valparaiso. They were charged with deductions from their wages for medical expenses incurred in treatment of the disease. It was the contention of their union representatives that, in view of the fact that all maritime nations do accept the treatment of venereal disease the same as any other illness, the cost of treatment should not be charged to the men. However, they were charged under the "wilful" clause of the act. The Department of Transport in this case referred the union to the courts. Rather than referring the union to the courts a little action by the government in line with other maritime nations would save a great deal of unnecessary suffering and needless expense to the individuals concerned.

This is a matter of vital concern to the seamen of Canada's merchant marine, and with all the talk we hear from the present government as to their interest in social welfare, why cannot they maintain the order in council which they passed during the war?

It is part and parcel of the general set-up of other maritime nations. It was regarded as very necessary in time of war. Some day we might want these seamen again, and they might not be willing to sail the boats unless conditions are changed. I am interested in this matter because I have worked on coastal boats and am a member of the international seafarers' union. I should like to see these men given the service they deserve.

Mr. CLAXTON: Similar representations have been made by other members from time to time, in addition to those made to-night by the hon. member for Skeena. He has said that section 303 of the Canada Shipping Act discrimnates against this class of seamen. He also said that other countries had more generous provisions with regard to these seamen. My information is that no country provides the kind of coverage that he mentions.

The situation, as I understand it, is this. Under section 305 of the Canada Shipping Act, which in one form or another has been in effect for a great number of years, owners of ships engaged in international or interprovincial trade are required to pay a certain fee into the sick mariners' fund. That fee is two cents per ton. Out of the fund the federal government, acting through the Department of National Health and Welfare, provides services to sick mariners. This came up in connection with the vote under item 210, and at that time I think some figures were put on Hansard. It runs into a very considerable sum of money. In the fiscal year 1944-45 the revenue was $210,452.42 and the expenditure was $303,747.58. But, generally speaking, over the years, the expenditure is just about offset by the revenue. This measure is arrived at by international agreement. It provides protection for seamen who are covered by the terms of section 305; that is those who are engaged in international or interprovincial trade, not local trade.

The class of seamen whose cause has been so ably argued by the hon. member for Skeena are those who are engaged in trade within a single province. They are not ordinarily covered. It has been the view of the federal government and, I believe, all other governments of this and every country, since long before I had anything to do with this administration, that the responsibility for dealing with seamen in that class was a matter of local jurisdiction, in this case a matter within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Indeed provision for the purpose is, I understand, made in some if not in all of the provinces under the workmen's compensation acts. Further, I am informed that in the case of some of the vessels in this class there is a requirement by the Department of Transport that they do secure protection under the workmen's compensation act. But that comes under the Department of Transport and I am not familiar with the details. There is no discrimination in any sense. The coasting vessels, which are the vessels which are worked by this class of seamen, do not make any contribution. They do not come within the legislation. It has been the view that if there should be protection for that class of seamen operating within the ordinary limits of a province, it should be provided by the workmen's compensation law of the province. I might point out that, whereas the situation regarding men engaged on deep-sea work is as I have described it, that is, year in and year out the costs are just about met by the revenue. The situation is quite different with regard to the vessels which carry on an interprovincial trade as opposed to an international trade. In 1938, which was a normal peacetime year, coastal vessels covered having a crew membership of 8,652 paid $7,984.98, and treatment was given to the amount of $56,260.16. In 1944, this class of vessel, with a crew membership of 9,547, paid out $9,133.90, while treatment costing $59,742.97 was given.

Mr. MacINNIS: I should like to say a few words in support of some of the points raised by the hon. member for Skeena. The minister may remember that I discussed this matter with him last year. I first took it up with the Minister of Transport, and had prepared an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act which I thought would meet the situation. The men, and the women too, I imagine, who work on coastal ships in British Columbia feel that they are being discriminated against. The department is not necessarily to blame for this, because it is only administering the sick mariners' fund according to the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act—

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. MacINNIS: —which provides that only vessels which ply between international ports or ports between two different provinces pay dues. But here is the sort of situation which arises. A ship crosses from Prince Edward Island to New Brunswick, or from New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island, a distance of nine or ten miles, and because of that, contributions are made to the sick mariners' fund and the crews are looked after in case of illness; or in British Columbia a boat goes from Vancouver to Seattle or from Victoria to Seattle and the crews of those boats are covered by the benefits of the sick mariners' fund. But take a much longer sea journey, from Prince Rupert to Vancouver, and ships operated by the same company are not covered. So the employees of these ships feel that they are being discriminated against. The minister mentioned that they are covered by workmen's compensation. That is quite true, but the workmen's compensation fund covers them only in case of accident, not in case of illness.

Let me take two cases. An employee on a Canadian Pacific boat plying between Vancouver and Seattle becomes ill with appendicitis; he is taken to a hospital and his hospital bills are taken care of out of the sick mariners' fund. A person on a sister ship running between Victoria and Vancouver, or between Prince Rupert and Vancouver—much longer distances—takes sick with appendicitis, goes to hospital, and has to pay his own hospital and doctor bills, and if he is unable to pay them while he is in the hospital he comes out with a debt which he must discharge. What is required, I submit, is an amendment to section 305, I think it is, of the Canada Shipping Act, so that this provision will be applicable to ships plying between different ports in the same province as well as to ships plying between ports in different provinces. It seems to me that the remedy is very simple. I do not see that any provincial rights enter into the matter; I do not believe any province would object to such an amendment. I ask the minister again, as I did eight or nine months ago, to take the matter under consideration and see if something cannot be done to obviate this most illogical situation.

Mr. PEARKES: I was rising to speak on the same subject. I do not profess to have anything like the detailed knowledge which the hon. member for Skeena has.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It has just occurred to me that the hon. member is going to discuss an amendment of the act. This is hardly the time to discuss it. I do not know whether the act comes within the purview of the Department of National Health and Welfare, but, if not, it would not be pertinent to the vote under consideration. The committee is considering item 573, treatment of Canadian fishermen and seamen, $15,000, and the discussion should be confined to the purpose for which that money is used.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder if, before the hon. member for Nanaimo resumes his remarks, I might speak to that point of order. In a certain sense, I believe, Mr. Chairman, your point of order is well taken, because we have passed the item dealing with the sick mariners' fund. But the sick mariners' fund is under a section of the Canada Shipping Act which comes under the administration of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I thought at one time that it was under the administration of the Minister of Transport, but that particular section, 305, of the Canada Shipping Act is under the administration of this department, and it can be discussed. There has been some discussion on it, and I do not want to speak to it further, but I suggest that the hon. member for Nanaimo be permitted to make his particular point, because the matter is one of importance.

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion has gone on at some considerable length. I was under the impression that the administration of the act came under a different department.

Mr. MacINNIS: No; it comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The CHAIRMAN: I think we should allow the hon. member for Nanaimo to make his remarks, and then we might confine the discussion to the vote under consideration.

Mr. PEARKES: I just want to add my support to what the hon. member for Skeena said, because the same problem has been brought up by the fishermen and the seamen in my own constituency. We have those boats which have been referred to as going from Vancouver to Victoria, in which perhaps a seaman who is taken ill cannot receive treatment on that tour. If, however, he goes on from Victoria to Seattle, on the same boat, on the same trip, I believe, although I am not positive, that he can receive the treatment. But there are a number of fishermen operating out from Nanaimo and other ports in my constituency who go out into the deep seas, who continue fishing for a long time and then return to these ports in British Columbia and there is a feeling amongst them that there is some discrimination and that it is not possible for them to receive some of the benefits which they believe the fishermen on the maritime seaboard receive if they go out from one of the ports of New Brunswick and happen to put back into a port in Nova Scotia.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and Reconversion — National Health and Welfare—

575. Health unit, Prince Rupert, B.C., $4,080.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Is this health unit in Prince Rupert for the treatment of seamen, as far as medical health treatment and so on are concerned?

Mr. CLAXTON: No; it is the general health situation brought on by the quite considerable concentration of troops in Prince Rupert and its area during the war.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: If that were taken away, would seamen be able to get treatment through other sources? I imagine they would get treatment through this.

Mr. CLAXTON: This vote does not assist seamen in any way.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and Reconversion — National Health and Welfare—

576. Health services, Halifax, N.S. Chloramination of water, $30,000.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am interested in this word "chloramination." What is the definition of it? I presume it is English.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is virtually the same as chlorination and is a process whereby a small quantity of chlorine, and sometimes other chemicals, are added to the water to purify it.

Mr. KNIGHT: Is it synonymous with chlorination?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and Reconversion — National Health and Welfare—

577. Nanaimo, Victoria and Prince Rupert, $11,000.

Mr. PEARKES: When will the plant at Nanaimo be handed over to the city of Nanaimo? I understood the minister to say that arrangements had been made for its disposal.

Mr. CLAXTON: Actually the plant is situated where it has always been and is operated by the civic employees of Nanaimo. All that remains is for a formal agreement to be entered into between the crown and the city. I understand that is already agreed to and nothing remains but to sign the agreement.

Mr. PEARKES: Does the same apply to Victoria?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. PEARKES: Why is the money needed?

Mr. CLAXTON: Under the agreement we are continuing to pay the cost of operating the chlorination plants until December 31, 1946.

Item agreed to.

Demobilization and Reconversion — National Health and Welfare—

578. Greater Vancouver, North Vancouver city and district, $35,000.

Mr. MacINNIS: Knowing now that chloramination and chlorination mean the same thing —

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I should explain that. The additional syllable is introduced to indicate the addition of a very small portion of ammonia. It is only an infinitesimal part.

Mr. MacINNIS: I imagine the amount of ammonia that is added does not affect the matter to such an extent that I may not raise the point which I am about to discuss. Perhaps there was a professor mixed up in these estimates. My understanding is that the chlorination of the water supply of Vancouver has been discontinued. As a matter of fact, and as a matter of history, the chlorination of the water supply of Vancouver was imposed upon the residents and the municipal authorities of that city after a strenuous fight. I do not know whether the members of this committee know it, but the water supply of Vancouver is so pure that when you chlorinate it you really contaminate it. That indeed was proven by this fact that there was a fish hatchery that was supplied by water from our water supply, and after the dominion authorities, acting in their wisdom, purified our water by chlorinating it, it killed all the fish in the hatchery. So we had the peculiar situation that the water was not pure unless it killed fish. The war being over, however, I understand that the municipal fathers in Vancouver have had the chlorination stopped. I do not see, therefore, what this vote is for. They have stopped the chlorination of the water, and I understand they are pasteurizing the milk instead. That is actually the situation, and I see no reason in the world why there should be $35,000 in the estimates to contaminate the water supply of the city of Vancouver.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not think the hon. gentleman expects me to enter into a discussion of the fundamental situation in connection with the water supply in Vancouver. That can be done by other people and the two sides of the question have been vociferously put forward by people on the spot. With regard to the question the hon. member asks, the situation is that the votes for these three chlorination plants are lumped together, and until an agreement is reached with each of the three municipalities we might be liable, under the agreement we entered into to chlorinate the water for them, to pay any expenses up to the end of the war. But if the agreements are signed, as we expect they will be, then the obligation with regard to Vancouver will terminate from March 31, 1946, and the amount provided in the vote in connection with Vancouver will not be needed. But we should have the item there, because there is the possibility of the obligation running until the formal termination of hostilities.

Mr. MacINNIS: One other question. I understand that the chlorinating machinery—I presume that is the right term—has been turned over to War Assets Corporation and that it is no longer there. If the machinery for the chlorinating is not there, then certainly the agreement has definitely come to an end as far as Vancouver is concerned and there is no need for this item.

Mr. CLAXTON: The machinery is still there.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CLAXTON: We have made very good progress and concluded all the items of this department except those that come under a separate branch for the film board, and since it is ten minutes to eleven o'clock and a very hot night I wonder if it might not meet the views of the committee to rise now.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not like to resist the suggestion that the committee should rise after a hard day's work, but there is a question relating to the estimates which I asked the minister on a previous occasion and which has not yet been answered. It will be found at page 2584 of Hansard of June 17. I said then:

Would the minister give figures indicating the incidence of venereal disease within, say, the last two years, to establish trends, including both the civilian population and the armed services?

The minister in reply, after making an explanatory statement, said he had figures for 1943-44 but could not lay his hands on them at the time. Will he kindly put those figures on Hansard, as well as the figures for 1945 if he has them?

Mr. CLAXTON: In doing that, I think I should recall to members of the committee the warning I gave about the use of figures with regard to venereal disease. The greater degree of cooperation you get, the greater the amount of reporting of the figures by the provincial and municipal authorities and by doctors, the higher the apparent rate of venereal disease. The figures, therefore, must be read cautiously and by those who are familiar with them in order to derive their true meaning. The total venereal disease in 1944 as reported by provincial health departments to the dominion bureau of statistics was 38,772 cases; in 1945, 40,527 cases. The total syphilis for 1944, was 16,475 cases; in 1945, 15,278 cases.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a reduction?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. In 1944, the number of cases of gonorrhoea was 22,282; in 1945, 25,237. In 1944, other venereal diseases amounted to fifteen cases; in 1945, twelve cases.

Mr. FLEMING: Has the minister the figures for 1943 as well?

Mr. CLAXTON: No. The reporting began only in 1943, in accordance with arrangements worked out in 1943, and I have not the figures. I do not think there are figures. If there are I shall make sure that the hon. member gets them.

Progress reported.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

CLARIFICATION AND EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS AND BENEFITS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, to provide for clarification and re-arrangement of its provisions and of the procedure to be followed thereunder; generally to enlarge the scope of the Act to extend the application of the provisions and benefits of the Act and of the qualifying period for insurance to certain veterans and merchant seamen.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRICE CONTROL

EXPIRY OF UNITED STATES LEGISLATION—RETENTION OF CANADIAN CONTROLS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I might give the house a little information with respect to the matters of price control in the United States and the attitude of this government towards the possible consequences thereof.

On June 30, the emergency legislation in the United States which authorized price, rent and rationing controls expired. As I understand it, the consequence is that there is at the present time under federal law no price control, no rent control and, with the possible exception of sugar, no rationing in the United States. There are, of course, certain states and municipalities which have taken emergency measures or maintained existing regulations which are not affected by the expiration of the federal law.

This situation has, not unnaturally, raised certain questions in the minds of many Canadians. The government feels that the first opportunity should be taken to assure parliament and the country that there is no intention of abandoning similar controls in Canada.

Developments affecting prices in other countries, particularly the United States, are, of course, not without their effect upon Canada. Our policies have, in the past, and will, in the future, necessarily continue to have such developments in mind.

Price control, rent control and the control of supplies existed in Canada before they were adopted in the United States. Canadian regulations, while similar in objective to those in the United States, have often differed quite widely both as to their form and their nature. In other words, we in Canada have followed our own course, which we believe is well adapted to Canadian conditions and to the Canadian economy. We shall continue to follow policies which we believe to be in the general interest, making, from time to time, such modifications as seem to be required in the light of internal and external conditions as they develop.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

STATUTORY AUTHORITY FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (for Mr. Ilsley) moved the second reading of bill No. 195, respecting the control of the acquisition and disposition of foreign currency and the control of transactions involving foreign currency or non-residents.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one or two comments on this bill. I rather anticipated that there would be a statement from the minister. I had understood that there was to be a motion to refer the bill to the banking and commerce committee. Did I misunderstand?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; that is correct. I had intended to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, although I have no intention of making a speech on the second reading, because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), when the resolution preceding this bill was introduced, made an extended statement outlining the purposes of the bill. He indicated at that time that after being given second reading the bill would be referred to the banking and commerce committee. That is the intention of the government, and the motion for second reading as put should include that the bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee. As the minister indicated, there is no desire to curtail debate on the second reading, although in the interest of expediting the business of the house I perhaps might express the hope that the greater part of the discussion and questions with respect to this rather technical bill might well take place before the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the suggestion of the minister and I wish to make just one or two brief comments.

This bill is one of very great importance, not only because of the matters contained in it, but because I think it is another step towards the further control of our lives by experts. Now experts are very good poeple, and in the last several years we have had to submit to them in many ways, and we are not going to get rid of that for some time. But I do feel that in considering a bill of this kind we should bear in mind its far-reaching implications, and that it is, whether we wish it or not, another step to a controlled economy.

In particular I want to make one suggestion, which can be further considered in the committee, but I am making it now in the hope that possibly it may not become a matter of party difference. The suggestion I make is that this bill should not be made of indefinite tenure, but that it should be for a limited period. The emergency powers bill was for a limited period, and I suggest it would be very desirable that this bill be for a limited period, for this particular reason: if it extends for an indefinite time it just goes on and on, and people get used to the idea, and there is no opportunity for it to be reviewed. It becomes part of the landscape. I do suggest, and this is the only point on which I shall take up the time of the house, that the government might very seriously consider whether this bill, like the emergency powers bill, might not be made for a special period. Then it could, if necessary, be extended. That would have two results. First of all, the act will have to come up and justify itself. Secondly, and perhaps most important, if it is for a special period, then those in charge of its administration will almost automatically have moral pressure put upon them to try during that period to work towards a situation where it may no longer be necessary to continue it.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss the bill at this stage. We believe that the proper procedure is the procedure being followed, to have the banking and commerce committee deal with the bill, and if there is anything further we wish to say, we can say it when the bill is reported back to the house.

There were two points made by the preceding speaker (Mr. Macdonnell) on which I should like to comment briefly. He said that this was perhaps just another step in the control of our lives by experts. Well, if there is anything that is worse than being controlled by experts it is being controlled by people who are not experts and that is what I imagine we had prior to the creation of the foreign exchange control board. I am sure the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario would be the last one to suggest that foreign exchange control when it was first introduced did not serve a useful purpose at a very critical time. As it is apparent that that critical time has not yet passed, I think the measure should be extended for a further period. Whether a time limit should be provided in the bill itself, I am not prepared to say; it is one of the things that can be discussed in the banking and commerce committee. I am willing to leave that point until the committee reports.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few comments to make regarding the general principle and purpose of the bill, because after all we do endorse the principle on second reading. On the resolution stage, on June 17 last, I stated that this group believed it would be in the interest of Canada to maintain the foreign exchange control board as a peacetime measure. We believe that the board served this country well during the war, and that it can have a very important part to play in the future. But when I said that I made it quite clear that I did not mean that in supporting the principle we approved all the policies of the board in the past or as it operates to-day.

There is one statement in the preamble which I would like to read, and then explain the situation with regard to it. At line 13 of the preamble we find the statement:

> And whereas it is desirable to provide means for achieving orderly exchange arrangements and in general discharging the obligations of Canada as a member of the international monetary fund.

When the Bretton Woods agreement was before the house for discussion last year, I think we of this group made it quite clear that we were opposed to that agreement. However, parliament decided that we should become a member of the international monetary fund, and also of the bank of reconstruction. A sufficient number of other nations agreed to join the fund, and therefore it is understood that we are going ahead with the Bretton Woods agreement, and that the machinery for the fund, and the bank, are being set up. That being so, although we are still of the same opinion, that it would be a good thing for the world at large if the Bretton Woods agreement were dropped, nevertheless, in view of the fact that it is being gone on with, we think it important that everything possible should be done to make the fund work in the interests of Canada and of the world as a whole. But we emphasize the view that we should be very careful not to sign any more agreements which will still further restrict the action of the foreign exchange control board. In saying that I have especially in mind the United States proposals for expansion of international trade.

We are convinced that the Bretton Woods agreement will not prove a success unless the creditor nations are prepared to make far-reaching changes in their trade policies. Unfortunately there does not seem to be any sign on the part of the creditor nations that they intend to make those changes. The Minister of Finance, in his speech on June 17, seemed very uncertain regarding the future condition of international affairs. He seemed to have grave doubts in his mind as to just what was going to happen. I should like to quote his remarks in that regard, to be found on page 2547 of Hansard:

> I should like to summarize what I have said in this way. The general character of the international financial and economic relations between nations which is going to prevail in the future is still uncertain. We hope that it will be one which does not call for restrictive controls and we shall do evertyhing in our power to bring this about. But we cannot be certain that the world we are going into will be what we would like to see. It may be a world of economic friction instead of cooperation.

I should like to pause there to say that I wonder whether if the minister thinks that capitalizing on the distress of certain nations resulting from the war, to force those nations into adverse, even suicidal agreements such as that of Bretton Woods, will help to remove that friction I wonder whether the minister really thinks that to force nations into these agreements helps to establish good will, restore confidence and prevent the development of the kind of friction which he seems to be afraid of. I would further ask whether the discussions which have already taken place between the United States and Great Britain on the proposed loan have helped to increase good will between those nations. I believe everyone who has read the discussions which have taken place about it in the United States and Britain must agree that the situation has been further aggravated and more friction has developed. I proceed with the minister's speech:

> We cannot demobilize our main economic defence without being absolutely certain that it will not be needed. We cannot leave ourselves in a position where our choice of domestic economic policies has to be influenced by the consideration that one policy or another may lead to capital withdrawal by foreigners or capital flight by Canadians.

Let me say here that if that is true of Canada, as a gold producer and as a nation which in the past has been able to maintain a favourable balance of payments for a number of years, how much more true must it be of those nations which are not gold producers and have had the experience of a chronic unbalance of trade in the past.

But the next statement of the minister is one to which I particularly wish to draw the attention of the house, because it appears to be a very peculiar statement to make at this time:

> We have no intention of using this exchange control legislation to restrict anything but certain types of capital movement.

This is the point I want to refer to:

> We expect to be able to avoid any interference with current account transactions.

Why should the minister say that we expect to avoid any interference with current account transactions? He knows very well that by the Bretton Woods agreement we have to avoid it whether we like it or not; we have no power under the agreement to interfere with current accounts; therefore why does he say that we expect to be able to avoid this interference? Is he starting now to doubt whether we can carry out the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perhaps he understands it a little better now.

Mr. QUELCH: The Minister of Finance was under the impression that we would be protected under article VII, which provides that when a scarcity of currency develops we are allowed to place restrictions against the imports of nations whose currency is scarce. But unfortunately article VII applies only when a scarcity of currency develops in the fund; it does not apply when a scarcity of currency develops within any one nation. The mere development of scarcity of currency within one nation does not permit that nation to place a restriction against the imports of the nation whose currency is scarce.

The minister in his speech proceeded to emphasize the need for the stabilization of exchange. But I think he must be careful not to confuse effect with cause. Fluctuations in rates of exchange, apart from speculation, are very largely the effect of adverse trade balances. Nations in the past have devalued their currencies in order to expand exports and thereby balance their trade. The monetary fund definitely limits that power under articles IV, V and VI, and under article VI proceeds to penalize a nation which is unable to balance its trade over a period of time.

Take the position of Canada prior to the war, and again to-day. The minister refers to it on page 2540 of Hansard. He states:

> With the United Kingdom, the rest of the sterling area, and with the continent of Europe, we had a surplus; with the United States we had a deficit.

Surely the logical solution of a condition of that kind would be an attempt to expand our imports from the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area, in order to make it possible for them to balance their trade with us, and either expand our exports to the United States, or, if they refused to buy, curtail our imports. Unfortunately, however, we no longer have that power. Under the Bretton Woods agreement we have given up that power, so that we are unable to restrict imports from a nation which insists upon having a favourable balance of trade with us. Under the United States proposals for the expansion of trade, that power will be still further restricted. Of course, so far as I understand it, Canada has not signed the United States proposals. Britain was forced to sign them in order to get her loan, and I think it is generally understood that Canada intends to sign as well. But again I say that if we want to make the Bretton Woods agreement succeed we should be very careful not to place any further handicaps on our foreign exchange control board.

While the minister refers to the fact that, under article VII, when a currency becomes scarce the nations are allowed to place restrictions against imports, on the other hand the nation which everyone has in mind when talking about scarce currency is, of course, the United States of America. Personally I am very doubtful indeed whether the United States will allow her currency to become scarce, because if she were to allow a scarcity of her currency with the fund, then the nations of the world would be allowed to place restrictions against imports from the United States. It is far more likely that the United States will expand her loans to other countries, or buy gold, thereby preventing her currency from becoming scarce in the fund, and thereby preventing other countries from exercising any controls or restrictions whatsoever against imports from her. Of course, by making loans, they gradually buy up the capital assets of the debtor nations, and you have a vicious form of American imperialism in operation.

One of our main complaints against these proposals is that they do not provide in reality for the stabilization of the currency at its real value, but merely in terms of gold; because no provision whatsoever is made in the Bretton Woods agreement or in the United States proposals for the stabilization of price levels. And of course the real value of money must be based upon the purchasing power within the country of its origin; that is to say, if the price level in Canada goes up, the Canadian dollar buys less, and if the price level in Canada goes down, then automatically the Canadian dollar buys more Therefore in determining the relative values of the currencies of the world, one must be governed by their existing price levels, and so long as creditor nations are willing to accept payment in goods, thereby permitting debtor countries to balance their payments, there will be little need for a nation to devalue its currency. Unfortunately, however, that is not the situation to-day, and the United States of America and Canada together must take a very large responsibility for the fact that it is not the situation. Therefore I would like to consider the act for a few minutes in the light of existing conditions instead of conditions as they should be.

The purpose of the foreign exchange control board is outlined in the report of the foreign exchange control board for 1946, at page 9:

> The purpose of exchange control was to maintain exchange stability and to conserve Canada's supply of United States dollars for essential war and civilian requirements by ensuring that it was not dissipated on non-essential purposes such as capital export.

That was the situation in 1939 at the start of the war. To-day it is to a large extent reversed. At that time there was danger of United States citizens selling Canadian securities on account of the fact that Canada had gone to war and no one knew then what the result of the war might be. People were naturally getting a little scared of what might happen and were trying to unload their holdings of Canadian securities, with the result that there was danger of a shortage in Canada of United States dollars. The situation eased from 1941 onwards, owing very largely to the Hyde Park agreement, and also to the fact that the United States entered the war. From then on United States capital flowed into Canada, and that is also referred to in the report of the board at page 27:

> In the later years of the war the inflow of capital to Canada from the United States became an important source of exchange. The inflow took the form mainly of the purchase of Canadian securities by United States investors. The movement first became marked in 1942 and rose sharply in 1943 when the gross sales of outstanding Canadian securities for United States dollars amounted to nearly $200,000,000 or almost twice the total in 1942. While there was some falling off in 1944, the total for the year still exceeded $100,000,000, and in 1945 rose again to more than $200,000,000.

Unfortunately although the war is over that practice is continuing; in 1945 United States net purchases of dominion bonds stood at $134,000,000, and in the first three months of this year net purchases of Canadian bonds by Americans amounted to $65,000,000. I think most members will agree that this is definitely not in the interests of Canada, and it could be stopped by the foreign exchange control board refusing to issue permits to residents desiring to sell bonds to non-residents. The reason I say it is not in the interests of Canadians is first of all the fact that it is very highly inflationary. The minister of Finance is constantly warning us in this house against the danger of allowing wages to rise, or allowing the prices of primary products to rise, on the ground that it is inflationary. I would point out that neither of these measures would be nearly as inflationary as large-scale selling of Canadian bonds to non-residents, because when you allow the price of wages to rise or the price of agricultural products to rise, you do to a certain extent stimulate production—you are bound to—thereby increasing production. But when you allow the sale of Canadian securities to non-residents, to Americans, you increase the amount of money in circulation without expanding production in any shape or form.

I would agree that if at the present time we had a lack of effective demand in the country, a lack of purchasing power, then the sale of Canadian securities, by increasing the amount of money in circulation, would help to stimulate production. But that is not the situation to-day. We expect it to be the situation in the not far distant future, but at the present time no one can claim that there is a shortage of purchasing power to buy production, and certainly there will not be as long as we carry on a large-scale export of goods to meet the needs of devastated areas in Europe.

It may of course be argued that this will not be inflationary if the United States dollars obtained by the sale of Canadian securities are used to purchase goods in the United States. Of course if United States dollars obtained by the sale of Canadian securities were used to purchase American goods, and those goods were brought into the country, the result would not be inflationary; but that is not the practice of the foreign exchange control board. Page 18 shows clearly that that is not their policy. The policy is to try to use American dollars to purchase securities payable in American funds so as to balance the transactions. Secondly, I think hon. members will agree that it would not be in the interests of Canada to use these American dollars for the purchase of goods, because then we would be financing consumption in this country by expanding our external debt to the United States, and there is no need to expand our debt to the United States at the present time.

Most hon. members, I believe, will agree that the only justification for the sale of Canadian securities to non-residents or residents of the United States would be for the refunding of existing obligations at a lower rate of interest, and to the extent to which that is done there is no harm. Our policy therefore should be to reduce our obligations to the United States and not to expand them. That is the main difference between the situation to-day and the situation that existed in 1939-40. At that time we had to increase imports from the United States in order to maintain the greatest possible development of our resources in this country so as to expand our war effort. In order to do that we had to increase our holdings of American dollars, and to accomplish that, we had to encourage the inflow of American capital into this country.

That was justifiable for the purpose of winning the war. At the present time, in view of the fact that the United States is our only creditor, or our main creditor, it is certainly to our advantage to do everything we can to reduce our indebtedness to the United States rather than to expand it, because we are certainly not going to solve our problems by expanding our interest payments to the United States, as would be done, or is done, when we sell Canadian bonds to non-residents.

Quoting again the purpose of the foreign exchange control board as set out at page 9:

> The purpose of exchange control was to maintain exchange stability and to conserve Canada's supply of United States dollars for essential war and civilian requirements by ensuring that it was not dissipated on non-essential purposes such as capital export.

That was the purpose in 1939, and I am sure all hon. members will agree that it should also be the purpose to-day. It is just as important in the future to see that our wealth is not dissipated by foreign investments in nations not our creditors instead of using it to expand our imports. I say "not our creditors", because if a nation is our creditor, then of course we can make an investment in that country to balance their investments in Canada. But there can be no possible justification for doing that with countries which are not our creditors.

Again we must remember the history of foreign investments. So far as Canada is concerned we have very little history in that regard; but let hon. members recall what happened to Britain under its large scale policy of foreign investments. According to Arthur Michael Samuel, in the sixty years prior to 1914 Britain lost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $16 to $20 billion of her foreign investments; and speaking from memory I believe the United States lost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $10 to $11 billion of her foreign investments between the two wars. In other words, both these nations were dissipating their wealth. A young nation such as Canada cannot afford to dissipate its wealth in that way, at least not until such time as everybody in this country has a decent standard of living. After we have achieved that, it no longer becomes so important what we do with the surplus.

I know the minister favours the idea of meeting our obligations with the United States by making advances to other nations and then by the convertibility of currency meeting our payments to the United States by converting those credits. In actual practice we might not only lose these credits but at the same time make no reduction in the debt we owe to the United States, if we suffer the same consequences that Britain suffered prior to 1914, and also the United States between the two wars. It must be obvious that you cannot have convertibility of currency without a proper regard for the balancing of trade, and until such time as creditor nations recognize and live up to their responsibility to balance their trade with other nations we cannot expect much progress on this point. Any attempt continually to use sterling balances to meet our obligations in the United States may well force Britain to default and force it out of the Bretton Woods agreement.

Already a keen fight for foreign markets is developing. Somebody was kind enough to send me a copy of the magazine called World Report with a note to look up page 34. I do not know whether this magazine came from the Department of Trade and Commerce. Maybe it came with the minister's compliments. But it has an interesting statement on page 34, which is headed: "Canada Capturing Markets in Latin-American Nations." Then it goes on:

> By quick conversion of her industry, she has gained a head start over United States, United Kingdom and other exporters.
> Canada is making an aggressive bid—

That is the way to create a good feeling with other nations, by being aggressive in this way. I continue with the statement:

> Canada is making an aggressive bid for increased trade with Latin-America. As a result of her campaign for this business, she is to become a competitor of the United Kingdom, the United States and nations of the European continent.
> Canada's objective is to boost her exports to Latin-America to eleven times their 1938 level.

In order that Britain may meet her obligations under the Bretton Woods agreement and under her loan from America, we are told that she has to expand her exports by seventy-five per cent. We are entering into competition with Britain for markets in Latin-America, and we are also trying to expand our exports. That is bound to result in keen competition. With that kind of policy I am not surprised that the minister states he views with some alarm the kind of world which may be developing, because Canada is taking an active part in helping to develop international friction. The statement goes on:

> Markets must be found for $1,750,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 worth of exports if Canada is to maintain employment and income at desirable levels, according to the opinions of dominion economists.
> The United States is expected to continue, in the long run, as Canada's best peace-time customer. The United Kingdom, which formerly tied sometimes with the United States for first place in Canadian trade, will be unable to approach her pre-war purchasing rate unless pending loans from the United States and the dominion are approved.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would the hon. member permit a question? Where is this magazine published? I got the name but I did not hear where it was published.

Mr. QUELCH: I have not seen it before. It is an interesting weekly magazine on world affairs. I think all hon. members received a copy of it.

Mr. MacKINNON: Published in the United States.

Mr. QUELCH: Was this sent out with the compliments of the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. MacKINNON: Not by me personally; it may have come from my department.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not know who sent it, but they told me to read page 34, and page 34 is worth reading.

Mr. MacKINNON: I imagine that was the opinion of the person who sent it to the hon. member.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes. I presume this article was written by a Canadian, a member of the Department of Trade and Commerce. At any rate it was written by somebody thoroughly familiar with the figures.

Mr. MacKINNON: To keep the record straight, I think the article is an observation of a United States writer in a United States magazine.

Mr. QUELCH: And the information was supplied, I suppose, either by the Department of Trade and Commerce or by some confidential source. I will not suggest that any official secrets have been disclosed. By way of comment on it I would say that the only way Britain can expand her trade and meet her obligations is by Canada and the United States buying more goods from Britain. Apparently we are not so much interested in that as we are in expanding our exports, because time and again the Minister of Finance has stated in this house that we shall use large amounts of our sterling balances not for the purpose of buying more goods from Britain but in order to meet obligations to the United States. One wonders just how Britain will be able to meet her obligations if the United States adopts the same tactics.

I was quite interested in a Canadian press dispatch which appeared in the papers under date of June 26. The heading of the article is: "United States Opposition May Delay Anglo-Canadian Wheat Pact", and it reads as follows:

> United States opposition to the proposed Anglo-Canadian wheat agreement may delay negotiations but will not prevent an agreement being reached, officials in touch with diplomatic and market aspects of the question said to-day.
> It was freely admitted, however, that the United States has presented to the Anglo-Canadian negotiators a number of factors that must be considered:
>
> These are:
> 1. The reaction in the United States if the purchase agreement enables Britain to buy wheat from Canada over a long period at a price little more than half that which American farmers are receiving.

I am specially interested in the next point:

> 2. The inconsistency of such a bilateral agreement in the light of the white paper issued by the State Department last December and endorsed by Britain calling for an international effort to remove trading discriminations and put world commerce under control of multilateral agreements ensuring free opportunity to all.
> It is understood the British negotiators, led by Food Minister John Strachey, were asked to consider what the effect of a bilateral agreement to purchase Canadian wheat would be on the congressional debate over approval of the $3,750,000,000 loan to Britain.

I read that because I am interested in the view expressed by officials of the United States, that they consider this agreement to be a contravention of the white paper. When we were discussing the Bretton Woods agreement last year we warned that by signing the agreement we would be making it difficult for Canada to make trade agreements with countries in Europe; that these trade agreements might be regarded by the United States as a contravention of the Bretton Woods agreement. Now when the first major agreement comes up, the United States apparently is objecting to it on the ground that Britain is breaking her obligations under the white paper. I take it that the white paper is not the Bretton Woods agreement but the United States proposals for expansion of world trade. Maybe that is the proposal which Britain signed, but so far we have not signed it. But an agreement must be between two people; it cannot be on the part of one only. Therefore if the countries in Europe are bound by an international agreement with the United States, it becomes impossible for us to make a contract with them which is a violation of their agreement with the United States.

Another point I want to bring out is that we are asking the farmers at the present time to accept prices considerably lower than world market prices, on the understanding that we will have a long-term agreement for the future under which they will receive good prices. Now apparently we are finding it difficult to make these long-term agreements. Again I emphasize that we must be very careful not to sign the United States proposals for an expansion of world trade until certain amendments have been made to those proposals.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have signed too many already.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes, but we do not want to make it worse by signing more. If anything, we should try to amend the existing agreements, though I know that is practically impossible. The important point is that control of foreign exchange should be for the purpose of helping to maintain the development of a nation's resources at an optimum level. As long as nations are willing to balance their trade, there need be no difficulty in stabilizing the rates of foreign exchange. On the other hand when creditor nations refuse to accept payment in goods, thereby forcing other nations into debt, currency devaluation is bound to ensue as a necessary protection. That was one of our main complaints against the Bretton Woods agreement—that while it removed a nation's defence, it did not remove the causes which made a nation want to make use of that defence. Therefore I would say the consequence of the Bretton Woods agreement and of all these international agreements may very well be not an expansion of international trade but a reduction of imports and an intensification of economic nationalism. Already we are seeing that very thing take place in Great Britain; it has been referred to on more than one occasion by Prime Minister Attlee. He has spoken of the need to reduce imports in order to meet their foreign obligations, and the need to develop their own resources to a greater extent so that they will not have to depend upon the resources of other nations. That is the attitude Britain is taking to-day after signing an agreement supposed to be for the purpose of expanding trade. Already in Britain it is having the effect of intensifying economic nationalism. So I would go so far as to say that the inevitable consequence of the operation of these various international control measures will be an intensification of economic nationalism, unless there is a complete change of policy on the part of the creditor nations, of which there is no sign at the present time.

Under the Bretton Woods agreement the Canadian dollar is to be valued in terms of the United States dollar or gold; and I understand it will be largely the responsibility of the foreign exchange control board to maintain that relationship. Suggestions have been made by a number of people, and suggestions were made in this house on June 17, that it would be in the interests of Canada to maintain the Canadian dollar on a parity with the United States dollar. When the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), I think it was, made that suggestion on the 17th I stated that I did not think it would be to the advantage of Canada to maintain parity with the United States. Unfortunately at that time Hansard dropped the word "not," giving my words the opposite meaning; but on every occasion this matter has come up in the house I have objected to the suggestion that the Canadian dollar should be placed on a parity with the United States dollar. My reason for taking that position is this: If that parity is established, either Canadian exporters will receive ten per cent less for their exports or the foreign purchasers will pay ten per cent more. In either case Canadian exports will be discouraged; and in view of the fact that the United States is our main, or perhaps I should say our only, creditor, the present need is to encourage our exports to that country rather than the reverse. If we raise the value of the Canadian dollar, in terms of the United States dollar, by ten per cent, then under the Bretton Woods agreement our currency will be raised ten per cent in relation to the currency of all nations, not merely that of the United States, because all currencies are convertible under the Bretton Woods agreement. So our primary producers may be at a serious disadvantage in competing with nations such as Australia, the Argentine, New Zealand, and perhaps in the future Russia, because of the fact that their currencies are already depreciated considerably below the Canadian dollar. Moreover, Australia, New Zealand and Russia have not signed the Bretton Woods agreement; therefore in future they will be able to devalue their currency to any extent they see fit, while we, having signed the Bretton Woods agreement, would be able to devalue our currency only ten per cent below the rate set when we joined in the agreement. Therefore it does seem to me that as long as we are under the Bretton Woods agreement, which in my opinion represents nothing more or less than laissez-faire capitalism, cut-throat competition and American imperialism, we must protect ourselves by maintaining the Canadian dollar below the United States dollar, because once we set the value of the Canadian dollar we are allowed to vary it by only ten per cent one way or the other without the permission of the fund.

So let us hope the day will come when the creditor nations will recognize their responsibility to balance their trade. Then and only then, I believe, the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar with any other unit of currency can be established on the basis of the internal price level in Canada as compared with the corresponding price levels in other countries. Then one of the main causes of international friction and international trade restrictions will be eliminated, and international trade may help promote good will and friendship. Then perhaps the minister will be able to look to the future with less fear than he looks to it to-day.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have only a word to add—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. If no other hon. member wishes to speak the minister will close the debate.

Mr. BRACKEN: I have just one question, with respect to procedure. I understand this bill is to go to the banking and commerce committee; that it will not first be considered in committee of the whole, but that after it comes back from the banking and commerce committee it will come up for consideration in committee of the whole?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): May I say just a few words in regard to this bill before it is referred to the banking and commerce committee. I have no fixed opinion as to the rightness or wrongness of continuing the foreign exchange control board, whether temporarily or permanently, though I might say that as far as one can see from the bill it is the intention to continue the board for ever. Certainly one could not have any strong objection to continuing the controls we now have until the Bretton Woods agreement comes into operation and we have at least that slight uncertainty out of the way. However, sir, I do approach the question of all these government controls from the point of view that the fewer we have of them the better off we are; and that applies to foreign exchange control as well as to any other control. There may be some advantages to some types of business men in having controls, some inefficient business men as well as some efficient ones, but on the whole I believe business men would rather do without them. I think it is in the best interests of all our people that we should have free, competitive business wherever possible; and it is a sign of weakness that we should have to resort to controls in regard to our foreign exchange. The United States, which is a strong monetary power as well as a strong physical and industrial power, does not have to resort to foreign exchange control to protect its currency or its national economy.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is the only country in the world that does not.

Mr. JACKMAN: We are adjacent to the United States. I take it my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Abbott) is acting for the Minister of Finance in his absence; and if he thinks the United States is the leading nation in the world I suppose there is no reason why we should not follow in the footsteps of that country in regard to foreign exchange control, just as of necessity, because of our similar economic conditions, we follow in the footsteps of the United States in other ways.

Mr. ABBOTT: I did not say she was the leading nation in the world.

Mr. JACKMAN: You said it was the only nation that did not have to resort to control. Certainly we all know that because another great country had taken on financial responsibility in connection with the war, by force of circumstances, the United States alone had a currency which had convertibility everywhere in the world. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) and I both remember that when we were in Portugal. The value of the pound in American currency was about $2.40, but the American dollar, which I believe was on a gold basis at that time, was the medium of exchange that could be depended on, that obviously had purchasing power. If you had an American dollar you knew you had something. I should like to see our Canadian dollar on the same basis. There may be a fear at the present time that the Canadian dollar will go to a premium over the American dollar, because intrinsically our dollar is a stronger dollar; it has more purchasing power at the present time.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a sounder dollar.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister, speaking on his own behalf, although I am sure he shares the confidence of the cabinet, says that our dollar is the stronger dollar. Why should we prefer to have it at a ten per cent discount? That is an artificial situation. Many of our industries, such as newsprint, find that the profit on their product, which is sold largely in the United States, depends upon the exchange. The United States dollar commands a premium now, and there might be great repercussions if we allowed our dollar to go to a premium over it.

This brings me to the point which I mentioned earlier, that I am quite willing that we should have control until we find out where we are going to be after Bretton Woods, which, as I understand it, will have to do with the setting of what the interrelationships of foreign exchanges are to be. Until that time let us continue it, because we may find that the Canadian dollar will not sell at ten per cent discount vis-à-vis the American dollar and ten per cent premium vis-à-vis sterling.

I should like to point to one or two considerations which are in my mind as we consider this bill, which is to be sent to the banking and commerce committee. First I should like to ask how much better off Canada would have been in 1939 than she was had we had foreign exchange controls during the thirties, with all the nuisance of the forms and regulations which foreign exchange control entails. The government of the day did a very good job in 1939 in clamping on the controls and freezing all capital movement and current account movement between Canada and other countries. We were thus able to conserve our currency, and subsequently by means of the Hyde Park agreement Canada was able to exercise a beneficial control over her international exchange account. How much better off would we have been had we had foreign exchange control prior to 1939? How much better off shall we be if we continue foreign exchange control now, with all the nuisances that accompany it, if at some future time an emergency such as a war should arise? Shall we be better off with that control than we would be if we allowed exchange to take its normal course, and clamp on the control when an emergency arises? It seems to me that if we maintain controls now, there is some validity in the comparison of a nation keeping a standing army in peace time. There are certain things a nation can afford and certain things it cannot afford because they are not worth while.

While there is relative freedom on current account as far as international trade is concerned, that is in anyone getting foreign exchange in order to purchase goods abroad, and also in selling foreign exchange which we receive for goods we have sold abroad—there is not much difficulty in connection with current account—on capital account transactions, however, there are definite restrictions. In other words if a Canadian wishes to make a new investment in the United States or some other country, he is prevented from doing so by the regulations now in force.

May I just make an observation here which I think has some consequence. I do not think it is too much to say that the fact that Great Britain through her early history had a free capital market whereby her nationals could invest money anywhere in the world, the fact that she had built up a large foreign investment reserve, the fact that that reserve was available at the outbreak of the war before the United States adopted lend-lease and when Great Britain had to pay cash on the barrel head, saved civilization. I do not think it is an exaggeration to make that statement. It certainly gave Great Britain a chance to get goods and munitions to hold off the enemy and give the rest of us on this side of the Atlantic a chance to arm for the conflict.

While some reasons may be advanced why foreign exchange control on capital account should be maintained, I wonder if we fully understand the advantages of having a free capital market. If we were so unfortunate as to become engaged in another war and found that our nationals had large investments abroad, or across the border, we could realize on those investments and immediately get goods or munitions into our country where we would need them. It would be much more valuable than to have foreign investments than it would be to have the money or capital in our own country. You are able to control your own country anyway, but you cannot tell Uncle Sam or someone else what his nationals are to do. If you have gold or investments in their countries they will be quite willing to take those investments and ship you the necessary goods. I raise this point and perhaps those in charge of the foreign exchange control board will be able to answer me satisfactorily.

There are only one or two other points, some of consequence, which I wish to raise. First, foreign exchange control is a frightful nuisance to a business man and to individuals. If you want to send a magazine subscription to the United States, or pay dues of some sort, you have to send to the bank and fill out forms. If you want a larger amount for travelling, you have to write to the board and submit everything to scrutiny.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have forgotten the limit, but I think one can get anything up to $25 without any permit.

Mr. JACKMAN: You have to go over to the bank and fill in the forms.

Mr. ABBOTT: No. You can go into a post office and get a post office money order in United States funds.

Mr. JACKMAN: I wanted $6 to send over as a registration fee to a meeting I was attending in Boston, and I know my secretary had to go and fill in those forms. Then I wanted some money for travel in the United States, and it was necessary to fill out other forms. You must surrender these forms when you cross the border.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is for travelling.

Mr. JACKMAN: I have found that the minister sometimes is not so well informed on these matters.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not omniscient, but I do know that you can get up to $25 or $50 for ordinary purchases in the United States without filling in any form.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is a matter of fact, and there is no use arguing about it. Neither of us is certain. I am only reciting my own experience. If you want a substantially larger amount for summer vacation purposes in the United States it is necessary to write to the foreign exchange control board and have them pass upon it. Then you go through the procedure of actually filling in the forms to get the exchange. If my hon. friend does not believe it, let him try it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have done it without doing that.

Mr. JACKMAN: I was not aware there was any ministerial pull.

Mr. ABBOTT: I just went into the bank in the ordinary way and filled out a form.

Mr. JACKMAN: These are matters of fact which the minister can find out himself. I leave it to him to find out. I am simply reciting my own experience in the city of Toronto.

Mr. ABBOTT: Everything is different there.

Mr. JACKMAN: However, I will say this on behalf of the board. It is convenient for traders on international account to know that they can buy foreign exchange at a fixed rate and sell it at a fixed rather than a fluctuating rate. But the danger is that if these rates are artificial and are sometimes subjected to severe readjustment—the Canadian dollar is now selling too low in world markets—the readjustment to a proper value if it comes suddenly may cause real hardship, which would be avoided if the readjustment came gradually and the higher level of the dollar was foreshadowed by gradual increases in its value.

A point of more significance than the forms in which the Minister of National Defence is so well versed is the fact that Canada is becoming the third or fourth largest trading nation in the world. We must therefore have a very large volume of foreign exchange passing through the board and through the banks. At the present time we are well on the road to becoming in a fairly substantial way an international money market, but we shall never become an international money market so long as we have regulations which prevent the free deposit and free withdrawal of money in this country, particularly on capital account. When I speak of capital account I have in mind the fact that international exchange markets have always been subjected to money which flows from one market to another, upsetting them, and I have no objection to a stabilization fund being maintained which will offset that danger to some extent at least. There is a real source of revenue for Canada in becoming a money market but if we insist on retaining the foreign exchange control board we lose all possibility of having an international money market as compared with the United States, where there is complete freedom.

Again, as one reads the bill, one sees in it a further tendency to a managed economy. There are many people in this country, I think the great majority, who do not wish to have everything regulated for them by the government. But some people, once put into power, never want to give it up, and they always find good and substantial reasons why their controls should not be relaxed. Of course there are always dangers. I never expect to live in a world without uncertainties. There are too many complications at the present time and too many different ideologies around us for us to have what some of us believe to have been the state of things in the Victorian era. If the government says that we must have controls and a managed economy because there are so many uncertainties facing us, I say that if many of these matters are left to the natural working of economic forces, which will in the long run prevail anyway, we shall know what our position is; we can plan as individuals much better than the government can ever plan, and the planning by individuals will bring about for our people a better standard of living than can ever be achieved under a managed economy.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a number of points have been made in the course of this debate on which I should like to say a word. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) and the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) have pointed out that whether a time limit should be placed on the operation of the bill is a question which may well be considered by the banking and commerce committee, where the pros and cons can be gone into.

I have no desire to review in detail the various points raised by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), or to argue the case for the Bretton Woods agreement, or whether residents of the United States have been allowed to purchase greater quantities of Canadian securities than they should have. These are matters that can be discussed before the banking and commerce committee. I do wish to refer to one statement by the hon. member for Acadia. If I understood him correctly, he said that Canada was attempting to force other nations into suicidal agreements. Let me say that so far as I am aware Canada is not attempting and has not attempted to force any other nation into any agreement.

Mr. QUELCH: Is it not true that the Minister of Finance in supporting strongly the Bretton Woods agreement said that we were actually pushing it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not dispute that the government is supporting the Bretton Woods agreement, but I do take issue with the statement that the Canadian government is forcing any other government into any agreement, suicidal or otherwise. I take it, it is not the desire of the majority of the members of this house that we should not enter into any form of international agreement, but I gather from the remarks of my hon. friend that he is against international agreements of any kind.

Mr. QUELCH: Oh, no; only certain ones.

Mr. ABBOTT: Only if they relate to monetary or trade matters.

Mr. QUELCH: If they are of a restrictive character.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not want to labour the point. But I do say that the Canadian government is in favour of international agreements which will make for greater freedom of trade.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

MONOPOLISTIC TRADE RESTRICTIONS—COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of bill No. 193, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have just a few remarks to make in amplification of what I said on the introduction of this bill and its first reading.

As hon. members know, the Combines Investigation Act provides for the investigation of trade combinations, monopolies, trusts and mergers which are alleged to have operated to the detriment of the public through limiting production, fixing or enhancing prices, preventing competition or otherwise restraining trade. Organizations of this kind which are against the interest of the public are defined by the act as combines, and participation or knowing assistance in the formation or operation of such combines is an indictable offence.

In outlining the purpose of the amendment on the first reading of the bill on June 5, reference was made to the report "Canada and International Cartels", which was tabled in the house at the last session, and which reported the results of an inquiry into the nature and effects of international cartels and other types of trade combinations. In that report it was submitted that need existed for strengthening the Combines Investigation Act "in certain matters of procedure including the avoidance of unnecessary impediments or delays in the conduct of proceedings under the act", and for "more adequate provision for the initiation of inquiries by the combines investigation commission into restraints of trade and unfair trade practices." The amendments now proposed are designed for that purpose. They do not alter the definition of the offences against which the act provides. The proposed amendments deal with certain matters of procedure for the investigation and prosecution of offences, which are at present defined of collusive, monopolistic and other unfair trade practices which unduly restrain or injure trade. The purpose of the amendments is to provide improvements in the procedure now made available for dealing with trade offences of this class, with a view to facilitating deterrent action respecting the commission of these offences.

The principal changes proposed by the bill are to be found in sections 2 to 6 and section 9. Perhaps I might make a brief reference to these sections, as it is what they contain that determines the nature and extent of the bill.

