The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Seventh report of the special committee on veterans affairs.—Mr. Tucker.

First report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Maybank.

THE KING'S BIRTHDAY

RESOLUTION EXTENDING GREETINGS AND GOOD WISHES TO HIS MAJESTY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to-day is the day appointed for the celebration