Section 2 provides for the appointment of deputy commissioners who may exercise the powers of the commissioner, subject to control by regulations made by governor in council. It is felt that if the act is to be effectively administered the commissioner cannot possibly conduct all the inquiries which should be made, and the appointment of deputy commissioners would enable them to act in his stead and carry out some duties which the pressure of business might make it impossible for him to attend to personally. It is not intended to provide that the governor in council shall appoint these deputy commissioners; they are to be appointed under the civil service commission, but one of them can be designated by the governor in council after appointment by the civil service commission to perform the duties of the commissioner in his absence or inability to act.

Section 3 authorizes the commissioner to make studies of cartels or other monopolistic conditions, and to report the results to the minister. It is felt that it is apt to be necessary after the abolition of the wartime controls to have studies made of the operations of these large trade organizations so as to prevent if possible, rather than to punish after the fact, conduct of organizations which might be injurious to trade. The impression is that business men in general do not want to be lawbreakers, and if these conditions are inquired into and representations are made to them as to the likelihood of their being in breach of public laws they will most often desist and modify their proceedings in such way as not to fall foul of these provisions of the law.

Section 4 would permit the commissioner to investigate complaints which may indicate breaches of sections 498 and 498 (a) of the criminal code. The several kinds of offences against which the Combines Investigation Act and these two sections of the criminal code provide are very closely related. It will be remembered that in 1935 the dominion trade and industry commission was given jurisdiction to make inquiries under the Combines Investigation Act and also into suspected breaches of these two sections of the criminal code. Then, after the hearing before the courts in 1937, the jurisdiction over the application of the combines act was removed from the dominion trade and industry commission, but it was left with jurisdiction to make inquiries into breaches of sections 498 and 498 (a) of the criminal code, frequently into the same matters which might be handled under the Combines Investigation Act. It is felt that it will be more convenient and avoid duplication to have investigations under control of one agency, whether nominally they be under the Combines Investigation Act or under sections 498 and 498 (a) of the criminal code. The chairman of the dominion trade and industry commission warmly approves the transfer of this jurisdiction to investigate under the articles of the code to the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, and his recommendation is concurred in by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), under whose jurisdiction the dominion trade and industry commission operates.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister permit a question with regard to the new section 10A?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am coming to that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But it is section 4 of the act. Since the purpose of these amendments is to have machinery which will operate quickly and more effectively than that previously in operation, why is it provided that only the attorney-general of Canada or the attorney-general of the province within which an offence is alleged to have taken place has the right to institute proceedings? Why, if enforcement of this act is desired, should not any group of persons have the right to lay an information under the act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is my impression, Mr. Speaker, that anyone would have the right to lay complaints, but here, if an information is to be laid as the result of an investigation conducted by the commissioner, it is felt that that should be on the responsibility of the attorney-general of a province or the attorney-general of Canada. My hon. friend knows what prejudices may sometimes exist about certain practices which appear to be monopolistic. We had an illustration of that in the investigation of the royal commission on coal policy. At more places than one people went before the commission and attempted to make out that there existed monopolies operating in the coal trade to the detriment of the public. There had been a few years ago an investigation by the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act; at that time it was found that there were practices which were contrary to the policy of the code and of the Combines Investigation Act, and proceedings were instituted on behalf of the attorney-general of the province of Quebec. They constituted quite a considerable undertaking. I know something about it, because I was retained by the attorney-general of Quebec to prosecute, and a very large bill was incurred in the prosecution of those offences. Whenever there is an investigation and there are revealed things which are detrimental to the public, it has been the policy, since the act was first introduced, in 1910, to make it the responsibility of the attorney-general of the province concerned or the attorney-general of Canada to institute the proceedings and to finance them to a judgment. A charge could be laid by anyone on his own information, on his own belief, under section 498 or 498(a) of the criminal code, if one saw fit to do so. However, for the purposes of setting in motion the action of the courts as a consequence of investigations made by the commissioner it was felt that it would be desirable to have the matter under the control of one of the attorneys-general representing the whole public.

Section 5 authorizes the commissioner in certain circumstances to initiate inquiries, and thus restores a provision to the same effect which had been in the section from 1923 to 1937. It is felt that as government wartime controls are removed there will be increasing need to avoid unnecessary delays in seeking the facts as to any private restrictive agreements that might prevent or unduly limit the supply of goods or enhance their prices unreasonably. Most of these inquiries are not extensive and are intended to be rather preventive and advisory in character, and it is the view that administration will be more effective if the power to initiate such inquiries, without the necessity of producing a complaint by six persons, is restored.

In section 6 of the bill, the first proposed subsection 2A is to consolidate and revise a restriction placed in the act in 1937. It restricts the power to enforce orders on witnesses to attend and testify, which is an ordinary and needed formal power of a commissioner conducting investigations under any statute or commission. The mere existence of this power is usually sufficient; it has been used only once under the act since 1923, and may never have to be used again, because, when it exists, one does not usually attempt to resist and require that enforcement proceedings be taken.

Here the restrictions left in this provision of the bill are quite substantial. They are not found in any other statute. It was felt, however, that in view of their insertion in 1937, after a commissioner sentenced for contempt one who happened to be a lawyer, they should be retained in substance, and it may be a good safeguard to have to apply to a judge before resort to these enforcement provisions, which are usually in all other statutes authorizing inquiries.

Subsection 2A of section 6 is intended to replace section 42 of the act as it now exists. Subsection 2B would authorize a justice, on application of the commissioner, to transfer to the commissioner things that are seized pursuant to a search warrant issued by a justice under the provisions of the criminal code. It may be necessary for the commissioner to retain for the purposes of the prosecution the papers found on execution of the search warrant, and it was felt here again that the matter should not be left to the arbitrary decision of a commissioner but that he should be required to justify before a justice the propriety of retaining the things found in the execution of the search warrant.

Section 9 represents the principal substantive change in the bill. It authorizes the exchequer court to issue an order revising or cancelling patent licensing or pooling agreements or agreements relating to the use of trade marks or patents when these have been used to the detriment of the public. The cartel report showed how patent rights may on occasion be used as pretext and shields for activities which would be clearly illegal under the Combines Investigation Act if patents were not involved. Trade marks may be used as an adjunct to restrictive patent licensing agreements or employed by themselves to enforce arrangements as to the division of markets. This section is designed not to interfere with the proper use of trade marks or patent rights or deprive patentees of rewards for their inventions. It is intended to provide a means for ensuring that trade marks and patents will not be used to control an industry to the detriment of the public at large, and to furnish a workable way of preventing persons from extending patent rights beyond their legitimate bounds by using them as instruments for restrictive cartel arrangements and for the exercise of wider and unreasonable private monopoly controls. A close analogy to the type of exchequer court order proposed already exists in certain sections of the Patent Act which are designed to prevent abuses of patents by way of failure to work the patents in this country. The proposed section has a wider purpose which makes it desirable to place it in this act rather than in the Patent Act.

The general form of procedure and order is not at variance with established court procedure respecting patents. This would allow the exchequer court, instead of making an order cancelling a patent or cancelling the registration of a trade mark, to make a lesser order, if it were felt that a lesser order than absolute cancellation would prevent the undesirable effects of the use being made of the patent or trade mark. Previously, one had to make out a case that appeared sufficiently grave to the court to justify the cancellation of the patent; whereas here, the court will not have to go to that extreme. It may be that it will be sufficient for the court to enjoin a certain form of use of the patent or trade mark.

The principal effect of section 10 is to permit the attorney general of Canada to arrange for prosecution of a combine without in practice having to wait at least three months, as under the existing section, to determine whether the attorney general of a province concerned is going to take action. Under the act as it stands, a report has to be made to the attorney general of a province and the attorney general of Canada has to wait three months to see whether the provincial attorney general will act or not before authorizing action himself. There may be cases where it would be found desirable to proceed without waiting for that length of time for a decision from the provincial attorney general. There may be such things as extend to more than one province, where it might not be right to expect that the attorney general of one province would undertake the prosecution of all those concerned in a widespread combine or restrictive arrangement. In the past the prosecution has been taken with the assistance or under the direction of the attorney general of Canada. The provincial departments have usually required the attorney general of Canada to undertake financial responsibility for the proceedings. Some of the recommendations of the report are being carried out as a result of the supply voted to the department for the combines investigation branch; and there have already been organizational changes designed to implement parts of the report of the commission. It is felt that if the house sees fit to make these amendments to the statute, we shall then have a fairly effective instrument to carry out the objectives indicated in this cartel report, which, after it was tabled in the house at the last session, obtained wide publicity and, I believe, fairly wide approval throughout the country. It is felt that there is now a responsibility upon the commission to put itself in shape to do those things which it recommended and which seem to have met with pretty general approval throughout the country.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): In my view this is an important measure. The principal act, of course, is itself most important and in principle it has my most thorough approval. I support the original act and this amendment on the ground that it is one of our most effective safeguards against socialism. Even those who are as enthusiastic supporters of the free enterprise system as I am will not deny that under free enterprise, as under any economic order, we have weaknesses. I believe that the Combines Investigation Act is one practical means of ensuring that free enterprise shall continue to be the enterprise of liberty and not of licence. Over one hundred years ago Edmund Burke said, "Liberty must be limited in order to be possessed." I hasten to add now that in my view the only proper limitation to liberty is a limitation imposed by parliament and not by any other agency, but perhaps that is by the way. It is this direct form of limitation, this direct action against particular weaknesses of our economic system, which will best purge free enterprise of what I call its Achilles heel, and will at the same time save us from the burdens, repressions and restrictions—and in particular from the danger to political liberty—which are always inherent in any general form of regulation such as socialism.

The weakness of the free enterprise system has always been that it has failed to solve completely the problems of equitable distribution of wealth. One of these problems, and not its least, is the control of combinations and monopolies which act against the public interest. The fact that these problems have not been solved before is not, I believe, due to any evil which exists in the Canadian people but rather because of the great difficulty of devising proper measures for their control. Therefore to say that because these problems exist and have not yet been completely solved we should embrace socialism is to step from the frying-pan into the fire; because apart from its most important threat to political liberty, without which no economic benefits would be of much use, nor would they be lasting, it is my view that socialism would aggravate rather than assuage the problems which confront us with respect to the distribution of wealth. Although under free enterprise the distribution of wealth may be imperfect, the fact remains that under that same system we have been able to create a system of production which has never been equalled by any other economic order and which, I believe, can never be so equalled. That ability to produce wealth to maximum quantity under free enterprise is, perhaps, the reason which makes it possible to bear our present admittedly defective system of distribution.

It is interesting to reflect that in fact we are living under socialism now and that we have, as we might expect, underproduction and an unwieldy and bureaucratic system of distribution. Under any other form of socialism practised by any other party I feel sure that we would have the same unwieldy and bureaucratic system of distribution which would be worse than the difficulties which I have admitted to exist under the free enterprise system.

It is interesting to note that in the last report of the Department of Labour for the year ended March 31, 1945, it is stated that this monopolistic danger which is inherent in all controls may be enhanced by the wartime prices and trade board. No less an authority than the chairman of the board is quoted in these words in the report to which I refer:

> In some cases the continuance of such controls beyond the emergency would have the effect of restricting competition and production, and of strengthening the position of established businesses. I think you will agree that this would be most undesirable. To create a healthy and prosperous economy more competition and more freedom for newcomers to start up in business is needed—not less. That is one of the principal reasons why such controls have to be eliminated as soon as feasible and before the emergency is quite gone rather than after.

I may say that during the past few months I had occasion to investigate and to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) one small case in which the principle referred to by the chairman of the board was, in my opinion, in fact operating to damage the small businessman in relation to his greater competitors. Therefore I believe this act goes in the right direction.

At this time I wish to say that in the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act we have a public servant who is performing a great service to the country. One has only to meet him to recognize two things about him: first, that he realizes the importance and the far-reaching effect that his job has if it is properly done; and, second, that he also recognizes what a delicate position he is in and how carefully he must guide himself in carrying out the provisions of the act without becoming a burden upon or an irritant to the business community. I believe that Mr. McGregor has a clear realization of those essential principles.

I believe that the day is surely going to come in this country when business relationships and practices such as we are dealing with here, as well as industrial relationships, labour-management relations, will be regulated by as clear a code of laws as now govern the personal relationship between man and man. Time was when such things as slavery, duelling, child labour and many less obvious malpractices between human beings were supported by law and were considered to be perfectly proper things. That time, of course, is no more. Likewise it is my belief that the time will come when all of us will recognize the evils to self and to society generally which are inherent in many trade practices which at the present time are considered, and widely considered, to be perfectly proper means of doing business. When that time comes; when we all have that realization, I am quite certain these malpractices which are themselves partly the cause of our inequitable distribution of wealth, will disappear. I feel we must all work toward that end, but in the meantime we must resist the temptation to follow the seeming short-cuts but actual blind alleys of socialism. I believe the proper regulator of ordinary business relationships and practices, and of labour-management disputes, is the same authority that now regulates our personal relations as between ourselves; and when I speak of that authority I mean public opinion translated into law, not actions of the executive government.

Before I turn to the actual bill before us, I want to make one observation as to the dangers always inherent in the other form of monopoly, what one might call public monopoly or the commodity agreement. It is very proper that under this act the commissioner does not inquire or investigate into a combination which has received the approval of this house or of any provincial legislature. I wish now simply to observe that the fact that there is no check over monopolistic practices on the part of a public body, through the Combines Investigation Act or in any other way, places upon this house and upon provincial legislatures an added responsibility to make sure that in bringing about any such combination, or in giving it their approval, for a seemingly good purpose they are not running counter to the principle expressed in this bill.

Turning to the bill itself, I want to say that I believe it really does not go far enough. Section 30, which is the only substantial alteration of the law in the bill, is very good as far as it goes, but it is entirely adjective law. It is a strengthening of the procedure and penalties laid down for the punishment and check of breaches of the law; but I see in the bill no new departure in substantive law, no development of the law in the light of our experience in business over the twenty or thirty years since the Combines Investigation Act was first enacted. It is my view, following definitely along what I said in principle, that together with its enforcement duties an equal function of this department should be the development of what one might call the legal science respecting combinations and business practices. In other words, this department should be an educational agency as well as an enforcement agency; and out of this department should come the new substantive law which will enable our business men to regulate their practices with greater certainty and less chance of having their ordinary business interfered with by investigation or executive action. I realize that the problem of developing new and substantive law in this connection is very great. It is difficult to isolate what are bad business practices from those that are tolerable; and it is my suggestion to the minister that an attempt might be made around the fringes of this whole subject so that the malpractices which we know to exist but which we cannot translate accurately into law may be confined and narrowed by the isolation of those which are clearly immoral, if you like to use that term, and which can be prohibited by law. In that connection I want to refer to a footnote at page 209 of Mr. Bladen's "Introduction to Political Economy," where in dealing with this question of the public knowledge of what is or is not evil in business practice he gives three quotations:

See J. Finkelman, "Combines and Public Policy":

"One of the gravest faults of the whole legislation is that owing to the uncertainty and obscurities of the law a person may be accused and convicted of having committed a criminal offence when he was doing no more than what he considered desirable to forward his own interests in the manner generally approved in the industrial society in which he operates. The line between what is legal and what is illegal is very fine, and his guilt or innocence may depend to a large extent on the social and economic views of the registrar, or the commissioner, or the judge and jury. It is highly desirable in the interests of justice that the offender be not punished unless he has been warned that his conduct is unsocial and until he is given an adequate opportunity of reorganizing his enterprise."

Then the author refers to the remarks of L. M. Singer, organizer of the amalgamated builders' council and other guilds, who said:

Every court and every jury may reach a different decision upon the same facts. Until they speak it is not known whether the accused is a malefactor or a benefactor.

Then he refers to the editorial comment in the Financial Times of August 1, 1941, on the conviction of a group of tobacco manufacturers and wholesalers:

The "crime" for which the companies have been convicted is one that has been considered for many years good business and merchandising policy.

In reading these words I do not want it thought that I entirely agree with all the conclusions at which those persons arrived. Rather I quote them only to show what is in fact the case, that there is considerable uncertainty in the minds of many people as to what is or what is not an offence under the law as it stands at present in relation to business practices. That is a justification for the views I have read. On the other hand, one could say what I said to myself after reading that footnote, which was that the only time I had heard this before was in the old adage, "I didn't know it was loaded". That revolver analogy is quite interesting, because the time was when in this and in all countries the possession of a revolver or a firearm in a private home was absolutely necessary for the protection of life. At that time the law was not so developed that the individual householder could feel safe under its protection and he had to provide means of protecting himself. Thus we all had revolvers or other firearms in our homes. However, that day has gone, and now all of us can feel perfectly safe and know that we shall be properly protected by the police without the necessity of our having revolvers in our homes. The result is that now we are harder on people who do not know it was loaded than we were, say one hundred years ago. By the development and strengthening of the law relating to business practices we could then be harder on those who do not know that the industrial revolver is loaded.

We must consider the problem of creating new law and the new public opinion which should precede or accompany that law. We must consider the difficulty of education in this field. I do not think that can be done through the national film board, the newspapers or any other similar agency. I would throw out the suggestion that the best possible educator would be the isolation of malpractices and their prohibition by law. We should have these safeguards as well as the general provisions that are now to be found in the criminal code and the act.

If you examine the history of investigations and prosecutions under the Combines Investigation Act since it was established, I believe in 1910, you cannot avoid being impressed with the number of cases where the commissioner felt that either combinations or improper trade practices existed but where no prosecution followed or where the courts, on prosecution being instituted following the report of the commissioner, acquitted the accused. There, again, we can see difficulties in our substantive law. In my opinion the reason for the acquittal is quite evident. Where the words "unduly or unreasonably to restrict" are found in section 498 or where in the Combines Investigation Act there are found such words as "or is likely to operate to the detriment or against the interests of the public, whether consumers, producers or otherwise," there is thrown upon the court, not the duty of determining that a certain fact or agreement exists but rather the duty of determining what we in this parliament so far have been unable to determine, whether the agreement or the facts as found by the court are in the interests or against the interests of the Canadian people. Everyone knows that very descriptive quotation, "Our lady of the common law is no economist." In a few words that is the reason why convictions are not obtained in some cases after the commissioner has found evidence of malpractice.

I have one or two suggestions to make with regard to the need for the development of substantive law, which may show the way in which these forward steps could be taken. Hon. members will recall that in the two investigations into alleged combines in connection with fruit distributors in western Canada the commissioner passed unfavourably upon the existence of control by the jobber or by the distributor over the broker who sells to the jobber and who is actually the agent of the grower. In both investigations the commissioner pointed out the danger of the exercise of that control over the broker by his natural antagonist in business. The broker would be disposed to favour the jobber to the disadvantage of the grower, whose agent he was.

If the commissioner's findings were so in fact, and I believe in the first case they were held to be so by the court upon prosecution, it would seem to me that there is a clear case which could be isolated and which could be enacted into substantive law in order to ensure that the business agent will have a single loyalty and not be controlled by the person to whom he is selling.

Then, again, we have cases of price fixing at the retail level by the wholesaler or by the manufacturer or by associations of wholesalers and manufacturers. It is my view that we should set our face against price fixing in business. I do not like public price fixing in principle, and I certainly like it less in private. Prima facie a lower price to the consumer brought about by competition is a good thing, and the lower the price can go, the better. If at any time, particularly in times of depression, there is need for collective action to prevent the demoralization of a market, then I suggest that application could be made to parliament by those interested—this application should not be to the government or to a commissioner but to parliament itself—for the institution of a marketing board to regulate prices, preserve the market from demoralization and perhaps to maintain employment.

It is my view that only in depression times would such an application be necessary. In normal times of buoyant business one does not find these combinations arising so much, nor does one find that prices go down to such a level that demoralization sets in. It might be interesting to consider what happened in British Columbia where we had a peculiar situation in pre-depression time in the marketing of fruit. Our markets were far away and they were difficult of access to the grower. There was created a natural products marketing board under provincial legislation to assist that body of our economy which had a clear need. Later on, when the depression set in and all markets were becoming shaky and tending toward demoralization we had a succession of boards set up on the Pacific coast covering milk, potatoes and many other products. Of course we have a great example of price fixing approved by the government with respect to the pulp and paper industry in Quebec and Ontario. It is my view, although I do not pretend to have studied the matter to a finality, that we might well simply make unlawful private price-fixing agreements, and allow those whose markets are so peculiar as to require collective action to go to their respective legislatures or to this parliament for the necessary authority.

In this field of legislation we cannot expect miracles all at once. What I should like to see is steps taken progressively over the years in prohibiting those malpractices which are capable of isolation. As we go along over a period of years I think we would find that such a course would have a beneficial effect on the distribution of the wealth of the country.

Great emphasis should be placed by the minister upon the education of the public through the development of substantive law and also by action of parliament and of the judiciary to check those practices which tend against the public interest. He should particularly avoid the extension of action by the executive, which in my view amounts to regimentation, whereas the action of parliament and of the judiciary amounts to wholesome and progressive regulation.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) will not mind if my first words are words of congratulation upon his progress in social thinking since he came into this house. But I regret that I am not able as yet to congratulate him on the clarity of his thought. He began by saying that he favoured this measure because it was a means of combating or retarding socialism, and then before he had made much further progress with his speech he told the house that we have socialism already. If we have socialism already, obviously the thing to do is not to retard it but to do everything we can to facilitate its development and make it more and more useful.

I cannot, however, agree with his conclusions because they were negative. He would use the law, the courts and the police to stop the malpractices and the exploitation of the community by corporations which have got control of our means of life and are using it not for the purpose of providing the community with what they need but to make private fortunes for themselves out of the needs of the community. Obviously the remedy is not the appointment of more policemen but to take over the operation of these industries by the people themselves and operate them for the benefit of the people.

Mr. MERRITT: You mean, by the government.

Mr. MacINNIS: The government is a government of the people and acts on behalf of the people.

I can agree with my hon. friend that this bill does not go far enough. In so far as it goes it is made necessary by the public demand, and the effect which that public demand has on the government, for some form of control over monopolistic corporations.

There is another thing in which I agree most heartily with the member for Vancouver-Burrard, and that is in his remarks with regard to the commissioner. It is my good fortune to have known the commissioner for almost the fifteen years or so that I have been in this house. I have watched his work in his department, and I can agree with the hon. member that he has done a good job in so far as the law would allow him to do it.

Canada is relatively a young industrial country. Within the lifetime of the older members of this house and perhaps of those like myself who are not so old we have seen this country develop from a nation of handicrafts to an industrial nation with huge combinations and monopolies. As far back as 1910 we had our first combines law. Since then, we have had a number of commissions investigate industrial conditions in Canada. Perhaps the most notable of them was the price spreads and mass buying commission, the chairman of which was the Hon. H. H. Stevens, who was the first minister of trade and commerce in the Bennett government. The commission was appointed in 1934. In the introduction to its report made in 1935 the commission says:

> At first sight, indeed, it appeared that the separate and distinct problems which emerged in the evidence called for separate treatment and almost separate reports. On closer study, however, it became clear that many of the grievances complained of, and the problems disclosed, were manifestations of one fundamental and far-reaching social change, the concentration of economic power. This idea, therefore, runs through the whole of our report and gives it a certain unity which it might not otherwise possess.

The Combines Investigation Act in the first instance was brought into being because of the power of combines to control and use the means of production in this country, not for the benefit of the people, but for their own profit. There was an amendment to the act in 1935, and the late leader of this group raised the question of giving publicity to the commissioner's reports. My memory is that the government of the day was opposed to doing that; I am not sure whether it was made the law or not. I should like to read a very short statement by the present Minister of Finance (Mr Ilsley), who was a member of the price spreads and mass buying commission. He did not sign the whole report, or at least he signed it with reservations.

He said, as reported in Hansard of 1935, page 3474:

> I just want to add to what I said that the evidence before the price spreads commission revealed a startling concentration of business in Canada, great numbers of large corporations and what the experts call monopolies and quasi-monopolies. Times are changing. It may have been quite proper twenty or thirty years ago to be very careful as to what publicity you gave to matters of this kind, but it is highly important in these latter days that the public have all the facilities possible for coping with these great concentrations of industry, and to that end it seems to me important that the public be acquainted with the true state of affairs.

Then he continued:

> This act is being amended not only to cover combines but to give better facilities for coping with monopolies such as mergers and the like, and it is exceedingly important that the public be acquainted at once on the conclusion of an investigation with the true state of affairs. If for instance 85 per cent of the packing industry gets into the hands of one company, which is what would happen if two of the largest companies were to merge at the present time, that is a fact which the public should know, and know at once.

I wanted to read that because it shows how strong monopolies are in this country and what very slight moves are necessary on their part to make them even stronger.

Again, in the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial affairs, which was later than the price spreads report, I find this at page 148 of book 1:

Business organization has everywhere become increasingly monopolistic. In Canada industry, commerce and finance are highly centralized and in many branches a few enterprises dominate the field. Under such conditions the maintenance of prices is possible in the face of declining demands. The monopolistic producers may consider that they are better off by selling less at higher prices than by selling more at lower prices.

That, of course, has always been the main purpose of a monopoly, a combine or a cartel —to sell less for more. You are not going to eradicate that tendency by the policeman's baton or by the fear of a term in gaol, particularly when corporations have such great financial means at their command to protect them from going to gaol. This report continues:

Consequently, the burden tends to fall upon the workers who lose their jobs through the reduction in output and on the exporters whose costs are thus held rigid while their prices on world markets are sharply reduced.

I am not surprised that, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard studies these things, while he is still bracing himself against socialism, he agrees that we have to do something. To doubt is the beginning of wisdom.

I need not say anything more to show that Canada is the home of many monopolies and perhaps cartels as well. I imagine that hon. members have read the report on "Canada and International Cartels" which was tabled in this house at the last session. This group have been drawing these matters to the attention of parliament in season and out of season ever since we have been here. We continued to do so during the war. Cartels did not decline during the war; they prospered and are stronger than ever they were. At the beginning of 1943 a special parliamentary committee was set up to hear evidence regarding the Aluminum Company of Canada and a special depreciation of $164 million which was given to it by this government in addition to the wartime profits that were made by the company. The committee admitted in the report to the house that an international holding company, located in Switzerland, limited world production of aluminum, fixed world minimum prices, and, further, that the German producer was a member of this holding company. It further pointed out that from 1935 this aluminum cartel, by agreeing to restrict production to the needs of domestic markets, allowed Germany to expand aluminum production enormously. The cost of that may or perhaps may not be computed in the lives needlessly lost during the recent war. Recently the United States court of appeal ruled that the Aluminum Company of America and Aluminium Limited of Canada were engaged in cartel agreements. In addition to this, the cartel's report to which I have referred, a report ordered by the Canadian government, may I point out, states, at page 34:

The aluminum industry throughout the world has been dominated by a small number of firms since it became of commercial importance toward the close of the nineteenth century. The first cartel was formed in 1901 and the latest, and most effective, Alliance Aluminum Company of Basle, was set up under an agreement made in 1931 and renewed in 1936. The present Canadian producer, Aluminium Limited, or its predecessors entered into each cartel. Aluminium Limited was formed in 1928 and received from the Aluminum Company of America practically all its foreign properties in return for common stock, which was then distributed to shareholders of Alcoa. The new Canadian company, Aluminium Limited, became a member of the Alliance Aluminum Company of Basle with a production quota of 28·58 per cent, compared with 21·36 for the French producer, 15·42 for the Swiss, 19·46 for the German and 15 for the British. Aluminum Company of America was not a party to the cartel arrangement, but it seems to have been accepted that Alcoa would not upset the market outside the United States while the cartel arrangement would preclude any competitive sales in the American market.

The control of the world trade in aluminum was to be achieved by the Alliance through three devices:

(a) by fixing an Alliance buying price at which it would purchase aluminum from any member producing within its quota;

(b) by regulating the production quotas of its members, thus protecting itself against actually having to buy raw aluminum at the price fixed under (a);

(c) by holding surplus stock off the market (the 1931 agreement provided for the purchase, at a stated price, of surplus stocks in the hands of members).

Then, at page 35, we find this:

In view of the monopolistic character of the aluminum industry in most producing countries and the national interests involved, some positive form of intergovernmental action may be required in this field in the post-war period to avoid undue restriction of production.

I submit that positive action means not merely action through the courts. Then, again, we have C.I.L., that is, Canadian Industries Limited, which is a wholly-owned subsidiary of du Pont of the United States and Imperial Chemical Industries of the United Kingdom. It was stated in the press a few days ago that the United Kingdom government was making plans to nationalize Imperial Chemical Industries in that country. In 1939 the directors of du Pont passed a resolution permitting this Canadian industry, that is Canadian Industries Limited, to export during the war. If they could permit this Canadian company to export during the war, it meant that the Canadian company had not the right to export before the war. Here is a flagrant example of pre-war restrictive policies on the part of the monopolies—a private company in one country deciding what one of its branches in another country shall or shall not do.

I doubt whether there is in the bill before us, when it is passed by this parliament, anything that will prevent that kind of thing. It is stated in the report that international cartels rest upon and arise out of national monopolistic organizations. There must first be a monopoly of a national character and that monopoly extends to the international field. I quote again from the report:

The restrictive practices followed by international cartels are similar in character to those engaged in by domestic trade combinations. In fact, the agreements are in most cases made effective through the actions of domestic combinations or monopolies.

The report goes on to cite a number of combines, and one of the examples mentioned is that of fertilizers, particularly potash, nitrogen and phosphorus, of which Canada imports about $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 worth annually. That was before the war. Prices were deliberately kept high for this product. Production of the materials was restricted, with the ultimate result that the farmers suffered; and when the farmers of a country suffer, the whole population suffers. Another example given was that of magnesium refractories. However, since all this is in the report I will not take up the time of the house to deal with it. Let me quote briefly from page 55:

To the extent that cartels attempt to resist change and maintain the status quo, to prefer security to progress, they tend to impoverish the world. In the post-war world this will be a particularly undesirable attitude. In the first place, the great technological advances of the war period must be applied to peace-time industries. New competitive products and new sources of supply of old products will emerge. Such new developments must not be throttled at birth by defenders of the status quo.

If my hon. friends think they are going to prevent that sort of demonstration of power by court action and not by positive action, in the form of creating industries which these people will not build, they will be greatly disappointed.

In the second place, the development of backward countries must take place if the promise of "freedom from want" is intended to apply to more than a small fraction of the world's population . . . Industrialization of undeveloped countries will provide immediately new opportunities for investment and the sale of capital goods, and should assist initially in maintaining a high level of employment in the older industrial countries.

But that will not be possible as long as we are thinking in terms of high prices rather than in terms of quantity of production; and monopolies—indeed all private business—must, because of their very nature, think of prices rather than of quantity and quality.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. KUHL: The corner grocery store too?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. That is why we have to have inspectors of weights and measures.

Mr. KUHL: You do not want to socialize the corner grocery store.

Mr. MacINNIS: The corner grocer is in that business not because he wishes to be but because of the competitive struggle in which he is engaged. By reason of that struggle he thinks it is his best way of making a living. But these corner grocers go bankrupt by the thousand every year under the competitive system. It was only during the war years when we were all prosperous that such bankruptcies fell to a very small number.

Mr. KUHL: There was a lot of money afloat then.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not care to enter into an argument with my hon. friend over this because when he talks he mostly talks over my head.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is obvious.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is why I said it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member who has the floor must not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I read another passage from page 66:

The allocation of markets through restrictive arrangements made by private interested parties impinges on government authority over foreign trade and may nullify national trade policies developed to serve wider public markets. Government policies to encourage either imports or exports may prove ineffective if private barriers to such trade are erected by cartels. The reservation of the domestic market to particular producers may be as effective as the prohibitory tariff in barring imports. The allocation of import or export quotas by cartel agreement subjects foreign trade to quantitative limitation, though such control may run counter to public policy. Ways must be found to prevent private business organized as cartels from supplanting government in the establishment of such commercial policies.

I submit that there is nothing in the Combines Investigation Act and nothing in the amendment before us that provides ways of preventing private business organized as cartels from supplanting governments in the establishment of commercial policies.

Then again:

Cartel arrangements which impede industrial innovations and slow down the effective development of new opportunities for investment tend to diminish the supply of goods available for human use. Attempts by cartels to protect old investments by limiting the introduction of useful new techniques and new production would have a prejudicial effect on government policies to secure high employment.

At a time when the purpose of this government, as stated by them almost every day, is to secure high employment, the first thing that they should do—and they may not succeed even in that—is to make sure that their policies are not impeded by the control over the resources of the country, both industrial and natural, by a few individuals or corporations.

I shall give another quotation from page 68, which reads as follows:

The following might be considered in the further development and application of Canadian policy relating to both domestic and international practices in restraint of trade:

(a) The full utilization of Canadian legislative powers with respect to criminal law,—

That is what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is advocating.

—including investigations, publicity and prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act, tariffs, import and export trade, taxation, patents, trade marks, public ownership, including crown companies and the disposal of war assets, and public regulation, in so far as such powers may be constitutionally applied.

This report was not made by a C.C.F. commission, but by a commission of experts appointed by the government. They had full information on what was happening to the Canadian economy and to world-wide economy. According to this statement, they were convinced that legislation in itself, so long as it is confined to investigation and prosecution, is not sufficient to meet the situation. What has happened in Canada is happening in every industrial country in the world.

In May, 1944, Wendel Berge, then attorney general of the United States said:

Make no mistake—the war has not interfered with cartel plans. Cartel agreements invariably provide for the contingency of war. Long before the war, cartels worked out a modus vivendi—a method of continued existence—for they felt that their relations must be preserved, war or no war. Thus we find American and British cartelists agreeing to preserve the German position in Latin American markets after the war. Agreements between the cartel members of the countries now at war provide for a resumption at the war's close.

I think I have said—and I merely quoted from publications which are available to every hon. member—sufficient to prove to us that it is desirable not only that we pass this legislation but that we give every facility to the commission or commissioners who may be appointed to carry on the work which they have done so well during the years, having regard to the limitations imposed upon them. We must also take more positive steps if we are to make the natural and industrial resources of this country available to the people so that wealth production will be limited only by our willingness to work.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): I wish to commend the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and those associated with him for having introduced these amendments to the Combines Investigation Act. I think they will serve the public interest and they are, therefore, a step in the right direction. Without any hesitation I should like to endorse the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) when he referred to the splendid work done by commissioner F. A. McGregor. I often think that few people in Canada are aware of their great indebtedness to that official.

In speaking on this topic this afternoon let me say at once that, generally speaking, I have no quarrel with combines or cartels as such. It is only when certain combines conflict with the public interest, when for selfish purposes they attempt to restrain trade, when by so-called "gentlemen's agreements" or otherwise, they endeavour to eliminate competition, thereby to gain monopolistic privileges; it is when that sort of thing is attempted that I am prepared, as I believe thousands of other Canadians are, to fight to the limit any such cartels, no matter what label they bear.

I am particularly interested in the attitude of what appears to be two such combines operating in Canada at the present time, but I shall discuss only one of them to-day. I may return to the other at a later date. Here I want to emphasize the fact that I do not for a moment believe that all combines are operating on purely selfish principles. Far from it; on the contrary, I believe that combines or unions among business or manufacturing firms often result in lower operating expenses than might otherwise be possible. If a reasonable percentage of the reduction is passed on to consumers without any restraint of trade or where there is no suggestion of monopolistic practices, the existence of a cartel may be amply justified. At the same time the individual retailer, to whom some reference has been made by the last speaker and some others, operating on his own, in a centre large or small, should not be forgotten, and it must be kept in mind that other factors frequently enter into the community picture, more important perhaps than a trifling difference in the cost of commodities. No one will deny that many a retailer, because of his initiative, his business ability, his fine public spirit, is of untold value in his community.

I do not wish to take up time in generalities, but I want to make special, and I trust, fair reference to the cartel which I have in mind. In view of a situation existing in the western provinces, which would seem to be completely unjustifiable, and desiring to have correct information at the proper time, I placed upon the order paper on March 28, 1946, a number of questions which were duly answered as follows:

1. Where are the head offices of Canadian Industries Limited, located?

Answer: (from the Secretary of State Department)

Letters patent incorporating Canadian Explosives, Limited, dated 18th November, 1910, provided for the head office of the company to be at the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec. By supplementary letters patent dated 20th June, 1927, the corporate name was changed from Canadian Explosives Limited to Canadian Industries Limited. The annual summary of the company filed under the provisions of section 121 of the Companies Act, as at the 31st March, 1945, recites its street address as 1135 Beaver Hall Hill, Montreal, Quebec.

2. Is this company associated with any non-Canadian companies that are members of an international cartel? If so, what companies and what cartels?

Answer (from Department of Justice)

Canadian Industries Limited has been associated with Imperial Chemical Industries, Limited, of Great Britain, and E. I. du Pont de Nemours and Company of the United States in the general field of chemicals and chemical products. Canadian Industries Limited had agreement with other non-Canadian companies respecting patents or manufacturing rights including an agreement with National Lead Company of the United States with respect to titanium compounds.

Then questions 3 and 4:

Are any of the products of Canadian Industries Limited protected by Canadian tariffs? Is the manufacture of small arms ammunition so protected? If so, at what rate?

The answer from the Department of National Revenue was:

The rates of duty on small arms ammunition are as follows:

British preferential tariff .....10 per cent
Intermediate tariff .....27½ per cent
General tariff .....30 per cent

When the product or manufacture of Great Britain and imported direct to Canada, there is a discount of 50 per cent from the British preferential tariff, or 5 per cent net.

Then question 5:

What has been the total amount of small arms ammunition imported into Canada each year from 1943 to date?

The answer by the Department of Trade and Commerce was:

With reference to part 5 of the question by Mr. Matthews (Brandon), notice of which appeared in Votes and Proceedings No. 2, part 1, the dominion bureau of statistics do not classify small arms ammunition separately for statistical purposes.

Those were the questions I asked, Mr. Speaker, and that is the information I received from different government departments.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. J. E Matthews.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

COOPERATIVE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern) moved the second reading of bill No. 197, to incorporate Cooperative Life Insurance Company.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that the sponsor of this bill, the hon. member for Rosthern, will want an opportunity to explain this measure more fully than he did on its introduction.

Mr. TUCKER: The purpose of this bill is to incorporate a group of cooperators in Saskatchewan now incorporated as a provincial company. They desire to extend their activities into other parts of Canada. When the dominion company is incorporated it will take over the business of the provincial company. The bill provides that this can be done only with the approval of the treasury board and on a vote of two-thirds of the shareholders of the provincial company called together for that purpose. They cannot enter into business until a notice to that effect has been published in the Canada Gazette by the superintendent of insurance after he has satisfied himself that all the requirements of the act have been complied with. It will be my intention to move that this bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee where any other details may be gone into. I have been informed by the superintendent of insurance that he has no objection whatever to this bill receiving the assent of this house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the committee on banking and commerce.

NATIONAL HOLIDAY

GREETINGS FROM GREECE AND MESSAGE OF APPRECIATION IN REPLY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Canadian Parliament
Ottawa

The fourth Hellenic revisionist chamber on a motion voted unanimously salutes through you the courageous Canadian nation friend of Greece on the occasion of its national holiday. Common ideals for the liberty and prosperity of men bind us closely forever, and as often as necessity requires, our peoples will be capable of giving joyously the example of sacrifice and virtue. We pray you to convey to the Canadian people our friend and ally the sentiments of brotherly friendship and the good wishes of the Hellene people.

Theotokis, President.

With the consent of the house I intend to send the president of the Hellenic Chamber the following message in your name:

The members of the House of Commons of Canada wish to express their appreciation for the message received from the fourth Hellenic revisionist chamber extending their sentiments of friendship and their good wishes to the Canadian people, on the occasion of their national holiday, and beg in return to convey to the Hellene people the assurance of their everlasting admiration for the sacrifices so generously and courageously contributed by them to the cause of peace in the world.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for the second reading of bill No. 193, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, prior to the house rising at six o'clock I was citing some questions which I had placed on the order paper last March and the answers given to them. My reason for having asked those questions, bearing directly as they did upon Canadian Industries Limited, was due to a situation which is set forth and explained by Merchants Consolidated Limited, an old and reputable wholesale firm in the city of Winnipeg of which some four hundred retail merchants in western Canada are members. As hon. members know, I am not in the habit of trespassing unduly upon the time of this house; but because of the number of people interested in this matter, and particularly because of the principle involved, I desire to take the time to place upon the record a brief, issued by Merchants Consolidated Limited so that the Canadian public may judge for themselves the strength or weakness of the situation. I do this not necessarily in the interests of Merchants Consolidated Limited but because, as I have suggested, there is a principle which should be ventilated in discussing the bill now before the house. Here then is the position of Merchants Consolidated Limited as set forth in a letter from them dated November 7, 1945. This letter tells an interesting story, and is as follows:

To our shareholder merchants:

As instructed by the board of directors and the shareholders of Merchants Consolidated Limited, we are writing to advise you of the situation that we face in regard to our ammunition supplies.

In 1914, a number of the better type of general store and hardware merchants of Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan, noting the inroads being made into retail distribution by the corporate chain-mail-order houses, and realizing that this type of distribution was detrimental to the community centres of the prairies, met together to discuss the possible establishment of their own wholesale house, with the object in view of establishing economies in the operation that would result in a more favourable scale of prices to the consuming public and a continuation of prosperous community centres on the prairies.

Merchants Consolidated Limited was organized a few weeks later. A wholesale house was established in Winnipeg and a stock of groceries, dry goods, shoes and hardware merchandise accumulated.

Opposition to a company of this type was early in evidence, and for some years a substantial percentage of the time of the company's management and buyers was devoted to an endeavour to gain for the company recognition as legitimate wholesalers by Canadian, British and American manufacturers.

This was accomplished early in the 1920's in both the grocery and shoe divisions of the company's business, and, with one notable exception, also in the dry goods field.

Recognition, however, was not gained nearly as rapidly in the hardware branch of the company's activities, but, nevertheless, substantial progress was made.

Prior to the war, the company was forced, in order to supply a full range of hardware items to its merchants, to purchase a limited number of lines in the United States of America, although these lines were made in Canada, but were denied to the company by the Canadian manufacturers of them.

The declaration of war, and the institution of a very high rate of exchange for United States currency, and the adoption of a ten per cent war tax, raised the company's costs on these commodities. However, in spite of this, and in spite of the war needs of the United States government, the company was reasonably successful in supplying its merchants with these lines of merchandise.

A number of years ago, the company endeavoured to purchase its ammunition on the same basis as other western wholesale hardware houses from the one and only company making this type of merchandise in Canada—Canadian Industries Limited, with head office in Montreal. The company's management was unsuccessful in persuading this organization to recognize the company as legitimate wholesale buyers at that time.

In order to obtain supplies from a service standpoint, the company was forced to buy from a competitor, at, of course, substantially higher costs than those enjoyed by the company's competitors engaged in a similar line of business.

From time to time, representation was made to Canadian Industries Limited, without satisfactory results.

Shortly after the commencement of the war, it was pointed out to the company that one of the reasons that the company had failed to gain recognition as legitimate hardware wholesalers, with every Canadian manufacturer, was because of the general nature of the company's business. It was suggested that if the company segregated the hardware division from the general business, the company's few purchasing problems would be solved.

Early in 1944, the company obtained a charter for, and established Falcon Hardware Limited, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Merchants Consolidated Limited, and purchased a large building close to the company's premises, and established therein the new company.

In the fall of 1944, after this had been accomplished, the management of the company called upon the official in charge of the explosive division of Canadian Industries Limited, at the head office of the company in Montreal, and informed him of the company's action, and once again requested recognition as legitimate wholesalers.

During the course of the discussion, the Canadian Industries Limited official pointed out that ammunition was not denied to the company, as the company had made arrangements to purchase its supplies through a competitor. Your management pointed out that the company was penalized by the amount of profit taken by the competitor on the company's business, and that the company, as a legitimate wholesaler, was entitled to buy on a direct basis.

It was further pointed out by the Canadian Industries Limited official that shareholder customers of the company could purchase ammunition from the other wholesalers of the west. The management pointed out, in reply, that over 400 of the leading retail merchants of the prairies had invested substantially in a wholesale company for the privilege of purchasing their goods through that company, and they desired to enjoy this privilege in any and every line of merchandise.

A further meeting with this and other officials of the company was set for the following day, but due to the sudden passing of one of the joint general managers of our company, it was necessary for the engagement to be cancelled.

Early this spring (1945) the management once again called upon the official in charge of the explosive division of Canadian Industries Limited, and after discussing the matter for over two hours failed to obtain a satisfactory reply, and also failed to obtain a satisfactory reason for the manufacturer's attitude.

Your management pointed out to this official that there are in the city of Winnipeg five wholesale hardware houses, including Falcon Hardware Limited, that the other four are on the direct list for ammunition and that he was at a loss to understand why the boycott against the company was persisted in.

Canadian Industries Limited were well aware of the company's purchases through the competitor, and under date of September 11, in reply to a telegram from the company, requesting that they transfer the company's allotment of ammunition to a direct charge to Falcon Hardware Limited stated—"in view of many factors involved in your proposal we would like to postpone a reply regarding 1946 policy until mid-October when we look forward to full discussion with you in Winnipeg."

Early in October, two officials of the explosive division of Canadian Industries Limited called upon the management of the company at Winnipeg and after a lengthy discussion, the company was informed that no change whatever would be made in the policy of the explosive division of Canadian Industries Limited towards Falcon Hardware Limited, although no sound reason for such action was advanced and that Canadian Industries Limited would not sell ammunition to Falcon Hardware Limited.

Canadian Industries Limited enjoy a customs tariff protection on ammunition against manufacturers in the United States of America of 27½ per cent and, of course, in addition, the benefit of 10½ per cent exchange. This very substantial protection makes it impossible for Falcon Hardware Limited to import into Canada ammunition at competitive prices.

[Mr. J. E Matthews.]

On the high power shotgun shell, made by an American manufacturer in Minnesota, which is comparable in quality to the Imperial shell made by Canadian Industries Limited, the price f.o.b. Minneapolis, less trade discounts, is $31.70 per thousand. The exchange of 10½ per cent amounts to $3.33, the import duty of 27½ per cent is $9.63, the sales tax of 8 per cent is $3.57 and freight $1.10, making a laid down Winnipeg cost of $49.33 per thousand.

It is the company's understanding that the cost of imperial shells laid down to wholesalers in Winnipeg, who are on the direct list, from Canadian Industries Limited, is $41.87 per thousand.

According to a suggested price list governing selling prices of Manitoba wholesalers to retailers, effective January 2, 1941, and still in effect, imperial 12 ga. shells are listed at $53 per thousand. This represents a mark-up of 26·53 per cent as profit to the wholesaler.

It is obvious from the above-mentioned facts that the company is being discriminated against by the explosive division of Canadian Industries Limited and for which no satisfactory explanation has been advanced. It can further be pointed out that all other divisions of Canadian Industries Limited recognize the company as regular wholesale buyers and extend to the company all terms, discounts, et cetera applying to legitimate wholesalers.

It is the considered opinion of the board of directors of the company that Canadian Industries Limited should either desist from the present discrimination and boycott, and sell its ammunition to Falcon Hardware Limited on the same basis as they sell to all other wholesalers or that the customs tariff on ammunition should be reduced immediately from 27½ per cent to 7½ per cent, to enable Falcon Hardware Limited and any other Canadian buyer who is being treated in a similar way, to lay ammunition into Canada at prices no higher than those charged by Canadian Industries Limited.

Further, it is the opinion of the company's board that no manufacturer in Canada, enjoying tariff protection, should be permitted now, or at any time in the future, to withhold goods from any legitimate distributor, particularly if the manufacturer enjoys a complete monopoly in his field as does Canadian Industries Limited on ammunition.

Yours very truly,
Merchants Consolidated Limited.

November 7, 1945.

If that brief by Merchants Consolidated Limited, a firm that has done business in this country for thirty-two years, does not impute restraint of trade and discriminatory practices, I do not know what does. Surely Canadian Industries Limited have an explanation. Well, they have what purports to be an explanation, and here is what they say: I quote from the submission they made under date of January 26, 1946:

The two main objectives of our distribution policy on sporting ammunition have been

1. To obtain the widest possible retail distribution of our product through hardware and sporting goods outlets.

2. To supply the largest possible share of Canada's relatively small ammunition market, as maximum volume is necessary for low cost production and maintenance of employment in our factory at Brownsburg, Quebec, where 350 employees are normally engaged solely in the manufacture of sporting ammunition.

I suggest that those two objectives when you analyse them may be reduced to one simple sentence, namely this: "We want to obtain the widest possible retail distribution of our product." Well, no one could very well condemn that ambition on the part of any firm. I suggest that in the stand I am taking to-night I am trying to assist C.I.L. in a wider distribution of their product rather than to curtail them. But if C.I.L. are really yearning for expansion as they would suggest, why do they refuse to sell, except at a higher price level, to the wholesale firm of Falcon Hardware company of Winnipeg, which in turn would be distributing to approximately 400 business firms in the western provinces who are stockholders of the Falcon, and whose thousands and thousands of customers are at present deprived by C.I.L. of advantages enjoyed by other Canadian citizens? It would look to me as though C.I.L. is missing a substantial channel for increased distribution, and I can only guess, but I think it is a fairly good guess, as to the reason.

Later in their submission, C.I.L. point out that in keeping with their policy of adequate distribution, a worthy policy I admit, they now sell to eighty wholesalers, who in turn supply 7,000 retail outlets. Well, if their professed policy of adequate distribution is to be genuinely and sincerely adhered to, does it not seem passing strange that C.I.L. in their yearning for expansion are, as I have said, unwilling to increase their wholesalers from eighty even to eighty-one, their retailers from 7,000 to 7,400 or more, and their customers by many thousands? I must say that I have never in all my life seen what seems to me to be a more glaring or a more stupid contradiction in two attitudes as expressed by any firm. I confess that I have tried, but tried in vain, to reconcile those two attitudes, but always with the one result, that is to recall those ancient words, "consistency, thou art a jewel." In theory, anxious to sell, so they say, but in practice refusing to sell except under discrimination. The Canadian public cannot accept any such clumsy explanation as that.

But then the C.I.L. bring up another point which perhaps from their angle would have been more wisely left unsaid:

> The choice of distributors is, at best, a difficult one for any manufacturer, particularly when the manufacturer finds himself the sole Canadian producer in competition with numerous imported brands. Our position in this respect has not been created by any combination of interests, but presumably exists because the market is too small (normally less than 1,000,000 per annum divided over 200 types and loads of ammunition) to justify two plants for a product that requires a very large capital investment.

I should like to ask, is this a dog-in-the-manger attitude, or is it not? Does it mean that C.I.L. object to make any outlay for increasing their limited output but yet expect to retain what may be regarded as a monopoly in what they do produce? Are we to infer from their observation that C.I.L. have reached their maximum production? Such a condition would hardly coincide with their urge for adequate distribution. And the last paragraph of their submission seems to be only another contradiction. Here it is:

> In order to reach a settlement with Merchants Consolidated Limited we are prepared to submit a proposition for selling them direct on terms which we feel would be fair and reasonable, although ammunition is still in short supply, and we are not able to take care fully of the current needs of our present distributors. We are now attempting to arrange a meeting with Merchants Consolidated Limited to discuss our proposition . . .

This submission was made by C.I.L. on January 26, 1946. Resulting from it, another letter, dated May 5, was sent by Merchants Consolidated Limited to their members, as follows:

> To our shareholder merchants:
>
> Further to our letter to you of November 7, 1945, regarding the refusal of Canadian Industries Limited to recognize Falcon Hardware Limited as legitimate wholesale buyers of ammunition.
> On January 26, we received a letter from the sales manager of the "Dominion" ammunition division of Canadian Industries Limited in which he stated that his company was now in a position to discuss the matter with us.
> Later, this official wrote to state that he would call upon us either on the following Thursday or Friday. On Friday, February 8 he and his assistant called upon us and presented a letter addressed to this company under date of February 4, in which Canadian Industries Limited agreed to sell to the company on the basis of their "A" list, copy of which they attached to their letter. They stated that this list would be subject to a discount of 2½ per cent on carload orders. They also set forth the quantity of ammunition they would be in a position to supply to us in the year 1946.
> The prices on the "A" list are 5 per cent higher than the regular list applying to wholesale buyers. In other words we are expected to pay 5 per cent more for ammunition than our competitors.
> In view of the fact that the executive committee of our board of directors was to meet on the Monday following the interview, it was decided to leave the matter in abeyance until that meeting.
> A report was made to this meeting and, in view of the fact that a general meeting of shareholders of the company had been called for Wednesday, February 13, the executive committee decided that the matter should be taken up at that time with the shareholders.

The matter was duly reported to the shareholders and, after some discussion, it was the unanimous opinion that it would be entirely too dangerous for the company to establish a precedent that in effect was that the company was prepared to pay 5 per cent more for its goods than its competitors, and the company was instructed to endeavour through every means possible, to obtain what they originally requested, viz., that the company either be placed on the regular wholesale list by Canadian Industries Limited, or that the rate of customs duty be reduced from 27½ per cent to 7½ per cent.

Yours very truly,

Merchants Consolidated Limited.

It will be noted from what I have quoted that Merchants Consolidated Limited did not ask for the segregation of their hardware branch under the name of Falcon Hardware Limited, or any other name. The segregation was suggested to them, as stated in their brief.

I suggest that Merchants Consolidated Limited is either a wholesale organization, or it is not. There is no halfway station. I am acquainted with many of the shareholders, and they are the type of men who know their rights, who ask no more, and whose rights they will maintain.

Merchants Consolidated Limited, as hon. members have heard, have been doing a wholesale business in western Canada for thirty-two years. Access to other manufactured products has already been accorded them—dry goods, boots and shoes, groceries, small wares, and many others. Therefore I ask, who is this C.I.L. in Canada, who is this cartel outside Canada having the audacity to set up its own standard of discrimination in this our free country? I know who the members of Merchants Consolidated are and I stand firmly in a demand for justice in their behalf.

This attitude of C.I.L. is not altogether a new thing in Canada. I have some recollection of a similar incident some years ago when another firm enjoying tariff protection declined to sell their products to a wholesale house. I believe that the matter came before the then tariff board and the manufacturers were given their choice of selling the goods as requested, or of having the tariff removed. I need scarcely add that a decision was quickly arrived at. I speak for a multitude of people in this country when I say that C.I.L. should be given the same choice, to be acted upon immediately, namely, to sell to Falcon Hardware in the same way and at the same price as they sell to other hardware firms, or to have the duty removed from similar goods imported into this country. In other words, they should be told to play the game or forfeit their protection. To my mind there is no alternative. Let it not be forgotten that the Canadian people as a whole, not any one section of them, grant protection to C.I.L. Therefore I say most emphatically that the Canadian people as a whole are entitled to share in the advantages, if any, which accrue from that protection. I would be most reluctant to make demands upon any firm struggling for its existence; but I learn, in fact I have learned to-day, that the common stock of C.I.L. is selling for from $240 to $250 for a $100 share and that a half yearly dividend of three per cent has already been declared for the first half of 1946. It would look, therefore, as if the people of Canada have been reasonably good to C.I.L. and that that firm is not by any means headed for bankruptcy.

I am less fortunate than a good many hon. members in the fact that I am not learned in the law. But I am to some extent learned along certain other lines, perhaps equally as good in their way as that of law. By long and sympathetic observation and by close and friendly contact with my fellow men I have learned something of those principles which are right and just, honourable and desirable in a community and in a nation; and I find it difficult to include in that category any tendency toward discrimination among our people, or the restraint of legitimate trade.

I therefore, with every confidence, ask urgently the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), both able lawyers, to take such steps, either individually or jointly, by the present amendment or by added amendments, as may completely eliminate those unfair conditions to which I strenuously object, and to which I shall continue to object until the situation is corrected.

Mr. DAVID A. CROLL (Spadina): I too want to commend Mr. McGregor, who was the commissioner appointed under the Combines Investigation Act, for the comprehensive report which was tabled here last session. The suggestions made in the report as to control and abolishment of cartels are most useful, and I think it is well that before we get into the discussion I should give the house some of the recommendations made by the McGregor commission. A summary states that the cartels were guilty of having:

1. Limited production and impeded the most efficient use of world resources.
2. Raised or maintained certain consumer prices.
3. Restricted the import and export of certain commodities.
4. Restricted the use to which certain commodities might be put.
5. Nullified external trade policies in certain respects.

6. Restricted technological advances in certain fields.
7. Created patent pools or monopolies covering wide fields of endeavour.
8. Assisted the formation of private industrial empires which tended to supplant governments in the determination of certain national commercial policies.

I think it is fair to say that it is common knowledge that cartels exist, but how they operate is far less familiar, and what is often lost sight of is their effect upon the national economy of this country. Cartels are defined as private business arrangements to reduce or regulate competition in international trade. Their method of operation, or their usually understood method of operation, takes three forms: first, by agreements, written agreements, and if written agreements are found undesirable, there are oral agreements or, as they are termed in the trade, gentlemen's agreements, if you will; second, by membership in associations, wherein they form associations and limit the membership, as I shall indicate to the house a little later on; and, third, by centralized selling agencies, by which they demand that certain products be sold through a central agency.

Usually they divide a territory so that a member may have a sheltered territory in which he becomes a monopolist. Again, they often place restrictions upon process production, usually by patent agreements. The league of nations report in 1937 stated in part that thirty-two per cent of international trade was controlled by marketing controls; and the United States Department of Justice report in 1939 indicated that there were 179 cartels operating in that country. We in Canada have not escaped from the octopus of monopoly cartelization. As a matter of fact, we all know that every day in every way we are paying tribute to cartels in hundreds of ways.

A few glaring examples I take from the cartel report indicate that farmers are discouraged from mixing their own fertilizers by the fact that the potash and nitrogen cartels keep prices for direct sale to consumers exorbitantly high. Through cartel agreements, the price of sulphur was maintained at $18 a ton for seventeen years and then reduced to $16 a ton which became a new fixed level, and the average profits during this time to the cartel members varied from 13 to 29 per cent. The price of sulphuric acid was forced upward during good times and bad from $12 a ton to $17 a ton, although in a free market the natural tendency is for competition to send prices down. Instead of passing on to consumers the benefits to be had from newer and improved electric light bulbs, General Electric deliberately reduced the life of bulbs from 35 to as much as 62⅔ per cent, and instead of promoting the use of fluorescent lighting, which is better and cheaper than the old-fashioned bulb, General Electric and Westinghouse agreed to defer the development and marketing of the product as long as possible. A cartel agreement gave the Eddy Match company a virtual monopoly of the domestic market, foreign competition being barred by the policy of the match cartel; and through a cartel controlling plastics, du Pont of America agreed with the I. G. Farben Industries to fix the price of plastic powder for dental use at $45 a pound, although exactly the same product was sold to commercial moulders at 85 cents a pound.

That is the way cartels agree, according to the commissioner, to cripple and hamstring the economy of a country and force the public to pay through the nose for the essentials of life. The Americans have been awake to the situation, and I notice by the Globe and Mail of June 19 that:

> The United States Department of Justice has started civil and anti-trust monopoly proceedings against the wealthy International Nickel Company of Canada Limited and its American subsidiary International Nickel Company Incorporated.

From the Globe and Mail of June 28 I see that they have also started proceedings against Electro Metallurgical Company of Canada Limited. But what is more important is a decision which has just been handed down by the United States supreme court dealing with the tobacco trust. I would ask hon. members to pay particular attention to it to see how well it fits into our situation. I quote from the research institute of America of June 14:

> A far-reaching decision which can force revision of buying and selling practices in many industries has just been handed down by the supreme court. In a 6-0 ruling involving major tobacco companies the court has extended the revolutionary type of reasoning begun in the Alcoa case. While the earlier decision dealt with the monopoly aspects of a single firm—the new ruling applies virtually the same tests and finds an illegal monopoly where three firms exercised similar controls.
> The court makes it clear that actual exclusion of competitors (from interstate or foreign commerce) is not necessary to a finding of unlawful monopoly. It is sufficient if all three of the following conditions occur:
> 1. Some members of an industry "combine" to get or keep the power to exclude competitors. The court pointed out that although there was no express agreement among the defenders their action indicated a clear course of dealing. This in itself seemed convincing evidence of a combination or plan to fix and maintain prices and prevent future competitors from getting into the industry.
> 2. The group has the "power" to exclude present or future competition from the field. The court noted that the defendants controlled over two-thirds of the entire domestic cigarette field and over eighty per cent of comparable cigarettes. Following the Alcoa precedent, which uses percentage of control as an index of monopoly power, the court said that "comparative size on this great scale inevitably increased the power of these three to dominate all phases of their industry."

3. The group "intends" to use this power to maintain a monopoly. Evidence of such intention was found by the court in a wide range of buying and selling practices of the three companies.

Both combination and intent to exclude competitors were inferred from a wide range of parallel purchasing and sales tactics engaged in by the companies—for example:

(a) Buying methods. Each of the three majors refused to make any purchases of domestic leaf tobacco unless the other companies were represented on the market. Before markets opened, they placed limitations on the prices which their buyers were permitted to pay and formulated grades so that there frequently was no competition between them. The companies determined in advance of each season what portion of the entire crop each would buy—then spread purchases evenly over the different markets throughout the season. At the time when manufacturers of low-priced cigarettes were beginning to manufacture in quantity, the majors made large purchases of the cheaper leaf needed for the low-priced cigarettes.

(b) Selling methods. The companies charged identical list prices and gave identical discounts for their cigarettes. They also raised and lowered their prices at the same time. At one point, for example, all three raised their prices on the same date in the face of declining cost and market trends. When the majors were faced with competition from cheaper brands they sold for a while at a loss. Later they insisted that retailers maintain a fixed differential between the quality and the low-priced brands.

RCA observation 1: While no one of these practices taken alone would have been evidence of monopolistic exclusion tactics, the entire pattern is one that could get a group of quasi-competitors into trouble. In this case, for example, fines totalling more than a quarter of a million dollars were imposed.

I point out the steps which our friends to the south of us are taking to deal with this important problem. I have already told the house that in his report Mr. McGregor indicated that cartels restricted production. Restricting production might be beneficial to a cartel, but surely it cannot be beneficial to the economy of this country; for I ask hon. members how restriction of production can ever be socially desirable. It is true the report says that they prevented cyclical fluctuations in prices. As was indicated this afternoon, the aluminum cartel kept prices at fixed levels in good and bad times. I ask hon. members, where is the social advantage if the price is fixed above the average of fluctuating prices which would be permitted in a free economy?

At this particular time we must pay some attention to a problem which arose during the war in order that we might examine the extent to which big firms were able to influence government regulations against the interests of smaller competitors, especially by placing men in key federal agencies. Further, we must examine the degree to which concentration of economic power has increased under war conditions and make certain that we do not permit wartime powers to be used as a cover for anti-social peacetime associations. Individually and collectively the effects of cartel agreements are a bottle-neck in economic progress. After all, what purpose is there to the united nations organization, to the Bretton Woods agreement, to the various trade agreements which we have? If the lifeline between nations, trade relations, is to a great extent under the control of international industrialists; if we are to achieve national unity in this country—and that is our purpose—then we must make sure that wealth is distributed more equally in Canada; that industry is decentralized or in turn compensation is given to the maritimes, to the prairies and to British Columbia for their lack of industries. We must also make sure that the people of the country have an equal standard of living. The only way to do that is to clear the channels of trade, both domestic and foreign, for we no longer have an agricultural economy in Canada.

We are a great industrial country. A few hours ago an hon. member said that we were the fourth trading nation of the world. Hon. members well know that we are the third largest industrial nation of the world; and if we are left to our own initiative, unshackled and with the know-how which we have gained during the war, the world is our oyster, particularly when it is realized that we are now reaping the benefits of our price control, of our monetary stability, of our differential in the cost of raw material. To-day we have an advantage over the United States in the markets of the world to the extent of from twenty to thirty per cent. Although we have that advantage we are now starting in to wrestle in public and we shall probably lose the advantage. In the meantime, it seems to me that there is a first-class opportunity to gain some of the markets of the world so long as we are unshackled.

To-night I wish particularly to call attention to an abuse which has crept in, namely, the Canadian Radio Patents Limited, which already has a membership of seventeen and was formed for the purpose of licensing. It is a licensing agency organized by the industry to deal with radio patents. Radios are pretty well standard equipment in Canada. I am told that in Toronto 93 per cent of the homes have radios and 87 per cent in Montreal. I have no doubt that the percentage is just as high throughout the country. To-day radio is an essential to every home, not only for educational purposes but for entertainment and cultural purposes. It is sometimes alleged that it is useful for political purposes. But here is a company having as its objective the prevention of foreign competition and the bolstering of domestic prices; which owns over six hundred radio patents, many of them basic, without which it is impossible to manufacture or sell radios; and which has a financial set-up all its own. They demand from a member $10,000, and at the same time the member must show that he is financially worthy to the extent of $100,000. Even after this has been done, they still have the right to refuse that member admission to the company, on the ground that he has curly hair or pink eyes, or for that matter, on any other ground. To-day, as a result, they are in absolute control of radio patents which are essential for the manufacture of radios in this country. The house may say that we can import radios, but when one realizes that there is a 25 per cent tariff, in addition to the sales tax, excise tax and exchange tax, it will be seen that this is hardly feasible. What is more, under our patent laws, even if a radio is brought into this country, this company have the rights to charge a royalty on it, and as a matter of fact they have warned many people they would do exactly that.

We are getting far away from business as we used to understand it. I remember the time when it was said if you built a better mouse-trap the world would track a path to your door. It seems to me that the people who want to go into the radio business and take their chance ought to be permitted to do so, by paying the ordinary royalties that one pays for the use of patents, basic or otherwise.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Is the hon. member aware of the fact that Radio Patents expired some time ago; that this agreement is not in force at present; that anybody is free to license himself under any patent formerly owned by Radio Patents?

Mr. CROLL: I can only answer that by saying that as late as a week or ten days ago my information was to the contrary, and that is why I am bringing this matter to the attention of the house. If Radio Patents Limited are out of business and no longer in control of these patents I am sure the house would be glad.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): It is a fact.

Mr. CROLL: I have indicated the evils, which are quite apparent to the house. In the United States they have the Sherman anti-trust law, which to some extent prohibits and at least sets up machinery for the purpose of dealing with trust agreements. Up to the present time Canada has been a bit of a happy hunting ground for cartels; and I think it is undeniable that the time has come for us to make certain that restrictions on production, restrictions on scientific achievement, restrictions on competition in trade, are no longer to be tolerated. As I have pointed out, there is an easily recognized handful of sand being thrown into the machinery. We in this house do not run the machinery, but we make it possible for the people of Canada to enjoy fully the fruits of their labours.

To me the action to be taken by this house is clear. We must pass an act or acts which will tear down the walls erected by these powerful combines between our factories, our farms, and our markets beyond the seas. We must curb restrictive actions which bar our exports, reduce our national income and cause unemployment in this country. We must maintain full production to meet the needs of our own people, and we must make better use of our natural resources. We have two ways of going about this. We can do something at the international level and we can do something at the domestic level. We are members of the economic and social council of the united nations. We have a representative there. The matter will come before that council for some discussion and action; and it is well that our delegate, whoever he may be, should be instructed as to the action he should take. In so far as this house is concerned, parliament can deal with this matter realistically. Our objectives are good. What we need is a law with teeth. As a matter of fact we have had some experience with cartels. I think most hon. members will remember that when the radium cartel was under the control of the Americans the price was from $100,000 to $170,000 a gram. Then came the Belgians, who reduced the price to $70,000. Then, after discoveries made in the northwest territories in 1938, we brought down the price to $20,000 a gram. Whether that price is fair or unfair I do not know, but it came about as the result of action by this government.

At the present time it seems to me we are merely nibbling at the problem. It is a large problem, a very large one. In the vigorous and tumultuous future it will require more than policing. To fine these companies a quarter of a million dollars, as they do in the United States, is merely to have that fine passed on to the consuming public in one way or another. We must take action in a more direct and more constructive manner. This measure goes far; it may work out, but it seems to me that it does not go far enough. A great deal will depend on how it is administered. I am hoping that the Minister of Justice will see that it is administered by such men as Mr. McGregor, in whom we have all confidence, and that he is given adequate facilities and assistance so that when we come back here again, whenever that may be, a report may be presented to this house indicating not only that action has been taken but that results already have been achieved from this legislation. Otherwise we shall feel that we have merely gone through the motions.

Mr. SKEY: The hon. member for Spadina, speaking to the Combines Investigation Act, spoke of placing men in key federal positions. I am merely seeking information. I should like to know what he meant.

Mr. CROLL: I said "agencies."

Mr. SKEY: Yes, the appointing of men in key federal agencies. I should like to know what the hon. member meant by that phrase.

Mr. CROLL: I meant just that.

Mr. SKEY: May I ask another question?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that we are on second reading of the bill, and not in committee.

Mr. SKEY: I merely want to address another question to the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: That would not be in order.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I have listened, as has the house, with great interest to the speeches made this afternoon and this evening, and in particular to the two last hon. gentlemen who spoke. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) clearly showed the existence of a combine in restraint of trade. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) not only read from the report of the inquiry into international cartels and other trade combinations, but added information he himself had gleaned as the result of personal investigation. All who have read this report must be impressed with the fact that to a degree never before known in this country cartels in many commodities and in full restraint of trade have been operating. As a matter of fact it is difficult for me to imagine that anyone could have made a more terrific indictment of the government than is made in the sixty-nine pages of this report made by a commission appointed by the government.

The commission reports that in regard to various commodities cartels have been continuing in restraint of trade for a good many years and that they are to-day operating. While we are speaking about the subject in this house, the evidence has been secured and put together by a commission to whose chairman high and proper tribute has been paid. The law is on the statute books in the form of section 498 of the criminal code. This section gives wide powers for the laying of informations against any company or individual who unduly limits facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce, who restrains or injures trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity, or who unduly prevents, limits or lessens the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or who unreasonably enhances the price thereof, or who unduly prevents or lessens competition, and certain other matters covered by the section in question.

The Combines Investigation Act was amended in 1935 to permit prosecutions being taken without the necessity of establishing that what was being done was being done in a manner that could be described as unduly. The hon. member for Spadina says that we should put teeth in the law. I see nothing in the amendments before the house at this time that will put any more teeth in the law than exist to-day to prosecute these companies that are acting in restraint of trade for their unlawful actions. The hon. member for Spadina said, and I paraphrase his words, that every day in every way we the people of Canada are paying a tribute to these companies which have taken undue advantage of the people of Canada.

We have had the law up to now. We have had the recommendations and the information contained in this report since October 10, 1945. I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent): what has the government done since then to punish the wrongdoers who are referred to in the report made by the McGregor commission and who could rightly be convicted of wrongdoing if the statements contained therein are correct? I have looked over the record since 1935 for the purpose of ascertaining just how far this government has gone in carrying out the promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the election night of 1935 when he said, or words to this effect, "Now the forces of monopoly and privilege will be shown their place, now the moneyed interests will be brought to task and to account."

The McGregor report sets out in detail the existence of cartels in fertilizers, to which reference was made by the hon. member for Spadina, in tanning materials, flat glass, sulphur, dyestuffs, tools, titanium pigments, chemicals, electric lamps, radio tubes and so on. The indictment is there. Not only have we the recommendations and the evidence of a commission appointed in Canada; but in the United States, as the result of investigations by the Arnold committee and also of a committee of the United States senate, it has been shown that international cartels exist and have been carrying on their practices in Canada while under indictment in the United States. They have been allowed to remain free and still carry on their nefarious work in this country.

Let me point out what has taken place since 1935. All these cartels have been in existence for ten years or more and yet none has been prosecuted. Here is the record since 1935. An inquiry was made into anthracite coal on February 3, 1937. A combine was reported and proceedings were taken. The anthracite coal importers were fined $48,500. Then on August 31, 1938, a report was made on the distribution of tobacco products in Alberta and elsewhere as being in contravention of the combines act. Prosecutions took place and various tobacco companies were fined. Upon appeal the convictions were set aside on the ground that two offences, one under section 498 of the criminal code and the other under the combines act, were joined together in the one indictment. It strikes me as passing strange that when that conviction was quashed on technical grounds the government has not yet seen its way clear, provided that a combine had been established in connection with these companies, of taking action and proceeding in the courts.

The next report made under this act was with respect to the manufacture and sale of paperboard containers and related products. On March 14, 1939, a combine was reported and prosecutions took place in that year. Fines to the extent of $165,000 were imposed. Finally, on October 31, 1939, wholesale shippers of fruits and vegetables in western Canada were found to be operating a combine in contravention of the act. They were brought before the courts and acquitted. The record shows that proceedings were taken against only small combines in comparison with these international and national combines which are set out particularly in the report of a commission appointed at the instance of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell).

I should like to ascertain from the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) the attitude of the government in Canada in regard to combines. In October, 1945, there was a meeting in Washington of the Anglo-American financial conference at which the question of cartels was discussed. There was a difference of opinion as between the United Kingdom representatives and the representatives of the United States of America. The Americans proposed, and I quote:

> The Americans proposed that a multilateral agreement be concluded among all the major trading nations, and eventually among all others, under which each country would morally commit itself to take whatever steps were necessary to prevent its nationals from entering into combines, etc., in restraint of trade through fixing prices, sharing markets, and similar measures.
> The British were prepared to go part way on this thesis. They considered certain cartels were in restraint of trade, but they also felt that others were not. They proposed that efforts should be made to eliminate bad cartels but instead of outlawing all cartels, they favoured having a consultative body set up to which a country could complain against a cartel that it considered was acting in restraint of trade.

I ask the Minister of Justice this: What is the attitude of the government of Canada? Does it intend to prevent all cartels and to punish all cartels in restraint of trade? Or does it intend to follow the British practice as suggested by the responsible minister of the British government, that only such cartels should be interfered with as are necessarily illegal?

Before the second reading is over, I think the Minister of Justice should indicate to the house and the country to what extent the companies referred to in the commissioner's report are to be proceeded against. The evidence is here. Mr. McGregor, the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act, places his name on this report, indicating clearly that in his opinion prosecutions should take place. As a matter of fact, as I listened to the hon. member for Spadina referring to electric lamps, these words in the report, at page 22 struck me:

> The production of electric lamps in Canada and the United States is largely controlled by the General Electric Company, a United States corporation, which directly or through its subsidiary International General Electric has agreements with the principal foreign producers (in England, Belgium, Holland, France, Germany, Japan, et cetera) which provide for cross-licensing of patents, exchange of information and allocation of territory. The agreements exclude the foreign producers from the Canadian market, which is reserved for those manufacturers in Canada licensed under Canadian patents, who are likewise barred from exporting to other markets.

Surely any agreement to that effect, to prevent Canadians from importing from another country, is in restraint of trade. The report goes on:

Canadian manufacturers of electric lamps appear to be governed by much the same type of control as to manufacture and sale as has been established by the General Electric Company in the United States. In such an important factor as the length of life, the specifications for lamp construction appear to have been drawn up in the interests of manufacturers. Long life bulbs which have been produced in other countries, in Holland for example, are not permitted to be marketed in Canada.

The report goes on to deal with radio tubes and sets and says:

In its investigation of the radio industry in 1939 and 1940 the tariff board found that Canadian consumers were being unduly exploited through the arrangements then in effect.

There is the report of a body set up by the government, and in order to reinforce its opinion it goes back to 1939 and states that the tariff board at that time found that, in so far as this company was concerned and those associated with it, it was unduly exploiting the Canadian consumer.

Reference has already been made to radio tubes and sets. In the western provinces we find that most of our farmers require a radio as do farmers and other people all over this country. Yet we are unable to get small radios in this country and we are unable to import them. We are denied the opportunity and privilege. The companies in Canada under cartel arrangements are forbidden to manufacture small radios in this country. I will read the particular portion of the report bearing on this, and again I say that this report is an indictment, not of the law as it now stands, but of the government for its failure to act when its responsible representatives and those appointed by it demand that it act. All the action we get in response to that demand is a matter of a few moments, to which particular reference will be made when we go into committee, because we are denied the opportunity of dealing with them on the second reading when only the principle of the bill is at stake. What does this report say about radio tubes and sets? It says:

Arrangements of a like character—

Like the arrangements with respect to electric lamps.

—exist with respect to the allocation of world markets for radio sets and radio tubes . . . The arrangements for the exchange of patents and licences protect Canadian manufacturers from outside competition, while the establishment of holding companies to control Canadian patents restricts competition among Canadian licensees.

That is the finding of a responsible committee which was set up under the chairmanship of a man who has earned the approbation of my hon. friends on all sides of the house and who must have had the evidence before him on which to make findings like that.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

I point out now what the radio situation is. Considerable investigation was made of it last January by Mr. Chester Bloom of the press gallery. In an article he sets forth exactly what is happening in this country and explains why people cannot secure the small types of radios. I am going to quote from his words and then I am going to appropriate them as my own. He says:

This patent pool is operated under the name of Thermionics, Ltd. Complaints concerning its operation have been numerous in the past yet no government action has ever been taken to open up the small radio market to free competition.

Is it not fair to interpolate at this moment and ask the government why? There is a demand across this country for small radios. This condition of affairs cannot be explained away as having been in existence only since the war because it dates back to 1935, and possibly even earlier. The fact remains that no consumer in this country has been able to get a small radio. Why? Simply because the things we condemn in the statute are carried on by the companies named in the indictment which is in the form of a commissioner's report. Mr. Chester Bloom goes on to say:

Particularly discriminated against in this respect are farmers who have individual power plants operated by gas engines or wind power. There are some 20,000 such plants on farms in the prairie provinces.

The standard voltage for radios on farms with such individual power service is 32-volt.

Why then, not import such 32-volt radios from the United States?

Then he goes on to state the reason. One reason is that there is a patent pool existent in this country, and the patent pool goes back, he says, to the 1930's. Some might ask, why cannot one write to the United States, buy a radio there, pay the duty on it and bring it in? The answer given by Mr. Bloom is this:

The initial deposit required for an import licence from Thermionics, Ltd. is so high, the importers allege, that it is prohibitive when coupled with the subsequent royalties which must also, of course, be included in the price to the individual purchaser.

That is very much in line with what the hon. member for Spadina said in regard to radio parts in this country.

But suppose—

He says.

—an individual buyer attempts to import such a radio, what happens? He receives at first a tactfully written letter informing him he has fractured the patent laws and is subject to prosecution. If that doesn't suffice, a writ is issued against him. But, according to people who have had this experience, seldom is the case ever taken to court. The writ is merely allowed to stand as an impairment to the credit of the would-be importer . . .

There have been instances where Canadian distributors have endeavoured to induce United States radio manufacturers to set up a plant in Canada and manufacture competitive radios in this country. One such manufacturer said frankly he could take all the Canadian market but why should he? He said he would not make any more than he was then with 15 per cent of the Canadian business which he was getting under a gentleman's agreement.

These are not statements loosely made. These are statements reinforced not only by the findings of the McGregor commission but also as a result of the investigations which Mr. McGregor has made over a period of years. But I think we in this house and the country are entitled to find out this: in how many cases did Mr. McGregor or anyone acting on his behalf, since 1935, indicate that there were combines in this country, and in how many cases did prosecutions take place as a result thereof? Because, sir, the position is this: no private individual in this country can take proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act, but only the Attorney General of Canada or, in turn, the attorneys general of the provinces in which the alleged offence has taken place. The result is this, that if the Attorney General of Canada, because, as was pointed out to-day, of the very high costs of taking proceedings, decides not to take proceedings and hands over the ball to the provincial attorney general, do you think it would be reasonable that the province would feel like proceeding with an action when the dominion had decided, apparently, that the cost of prosecution would be so prohibitive that it would not proceed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Is he suggesting that it is after the Attorney General of Canada has taken a decision that the facts are brought to the attention of a provincial attorney general? Does he not know that under the statute the facts are required to be first brought to the attention of the provincial attorney general and that the Attorney General of Canada is required to wait for three months for his decision, and that that is a provision which it is proposed to amend?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is perfectly true; there is no argument about it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Then why say anything else?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have not said anything else.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member said quite the opposite of that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I can well understand the annoyance of my right hon. friend the Minister of Justice. However, he has not been Minister of Justice very long and he can excuse himself—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He has no reason to offer any excuse.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —for his failure to act. I appreciate that. I will deal with that in a moment. His failure to act can be explained away on the ground that the war was on. But, sir, he says he will not say that, he will accept his responsibility. Then I ask him, why, having regard to what has taken place, and the fact that there has been a report since October and goodness knows how many reports were sent on to the Department of Justice before October by Mr. McGregor after investigations which he has taken, is it the situation that in a period of eleven years the total number of prosecutions in Canada under the Combines Investigation Act has been in respect of only four matters?

I should like to ask him too in regard to the international situation. The hon. member for Spadina referred to certain prosecutions which have taken place in the United States. I pointed out one to which I think he made some reference—the match monopoly. On May 2, 1944, the department of justice of the United States of America charged ten companies with having contravened the Sherman antitrust act. One of these companies was a Canadian corporation. Those proceedings were gone ahead with in the United States. I ask the minister this, is there any collaboration, is there any intercommunication as between the government of the United States and the government of Canada when, as a result of an investigation in the United States it is ascertained that international combines carrying on business in these two countries are operating in restraint of trade; and, if so, is there any manner whereby joint prosecutions can take place? Certainly, across the line in the United States large volumes of evidence have been piled up as against two or three corporations operating in Canada, but as yet none of us has heard of any prosecution taking place in this country with regard thereto.

Just one other matter to which, also, reference was made to-day by the hon. member for Spadina, the question of fertilizer. That report is an indictment that affects every farmer in this country either directly or potentially as a possible user of fertilizer. The report reads as follows:

Prices of principal fertilizer materials, potash, nitrogen, and superphosphates, have been controlled under various cartel agreements, some world-wide in extent. The cartels have divided markets and allocated export quotas among members. The resale of potash was deliberately kept high to prevent farmers from mixing their own fertilizers.

Here, I suggest, is one matter which affects the farmers of this country, and I ask in the very kindest manner possible, what are you going to do about it? My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) laughs.

Mr. MITCHELL: I said, "in a kindly way".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that. Since my hon. friend the Minister of Labour started using that expression "in a kindly way", the atmosphere of this house has improved very greatly, and everybody is using it.

He certainly was the motive power that started the investigation. He is the one who set up this committee and gave it power to act. He has discharged his responsibility. I ask the Minister of Justice, when may parliament and the country expect that in so far as the fertilizer industry is concerned the prosecutions will be taken, to the end that no longer will Canadian farmers be prevented from mixing their own fertilizers by an illegal agreement in restraint of trade and designed with one purpose in mind, to maintain the price at such a height that the largest possible return will come to an international organization?

To-day the Minister of Justice stated that the purpose of the amendments was, if I paraphrase him correctly, to provide the machinery for accelerated action, or, in other words, to provide means whereby prosecutions can be launched and proceeded with, with the greatest possible dispatch. He had the support of every member of this house, and we shall look forward to the acceleration of prosecutions. Certainly no one can characterize in favourable terms the activities of the combines investigation branch of the department since 1935. Of course one of the difficulties has been that Mr. McGregor has had neither the necessary staff nor the necessary appropriations. As I understand it, he is to have a staff of ten experts, and really they are going to set up an organization which is intended to act. I think parliament and the country have the right to know at this time what is to be done when this power of accelerated action has been granted under the amendments asked for under this measure.

As to individual sections, some of these I shall refer to when we come to discuss them in committee. At this time only the question of principle is at stake. I do not see where the new provisions put many teeth in the law as it now stands. To me they look like false teeth. They are merely the padding of certain sections that can have no effect beyond the effect of the law as it stands at present, because, while they provide new machinery, they do not in any way provide for a change in the nature of the evidence that must be secured in order to found a conviction. In other words, you still have to establish under the criminal code that whatever is done is done unduly. A private individual cannot lay the information. I appeal to the Minister of Justice again. If he desires to secure the power to act, why does he not give the individual consumer, the forgotten man in this country, an opportunity of laying an information under the Combines Investigation Act? As a matter of fact, recommendations have been made in the past to provincial attorneys general that they proceed to prosecute a combine and no prosecution has taken place.

I remember very well, though I speak from memory, that about twenty years ago a potato combine was found to exist in one of the maritime provinces. The matter was turned over to the attorney general of that province and no prosecution took place. The greatest deterrent that any of these corporations can suffer, who are taking undue advantage—and there are only a few of them—is to have publicity given their activities. The greatest police is an aroused public opinion with knowledge and information. When a farmer realizes that he is being unfairly dealt with in the matter of fertilizer, what is the use when he is denied the opportunity of going into a court and himself taking proceedings on the basis of recommendations that have been made by the McGregor commission.

Certainly to-day the situation is such that on the evidence which the McGregor commission has gathered together upon which to found its report, I do not think there would be any great difficulty for an individual having the power to lay the information, to gather together that evidence, having as he would have behind him Mr. McGregor and those associated with him in obtaining the evidence upon which the charges made in the report of the commission were founded.

We can pass laws; but if laws are not enforced they bring the administration into disrepute; they bring justice and fairness and equity into disrepute. We have had the law, and we have had the amendments passed in 1935 to cover some of the abuses that came to light in the price spreads investigation. We have the law; yet with the law at our disposal with a responsible man and a man of experience in charge of the department, with investigations going on and recommendations being made, I say once more that it is not good enough that, with a record such as we find set forth in that report, after eleven years there have been only four prosecutions,-two successful, one reversed on appeal and the other registering an acquittal.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): In closing the debate, I wish first of all to express my gratification at hearing members on all sides of the house pay such a well-deserved tribute to Mr. McGregor, the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. I am not going to make a political speech, nor am I going to make a speech to try to impress anyone. I brought the bill to parliament because I thought it would enable this house to provide more effective machinery to do something which it is necessary to have done in the public interest, and it is principally with that consideration that I am concerned. It seems to me that this tribute which is being paid to Commissioner McGregor is the best earnest that, if we give Commissioner McGregor the kind of machinery he requires in order to do his job, he will do it and do it in an efficient manner.

I am sure the member for Lake Centre likes to make these indictments upon the government of the day. They probably do provide some headlines; they do provide some passing interest. But it does not last very long, and the hon. member and I know that what really counts is what is done, rather than what is said.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member knows, in spite of the speech he made to-night, that this bill will provide machinery to do some of the things about which he has complained. For instance, he has dilated upon the serious effect upon the Canadian public of the misuse of patents when they are pooled and licences are issued with conditions attached to them which do hamper the possibility of the Canadian consumer obtaining some of the things he would like to get. This bill provides for giving jurisdiction to the courts to deal with that kind of arrangement and to say what portion of such pooling and patent agreements will not operate and will not have the effect of which the hon. member complained and to which also the member for Spadina referred.

The hon. member for Lake Centre says, "Why don't you allow anyone to lay an information?" I will make this bargain with him. When we get into committee, if the committee will take out of the act the restrictive provision which the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen put in there in 1935, I will agree to take out the provision restricting the laying of information to the attorneys general. But I will not agree to taking that provision out if it is to remain there merely to allow sham proceedings to be instituted against lawbreakers and then have a clause that no other proceedings can be instituted against them on the same set of facts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Meighen was not here in 1935.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He was in the senate; it was in the senate that this was introduced; and it came here the day before the last of the session and had to be taken in that form or nothing at all would have been obtained. If in committee the house will agree that the restrictive provision which prevents the institution of more than one set of proceedings be deleted, then I shall be quite prepared to accept a motion to delete from the Combines Investigation Act the subsection that has been there since 1923, which reserves to the attorneys general of the province or the Attorney General of Canada responsibility for taking action following an investigation under the act. The hon. member knows that would be something of little substantial effect. He pointed out in his speech that there are very few individuals who are going to undertake, at their own risk and at their own expense, a long struggle with a powerful corporation to establish that its manner of doing its business is illegal. But there will be no objection to having the law framed in such a manner that if such a courageous, public-spirited citizen wishes to do it on his own account he will be privileged to do so. He already has had the right to do so under section 498 or 498A of the code.

The matter to which the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Matthews) referred is one which, on the facts stated in the brief he submitted, would clearly constitute a violation of section 498A of the code. It is a matter which is being carefully investigated by Mr. McGregor. Mr. McGregor has not yet come to the conclusion that he should recommend that proceedings be instituted, but he has had the matter under consideration. He has had correspondence with the interested parties and is giving it serious attention. But apparently Merchants Consolidated Limited, made up of four hundred individual merchants, would prefer to have the government undertake the risk and expense of bringing Canadian Industries Limited to time than do it itself.

With respect to international cartels, the hon. member for Lake Centre knows, as I know, that we cannot prosecute for offences committed in foreign parts; that arrangements to that end have to be negotiated internationally, and the matter is on the agenda of the meeting called originally by the United States government and which has now been placed under the aegis of the economic and social council of the united nations. Joint action is required there. We cannot prosecute anyone here in Canada because he has to charge for the components of fertilizer which he imports into this country a price which gives him some margin over the laid-down cost at the Canadian port of entry. That is something which we cannot effectively deal with here. We can refuse to take these component parts at all, but that would not give us the fertilizer. It so happens that, in spite of the serious situation disclosed in this report of the commissioner on cartels, we still prefer to have the fertilizer at the price we have to pay than to do without it. But the purpose served by making these facts public is to prepare the way for the international agreements we hope to be able to make which will bring about by international action the curbing of such activities.

Here we are asking for amendments to the legislation which appear to be necessary to enable the commission, as it is being reorganized, to function in an efficient manner. During the war there were price ceilings which afforded some protection. It is known to members of the house that the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act was on loan to the wartime prices and trade board and was, up to a few months ago, in charge of the enforcement of the regulations of that board. Since the beginning of the year he has returned to his former job of giving his time and attention to the matters to which the Combines Investigation Act applies. I think most hon. members have in him the confidence which was expressed by those who have taken part in the debate, and they believe that if he is given the statutory legislation he requires, and is not hampered in his operations, he will do an efficient job.

I can say to the hon. member for Lake Centre that there have been no reports from the commissioner to the Department of Justice not acted upon, and I am informed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that since 1939 there were no reports to the Minister of Labour from the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act which were not acted upon.

While this act is administered under the Department of Justice and I happen to be there I can give the house the assurance that the efforts of the commissioner will be fully seconded in every possible way to eliminate, to the extent to which it may be feasible, the detrimental effects of these monopolies, trusts and cartels referred to in his report. I therefore suggest that this bill might be given second reading and that we might consider then the clauses it contains; and if it is, as I hope it will be, the feeling of the house that section 28 of the bill of 1935 be repealed I shall then be quite prepared to accept an amendment from the hon. member for Lake Centre to repeal the provision which makes the laying of informations the sole responsibility of attorneys general.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Deputy commissioners.

Mr. FLEMING: How many deputy commissioners does the minister propose to appoint under the provisions of the new section 6?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I asked the commissioner that question and he gave me the information. He is just entering the chamber and I shall have him repeat it to me because I want to be absolutely accurate in giving the answer. At the present time the intention would be to have three appointed and it might perhaps be four. The commissioner tells me that what he is considering at the present time is three.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it they will be full-time deputies and not simply ad hoc appointees from time to time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; they will be full-time deputy commissioners appointed under the Civil Service Act, and one will be designated by the governor in council as the deputy who will replace the commissioner in his absence or if at any time he should be unable to act.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister state the number of personnel at the present time, and by how many they will be augmented when the three additional commissioners have been named?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At the present time there are ten combines investigation officers. The present intention would be to have three of those officers designated as deputy commissioners.

Mr. HACKETT: My question was, by how many will the personnel of the department be increased by reason of the appointment of the three deputy commissioners?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would not necessarily increase the number at this time. The present intention would be to have three of the combines investigation officers appointed by the civil service commission as deputy commissioners. That, of course, would be subject to the findings of the civil service commission, which will fix the qualifications required; and it is hoped that it would be from the existing combines investigation officers that the three deputy commissioners would be selected.

Mr. COCKERAM: What salary does the minister propose to pay these deputy commissioners?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: These salaries are fixed by the civil service commission. It is a matter which is at present under consideration by the civil service commission, which probably is awaiting the report of the special commission under Mr. Gordon as chairman, which report is expected very shortly, in relation to salaries for key positions in the civil service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many investigations have taken place in the last ten years? A while ago the minister mentioned that in no case had a recommendation, made by the commissioner not been acted upon. How many investigations have taken place, and in how many cases was a combine reported as in existence?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the two years from 1935 to 1937 no investigation reports were made. In 1939 there was the investigation of Container and Materials Limited, and the shipping case, Materials Manufacturers' Association, which cases went on until 1942. In 1940 and 1941 there was the investigation into tobacco manufacturers and wholesalers. In 1939 there was the investigation into the western fruit and vegetable combine. The commissioner repeats to me the assurance I gave the house, that during this whole period no reports were made that were not acted upon. A number of informal investigations were conducted; representations as to what was the law were made to those investigated; if they immediately complied with the law, the investigations did not end in a formal report being submitted by the commissioner to the minister.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that right, then, that in certain cases investigations are conducted by the commissioner and that, once he arrives at a settlement or a satisfactory arrangement, no report is made on what has taken place?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commissioner reports the facts he ascertained, that there were practices which appeared to him to be undesirable and that those who were responsible had agreed to eliminate them, so that further action appeared to be unnecessary to protect the public interest.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many of those were there in the period I have mentioned?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commissioner informs me that from 1935 to 1937 there were no cases. From 1937 to 1939 there were the three major cases which were investigated, where he found combines which he reported and in respect of which prosecutions were instituted, while there were other investigations where he did not find there were combines.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But how many of those were there? I should like to find out the extent to which investigations are made. How many of these investigations were made in which, after the matter was brought to the attention of the alleged wrongdoers and they gave the assurance that changes would be made, no further action was taken? What was the number of those cases?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am told I was wrong in saying they had to give assurances that changes would be made. What followed as the result was that there were not sufficient grounds to charge that a combine existed. In the two fiscal years from April 1, 1938, to March 31, 1940, some fifty-two such investigations were made. In the five fiscal years from April 1, 1940, to March 31, 1945, some forty-two investigations were made. That was during the war period.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In regard to this question of radio tubes and sets, and Canadians being unable to get small radio sets, when was that matter first brought to the attention of the commissioner or those charged with the administration of this act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Allegations of the existence of a combine with respect to the manufacture of radio tubes and receiving sets were received toward the end of 1930 or the beginning of 1931, and the greater part of this investigation was carried on in 1931. The registrar reported a combine of radio tube manufacturers. It was alleged that common selling prices had been fixed at an unreasonably high level and that competition had been otherwise lessened to the detriment of the public. The attorney general of Ontario, to whom the case was referred, decided that no prosecutions should be instituted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In addition to that report, there was a further report which seemed to bring the matter right to the attention of the commissioner. This is referred to on page 24 of the report. This is right up to date; it is not back in 1931. The report states that on investigation of the radio industry in 1939 and 1940 the tariff board found that Canadian consumers were being unduly exploited through the arrangements then in effect. That having been found out in 1939, why were no proceedings taken with regard thereto?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At that time the matter was being handled by the tariff board, and the proceedings referred to there are proceedings before the tariff board where apparently an application had been made for a reduction in the protection because of the prices that were prevailing in Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did the tariff board not report to the combines commissioner that they had found that Canadian consumers were being unduly exploited by the arrangements which were in effect?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commissioner tells me, it did not. The tariff board reports to the Minister of Finance and there was no report to the commissioner. This was knowledge that the commissioner obtained for the purposes of this report, but it was not through a report made to him by the tariff board.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That seems difficult to understand because it shows a lack of collaboration and cooperation between departments that is quite serious. The Minister of Finance finds out in 1939 and 1940 that the radio industry was unduly exploiting the Canadian consumer, and yet nothing is done because apparently the Minister of Finance or those connected with him did not report to the officer in charge of the investigation of cartels or monopolies or unfair practices. Something should be done to draw to the attention of the departments the necessity of passing on information that is as well authenticated as this was. This should apply to the Department of National Revenue as well as to the Department of Finance. The tariff board made a lengthy finding on the matter, and that should have been communicated to the officer in charge of protecting the Canadian people from such exploitation.

I am not going to read all that appears on page 24 because I do not believe in reading long quotations, but it is all set out there quite clearly. Apparently it was known to the board and to the Minister of Finance in 1939 and 1940 that these serious matters were going on. I am sure that there should have been some exchange of information between departments which would bring such startling information to the attention of the man charged with preventing wrong-doing of that kind.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would call the attention of the hon. member and of the committee to the fact that this is not a finding of a combine or monopoly, it is a finding that because of a situation which existed there were being taken from Canadian users higher royalties than were being taken in other countries. That is precisely one of the things which one of the later sections of the bill is intended to correct. In 1935 the Combines Investigation Act and sections 498 and 498A of the criminal code had been placed for investigational purposes under the control of the dominion trade and industry commission. That was the situation until 1937 when investigations under the Combines Investigation Act were restored to the commissioner, but investigations under sections 498 and 498A remained under the dominion trade and industry commission. It is proposed by this bill to restore the jurisdiction and responsibility for investigations under sections 498 and 498A to the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act so as to have only one responsible official for investigations under both statutes.

Mr. COCKERAM: The minister stated that there were ten investigating officers at the present time, but according to the estimates for this branch there are only six.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The estimates were prepared before the schedule for the reorganization of the branch had been drawn up. If the hon. member was here when the estimate was passed he will remember that I declared I would have a substantial supplementary estimate to enable the commission to carry on according to its plans. Just before the main estimates were considered in the committee I had signed a recommendation to the treasury board to approve a substantial supplementary estimate for this combines investigation commission.

Mr. SKEY: Did the commission have sufficient personnel to carry on fully in the past the investigation of all informations that were brought before it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: From 1935 to 1937 jurisdiction was taken away from the commissioner and transferred to the dominion trade and industry commission. In 1937 the commissioner got back part of his jurisdiction under the Combines Investigation Act, but the remainder, which came under sections 498 and 498A remained with the dominion trade and industry commission. By this bill it is proposed to put them both back under the commissioner and he is enlarging his staff. He feels that for the present ten investigating officers and the clerical staff required to assist them will enable him to carry out his duties. From the beginning of the war to the end of 1945 the commissioner was on loan to the wartime prices and trade board as enforcement administrator of the wartime regulations.

Mr. SKEY: The minister has not answered my question. I asked whether the commission had had sufficient staff to carry on investigations in all cases of informations that had been laid before it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I took the hon. member's question to refer to the period 1935 onward. If it referred to a prior period I would state that frequently ad hoc investigators were appointed as assistants to the commissioner to make investigations. The commissioner informs me that at no time was he prevented from obtaining all the assistance he required to carry out all the work that he felt it was proper to do.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister a few minutes ago, in giving statistics as to the number of inquiries since 1935 made by the commissioner, indicated that three had resulted in an extensive investigation leading, I take it, to prosecutions, and that approximately one hundred inquiries had been made which had not issued in reports. That ratio of about three to one hundred apparently represents the number of complaints received by the commissioner having a substantial foundation. Section 13 of the act, as amended by the 1935 statutes, chapter 54, section 7, provides:

> If, after such preliminary inquiry as the commission deems the circumstances warrant, the commission is of the opinion that the application is frivolous or vexatious, or does not justify further inquiry, the commission may decide that no further inquiry is justified . . .

In how many of these cases was the power in section 13(1) exercised? Or do those one hundred cases approximately represent those in which the commission, although not finding that the application was frivolous, or vexatious, or not justifying further inquiry, went ahead and made an investigation, but nevertheless found no justification for the charge and no ground for prosecution or report to the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure that I fully got the gist of my hon. friend's question, but possibly this information may supply an answer to it. I understand that since 1923 there have been 585 complaints or requests or occasions for investigations. Of these all but twenty-one were on formal or informal complaints coming from members of the public, and twenty-one were on matters initiated by the commissioner himself. There were during that period eighteen formal investigations and prosecutions in ten main groups of cases. In all but two there were verdicts obtained against some of the defendants and in one more, the tobacco case, the verdict was upset on appeal.

Mr. FLEMING: That is, eight out of ten.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There were two acquittals and one case where the conviction was reversed on appeal.

Mr. SKEY: Did I understand the minister to say that there were 564 complaints from the public and only eighteen formal investigations of those 564 complaints?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, there were fifty-seven formal applications for investigation. There were 507 matters brought in the form of a complaint to the attention of the commissioner by members of the public who felt that they were being required to pay more than they should pay or that they were not getting commodities that they should be enabled to get.

Mr. SKEY: What is the difference between a complaint and a formal complaint?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A formal complaint is an application by six persons for an investigation under the act. That is one method which is provided for by the terms of the statute. It has to be supported by a statutory declaration of the facts set out in the application. In 507 additional cases there were representations made by individuals to the commissioner asking him to look into a certain thing which appeared to the writer to be wrong.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not wish to prolong this discussion, but in the light of the statistics furnished by the minister it looks as if the people of this country have obeyed pretty faithfully the terms of the statute when after twenty-three years of experience with the act there have been some 500 odd complaints and only ten cases that went to the courts, and of those ten only eight resulted in verdicts. That is a pretty good record for obedience to the law, I should say.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think that in general the business community of Canada does not want to breach the laws which parliament has enacted in the interest of the public. These cartels have not always been things that those engaged in them looked upon as wrong. That is confirmed by the citation which the member for Lake Centre made this evening that the United States authorities wanted all cartels to be eliminated as wrongful, whilst the British attitude was that each one of them should be individually looked into to determine what it was accomplishing and that, unless it was found to be bringing about harmful results, it should not be eliminated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that the policy in this country?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That has been the policy in this country. There have been principles asserted by our courts, and a combination has to be shown to be undue to come within the terms of the law; there can be a limiting of actual competition that is not undue and that is not harmful to the public.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister said that some 500 odd complaints were made and only fifty formal complaints. Would that indicate that there was not sufficient leeway allowed to make complaints and have an investigation? I wonder whether the minister feels that the provision that six people must swear by deposition under oath before an investigation can be started should be retained? What surprises me to-night is the number of complaints which have been made, the few formal ones, the very few convictions, and the number of cases that have been investigated in which no report whatsoever has been made to the minister. It seems to me that a little more action might be taken than has been the case hitherto. Has the minister some suggestions in that regard, because the situation seems to me alarming?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member is patient he will find there is a provision in the bill to enable the commissioner to act now as he used to act before 1935, on his own initiative, without requiring the formal complaint of six persons.

Mr. BOUCHER: I appreciate that, but I do not think it cures the situation we have now, wherein some 550 complaints have been received but only a baker's dozen of investigations have actually been made. It seems to me that more initiative could be shown. The commissioner is allowed to go ahead on his own initiative, and I think there should be some means of requiring that he shall go ahead.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I asked a question to which the minister omitted to reply, which has to do with the prosecution of the tobacco companies in Alberta in 1941 and 1942. A great deal of evidence was heard in those prosecutions. The case went on for a very long time; a conviction was registered, and—I speak now from recollection; I thought I had the case here, but I have not, it is just one of the interlocutory matters referred to in this volume—a fine of some $220,000 was imposed. The matter went to the court of appeal of Alberta, and the court allowed the appeal on a technical point, one which, although perfectly justified, was nevertheless technical, that there should not have been conjunction of certain charges under the criminal code with those under the Combines Investigation Act. Then there was an endeavour on the part of the crown to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, and, as I remember it, the application for leave to appeal was denied because there was no such right having regard to the decision made by the court of appeal of Alberta. The case is still spoken of, and one frequently hears the question asked, why were no further proceedings taken? Certainly the allowance of the appeal in the Alberta court of appeal under the circumstances would scarcely afford a defence of autrefois acquit; and naturally, having regard to the striking evidence which was given of monopoly control and interference with the rights not only of consumers but of retail dealers, it is difficult to understand why something has not since been done. I should like to ascertain from the minister why no further action has been taken; why, in view of the fact that the government saw fit to retain most eminent counsel to prosecute that case—Mr. McRuer, now chief justice of Ontario—nothing further was done, and to all appearances no particular changes have taken place since in the matter of the handling of a commodity in such general use.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I asked for a report on that case, because, as the hon. member says, it did attract considerable attention at the time. The report I got on it was this:

Existence of an alleged combine in the distribution of tobacco products in the province of Alberta and elsewhere in Canada was reported by the commissioner in August, 1938, after an investigation commenced in March, 1938. A system of price-fixing agreements, stop-lists, boycotts and related trade restrictions operating to the detriment of the public was reported to have been put into effect in Alberta and other provinces by certain tobacco manufacturers and wholesalers. Prosecution proceedings instituted in Alberta in 1938 under section 498 of the criminal code subsequently were stayed by the crown and charges were laid for offences under the Combines Investigation Act. Thirty-six companies and individuals engaged in the tobacco business, including wholesalers and seven manufacturers, were convicted by a jury at Edmonton in July, 1941, of offences of participation in a combination to fix and enhance prices of tobacco products and operation of a merger, trust or monopoly substantially controlling tobacco distribution throughout Canada to the detriment of the public. Sentences imposed by Mr. Justice Shepherd of the Alberta supreme court totalled $221,500 and ranged in individual amounts from $25,000 to $250. Appeals against conviction by thirty-five of these accused were allowed by four members of the Alberta court of appeal in February, 1942, on the ground that certain of the accused had been previously charged under section 498 of the criminal code and on other technical grounds of procedure at the trial. An application on behalf of the attorney general of Alberta for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was dismissed in May, 1942. Reductions of some ten per cent in prices of a number of leading brands of tobacco products, exclusive of tax changes, were made after institution of the court proceedings in these cases.

In May, 1942, most people were otherwise engaged than in proceeding against combines in restraint of trade in the domestic market.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They were engaged in the same way in July, 1941.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, not to the same extent. The year 1942 was a pretty dark period; and the attorney general of Alberta did not choose to start over again. The grounds on which the proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act had been quashed in the court of appeal were that under this section 28 of the 1935 statute there could not be any other proceedings; proceedings which had been instituted under the article of the code were an obstacle to other proceedings being taken under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Does the minister say that the reason no further proceedings were taken is that the attorney general of Alberta did not want any further proceedings taken?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There were no doubt many factors that entered into the decision not to proceed further. The wartime prices and trade board was then in control of prices, and it may have been felt that no useful purpose would be served by continuing the proceedings. Then there was the difficulty which arose out of the 1935 statute which provided in terms that—

"No person shall be charged with, tried for or convicted of an offence against this act,"—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What section?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is section 28 of the 1935 statute.

—by the same information, upon the same evidence or at the same time as he is charged with, tried for or convicted of an offence against section 498 of the criminal code.

There was some question as to whether, if the proceedings under the criminal code were withdrawn, that would not give rise to a plea of autrefois acquit, and the court had decided that unless they were withdrawn the fact that they were stayed did not allow proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act to be instituted and carried on.

Mr. MERRITT: Does the result of that case, therefore, lead us to this position—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We ought to try to keep to the section, which is section 2.

Mr. MERRITT: The discussion on this point has gone on for a considerable time and I have a question to ask which I am sure the minister would answer.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: By common consent we have treated this as the section on which a general discussion might take place.

Mr. MERRITT: Is the committee to understand, from the total result of the case to which the minister and the hon. member for Lake Centre have been referring, that the price-fixing agreements and other practices of which the commissioner complained are now tacitly approved by the result of the proceedings, and have those practices been altered in any way, to the knowledge of the minister?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are certainly not tacitly approved. They were not felt to be operating to the detriment of the public. There had been this reduction of about ten per cent in the prices of the principal brands of tobacco in the western provinces, and the wartime prices and trade board had fixed ceilings beyond which such products could not be sold. It was not felt that at that time they were operating to the detriment of the public. But as soon as controls were removed, if like practices are persisted in, they will continue to be in violation of the statute. It is hoped that this embarrassing provision of the 1935 statute will have been eliminated, and if it is found that the practices are persisted in, proceedings could be resumed and carried to a successful conclusion.

Mr. MERRITT: That is really the essence of my complaint against the provisions of the statute as it now stands. Apparently a reduction of ten per cent or of some percentage in the price may make an agreement, which would otherwise be illegal as against the interests of the public, one that possibly would be in the interests of the public, and to my mind it is the existence of the agreement to fix prices which should be the illegal thing. It should not be left to a question of what the actual effect is on the prices. Would the minister give an opinion and say whether he thinks we can ever get anywhere when one has to look into the actual effect on prices of each particular agreement which might be the subject of investigation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At the time the investigation was made and these practices were ascertained, it was quite apparent that they were impeding competition and preventing certain companies from getting their products to the consumer. Then there came about this reduction in price. Then there was set up the wartime prices board which stabilized prices, and at the same time the demand for tobacco products became so great that no one was interested in the elimination of competition. There was a greater demand than there was capacity to produce by all the producers, so that it became a matter that did not have the same interest for the public as it had when the investigation was started.

Mr. MERRITT: Do private agreements still exist?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not in a position to say whether they exist. As a matter of fact, they do not appear to have been operating. The market appears to have been open to anyone who could supply tobacco products.

Mr. WRIGHT: Some time ago the minister stated that there were fifty-two firms that had been investigated in respect of whom no action was taken. Apparently the commission thought that no action was necessary. Was there any change as a result of the investigation in connection with any of these firms in which certain practices were followed?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commissioner informs me that though he had not found enough to justify prosecution there were quite a number of cases where there were practices that looked questionable and to which the attention of the administrators of the firms was called; he has no doubt there were some of these things which did not suffice in his opinion to justify prosecution but which nevertheless were eliminated after the attention of the administrators had been called to their objectionable aspect.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. WRIGHT: In that case it would look as though there were bargaining between the firms and the commission as to what they should do to avoid being prosecuted. There is an opening left for that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not believe that Mr. McGregor would bargain, and I do not think those who paid tribute to him this afternoon feel that he would bargain away the rights of the public with those whom he was investigating.

Mr. WRIGHT: I am not saying that he did or that he would, but I am saying that it leaves it open to that construction, which I think is a serious position to leave the commission in.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member suggest how it could be avoided?

Mr. FLEMING: How many inquiries are pending at the present time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commissioner informs me that there are from twelve to fifteen cases under consideration at the present time. He would not like to give any more information about them than just to state that about twelve or fifteen are under investigation at this time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not wish to press this unnecessarily, but I am surprised at the explanation given the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard regarding the circumstances connected with the decision made that no further proceedings would be taken against these tobacco companies. They were charged with having in 1938 and previously done many acts in restraint of trade, having indulged in unfair practices. According to the minister there was justification for the charge; because, if I understood him rightly, the evidence was to that effect. He said that the reason they did not proceed against them after they got away on technical grounds in the court of appeal on another charge was that the wartime prices and trade board was operating then and that, therefore, there was no danger of these companies taking advantage any more. In any event, they reduced their prices by ten per cent. What it amounts to, therefore, is this, that they were not proceeded against any more, after having won a new trial in the court of appeal on a technical ground, and they were not proceeded against because they said they would not do wrong any more; or the attitude of the authorities was, "They cannot do wrong any more because of the action of the wartime prices and trade board." I ask the minister this pointed question: Did not the chief counsel for the government, Mr. McRuer, request the Department of Justice to proceed, and did he not give it as his opinion that further prosecution would not be defeated by reason of the fact that an information had been laid earlier and withdrawn?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; there was no such opinion given to the Department of Justice. The commission was not under the Department of Justice at that time; it was operating under the Minister of Labour. I have no knowledge of any such opinion having been given to the Department of Labour.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister does not know.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There did not come to my knowledge in the Department of Justice any such opinion.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Duties of commissioner.

Mr. MERRITT: Section 3 is the only part of the amending bill which makes any reference at all to the conclusions of the McGregor report. Section 3 permits the commissioner to compile further information with regard to monopolistic conditions arising either from the operations of international cartels or otherwise. I should like to know, first of all, whether any further investigations are being made along any particular channels which have not been explored by the McGregor commission and whether there is an appropriation and a staff to give effect to this new section. Why does this bill not contain some measure to control international cartels? Either on second reading or after we got into committee I understood the minister to say that until some international agreement was reached with other nations it would be impossible to deal with the Canadian sections of international cartels. I cannot understand why the new section 30 and the old section 2 cannot be made applicable at the present time to international cartels. If so, I should like to know whether proceedings implementing the McGregor report are being taken under these sections.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We have not yet come to section 30. Section 30 is being asked for precisely for the purpose of enabling the commissioner to deal in Canada with that part of an international cartel arrangement which would operate here. As to providing in this bill curbs or provisions to implement international agreements with respect to cartels, we were not able to devise anything which would have been other than a provision empowering the governor in council to take such action as might be required to carry out an international agreement. I felt that I would not ask parliament to empower the governor in council to do that; that parliament would probably want to know what the agreement was before it would give authority to implement it. Even if it did take a little more time, it was better to wait until we had the agreement and then come to parliament and ask parliament to provide for it to be implemented instead of asking for a blanket authority in advance to carry out such agreement as might be arrived at. My experience at the last session of parliament made me feel it was better not to ask parliament for such blanket authority, even if it did involve taking a little more time to accomplish our purpose.

Mr. MERRITT: The other part of my question was, is there a staff to carry out these additional duties of compiling information and making studies as well as actual investigations?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is a staff which the commissioner feels will be able to do everything which he envisages at present, but I do not think this staff is going to stay at ten officials. I believe it will grow as its work develops.

Mr. HAZEN: Has any attention been given to the advisability of defining the words "international cartels" or "international cartel"? I do not think there is any definition of "international cartel" in the act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, and I do not think it would be prudent for parliament to try to define what is an international cartel. I am sure that if we did, the things which would be set up afterwards would not come within the definition. I think we are better off with the expression "international cartel", because we know what we have in mind; whilst if we set up a definition there would be a form of arrangement arrived at which would not be within the terms of the definition.

Mr. HAZEN: We were good enough to give a definition to the word "combine".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: We were dealing there with organizations in our country, and we defined "combine" in pretty broad terms; but at this time I think we would be going beyond what we should do if we tied ourselves down to a definition before we have these discussions with others who are interested like ourselves in curbing the activities of such organizations.

Mr. MacINNIS: The commission on Canada and international cartels made a number of recommendations which are at the end of the report. Do these amendments to the Combines Investigation Act make provision for all the specific recommendations made in the report, or is further legislation to be introduced to put the recommendations into effect?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are recommendations which require to be implemented by international agreement, if international agreement can be arrived at. If it is found that international agreement can be arrived at, we shall then have to come to parliament for authority to carry out our part of the international agreement, and we shall know just what the international agreement amounts to. If international agreement cannot be arrived at, then we shall try to devise some means to get along without it and to achieve the objectives recommended in the report in some other way. But this bill is to deal with things which can be brought before the courts of justice of this country at this time. There is, in addition, this provision in section 3, making it the responsibility of the commissioner to keep himself advised of what is going on in the way of international cartel arrangements and to advise the government and parliament constantly of his findings in that respect.

Mr. MacINNIS: Outside of what must be done by international agreement, are all the other recommendations which can be carried out without international agreement, included in this measure?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am informed that the commissioner felt that all the legislative amendments which were required were provided for in this bill; that the other part of his recommendations will require organizational changes which are provided for in the estimates, or will be provided for in the supplementary estimates which will be brought down.

Mr. GRAYDON: As the minister knows, the economic and social council of the united nations, to which some reference has already been made in this debate, has some powers which could hardly be described as having very sharp teeth. That council, of course, is set up for the purpose of initiating studies, making recommendations and so on; but there are no operative provisions in regard to enforcement or anything of that kind. From what the minister says, I take it that there is in contemplation some sort of international agreement with respect to the question of international cartels. Will that agreement be initiated or entered into under the aegis of the economic and social council, or will it be a separate agreement among certain nations particularly interested in the subject?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My understanding is that the United States government put out its proposals for expansion of world trade and employment; that those proposals had been communicated to several governments and had been given tentative approval; that at the general assembly of the united nations a decision was made that the social and economic council would take the responsibility of convening this meeting of the nations to discuss the proposals put forth by the United States government, which among others contained proposals for the elimination of cartels; and that it is hoped the governments participating in the conference would agree upon terms to eliminate these international cartels or to control them in such a manner as to prevent their harmful effects upon the economies of the participating nations.

Mr. GRAYDON: It seemed to me that unless there was some agreement among the governments interested in the suppression or control of the cartel situation at the international level, two things might result which would be prejudicial to our national organization as well as to the international organization. That is, if we allow in the world some superauthority which is seemingly beyond the power of governments themselves to control, as international cartels at certain stages actually seem to be; if that condition were allowed to continue it would seriously affect the international organization which has been set up, and, in addition, would weaken the position of our own government and our own parliament in dealing with that matter at the domestic level. The evidence clearly shows that at various stages these international cartels weave themselves into the very fabric of our own domestic situation and our own economic structure; and I should fancy that one of the principal advantages in the reform of cartels would be to see that international cartels are dealt with at that level in the manner in which they should be dealt with. In other words, there should be no higher authority and no higher power than the government which represents the people of a nation, though there seems to have been some evidence in the past, in any event, that governments have been unable to cope with a situation having so many international ramifications that it almost overpowers governments which are supposed to represent the people themselves.

I make these remarks only because I wanted the point clarified with respect to the part played by the economic and social council. If the matter is to be simply left to that council, certainly under the united nations charter the council has not sufficient power to enable it to do anything in connection with cartels except to initiate studies and make recommendations. If, however, at the world trade conference a proper agreement is reached, of course that alters the picture entirely, so that eventually we may hope for some teeth in the procedure for dealing with this affair on an international basis.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure there will be no difference of view between the government of the United States and the government of the United Kingdom as to the desirability of there being no commercial or industrial power greater than the power of governments to determine what the economy of the respective nations should be.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Transfer from D.T. & I.C. Act of provisions re certain complaints.

Mr. GRAYDON: This section contains a number of features which I think perhaps require a little more extended discussion than we shall be able to give to-night. It is very close to eleven o'clock, so that perhaps this section might be allowed to stand, because I am afraid we cannot complete it this evening.

Section stands.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

RADIO BROADCASTING—ADVERTISING PROGRAMMES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting corporation banned or refused advertising programmes offered to it at any time during the past year?
2. If so, which programmes were banned or refused?
3. Why was each refused?
4. By whom was the decision made in each case?

Mr. McCANN:

1. The Canadian Broadcasting corporation has not accepted for its networks some advertising programmes offered during the past year.

2 and 3. It would not be in the public interest to give details of these non-acceptances as this might be embarrassing to advertising agencies, sponsors and United States networks, would impair the relations of the corporation with those with whom it has business dealings and so affect its ability to serve the listening public.

4. By the corporation.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—FARM MACHINERY

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

1. Who are the members of the wartime prices and trade board?
2. Is there any representative of organized labour and agriculture on this board?
3. If so, who are they and what organizations do they represent?
4. What companies made representation to the wartime prices and trade board for increase in price of farm machinery?
5. What were the demands of increase in retail prices in each case?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Chairman: Donald Gordon, deputy governor, Bank of Canada.
Members:
H. B. McKinnon, chairman of the tariff board.
David Sim, deputy minister for customs and excise, Dept. of National Revenue.
F. A. McGregor, commissioner of the combines investigation act, Dept. of Justice.
A. M. Shaw, director of marketing service, Dept. of Agriculture.
J. G. Bouchard, asst. deputy minister of agriculture.
W. A. Mackintosh, director general of economic reconstruction, Dept. of Reconstruction and Supply.
A. MacNamara, deputy minister of labour.
M. W. Mackenzie, deputy minister, Dept. of Trade and Commerce.

2. No. The members of the wartime prices and trade board are employees of the government or government agencies and special groups are not represented.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4 and 5.

Geo. White & Sons Co. Ltd., London, Ont., 22 per cent.

Otaco Ltd., Orillia, Ont.—variable amounts on each machine ranging from 8½ per cent to 40 per cent.

Fleury-Bissell Ltd., Elora, Ont., 27 per cent.

John Deere Plow Co. Ltd., Welland, Ont., 20 per cent.

Brantford Coach & Body Ltd., Brantford, Ont., 45 per cent.

Massey-Harris Co. Ltd., Toronto, Ont., 29 per cent.

Cockshutt Plow Co. Ltd., Brantford, Ont., 28½ per cent.

International Harvester Co. of Canada Ltd., Hamilton, Ont., 23 per cent.

R. Noble & Sons, Shallow Lake, Ont., 25 per cent.

Note.—A great number of requests were made by telephone which were not confirmed by letter. During these telephone conversations the applicants were generally advised that a survey of the industry was being made and that the increase when approved would be uniform and would apply to all manufacturers.

VETERANS LAND ACT—MIDDLESEX COUNTY

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. Have any farms been purchased in East Middlesex under the Veterans Land Act?
2. If so, in what townships, concessions, and what are the lot numbers?
3. What price was paid for each?

Mr. TUCKER:

1. Yes.
2. Farms purchased in East Middlesex:

3. It is considered that the public disclosure as to details of prices paid for various lands purchased by the Veterans Land Act would be detrimental to the administration and operation of the act and not in the best interests of the veterans for whom the lands are purchased. This is in accord with statement made to the house on April 17, 1946, page 951 of Hansard, and on subsequent occasions.

1943-44 WHEAT PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH:

1. When will the 1943-44 wheat participation certificates be redeemed?
2. Will it be necessary for these certificates to be sent into the Canadian wheat board offices before being paid?

[Mr. Mayhew.]

3. Have the forms asking for the return of such certificates been sent out from the Winnipeg office?
4. If so, when?
5. If not, what is the reason for the delay?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. As soon as the participation certificates listed on the proper form are returned to the Canadian wheat board.
2. Yes. These should be listed on special forms by the producer. These forms have been in the hands of the elevator companies since June 22. Producers who have not already done so, should obtain these forms from the local elevator and the elevator companies will return the completed forms with the participation certificates to the Canadian wheat board in Winnipeg.
3. Answered by No. 2.
4. June 22, 1946.
5. Answered by No. 4.

INTERIM ARMED FORCES—GRATUITIES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Are members of the interim force of the armed forces entitled to payment of gratuities?
2. What action has been taken towards early payment of gratuities to men in the said force?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Members of the interim force of the armed forces are entitled to payment of war service gratuity: (a) On the date of their acceptance for service in the permanent naval or military forces or the regular air force; (b) or, if not accepted for the forces named in (a) then they will be entitled to payment when they resume their civilian status.

2. The paying authorities of the services are organized to make payment at time the member of the interim force becomes entitled as outlined in answer to question No. 1, above.

SUCCESSION DUTIES

Mr. FRASER:

What has been collected by the federal government in succession duties during (a) the year 1945; (b) the first five months of 1946?

Mr. McCANN: Succession duty collections: (a) $21,876,664.37; (b) $7,510,342.80.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD—MUNICIPALITY OF ARTHUR, MANITOBA

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. What soldier settlement farms, if any, have been sold by the Soldier Settlement Board in the municipality of Arthur, province of Manitoba, since 1929—by section, township and range?

2. What price did the Soldier Settlement Board receive for such farms?

3. Have submissions been made to the Veterans Land Act Board to sell any of these farms to the board and if so, at what price?

MOBILIZATION ACT—MINISTERS OR CLERGYMEN

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. How many religious denominations in Canada were recognized as entitled to exempt ministers or clergymen under the National Selective Service mobilization regulations? What are their names?

2. How many Canadian men were allowed the exemption as ministers or clergymen?

3. How many who applied for this exemption as ministers or clergymen were refused it?

4. How many men applied for exemption on the grounds of being students for the ministry?

5. How many such applications were (a) granted; (b) refused?

6. From how many religious denominations were allowed applicants drawn? What were they?

7. How many students for the ministry were allowed to each of the named denominations?

8. What was the number of college students classified as conscientious objectors (a) theology students; (b) non-theology students?

9. How many of these have returned to their former training or vocation?

10. How many of the college students classified as conscientious objectors are now making contributions to the Red Cross Society, and how many are not?

11. How many of the men not making contributions are required to report periodically to the alternative service officer?

12. What is the purpose of this reporting?

13. To what different denominations do the men belong who are now detained in alternative service work camps, and how many from each?

IMPORTS OF CORN

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many bushels of corn were imported into Canada for the years 1941, 42, 43, 44, 45, and 46 to date?

2. What amount of subsidy was paid each year on the corn imported?

3. What are the names of the importers?

4. For what purpose was the corn imported?

ALTERNATIVE SERVICE REGULATIONS

Mr. McMASTER:

1. How many persons are employed in administering the alternative service regulations of June 1, 1946?

2. How many of these are mainly employed in looking after conscientious objectors?

3. What was the gross expenditure for administering alternative service for the month of April, 1946 for (a) salaries; (b) office space; (c) other expenses?

4. How many alternative service camps are still in operation?

5. What was the cost during April, 1946, of maintaining these?

6. What financial returns did the government get during the same period from the operation of these camps?

7. If figures (for 6) not yet available, what was the gross profit or deficit from operation of all such camps in 1945?

8. How many unemployed are now registered with national selective service?

9. How many men are required in agriculture?

10. How many of the registered unemployed have been offered work in agriculture?

11. How many of these have refused to engage in agriculture?

12. How many registered unemployed are receiving unemployment insurance?

NATIONAL SELECTIVE SERVICE—EMPLOYMENT OFFICES

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. How many men of military age were employed in the National Selective Service offices throughout Canada from September, 1942 to V-J day?

2. How many of these men are now permanent civil servants in the employ of the national employment service offices throughout Canada?

3. Have other non-veterans been appointed to the national employment service staff since the war ended? If so, how many?

4. What steps have been taken by the government to give veterans preference in appointments to the national employment service?

CHATHAM, N.B., AIRFIELD

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What were the costs in connection with the airfield at Chatham, New Brunswick (a) land; (b) grading; (c) surfacing; (d) buildings; (e) equipment; (f) incidentals; (g) total?

2. Who were the contractors, stating tender prices?

3. Has the property and equipment or any portion been sold or offered for sale? If so, to whom and at what prices?

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Third and fourth reports of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

PRINTING AND STATIONERY

ADVANCES TO KING'S PRINTER FOR PURCHASE OF MATERIALS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act in relation to advances authorized to be made to the King's Printer for the purchase of materials to execute orders and requisitions and payment of wages, and to provide that the total amount of such outstanding advances shall at no time exceed the sum of two million dollars.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

HIGH COMMISSIONERSHIPS

INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATION ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he inform the house how long the post of Canadian high commissioner to the United Kingdom has been vacant, and whether there are similar vacancies existing in respect of our diplomatic representation in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, answering my hon. friend, who sent me notice of his question, I would say that the post of high commissioner in the United Kingdom has been filled since Mr. Massey's departure from the United Kingdom on May 23 by the acting high commissioner, Mr. Frederick Hudd. In Australia Mr. C. M. Croft, formerly head of the commercial intelligence service and now commercial counsellor, has been acting high commissioner since the return to Canada of the Hon. T. C. Davis. Mr. Alfred Rive has been appointed high commissioner to New Zealand in the place of Doctor W. A. Riddell, who has returned to Canada on retirement. In South Africa Mr. J. C. Macgillivray has been acting high commissioner since the retirement of Mr. C. J. Burchell, K.C.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask a supplementary question? In the case of the three posts which are temporarily being filled does the government expect to make permanent appointments in the near future?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The filling of these posts involves consideration of possible transfers in some of the posts which are already filled elsewhere. There has not recently been the opportunity which I wish to have in consultation with the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs and with my colleagues in the government to finally settle certain appointments. However, I expect it will not be very long before adjustments are made.

MOTOR VEHICLES

PASSENGER CARS—PRIORITIES TO PERSONS ENGAGED IN AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I wish to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply if in any case passenger car priorities are granted to persons in agricultural production.

[Mr. Martin.]

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, that is a rather broad question. It depends entirely on whether ownership of the passenger car is essential to the earning of the livelihood of the person concerned. Certain people associated with agriculture do earn their livelihood through the use of passenger cars, and these get priority if they qualify as eligible consumers within the terms of motor vehicle control order as amended. Others do not, and consequently they do not get priority.

Mr. GRAYDON: Under the class A and class B priorities there does not seem to be anything which gives officials of the department such discretion as the minister now indicates. I have in mind a man who has been—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is an important matter, and I ask the question only because it has broad general import.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member has been given sufficient latitude in connection with his question.

Mr. GRAYDON: I assume I am permitted at least to ask a supplementary question of the minister with respect to it. Will the minister take into consideration the situation he has referred to and determine whether it applies to a case such as I have attempted to lay before the house?

Mr. HOWE: I would call the attention of my hon. friend to Canadian war orders and regulations dated November 10, 1945, in which is it stated that an eligible consumer will be entitled to a priority certificate—only if he establishes to the satisfaction of the motor vehicle rationing officer,

(a) his need for the new passenger car for the purpose of his profession, business, trade or calling.

Mr. GRAYDON: In this case the farmer who needed the vehicle was refused it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

BUILDING MATERIALS

SHORTAGE IN SUPPLY OF WINDOW GLASS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, on June 18 I asked a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in connection with window glass. At that time the minister said—Hansard, page 2590:

Canada does not manufacture that product, and for our supply we are entirely dependent upon imports.

Since that time I have received a letter from Industrial Glass Works, of St. Laurent, Quebec, stating that they are making substantial or large shipments of glass each day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is perfectly aware that if he wants any information he should put a question to the minister, but he should not give information to the house.

Mr. FRASER: I just wondered whether the minister had received a letter from this company informing him that they are manufacturing window glass.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to limit himself to putting his question.

SUPPLY OF NAILS FOR DOMESTIC USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, of which I have not been able to give him notice because I have just received the communication. Has the nail situation in Canada improved at all? I am asked if it will be possible to get nails to manufacture crates and cases for the canning factories to take off the crops in my constituency. I should like to ask a second question: are any nails being exported from Canada?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Plants producing nails are or have been working to their full capacity for many months. I assume that the canneries of my hon. friend's riding have the same chance to obtain their share as any other canneries or any other users of nails. The answer to the second question is that the export of nails from this country is prohibited. I might point out, however, that all exports are crated, and nails are used for crates; the demand for nails for crates has reached amazing proportions. So I would not say that no nails are being exported, but they are not being exported in packages.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

MONOPOLISTIC TRADE RESTRICTIONS—COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE

The house resumed from Tuesday, July 2, consideration in committee of bill No. 193, to amend the Combines Investigation Act—Mr. St. Laurent—Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 4—Transfer from D.T. & I.C. Act of provisions re certain complaints.

Mr. CHURCH: In reference to section 4, this matter of combines and restraints of trade came up a few years ago in connection with sections 498 and 498 (a) of the criminal code. There had been an indictment and some appeals before the authorities in Ontario in connection, I believe, with milk, electrical, contractors, agreements of manufacturers to sell exclusively, and also as to heat, light and power corporations, and a bill of indictment was laid before one of the assizes. Meetings had been held of various companies fixing prices and agreeing as to who should tender on certain contracts in connection with municipal work, and the question was raised as to the applicability of sections 498 and 498(a) of the code, which are referred to on page 233 of Snow's Criminal Code and the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935, to these particular combines. One of the cases went to the privy council, and it was held that these combines could not be regulated in this manner.

Combines in restraint of trade have been flourishing like a green bay tree under all governments since confederation. The sections of the code were found to be of doubtful effect. Why were they invalid and unworkable? Because they were made a football between the attorney general of Canada and the attorneys general of the provinces. I remember that in the 1926-27 session, on the Ottawa-Georgian Bay bill, on March 14, 1927, these particular matters were brought into issue regarding navigable streams, as to which rights were international and which interprovincial, and the jurisdiction of the dominion over boundary waterways schemes and interprovincial schemes. Unfortunately the bill was talked out at that particular session. These proceedings will be nothing but a farce, because you cannot by the widest stretch of imagination exercise any control over these international cartels. Security and social councils, so far as international regulation of combines goes, are a myth. I know, because I had some experience with the super-power trust for a good many years. It was contended by a former member for South York, Mr. Maclean, who was a very valuable member of this house and also a powerful newspaper man in Toronto, and I agreed with his contention, and submit it now to the right hon. gentleman who is leading the house, that it is the duty of the federal government to enforce its own law in relation to these combines that operate in restraint of trade. The reason for that is obvious; such combines come almost exclusively under the control of this parliament, since by section 91 trade and commerce are within its jurisdiction.

As regards the principle of referring these questions to the attorneys general of the provinces, I do not know how it got into the act, but I contend that it has been fatal to the whole procedure. I have nothing but the greatest respect for Mr. McGregor, having had a good deal to do with him in the days when he was an officer of the Department of Labour. He is all right, but the whole of this law is all wrong. We do not exercise over combines the same effective control that the Sherman Act exercised years ago in the United States, because under that act the president and others who have to do with its enforcement can take real action; and they have not our complicated division of powers under the British North America Act.

I suggest that the greatest step forward in the regulation of trusts and combines in this country was taken by the government of Mr. Bennett when he appointed the price spreads committee in 1933-34, on the membership of which sat my hon. friend representing the constituency of Haldimand (Mr. Senn). That committee accomplished something that had never been done in the history of this parliament. It made a real investigation into the operation of combines in restraint of trade. It summoned all interested parties; all sides of the question were debated; witnesses were heard representing trade and commerce and restraint of trade, and the committee submitted a very valuable report. It astonished the working classes of Canada to learn what was going on in the country in this respect. The report of that committee was the key to the whole situation.

We know very well how divided the attorneys general of the provinces are in matters of this kind. This was fully recognized by the former member for South York, Mr. Maclean, back in 1924, 1925 and 1926, and I have always agreed with the view he expressed that the federal law in regard to trade and commerce, and jurisdiction over combines in restraint of trade, should all be under the control of the attorney general of Canada, who should initiate proceedings, instead of leaving it to the provinces themselves, who have no jurisdiction.

Sections 498 and 498A were in the code before we had a commission and before the department was given the power it now has under the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act of 1935, and these particular sections have been before the law courts of the country for consideration. The cases are set out at page 233 of Snow's Criminal Code. One of the cases even went to the privy council. If this parliament really wishes to do something about combines it should put the power to enforce the law where it belongs. These combines and restraints of trade are flourishing like a green bay tree. We all know what the American super-power trust has meant in connection with waterways in the United States. Private ownership had control of the whole thing and Ontario was finally redeemed from slavery by the government that came into office in the province in 1905. It gave the joy and boon of cheap light and power to people in the cities and in the suburban and rural parts, and domestic and commercial lighting in consequence costs nearly three times less than it did before. In my opinion, the government is not going about this problem in the right way. This is not the way to attack combines. These combines will go on as long as there is such a thing as trade and commerce, because you cannot stop restraints of trade by legislation in which clever lawyers can find loopholes whenever the need arises. I was president of the union of Canadian municipalities for some time and this whole question came up in the municipal association in Toronto. We had a full discussion of it then and I do not believe that under this bill we are going to make any progress at all in controlling combines because, as I say, lawyers can find a loophole in any act. A lawyer can go to the attorney general of the dominion and say: This is a purely provincial matter which should be referred to the attorney general of the province; and the result will be that the whole thing will become a political football. As I have already pointed out, the Sherman law in the United States has enabled those in authority to take effective action. The ratepayers of that country have been given the real picture.

See what has happened to the bank act. You can drive a coach and four through this act just as you can through the bank act. There is a section of the bank act that declares that banks shall not deal in real estate. Why then should it be necessary for a bank to have a thirty-five storey building to do work that could be done on four floors? Where have the attorneys general been so far as that is concerned? I suggest that the same thing is going to happen here under the Combines Investigation Act. I fail to see how combines are going to be regulated by this legislation unless the enforcement is by the attorney general of Canada.

But not being able to regulate combines in restraint of trade in our own country, they want to branch out now and regulate and control cartels in international affairs. They want to take in the seven seas. But the people are waking up and are finding that little or nothing can be done about it. I appreciate the fact that in Mr. McGregor we have a valuable officer, but Mr. McGregor cannot do anything unless he is given proper enforcement machinery. Section 4, the bill states in the explanatory page, is substantially similar in form to section 20, chapter 59, of the statutes of 1935, the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act. Provisions of that act, which make its section 20 applicable to the combines investigation act and to sections 498 and 498A of the criminal code, are proposed to be repealed by subsection 1 of section 14 of this bill. In my opinion this will mean nothing so far as regulating combines is concerned. If we want to regulate combines effectively we must bring them within the jurisdiction of the criminal code, and to do that we must make the sections really effective. Before a bill can be laid before the assizes, section 4 must be invoked, and sections 498 and 498A of the code, and if you take the case to the law courts, after investigation by the Minister of Labour, you will find that you are wasting your time, because I doubt whether a bill of indictment would be laid before the grand jury. And if it were, it would no doubt be quashed later in the courts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Last evening the minister made reference to certain changes which I suggested, and he indicated that if certain restrictive provisions "which the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen put in there in 1935—" and I add "were removed"—"I will agree to take out the provision restricting the laying of information to the attorneys general". I have quoted from the minister's statement at page 3073 of Hansard. I do not know of any record in support of the minister's statement. I hold in my hand the senate report of July 3, 1935, in which any recommendations for changes which were made in the bill as submitted to the senate committee were introduced, and concurrence was moved not by the Hon. Mr. Meighen but by the Right Hon. Mr. Graham, who presided over the committee. I mention that by way of clarification. Nowhere have I been able to find any suggestion, either in the banking or commerce committee to which the matter was submitted, or in the debates in the senate, which would bear out the statement that in fact it was Mr. Meighen who introduced the proviso that prosecution should not take place under section 498 of the criminal code and at the same time under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

With regard to section 10A, when the commissioner is led to believe that there is a combine or a merger which contravenes the provisions of the act, does he proceed with the taking of evidence, either under oath or not under oath, or how does he determine the question upon which a prima facie conclusion is arrived at that a combine does in fact exist? I took the trouble to read over the evidence of the banking and commerce committee of 1937, and it was interesting to note that one of the recommendations made was that as soon as any information came to the chairman of the tariff board which indicated that there was a combine in any particular commodity, that information should be communicated to the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. Last evening I was surprised to learn that as to radio tubes and sets, although the tariff board found in 1939 and 1940 that Canadian consumers were being unduly exploited through the arrangements then in effect, no information of that kind was brought to the attention of the commissioner. This is a serious matter. The supply of small radios has been clearly restricted by the actions of a combine operating not only internationally but in Canada.

Last evening I asked the minister what he was going to do about it. What is he going to do about the findings of the commissioner on the electric lamp combine? What is he going to do about the findings of the commission as to radio tubes and sets? There is no doubt the findings are clear and definite that there is a combine and that the Canadian consumer is being exploited. What does he intend to do about matches and the other matters referred to in the report?

Under section 10A—and this is supposed to consolidate the section in the dominion trade and industry commission act and also in the criminal code—the commissioner may receive and investigate complaints and communicate them to the attorney general of the province or to the attorney general of Canada. Does that mean that he shall investigate them and communicate his findings, or is it merely permissive? So far as the crown is concerned I realize that "may" is mandatory. But is it not a fact that under these circumstances the word "may" makes no action mandatory on the part of the commissioner? I should appreciate it if the minister would explain generally the procedure. In the banking and commerce committee of 1937 one of the chief complaints was that, while there were preliminary investigations, little serious action was taken on the basis of the information secured by the commissioner. The time has come for a declaration by the minister as to the extent to which wrongdoing revealed in this report is to be proceeded against. I realize the difficulty with international cartels, but what about the cartels operating in Canada through companies nationally incorporated in Canada and doing business in Canada? What is to be done about these?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not in a position to predict what actions are to be taken by the ten officers under the act setting up this commission. I suggest that they are to carry out their duties prescribed by the act. Section 12 of the act says that whenever a formal complaint has been made by six persons the commissioner shall make an investigation. Whenever he is directed by the minister to do so he shall make an investigation. Whenever he has reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed, he shall make an investigation. I believe the commissioner, about whom such laudatory things were said yesterday, realizes his responsibility and the duties incumbent upon him under his oath of office, and that he will carry out the provisions of the act.

The hon. member refers to the statement about radio sets and electric lamps in the cartel report which was tabled at the last session of parliament. This system of licences and agreements between patentees is one of the things which has proved to be a serious embarrassment in proceeding against these organizations. It is for that reason that an amendment is suggested in the bill to enable the commissioner, under such conditions, to go to the court and ask the court to make such order as may appear to be necessary to avoid the consequences of abuses of these exclusive privileges which result from patents or from the registration of trade marks. Section 10A is to make it part of the duty of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act to make investigations when complaints are laid, or when directions are given to him, or when he has reason to believe sections 498 and 498A of the code are being violated. The section is substantially in the form in which it appears in the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act; and the effect of this and the repealing section, which is further on in the bill, is to transfer the power, responsibility and duty now resting upon the trade and industry commission, with respect to these sections of the criminal code, to the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. That is the extent to which section 10A goes.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Commissioner shall cause inquiry to be made.

Mr. CASE: This clause says:

> The commissioner shall, on application made under section eleven of this act, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed—

The question in my mind is, upon the application of whom? Does it result from an individual application or a petition, or what brings about the investigation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 11 provides that an application for an investigation may be made by any six persons, British subjects resident in Canada, of the full age of twenty-one years.

Mr. STIRLING: The basis of this act at least used to be that the combine was wrong when it was in restraint of trade. I take it that is still the basis?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Then I wonder if the minister would comment on this wording which is underlined in section 5, "or whenever he has reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed." I do not see how the commissioner can peer into the future and make up his mind when a combine is being formed whether or not it will result in the restraint of trade.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the situation is such that he cannot have any definite opinion about it, then he will not have the duty cast upon him by this section of making an investigation. "Combine" is defined in the act, and I think it is easy to conceive that one might come to the conclusion that certain negotiations were such that their completion would bring about the formation of a combine unduly restrictive of trade. I think it is quite easy to conceive that facts might come to the knowledge of the commissioner which would clearly indicate that there were in progress negotiations the culmination of which would be the formation of a combine restrictive of trade; and under those conditions it would be his duty to cause an inquiry to be made with a view to determining whether or not his impression was founded upon sufficient facts to justify intervention.

Mr. STIRLING: I can quite understand that the commissioner might so proceed when the combine had been set up and had commenced operation, but I find it very hard to believe that he would have sufficient prophetic powers to enable him, before it is formed, to decide whether or not it will be in restraint of trade. Would the minister go so far as to say that a combine can ever be a good thing?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not a combine as defined in the act, because there it is one which does unduly restrict trade or affect prices; so that kind of combine cannot be a good thing. It must be one coming under the definition, part of which requires that it must have obnoxious tendencies.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not "unduly" under this act, but under the code.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: But here it must be something which is against the public interest, so its obnoxious character is one of the things required to bring it within the definition; and if it comes within the definition it constitutes an offence and cannot be good.

Mr. KNOWLES: I understand one of the reasons for adding the new words giving the commissioner the right to initiate an investigation on his own motion is that it was found that the provision that six people might make application was not worth a great deal. I am glad to see this addition giving the commissioner authority to initiate an investigation. I wonder if at the same time thought was given to reducing the number of people required under the other section, which we are not to have an opportunity to discuss, from six to perhaps four, or even two, so that we could make sure that any possible combine as defined by the act is investigated.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Consideration was given to that point, and it was felt that whether the number be four, or six, or even two, when it requires to be in the form of a formal application for an investigation supported by a statutory declaration having the effect of an oath, it was not the thing that ordinarily would be done. What ordinarily occurs is that someone writes in and calls the attention of the commissioner to a situation which he considers fraught with danger to the public. The commissioner does get quite a number of frivolous communications. He uses his best judgment to sort out the wheat from the chaff, and whenever it appears to him there are anything like serious grounds for proceeding, he will do so if this section is passed as amended. Previously he had to have a formal application by six persons supported by their statutory declaration, or he had to have a direction from the minister. That required the minister to go into it and come to the conclusion that it was necessary to have an investigation made. My experience in the office of minister would lead me to believe that this would be something that would retard proceedings. The minister was required to go into it himself; and as the act read previously he had to go into it and not only take the vicarious responsibility for this being done in his department, but take the personal responsibility of asserting that he had given it sufficient study to come to a conclusion based upon his own research.

In these cases I think it is desirable to have a head officer in the commission who will do that on his own responsibility. Of course the minister will still retain his responsibility to parliament for the conduct of the official, but he will not have to make a personal investigation to put him in the position where he could go into court and say, "I have gone into this and have ascertained facts which justified me in giving that direction." If it is not to be done in that way it becomes just a hollow formality. If the minister is not to do it himself, I think it is preferable to have the statute indicate who is to do it and who will have to give sufficient consideration to the facts to form a reasoned, considered conclusion upon them.

Mr. KNOWLES: I take it that the provisions laid down in section 11 will scarcely be used from now on. It is likely that most of these investigations will be made on the initiative of the commissioner in the light of information conveyed to him.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is what has happened during the last twenty-three years the statute has been in operation, and I expect it will continue to be the way in which, in practice, it will operate.

Mr. KNOWLES: The only reason for keeping section 11 is to provide a last resort, if both the commissioner and the minister fail to do their duty.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the commissioner and the minister both take the view that it is not worth while to make certain investigations, and there are six British citizens who feel strongly otherwise, they can force the hand of the commission.

On section 6—Certificate for exercise of compulsion to witnesses.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I note the words—

> The commissioner shall not exercise power to penalize any person . . . whether for contempt or otherwise, unless and until . . . a judge of the exchequer court of Canada or of a superior or county court has certified . . .

Why is this made so wide? Would it not be sufficient if it covered the exchequer court or the superior court, thus ensuring uniformity of procedure and application? The one condition which would be required in connection with a provision of this kind would be a degree of uniformity across the country. It was found necessary to appeal many of the decisions made from wartime prices and trade board regulations, because in one province a judge would look at the matter in one way and in another province a judge would view it in another way. If the matter were left to the superior court, or particularly to the exchequer court, there would be uniformity and no possibility of discrimination.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In only one case in twenty-three years has there been any attempt to penalize a witness for refusal to answer. It was recognized that all other investigating commissioners have, by statute, the right to do what is sought here. In this instance it was felt that it would be better if before doing anything of the kind the commissioner, or one exercising his powers, were to realize that he had to go before a judge and justify what he intended to do.

In the provinces the superior court judges are to be found usually only in the capital cities. It is not a matter of very great importance whether that jurisdiction is or is not given to county court judges. I should expect however that it would be exercised with as much care by district or county court judges as by superior court judges. As a matter of fact I should not expect that a commissioner would be apt to appear before a judge with an application which would not commend itself to anyone before whom it was brought. The action of the commissioner, or one exercising his power, would be a considered action, subject to publicity. I do not believe any inconvenience will result from the fact that the county court judges would have jurisdiction in this connection. I believe its value is in preventing the making of a hasty decision. The commissioner has to consider his proposed action, and must make an application in connection with it. This is something which will receive publicity. In my view with those safeguards it will be properly administered.

On section 7—Use of documentary evidence in criminal proceedings.

Mr. HAZEN: Why have the last words in the act been dropped?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They are dropped because after documents are examined and made part of the evidence submitted they can never be used in any other proceedings. That is something which would give the sort of immunity which does not flow from any provision in any other statute. Here there may be various other kinds of cases in which one would require to use the same documents as part of the evidence. These words would give to any document used in a prosecution under sections 498 and 498A, or under the Combines Investigation Act, an immunity with respect to proceedings in any other criminal court. It would seem to me that that is a dangerous principle.

Mr. HAZEN: I am not clear about the section as it now reads. It says:

> No person shall be excused from attending and giving evidence and producing books, papers or records, in obedience to the order of the commissioner, on the ground that the oral evidence or documents required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to any proceeding or penalty, but no such oral evidence so required shall be used or receivable against such person in any criminal proceedings thereafter instituted against him,—

And so on. I direct the minister's attention to the words: "or documents required of him . . . but no such oral evidence so required shall be used or receivable against such person". It does not say, "oral evidence or documents so required shall be used or receivable against such person". I find only the words "oral evidence". Then it proceeds to say:

> Nor shall any such documents be used or receivable in any criminal proceedings.

These are criminal proceedings against the witness, or person who has been called. But if one goes back to the words in the sixth line, he finds "but no such oral evidence so required shall be used or receivable against such person." Why should the oral evidence not be received, and yet the documents be received against him? Should it not read, "oral evidence or documents?"

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. When the documents are secured they can be used as evidence. But if a person is interrogated, and is not permitted to decline to answer, it would not be proper to use against him the answers he has been obliged to give, and which might tend to incriminate him. The words we wish to strike out would prevent even the defence from using these documents. It would make them documents which could not be used in any criminal proceedings, except those under section 498 or under the Combines Investigation Act.

I think it may have been well intended when inserted in 1935, but the language used goes beyond what was originally intended, because, as provided there, it would even deprive the owner of the documents of the right to use them in his own defence. I do not think that would be a proper provision to maintain in the statute.

Mr. HAZEN: As I read it, the evidence he gives cannot be used against him in criminal proceedings, but the documents can be used against him in criminal proceedings. Is that what the intention is?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. These documents can be used against him when obtained in that way or obtained on a search warrant. They are material things which can be looked at. As I understand it, the provision which confers protection on one who is compelled to answer was not put there for his sake, but was put there so that he would be in a position to testify freely and truthfully. That does not exist with respect to the documents. They are material things. They do not need to be protected so as not to change the story they tell.

Mr. HAZEN: The Canada Evidence Act refers only to the evidence. It makes no reference to documents.

Mr. MacINNIS: A nice point of law has been raised by the lawyers; but how can you proceed against the combine if the documents cannot be used?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: My own experience in the only prosecution I conducted under the Combines Investigation Act was that we made our case out of documents and correspondence.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I must commend the minister for the statement he made a moment ago in answer to the member for St. John-Albert when he said that it would not be proper to use the evidence of persons brought before a commission to incriminate them in criminal proceedings. That is a proper point of view, and it is one which we on this side of the house took in connection with the espionage commission. My right hon. friend's declaration of a moment ago was entirely in keeping with the best traditions of British jurisprudence, and it was made without equivocation or addition—namely, that when a person is compelled to give evidence by any investigating body the evidence so given shall not be used against him. As a matter of fact there is one statute in which that right still exists—I refer to the Excise Act. Under the Excise Act a commissioner or inspector of the mounted police may, if he believes there has been any infraction of the Excise Act, order a person by subpoena to appear before him and to answer such questions as are put to him. In one such case I was not on the prosecution but on the defence, and the person being examined refused to answer unless protection was given to him. He was subsequently prosecuted for that failure but was acquitted. As I understand this section, it frees the defence from the penalty section which provides that once there is an examination on the basis of the documents that have been produced before a commission, the use of those documents is denied in the courts even for the defence. The section removes an anomaly, and I think it is a very proper provision.

Mr. McMASTER: I cannot see why the evidence could not be used under further proceedings under this act.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the hon. member's construction is correct. We feel that it is improper in this law to blank out a certain number of documents and say that they can never be used in any criminal proceedings by anybody. I think that is a wrong principle to have in this act, we are therefore asking that it be taken out.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Powers of exchequer court in cases of use of patents or trade marks to limit production unduly or to restrain or injure trade.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Has the Minister of Justice had an opportunity to consult the Secretary of State as to the effect of this section in relation to section 65 of the Patent Act, which provides:

> The attorney general of Canada or any person interested may at any time after the expiration of three years from the date of the grant of a patent apply to the commissioner alleging in the case of that patent that there has been an abuse of the exclusive rights thereunder and asking for relief under this act.

Then follows a list of what constitutes an abuse. As I see it, many of the provisos in section 9 (30) of the bill now before us are similar to the abuses named in section 65 of the Patent Act. The commissioner has power under the Patent Act to revoke a patent, which is similar to the provision contained in this section. Is there not duplication? Is there any reason why this legislation should be repeated in another act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The reason for asking that this section be enacted is that those who have patents do give licences in which they may insert conditions which may make possible the operation of a monopoly or combine, and an order that another licence be granted would not remedy the situation. The present provision, section 65 of the Patent Act, makes the only other alternative the cancellation of the patent. But in the bill before us it is suggested that the court be given the right to make such order respecting the use of the patent as may be required to prevent its being made a factor in the establishment and operation of a combine.

Mr. RICHARD (Ottawa East): Section 66 of the Patent Act empowers the commissioner to grant a licence if there is an abuse, just as in this case.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, but it is felt that the granting of another licence to one more would not be a remedy. The remedy that is necessary is to prevent the owner of the patent from putting conditions in his licence which enable him to exercise control over the disposal of the patented article.

Mr. KNOWLES: During the latter part of the war information came out that Bayer's aspirin was making a good deal of money which through devious routes was going to an enemy country, to Farbenindustrie, I think it was. Certain steps were taken in the light of that information which resulted in the company's profits in this country being entrusted to the custodian of enemy property. Since this section deals with patents and trademarks will the minister tell us how that matter now stands, and what could be done under this new section about a situation of the kind I have described?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not in a position to inform the hon. member how that matter stands. My information is that it is not a patent which is involved there, but rather the registration of the word "aspirin" as a trade mark, and that this registration prevents anyone else from selling the same thing under the name of aspirin. It is acetylsalicylic acid; and aspirin now appears in fact to have become more than a trade mark. A trade mark is used to designate a certain thing made by a certain producer; but aspirin has in fact become a household word, and much better known than acetylsalicylic acid. There is a matter there which is under consideration. Even in the United States the word "aspirin" can be used by others than Bayer. In England the same situation exists. And that is the matter which is under consideration, and which, because of the form of our Trade Marks Act, which gives a perpetual right in a registered trade mark as long as it remains registered, creates a difficulty.

Mr. KNOWLES: When I was in London a few months ago I went into a chemist's shop in London and asked for aspirin. The chemist produced a good-sized bottle for about ninepence. I could hardly realize that it was aspirin. I concluded that it was, but that I had been misled by my experience in this country, where, because of this practice, it has a virtual monopoly. Added to that were the huge profits which created such a scandal during the war. This is a matter which calls for attention.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no monopoly of the product. There are many concerns manufacturing the product, but some of us do not know enough to realize that if we do not get it under the name of Bayer's aspirin it is just as good as if we did. They have under our Trade Marks Act an exclusive right to use the word aspirin, but there is nothing to prevent other pharmaceutical manufacturers from putting out the same article, exactly the same thing, at less than one-third of the price for which aspirin sells. But the radio programmes and other forms of advertising convince the public that if they want to get rid of a headache they have got to have the article which is sold legally under the name "aspirin."

Mr. KNOWLES: It is all wrong.

Mr. JAENICKE: I should like to ask the minister about the proviso of this section which stipulates that—> no order shall be made . . . which is at variance with any treaty, convention, arrangement or engagement . . . with any other country . . .

What treaties or conventions have we with other countries, and what countries; and, briefly, what are the provisions of those treaties?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is an international convention for the protection of industrial property, to which Canada is a party, and which of course must be respected in any order which might be made under this section 30.

Mr. JAENICKE: Is that available to members of parliament, and do we know what other countries adhere to this treaty?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have in my hand a copy of the convention issued by the government of the United Kingdom, printed by His Majesty's stationery office, international treaty series No. 16 of 1928, which when issued sold for ninepence at any office of His Majesty's stationer; and the copy shows that it was entered into by Germany, the Austrian republic, Belgium, the United States of Brazil, republic of Cuba, Denmark, the Dominican republic, Spain, the republic of Esthonia, the United States, the republic of Finland, the French republic, the United Kingdom, the Dominion of Canada, the commonwealth of Australia, the Irish Free State, Hungary, Italy, Japan, Morocco, Norway, the Netherlands, Poland, the free city of Danzig, Portugal, Serbia, Sweden, the Swiss confederation, the Czechoslovakian republic, Tunisia, and Turkey.

Mr. JAENICKE: What happens to the rights of Germany, Japan, Italy and the free city of Danzig as protected under this treaty?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Under our regulations concerning trading with the enemy, all property belonging to subjects of enemy countries became vested in the custodian of enemy property and are still vested in him. Such rights as subjects of enemy countries may have had are now vested in the Canadian custodian of enemy property in respect of Canada.

Mr. CHURCH: I think the minister has stated the intention of the proposed statute. The statute is simply exploratory. It gives wider powers to the commissioner than he had before, to summon witnesses, to compel their attendance, and to make a more thorough examination than is possible under the act to-day. So far so good. No doubt it gives him wider powers to go into these matters, to call witnesses, to require the production of books, and to make what may be called a thorough examination of the whole case regarding combinations in restraint of trade. But I want to point out one defect. The commissioner has no further powers. He can go before a judge of the exchequer court or a superior court or county court judge or other judge and ask him to give him authority to lay an information. Then the judge may render a bill of indictment. I want to point out that under sections 498 and 498 (A) at present the commissioner—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I think the attention of the hon. member should be called to the fact that these sections have been adopted.

Mr. CHURCH: I am dealing with the sections—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The sections which the hon. member is referring to have been adopted.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the next section all the commissioner can do is to make a report. On page 233 of the fourth edition of Snow's Criminal Code, about twenty cases are listed under the sections in respect of which the commissioner makes his report, and in nearly all of them the convictions were upset on appeal. The enforcement of every section and of federate law in general is under the attorney general of the province. It is true that not only this act but all federal statutes are enforced by the provincial attorney general, the attorney general of Canada being relieved of all that responsibility, and the enforcement of all these federal laws costs the provinces a lot of money. With the complicated situation that exists, therefore, I doubt whether by this bill we shall be able to control combines in restraint of trade, or cartels.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is apparently an additional power under the head of remedies, and while speaking of remedies and the necessity for the commissioner to have wide powers, I would read section 29 as it now stands. It is stated that whenever, as a result of an investigation under the provisions of the act, or as a result of a judgment, and so on——it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council that with regard to any article of commerce, there exists any combine to promote unduly the advantage of manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the public, and if it appears to the governor in council that such disadvantage to the public is facilitated by the duties of custom imposed on the article, . . . the governor in council may direct either that such article be admitted into Canada free of duty, or that the duty thereon be reduced to such amount or rate as will, in the opinion of the governor in council, give the public the benefit of reasonable competition.

There is a section that gives unusual powers, and once more with reference to the small radio, and also to other matters which I have mentioned, one of the reasons advanced by the department why we cannot get these radios is, first, that there is a combine, and, second, that if a Canadian goes to the United States to buy one he is faced with a tariff, and so on. In view of the fact that there was a definite finding by the commissioner that the Canadian consumer is being detrimentally affected, the question I wish to ask before referring to section 30 is this: To what extent was that stringent power resting in the governor in council ever utilized? To what extent did the commissioner at any time ask that it be utilized in order to cover the situations particularly set out in the report of the commission? Because, if that section were used, the difficulties set forth in the report with respect to electric lamps, radio tubes and sets would be obviated if not altogether done away with.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member has read the section and then paraphrased it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, no.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The section applies when as the result of an investigation by the commissioner or a judgment of the supreme court or the exchequer court of Canada, or any superior court or circuit, district or county court in Canada, it appears that such and such exists. There have been no such cases. This investigation by the tariff board is not an investigation by the supreme court of Canada or by the exchequer court or by the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act. It is not a case where this section would apply. The section is one which will be of considerable value whenever, after the restoration to the commissioner of the powers he enjoyed before 1935, he proceeds to make these investigations and makes these reports.

This report that was tabled is not the kind of investigation to which section 29 applies, and the matter of tariffs is one which, as hon. members will have noticed from the speech of the Minister of Finance stating his budget proposals, it is felt should not be dealt with piecemeal or in any small way.

In the forthcoming international conference on trade policies the tariff and cartel matters are down for consideration. I hope there will come out of that conference measures for the freeing of trade which will be of genuine assistance to the peace-loving nations and which will remove some of the causes that create the isolationism that eventually leads to war.

I do not think this section should be interfered with. It will be of value to have it there, and occasions will probably arise on which it can effectively be used. In connection with these patented things, it is not the tariff that is the obstacle to freedom of trade; it is this interlacing and these licensing agreements which are used in an ingenious fashion. For instance, the registration of a trade mark is used to limit the zones in which certain traders can operate. The same trade mark being registered in the name of different owners in different countries and being applied to something in which there enters a patented part or patented material, makes it impossible for the licensees to invade the territory of another because they would be infringing the trademark of the other owner. These are matters which are somewhat like the devices that have had to be run down in the application of taxing statutes. The income tax statute has become complicated because of the large number of plugs which it has been found necessary to introduce from time to time to prevent leakages which ingenious persons had contrived to bring about in a manner that was not illegal.

These things have to be studied in that light, and I think the dispositions manifested by several of the western allies do give some promise that this kind of conference will bring about results that should remove some of the fetters that now embarrass trade and frequently enable inordinate profits to be realized.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not going to labour this matter of radio tubes and sets, but I do not seem to get an answer as to what is to be done. The minister said that the tariff had nothing to do with it. Let me point out that in 1939 the tariff board reported, as set forth in the McGregor commission report:

The board strongly suggests that the selling margin granted jobbers and dealers should be drastically reduced. The average mark-up on the manufacturers' selling price of 113·11 per centum is ridiculous and such a method of meeting the competition of imported, unlicensed tubes is obviously made at the expense of the consumer.

In other words, in 1939 the tariff board found, first, that the public was being exploited, and second, those who manufactured radios in Canada raised the mark-up price 113 per cent above the manufacturers' price, so that the price would be high enough to cover the protection granted in this country. It is difficult for me to understand why a body charged with the responsibility of preventing and punishing combines in Canada did not have the ear to the tariff board or was not aware of the fact. The commissioner says he never heard of it until 1945, although the Canadian public were being exploited in this particular instance by agreements in restraint of trade. I accept the explanation, but it seems difficult to understand that there should be such an isolation or insulation of different departments of government that the department charged with preventing and punishing this sort of thing is not made aware of the reports of another department of government which finds that the Canadian consumer is being exploited. Surely if there ever was a case which could have been proceeded with it is this one. There is the evidence; there is the finding not only of this commission but of the tariff board in 1939. While we sit the Canadian consumer is still being exploited to the extent of 113 per cent of a write-up. Apparently I cannot get an answer from the government that they will act in this case which affects hundreds of thousands of radio listeners in Canada. It covers tubes; it covers radios. We have the definite finding that the whole thing is wrong and an exploitation, but it is impossible to get an answer that this sort of thing is to stop and the offenders to be proceeded against. We did not need the present powers to go after these people. The power was contained in the original act, and as it stands to-day.

Under the criminal code, before a conviction can be had, it is necessary to establish that what is being done by a trust or combine is unduly to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing and supplying; unduly to prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any article, or unduly to prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, and so on. In other words not only must it have that effect, but it must be done so flagrantly as to come within the ambit of the descriptive word "unduly". Under the Combines Investigation Act it is not necessary to establish that what is being done is being unduly done. A combine, as definied in section 2, means a combination having or designed to have the effect of limiting facilities for transporting, and so on. In other words, under the Combines Investigation Act all you have to prove is that certain results follow. Under the criminal code you have to establish not only that these results follow the unlawful act but that what is being done is being done with the intent unduly to limit transportation, competition, and so on. That being so, I ask the minister why in section 30, the amendment now being brought in, has the word "unduly" been incorporated, thereby widening the ambit and the necessity for proof, imposing an additional onus upon the commissioner beyond that which is now provided for in the act. I do not know whether I make myself clear, but in the act as it is constituted at the present time there is no necessity of establishing a state of mind, as would apparently be necessary if one were to set out to establish that what had been done had been done unduly. In the new section provision is made for the necessity of establishing that ingredient. I should like to know the reason for the change.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Lake Centre on his strategy in making a political speech and then winding up by asking a question so that the answer will be to the question and the political speech left unchallenged.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are none so deaf as those who will not hear. The hon. member has repeatedly asserted that it has been impossible for him to get any answer as to what is to be done about these abuses that are reported upon in the cartel report. If the hon. member were only half as eager to assist in making remedial legislation as he is to attempt to show that the government has been remiss in its duty, we should get along very much better.

With respect to his question, the criminal code provides that in order for conduct to constitute an offence it must be undue conduct. A long line of cases decide what is required under these provisions. The Combines Investigation Act provides that in order for an organization to be a combine it must be something which has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment of or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others. We have endeavoured to retain the language which has been the basis of decisions which have helped to establish what the law means to the public generally.

In this debate one hon. member—I forget which one—said that what was necessary was educational work to bring it home to those who organize and operate and exploit these monopolies and cartels what the state of the law is. Well, it may be an expensive way to educate them, but the best way to educate them is bring them before the court and have the court tell them that such and such are things which they cannot do, and if they do them they will be fined or go to gaol. That is the effective educational process which has been going on, and will have to go on in order to bring about that freedom of trade which we are all concerned to see realized. I do not think it is helpful toward that goal to—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Bring out the facts.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —cast blame here or there. Does the hon. member imagine that if it were not the intention of the government to take measures and to have measures taken to bring about the eradication of these abuses, it would have tabled this report? This report was requested for the purpose of ascertaining what the situation was. It was tabled for the purpose of permitting parliament and the public to realize that there were abuses which required intervention. We now come before this house asking it to give the commissioner the kind of legislation he feels he requires in order to be able to remedy these abuses; and the hon. member says, "I cannot get any answer from the government as to whether or not anything is going to be done about it."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let me answer that. My right hon. friend says the best way to educate certain people who are wrongdoers is to bring them before the courts. I agree. There has not been very much education of wrongdoers under the combines act since 1935. There have been four major prosecutions. In two the verdicts were "guilty"; in one the verdict was "not guilty", and in the fourth there was a verdict of "guilty" in 1941. A combine was found to exist; the verdict was reversed on a technical objection on appeal; and last evening my right hon. friend said the reason the case was not retried was that the wartime prices and trade board kept prices down now, so that these people would not be able to continue to do wrong. This is the first time in history that in a criminal prosecution anyone getting a new trial has been able to say, "Well, now, I will never do it again.

I cannot do it any more, anyway," and they are not proceeded against. My right hon. friend becomes very indignant. He says, "Do you think anyone would believe that unless the government intended to act it would have brought down the report?" In 1939, the government knew what was going on in regard to radios and radio parts; yet they have not acted. The tariff board pointed out the exploitation and the wrongdoing, but the persons in charge of prosecuting these wrongdoers who took advantage of the public; the persons in charge of the education campaign to which my right hon. friend refers, never heard anything about it because one department of government was so isolated from the other that it did not pass on the information.

I am not going to ask about the matter any more because, when I ask, my right hon. friend says it is political. I am not going to ascribe the failure to prosecute to political considerations, though there are many in this country who believe there is justification for such a viewpoint. My right hon. friend was the first to mention "political." If I or anyone else in this house were inclined to be suspicious, political considerations could be discussed at considerable length at this time. However, in spite of the findings of the tariff board in 1939; in spite of the findings of a royal commission in 1945, we have as yet no suggestion that anything is to be done about the matter. I leave it there.

Mr. FULTON: As I understand it, the measure provides that the exchequer court, on information exhibited by the Attorney General of Canada, may require individuals or concerns who have been found to be carrying on a cartel, to cease doing so, or to take such other action as will render the fact that they are a cartel harmless to the Canadian people. Is that the effect of the section? If that is not correct I would appreciate an explanation by the minister.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should like to explain that this is not intended to say to combines that they shall not continue to operate. If the hon. member will refer to the definition of "combines" in the Combines Investigation Act he will find at the end of subsection 4 the words:

> Provided that this subsection shall not be construed or applied so as to limit or impair any right or interest derived under the Patents Act, 1935, or under any other statute of Canada.

Rightly or wrongly it might be argued that those who were carrying out the terms of licences they obtained from patentees did not come within the definition of a merger or monopoly as defined in the act; and this section is to enable the attorney general to go to the court and show that use is being made of a patent or trade mark as an aid to get into a monopolistic situation in order to take from the public more than the public should have to contribute, and to ask the court to order such modifications in the licence or agreement under which the patented right is being used as will make it possible to avoid those consequences. That is the purpose. It was felt that when all you could prove was that a certain number were conforming with the terms of licences, you would have to go a good deal farther to establish that there was a combine. But if those terms produced, as they did in the cases referred to in this report which was tabled last session, results harmful to the public, the attorney general could ask the court to relieve the licensees from such conditions, or to make such other order as might allow the patented right to be used but not in this obnoxious fashion.

Mr. FULTON: It is not contemplated that it would be necessary to use this section against any organization or body coming within the definition of a "combine" under the Combines Investigation Act. Is that correct?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. They can be proceeded against, but it is quite probable that this will be frequently invoked, because it will be much easier to make out a case after we have had them relieved from the restrictive terms of licences. If a certain number of traders being prosecuted as a combine were to say, "Well, there is no agreement at all between us. Each of us is living up to the conditions that have been imposed upon him in his patent licence," that might be raised as a defence. But if we commence by having those conditions removed, and after they are removed the traders still act in a manner which indicates joint action to maintain prices, it will be much easier to obtain a conviction against them.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not like the last four lines of this amended section, which say:

> . . . no order shall be made under this section which is at variance with any treaty, convention . . .

And so forth. I know that no contract between private individuals can be binding that has in view an illegal act. Unless the minister knows there are certain clauses in this convention which could be invoked, I would suggest that these words be left out. If at any time it is found that a decision offends against this convention the matter could be brought before this parliament. If this convention does protect anybody, and it is wrong, I suggest that it is not a good convention and should be changed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is in the international convention an article, namely article 5, which declares that importation by the patentee into the country where a patent has been granted of articles manufactured in any of the countries of the union shall not entail revocation of the patent. There are in that article conditions with which the licensee under the patent must comply. Whether or not we have this proviso in the statute, no court would wish to make an order contrary to an international undertaking made by Canada. This is just a warning to the courts that there are such international agreements and that no order must be made in terms such as to violate the international agreement. That international agreement is reciprocal. Those who patent inventions in each country get the protection of the international agreement in the other countries, and vice versa.

Mr. McMASTER: I appreciate what the minister has said, but I point out that if people who form cartels take refuge under this convention, then it is time the law officers of the crown examined the convention to see where that can be stopped. There is no use in our passing legislation if it is to be ineffective because of this convention.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not think any of these abuses could be protected under an international convention. But an order might be made with respect to a patent which would be so broad in its terms as to violate some of the provisions of the international agreement. All we want to guard against is that, in making orders, they be not made in such broad terms as to violate international agreements. I am convinced that they can be made sufficiently specific to prevent abuses, without restricting the legitimate rights which flow from international agreements.

Mr. McMASTER: In answering my question the minister has said that he does not want judges to make orders which would offend against any treaty, and then he proceeds to point out that they would not do so in any event. I suggest that if the treaty were brought to their attention they would be bound by it.

If this clause were left off and a decision given adverse to the treaty, the matter would come before parliament, and we would know about it. Many of these decisions from the courts do not reach the ears of the general public. The matter would be brought before parliament which would deal with the effect of the decision. As I said before, we do not want the effect of this act to be abrogated through some judge's decision as to what the convention means.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: A certain end can be obtained by an order in general terms, and that order in general terms might violate the terms of the convention. The same effect can probably be achieved by making a specific order and by forbidding the doing of specific things. We wanted to guard against the former, and to answer the criticism by lawyers that we cannot have this kind of section because it might offend against international treaties. We are convinced that we can have it, and that orders can be framed which will be effective and which will not offend against the international treaty.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice or the Secretary of State, who is now in his seat, if the government has in contemplation any revision of the Patent Act. It may be that such revision is necessary, in the light of a good deal of this discussion both this afternoon and last night. Will the minister give us some indication as to whether the government has such revision of the patent law of the country in contemplation?

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot say whether there will be any revision of the Patent Act, in so far as this particular matter is concerned. At the present time, however, consideration is being given to administration by the patent division, but in no way which would involve the matter now under discussion. What is being done will have to do with rendering more efficient the administration by the patent office.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that that is a matter of administration within the department. Is it the view of the government that no amendment or revision of the substantive patent law of the country is necessary, even in the light of the information brought before the committee?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order; we must discuss the section before the committee.

Mr. FLEMING: What I have said is most relevant to the discussion, because section 9 in the bill has to do with trade mark and patent rights.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not agree that any discussion of patent administration would be in order at the present time. However, I did reply by stating that consideration was being given to more efficient administration of the Patent Act. The consideration being given to the act itself would in no way affect the matter now under consideration.

Mr. KNOWLES: I would refer to the use of the word "unduly" in the first paragraph of the section. It seems to me that the committee should consider the removal of that word from paragraphs (a), (c) and (d). With the inclusion of those words it seems to me the usefulness of those paragraphs is considerably reduced. I am not convinced by the minister's argument when he refers to the fact that these words appear in the criminal code. It seems to me that there is a difference between offences of this kind, punishment for which is the cancellation of certain licences or patents, and offences under the criminal code which involve the payment of large fines or gaol sentences.

Perhaps the matter might be brought to a head simply by offering an amendment, one which I had expected the hon. member for Lake Centre would have offered. Since he did not, I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke):

That the word "unduly" be struck out of paragraphs (a) (c) and (d) of section 30 of the Combines Investigation Act, as provided by section 9 of bill 193.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I submit that the hon. member's motion cannot be accepted. All patents and trade marks do limit the actions of others. They do give exclusive rights which cannot be exercised except by agreement with the owner of a patent or the registered owner of a trade mark. It is only when they go beyond what is reasonable that interference can be sought.

The whole purpose of a patent and of the registration of a trade mark is to give an exclusive right to a patentee or an owner of a trade mark. He may be required to license others, under reasonable conditions. But by virtue of the Patent Act he has monopolistic privileges; and it is only when he abuses those privileges that we can ask the courts to interfere. If he is making use of his patent merely to prevent some other person from producing his patented article and is not doing it in an unreasonable fashion, he is simply doing what the patent is designed to give him the right to do.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why does the word "unduly" not appear in paragraph (b), where these words are used:

(b) to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The word "unduly" is not used there because it is felt that making use of a patent or trade mark, now that those devices have been recognized for a very long time, is not, in itself, necessarily injurious or restrictive to trade or commerce. We have for a long time recognized patents of invention and trade marks. They are not regarded as of a nature to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to such articles. It is only when they are used in a manner which the public concept of proper business dealings would regard as restrictive that they should be interfered with. The language used here is copied textually from section 498 of the criminal code, which has been the occasion for a great many decisions construing the language used. If my hon. friend will compare paragraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) with section 498 of the criminal code he will find that the only difference is that in section 498 of the criminal code each one of these paragraphs begins with the preposition "to"; to unduly limit, restrain or injure trade, to unduly prevent and so forth, whilst here the use of the split infinitive has been avoided. Otherwise it is identical with the language of section 498 of the criminal code.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In the definition of "combine" under the Combines Investigation Act "unduly" does not enter into the picture at all.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. It is replaced by the phrase "has operated or is likely to operate to the detriment . . . of the public."

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wish to press his amendment?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes. The minister's argument only makes me feel the uselessness of these paragraphs as they stand.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Procedure when in opinion of commissioner an offence committed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, sections 10, 11 and 13 should, I think, be considered together. If section 13 as it is here is adopted, I would then be prepared to accept the amendment to which I referred last night with respect to the removal of the limitation of prosecutions to the attorneys general. If that were accepted, the language of sections 10 and 11 would require to be changed as a matter of concordance. So that I think sections 10, 11 and 13 should be taken together, and if section 13 carries I have here a draft which eliminates the restrictive provision in the Combines Investigation Act and brings about the necessary concordance.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall sections 10, 11 and 13 be considered together?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think the point made by my right hon. friend covers the question I raised last evening. I thank him for accepting my suggestion that an information can now be laid, if this becomes the law, by any individual, thereby enabling any consumer in this country who believes that a combine in fact exists, and where proceedings have not been taken, to go ahead in the ordinary way in the courts. I frankly am appreciative of the minister's acceptance of my suggestion because it goes a long way towards putting into this legislation the teeth which have been lacking in the past. It will do a lot toward fortifying the people of this country in their opinion that a real effort will be made to prevent combines from unduly lessening competition and exploiting the public. Having said that, may I ask the minister this question? Why the insertion of subsection 3 in section 11:

No person shall be charged with an offence against this act on the same information or indictment as that on which he is charged with an offence against section four hundred and ninety-eight of the criminal code.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is to replace the portion of section 28 of the 1935 statute which it is desirable, I think, to retain. The complaint was that indictments were being framed with several counts, some being under the criminal code and some being under the Combines Investigation Act. I thought that that was unfair and that the prosecutor should exercise his option and decide whether he was going to prosecute under the code or under the Combines Investigation Act, but that he should not have counts under both in the same indictment. I think that is only proper. I think it is proper to require the prosecutor, when there are two statutes which can apply to given facts, to frame his charges under one or under the other but not under both. But section 28 as enacted in 1935, went much farther than that. It read:

No person shall be charged with, tried or convicted of an offence against this act, by the same information, upon the same evidence or at the same time as he is charged with, tried for or convicted of an offence against section four hundred and ninety-eight of the criminal code.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has that section been interpreted by the courts?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes, it was interpreted in the Alberta case, and it was held there that because a charge had originally been made under the code and a stay of proceedings had been entered by the attorney general the subsequent proceedings under the Combines Investigation Act were illegal. That is why I said last night that if it were to be permissible to anyone to lay an information I wanted to avoid having that information remain as a bar against other proceedings if the one laying the information did not follow up his charge and get a judgment upon it. Otherwise it might be possible for those who were fearing prosecution to have a charge laid against them and just rest behind that charge. The suggestion now is that:

No person shall be charged with an offence against this act on the same information or indictment as that on which he is charged with an offence against section four hundred and ninety-eight of the criminal code.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why not "and 498A?"

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is nothing in the Combines Investigation Act which is similar to section 498A. It is section 498 and the Combines Investigation Act which cover the same territory.

The hon. member has read the suggestions; he sees that it is necessary to have some slight changes for concordance to be made if that principle is accepted. So that if it were the pleasure of the committee to adopt section 13 and the pleasure of the hon. member to move the amendments to sections 10 and 11 set out there, perhaps all three could be adopted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, would this be the point to move the amendments? I move:

That the present section 10 be replaced by a section to read as follows:

10. Section thirty-one of the said act, as enacted by section twenty-two of chapter fifty-four of the statutes of 1935 and amended by sections four and twelve of chapter twenty-three of the statutes of 1937 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

31(1) Whenever in the opinion of the commissioner an offence has been committed against any of the provisions of this act, the commissioner may remit to the attorney general of any province within which such alleged offence was committed, for such action as such attorney general may be pleased to institute because of the conditions appearing, any records, returns, evidence or report relevant to such alleged offence.

(2) The Minister of Justice may instruct counsel to attend on behalf of the minister at all proceedings consequent on any information being laid for an offence under this act.

I assume that is as far as I would go at this time.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I also move:

That section 11 of the bill be replaced by a section to read as follows:

Section thirty-two of the said act, as amended by section twelve of chapter twenty-three of the statutes of 1937, is further amended by repealing subsection two thereof and adding thereto the following subsections:

(2) No person shall be charged with an offence against this act on the same information or indictment as that on which he is charged with an offence against section four hundred and ninety-eight of the criminal code.

(3) The provisions of this section which provide for the imposition of penalties shall not be deemed to deprive any person of any civil right of action.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the minister take another minute to explain why it will not be possible under the first of the subsections now proposed to do the same thing that it was possible to do under the old section 28? I am referring to those people who, fearing charges, get a charge trumped up against them under one act so that they will not have it under the other.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no obstacle to there being more than one charge laid. The fact that a charge will have been laid by someone will not prevent an attorney general from laying another charge. The only defence one would have would be that he has been convicted or acquitted. Supposing someone thought he was going to get protection by having a prosecution brought against him, and a charge was laid but the informant did not proceed, nothing would prevent the attorney general from laying a charge for the same facts. The only defence the person prosecuted could have would be that the first charge had gone to judgment and had resulted in an acquittal or in a conviction. The existence of the charge would not constitute an impediment. So that I feel certain there is nothing to be feared from the possibility of trumped-up charges being brought by prosecutors who are not serious.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

CLARIFICATION AND EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS AND BENEFITS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, to provide for clarification and rearrangement of its provisions and of the procedure to be followed thereunder; generally to enlarge the scope of the act to extend the application of the provisions and benefits of the act and of the qualifying period for insurance to certain veterans and merchant seamen.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought that this afternoon, as the hour is getting late, I might make a statement which I have before me, and perhaps hon. members would like to discuss the principle of the bill after they have heard the statement. I have drafted it in a manner which I hope will make it easier for hon. members to understand the rearrangement of the act and also certain sections of the act, and certain fundamental changes which are being made in it.

Five years ago, on July 1, 1941, contributions under the Unemployment Insurance Act first became payable. Now that we are considering a number of changes in the act to make it work more smoothly and to close some of the gaps which have appeared, it is perhaps well to take stock of what has been accomplished in order to place this important piece of social legislation in its true perspective. Many hon. members doubtless have read statements made in another place or on May 23 on the second reading of the bill. At that time some interesting statistics were placed on the record, and I will not repeat them at this time. However, I am sure you will be interested to know why it has been considered desirable to introduce the bill in this house, and the reasons why it was withdrawn from the other chamber.

Subsequent to the decision of the government to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, it was decided to add sections to the bill which would involve expenditures of money.

These amendments relate principally to veterans and certain merchant seamen.

It may be well to recall that the Canadian unemployment insurance scheme is based on sound insurance principles, many of which are common to both commercial and social insurance.

The first of these is that there must be a reasonable interest in a contingency.

In the case of an employee, this contingency is his contract of service which may fail in its completion by a lay-off, by termination in accordance with its own terms, or by mutual agreement.

The second of these principles is that the indemnity or benefit arising out of the contingency must be related to, but must not exceed, the loss or value of the insurable interest.

The benefit may be related to part of the loss, as in some forms of automobile insurance, or a cash benefit related to, but less than earnings, as in unemployment insurance.

The third principle is that due weight must be given to what might be called the moral hazard. In commercial insurance this would result in a selection of risks, but in the wider scope of unemployment insurance results in the erection of proper safeguards in the public interest.

These past few years have proven an extremely difficult time in which to recruit and train a staff to man the local and other offices of the commission. I think it can fairly be said that a good job has been done, although we are continually endeavouring to improve our standards. The continual training of staff on the job is expected to result in a still higher degree of efficiency.

We are operating a public service of the greatest importance by seeking to match jobs with those seeking jobs, while at the same time ensuring that claims against benefit rights accumulated in the war years are handled promptly and equitably.

The act became effective at a good time in so far as the building up of the fund was concerned. Employment climbed steadily, resulting in almost one-fifth of the population of Canada having a direct stake in the fund. With their dependents, this means more than 50 per cent of the population of Canada. This has helped to cushion these months of change-over and adjustment.

The effect of any social legislation is dependent on the extent of the classes of persons covered. In July, 1941, there was insured under the Unemployment Insurance Act almost all employment in industry, apart from the basic industries of agriculture, fishing, lumbering and logging, transportation by water and air, which presented special problems, as well as those excluded by reason of the wage ceiling of two thousand dollars.

It has been and still is the policy of the government to widen the scope of the act as rapidly as possible, and the changes effected, together with those projected, indicate the progress being made.

In January, 1942, action was taken by order in council to retain within the insured classes persons whose earnings exceeded two thousand dollars a year because of war conditions, such as increased hours and other factors.

In that same year action was taken to place veterans in as nearly as possible the same position as they would have had under the act had they not served in the armed forces. This step was made effective by the post-discharge reestablishment order, is now in the present bill and will become part of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

It provides that employer and employee contributions, for the period of service in the forces subsequent to June 30, 1941, will be paid into the unemployment insurance fund by the government when the veteran completes fifteen weeks in insured employment in any period of twelve months following his discharge. This is proving a most satisfactory and realistic way for veterans to build up a share in the fund.

The only previous bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed in July, 1943, and effective from September 1 of that year the ceiling for salaried employees was raised from $2,000 to $2,400, to take care of the general rise in earnings.

In place of the order in council insuring those whose earnings were higher because of the war, the earnings ceiling was removed entirely for persons paid by the hour, day, week or on a piece rate.

The other change in coverage made at that time was the inclusion of all employees of public utilities who were within the insurable earnings limit, so as to remove discrimination between municipally-owned utilities and those owned by private companies. Previously, municipalities had been allowed exception for certain of their permanent employees.

Here let me say a word on this question of permanency of employment and coverage under the act. There are those who feel that where there is little risk of unemployment, the employment should not be insured.

On reflection, it will be quite clear that if those who were fortunate enough to have stable employment were excluded, it would be virtually impossible to build up a fund adequate to provide benefit for those with less stable employment without making the amount of the contributions prohibitive. It is only by spreading the risk that a sound scheme is possible. The man who pays his fire insurance premium and does not have a fire is fortunate.

Then even in employments regarded as most stable, unemployment is not unknown. In Britain, in the nineteen-twenties, when their unemployment insurance act permitted the withdrawal from the general scheme of industries which were thought to be particularly stable, the coal mining industry considered setting up a special scheme. The heavy unemployment suffered in that industry in the years that followed is only too well known.

Included in the 1943 amendments was one giving the governor in council authority to extend coverage to excepted employments on joint recommendation of the commission and the unemployment insurance advisory committee. This has made it possible to extend the scope of the act without waiting for an opportunity to introduce a bill into parliament.

Thus, in August of last year, employment in transportation by air and as a professional nurse (other than employment as a private duty nurse or as a probationer) became insurable.

Following a series of investigations into the peculiar problems, both seasonal and administrative, of lumbering and logging in different parts of the country, action was taken to make employment in this industry insurable.

Contributions are to commence in British Columbia on August 1 of this year. It is expected that in a comparatively short time the industry will be insured across the country.

Discussions are now under way for further extensions in coverage by joint recommendation of the unemployment insurance commission and the advisory committee. However, there is now included in the bill an amendment which will make insurable employment in transportation by water—both inland and deep sea.

Until reciprocal arrangements have been completed with the United States and Great Britain, our coverage of deep sea vessels will be somewhat limited, but a start is being made and it is fully anticipated that proper arrangements can be made with these other countries as to the jurisdiction over vessels of different registry.

Many persons insured under the act are now faced for the first time with the need to take advantage of the benefit rights which they have been accumulating, and I think it may be of general interest to outline the handling of claims.

At the outset let me emphasize that the first action taken when an unemployed person enters the local office is to register him for employment and inform him of the employment opportunities which are available.

Only after this has been done are the necessary forms completed for the filing of a claim, if the insured person so desires.

A claimant must deposit his unemployment insurance book, or arrange to deposit it when he files a claim; he is required to give particulars of his employment during the previous six weeks, in order that the reasons for separation from employment may be verified. There is a disqualification imposed, for example, if a claimant has left his employment voluntarily without just cause, or he has been discharged because of misconduct.

If the claimant wishes to receive benefit at the higher rate because he maintains a dependent within the meaning of the act, further particulars must be provided. He must give details of any spare-time occupation which he follows, because there are restrictions in the act governing the receipt of benefit by persons with spare-time jobs.

A claimant is ordinarily required to report once a week in order to prove unemployment, capability of work and availability for work. He may be called in during the week because of an employment opportunity which has arisen. On his weekly reporting day, the placement officer must certify that there is no suitable employment available for him, before action is taken to record his unemployment.

There are a considerable number of claimants who live at too great distances from any local office to file claims in person. The practice is to permit such persons to file their claims by mail if the cost of return transportation from their home to the nearest local office exceeds thirty cents; they are then called "postal claimants." They not only file their first claim by mail, but they continue to report weekly by mail. Their statements as to unemployment, et cetera, must be certified by two responsible individuals. The payment of benefit is made by cash in the larger local offices and in the remainder, by warrant. Postal claimants are paid by warrant.

The contribution records of insured persons are maintained at eight points across the country. The contributions in the current insurance book, together with those in the records for a period of two years preceding the claims, determine the rate of benefit. Similarly contributions recorded for the five years previous to the claim, and benefit paid in the preceding three years, determine the duration of benefit.

The adjudication of claims is the responsibility of insurance officers appointed under authority of the act. These officers are located at numerous points across the country.

The main questions which an insurance officer must decide in adjudicating claims for benefit are whether the required contribution conditions have been fulfilled; if the claimant left his employment voluntarily, did he have just cause for so doing? Was he discharged for misconduct within the meaning of the act? Or does his unemployment result from a stoppage of work due to a labour dispute? Also, a claimant must be sixteen years of age and a resident in Canada before he is entitled to benefit.

Let us look at the important and controversial subject of suitable employment. The act specifies certain types of employment which are not to be considered suitable, for example, employment which arises out of a stoppage of work due to a labour dispute, employment which would require a claimant to become a member of, or to refrain from becoming a member of a union.

The act also states clearly that employment is not to be regarded as suitable if it is employment in the claimant's usual occupation where the wages are lower or the conditions less favourable than those observed by agreement between employer and employee. Neither is employment suitable in another occupation where the wages are lower or the conditions less favourable than those he obtained in his usual occupation.

On the other hand, it is likewise specifically provided that after a lapse of a reasonable interval from the commencement of unemployment, employment in another occupation is not to be considered unsuitable (in other words it is suitable) if the wages offered are not lower and the conditions not less favourable than those obtaining in that occupation.

It is only possible to consider whether a particular offer of employment is suitable in relation to an individual claimant at that time; what is not suitable to-day may well be suitable a month from to-day. The most careful consideration has been given to the guidance afforded insurance officers in adjudicating cases of refusal of employment which is apparently suitable, and reference has been made to both British and American experience in handling this problem.

Some of the factors considered by insurance officers are the difference in the rate of wages between the usual occupation and the work offered; whether there would be any sacrifice of skills in accepting the job offered; the length of unemployment; whether there is any prospect of the claimant finding work with his former employer within a reasonable time, or whether there is any possibility of his finding work in what is his usual occupation.

After an accident, for instance, a man may not be able to return to his former work, and he must consider a change in occupation immediately. Or a man who has reached retirement age for a given occupation cannot hold out for employment of that kind. Similarly, there are certain skills which were required during the war which have little or no place in a peacetime economy. Then there are always circumstances peculiar to an individual claimant—his family responsibilities, adaptability, age and so on, which affect his suitablity for a job.

Let me emphasize that in no country has it been found practicable to legislate on what is suitable employment, because it is one thing one day for one claimant, and something else a month or two hence. It should always be remembered that if a claimant is not satisfied with an insurance officer's decision, he has a right of appeal to a court of referees, composed of representatives of employers and employees, and an independent chairman. In certain circumstances there is a right of appeal to the umpire. Gradually there is being built up from decisions of the umpire a most important and helpful guide to the interpretation of various provisions of the act, which is of great assistance in striving for uniformity of action among those adjudicating claims.

Glancing over the amendments in this bill, hon. members will notice that nearly two-thirds relate to changes in references made necessary by a rearrangement of some of the sections and by minor clarifications of old sections, which experience has shown as desirable.

Of the other changes, I would draw hon. members' attention particularly to the following:

Clause 3 of the bill permits coverage of persons whose status as employees has given rise to some argument; for example, men paid on a commission basis may be either employees or independent contractors. On the other hand, clause 36 excepts from coverage a person who is virtually an employer; for example, a man who owns more than half the registered stock of a corporation.

Clause 6 of the bill permits repeal of section 23(2) of the act if the present proposal in the bankruptcy bill on priority of claims is approved.

Clause 7 is a major rearrangement of the present section in order to set out in a more straightforward manner the conditions on which benefit will be paid. It also increases the earnings permitted from subsidiary employment from $1 to $1.50 a day; widens the group of dependents in respect of whom the increased benefit rate may be paid; authorizes benefits to be calculated to the nearest five cents, and also permits small errors to be cleared from the books of the fund. Clause 7 takes up about one-third of the bill.

Clauses 10 and 11, together with part of clause 7, clarify the question of appeals to the umpire.

Part of clause 14 assures that benefits obtained by false pretences will not be retained by the claimant.

Clause 16 extends the time in which proceedings for an offence may be commenced from three months to twelve months of evidence of the offence coming to the knowledge of the commission.

Part of clause 18 permits benefit to be paid where contributions were not paid due to an erroneous decision of an officer of the commission.

Clause 20 grants authority to pay expenses which may be incurred if it becomes necessary to pledge securities held in connection with the fund.

Clause 21 makes the date of the report of the advisory committee the same date as that of the commission.

Clause 22 permits gradual extension of coverage to lumbering and logging.

Clause 23 makes the national employment service responsible to the minister and permits it to carry out additional duties not within its formal functions.

Clause 24 transfers to the act sections of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act dealing with unemployment insurance, with some enlargement relating to veterans of allied nations and certain merchant seamen. In this connection clause 32 repeals the relative sections of the Veterans Rehabilitation Act.

Part of clause 25 continues the requirements that employers report engagement of employees and that persons seeking employment notify the employment service.

Clauses 33 and 34 extend coverage to merchant seamen.

I would like to deal in some more detail with the principle of ministerial responsibility suggested in respect of the employment service.

The efficient administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act requires an effective employment service. The problems of war made it abundantly clear that a national employment service has other important functions to fulfil. The complexity of post-war conditions, the conviction that employment must be provided for all who want to work show that the employment service has still to play a much larger part in our national economic life than that connected with unemployment insurance.

The national employment service should and must become a keystone in the carrying out of plans of the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Department of Reconstruction, the Department of Transport, the Department of Agriculture and the Departments of National Defence in their various activities for reconversion and reestablishment.

There must be the closest possible working arrangement between departments at the ministerial level, and the Minister of Labour must have detailed knowledge and control over the employment service so that he can give his colleagues the cooperation necessary to carry the reconversion plans to a successful conclusion.

Then there are cases where special financial or other curative measures are necessary. Such cases include employment problems of youth, of older persons who are not pensionable, of persons not covered by unemployment insurance, as well as problems associated with apprenticeship, and encouragement of movements of manpower to agriculture (one of the most important responsibilities we face at this time), basic industries or domestic service. More efficient dominion-provincial arrangements to deal with these matters would be possible where the minister could issue direct instructions to the employment service.

In the administration of the employment service and unemployment insurance, Great Britain has divided authority at the top level between a ministry of labour in charge of employment, and a ministry of national insurance in charge of unemployment insurance and other social security benefits. The long experience of Great Britain in matters of this kind makes worthy of note her action in determining this to be the most desirable line of action between parliament and the administrators concerned.

In the United States, the department of labour and the social security board have each had a hand in administration of the federal employment service, which in turn are separated from the state unemployment compensation authorities. At present, there is a move on foot to vest complete control of the employment service in the department of labour.

In New Zealand, the employment service will come under a newly created ministry of employment. Their social security department, which will be responsible for unemployment compensation policy at top levels, will have no authority over the employment service. Australia is to follow New Zealand's lead with a commonwealth employment service directly responsible to the minister of labour and national services, and free to act independently of the department of social services.

Thus the plan proposed for Canada follows the trend that experience in other parts of the world has found desirable in that it seeks to make the employment service directly responsible to the Minister of Labour, rather than to have the chain of authority directed through the unemployment insurance commission.

It should be noted that sixty per cent of the money voted by parliament for the activities carried out by the staff of the commission is spent for work not covered by the act.

If this sixty per cent is a responsibility of the minister, it is submitted that it is the duty of the minister to exercise supervision of the employment service, because it is through that service and by its staff that money voted is spent.

Unemployment insurance and the employment offices are a part of the general social security programme. They are primarily concerned with one of the most important fields of national welfare, the provision of insurance payments during periods of unemployment and the movement through the employment offices of persons in search of gainful employment.

It has facilities to deal with veterans and to meet the problems of persons requiring vocational guidance, or special attention due to physical handicap. It is already taking its proper place in the minds of both workers and employers, a place which they see is necessary in any plan to maintain a high and stable level of employment.

I imagine that most people have had contact with the employment service during the war, particularly when national selective service was in full operation.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you call it six o'clock.

Mr. GRAYDON: I understood it was the minister's suggestion, which I think met with general approval, that following his statement the matter might stand and the debate be resumed at a later time. It was our understanding that this suggestion had received the approval of the house, so that perhaps at this time the debate might be adjourned.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sorry; before I sat down I meant to mention that the hon. member for Vancouver East, together with my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition, suggested that the resolution might pass now and that the debate on the principle be held on the second reading of the bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not want to be deprived of the right to speak on this resolution if it comes up again, but under the procedure that has been developing in this house we have had no debate on the resolution, and the general debate has taken place on second reading of the bill. I think that is a good procedure to follow, since then we have the bill before us. So that if the other parties would agree to that, I see no reason why we should not have the bill introduced and given first reading to-day, in order that the measure may be advanced a stage.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is perhaps a special advantage in that procedure which might be mentioned. We can then examine the statement of the minister together with the terms of the bill, so that perhaps we ought to consent to the bill being introduced and being given first reading, in order that the debate may take place when second reading is moved another day.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mitchell thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 243, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 4, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton) moved that the fourth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, presented on Wednesday, July 3, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MERCHANT MARINE—PARK STEAMSHIPS—WAR RISK BONUS

Mr. HOMUTH:

1. What was the rate of war risk bonus paid to seamen on Park Steamships operations?
2. Who authorized this payment?
3. From what fund was it paid?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Seamen, on Park Steamships operations were paid the following war risk bonus: (a) Adult male crew members, $44.50 per month; (b) Boy crew members, $22.25 per month.

2. The National War Labour Board by its finding and direction No. N.1002 dated June 7, 1943, authorized the payment of this war risk bonus with effect from May 5, 1943.

3. The war risk bonus was paid out of Park Steamships company earnings and not from any special fund established for the purpose.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH—PHYSICAL FITNESS BRANCH

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who are the chief officers of the physical fitness branch of the Department of Public Health (a) stationed at Ottawa; (b) elsewhere?

2. In what theatre of war did the deputy head of the department and his chief officer in each of the provinces serve?

3. What is the salary of the deputy and what were his travelling expenses for the last year of record?

4. Have any of the provinces so far refused to adopt this programme? If so, what provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. (a) Ian Eisenhardt, national director of physical fitness; S. B. Carey, technical assistant to the national director of physical fitness; (b) Nil.

2. Ian Eisenhardt—

1940-41—Enlisted in the Canadian army; served on Pacific coast; commissioned as second lieutenant, First Battalion Irish Fusiliers, Vancouver Regiment; promoted to first lieutenant.

1942-43—Promoted to acting captain; seconded to National Selective Service and placed in charge of developing wartime sports and recreation in Canada for war workers and their families.

1943-44—Canadian army sports officer, National Defence Headquarters, Ottawa with rank of acting major.

June 1944—Granted indefinite leave of absence to assume the post of national director of physical fitness, Department of Pensions and National Health.

S. B. Carey—

1939—Enlisted in Canadian army chaplain service.

1941—Reposted to ship conducting staff—Atlantic ocean and England.

1942—Reposted as auxiliary services officer, Labrador.

1943—Reposted National Defence headquarters, Ottawa (administrative duties).

Nov. 1943—Assistant to Canadian army sports officer, National Defence headquarters, Ottawa.

1945—Discharged, as from chaplain service, with rank of captain.

3. Salary $5,000. Travelling expenses for 1945-46—$3,749.23.

4. Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick have not yet signed agreements with the dominion government.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

IMPORTS OF CORN

Mr. FLEMING:

1. (a) What was the quantity and value of Indian corn imported into Canada in each of the years 1941-5, inclusive, and in 1946 to the latest date for which figures are available; (b) how were these annual totals broken down among the countries from which Indian corn was imported?

2. (a) What rates of subsidy were paid in Canada on such Indian corn during the said period; (b) what was the total amount paid by way of such subsidies during each of the years aforesaid?

3. What is the basic price of such imported corn effective on and after May 20, 1946?

4. What quantities of corn from Argentina have been purchased for delivery in Canada in 1946, and what subsidy payments have been made or arranged thereon by commodity prices stabilization corporation and/or wartime prices and trade board, and what is the rate of such subsidies?

5. Has the dominion bureau of statistics discontinued publication of its monthly report "The Grain Situation in Argentina?" If so, when and for what reason?

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—REGINA DEPARTMENTAL BRANCH

Mr. PROBE:

1. What are the names, ages, nature of duties, rates of remuneration and qualifications of each employee, in Regina, of the Family Allowance Branch, Department of National Health and Welfare during June, 1946?

2. Which of the above employees are (a) permanent; (b) temporary; (c) casual employees; (d) war veterans?

3. On what dates did each of the permanent and temporary employees above listed qualify for appointment?

4. Is the Department of National Health contributing to old age pension or paying childrens' allowance to any of these employees? If so, what are their names?

JUDGES

CONSOLIDATION AND AMENDMENT OF ACT—ADDITIONAL PUISNE JUDGE FOR EXCHEQUER COURT

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to amend the Exchequer Court Act to increase the number of puisne judges of the court from two to three, and also to present a measure to consolidate and amend the Judges Act to include provision for the appointment, tenure of office and duties of the judges of the dominion and provincial courts, fixing judges salaries and providing for the payment of salaries, and for the payment of increased salaries, travelling allowances and annuities to judges and annuities to their wives and widows in certain cases and subject to conditions therein set out.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED NATIONS

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL—PREPARATION FOR WORLD TRADE CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will he inform the house what steps are being taken and what progress is being made by the united nations economic and social council by way of preparation for the prospective world trade conference; and, when he is answering the question, will he say whether there is any possibility that the conference will be convened this year?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have had no notice of the question, and I am not sure that it is properly directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce; but I shall confer with the Prime Minister and see what answer can be given.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I point out that I delivered notice of the question to the minister's office at two o'clock to-day or thereabouts. Perhaps there has been some mishap.

Mr. MacKINNON: The cabinet was in session up to half past two to-day, and that may be the reason for my not receiving it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the minister or the appropriate member of the cabinet will take the question as notice and have it answered to-morrow.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LENNARD—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF JULY 3

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): On a question of privilege, I wish to refer to an article that appeared in last night's Ottawa Journal, to the effect that Mrs. Fred Rose had conferred with a number of members of parliament in an effort to end the isolation of her husband in a Montreal gaol. In this article she is quoted as follows:

> I believe I can say that all the members of parliament with whom I have talked have expressed themselves as against this policy of isolation . . .

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this is a reflection on many of the members of this house, and I want it distinctly understood that I was not one of those interviewed.

In this connection I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can say when the seat for the riding of Montreal-Cartier will be declared vacant.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Until the pending appeal has been heard and a report of a conviction made to His Honour the Speaker from the court, the seat will not be declared vacant. Further consideration will be given the matter after the final decision of the court.

BUILDING MATERIALS

SHORTAGE OF CEMENT IN SOUTHERN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has taken occasion to look into the cause of the cement shortage in southwestern Alberta? The other day I asked whether he would be good enough to do so. That there should be a shortage of cement in Canada is something which it is beyond my power to understand.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I did look into the matter, and I intended to write to my hon. friend. When he asked the question I said I thought it was hardly a proper question to be answered before the orders of the day. However, the information that I have received is that there is no greater shortage in that part of the country than there is elsewhere, and the shortage is due to the heavy demand.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

CLARIFICATION AND EXTENSION OF PROVISIONS AND BENEFITS

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of bill No. 243, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Speaking to the amendment which is now proposed to the Unemployment Insurance Act, I should say at the outset that for the most part, so far as one has been able to understand this very long bill in the short time at our disposal, the changes are very welcome indeed, and a revision of the act in the light of the past five years' experience is timely.

I was glad to note, when I read the report of the debate on this bill in the other place that the advisory committee is now looking into the possibility of making some increases in the benefits payable under the act to unemployed persons with dependents. This is undoubtedly a step in the right direction. But since I understand that the scope of the investigation of the advisory committee went only so far as to permit consideration of what increases could be actuarially made without any increase in the rates payable under the act, I should not imagine that any such increases could be substantial. The disappointing thing about the amendment is that neither in the bill itself nor in the statement made by the minister is any hope held out that consideration will be given to making some fairly satisfactory increase in the benefits, if necessary by the increase of the rates payable; because of course this fund must be on an actuarial basis.

Now that we have come through the first year or so of peace, and for the first time use is being made of the benefits under the act by a substantial number of persons, there is general realization in the country that these benefits do necessitate a steep drop in income from the moment a person becomes unemployed. Take for instance the two top classes. A person earning from $80 to $100 a month, upon becoming unemployed, is reduced to between $48 and $54, and if he is in class 7 earning over $100 a month he gets not less than $57.60 and not more than $62.50 a month provided he has a dependent. Hon. members will realize that if one takes say $25 a month out of that amount for rent, which I believe is a reasonably conservative estimate for that item, there is not much elbow-room left for the unemployed person. It is perfectly obvious that if this scheme is to be successful it must be maintained on an actuarial basis; therefore, the benefit cannot be increased unless the government itself is prepared to make a greater contribution without an increase in rates.

I hope that consideration is also being given by the advisory committee and by the minister to the possibility of increasing the benefits, particularly to married persons, substantially above the sum of $14.40 a week, which is the maximum possible, even though it might mean some increase in the rates payable. I hope that some scheme can be worked out under which these increased rates would not bear too heavily on a person while in employment. Naturally all these matters have to be taken into consideration by the experts on the commission, but it struck me that if it were possible to pay a higher benefit for the first month, let us say, after a person becomes unemployed, the shock of the drop from his full earning rate to the unemployment insurance rate might be lessened. In my opinion, in that first month will fall the extra expenses, the back bills that have not been paid, and during that interval time would be given the unemployed person to turn around so that if he is going to remain unemployed more than a month he at least would have a better opportunity to adjust himself to the new conditions.

From a Gallup poll which was taken last November it would appear that there is a general feeling among the lower-paid workers across Canada that the maximum rate of benefit for a person with dependents is too little. It must be obvious that with costs rising as they are to-day, $14.40 is not enough to keep a family in a bare state of maintenance. But any scheme for increasing rates would require an increase in the rates payable. The other way to bring increased benefits on an actuarial basis is for those who have the custody of the fund to reserve it strictly for those for whom no suitable employment exists. If we can be sure that benefits are paid out only where no proper work is available for the applicant, then over the course of some years—and perhaps not so many—I am sure that the factor of safety, which the actuaries must have applied, could be modified and some increases granted without raising the rates payable.

I agree with the minister when he said yesterday that suitable employment is a difficult thing to define and must be considered in each case. Even then I am sure it is not easy. But all the efforts of those concerned with this act must now be directed toward an increase of the benefits which are payable, so that they may reach a level which will, if possible, enable an unemployed person to pull in his horns and save himself from going deeply in debt. At the present time I am sure that a person who was unemployed for a long period would be bound to go into debt or to draw heavily on the amount that he may have saved.

As to prevention of depletion of the fund, I should like to call the attention of the house to some of the figures given, in the debate in the other place, with respect to payments into the fund since its inception and the benefits which have been paid up to the present time. The figures show that up to 1945 substantial payments were made into the fund and the payment of benefits was quite negligible. As a result the fund built itself up to the good position in which it finds itself now, with more than $300 million to its credit. But in 1945 there was a substantial increase in the benefits paid out consequent upon the unemployment after the end of hostilities. If I recollect rightly the benefits paid out in 1945 amounted to about $14 million, or 17·5 per cent of the revenue of the fund for that year. That figure may be, and probably is, a bearable figure now, but for the first three months of 1946 one finds that over ninety per cent of the amounts paid into the fund were paid out in benefits to unemployed persons. We have a considerable amount of unemployment in the country at the present time. On May 3 I believe 210,000 people were unemployed, and that, of course, is too many. I do not think it can be denied that on occasions in the future this fund will be called upon to bear much heavier burdens than the amount paid out so far. Therefore the payment out of more than ninety per cent of the amounts paid in in the first three months is not a fact that one can quickly brush aside. I hope, and I know, that the minister is taking that into consideration and will project forward what will happen to the fund if such rates of payment are kept up.

When the minister made his statement yesterday he said the unemployment services which are set up under the bill will come under his immediate direction, whereas the operation of the fund itself remains entirely under the unemployment insurance commission. I believe it is proper that that should be so. I agree that he must have direct power in respect of the unemployment services. If the fund is to be kept on an actuarial and sound basis there is much point in its being handled by the unemployment commission, and not being subject to the day-by-day direction of the department administering the unemployment services.

I mention the question of suitable employment because it is there that a raid can be made upon the fund. If the time should ever come when persons would be kept on unemployment insurance when suitable jobs were available, then the fund could be quickly depleted. That would do great harm to those who are paying into it, and to those with bona fide cases of actual need, who are the persons for whom the fund was set up.

Although the minister has said that there are insurance officers in every district to handle these applicants, I did not gather whether they were officers of the unemployment insurance commission or of the Department of Labour, responsible to the minister; whether they took from the minister or from the commission itself the directions given to them for their guidance in deciding what is suitable employment. I hope he will make that point clear when he speaks in this debate.

What I have been saying is given strong support by a statement in the Ottawa Journal of recent date in which the deputy minister of labour is reported to have said with respect to the need for finding agricultural workers:

> "We can place ten thousand workers on the land" said Mr. MacNamara, "and the bulk of those men with farm experience are now beginning to accept the inevitable in going to work."

Later, though this is not a direct quotation, the report states:

> It had been the policy of the unemployment insurance commission "for some weeks" to cut off their benefits in cases where men refused work for which they were qualified.

That report gives rise to the question whether the unemployment insurance fund has been too liberally administered, and used in a way which ultimately would work against the people who now or in the future might have very real need for its assistance; and whether such a liberal policy could work against the possibility of an increase in the benefits payable without an increase in the rates as well. Certainly while I should be the last to wish to see the regulations or the act enforced in such a way as to harm anyone who finds himself out of work, I think the need to take care of the unemployed who have dependents must outweigh any notions of excessive liberality; and the quotations I have just read would lead one to believe that people who heretofore could have gone to work but did not wish to "accept the inevitable" have not been required so to do. Indeed in the second quotation the actual words "refused work" appear. So I hope the minister will make a further statement on this matter of suitable employment, and indicate whether or not it is within his power, or the power of the unemployment insurance commission, or both, to determine what is suitable employment at any particular time, whether these insurance officers come under the commission or under the minister or under both, and what authority issues to them their instructions.

Again, it seems to me very important to have an understanding of what is meant by "a reasonable time" in section 31, dealing with the entitlement to continuing benefit after being on the roll for some time, there being no suitable work of the kind to which a person has been accustomed. After a reasonable time one must accept employment of some other type for which one is fitted; and I think the construction of that word might be explained with some benefit. I want to emphasize that my remarks on this point are made in the desire to see the benefits increased, particularly to those with dependents, and are in no way offered in criticism of persons who may be on the unemployment insurance rolls at the present time.

There are only two other points I should like to mention. I thoroughly approve the establishment of the employment service under the arrangements the minister has described. I see this service has certain powers and duties in regard to the investigation of working conditions and opportunities for work, which will enable it better to carry out its functions. I want to offer one suggestion to the minister. The employment service, which of necessity will be closely concerned with examining employment opportunities in all parts of Canada, to my mind will have a great opportunity to assemble data and perhaps come to conclusions in regard to the improvement of working conditions in various parts of Canada. I refer particularly to the possibility of providing better housing accommodation and greater opportunities for the construction of houses in mining and logging camps which are far removed from towns and cities. It seems to me that good housing in our mining and logging camps, and indeed on farms and throughout the country, is a wonderful way of adding to good labour-management relations and to promote industrial peace instead of industrial unrest. The improvement of conditions in that respect, of course, would be a way of keeping up production, maintaining employment and relieving the burden on the employment service itself.

Suitable housing in these places, which when you come right down to it are the places where we produce our natural wealth, would kill two birds with one stone. It would enable men to be united with their families on the job and take them off the unemployment insurance rolls, because men are much more willing to travel to another place of employment if they are able to take their families with them; and moving a family out of a congested city area would free additional housing accommodation at that point, where housing accommodation is most critically short. So without going into it further I feel that this employment service could well work closely with the department responsible for housing in devising some amendment to the National Housing Act which would make funds more readily available for the construction of housing accommodation in these outlying places, thus contributing to the work of both the Department of Labour and the Department of Reconstruction.

The other matter about which I should like the minister to tell us something when he speaks is unemployment as related to the Unemployment Insurance Act. According to the last word of the department, as at May 30 there were in Canada 210,000 people unemployed, while at the same time there were 115,000 opportunities for employment. In order that we may see the relationship of these figures to the unemployment insurance fund I hope the minister will be able to tell us how many are receiving unemployment insurance at the present time, and how many of them have been on the unemployment insurance rolls for more than three months.

That is about all I wish to say on the motion for second reading.

Mr. MITCHELL: Did the hon. member ask for the number of those in receipt of unemployment insurance for three months?

Mr. MERRITT: Yes. That period of three months, which I mentioned, was one chosen at random. Perhaps information for one, two and three months might be useful to hon. members.

Without making any pretence of having digested the bill in full, let me say in conclusion that I welcome the extension of the benefits to veterans and to those in the lumber industry. I hope the minister will not wait too long before bringing within the operation of this useful act some other classes in the community.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the measure before the house is worthy of commendation. There is one matter to which I would draw the minister's attention, and to which I believe he will have to give consideration as the years go by. In my view the principle of contributions on the part of employers and employees is not a sound principle upon which to enter the future. I suggest the minister should gradually and progressively eliminate contributions required from both employers and employees.

Employees' contributions decrease purchasing power among the people, which is exactly where we want the purchasing power to be. Contributions by employers tend to increase prices to consumers, which is exactly what we do not want, because it has a tendency toward inflation. Contributions by the government from moneys raised by taxation, the means by which money now being used for this purpose is obtained, also decreases purchasing power by taking it away from the people throughout the country, which is exactly where the purchasing power ought to be. It also tends to increase prices, which again is a means of producing inflation.

In his customary fashion the minister will be inclined to laugh off the suggestion that the government should make contributions, and should make them with debt-free money, money which is created debt free in accordance with the surplus production of the country in goods and services. As the minister grows in wisdom and understanding he will be less inclined to laugh off that suggestion. He will come to realize that it is the principle upon which the future must be based.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, is a voluminous document, although there is in it no outstanding new principle. I should like however to make a suggestion to the minister which I hope he will see fit to accept. My suggestion is that after second reading the bill be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations. I shall attempt to give the reasons why I believe that suggestion to be a wise one.

The Unemployment Insurance Act is a relatively new statute, having come into effect on July 1, 1941, so it has been in operation only five years. It affects a large proportion of the population. I believe the minister said yesterday it applied to approximately one-fifth—

Mr. MITCHELL: I said fifty per cent of the population.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, fifty per cent of the population, and perhaps one-fifth or more of the adult population. It affects employers of labour as well as employees.

Until a year ago there was very little unemployment in the country, and relatively few claims for unemployment insurance. Consequently there had been few complaints as to the operation, or perhaps I should say the administration, of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Since a year ago, however, unemployment has increased to fairly large proportions, with the result that claims have increased in proportion. There have been many complaints about the administration of the act. I am sure the minister knows that better than any other hon. member. Some of these complaints arise because of a general misunderstanding of the purpose of the act. Others arise from faults in administration which I shall not criticize at this time but to which I shall refer.

Many of the communications I receive from people who find fault with the administration of unemployment insurance benefits indicate that because they have contributed to the fund they are therefore entitled to benefit from it under almost any circumstances which may separate them from their employment. They feel that when they are ill they are unemployed, and that consequently it is illogical that they should be refused the benefits of unemployment insurance while they are ill, but granted them if they are unemployed and well. They believe also that if they retire from industry and have not drawn benefits from their contributions, the contributions should be returned to them. These complaints arise from a misunderstanding of the purpose of the act, a misunderstanding which can be overcome only through education of both employers and workers.

Unemployment insurance is a means of sharing the risks of unemployment. Workers in the sheltered trades share the risks with the workers in the unsheltered trades. Employers and the government, through their contributions, also share the risks. Workers and employers pay directly into the fund, while the people as a whole pay indirectly by means of the government's contributions.

I listened with interest to the points raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Merritt) and I agree with most of what he said. I doubt very much if any unemployment insurance scheme could be satisfactory if we were to have a prolonged period of mass unemployment. An unemployment insurance scheme that is actuarially sound is not designed for that sort of thing. Unemployment insurance schemes in all countries are designed to carry the worker from one period of employment to another. The contributions made by the worker, the employer and the government are based on the estimated percentage of workers which may be unemployed over a period of time. I do not remember the exact percentage upon which our act is based, but I doubt if present contributions would be able to finance present benefits if more than ten per cent of our working force were unemployed. If the percentage of unemployed went above that, the contributions to the fund could not provide benefits at the rate now paid.

I think perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard will agree with me when I say that as the benefits paid are based upon the wages received, what is required is an increase in the wage rates which in turn would increase the amount of the benefits received. Let me point out to the house how low the wage rates are on which benefits are based. The first class covers persons under sixteen years of age who are earning less than 90 cents a day. In this case the employee does not make a contribution; the employer pays the whole contribution of 27 cents a week. The next class includes persons earning from $5.40 a week to $7.50, and here the contribution by the employer is 21 cents and by the employed person, 12 cents. The third class covers those earning from $7.50 a week to less than $9.60 a week. The next class covers those from $9.60 to $12, and so on up to those earning $38.50 a week or $2,000 a year. This maximum was later raised.

No benefits are paid for those who earn under 90 cents a day. The next class receive a benefit of $4.08 for a single person and $4.80 for a person with dependents; these benefits are based on earnings between $5.40 and $7.50 per week. It is obvious that if we are to appreciably increase the benefits they will become larger than the earnings on which they are based. I do not think that is practicable. The thing to do is to increase wages, and then if a person happens to be unemployed his benefits will be increased accordingly. I am not objecting to an increase in the benefits, but I do want to show that you cannot increase the benefits very much without giving the worker a higher remuneration in benefits when unemployed than he is receiving in wages while working. Obviously there would be no reason in the world why he should work under such circumstances.

As I said earlier, during the last year a great many complaints have been made to me in connection with the administration of the act. I realize the handicaps under which the unemployment insurance commission and the minister have been working. The minister is practically the commission at the present time, because there is only a chief commissioner. As I said before, this is a new field of administration, and that in itself would make the administration difficult. The commissioners who were appointed had had no previous experience with legislation of this kind. The minister and the commission had to contend not only with inexperienced staff but also with inexperienced administrators. Until we get over this particular phase, while criticism might be popular I am inclined not to engage in it at the moment.

Let me again draw the attention of the minister and the house to the desirability of referring this bill to the standing committee on industrial relations. The bill affects a large number of workers, and an opportunity should be given to their representatives, to the representatives of organized labour particularly, to make representations as to the shortcomings or otherwise of the act. The employers also should have an opportunity to appear again before a committee.

I had the privilege of being a member of the special committee to which the bill was referred in 1940 when it was introduced in this house as a new measure. A large number of representations were made at that time, and I am convinced, now that five years have passed, that we should again hear from those who are affected by the act as to what they think of it, how they think it can be improved, and so on. I urge as strongly as I possibly can that when this bill has received second reading the minister move that it be referred to that standing committee. If it is not referred to the committee it may not be possible to have second reading of the bill to-day, because of the short time we have had to examine the bill. I was fortunate in getting a copy of it last night, but until about one o'clock or half-past one this afternoon most hon. members, at least those of my group, had not seen it. We should like to have more time to study it. If, however, my suggestion finds favour with the minister, perhaps we could let the bill have second reading without extended debate.

Mr. DAVID A. CROLL (Spadina): As one who for some years was responsible for the employment offices in the province of Ontario when there was very little employment, I am not likely to be given to much criticism to-day, but the minister said he wanted a little, so I shall try to provide it.

The hon. member for Vancouver East said that unemployment insurance is not new. I agree with him but as we know the act, it is almost in its infancy in this country. But the idea that unemployment is an insurable risk was given official sanction in England back in 1911, and it has developed there and on the continent with the result that to-day we profit from their experience. Canada is able to benefit to some extent from the field work which has been done in other countries.

The unemployment insurance commission, in adapting to Canadian conditions the theories which have been developed, has done an admirable job. I do not expect there will be any criticism of the commission or of the act. As a matter of fact we who were away from this country for several years were glad to know that in 1940 the house took the time to place this act upon the books, and in 1943 to improve it. It indicates that hon. members of that day were thinking about us and laying well the cornerstone of the unemployment insurance structure. I think this is a great social measure, and I fully agree with what the minister said about the present administration of the act. All of us are familiar with the workings of it.

It should be made clear, however, that the first purpose of the act is to find work for those who have been thrown out of employment, whether because of labour turnover, of seasonal unemployment, or of the vagaries of the business cycle. And that purpose is a proper one. The people want work, not charity. Statements one sometimes hears, that they are more interested in drawing insurance than in obtaining work, are just rot. It is only when the possibilities of obtaining work have been exhausted that benefits are payable, and then of course in each case they are based on the amount of the contribution and the length of time during which they have been paid. To this scheme 2,294,000 insured persons and 150,000 employers contributed over $62 million in the year 1945, to which the government added twenty per cent, or some $12,500,000, as its share. Out of this fund $14 million were paid in benefits over the same period: as the hon. member for Vancouver East has already told the house, it amounted to 17·5 per cent. To paint the over-all picture, from the inception of the fund to the end of February, 1946—I am quoting from the April, 1946 issue of the Labour Gazette—the total amount contributed has been $348,309,381, and the total amount paid out in benefits for the same period was $29,530,514, leaving a net balance in the fund of $318,778,866.

I think there will be general agreement that the method of contribution up to the present time has not worked too badly, except that apparently the government's contribution has not come up to what it ought to be. In Great Britain, subject to certain statutory exemptions, all male workers under the age of sixty-five and female workers under the age of sixty are covered by unemployment insurance. The contributions are shared in equal thirds by employees, employers, and the state. The scale of contributions and benefits for males is as follows—this is another provision of the scheme which appeals particularly to me, and I recommend it to the minister: in addition to the weekly benefits there are benefits to a wife or other adult dependent of sixteen shillings weekly; as to children, each of the first two receives five shillings weekly, and others receive four shillings.

The United States works on a different scheme. Unemployment insurance is wholly within the province of the states. However, the Social Security Act authorizes federal co-operation in two ways. Federal grants are made to states to defray the costs of administering state legislation. We had a joint plan of providing for the employment offices, before this scheme came into effect in Canada. Employers are allowed credit against the federal unemployment tax for their contribution to a state unemployment fund. The federal unemployment tax is an excise tax levied on all payrolls of employers with more than eight employees; it amounts to 3 per cent of the wages paid, and covers everyone.

I point out to this house that up to the present time the fund has ben more than adequate, and that a surplus has accumulated which swells the fund very considerably. But when we come to examine the benefits paid, the inadequacy of the scheme becomes apparent. Total disbursements to date have been less than ten per cent of the fund. In this connection the hon. member for Vancouver East gave some figures. The British operate on the basis of paying the same benefit to a person, whether he is married or single, then making an additional allowance to his wife, and then a further allowance to his children. We look at it in a rather different light, and the differential between the married man and the single man at the present time is so little that in that respect the act fails. If a single person receives $4.08 in the first category, the married man receives $4.80, and in the second category the single man receives $5.10 and the married man $6, so the relationship remains about the same. It is true that the first four years of the commission's existence have been good years, and the amounts of benefit have only begun to show a marked increase in the last twelve months; but the fact remains that after five years ninety per cent of the fund is still untouched.

I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that is no reason for raiding the fund, because it belongs to the people who have contributed to it. But let us examine the case of a married man with a child whose income while he is employed is the largest possible under the act, $2,400. The average industrial earnings in Canada in 1942 were recorded at $31.44 a week and in 1939 at $24 a week. If we strike an average we get an earning of $27.72 a week; yet the largest possible unemployment benefit under the act is $14.40 a week, or 51·9 per cent of a man's earning capacity. In the United States it is 60·8 per cent, and in Australia 53·4 per cent.

In the United States, where unemployment insurance is financed by a tax on salaries, regardless of the amount of salary, and is in all cases with the exception of four paid by the employer, the benefits range from a minimum of $15 to a maximum of $28. One might go on and quote statistics relating to England and Australia, but I believe a comparison between benefits payable in different countries gives no real indication of their adequacy. There are many disparities, differences in costs, differences in standard of living of different classes to whom benefits are paid, and different basis of contributions. In four of the American states the employees contribute to the insurance fund. What is more to our purpose is that, under present circumstances, given the costs and conditions in Canada, $14.40 as maximum per week is entirely inadequate to maintain a family in health and respectability. Hon. members will no doubt say, what about the family allowance? Well, that is a great help, and we were all happy to hear the minister say, when he presented his estimates, that talk about family allowance being abused was absurd since in only an infinitesimal number of cases was there any evidence of abuse. Nevertheless $14.40 will in many cases provide only food for the average family on the standard endorsed by the Canadian council of nutrition.

I find here a number of diets for different families in the booklet "The Cost of Living, 1944", published by the welfare council of Toronto, and it might be remarked in passing that the cost of living has increased somewhat since 1944; it now stands at 122 with relation to the basic period of 1935-1939. In the study of the Toronto welfare council I find on page 7 weekly sample market orders for various families comprising two adults and three children. The food budget for a week is $12.40. In those days milk was 11 cents a quart, cheese 34 cents a pound, and so on. A man drawing the maximum unemployment insurance of $14.40 would have the sum of $2 left to spend for shelter, clothing, health and recreation for his family, not to mention replacements. On the over-all basis, the monthly budget for a family of five is $154.17, or $35.85 a week—two and a half times the unemployment insurance benefit of $14.40. On the same basis, if you add the family allowance for the same children—and by the way they are a boy of six, a boy of twelve and a girl of ten—that raises it to $18.75. It is true that this is based on the cost of living in Toronto, and it will be in some respects higher than in other localities. But it should also be kept in mind that the benefits payable in Toronto are no more and no less than those paid elsewhere, and it strikes me as unjust to penalize the residents of the larger cities and towns, where living costs are high, by limiting them to a scale of benefits which would be more suitable for rural areas.

So far as Ontario is concerned, I am reading from a brief presented to the veterans affairs committee by the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, Ontario provincial command, on July 12. There is a section in the report bearing on the present discussion. A table is given showing the estimated cost of living for a family of three. This table was compiled from information submitted on the request of the mayor of each of eight Ontario municipalities, and I think it can be accepted as a fair appraisal of the situation. Again it must be remembered that the cost of living index has advanced slightly even since then.

Taking a widow and two children, they point out that in Sault Ste. Marie the cost is $113.70 a month; in London, $91.33; Niagara Falls, $107; Sarnia, $109.25; Owen Sound, $100; Stratford, $125; Ottawa and Guelph, $100. It is interesting to see how the Ottawa figures are made up. The breakdown of the committee's findings on the cost of living in Ottawa gives: food, $39; rent and light, $31.50; clothing, $12.50; medical and dental, $6; incidentals, $8; insurance, $3.

Hon. members realize what little ground is covered in the spending of that $100. These figures are for a widow and two children. Obviously it would be higher for the typical family of two adults and one or more children. But even on the basis of the figures which I have quoted it cannot be denied that the present unemployment insurance benefits of less than $60 a month are grossly inadequate in view of the cost of living and the standard of living which must be maintained by the average Canadian family. The situation can be remedied only by increasing the weekly benefits of unemployment insurance. It would seem to me that an increase of fifty per cent is warranted.

I can see two possible objections. The first question that will be asked by the house is, where is the money to come from? It has been pointed out that some ninety per cent of the unemployment insurance fund, amounting to almost $320 million, remains untouched. I am not suggesting that it be touched, but I point out that it should be possible to do as they did in England in 1944—estimate what proportion of the fund would be required to meet benefit payments in the foreseeable future, set aside that amount, and apply the remainder to increasing the current scale of payments. In England they found that they were able to increase their payments by eight per cent. Should the fund prove inadequate in these circumstances I suggest that the portion now paid by the government, which is twenty per cent, be increased to one-third. That is a desirable step. Governments, through the people, benefit as a result of these payments, and I think it proper to increase the benefits.

The second objection to unemployment payments being increased is that workers will quit their jobs. There is little danger of that.

In the first place, unemployment insurance is not granted indiscriminately to anyone who happens to be out of work. All applications for benefits are examined by the commission and a fairly large portion are disallowed. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, 18,979 out of 102,144 were disallowed. We can rely upon the staff, which is becoming more competent each day, to winnow out the undeserving cases. Unemployment insurance is not a life pension. It is payable for a limited period, roughly one-fifth of the time which a person was employed and contributed to the fund. Therefore there is little danger that an increase in unemployment insurance benefits will result in workers leaving their jobs and living at the expense of the government.

As in any other form of insurance, the policyholder will receive just what he pays. Unemployment insurance is just insurance without the middleman, and with the government contributing. The essence of unemployment insurance, as has already been pointed out to the house, is that it belongs to the workers. That is the idea which the commission is striving to get across to them, and it is confident that with the widespread acceptance of that principle, attempts by individuals to profit at the expense of the fund will become more and more negligible.

Reference has been made to the senate committee. The senate committee concluded that the present scheme could be kept actuarilly sound and yet permit an increase in the present rates of benefit. From a study of the Unemployment Insurance Act during the five years of its existence, and having regard to the steady increase in the cost of living since the inception of the scheme, I point out to the minister that it is time the rates were increased. In addition it is time the act was extended to include a great number of people who are not covered by it at the present time.

In so far as administration is concerned, when one takes into consideration the changes in staff and the difficulties in accommodation, the commission has done a workmanlike job. The chief complaint I hear is that men are being pushed around. No one likes to be pushed around. A man is told to go to a certain place; when he gets there he finds he has to go to somewhere else, and when he gets there he has to go to somewhere else. The result is he becomes annoyed before his case is dealt with. I suggest to the minister that a study is necessary—as a matter of fact it is overdue—for improvements in this act. We are making haste, but we are not making haste fast enough. At the present time the act is far short of the mark, and we cannot neglect it. We are marking time with respect to other social security measures; but if we strengthen this act we shall find ourselves in little difficulty. Unless we strengthen the act and increase the benefits we may find considerable difficulty still facing us. I support the act; I support it in principle, but there are some details which need attention, the most important of which is the matter of benefits under the act, I ask the minister to give it his immediate attention.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to say a word on this bill before the house goes into committee. As has been pointed out, most of us never had a chance to see the bill until about one o'clock to-day, because it was not put into our boxes until that time; therefore it was difficult to go over the bill as carefully as some of us would have liked. The only thing we could judge the bill on was the address of the minister of yesterday. After reading what the minister said and looking over the bill, it can be said that it is going to be a little improvement on the bill of 1940.

I wish to say to the minister that while I am not sympathizing with him—he needs no sympathy; all he needs is a little criticism and jacking-up once in a while, and then he does very well—he will have a difficult task before him in administering this act. It is bound to present a lot of difficulties. He can clearly see that now, because while this bill is entitled the Unemployment Insurance Act, greater attention should be paid, possibly by the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), to an employment act. The more an employment act fails to fulfil its obligations, the greater the obligation that rests on the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to carry out the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

It can be readily seen that the number of unemployed is steadily climbing. A few months ago we had something like 250,000 registered unemployed. We now have around 300,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is just going in reverse.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is not the way it is reported from my part of the country. Look at the statement just put out by the deputy minister, in which he took a rather dictatorial attitude in regard to transporting workers from one part of the country to another. That, too, I think is going to add to the difficulty of administering the act.

Mr. MITCHELL: When my hon. friend talks about a dictatorial attitude, I should like him to enlarge on that a little.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Very well. I did not want to go into too much detail—

Mr. MITCHELL: Because you haven't any detail.

Mr. JOHNSTON: —but since the minister is asking for it I am sure he will not mind if I elaborate a little. It has been stated already that those who do not obey a direction from selective service in regard to employment will be given only so long before having their benefits cut off. If that is not getting dictatorial I do not know what is. I shall go into that a little more fully when we come to discuss what is meant by "suitable employment" in the bill. I was not going to discuss the bill in particular to-day, but I do think the minister is going to run into a great deal of difficulty in the administration of this act when he comes to define what suitable employment is. That is a difficulty right now, as a matter of fact.

Mr. MITCHELL: Has my hon. friend a definition?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I can give the minister his own definition; I do not suppose he will object to that. I quote from page 3105 of Hansard for yesterday:

> On the other hand it is likewise specifically provided that after a lapse of a reasonable interval from the commencement of unemployment, employment in another occupation is not to be considered unsuitable (in other words it is suitable) if the wages offered are not lower and the conditions not less favourable than those obtaining in that occupation.

Then the minister went on to say:

> —what is not suitable to-day may well be suitable a month from to-day.

The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but there I think he was trying to define what is suitable employment. I must admit that he has defined it very vaguely, but I do not think he would care to endeavour to define it right now. I too realize the difficulty of defining just what suitable employment might be.

Mr. WARREN: Would the hon. member tell the house just what he considers unsuitable employment?

Mr. JOHNSTON: The hon. member probably was not in the house when I began to speak. I was giving the minister's definition; surely the hon. member would not object to that. I did not want to get into too much of an argument on this matter—

Mr. WARREN: I should like an answer to my question. What is unsuitable employment?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. JOHNSTON: I will tell you what suitable employment is. It is employment a person desires of his own accord, which gives a desirable remuneration. Would the hon. member object to that? Anything else is not suitable.

Mr. WARREN: I have never known of unsuitable employment.

Mr. JOHNSTON: If I tell you what suitable employment is I imagine you would have sufficient intelligence to know what unsuitable employment is. You just put in the negative form and you have your definition. A moment ago the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) mentioned what might be considered unsuitable remuneration, when he said the total payment to a married man was $14.40 a week or about $60 a month. In my opinion that would not be suitable remuneration.

Mr. WARREN: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. JOHNSTON: If the hon. member will just sit down and wait until we consider the bill, we can go into these detailed discussions then.

Mr. WARREN: Perhaps the hon. member would answer this question. Did he ever know of a man with health and a little initiative who could not add to that amount, in some way, through his own enterprise?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not think I quite got the question.

Mr. WARREN: Did the hon. member ever meet a man who was living on unemployment insurance who could not add to his income, if he was in good health and had a little initiative? Could he not add something through his own enterprise?

Mr. JOHNSTON: But the act definitely limits him in that regard. If he is in receipt of other remuneration, that is taken into consideration in fixing the amount he receives. I am afraid my hon. friend has not gone over the act very carefully.

Mr. WARREN: I know something about it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: A few years ago in the old age pension committee the hon. gentleman was very much disturbed over the possibility that old age pensioners might receive increased pensions. I should think he would be also disturbed over the possibility that a material advantage would be given these people under this legislation.

Mr. GRAYDON: Better call the whole thing off.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think perhaps that would be a good idea, and my hon. friend can discuss it whenever he sees fit. I believe the consensus is that this act is an improvement over what was in existence previously. I have no strong objection to it, but I should like to point out that as time goes on our unemployment problem will get worse instead of better. With the present system of contributions, as the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) has pointed out, the difficulty will become greater. It seems to me the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) would be found to have a great deal of merit if they were properly considered. He suggested that the government should be contributing more to this scheme, and that view was supported by the hon. member who preceded me. The fact is that when the employee has to contribute, his purchasing power is reduced. When the employer has to contribute, the purchasing power of the public is reduced because increased costs of production go into the price of goods; as a result the people can buy less goods; industry can produce less goods because they sell less, so there is a general increase in unemployment. Whether or not people like to accept it, I think that is a sound proposition, and I believe the government must recognize it as such or find their difficulties in administering this act continually increasing. So I should like to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Spadina that the government should seriously consider increasing its contribution; and I would go one step further. The government has issued state money, and I think the Bank of Canada should be used for this purpose. It would not entail any increased taxation if the Bank of Canada were used to provide at least a portion of this increased government contribution.

These things will interfere with the administration of the act as it stands; the minister will have difficulties under many sections. As I read the act I can see trouble ahead in the administration of the section which tries to define suitable employment. I noticed the minister's interpretation in Hansard and tried without success to find the same interpretation in the act. I shall discuss that point when we come to it in the bill, but it seemed to me that what is contained there was quite the opposite to what was stated by the minister. I think that is all I care to say at the moment.

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to attempt to discuss the bill. In common with most hon. members I have not had an opportunity to look at it, because I have only just received a copy of it. I should like to make some references to what appear to be disabilities in connection with unemployment insurance. In doing so I am not in any sense critical of the measure itself; I think unemployment insurance is indeed commendable legislation. It will not however in my opinion be fully appreciated or fully operative until such time as we can combine health insurance with unemployment insurance.

I, too, hold the view that because of the higher cost of living there is much to be said for consideration being given to increasing the benefits to workers. I am not in any sense sympathizing with those who are unemployed and who refuse to accept good, healthy employment, and I am not too critical of the stand taken by the deputy minister because I know something of the hardships being experienced by farmers in my own riding who would be only too glad to have some good, robust fellows help them out at this time. It seems to me we must draw the line somewhere.

However I feel that no measure of governmental assistance should have as its objective a deterrent to work. When I suggest that benefits might be increased for the worker I am appreciating the fact that the benefits from unemployment insurance are limited. That is, there is a time limit on them. And while a worker may be unemployed, I do not feel that he will cease to look for employment because he knows that his time in that regard would be limited. There may of course be exceptions to the rule.

As I said, I am going to refer to some of the handicaps about which people complain. I have in mind those who are temporarily employed. I suppose it is difficult to have the act apply to all in a practical way, so that it can be administered without too great administrative costs. But, to give an example, I am thinking of a lady who is now married but who engages in temporary work by relieving cashiers at certain offices and by doing secretarial work for from two to four weeks each year. Certain deductions are made for unemployment insurance. Yet the fact remains that if she worked only two weeks in each year, it would be a matter of about fifty years before she would be eligible for benefits. It is felt, of course, that that is a hardship.

Another class I have in mind is that of farmers who left their farms, I suppose for some very good reasons—I hope that in the main they were patriotic reasons. They left those farms during the war to engage in industrial enterprise, and while so doing contributed to unemployment insurance. Now that the war is over they have the idea of returning to the farm. Perhaps they have reached more advanced years and for that, or for some other very good reason they feel they should return to farm work. In doing so they are no longer eligible, as farmers, for the benefits of unemployment insurance, and yet have no hope of recovery of the contributions they have made.

I have had certain representations made to me in that connection. I believe I have been able to satisfy these people that they are in the same position as people who carry fire insurance on their buildings. Those people feel they are most fortunate if they do not suffer loss from a fire. If those who were so employed were in a position to avoid unemployment, they made a contribution to something worth while for their less fortunate fellow citizens. Nevertheless these people feel they are being called upon to make a contribution from which they receive no benefit, inasmuch as when they return to their farms they cannot make the claim that they are unemployed.

The other group which comes to mind is that of graduate registered nurses who, I understand, are not eligible for benefits. Yet, Trans-Canada Air Lines employs graduate nurses to perform the duties of stewardesses, and while so employed I understand they make contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. When they leave the employ of Trans-Canada Air Lines, either through marriage or through returning to their former occupation, I should like to know how they can claim unemployment insurance. If they marry and leave Trans-Canada Air Lines they are not eligible; and if for any other reason they have resigned and returned to their former occupations they find that as nurses they are not eligible. Their feeling is that they have made contributions from which they receive no benefits upon their return to their normal professions.

It is with those groups in mind I have referred briefly to the disabilities under which some people feel they suffer. I am thinking of insurance in its broadest sense. When one thinks of life insurance he thinks of a type of insurance from which at some time, sooner or later, someone benefits. The individual himself can benefit during his lifetime, in accordance with the contributions he has made, from purchasing endowment insurance. If he has whole life insurance his heirs will benefit. With this type of unemployment insurance, contributions are being made, and a great deal of administrative detail would be involved if it were worked out in the practical sense I have suggested. However the individual receives no benefit, and neither does his estate if an insured person dies.

So in that sense I have compared unemployment insurance with fire insurance in the sense that a man who has paid fire insurance and has suffered no loss from fire has received no benefits beyond the protection he has had during that time. Unemployment insurance can be looked upon in the same way. It is true that the insured person may receive no benefit beyond the protection afforded during his lifetime.

While listening to other hon. members I have taken note of the vast proportions of the bill, and have concluded it would be wise if the minister would accept the suggestion that the bill be referred to the committee on industrial relations, where it might be more carefully reviewed, and returned to the house in a form in which we might discuss it.

The main theme of my remarks I have already covered, and when the minister speaks I should be pleased if he would refer to the points I have raised, namely those who are classified as temporary help, those who have returned to the farm, and registered nurses.

Mr. GLEASON BELZILE (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I offer no excuse for speaking in French, because I had only a short time to collect a few notes on the subject. I believe the French language is supposed to be understood fairly well throughout the house, and for that reason I shall discuss the subject in my native language.

(Translation): Under section 4 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, the administration of that legislation was entrusted to the commission. It had been deemed accessary that the commission should be an autonomous body and that it should be granted full administrative powers.

Under section 96 of the act, all reports, recommendations and submissions required to be made by the commission to the governor in council, must be submitted through the minister. In other words, the commission is not responsible to the minister as regards the administration of the act, and the minister is merely a link between parliament and the commission.

On September 4, 1942, order in council No. 7994 was passed; the minister was thereby entrusted with the full administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, as well as with the application of the National Selective Service regulations, the staff and the offices of the commission being placed under the jurisdiction of the department. That order in council lapsed on April 1, 1946.

What is provided by the proposed amendment to the act as the latter now stands is that the commission should be responsible to the minister as regards the administration of the employment service in Canada which it shall have to organize and maintain. The meaning of the word "responsible" is vague and obscure; that term could certainly be construed as meaning that the commission must account for its actions to the government, but it could, in a wider sense, authorize the minister to direct personally both the policies and the administration and even give him full direction of the employment service. Such is the interpretation the minister gave yesterday and which can be found at page 3106 of Hansard:

> Clause 23 makes the national employment service responsible to the minister and permits it to carry out additional duties not within its formal functions.

It is therefore obvious that the minister is undertaking, under this legislation, to perform the work of the commission. During the war there was much confusion among the public and the officials because of the double jurisdiction of the commission and the minister on the commission's affairs. What is now proposed by the bill is merely the perpetuation of that ambiguity.

The commission holds a delicate balance between capital and labour. It consists of a commissioner appointed after due consultation with labour organizations, of a second commissioner appointed after consultation with employers' organizations and of a chief commissioner appointed by the government and representing the public at large. Its functions are, in fact, quasi-judicial in character. Now experience has shown the inexpediency of investing any minister with judicial powers, and I seek no further proof of this than the unwarranted interference of the minister or deputy-minister of National Revenue in the assessment of income taxes.

Part III of the act, in its present form, provides that the Commission shall organize an employment service placed under its own jurisdiction; which means that employers, labour and the government each have their say in the policies and management of the employment service.

The bill proposes that this triple interest be replaced by the single control of the minister who—humanly enough—might be subject to political or even private pressure, whereas the commission is a body corporate independent of political pressures or of private interests.

The result of this change in employment service administration is that the officials of the commission will have to serve two different masters and therefore the public will be at a loss to know how they are standing.

Up to now, the commission's offices housed both the employment and the unemployment insurance services. After the adoption of order in council P.C. 7994, they bore the name of employment and selective service offices. Now they are called national employment service offices, which name denotes but a part of their activities. The local offices are not solely concerned with the placement of people in jobs, they must also attend to unemployment insurance claims, collect contributions as well as issue and recover unemployment insurance books. The impression given by signs displayed on local offices is that they are employment offices exclusively. Some even refer to the national employment service as if it were the whole thing, although it is but one department of the unemployment insurance commission.

At first, the change contemplated in the bill seems inconsequential as far as the unemployment insurance fund is concerned, for it will remain under the administration of the commission who is responsible to the government. However, it appears that, within a short time, the dissolution of the commission will be requested in order to put unemployment insurance under the direct supervision of the minister. Then, there would be strong reasons for claiming that since the employment service comes under the minister, there is no reason why the commission's fund should not. At the present time, the commission is trustee for the fund and it has been created in 1940 to safeguard the interests of both capital and labour and in order that the provinces would feel that unemployment insurance was not administered by a single federal department, but by an autonomous and independent body.

The restriction or suppression of the commission's authority would affect not only the interests of both capital and labour, but also and directly, those of the provinces. From the sole administrative angle the present amendment is unwarranted.

It is evident that the federal government, doubtless with the consent of the provinces, has invaded the provincial field of activities, when they passed the Unemployment Insurance Act. To my knowledge, there are in each province employment offices as well as labour departments. Therefore, friction in matters of jurisdiction is unavoidable and encroachments readily occur; to my mind, in order to avoid such overlapping of jurisdiction and continuous frictions only an independent body, outside the jurisdiction of the dominion government and free from any political influence, may look after the problems arising from unemployment and employment.

Further, in my humble opinion, the commission is a monument to that great Canadian, the late notary Joseph Sirois. He was the first to recommend it to the country and later he made it his life work. He believed that he was serving the interests of his country in advocating that problems pertaining to employment and unemployment insurance should come solely within the purview of an independent body, and I believe it would be a departure from the principle of the act to place it under the jurisdiction of the minister.

In conclusion, may I say, in passing, that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is one of the few spheres of government headed by a French-speaking Canadian. There are no longer any French-speaking deputy ministers, except the assistant deputy minister for national defence. Mr. Trottier, the present chairman of the commission, is practically the only representative of my race who has some authority in the government. I therefore suggest that the proposed amendment be modified.

(Text): Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add only a word or two to what has been said already, because much of what could be said now would be just a repetition and I think there will be a time and a place for that when the bill is before the committee. It seems to me that if we have had an accumulation of $318,000,000 or $320,000,000 in the short period of time that the act has been in operation some special consideration should be given to the more deserving cases and some exceptions made.

I agree with many of the things that were said by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). He covered many of the matters that I would have covered had I intended to speak at length. I want to point this out to the minister. In going hurriedly through the bill, I have not found anything applying to student groups. Under the present act, students applying for employment to any legitimate employer are in this position—and numerous cases have come to my attention in the last three weeks—at least this is the interpretation which I would draw to the minister's attention, and I would like him to tell me if it is incorrect. Those students who go to the income tax offices receive a form and are exempt from deduction for income tax purposes. I hope the minister is following me.

[Mr. Belzile.]

Mr. MITCHELL: I am making a note of what the hon. member is saying. I can give him the answer now if he wishes it.

Mr. LOCKHART: They receive a form and are exempt from income tax deduction. But if the same students, under exactly the same circumstances, go to the unemployment insurance offices they are required to take out unemployment insurance books, notwithstanding that they make the same statement as was made to the income tax department, namely that they intend to go back to school in September and continue their studies to a conclusion. I do not find anything in the bill dealing with this, although I had gone through it hurriedly before asking the question.

There will be a number of other matters which I shall raise when the bill is before the house in committee. Maybe it is going to a special committee; I do not know; that would I think, save a lot of time. I hope the minister will give an explanation of the procedure which I have mentioned, and which has been brought to my attention recently on numerous occasions.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, discussion of a bill of this kind always raises some important principles, principles so important that, it seems to me, whether we are to have freedom or not in this country depends on our attitude toward them.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), as well as a few others, suggested that the problem with which we should be concerning ourselves was not so much that of providing better unemployment insurance benefits, but rather that of dealing with unemployment, and it is on that score that I should like to say a few words.

As I have already suggested, this raises a fundamental question in our national economy. In pre-war years we debated this situation at length for many days and months, and we are already concerning ourselves once more with the problem of unemployment and its solution.

Personally I want to take decided issue with some of the objectives which have been both implied and suggested in the debate thus far. We shall never make progress in this subject until we establish sound objectives. In this modern streamlined age those who suggest that to make people work from eight to twelve hours a day is a solution of the unemployment problem are so far from the truth that they cannot even see it. Those who suggest that in this age of technological advancement it is possible for people to derive all their incomes as a consequence of working for eight or ten or twelve hours a day fail absolutely to recognize the circumstances in which we now find ourselves.

A word first of all in connection with legitimate objectives. I ask seriously, as I have done on many previous occasions in this chamber, is the provision by government of work for its people a legitimate objective; is it sound and desirable; is it the objective of the economic system?

On that point I should like to quote from a book by the founder of the social credit principles, Major C. H. Douglas, entitled, "Monopoly of Credit." This is what he has to say in relation to the objectives of the economic system, at pages 116 and 117:

> In attacking an engineering problem the first point we settle, with as much exactness as possible, is our objective. No engineer observer of the discussions which take place in political and lay circles on the industrial problems of the present day can fail to be struck with the fact that the problem itself is rarely stated with any clearness. For instance, the paramount difficulty of the industrial system is commonly expressed as that of unemployment. Therefore the suggestion involved is that the industrial system exists to provide employment, and fails. Those who are engaged in the actual conduct of industry, however, are specifically concerned to obtain a given output with a minimum of employment and in fact, a decreasing amount of employment. Consequently, those who are talking about industry and those who are conducting industry have in their minds objectives which are diametrically opposed and incompatible.

That is a pertinent quotation which should be considered by each and every individual who presumes to give advice on the subject of employment. We are seeking, I assert, to proceed in two opposite directions at the same time, and that is manifestly impossible. On the one hand, we encourage engineers and inventors to do everything humanly possible to eliminate the number of necessary hours of work. It is quite obvious to anyone; it has been stated repeatedly in this house by hon. members of every party, that one of the greatest contributing factors to unemployment in this day and age is technological, the substitution of power machinery and mass production methods. We recognize that; we say, yes, the machine obviously does displace human labour; yet the very same people who make those statements suggest that we must deliberately put people to work.

I ask, how can we proceed on that basis? Is it reasonable to proceed on that basis? The first thing we must do if we are to make any progress at all in this subject is to lay down a sound objective. To those who are worried about how to find jobs I can suggest a solution in two minutes. Instead of building our highways with the huge machinery we have to-day, whereby one man and one machine can do the work of a couple of hundred people, let us go back to the pick, the shovel and the wheelbarrow; if the wheelbarrows are too big let us cut them in half; if the shovels are too big let us use spoons, and there will be jobs for everybody. Follow the same principle not only in the matter of building roads but in all branches of industry and you will have jobs for innumerable people, twenty-four hours a day, if that is what you want. To those who suggest that the purpose of the economic system is work in the ordinary sense, I say that if they are to be logical that is the kind of thing they will have to do and, in fact, it is the kind of thing that was done in the days preceding the war. They did it in my own constituency in the construction of the Jasper-Banff highway. Roadbuilding machinery was standing on the roadside rusting, while young men with university training were building that highway with picks and shovels, just because it is assumed that a man is not entitled to eat unless he is slugging away at something, no matter how useless it is.

I assert, therefore, that we have to come to grips with this issue. This talk of putting people to work smacks of totalitarianism, and I deny any man the right to tell me to go to work when we collectively and individually have designed machinery to do the work for us. It is contrary to economic progress and contrary to the rights of the individual. We must recognize and acknowledge that we live in an age entirely different from that of our ancestors of even fifty years ago. Let me give one more quotation from Major Douglas. Here is one with regard to the question, how many hours of work would there be available if we used machinery to maximum capacity?

Mr. MITCHELL: Who is Major Douglas?

Mr. KUHL: The founder of the social credit principles, a Scottish engineer, one of the greatest men living to-day. If the hon. gentleman would take time to read his books he would be a little more up to date on the question of employment and unemployment and this country would be a little better off. I recommend the books of Major Douglas to him. If he has not the time to read all Douglas' books, here is a useful compilation of the best extracts from those books, entitled, "The Douglas Manual." I would be glad to lend him my copy. I was about to give another brief quotation from Major C. H. Douglas, in which he deals with the very problem that now confronts the Minister of Labour and will confront him more and more as time goes on. This applies to all those who entertain ideas of putting people, physically capable of working, to work for eight or ten hours a day. This is what Major Douglas had to say in "Economic Democracy", at pages 85 and 86, in the days before the war:

> It has been estimated that two hours per week of the time of every fit adult between the ages of 18 and 45 would provide for a uniformly high standard of physical welfare under existing conditions, and without endorsing the exact figures, it is perfectly certain that distribution and not manufacture is the real economic problem and is at present quite intolerably unsatisfactory.

That is another quotation with which the minister, I suggest, should concern himself very greatly. The same remark applies to all those who discuss the subject of full employment. There are in this chamber, and outside as well, those who, whenever they hear me and others who share my views making statements such as I am now making, imply, suggest and even directly state that to talk in the manner in which I am now talking is to advocate a loafer's paradise. Anyone who has made a study of this subject knows that it is not so. It is not at all work to which I object. It is being compelled to work, particularly by other human beings, which is nothing less than slavery. I say to the Minister of Labour and to any government that when the people, collectively through their inventive genius, have created sufficient machinery to reduce the working day to six hours, or to four, or to whatever number it may be reduced, and when, confronted with such a situation, the minister says that we are not going to recognize that situation but will put people to work even if we have to set the machinery on the roadside, he and those who take that attitude are assuming a prerogative which is not theirs, and they are actuated by a motive which is anything but democratic and which smacks of totalitarianism.

So far as hours of work are concerned, I believe everyone acknowledges that it is only common sense that, collectively or individually, the workers should not be obliged to do more than such work as the machine cannot do. That is common sense, and if it is not I should like someone to point out to me wherein it is not common sense. Otherwise, what is the purpose of the machine? Repeatedly I have put on the record statistics to show the extent to which power machinery has displaced human effort in this modern age. I have not under my hand at the moment the authority, but I have several times quoted figures to indicate that the average number of man hours per unit of production, for all production in the United States, has declined from 6·3 in 1905 to 2·3 in 1935, and if we had the actual statistics to-day we would probably find that it was 1·3. That has taken place in the last fifty years.

In the face of that, how can anyone suggest that it is physically possible, taking advantage of all the machinery at our disposal, to provide jobs for all who are physically capable of working, so as to furnish them with sufficient incomes with which to buy all the products of industry? It is impossible. I assert, therefore, that the first requisite is to reconcile ourselves to this situation. If we are to permit science to progress naturally, then we shall never again have that combination of circumstances in which everyone physically capable of working can get an eight-hour day or anything like it. So we should not expect of each other that we should be employed in work to bring about the production of essentials and the luxuries of life to any greater extent than the power machine cannot operate. It is evident from the quotations which I have given from Major Douglas that the number of hours that anyone would have to work would be very small indeed in this day and age.

That is just a consideration from the physical facts which stare us in the face. But the greatest objection I have is the approach from the philosophical point of view, and that is the assumption on the part of individuals that they have the right to determine what others should be engaged in. I believe the hon. member for Spadina implied that. I say that we shall have freedom only when people have the maximum opportunity to choose for themselves what they wish to do. What I wish to see in Canada for myself and for my fellow men—and I am speaking particularly on behalf of those who sent me here—is a set of circumstances in which my fellow men and I can choose the things we wish to do, instead of being ordered around and pushed around and shoved about as the hon. member for Spadina indicated. We shall have freedom only when all of us have the maximum opportunity to choose what we wish to do, and we shall never have that opportunity until we have incomes that will enable us to do it.

The greatest concern I feel we should have in the unemployment situation is the matter, not of jobs, but of income. That is what we ought to concern ourselves with; and simply to raise unemployment insurance benefits by contributions, either from the employer or from the government, will not help under existing financial policies.

It has been pointed out that under existing circumstances it is the consumer who pays in the final analysis. What difference does it make whether the government or the employer, or the worker or the salaried individual contributes? It all comes ultimately from the consumer, and there is not enough in the consumer's pocket to enable him to buy all the products of industry in the first place, even if what the consumer has were not taken from him. That is another position which must be acknowledged by economic thinkers. It is assumed by almost everyone in this house except the members of this group that industry is self-liquidating; that all you need to do is to start an industry, get it going, and automatically it will distribute enough money to buy back its own products. That is one of the greatest economic fallacies which we hear expounded to-day. No industry or business, whether it be a peanut-stand, a corner grocery store or a million dollar corporation, can distribute enough money to buy back its own products. All you are doing under the existing financial policy is redistributing poverty; that is what the whole unemployment insurance scheme amounts to, the redistributing of poverty.

What we need is not a redistribution of existing income, but a greater income. In normal times our income is never equal to our production. We must reconcile ourselves to that fact, and if we proceed to balance our national income by supplementing the incomes of the people to the point where the national income is equal to the national production we can wipe out the whole unemployment insurance bill and all similar legislation. When that takes place our people can enjoy freedom. They will not need to take orders from any government bureaucrat. When their incomes are supplemented by national money to the point where national consumption balances national production people will not only be enabled to acquire the national production but will have the freedom to choose what they wish to do. It makes it possible for machines to be used to the maximum degree and the work-week reduced to the absolute minimum, thereby giving the people plenty of leisure.

A few moments ago the hon. member for Spadina said that people want to work. I deny that. He does not want to work any more than I do.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is speaking for himself.

Mr. KUHL: Yes, I am, and I resent the imputation that he should set himself up in any way to recommend to me what I should do. I say that is a prerogative which no government official should have.

Mr. CASE: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. KUHL: Yes.

Mr. CASE: Is the hon. member saying that he would pay everyone a national income whether he worked or not?

Mr. KUHL: Yes. Without that you have no freedom. The reason they should obtain this income, or national dividend, whether they work or not is that they are entitled to it by reason of being citizens of this modern civilization. A dividend is not a hand-out; it is the heritage which belongs to the individual whether he works or not. That is a fundamental.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The recipients of the family allowances do not work for it.

Mr. KUHL: The work has been done by our ancestors. We who are alive to-day have contributed nothing to the discovery of electricity, the steam engine, diesel power and all the other inventions which make this great abundance possible to-day. We have simply accepted it, but we have not had sense enough to devise a proper system of distribution to enable us to enjoy the potentialities of production which it is possible for us to enjoy to-day. Certainly I say that this supplement to the individual's income should be received whether he works or not. He must receive it because he is entitled to it, and no one—whether the state or anyone else—has any right to step in between and determine how and where he should spend it. That is the glorious aspect of the social credit philosophy, wherein every man has the right to choose what he is to do, and does not have to take any orders from a government bureaucrat. That is the kind of civilization I should like to see in this country of ours as well as in every other country. Therefore I resent the inference or the direct statement by anyone that he is going to tell me what to do, where to go and what not to do. I want to choose that for myself. I claim that privilege for every one of my fellow men.

What people want is not work in the ordinary sense. They want an opportunity to indulge in leisured pursuits. That is what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) privately seeks to do. He does not spend any more time in the house than he has to; he does not write six paragraphs in a letter when he can get away with two. He conserves his energy.

Mr. MITCHELL: He works sixteen hours a day, six days a week.

Mr. KUHL. That is because he has to. If he did not have to do it he would not do it.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is work to sit here and listen to the hon. member

Mr. KUHL: I am not saying what it is to listen to the hon. gentleman; it is worse than work.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister is getting personal, in a kindly way, and he should not do so.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. KUHL: I wish to say another word or two on the question of work and leisure. A moment ago I said that privately we are constantly trying to relieve ourselves of our so-called work, not that we might necessarily lie in the shade all day. Usually people who have the opportunity for leisure expend more energy on their leisure pursuits than they do on their normal work. Here is a young farmer sitting on one of these stream-lined, rubber-tired tractors in the heat of the day with a parasol over his head, purring up and down his fields, and if you ask him what he is doing he says he is working. Right across the field there is a young fellow on a football field. He has no hat on his head and he is chasing a pigskin across the field, sweating and burning up energy. When you ask him what he is doing he says he is playing. What is work, and what is play? I should like to have the minister answer that one. Work does not consist of the amount of energy one burns up. What determines work is whether you are obliged to do it or not; that is the only thing that determines it. The thing that determines play is that you choose to do it, even though you may burn up ten times as much energy as you do in your regular work. What everyone is seeking to do is to reach the place where he has the maximum time in which to choose and follow leisure pursuits, whether that be sports or cultural pursuits or what have you.

We shall never be a nation; we shall never reach our height as a nation until we have the right to indulge to the maximum in voluntary self-chosen pursuits. This will be possible only when our incomes are high enough to enable us to enjoy the spare time which is misnamed unemployment and should properly be termed leisure time.

I have said all that I wish to say on this occasion. Perhaps I have exhibited more heat than light; but I must say that I become positively incensed, after being here for ten years and still being obliged to listen to the claptrap on this subject of unemployment and employment, and I simply cannot contain myself any longer. If there is to be any more of this foolish talk—and in my estimation it is foolish talk, then I am going to rise in my place on every occasion and give the house a barrage whether they like it or not.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): After the warning we have just heard I realize that I have to be pretty careful, but I should like to say a few things about the bill which is now before us to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act. It seems to me that the criticisms which we make about this matter, and the suggestions which we offer to the minister and to the government, should be divided into two classes. If I may say so I feel that these two classes of criticisms and suggestions have been somewhat confused in some of the speeches which have been made during the course of this debate.

First of all, there are things which we can say about this act strictly as an Unemployment Insurance Act, and we should keep it in mind, regardless of all the other reforms and social improvements which some of us advocate, that at the moment we are discussing a measure which is simply one dealing with unemployment insurance. On the other hand, having made suggestions directly bearing upon this measure as an insurance proposition, we can then make suggestions to the government as to things that are lacking in our social set-up, which are pointed to by the act now in operation and by the things it fails to do precisely because it is only an insurance act.

Under the heading of things that should be said about it as an unemployment insurance act I draw attention to three matters in particular. Two, I believe, have been discussed already, and I should like to add another. In the first place, I was interested, as other hon. members were, in the statistical job done by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) in regard to the rates of benefit. I think he made his case very clear when he insisted that if the act, as an insurance act, is to fulfil its function in our economy the government should give consideration to an increase in the benefits payable under it. I hope consideration will be given that suggestion not just in the distant future, but rather that the proposal of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) will be implemented and this bill sent to the standing committee on industrial relations, where we shall have an opportunity of hearing representations from interested bodies, both management and labour, and can see what may be done even this year along that line.

The second suggestion to which reference has already been made has to do with this question of defining suitable employment. I recognize the difficulty. I recognize also, because I have before me the national insurance act of the United Kingdom, that the definitions in this government's act regarding suitable employment are almost word for word the definitions to be found in the United Kingdom act. But what we get into, as the minister pointed out yesterday, is not just the definition of suitable employment laid down in the act, but the interpretation or the understanding and application of that definition by the officials of the commission and those all the way down the line who administer the act. In his speech yesterday in introducing the resolution preceding this bill, the minister said there were employments which might not be considered suitable right away but which might be considered suitable later on. He will remember that last fall he and I had a bit of a dispute back and forth about the tabling of a certain document, which he finally agreed to make public, which showed that he had suggested to the unemployment insurance officers that employment offering a certain reduction in wages might not be regarded as suitable employment three or four weeks after a person lost his job but might be regarded as suitable employment a few weeks later when securing employment seemed almost hopeless. I appreciate the difficulty of defining this, but it seems to me that we are going to get into a great deal of difficulty if we do not find a way of making clearer and more precise what suitable employment is, particularly in terms of wages.

The main feature about unemployment insurance that it has been possible to sell to the working people of this country is that it is distinct from relief in that it establishes a worker's right to benefits. Even when it is argued that the amounts paid at present are not much more than relief, still the fact that the worker does not have to submit to a means test but rather that this is his by right has made it an acceptable proposition. However, when under the latitude that is taken in defining or interpreting the definition of suitable employment there is this stretching of that term and the disqualifying of people who feel they should not be disqualified because they are not prepared to accept employment at a lower wage, we begin to break down that confidence that this is a measure which establishes benefits belonging to the workers by right. I hope this subject alone will appeal to the minister, because he admitted it was a matter of difficulty, as sufficient reason for acceding to the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver East that this measure be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

The only other point to which I should like to refer while treating this measure as an insurance act is the question of the waiting period. I did not discover in what the minister had to say the other day, nor have I been able to discover in the amending bill now before us, any suggestion of a change in regard to the length of that period. I have recognized in certain instances similarities, indeed in a few particulars almost the exact phraseology, as between this measure and the unemployment benefits sections of the United Kingdom act, but here is a point on which there is quite a difference. In Canada the waiting period is nine days, whereas the waiting period in the United Kingdom is only three days with respect to both entitlement to sickness benefit and entitlement to unemployment benefit. That is another matter it does seem to me should be considered, something that is properly a subject for consideration when dealing with this measure as what it is, namely an unemployment insurance act. Because of these three suggestions, and others that have been presented during the course of this debate, I strongly support the suggestion of my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East, and I hope the minister is giving consideration to the idea that after second reading this bill should be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations.

At the outset of my remarks I indicated that there is another way to look at this measure, another heading under which to offer criticisms. Some of those criticisms have already been offered, but I want it to be recognized that in doing so we are pointing to something that is admittedly not feasible within an act which is only an unemployment insurance act. Certainly it is clear that the operation of this act has pointed to the need for at least two other features in our whole social security set-up. As many hon. members have pointed out, one of the principal difficulties facing many workers is that they find themselves paying insurance to protect themselves against unemployment arising from the lack of jobs, but many find themselves unemployed not for that reason but because of illness. No matter how much we may try to point out that in such case they cannot receive benefits under this bill because actuarially they are only paying for unemployment insurance, still it is a let-down and a source of disillusionment to them, just as in the case of the farmer who insures against hail but finds that half a dozen other things come to re-destroy his crop. So that the operation of this act is certainly pointing up—and I am sure the minister would agree with me, if only he would fight for it within the government of which he is a member—the need of an over-all programme of social security.

In the past, we in this section of the house have had a good deal to say about the over-all programme of New Zealand and the over-all programme being developed in Australia. I should now like to say a word about the national insurance bill that was enacted by the parliament of the United Kingdom just this year. I have here a number of documents connected with the bill, the actual bill itself and certain command papers outlining the main provisions of the national insurance scheme in the United Kingdom. Part of the explanatory material is as follows:

The bill provides for a unified and comprehensive scheme of national insurance, which will eventually cover practically everyone in Great Britain, and will give the following benefits: Sickness benefit, unemployment benefit, maternity benefits . . .

And there are three types of maternity benefits set out. Then it refers to widows' benefits, of which three types are described. Following this, we find mention of guardian's allowance, retirement pension and death grant.

I could go into details respecting the amounts paid, the benefits received back, and we could get into arguments back and forth. But the chief point of difference between this scheme and the scheme now being brought into effect in the United Kingdom, which is similar to the ones in New Zealand and in Australia, is that in these other parts of the commonwealth there is an over-all scheme which insures the people of those countries, not against only one of the things which might happen to them, but against all those things over which they have no control. It gives to those people the feeling, not that they are paying taxes from which they may receive no benefits—along the lines of the complaints voiced by hon. members to-day—but rather that they are contributing to a national pool out of which they will receive protection against any of those things which may happen to them and over which they can have no control.

Precisely because the Unemployment Insurance Act has been in operation, but does not go far enough, the government must realize, as the people do, that this kind of thing is sorely needed in our national economy, and I hope the minister will fight for it in the government of which he is a member, and not leave the matter to the government which will some day take the place of the present one.

The other point emphasized in connection with the operation of the act was referred to by the minister yesterday afternoon. I refer particularly to what the minister is reported to have said at page 3105 of Hansard for July 3, when he was discussing the whole question of suitable employment. Let me pick out only a sentence or two:

Or a man who has reached retirement age for a given occupation cannot hold out for employment of that kind. Similarly, there are certain skills which were required during the war which have little or no place in a peace-time economy. Then there are always circumstances peculiar to an individual claimant . . .

As I listened to the minister yesterday and read his speech to-day, it seemed to me there was a recognition of the fact that unemployment insurance is only a last-ditch protection, and that what is needed, despite what has been said by the hon. member who just preceded me—and I shall say a word about his remarks in a minute—is a programme which will provide for full employment.

I take second place to no one, not even to the previous speaker, in my insistence that the hours of work of our Canadian people should be reduced, and reduced far beyond any goals we have yet tried to establish. The aim of life is not just that of working to eat and eating to work, ad infinitum; surely it is on a higher level than that. But I believe we should realize that when we advocate full employment we are not thinking of employment as an end in itself but rather as a means to bring about the provision of a sufficient quantity of goods and services so that our people can live a life on a higher standard, as has been envisioned by so many of us.

That is not all that can be said about employment. It is also to be noted that employment signifies participation by the people of a community such as ours in the production of the things that they, in turn, can enjoy. The fact is that employment is not an end in itself but an index of whether or not we are achieving our goal of production, and thus a steadily rising standard of living. Unemployment insurance will not do that, but full employment will.

Mr. KUHL: What is full employment? Define it for us. Is it eight hours a day, or twenty?

Mr. KNOWLES: It might be eight or twenty or even two.

Mr. KUHL: Who will determine that?

Mr. KNOWLES: Full employment is the use of our energy and our resources to produce as high a standard of living as the people of this country want. That is not clap-trap; rather it is a matter of taking an attitude of responsibility. I say, too, that in a world such as this which is torn asunder, a world which is lacking in goods and services and in which there is so much suffering, starvation and want, there is a moral responsibility placed upon the human race to do a bit of work and to attempt to produce a quantity of goods sufficient to make possible a better life the world over.

Along with that, by all means let us aim at a reduction in the hours of labour. Let us aim at the elimination of drudgery, and let us realize that the man who, of necessity, must work even at the most menial task, or a task involving the greatest amount of drudgery, is, after all, a human being entitled to the same spiritual, cultural and social amenities and privileges in life as any other person.

We are not going to accomplish this by falling back on unemployment insurance. The difficulties mentioned yesterday afternoon by the minister, when he explained how we must be prepared in many instances to settle down to lower rates of pay in order to have suitable employment, and his reference to the fact that certain people who developed war-time skills have had to accept occupations in which those skills were not required, suggest that we need, not just a measure to fall back on, but an aggressive policy designed to increase employment, and for the production of all the goods and services we can possibly produce.

We shall achieve that purpose only when we accept as our aim, not production for greater profit, but production for the use and needs of our people. I leave the subject at that, in the hope that the minister will agree to the suggestion that the bill go to the standing committee on industrial relations. If this is done the provisions of the bill can be dealt with in detail, and needed improvements made. I have in mind particularly the rates of benefit, the defining of suitable employment, and shortening the length of the waiting period. We could also discuss in that committee those further steps we must take to achieve a proper economy and a proper degree of social security for our people, toward which unemployment insurance is only a short step.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1 —Working week.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before we proceed to debate the bill in committee, I should like on two grounds to offer objections to the consideration of this bill in the manner in which the government now proposes to proceed with it. I had hoped that before second reading was given to the bill the minister would have given some explanation for the government's reasons for referring this bill to committee of the whole. In my opinion, this bill is one which should properly be sent to the committee on industrial relations.

When the unemployment insurance bill was before the house in 1940 a great deal of information was obtained and there was a great breadth of discussion which took place and which proved of exceptional value to the country as a whole. Not since 1941 has industry, labour or the public had an opportunity of appearing before a committee of the House of Commons. The minister was not the minister at that time, but I know he has read the proceedings of the committee of 1941. I am sure he will agree that there have been few committees of this house which have done more valuable work in the interests of industry, labour and the public generally. I think we are entitled to ask the government to send this bill to a similar committee.

There are many things that cannot be done in committee of the whole, such as the examination of witnesses and the like. In addition, there is a time element involved. The whole House of Commons is anxious to proceed as quickly as it is humanly possible with the work of parliament in order that we may be finished before the end of the year. This is a time when valuable time should be saved if at all possible. By sending this bill to a committee, not only could the time of the house be saved but valuable contributions would be made to the evidence which was presented to the committee in 1941.

The committee of 1941 was dealing with a wartime situation and we are now being asked to deal with this whole question of unemployment insurance from a peacetime point of view. I ask the minister to send this measure to the committee on industrial relations, and I base my request on the two grounds I have given. I think they are of sufficient weight to warrant his not overlooking the objections which have been made from this side of the house. I ask the minister, I appeal to the minister, I urge the minister to alter his decision with respect to this bill and move that it be sent to the committee on industrial relations.

Mr. MITCHELL: I had intended to answer some of the questions which had been put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and other hon. members. I have no objection to sending this bill to a committee, as is suggested by the acting leader of the opposition. I am in the hands of the house in that connection. However, I would point out that recently there was a meeting of the advisory committee of the commission. Public hearings were held, and the organizations interested had an opportunity of appearing before that committee and making whatever representations they wished.

At this late stage in the session we want expedition. After all, there are only three major changes being made in the act. One is the amendment dealing with merchant seamen; the second covers the powers given to the minister in connection with the employment service, and the third fundamental change is the amendment which grants the right to a person to earn $1.50 a day instead of $1 and still receive the benefits.

I must take the advice of lawyers, and we have endeavoured to rearrange this bill so as to make it understandable. It looks like a lengthy piece of legislation; but, as I say, there are only three fundamental changes. If my hon. friends desire that it be sent to the committee, I am quite prepared to have the bill sent there. I would point out that there are many committees sitting at the moment, and I do not think we could get witnesses to come before this committee in less than two weeks. This is holiday time for most people, with the exception of members of the house and officials of civil service who are advising us—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is coming soon.

Mr. MITCHELL: We hope so. I am simply pointing out the practical difficulties. Any question of increases in rates must, of necessity go before the advisory committee. That is a matter requiring long study; it is something that could not be done overnight in a committee of the House of Commons. I am in agreement with my hon. friends; I should like to have the benefits as high as they possibly can be within the realm of sound administration. One hon. gentleman referred this afternoon to non-contributory unemployment insurance. We have battled that out in this country. Some seem to think that it is the easiest thing in the world to take everything out of the barrel and put nothing in. The labour and employer organizations of this country understand the basic principles of contributory unemployment insurance.

Mr. KUHL: Share the poverty.

Mr. MITCHELL: Share the poverty; share the sense. Perhaps my hon. friend would start off by being sensible.

Mr. KUHL: You will learn by and by.

Mr. MITCHELL: We are trying to be sensible about this, not humorous. If hon. gentlemen want this bill to go to a committee I have no objection. Frankly, I think there will be more expedition if we proceed with the bill at the present time. The meetings of the committee might be long delayed and we could not get the bill back to the house within a reasonable time. The amendments affecting returned veterans and merchant seamen are of fundamental importance at the present time. What I am fearful of is that we may run into difficulty and the session may be prolonged. The hon. member for Vancouver East who knows more about unemployment insurance than any hon. member in this house—

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot admit that.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. members who have spoken this afternoon are interested, like myself, in this matter. Those hon. members will be in the front rank when we are discussing the questions I have just mentioned. I think we can carry on that discussion just as easily here and do it once, rather than allow the bill to go to a committee where the matter would be discussed, and then be discussed again in committee of the whole.

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree with the hon. member for Peel that this bill should be sent to a committee and I do not think it would delay the work of the house. The Minister of Labour has said that there are only three major changes, but that is not the important feature in connection with unemployment insurance. It is the parts that have not been changed that we are worrying about, not the parts that are changed. The two national labour bodies and the running trade have their national offices here and could make representations to the committee in a short time.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would point out that the two labour organizations to which my hon. friend refers appeared before the advisory committee only two weeks ago. I repeat, if my hon. friends feel that the bill should go before this committee, I am ready to consent.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, I have consulted with the acting leader of the opposition and with the—I think—acting leader of the C.C.F., and it has been decided that we proceed.

This afternoon there were one or two matters raised which I should like to clean up right away. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard asked about the numbers receiving benefits. During the month of May a total of 127,866 persons received benefit payments amounting to $5,221,870, or 2,719,245 compensated unemployed days, compared with 158,168 persons who were paid $7,011,579 for 3,446,271 compensated unemployed days during April; and 22,294 persons were paid $672,869 for 349,996 unemployed days in May, 1945. The average duration of the unemployment compensated was, then, 21·3 days in May, 1946, 21·8 days in April, 1946, and 16·4 days during May, 1945. The average amount of benefits paid per beneficiary was $40.84 in May, 1946, $44.33 in April, 1946, and $31.60 in May, 1945. The average amount of benefits paid per compensated unemployed day was $1.92 in May, 1946, $2.03 in April, 1946, and $1.92 in May, 1945.

Mr. MERRITT: Did the minister say that the average time for each unemployed person in receipt of benefits was sixteen days?

Mr. MITCHELL: No; 21·3 days in May, 1946, 21·8 days in April, 1946, and 16·4 days during May, 1945.

The hon. member for Grey North spoke about nurses. Nurses have been covered under the act since 1943; that is, excepting practical nurses. That takes care of that benefit. The hon. member for Lincoln raised a point about students. That is an insurable risk, and the benefits accrue while they are working in industry. For reasons best known to themselves those benefits are maintained for five years. The average cost of the benefit is about six cents a day. In an insurance item like unemployment it is necessary to cover everybody, and that is the reason why nurses and students are covered similarly with other persons in industry.

Mr. LOCKHART: What I was trying to get at is, why the exception in one department and not in the other?

Mr. MITCHELL: One is income tax, and the other is the risk involved in unemployment.

Mr. LOCKHART: It seemed inconsistent to me.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 6. Carried.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if you would go a little more slowly. We have had this bill before us for only a few hours. We cannot follow it as fast as you can read it.

The CHAIRMAN: I will read a little more slowly.

Section agreed to.

On section 7.

Mr. KNOWLES: Section 7 is really the substitution of new clauses for sections all the way from 27 to 49. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, you might call them individually.

The CHAIRMAN: Under the general heading in section 7 is the whole of new section 27, "Right of insured person to insurance benefit." "Payment of benefit where applicant a juvenile, a person of unsound mind, or deceased."

Mr. MacINNIS: Before we leave new section 27, this section defines conditions of receiving benefit. It states—

(b) capable of and available for work; and
(c) unable to obtain suitable employment.

There has been some discussion of this matter of "suitable employment," and I would ask the minister to explain the procedure now followed in ascertaining whether the employment offered to a person in receipt of benefits is suitable employment or is not suitable employment, and under what circumstances a person is denied benefit if he does not accept the "suitable employment" offered by the commission.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have here a brief dealing specially with that, which I might read:

In view of the provisions of the act and the conditions resulting from the war the commission has taken the view that a reasonable interpretation can be made along the following lines:

1. Where claimants have had technical training and experience in a skilled occupation they should be allowed a considerable period to find work in their own occupation before being required to make a complete change in their occupation and sacrifice their training and experience. The extent of the change of occupation involved would have a bearing on the interval allowed. For certain specified groups of skilled workers, the commission has instructed its offices to allow a period of three months before a change of occupation is insisted upon, provided that employment in the claimant's usual occupation has a place in a peace-time economy and that he is not barred from the occupation by reasons of age, physical deterioration, et cetera.

2. Occupations which have many of the same characteristics may be segregated into groups. If employment is not available in the claimant's usual occupation he may be offered employment in another occupation in the group in which his usual occupation falls. Because of the similarity of the occupations in this grouping a comparatively short period of unemployment is a reasonable interval.

3. The extent of the contrast between wages and conditions of work in the usual occupation and the other occupation has a bearing on the period allowed before a change of occupation was insisted upon. The commission does not require claimants imemdiately to accept very much lower rates of wages. However, following the war period the employment available for some of them may use only pre-war skills and may be at lower rates of wages than those to which they have become accustomed during the war. The period allowed for a change of occupation which includes a lower rate is therefore made progressive. For instance, employment in another occupation at a wage rate of 5 cents an hour lower is considered suitable for some claimants after three weeks of unemployment, while an occupation paying a wage rate of 10 cents an hour lower would be considered suitable only after four weeks of unemployment.

4. Other factors taken into account by the commission are the number of years the claimant has been employed in his usual occupation, provided it is a skilled occupation; distance of work offered from the claimant's home; prospect's of work in his own occupation, either in his own district or in another district; domestic responsibilities of the claimant and adaptability of the claimant, particularly where employment is in another part of the country.

5. Workers discharged from purely war work in plants, for example, shell-filling plants, where there are few if any similar skills required in peace-time industry, may be offered employment in another occupation with practically no interval allowed.

6. Persons who have been transferred from one part of the country to another to engage in war industry and who choose to return to the areas in which they formerly resided, may reasonably be expected to accept any work available in those areas without any interval.

7. Workers trained in specific war jobs with previous experience in some other occupation should be allowed only a short interval before being required to accept employment in an occupation in which they have had some experience.

In addition to that, we have set up across the country courts of referees composed of a chairman and representatives of the trade union and employers, and from these courts of referees there is a further appeal to the umpire. Probably my hon. friends have had more complaints than I have, but as a rule any complaints that are made funnel into the minister's office and those I have received up to now have been few and far between. In Great Britain they have had the same difficulty with much longer experience than we have had. We are just moving into what might be called the administrative period in the application of unemployment insurance. With the end of the war and the reconversion of industry, a measure of unemployment in any country that was engaged in the war—any free country at least—is inevitable, and in Great Britain they have had a measure of unemployment. To-day there are between four hundred thousand and five hundred thousand people registered for unemployment insurance, notwithstanding the fact that there the labour situation is much tighter than in Canada. I would assume that, in the light of the experience gained by the courts of referees and by the umpire, we shall be able to build up a system of precedents that will permit the orderly administration of this difficult aspect of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Frankly, I do not believe that we have had enough experience because in this country this is a virgin field of a kind that does not exist in Great Britain, where they have not the same seasonal employments that we have in the dominion. However, I think it can be stated that the courts of referees, the insurance officers, and the umpire will, in the course of the day-by-day application of this vital and difficult aspect of the administration of this measure, build up a method of procedure which, in the light of experience, will meet the situation in Canada. We have at the moment seven thousand cases before boards of referees.

Mr. MacINNIS: The act provides for the training of persons who have lost employment, in order to fit them for other work. Before a person is compelled to take what the commission regards as suitable employment, what provision is made to train such persons for such employment if they are not already fully qualified?

Mr. MITCHELL: That problem has not been a difficult one up to now. Of course we have thousands of veterans in training under the jurisdiction of my department. We have not so many civilian war workers. One of the most amazing things is this. At the collapse of Japan I had jurisdiction over the selection, and power of direction, of the men and women in the industrial and agricultural life of the country. I came to the conclusion, against the advice of many people, that the quicker we got rid of these controls, the better it would be for Canada, and in about four months we put more than a million people, through the employment service, into the employment stream of Canada, which is an indication—if we get suitable labour relations—of the ability of this country to face up to the problems of peace and a measure of full employment. Of course we are interfered with by conditions in other countries. The coal strike in the United States, and more particularly the steel strike, had a great impact upon employment conditions in Canada. But we expect, should the need arise, to be able to expand the application of the training of war workers in vocations necessary to fit them into the industrial and commercial life of the country. The pressure, however, has not been great up to now.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can the minister explain how the new part of subsection 2 of the clause operates?

. . . in the case of a deceased person or a person of unsound mind, benefit may be paid to any person who, in the opinion of the commission, is equitably entitled thereto . . .

Under what conditions would benefits accruing to a deceased person be paid to someone else?

Mr. MITCHELL: The benefit due to him when he dies is paid to his heirs.

Mr. MacINNIS: That means that if he dies while drawing benefits they will accrue to his heirs?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. JAENICKE: "Is equitably entitled thereto". What does that mean? I can understand "legally entitled".

Mr. MITCHELL: It simply means that he is not getting the benefit under false pretenses. There are sometimes cases where people do get benefits under false petenses.

Mr. PROBE: I was interested in what the minister said with regard to the terms under which his department might consider employment suitable. There is in the February issue of his official publication, the Labour Gazette, a case which I should like to have him comment upon briefly—CU-B44. In this case an instrument mechanic was receiving seventy cents an hour and, presumably on the basis of a forty-four hour week, would receive $30.80 a week. When the work in the aircraft plant in which she was engaged was discontinued, work was offered her subsequently through the employment service at $15.30 a week. She appealed to the court of referees and the decision that was given was, in effect, that this was considered suitable employment. The job offered was an elevator operator's job at $15.30, which in my province is below the minimum wage. If that is what the minister had in mind as suitable alternative employment, it seems to me that this clause does not mean a great deal. Were there any extenuating circumstances in this case? It is printed here and therefore I judge that it is a type case.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not familiar with the case to which my hon. friend is referring. Apparently it was the decision of the umpire. A good many factors may enter into it—what the worker did before the war, the interval of unemployment during which benefits were drawn, and so on. All these things will enter into it. My hon. friend can see that if it is the decision of the umpire it came up through the boards of referees in Regina, was it?

Mr. PROBE: That I cannot say. It was in the Labour Gazette and I took it to be typical.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend would like to see the full judgment I shall be glad to get it for him.

Mr. FULTON: This new section 27 refers to insured persons. For the sake of information, would the minister outline briefly the history behind the apparently traditional exception of agricultural employees from the category of insured persons? It is important in our province where agricultural work is seasonal work. I am sure there are difficulties.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not desire to take up too much of the time of the committee, but those of us who followed the establishment of unemployment insurance in Great Britain will remember that it started off with six trades covered, if my memory serves me rightly. We started off with a much larger coverage than that. In commencing their scheme in Great Britain, they were fortunate in that there was comparatively full employment. We were fortunate in Canada in that we were able to build up a fund because there was comparatively full employment in this country. In Great Britain, where they have social cohesion and climatic conditions somewhat different from what they are in Canada, where employment in farming is more or less looked upon as a trade or calling, it was twenty-five years after the inception of the plan in that country before agriculture was brought within the orbit of unemployment insurance. I hope it will not take twenty-five years for us to do it in Canada, particularly in my hon. friend's province where climatic conditions beyond the coastal range are similar to what they are in Great Britain and in New Zealand, in that there are not the great extremes of climate which we have in eastern Canada. In the light of the length of time since the inception of the plan in Canada the tempo of movement in the coverage under the act has been far greater than in any other country that I know of. Certainly it has moved with greater expedition than in Great Britain.

Mr. FULTON: The minister then looks forward to the day when agricultural workers will be covered?

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly; I look forward to the day when every man and woman working gainfully in this country will be under the scheme.

Mr. MERRITT: Would the minister answer the question I asked him on second reading with regard to insurance officers? Do they take their instructions from the minister or from the unemployment insurance commission? Whose employees are they?

Mr. MITCHELL: They take their instructions from the commission.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who are the members of the commission?

Mr. MITCHELL: The members are Mr. L. J. Trottier, chairman, Mr. R. J. Tallon, nominated by labour, and Mr. George W. Ritchie, who is the nominee of the employers' association. Mr. Tallon is from Calgary, Mr. Trottier from Montreal, and Mr. Ritchie from Toronto.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has the memorandum on the question of suitable employment from which the minister read a little while ago been given publicity? Has it acquired the force of law? Perhaps one way to get that answer is to ask whether in dealing with these matters the referees go back to the act and make their own interpretation, or are they governed by the principles in the memorandum which the minister read?

Mr. MITCHELL: These are for insurance officers only; the referees, of course, go back to the act.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister knows that some of us are quite worried about this memorandum. I hope he will not say that we are being political. I say that before he does, because it is a matter of deep concern. A good many trade unionists who are not necessarily political have spoken to me about it. Let me be quite frank about it. Having made that preface, may I say that I have had trade unionists come to me in Winnipeg and say that these instructions which have been given to insurance officers seem to have the effect of depressing wages. It looks as though the government is trying to say to war workers, the party is over and you might as well accept the inevitable and come down to these lower rates of pay. There are cases such as that which my colleague, the hon. member for Regina City referred to, and one or two about which I have written the minister. They are people who were in war work, and they were told to take employment at lower wages. It was done on the basis of this memorandum which says that five cents an hour less might be suitable employment after three weeks, and ten cents an hour less might be suitable employment after four weeks. These provisions, if not properly understood, do give rise to the feeling that the government is saying to workers, accept the inevitable and come down to a lower wage rate in the post-war period.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me say this without equivocation. This government has no idea of that kind in mind whatsoever. I am speaking of the government now. Let us wipe that completely out of our minds.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish you could wipe out the memorandum.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is all right. I shall come to the memorandum in a minute. There is the other side of the medal, namely, administration. This is not sentiment; it is administration. If my hon. friend has had any trade union experience he knows that you have difficulties and complexities in connection with unemployment benefits in trade unions. There has to be a rational administration, or else the unemployment benefits go down the drain and it is not solvent. Unfortunately all people are not honest. The memorandum is merely a guide. After the insurance officer has made his decision, the employee has the right to go before a board of referees composed of an equal representation of labour and management with an impartial chairman. In my experience I have found that if you have a good case you need have no fear of going before a tribunal of that description. If employees do not get from the board of referees what they consider to be justice they still have the right to appeal to the umpire. I do not think I can say much more than that. I am a great believer in the system of adjudicating disputes. We would have less trouble in the industrial field to-day if the orgainzations we set up, composed of employees and employers, were given the respect to which they are entitled by people who ask for representation on these boards or commissions or whatever the case may be.

If my hon. friends have any suggestions to make—and no doubt next year in the light of experience they will have—we shall be glad to receive them. We shall find difficulties arise, and we shall possibly find out that some of our approaches to the problem are not in the best interests of the people concerned. My hon. friend can rest assured that as far as I am concerned—and I am sure that this is true of every hon. member—what we have in mind, and nothing else, is that the man who is entitled to insurance by right, because he has contributed to it, shall have every ounce of justice to which he is entitled. We cannot go much farther than that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just this further word; I appreciate the position the minister is taking, and he is being perfectly logical so far as the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act is concerned. But I want to say that the man who has lost his employment at a fairly good wage rate and is forced to take employment at a lower wage rate does not regard it as the last word in justice merely to get his unemployment insurance, which is a lower rate still. He wants another job at a rate somewhat comparable with that which he had during the war. My concern with this memorandum is not so much that it is vitiating the Unemployment Insurance Act as that trade unionists feel that it has a depressing effect on the wage level generally.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Perhaps I was wrong, but I took it from the minister this afternoon that this memorandum had been withdrawn. Is it still in force?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am referring to the memorandum which was referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. KNOWLES: The one the minister read from a while ago.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; it is in operation.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is the one the minister did not want to table last fall. It was secret then.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can give my hon. friend a copy of it. There is no secret about it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not now; I already have it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It says that work which may not be suitable this week may be suitable next week, perhaps at five cents an hour less, or that two weeks later it may be suitable at possibly ten cents an hour less. From what the minister said I took it that the memorandum had been withdrawn.

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It is still in force?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Then I must agree with the hon. member who just took his seat that it does leave a bad taste in the mouths of employees when they know of the existence of such a recommendation to the board. From what the minister said a moment ago I do not believe that is his intention. He gave the word of the government that it was not the intention that people should go to work for less; but this memorandum definitely directs the officers to offer work one week, and if it should be found unsuitable because of lower wages it indicates that the same work might be offered to the same individuals the following week. The inference to be taken might well be that since they will be a little harder up by then they will be more susceptible to the offer. I do not think any other interpretation could be put upon it. The minister said a moment ago, and I take his word, that this was not the intention; but most assuredly anyone reading the memorandum can take no other meaning from it. Then, if you take what the minister said yesterday, that what is not suitable to-day may well be suitable a month from to-day, and put the two together, you would almost think the minister was supporting this memorandum, though I do not think he is. So that I believe it would be only fair to the workers and to the minister himself—because this will be a difficult thing to administer—to withdraw the memorandum and replace it with something else that would give a clearer indication of the government's policy. This is a most dangerous and most unsatisfactory thing to leave in the hands of the officers.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let me ask my hon. friend this very simple question. What would he do with a woman welder in an aeroplane plant who, prior to the war, had been a domestic servant?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Let her get married, if she wants to.

Mr. MITCHELL: All right; if my hon. friend would put that in the memorandum.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister is now trying to evade the question. Here the board has definite instructions—

Mr. MITCHELL: No, it is not the board. That is a guide to insurance officers.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Well, perhaps I used the wrong term. Here is a guide to the insurance officers. It is not only a guide; it is more of a directive.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, it is not.

Mr. JOHNSTON: You might almost call it a directive. Here they are directed that they can offer men work and, if it is not suitable, they can just sit back and say, "Well, we will wait for a week and perhaps then he will be more susceptible." Then, when the man comes back a week later he may find the wage rate lower still. I think the influence is bad, and I believe the minister agrees with me. In my opinion he would be well advised and the officers of his department would be well advised to have that memorandum withdrawn entirely and something more palatable put in its place.

Mr. MITCHELL: As I pointed out, nobody is all-wise, but we all try to be fair. That is not a directive; it is merely a guide. In my hon. friend's own province of Alberta a good many people left agriculture and went into war industries for reasons best known to themselves, patriotism and what have you. With the contraction of war industry and the shortage of farm labour, they have been given the privileges that were extended during the war, in that they did not have to enter the armed forces as long as they remained in agriculture and moved backward and forward between agriculture and war industry according to the season. Under those circumstances and in a democracy I think they should go back to agriculture. I have pointed out that there is a tremendous shortage of farm labour, and we must not forget that in Alberta we are still using German prisoners of war and conscientious objectors. You cannot laugh that off, as an administrative responsibility.

As I say, I am not responsible for this; it is the responsibility of the unemployment insurance commission, but they are dealing with a difficult problem. I think I have given this analogy in the house before, but it is like a man writing a piece of music. He thinks it is fine when it is on paper, but when it is played on the organ it may not sound quite so good.

Mr. GRAYDON: It depends on who is playing the organ.

Mr. MITCHELL: That might be true. It is the same with an act of parliament, the constitution of a farmers' organization, a trade union or a fraternal society; the only way to find out whether a thing works is to play it on the organ. In this case we are dealing with applicants for unemployment insurance benefits. I think I can say that the commission as such do not want to do anything that is not fair and just. If, in the light of experience, this does not work successfully, no doubt the commission will change its guide to the insurance officers. It must be remembered, however, that they do not have the final word. There is always the court of referees and then the umpire. Having had some experience in the appointment of these courts of referees across this country and some knowledge of the people who make them up, I feel certain that claimants for insurance benefits will be treated with justice and fairness. After all, it is a human thing.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I preface the question I am going to ask the minister by making two statements. First, I want to say that in any event, as far as I am concerned the minister may take it that I appreciate the difficulties of administering the Unemployment Insurance Act; as I said this afternoon, first, because it is new legislation operating in practically a new field, without experienced administrators or experienced staff. The second thing I should like him to know is that as far as I am concerned I will not try to press upon him anything I would not do or try to do myself in the circumstances. I do not think I need say anything more to prove my fairness in dealing with this matter. But I think we as a parliament must be vigilant in these things because, as my hon. friends to my right are so careful to point out on every possible occasion, bureaucratic boards may get into the habit of ordering people around. Consequently we have to be on guard here and, if there is any need for criticism, we should offer that criticism as a guide and suggestions to those boards. That is the way in which I approach the matter. I do not for one moment doubt the sincerity and the desire of the unemployment insurance commission to administer this act fairly and efficiently. I have had some correspondence with them. I have also held conversation with them, and I am convinced on that point.

But in this circular 34 there is an item which the minister did not read. I should imagine he has not read it all, and I am not suggesting that his not having read it is any indication that he has tried to hold anything back. Section 11 at page 3 of the copy I have states:

> If an applicant is seeking employment in an occupation which is no longer found in his locality, he must be prepared to change his residence if he still desires work in that occupation.

What help is given a person under these circumstances who may have to move from one locality to another? He may be put off unemployment insurance benefits, and move to another area.

Mr. MITCHELL: Under the wartime regulations we established extensive arrangements to pay the fares of people moving from one part of the country to another. The commission has the power to advance those fares.

Mr. PROBE: I wish to refer back to the unfinished symphony to which the minister referred a minute ago because, as near as I can see, it is working out, not as a symphony, but as a raucous discord. I still wish to emphasize that in the cases cited by the Labour Gazette, which are considered satisfactory I have no doubt, or they would not be printed here—they are type cases—a person who was receiving $30.80 a week for a normal 44-hour week is directed into employment at $15.30 a week. Those are the facts in connection with case CU-B44 of June 27 of last year. I maintain that the policy which the minister has explained, and which apparently he is translating into instructions to his insurance officers, his courts of referees and his umpires, is doing nothing but degrade the wage scale across this country. I say that $15.30 a week is below the minimum wage of our province; and if that is suitable employment in the opinion of the Minister of Labour, then I say he is far from the right track, so far as getting a labour symphony is concerned.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us get on with that symphony. My hon. friend is quite clear in what he says. I do not know the case he is talking about, but I understand the figures he has given. Let me tell him what the change has been. There is an appeal to the court of referees and then an appeal to the umpire. My hon. friend is not suggesting to me that I should tell the umpire what to do, is he?

Mr. PROBE: Well—

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a minute; you have had your say. Just sit down for five minutes. I shall give figures to support my contention. I do not know the case he has mentioned, but I say that I never would be afraid to go before an impartial umpire or arbitrator if I had a good case. If one comes to the courts with clean hands, that is all he requires.

Out of 145,000 claims there were 7,000 appeals to courts of referees; and out of those 7,000 there were only forty appeals to umpires. When you are operating in a big way, that is not a bad record.

Mr. PROBE: I would say it is good.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not bad. I do not know anything about this girl about whom my hon. friend speaks. I do not know what she did before the war. My hon. friend probably knows her better than I do.

Mr. PROBE: I wish I did.

Mr. MITCHELL: He has said that she is an instrument maker.

Mr. PROBE: That is what the Labour Gazette says.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, she claims to be an instrument maker; but she may be the only person in the world who thinks she is an instrument maker.

Mr. PROBE: May I say—

Mr. MITCHELL: Just a minute, now. The mere fact that it is on paper is not proof, and any person who has had experience in industrial operations appreciates that. Before the war she may have been a stenographer or a domestic servant on a Saskatchewan farm; I do not know what she did. However, I will say this, that I have set up a good many boards and commissions; but I have not yet taken the position that, once established, I should tell them what to do. A procedure of that kind would be in direct contradiction of everything our institutions stand for, everything we believe in.

Mrs. STRUM: Has the minister any way of ascertaining whether or not these claims are correct? I dislike the implication in the minister's remarks to the effect that people who fill in these papers are falsifying the record.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend got that impression, I am sorry. What I meant to imply was that sometimes they do; it is possible. Human nature is a peculiar thing; it ebbs and flows, and there are variations of it.

Mrs. STRUM: Yes; I understand all that.

Mr. MITCHELL: But I am not suggesting for one minute that people make out these claims dishonestly. I do not believe that, and neither does anyone else in the chamber. Unfortunately, however, once in a while somebody robs a bank.

Mrs. STRUM: My question was: Have you any way of checking on these applications?

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought I had explained that.

Mrs. STRUM: No; you just told me about human nature.

Mr. MITCHELL: And if I may say so, to my hon. friend, human nature is sometimes a strange thing.

Mrs. STRUM: I am talking about checking the records.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, there is a record, absolutely.

Mr. CARDIFF: I understand that unemployment insurance does not apply to farm labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is so.

Mr. CARDIFF: How will it apply to farm labour that was induced to enter industry last fall and to work there all winter, after the farming operations were completed? Were those men sent back to the farms, where they belonged, or are they now under unemployment insurance?

Mr. MITCHELL: I assume that most of them went back to agriculture; at least I hope they did. Of course, during the war my department had power of direction. We could insist that when they left the farms in the winter and entered industry they were to go back to the farms in the summer. But, as my hon. friend knows, shortly after the collapse of Japan those regulations were repealed, and there is free employment of labour in Canada at the present time.

Mr. CARDIFF: I believe that was true during the war years. But the trouble is that at the present time it is utterly impossible to get farm labour. Why? One reason is that the farmers cannot afford to pay the wages being paid in industry. Another reason is that farm labour was taken into industry a year or so ago and has not been sent back.

Mr. HAZEN: Speaking of robbing the bank, I believe there are some instances where unemployment insurance has been taken advantage of by the very people whom it is intended to benefit. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister a case which recently came to my notice. This man owned or operated a farm and, after hostilities commenced, he obtained employment in war work. At that time he made over his farm to his wife without any consideration and she continued to look after the farming operation. When the war ended, his employment with the company he had been working with ceased. He has since been working on the farm, which is owned by his wife, during the daytime, and after six o'clock he goes to work as an electrician. During this period he has been drawing unemployment insurance at the rate of $14.40 a week.

I am informed that he is able to do this because he is actually working in the day time on a farm. When he went to fill in the form he stated that he was working on the farm during the daytime when actually he is working also as an electrician after six o'clock at night. I will not say that he has been getting away with something, but the fact is he is getting $14.40 a week when he is working on a farm in the daytime and continuing his employment as electrician at night. This man does not think he is doing anything wrong, because the advertisements and notices that have gone out from the employment service have led him to believe that he has a credit of so many dollars and he thinks he has a right to draw on that. I think loopholes of this sort should be sealed up and the regulations redrawn and the forms prepared in such a manner that this sort of thing cannot happen.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would think that individual had made a false declaration and, if my hon. friend will give me the name privately, I shall be glad to have the commission look into the matter. Under the act as it stands, at the moment a person is entitled to earn $1 a day as subsidiary earnings, but if this farmer-electrician is holding down two jobs I should like to know who he is.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to make one more appeal to the minister to take up with the people who had to do with the drafting of this memorandum the matter of having it discarded or at least rewritten. I grant that there are some things in it that have to be there for the purposes of administration, but the tone of it has got under the skin of a good many trade union people. The minister replied to the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East in connection with a man seeking employment in an occupation which no longer offers employment in his own locality, by stating that the fares of people who move were paid. It is one thing to be willing to pay the fare of a person who wants to move, but is another thing to give the impression that a person must move or he will forfeit a right which he thinks he has because of having paid into a fund. There is another section a little further along in this bulletin No. 34, which reads:

> For example, it may not be expedient during the early days of unemployment to require him to take work in another district, but as the hopes of obtaining suitable employment in his home district diminish, work at a distance may have to be regarded as suitable.

It may be that something like that has to be included for the purposes of administration, but the minister knows as well as I that statements such as that have an effect upon working conditions and wage levels. I think I speak for all of us who have been objecting to this memorandum from this side of the house when I say that we do not rise to express the view that there is in this instance any need of a fundamental change in the Unemployment Insurance Act, but that the government should realize the wider implications and be on its guard against being responsible for the depressing of wage levels.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be glad to bring to the attention of the commission the observations of my hon. friends in connection with this document. I would point out that Canada is a continent, not a country. In a vast country like this you must have a measure of mobility of labour. At the present time I am moving people from Nova Scotia into the Maine woods. We are expecting to move farmers from western Canada to the east and eastern farmers to the west in order to get off the harvest. The hon. member for Vancouver East will remember that last fall we received an appeal from the city council about the congregation of labour in Vancouver, and at that time we considered it necessary that we render a measure of assistance to that municipality by providing for the migration back to where they came from of that labour which had come to that district for purely war industry purposes.

These things are not static; they are active. We must make every effort to place these people in gainful employment. My hon. friend has often spoken of conditions in Great Britain. After the previous war they had in South Wales and other districts, particularly in Barrow, what were referred to as depressed areas, and efforts were made to move labour from Barrow into other parts of the country.

In a country like Canada, with 12,000,000 people squatting on a continent, we cannot take the position where we can say, "Hamilton and no further", or Regina or Moose Jaw or what have you. I do not know how we could expect to make this country tick under those conditions. By the very nature of things we are bound to have stagnation in certain industries. An example of this was the aeroplane industry after the end of the war. It is necessary to provide for the movement of labour to other parts of the country where gainful employment can be found.

Mr. KNOWLES: I concur in the statement of the minister about providing for the mobility of labour, but what we are talking about is using language in connection with the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act to the effect that people must be prepared to move. It is the "must" we do not like.

Mr. JAQUES: I received a letter from a man in Montreal which I should like to read, and then I will ask the Minister of Labour his opinion of it. This letter is signed "John C. Wilson" and is headed, "A new serfdom." It reads:

> Do the veterans realize the shameless swindle which is to be put over them under the guise or mask of unemployment insurance? The correspondence columns of the Montreal papers should be read throughout Canada. In response to several complaints ("Jobless for four months, and not received a cent," et cetera, et cetera) the actual facts have been stated with admirable clearness in Montreal Daily Star of May 13 on page 3 by the assistant manager, Mr. Heffernan.

He quotes this by Mr. Heffernan:

> "Unless the job is accepted, the man will be disqualified from benefits for six weeks." Whatever his skill or qualifications, whether skilled mechanic or white-collar worker, "as long as the pay is within the minimum set by the province of Quebec, even if as an unskilled furniture-worker at 20 cents an hour, he will be disqualified."
> Not only so. "Every refusal thereafter, even during the six weeks, will add a similar period to his disqualification." Thus a skilled tradesman or even an accountant or professional man, who persistently refuses work at 20 cents an hour, will never receive a cent of unemployment insurance.
> If the proper English word for this is not "peonage," what is the correct word for it?

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will let me have the letter I shall be glad to look into it. I am sure that he cannot ask me, with about 2,300,000 people insured under this scheme, to know them all. But I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. JAQUES: But is it the fact, that highly skilled men will be forced to take any unskilled job?

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer to that is, no.

Section 7 (new section 27) agreed to.

Section 7 (new section 28) agreed to.

On section 7 (new section 29)—Periods not counted in computing unemployment.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is a section the hon. member for Vancouver East wants to speak about. It is one of the fundamental clauses. The amount is raised to $1.50 a day.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. I have no objection to that. That is not the point I wanted to ask the minister about. It says:

> An insured person shall be deemed not to be unemployed . . .

And then it goes on—

Mr. MITCHELL: That is the same as in the old act. There is only one change, namely to $1.50.

Mr. MacINNIS: I want the minister to make some changes. In the subparagraph relating to holidays, is everybody drawing unemployment benefits considered to be not unemployed on a holiday? I have had some experience in working, and sometimes I had to work longer on holidays than other days, and had to work Sundays. If holidays and Sundays are "out" as far as an unemployed person is concerned, he is not unemployed on those days because he is not supposed to be working on those days. But there are many people who work on Sundays. I worked for twenty-five years delivering milk and as conductor on a streetcar, and I had to work Sunday as well as week-days. If a person who delivers milk, in the western cities anyway, becomes unemployed, is it considered that he is not unemployed on Sundays?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am informed that this merely deals with short-term workers. The question my hon. friend raises comes in a later section. Since the original drafting of the act, we have taken care of it in these amendments. The 40-hour week was the exception to the rule, and the act defined a week as from Monday to Monday. But under the amendments later on in this bill, consideration is given to the hours of work of the normal week, rather than the week itself.

Mr. LOCKHART: Do I gather than a man can draw unemployment insurance and go out and pick up odd jobs so long as the remuneration does not exceed $1.50?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. It used to be $1; it is raised to $1.50.

Section 7 (new sections 29 and 30) agreed to.

On section 7 (new section 31—daily rate of benefit).

Mr. MERRITT: On this section, I understand that the unemployment insurance advisory committee has been considering changes in the rates of payments and changes in the contributions to make contributions of employers and employees equal each other. If that has been done; if that meeting which the minister referred to between the labour unions and those other persons who are interested and the advisory committee, which took place two weeks ago, has reached any conclusion on this quite important point, I am surprised that it is not included in the bill we have before us—the increase of rates which was found to be possible. What took place at that meeting and when may we expect the proposed increase to be placed in the statute?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have received the report of the advisory committee and in effect it extends the coverage and does in a minor way increase the rates to dependents. I am speaking now from memory. The bill had been drafted. The government decided that consideration should be given to that next year, probably, rather than this year. As my hon. friend knows, there is no restriction of coverage for anybody who works for an hourly, a piece-work or a daily wage. The coverage is restricted on persons in the salaried class running up to $2,400 a year. In the drafting of a bill like this, and the amendments, I want to be very frank in saying that the recommendations come at a period when we do not feel it advisable, particularly in the light of economic conditions at the moment, that the amendment should be made this year.

Mr. MERRITT: That statement surprises me, because I had understood that another class was to be added to the classes of payments which would be a class at a higher rate and would make higher contributions and would receive higher benefits. I feel sure that, as a result of our expenditures in the war, money rates of earnings are going to be much higher than they were before the war. It would seem to me that the sooner we get a new schedule of rates and benefits based upon present and possibly future money values rather than upon pre-war money values, not only will the individuals who come under the fund benefit in a way which is most important to them, in view of higher costs, but the fund itself, I believe, will benefit by the early application of the new provisions. The sooner the payments-in commenced, the better it would be both for the fund and for the people concerned. If the recommendations of the advisory committee are at all acceptable, I should feel quite strongly that the sooner they are introduced, the better—this session, if possible.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend speaks of money values. I think it is fair to say that money values on the North American continent at the moment are in a state of flux. We do not know what the value of the dollar will be twelve months from to-day.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister knows, though, does he not, that it is not going down?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am a little older than the hon. member, and I believe that what goes up must come down—even an aeroplane or a rubber ball. I went through this after the last war. I was talking to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is just back from New York, where butter at the moment is selling at $1.25 a pound. We do not know what is going to happen, and any prediction regarding the price structure on the other side of the line is simply a leap in the dark. If human nature follows the trend indicated after the last war, as the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said to-day, we may be in a very difficult position on the North American continent a year from now. Wherever you have inflation you have starvation and destitution later on. That goes for every country.

Mr. KUHL: Deflation.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend says "deflation." He has a peculiar brand of money theory with which I do not agree, but I will not argue that question with him this evening.

Mr. HANSELL: May I suggest that the minister stick to labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have the floor at the moment, and I do not wish to get into an argument on phony money at this moment any more than anyone else wants to argue about it just now. I have expressed my opinion and my hon. friends can express theirs. Let me say that the reason why we are moving with caution in the extension of coverage in respect of all these things is that we do not know what the relation will be a year from now between the present value of the dollar and the value of the dollar as it was in 1940, 1941, 1942 and 1943. No one can make any such prediction in view of what has happened in the United States in the last couple of weeks. They may be moving into an inflationary spiral with the inevitable collapse afterwards. We are living in peculiar times, and all I can say is that I trust that at this time next year conditions will be more stable than they are at the moment.

Mr. MERRITT: I had naturally thought, from what I have heard the minister say with regard to the government's price control policy and their ability to handle the situation, that the much feared deflation after inflation would not ensue. Apparently the minister is not so sure now when he comes to this point. Would he tell us whether or not the report of the advisory committee on these possible increases of rates and benefits took into consideration the uncertain state of financial affairs in the world? If the advisory committee have taken that question into consideration, then surely, they being concerned more than anyone else with the actuarial basis of the fund, their recommendation would be a safe one for the government to follow. It seems to me that there are already increases in the cost of various articles. If, therefore, these possible increases are withheld it will be a serious matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wonder if the advisory committee has given some thought to increasing the differential between the rate for a single person or a person without dependents and the rate for a person with dependents. If you look at these rates you will find that apparently it does not cost very much for a man to keep his wife, or vice versa, for the wife who is working to keep her husband. If a single man or woman is unemployed in category 2 the rate is $5.10 a week. If a married person, male or female, with a dependent is unemployed that person receives ninety cents extra, which brings it to $6. These rates that were set out in 1940 when the bill was passed should be revised upwards at least to the extent that the cost of living has gone up and to the extent that we feel it will go up within the next few months, though, of course, I realize that you cannot keep moving a scale of benefits of this kind up and down as the cost of living rises or falls a few points. The differential, however, is far too small, and I suggest that the advisory committee give thought to increasing it as between the person without dependents and the person with dependents. Has the minister at hand the percentage of benefits paid in each of the seven categories in which benefits are paid?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not before me at the moment but I will make inquiries.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is stated that the weekly rate of benefit shall be six times the daily rate. In many occupations now the week is a five-day week. In Ottawa many of the larger stores are closed all day Saturday, and the same is true of other cities. Many of the industries also operate on a five-day week. Has any arrangement been made to bring the act into conformity with the five-day week?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; that has been done. In the first section it has been provided for.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would this section not conflict with the other?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am informed that there is no conflict.

Mr. MERRITT: I am afraid I am not entirely satisfied on the point I was discussing. I see from new section 28 that the insured person does not receive a benefit unless he has contributed to the fund for a period of 180 days in the first two years. It would seem to me that if we delay in applying the new rates until the next session of parliament it will mean a delay of two years before the new class can come under the fund. If I am right in that, and I wish to be corrected if I am not, if any recommendation that is possibly acceptable to the government has been made to them, certainly no time should be lost in implementing it, and it should be in this bill. Could the minister amplify what he said, that it was not possible to bring it in this year. In the light of my objection that certain persons would not be covered for two years, will he state the reasons why it would not be advisable this year?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have given all the reasons I can think of. It is a matter of judgment. When my hon. friend spoke this afternoon he spoke of raising all the rates.

Mr. MERRITT: For dependents.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, for dependents. I thought I heard him say all the rates, but I take his word for it. Of course, when you raise all the rates you have to raise the payments by the insured. That is elementary.

Mr. MERRITT: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: When you speak of raising the rate to $25 a week it means in a broad way that the contributions paid by both employer and employee would have to be doubled. We have to face up to that problem.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister will find that I said exactly that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, I agree. As I say, this report was received just prior to the thing that happened in the United States. It is all a question of judgment; that is all. Their report does not increase the payments in the direction which the hon. member for Vancouver East would wish them to be increased, namely, in the lower brackets, if I heard him correctly, but that is the decision we came to. The recommendations of the committee are not fundamental recommendations; they do not cover the broad field. I am now speaking from memory; they do not touch the payments made to single persons, but they do increase slightly the payments made to those with dependents. In addition, an increase is made in the contribution by the employer.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister has not answered the other question I asked him. Will that mean that if it is held until next year it will be two years before it comes into force?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; if paid to-day it would be two years.

Mr. MERRITT: Then it will be three years if brought into force next year?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Section 7 (new section 31) agreed to.

Section 7 (new sections 32 to 34 inclusive) agreed to.

On section 7 (new section 35)—Waiting days not counted for benefit.

Mr. KNOWLES: Here is one of the places where, as has been pointed out, we are not so critical of the changes made as we are with some of the changes which have not been made. Was consideration given to shortening the waiting period to something less than nine days?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am informed by the advisory committee to the commission that that is the next thing they are to consider. As soon as there is enough money they will consider it.

Mr. PROBE: What is the British practice in this regard?

Mr. KNOWLES: It is three days.

Mr. MITCHELL: It was six and it is down to three now. Ours is nine.

Mr. KNOWLES: Three in the new national insurance act for both sickness and unemployment.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right.

Mr. CASE: I do not know whether this is the place to ask this question, but I understand that if an insured person is unemployed he is eligible to draw benefits until his contributions have been exhausted.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. CASE: Before he becomes eligible for unemployment insurance again, does he start all over again?

Mr. MITCHELL: Sixty days.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. CASE: He has to be employed for sixty days before he is eligible for any unemployment insurance benefits?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Section 7 (new section 35) agreed to.

Section 7 (new sections 36 to 38 inclusive) agreed to.

On section 7 (new section 39)—Disqualification through loss of work due to labour dispute.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain just how this new section affects men who are thrown out of work by reason of a strike which does not concern them directly?

Mr. MITCHELL: They get benefits.

Mr. GREEN: For example, during the lumber strike in British Columbia, which was settled a few days ago, there were men from the Pacific lumber inspection bureau whose job is to do log-scaling—

Mr. MITCHELL: These men got benefits.

Mr. GREEN: For a time they were refused.

Mr. MITCHELL: The matter was investigated and they got the benefits.

Mr. GREEN: Is there a clear-cut definition of the conditions under which they will get benefits? There were other men who were working in industries which were affected because they could not get logs. I believe that they, too, were refused unemployment insurance. Where is the boundary line? There should be a clear-cut line.

Mr. MITCHELL: There are three things, namely, participating, financing and directly interested in. The case to which my hon. friend refers was brought to my attention, and one of the ranking insurance officers on the top level was sent to Vancouver to straighten it out. As a rule, there is always a point of view on both sides. When a situation like that arises, what the commission does is to send out a ranking officer to make a decision. You have to make a decision in the light of the conditions in the dispute as they exist, because you have to be careful that you do not finance a strike, that the people who are paying unemployment insurance contributions in Montreal, say, do not help to finance a strike in Vancouver or Toronto. One has to be careful and cautious in the payment of benefits when a strike takes place. For that reason the commission is careful, and in the Vancouver dispute they sent out their ranking officials to settle the point at issue on the ground in the light of the conditions as they see them at the time.

Mr. GREEN: Is the disqualification supposed to extend beyond the men who are actually striking? Take the case of other men who cannot work because a strike prevents their factory from getting material. Are these men disqualified?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not get the point. I shall get it in a moment, I suppose. If they were in the same union in the same plant they would be disqualified. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. GREEN: No. They were working for another firm which had to shut down because it could not get the raw material. The reason it could not get the raw material was that there was a strike. What happens in that case?

Mr. MITCHELL: I should not like to express an offhand opinion. I would think they would be entitled to benefits, but I say that with reservations.

Mr. KNOWLES: The act is pretty clear.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is that not the answer?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes. Paragraph (a) of new section 39 covers it. It says:

that he is not participating in, or financing or directly interested in the labour dispute which caused the stoppage of work.

I am glad to hear the minister say that he sent someone to Vancouver, because I had complaints from persons who were refused benefits although they did not belong to the unions which were on strike, but were put out of work because a stoppage of work was caused through lack of material. I wrote to the commissioner about one case. One of the difficulties in getting the matter settled is the distance between Ottawa and the various places where the inquiry has to be made before any report can be made by the commission.

Mr. MITCHELL: We got that official away just as quickly as we could.

Mr. GREEN: This section does appear to be clear. It says:

That he is not participating in, or financing or directly interested in the labour dispute which caused the stoppage of work.

I had representations, I presume from the same people who made them to the hon. member for Vancouver East: yet the unemployment insurance officers in Vancouver ruled, I believe, that the men in question were not entitled to unemployment insurance.

Mr. MITCHELL: I sent a senior officer there, for that very reason. You take a local officer in a matter involving perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars; he is pretty cautious, and rightly so. When we get a situation of that kind we see to it that one of the senior officials goes out and gives the necessary directions.

Mr. KNOWLES: It seems to me that the case raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South is covered by subsection 1, which makes it clear that a person is disqualified only if there is a stoppage of work at the plant in which he is working. In the case of the secondary industry to which my hon. friend refers, the stoppage of work is not due to a labour dispute at that plant.

Mr. MERRITT: I also received representations in that case, and I happen to know quite a few of the men who are inspectors for the Pacific lumber inspection board. It struck me that case was so clear that it should not have been necessary to make representations to Ottawa. There the point that seemed to be involved was that all the inspectors actually work at the plants that were on strike, but they are employed by a totally different organization. Neither the Pacific lumber inspection board nor its employees were in any way connected with that strike. They are men who have high responsibilities in the checking of lumber, and it was a case in which I should not think there would be any need for hesitation on the part of the officials who were investigating.

The other point I wanted to ask the minister about was not a hypothetical case but an actual case I discussed with him, in connection with the moulders' strike. Would the employees of the brass foundry which is closed down because it is picketed by the moulders' union be debarred from benefits, though they themselves are not on strike and belong to an entirely separate union?

Mr. MITCHELL: It would depend on whether there was participation in the strike. I do not know the exact details, so that I should not like to give an opinion offhand. Anyone wanting to go to work, belonging to a union but not being able to get through the picket line, is in a difficult position. I want to say to my hon. friend that I would not go through any picket line.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are speaking personally? Or as Minister of Labour?

Mr. MITCHELL: Speaking personally. These fellows may belong to the organization; I do not know. If my hon. friend wants my people to look into the matter I shall be very glad to have that done for him. The hon. gentleman asked what was the doubt in our mind. These people worked in the mills, you understand, and it had to be decided whether they were part of the industry and taking part in the strike. My hon. friend, who is an old military man, knows that sometimes you find those in the lower ranks cautious about making decisions. They like to look up to the top and see that they have some measure of protection.

Mr. CASE: This section provides certain safeguards, but there is a broader over-all picture, in this sense. We will say there is a strike in a certain industry, probably not in the same city to which I would relate this question. In that other city there exists a trades and labour council. I have known this to happen. That council has a meeting. They do not join in the strike by means of a sympathetic strike, or anything like that, but they make a cash contribution of $40 or $50 or $100 for the benefit of the workers on strike. Many industries in the city where this trades and labour council is located might be affected by the strike in the other city. Some might have to close down because of the shortage of supplies which ordinarily would come from the industry on strike. In that case it would seem that these people would all be disqualified because their organization had made this cash contribution to assist the workers who were on strike. Would that seem to be reasonable?

Mr. MITCHELL: Offhand, I should not think so. I should think they could give money if they wished. I know I have given a good deal of money away.

Mr. CASE: You do not think they would be bound by the stand of the organization?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would not think so.

Mr. PROBE: Would the minister just indicate whether "labour dispute" means a lock-out as well as a strike, in order that this may be clarified?

Mr. MITCHELL: It means a lock-out as well as a strike. That is defined in section 2 of the act.

Section 7 (new section 39) agreed to.

On section 7 (new section 40)—Disqualification for neglecting opportunity to work or failure to attend course of instruction.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Paragraph (d) reads:

(d) has without good cause failed to attend a course of instruction or training that the commission directed him to attend for the purpose of becoming or keeping fit for entry into or return to employment.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

I am wondering if that could be interpreted so that a man might be directed for training into some business he was not desirous of entering, or which would not further develop the training he already possessed. Could the board direct him into training for some position for which he was not fitted, or which he did not desire?

Mr. MITCHELL: If I were out of a job and were offered training, I think I would take it. I do not know of any case like that. Perhaps it is a hypothetical case.

Mr. JOHNSTON: What I have in mind is that a man might be a carpenter and be directed to take training as a bricklayer.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend knew anything about the trade union movement he would know that they never train carpenters to be bricklayers or vice versa.

Mr. JOHNSTON: But it is not so stated here.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should not think that would be a good example. At the moment there are not enough bricklayers or carpenters to go round.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I think the wording should be changed to indicate that the training should be along the line of the previous training. I do not believe it should be left to the discretion of others to decide whether a man should follow a new line of endeavour. It seems pretty dictatorial.

Section 7 (new section 40) agreed to.

Section 7 (new sections 41 to 48 inclusive) agreed to.

On section 7 (new section 49)—Question arising during court proceedings.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is the explanation for this section?

Mr. MITCHELL: The courts have endeavoured to decide coverage. This merely gives the commission the final and only authority with respect to coverage under the act.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is no appeal?

Mr. MITCHELL: No appeal; there is an appeal to the umpire.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But beyond that there is no appeal.

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And the commission has power to reverse its own decision?

Mr. MITCHELL: On new facts, yes.

Section 7 (new section 49) agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

Sections 8 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

On section 18—The commission may pay benefit to insured person where contributions not paid.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the minister explain this?

Mr. MITCHELL: If a man is not covered and the commission finds out later that he has been covered, the commission can pay the benefits, even though the contributions have not been made.

Mr. FRASER: What safeguard has a person?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is his safeguard.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is in a case where he should have been covered?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Unemployment insurance fund.

Mr. PROBE: Thus far in the operation of the fund has there been any month where payments out of the fund have exceeded receipts? What about April?

Mr. MITCHELL: April of this year was the first month.

Mr. PROBE: What was the excess?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall get that figure for the hon. member.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister will remember, as those of us who dealt with this matter a few years ago remember, that, following the last war, in Great Britain a substantial fund had been laid aside, but it was not very long until the whole fund running into hundreds of millions of dollars had been dissipated. I do not mean that the money had been wasted, but it had been drawn out because of the great amount of unemployment.

We might run up against the same condition in this country, and it must not be taken as a reflection upon the Unemployment Insurance Act. The whole purpose of the fund is good. But both employers and employees will have to use their heads and meet situations as they arise. I am one who believes that if such a time should come we should be ready with the finances of the country to support it. The fund, which so many people seem to think is large, may actually be too small. But if such a time should come support should be given sufficient to carry on the obligations under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I have great faith in it. It has done a wonderful job, both in the old country and in Canada, as long as we have had it. It must not be allowed to fail. The country itself, through its finances, would have to save the fund if and when it became depleted, to that extent.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say to the hon. member for Regina City that the payments of benefits in the month of April were $1,500,000 more than the contributions.

Mr. PROBE: That is the only month?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think it is generally understood that in any case of general unemployment any insurance scheme will break down.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is like an earthquake.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes; it is beyond the efforts of human nature, and cannot be helped. Has the department some figure below which we would be on the safe side? What is the figure of unemployment in Canada beyond which the minister does not think the act would operate? What is the peak?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is estimated—and this is only an estimate—that it would be from 7½ to 10 per cent.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: For what period could it be carried at 10 per cent?

Mr. MITCHELL: Indefinitely.

Section agreed to.

Sections 20 and 21 agreed to.

On section 22—Governor in council may extend provisions of part II.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understand that an order in council has been passed to bring loggers on the west coast under the act.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are they now covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. MITCHELL: On August 1 of this year.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will that extend to loggers in any other part of Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: At present it applies only to British Columbia.

Mr. MacINNIS: All lumber workers in British Columbia are now covered by the act?

Mr. MITCHELL. They will be on August 1.

Mr. MacINNIS: Has the commission considered bringing in the longshoremen of British Columbia under the act?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am informed that consideration has been given to the matter. I had jurisdiction over the longshoremen at Halifax during the previous war, and I know and my hon. friend knows that there is some difficulty in that connection because these men work for so many different contractors.

Mr. MacINNIS: Longshoremen and loggers on the west coast are in pretty much the same situation as loggers and longshoremen in eastern Canada. Longshoring work in British Columbia is all-year work; it is not seasonal like the work in Montreal, Quebec and the ports on the great lakes. Longshoremen who work on the west coast and at the open ports on the Atlantic coast should be brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. GREEN: Is that the only reason why longshoremen are not covered by the act?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is largely an administrative difficulty because they work for so many different employers and because their employment is highly seasonal.

Mr. LOW: Does that apply also to loggers outside of British Columbia?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, absolutely.

Mr. GREEN: Longshoring on the west coast is certainly not a seasonal occupation. I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Vancouver East has said. There seems to be no good reason why they should not be covered by the act.

Mr. MITCHELL: They may work for many different employers in the one day. The matter is under consideration and I shall be glad to bring it again to the attention of the commissioner.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the longshoreman exempt from income tax because he works for different employers?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would not think so.

Mr. MacINNIS: If you can collect income tax you can also collect unemployment insurance contributions.

There is another matter I should like to bring up. Representations have been made to me by certain employees of the city of Vancouver who have been removed from the act. These employees work in the cemeteries which are owned by the city. I took the matter up with the chief commissioner, and he sent me the following letter under date of June 5, 1946:

I might explain that insurability of employment by cemeteries came up for consideration a couple of years ago when it was drawn to the attention of this commission that an anomaly existed which had given rise to some grievance. As you know, many cemeteries are operated by churches and other bodies which are classed as charitable institutions within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Act. These institutions are not required to insure their employees and this exception extends to employees of cemeteries operated by them.

On the other hand, cemeteries operated by municipalities and by private companies were required to insure their employees. Strong objection was taken by some of the latter and representations were made to the commissioner to remove the anomaly by exercising the powers granted under section 14 (1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, which reads as follows:

After quoting the section, which I do not think I will read since the minister will have it before him, the letter continues:

As a result the commission made a regulation, which came into effect on April 22, 1944, which was the item quoted in the letter of April 9 from the accountant for Vancouver. The regulation provides in effect that any cemetery which is required to furnish graves to the poor without charge is relieved from making contributions for its employees. The provincial statutes of most of the provinces require both municipal and private cemeteries to do so and for this reason they felt that they should be put on the same basis as charitable institutions.

The cemeteries in the city of Vancouver are not charitable institutions; they are run by the city. A person employed to-day by the cemetery department may be employed to-morrow by some other department. These employees want to come under the Unemployment Insurance Act so that they may draw benefits if unemployed. They feel that if employees of charitable institutions are exempt there is no reason why they should be. As employees of the city I think they have as much right to be covered by the act as employees of any other department of the city.

Mr. MITCHELL: There was an anomaly in the administration. Charitable institutions did not come under the act and in its wisdom the commission removed all cemetery employees from the coverage of the act. A similar anomaly existed in another direction in connection with power plants. Privately owned power plants came under the act, while municipal and provincial power plants were exempted, and they were all put under the act.

Mr. CASE: Many municipal employees do not want to come under the act because they feel a degree of security in their employment. The hon. member for Vancouver East asked if all lumber men in British Columbia are covered and the answer was in the affirmative. Are all lumber men in Canada covered?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. CASE: It applies only to British Columbia?

Mr. MITCHELL: So far.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Organization and maintenance of employment service.

Mr. CROLL: How many people have been trained under this plan?

Mr. MITCHELL: We have not those figures in front of us.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How many unemployed veterans are receiving benefits?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not that information in front of me but I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: What additional duties are to be given to the commission? Subsection 4 of the new section 88 reads:

> The commission shall assume and carry out such other duties and responsibilities as the governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, may require from time to time and, in respect of such other duties and responsibilities, shall be responsible to the minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: Speaking now as an individual, I want to say that I believe in ministerial responsibility. During the war we had to use the employment service for many things which were not covered by the legislation but which had to be done by order in council. At the present moment we are doing many things through the instrumentality of the employment service that are not covered by legislation. One item is apprenticeship training. For registration and all things necessary to carry this out in the different provinces we use the employment service. In the training of veterans we use the employment service; I mean that they move through that organization. Sometimes it is necessary to take a strike vote in some industry, and I use the agency for that purpose. Or take the movement of farm labour during the war, when we moved hundreds of thousands of people from agriculture in the winter to the other basic industries in the country; that was done under the direction of the minister through the employment service. I regard the employment service as a dynamic institution. You have to be prepared to make decisions, make them quickly, and give the necessary direction. I believe it can be truthfully said, notwithstanding some criticism, that without the employment service and the direction given to it by or through the minister during the war period, we would have had a very difficult situation in this country. Had we not had an employment service at the close of the war where, through ministerial responsibility, we could act quickly and give the necessary direction from day to day, I do not believe we would have passed through these last six or seven months as we have done. My mind goes back to the last war, when only ten per cent of the industrial structure of this nation was engaged in war production.

That, in short, is the story. I cannot tell what to-morrow I may find it necessary that the employment service should do under the direction of the minister. My hon. friend can rest assured that anything which should be done will be done through the medium of that organization, if it is in the interests of the economic well-being of this nation, of the employers and of the working people who go to make up its working force.

Mr. GREEN: The idea is that there shall be wide power given to the employment service for these special duties?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely, yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister does not mean that this will solve the unemployment problem?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Nor will it solve the condition the minister stated to-night, that we have to use and are using prisoners of war for industry and agriculture in this country at the present time?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; and let me say this, while we are speaking of prisoners of war, that I would send these people back to Germany, where they belong, to-morrow morning if I had my way. That is where they belong and that is where they should be.

Mr. MacNICOL: Back to England.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, to Germany. That is where they come from.

Mr. MacNICOL: They have to go to England first. They are England's prisoners.

Mr. MITCHELL: We found it necessary to retain them here. We have had representations from Alberta, Manitoba, and particularly Ontario, in connection with the sugar beet crop this year. Let me say also that under no circumstances will prisoners of war be used, under my jurisdiction, in this country as cheap labour. The cost to the employer must be on a par with that normally paid in the particular industry; and just as soon as we can get replacements of these prisoners by men in agriculture and the other avocations in which they are engaged, rest assured that they will be pulled out of this work as quickly as they possibly can. They are being pulled out now.

Section agreed to.

On section 24 (new section 92)—Definitions.

Mr. BROOKS: I notice in paragraph (a)—

(a) "discharge" means any honourable termination of service from the forces since the thirtieth day of June, 1941.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs will remember, when we were discussing veterans affairs matters in our committee, reference was made to a good many men who, by reason of certain army offences, did not get honourable discharge but were serving periods of time in detention in penitentiaries and in other institutions, for military offences which would not have been civilian offences had they not been in the army. I believe there was a board of review which was reviewing all these cases—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: —and a good many of these men have been given discharges; whether we can call them "honourable" discharges or not I do not know. The point I wish to make is this: If these men are satisfactorily discharged as far as the veterans' acts are concerned, would they be considered honourably discharged as far as this act is concerned?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think, I would say "yes" to that.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister is satisfied that that is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. PROBE: I do not want to prolong the discussion, but throughout this new section 92 I find no provision for members of His Majesty's forces other than those resident in Canada at the time of enlistment. I have particularly in mind paragraph (c), subparagraph (ii). There are or were in the forces of the United Kingdom quite a number of young Canadians who went there just prior to the war, and while they did not serve in the Canadian forces they served in the British forces and some of them are now returning. They had actually made their domicile in Britain, or thought they had, just before the war, and when the war broke out they joined the first force which they could join. The Minister of Veterans Affairs is familiar with many such cases. Since the war they have changed their minds; they do not now want to be domiciled in England and they are returning to Canada. What is their status? According to this clause, I believe they are not eligible for the government contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. Was it intended to discriminate against them?

Mr. MacINNIS: Would they not be eligible under new section 92, paragraph (a) (iii)?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. PROBE: But they were not resident nor domiciled here.

Mr. MacINNIS: The subparagraph states:

domiciled and resident in Canada, who served in the armed forces of any of the nations allied with His Majesty in active operations against the enemy in the war and was domiciled in Canada at the time he joined any such forces for the purposes of the war, and who returned to Canada within two years of the date of his discharge from such forces, or of the eighth day of May, 1945.

I think such a man would be eligible even if he were absent from Canada, if he were normally resident here.

Mr. BROOKS: If he intended to come back.

Mr. MITCHELL: This section is taken in toto from the veterans legislation. There is no change; it is just as it was; and goodness knows it has been discussed enough in the veterans affairs committee. If I have any understanding of the functions of the committee, if they have left anything out which is for the protection of the veterans I should like to know what it is.

Mr. PROBE: I am not on the committee this year, and for that reason I want to get it clear in my mind as to whether or not the men I have referred to are regarded as domiciled and resident in Canada. I recall that this matter was discussed last year in committee, but I do not remember what happened at that time. It looks to me as though these young men who went specifically to join the British air force just before the war, who intended to be domiciled thereafter in the United Kingdom, and who since the war have decided that Canada is where they belong, may not be covered by this section.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, they will be covered.

Section 24 (new section 92) agreed to.

On section 24 (new section 93)—Qualification period.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have one question. The first line reads:

A veteran who completes fifteen weeks in insurable employment within any period of twelve months . . .

What about the veteran who was not able to put in fifteen weeks in any such period? Where does he come in?

Mr. MITCHELL: He does not get it. That is the qualification.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister knows that after the great war in Great Britain they had the same experience, and the country found it necessary to give these men insurance by putting them on the unemployment insurance pay roll. Apparently we are not going to follow that here.

Mr. MITCHELL: No. We have not found it necessary yet.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suggest that the time will come when it will be found necessary.

Mr. MITCHELL: The ordinary employed person pays for thirty weeks. This veteran pays for only fifteen weeks.

Mr. MacNICOL: But no one knows better than the minister that, following the great war, there were in Great Britain hundreds of thousands of veterans who were twenty-five and thirty weeks unemployed in one year and the government put them on the fund.

Mr. MITCHELL: They get veterans out-of-work benefit.

Mr. MacNICOL: Two or three years from now.

Mr. MacINNIS: How long would a returned man who came under unemployment insurance in this way be in this category, that is to say, this section of the Unemployment Insurance Act? Would he ultimately come under the general operations of the act, or is it of a diminishing nature?

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, no. He comes straight under the act, with all the rights and privileges.

Mr. MacINNIS: But does he change his status at some time from that of a veteran to that of a civilian under the act?

Mr. MITCHELL: As soon as he has had fifteen weeks. He takes his position under the law the same as the civilian.

Mr. MacINNIS: And that is the only difference?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Section 24 (new section 93) agreed to.

On section 24 (new section 94)—Contributions in respect of veterans.

Mr. PROBE: The contribution made on behalf of the veterans by the dominion government equals the usual amount contributed by the employer plus that of the employee?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. PROBE: But there is lacking from this contribution the twenty per cent additional which would normally be contributed had this veteran been a civilian rather than a veteran; that is to say, contributed by the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is paid by the government.

Mr. PROBE: I did not read it in that way.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is paid by the government.

Mr. PROBE: If I have that assurance from the minister I have nothing more to say on the point.

Section 24 (new section 94) agreed to.

On section 24 (new section 95)—Report on fund.

Mr. GREEN: In new section 95 there is provision for the advisory committee to make reports on the effect upon the fund of these contributions. I presume the idea is to report if the fund is being depleted.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: What happens if it is found that the fund is being depleted? Will the commission go back to the veteran and demand payment from him?

Mr. MITCHELL: The advisory committee reports to parliament.

Mr. GREEN: The section says that "the governor in council may"—it does not state that the committee reports to parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL: The advisory committee does report to parliament.

Mr. GREEN: The section states that the governor in council may, on receipt of a report, take into consideration immediate measures to remedy any depletion of the fund due to the operation of this part, which depletion shall have been established by the report of the committee. Would it not be wiser to provide that if there is such depletion it shall be made up from the consolidated revenue fund?

Mr. MITCHELL: Frankly, I do not know the reason for that language. It was taken en bloc out of the veterans legislation. I may not be a member of the government when that happens. I cannot look into the future that far. I may not be a member of the government of that day, but I assume that if my hon. friend is a member of the government, or if the hon. member for Vancouver East is a member of it—probably not the same government—

Mr. MacNICOL: You never can tell.

Mr. MITCHELL: —they will do the sensible thing, just as I assume that this government would.

Mr. GREEN: I take it that when the minister says the government would do the sensible thing he means the government would make good whatever depletion might take place.

Mr. MITCHELL: The fund would be kept liquid.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, the fund would be made up out of the consolidated revenue fund. In that case, I think it would be well to put that provision in the act because, according to the present wording, the veteran could be called on to make good the deficiency.

Mr. MITCHELL: We cannot commit future governments. My hon. friend understands the principle that one parliament cannot commit another.

Mr. GREEN: Every statute you pass commits a future government as long as that statute stands. If a subsequent government wishes to change a statute it may do so. At any rate, I suggest that it should be made clear in this section just how the deficiency will be made up, and I do not think there is any dispute that it will come from the consolidated revenue fund.

Section 7 (new section 95) agreed to.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Chairman, may we revert to new section 94?

Mr. MITCHELL: When we have disposed of the other.

On section 7 (new section 96)—"Veteran" to include certain merchant seamen.

Mr. BROOKS: Are merchant seamen under this act at the present time?

Mr. MITCHELL: No. They will be as soon as it is assented to.

Mr. BROOKS: That is, all merchant seamen?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: And they were not previously?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. BROOKS: If a man continues in the same employment for fifteen weeks he gets the full benefits?

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not clearly understand that.

Mr. BROOKS: If the merchant seaman had been under this act prior to the present amendment—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I can answer this. In the case of a merchant seaman, he is required to have been in insurable employment for thirty weeks, but in the case of the veteran who is in receipt of the two bonuses referred to in new section 96, he must be in insurable employment for fifteen weeks.

Mr. BROOKS: He can continue, if he has been a merchant seaman, in his ship for fifteen weeks after the war; he gets the full benefit of unemployment insurance and the government pays that share.

Mr. MITCHELL: After this measure comes into force.

Mr. CHEVRIER: And if he is in receipt of the bonuses referred to in this section.

Mr. MacINNIS: Where does the Minister of Transport find that the merchant seamen must have made contributions for thirty weeks.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is in section 13 of the old act. That refers to all persons who are employed in any of the employments specified in part I of the first schedule, and part I is being amended by order in council so as to cover the point I mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. MacINNIS: I may not be able to read legal language, but this states that "veteran" shall include merchant seamen; and if veteran includes merchant seamen, surely the provisions that apply to a veteran who is not a merchant seaman will apply to a merchant seaman.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friend looks at section 13 he will see that people who receive unemployment insurance get it by virtue of that section.

Mr. MacINNIS: Section 13?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Section 13 of the old act says that persons who are employed in any of the employment specified in part I of the first schedule to this act are entitled to unemployment insurance, and those who are excepted in part II are not entitled.

Mr. MacINNIS: This part does not make any reference to part I or to section 13 of the act.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right. But if my hon. friend turns to page 20 of the bill—we passed section 19 a moment ago—he will see that it says:

> On the recommendation of the committee and the commission, the governor in council may extend the provisions of this act to any of the employments specified as excepted employments in part II of the first schedule . . .

And Part II of the first schedule has to do with transportation on water.

Mr. BROOKS: My point is that if merchant seamen were included in the act before, why are they put in this special section?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They were not included in the act before.

Mr. MITCHELL: Perhaps I can explain it in a sentence. Normally a merchant seaman comes under the terms of the act just the same as any other civilian worker. He has to have thirty weeks with the exception of those who are in receipt of war bonus, which is considered active service. They come under the same condition as the men in the fighting forces.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is those who are mentioned in new section 96?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is right.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is what I was dealing with all the time. Is the advisory committee or the commission considering the bringing of transportation by water under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is in this bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does that apply to transportation by air?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is already in.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are the merchant seamen on the great lakes covered also?

Mr. MITCHELL: They will be under this bill.

Mr. GREEN: Does the benefit given by the new section 96 apply only from the time this bill comes into effect? In other words, has it any retroactive effect?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. GREEN: Suppose a merchant seaman was discharged six months ago; would he get any benefits under this new section 96?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes; he is covered by the manning pools; he is in the manning pools.

Mr. GREEN: It covers the man who was discharged before the bill comes into effect?

Mr. MITCHELL: Certainly.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Transport shakes his head.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am saying "yes"; that is definite enough, is it not?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, if it is correct.

Section 7 (new section 96) agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: We shall revert to new section 94.

Mr. PROBE: The minister said that the object of this new section was to ensure that out of funds appropriated by parliament there will be handed over to the unemployment insurance fund an amount equivalent to what would have been paid had the veterans been in civilian employment, namely, a combination of the three amounts, that which would be contributed by the employee and the employer, plus the twenty per cent which the government normally contributes to the unemployment insurance fund. With all deference to the minister I do not think that is the way the new section reads. If that is the intent of the act I do not think it is properly worded. I shall read the part which applies.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have the answer. I know what is in the hon. member's mind.

Mr. PROBE: The section reads:

> . . . there shall be credited to the fund out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose, the amount of the combined contributions of the employer and the employed person under this act, for a period equal to the period of service of the veteran after the thirtieth day of June, nineteen hundred and forty-one, and the rate at which the same combined contributions shall be computed is the average of the contributions shown by the unemployment insurance records of the veteran to have been paid by him and on his behalf for the said fifteen weeks. . .

And so on. As I read this, the government's share of the civilian equivalent of contribution is not being paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament. If that was the intention, would the minister consider—

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall clarify it for my hon. friend. Section 94 deals with the contributions of the employer and the employee. Section 77, subsection 2, of the present act deals with the government contributions. You have the employer and employee contributions in section 94 and you get the government's contribution of twenty per cent in section 77, subsection 2, of the old act, which reads:

> The Minister of Finance shall also credit in like manner from time to time out of moneys provided by parliament an amount equal to one-fifth of the aggregate credits from time to time made as aforesaid after deducting from the said aggregate credits any refunds of contributions from time to time made under the provisions of this act from the fund.

That is a combination of the three classes.

Section 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Regulations concerning persons under same employer partly in insurable employment and partly in another employment.

Mr. GREEN: There are two paragraphs in this section, (o) and (p), on which I should like to ask the minister a few questions.

Apparently they are giving the employment service powers which they have not had heretofore.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is true.

Mr. GREEN: For example, paragraph (o) gives the employment service power to require every person who has engaged an employee, who ascertains that he requires or will require to engage an employee, or who ascertains that an employee has left or will be leaving his employment, to give notice to the employment service. Then the next paragraph reads as follows:

requiring every person seeking employment to notify the employment service of such fact and to supply prescribed incidental information in such manner and within such time as may be prescribed.

Surely it is not necessary to take powers which are so wide.

Mr. MITCHELL: We had that power, of course, under the national selective service. It is in effect. What we want to get is a running picture from day to day of the employment situation in Canada. That is the only reason for it. It has been carried on ever since national selective service regulations were instituted. It is still being done at the moment. That is the only reason it is in there. It is to give us a live picture of the movement of labour from day to day in the dominion.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister think it will be possible to get every person who is looking for a job first to report that fact to the employment service? It seems to me to be an impossible requirement. It will never be carried out. It will be annoying to people who are looking for work and also to employers, if they have to report every time they want to hire a new employee. If they have to report that fact to the employment service it will mean that the employment service must keep many additional records and a large staff. I suggest to the minister that there is no need to go that far. Surely it is not the function of the employment service to put its finger into everybody's business in that way for all time in the future.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is. I am not a statistics fiend, and I have always been afraid of those people who have a stack of statistics under their arms. However, I believe it is well to have some knowledge of the labour market, of employment conditions, the numbers employed and all that sort of thing from day to day. I do not think you could enforce a thing like that in rural parts—

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. GREEN: You cannot enforce it anywhere.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think you can, in large measure. I do not mean in an enforcing sense, but I think it can be done with a degree of cooperation from both employers and employees. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that these powers will not be abused as far as I am concerned; but here we are endeavouring to obtain better and more up-to-date knowledge of what one might call the labour market and labour conditions throughout the country than we have ever had before. We have figures quoted here. I remember that just before the last election someone predicted that we would have half a million people unemployed by October of last year. I sometimes think some people were disappointed that we did not, because they had predicted it.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is not looking at me when he says that.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; I was looking at the hon. member for Regina City. I do say sincerely, however, that my hon. friend may rest assured that there will be no abuse of these powers as far as I am concerned.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the one thing more than anything else which made the employment service unpopular was that people had to line up there day after day and wait hours to get service. If now in peace time it is to be the plan that everybody looking for jobs must go to the employment service—

Mr. MITCHELL: No, absolutely not.

Mr. GREEN: —then you will have greater line-ups than ever; you will have your whole system clogged, and I suggest to the minister that he give careful consideration to this question before bringing in regulations that require everybody to report before getting work.

Mr. MITCHELL: I appreciate fully the import of what my hon. friend says. One reason I took the course of eliminating the controls in selective service was the very simple reason my hon. friend has just enunciated. I thought there would be such a tremendous movement of labour that our offices would not be able to handle it, that we would have congregations of people in downtown Vancouver, Montreal, Toronto and so on. Some of my officials warned me against the sudden dropping of these controls, but I said to them, "You will be amazed at what free men can do, how they will find a niche for themselves in the economy of this country." I believe our decision has been justified by what has happened since then. As I have said, over a million people were put into the employment stream in the course of four months without any undue stress or strain on the employment service.

What I am driving at here, however, is merely a reporting system. I do not want people to go to employment offices, but we want to know the ebb and flow, the turnover in the labour market of this country. This may be a jump in the dark. It may be the wrong thing to do, but we feel that we can have a more reliable barometer of employment conditions by applying this very simple idea of reporting both by the employer and the employee, who, however, does not have to go to the employment office.

Mr. GREEN: But the great majority of these people will feel that they must go to the employment offices.

Mr. MITCHELL: If they are claiming benefits they will have to do so.

Mr. GREEN: I am quite certain a large number of them will not bother about reporting at all; therefore the minister's information will not be accurate because it will be only partial information. If my firm were going to engage a stenographer, for example, it would be a great nuisance to have to report to the employment service that we desired to employ a stenographer, and I am sure all firms will feel that way about it. They have had so many government reports to make out, both dominion and provincial, and have been so greatly handicapped in carrying on their business, that I do not see why the employment service should require these reports from either employees or employers.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. gentleman may rest assured that this power will not be abused.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not sure whether or not it is necessary; but, as more people come under the Unemployment Insurance Act, if they are to be directed to employment it will be essential for them to report somewhere in order that they may be so directed. Otherwise there would be no control whatever of those who lose their employment. If the employment offices have not a list of the jobs vacant and another list of persons looking for jobs, I do not see how they can function. As more and more people are brought under unemployment insurance, the greater will become the need for these employment offices. For instance, if stenographers are under the Unemployment Insurance Act and my hon. friend wants to engage a stenographer, since stenographers who lose their employment must register with the employment office the obvious place for him to look for a stenographer is the employment office. Of course, if there is a huge unemployment pool and the supply of stenographers is much greater than the demand, then he might be able to get one by advertising or in some other way. I submit, however, that if the Unemployment Insurance Act is to operate properly, at least those who are receiving benefits under it will have to be registered in the employment offices.

Sections 26 to 28 inclusive agreed to.

On section 29—Secrecy of records.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the minister explain why this section is necessary? It seems to me that we have now quite a lot of difficulty in getting information, and this will make it worse.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think it is a fairly well established principle that there should be some privacy for the individual. That is an old British tradition. It is the only reason for this provision. Any information we get from the man or woman in regard to his or her personal affairs, in connection with an application, is confidential and should not be given to anyone else. That is the general practice.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Do you not have enough protection now without having this? Members of this house will be precluded from getting this information, too.

Mr. MITCHELL: This has reference to the public generally. Take yourself and myself as individuals. I think my private affairs are no business of anybody, and neither are yours. A man may come to the unemployment office and want somebody to find his wife for him, or find out something about her. That is not our business. We deal with people just as employees, and any confidential information we get from men or women should remain in the files of the offices. We do not want to be snoopers for people who want to find out information about others who are drawing unemployment insurance, or who are covered by the scheme and receiving benefits.

Mr. MacNICOL: You will have enough to do without that.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: If we get a complaint in a certain case and want certain information, this will preclude members of parliament from getting it?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

PRINTING AND STATIONERY

ADVANCES TO KING'S PRINTER FOR PURCHASE OF MATERIALS

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act in relation to advances authorized to be made to the King's Printer for the purchase of materials to execute orders and requisitions and payment of wages, and to provide that the total amount of such outstanding advances shall at no time exceed the sum of two million dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. FRASER: Would the minister explain?

Mr. MARTIN: The purpose is to increase outstanding advances to the king's printer. These outstanding advances were in the amount of $700,000 in 1928. It is now proposed to regularize by legislation what was done in 1939 by order in council, namely to increase the amount from $700,000 to $2 million. This does not represent any expenditure. It is simply a revolving fund to enable the king's printer to make the necessary purchases of stationery which he has to furnish, in return for which he receives payments from the various departments of government. It is a sort of petty cash account.

Mr. MacNICOL: From whom does he get authority to make the expenditures?

Mr. MARTIN: He makes his report annually, and it is presented to parliament.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Martin thereupon moved to introduce bill No. 245, to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

REPEAL OF PROVISION OF ACT RESPECTING DUTIES OF CLERK OF PRINTING COMMITTEE

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of bill No. 127, to amend the Public Printing and Stationery Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. FRASER: Will the Secretary of State give us an explanation?

Mr. MARTIN: Section 3 of the Public Printing and Stationery Act which it is intended to repeal was passed during the session of 1888. It will be seen that the committee referred to in section 3 was therein empowered to employ a clerk independent of the authorities of the houses of parliament. The chairman of the joint committee on printing chose the job printing companies which were to handle the work and the clerk of the committee acting as his secretary had equal power. Section 3 of the Printing and Stationery Act is now obsolete, because the staffs of the Senate and the House of Commons have been reorganized, and their permanent officers, clerks and employees are appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. Moreover, the committee has now no right to make appointments. Standing order 82 states that the Clerk has direction and control over all the officers and clerks employed in the offices subject to such orders as he may from time to time receive from Mr. Speaker or from parliament itself. According to section 3, which it is proposed to repeal, the chairman of the committee can theoretically ignore the Speaker and the Clerk of the house and give whatever orders he desires. Obviously it is desirable that this conflict should not exist, and that this obsolete section should be removed. That is the purpose of the measure.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

REPEAL OF PROVISIONS NOW SUPERSEDED BY CONSOLIDATED REVENUE AND AUDIT ACT

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of bill No. 125, to amend the House of Commons Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Repeal.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister explain the purpose of this bill?

Mr. MARTIN: It is to remove from the operative sections of existing statutes certain obsolete clauses. Prior to 1931 there was no provision in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act for issuing moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund for the administrative expenditures of the House of Commons. Letters of credit signed by the Speaker and two commissioners of internal economy of the house were periodically sent to the treasury for amounts required during a certain period, usually three months. The letter of credit was issued in favour of the accountant of the house who had been duly authorized to receive it by the Speaker.

In the revision of the Audit Act, during the session of 1931, the words "public moneys" were defined so as to include all revenue from any source whatsoever, and section 3 declares that all public moneys shall form the consolidated revenue fund of Canada. Section 27 of the revised act provides that all issue of public moneys out of the consolidated revenue fund shall be made under the direction of the comptroller by cheque. The procedure is laid out in regulations and other sections of the act. These cover the issue of moneys required for the House of Commons; and therefore sections 19 and 20 of the House of Commons Act, which it is intended to repeal under this bill, have not been used since 1931, are obsolete and useless and should be deleted from our statutes.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

ENLARGEMENT OF PURPOSES FOR WHICH CREDITS MAY BE USED

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of bill No. 126, to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

Mr. MacINNIS: As I remember, the minister did not speak on the resolution stage of this bill and I was wondering if he had a statement to make to the house on the second reading.

Mr. MacKINNON: I have a statement to make, but I could not possibly make it in the few minutes that are left and I suggest that we call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. FRASER: When the minister is making his statement will he indicate what the manufacturers' association and the chambers of commerce agreed to at their last meeting, at which departmental officers were present?

Mr. MacKINNON: I shall be glad to do that.

On motion of Mr. MacKinnon the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, July 5, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth reports of the special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

ARMY AND NAVY VETERANS

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (for Mr. Cleaver) moved the first reading of bill No. 244, respecting the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the announcement of the peace conference to begin on July 29. The question is this: Has the Prime Minister or the government been invited to that conference and, if so, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to go? Perhaps I might be permitted to observe that in my judgment this country would expect him to go, and I think parliament would expect it. I may add, for those whom I represent, that if he should go we shall be disposed to facilitate the work of the house during his absence.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend in reply that up to the present no invitation has been received by the government of Canada to be represented at the Paris conference on July 29. I have no doubt that it will come in due course, and as soon as the invitation has been received I shall endeavour to inform the house as to the action the government is prepared to take upon it. May I say to my hon. friend at once that I appreciate the words which he has just addressed to myself and to the house, and thank him for them. What decision may be ultimately reached, as I have just said, will be made known in due course.

UNITED NATIONS

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL—PREPARATION FOR WORLD TRADE CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I answer a question which was addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce yesterday by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). The question was:

Will the minister make a statement as to what steps are being taken and what progress is being made by the united nations economic and social council by way of the preparation for the prospective world conference? Is there a possibility that the conference will be called this year?

The answer to the question is as follows:

Following the adoption of a resolution by the economic and social council, the secretary-general of the united nations has announced that arrangements are being made for a preparatory committee to meet in London on the 15th October, 1946, "so that a further constructive step may be taken towards freeing the productive forces of the world."

The following nations are members of the preparatory committee: Australia, Belgium-Luxembourg, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, India, Lebanon, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Union of South Africa, the U.S.S.R., the United States and the United Kingdom. The suggested basis of discussion is as follows:

(a) International agreement relating to the achievement and maintenance of high and stable levels of employment and economic activity; (b) International agreement relating to regulations, restrictions and discriminations affecting international trade; (c) International agreement relating to restrictive business practices; (d) International agreement relating to intergovernmental commodity arrangements; (e) Establishment of an international trade organization, as a specialized agency of the united nations, having responsibilities in the fields of (b), (c) and (d) above.

The secretary-general announced that in view of the scope and complexity of the preparatory work which will be necessary before the international conference on trade and employment can be held, it will not be possible to hold the conference until next year.

Negotiations relating to tariff changes will, it is expected, be held early in 1947. Work is now being done in various countries on this specific aspect of the proposals, but it is not possible for a date to be fixed at this time.

The second question is answered by what I have already said.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to give the house such information as I am in a position to give in answer to the question which was asked a day or two ago by my hon. friend opposite as to the further business of the house this session. I would preface anything I have to say by making clear that one or two matters might come up that I have overlooked or have not in mind at the moment, or of which the government has no knowledge at the moment, which will require consideration before the session is over. But I believe I can outline in pretty complete fashion the measures which still remain to be considered, and generally the amount of work which will have to be covered before the session comes to a close.

First of all, I need not enumerate the bills or resolutions which are already on the order paper, and I need not enumerate the measures which are before the Senate. I would regard anything that is now on the order paper either of the House of Commons or of the Senate as part of the business that is still to be completed before the session is over. The chief item of business, of course, will be the consideration of the budget. The debate on the budget will begin on Monday of next week, and it is the intention of the government to have the debate proceed pretty much without interruption, save that possibly one day a week may be devoted to taking up bills which are on the order paper so that a little more latitude may be allowed for consideration apart from debate of certain aspects of the budget debate, also to help keep the order paper cleared of some of the bills which may be accumulating and which it might be well to have before the other house without too much in the way of delay. How long the budget debate may continue I am not in a position to say. I leave it to the members to judge for themselves as to how far it may be advisable for the different parties in the house to seek to agree among themselves as to the amount of time they would wish to take in the discussion of the general resolutions. It may be that by conference between the whips and by agreement of the members of the different parties themselves it would be possible to limit the number of speeches that will be made.

May I make it clear that I do not wish in any way to shorten the business of this session or cause it to be pressed on unduly. Any suggestion I am making is what I believe to be in accordance with the wish of hon. members that we should if possible conclude the business before we get into the autumn. Looking at what there remains to be done I confess that unless there is some kind of organization among the different parties of the house, I see no prospect of the house adjourning for some little time to come. I do think that a little more organization will help to get over that possibility.

There will be in addition to the main debate, the several resolutions and bills based on the budget. Their consideration will take some time. They will constitute one of the major subjects of discussion. There are, of course, the estimates that still remain to be passed, and they are considerable in volume.

The next category of measures which may take some little time, it seems to me, are the bills which have to do with veterans' affairs. Some of these measures cannot be introduced until after the committee which has been considering veterans' affairs has made its final report. There are several of these bills. I hear the minister saying twelve. I am prepared to accept that at the moment, but I should be surprised if there may not be more before we are through. However, that brings me to something which I shall state very clearly to the house.

Some bills will be necessary which otherwise would not unless it is possible to obtain from the house permission to continue a little longer than is at present provided in the statute the time allotted for the continuance of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. As hon. members are aware, that act expires within fifteen days after the meeting of the house, at whatever time parliament reassembles. In considering the situation very carefully the government has come to the conclusion that there are some powers now exercisable under order in council that will have to be continued under special enactments at this session unless the house is agreeable to extending a little longer than is at present provided the powers that are now granted under order in council. I am going to ask the house to consider very carefully whether it would not be prepared to allow the government to have, instead of fifteen days after the reassembling of parliament, a period of sixty days during which such orders in council as it may seem desirable to have maintained, may be continued. It will be apparent from what we have seen elsewhere that were certain powers to have to be discontinued at a definite moment, almost immediately thereafter regret might be experienced that the existing powers had not been continued a little longer. The government does not wish to exercise any powers that are not absolutely necessary. On the other hand we do not wish to run the risk of not having the powers that may be necessary to meet emergent situations that may still continue. I am going to ask on behalf of the government, as I have said, that parliament consider amending the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act in one particular. Section 6 at present reads:

> Subject as hereinafter provided, this act shall expire on the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, if parliament meets during November or December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, but if parliament does not so meet it shall expire on the fifteenth day after parliament first meets during the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven . . .

That is the fifteenth day after parliament meets in 1947. The government would like to bring in a measure under which this section would be amended to extend the time to the sixtieth day after parliament meets instead of the fifteenth day after parliament meets. I realize that in considering this proposed amendment hon. members will wish to know at what time parliament is likely to reassemble. I believe it would be meeting the wishes of hon. members generally if I were to give an immediate undertaking that, unless something unforeseen may occasion us to call parliament sooner than the time I am going to mention, or something occur which might render it desirable to take an extra week or two before calling parliament, parliament will be called before the end of January, probably the last week in January. That would mean we would be asking to be authorized to continue in force orders in council with respect to a number of matters that we regard as more or less essential, until sixty days after the time parliament reassembles. If we are not granted that power, of course we shall have to introduce a number of bills to give us authority under statute to continue until that time powers we feel may be essential to meet emergent situations.

For the past several months officers of the Department of Justice and officials of the other departments most directly concerned have had under close examination all the orders in council which derive their authority from these statutes, that is the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945 and the War Measures Act, with a view to the elimination of those no longer necessary to enable the government to deal effectively with problems of the transition period which are national in scope. As a result I am now in a position to make a report to the house on this important subject and to indicate the extent and nature of the problem, giving certain of the more significant figures involved.

Of the total of 7,103 orders in council under the emergency powers, no less than 4,015 already have been revoked or have expired or are spent. Some 90 more can and will be revoked very shortly. Some 624 will be allowed to expire with the expiry of the National Emergency Transtional Powers Act, 1945. It has been found that 127 can be re-enacted adequately under other statutes. Of the balance of 2,247, some 1,541 are minutes authorizing war duties supplements for government employees. The remaining 706 orders in council constitute the real body of the government's existing emergency powers. They cover such miscellaneous and important subjects as the following: the constitution and operation of the various agricultural and fish products boards, by means of which Canadian supplies are maintained and contract commitments met in the critical world food situation; the maintenance and operation of price controls, rationing and distribution; regulations respecting enemy patents and other enemy property; wage control and emergency labour relations regulations: entry into Canada of dependents of ex-service men; the winding up of ex-servicemen's estates; procedure for salvage operations by naval vessels; controls upon the supplies of fuel, timber, steel and construction materials; control of exports, and the operations of the Canadian wheat board. That is not an exhaustive list, but these are specimens.

It will be evident at once that until the peace treaties have been signed and until world conditions have become more settled, many if not all the powers conferred by this group of orders in council will have to be continued for periods of time which will vary according to circumstances. At the same time it will be recognized that it would be a task of major proportions to translate into legislation all the orders in council which in the national interest need to be retained during the transition period.

I might leave the matter at that and give hon. members an opportunity to carefully consider what attitude they may wish to take when the measure is brought forward; but it is the intention of the government to bring in a bill to amend the act as I have just indicated, asking for that extension of time. It may be that hon. members may wish to ascertain the attitude of the government toward some measures I have not mentioned. In connection with anything of the kind the government will endeavour to give the fullest possible information.

In addition to what I have mentioned as to the bills already on the order paper and those that may come to us from the senate, I should mention that there may be some bills arising out of the reports of the committees of the house. One cannot say exactly what they will be until we know what is contained in the reports of the committees. However, I have here a further list of bills that we expect to bring in and dispose of during the present session. They are bills respecting the financing of the Canadian National Railways; to amend the criminal code; to amend the Immigration Act, consequent upon the Canadian Citizenship Act; respecting the Department of National Defence, having to do with the ministers and deputy ministers of the department; to amend the Canadian broadcasting act; respecting the Canadian information service; to amend the Federal District Commission Act; respecting Quebec branch line construction, Canadian National Railways; respecting the Toronto harbour commissioners; respecting merchant seamen's compensation; to amend the National Housing Act, 1944; to amend the Militia Pension Act; to ratify Canada-United Kingdom tax agreements; re Canadian war crimes regulations; possible legislation respecting Canada's membership in the united nations organization, and a possible amendment to the Superannuation Act.
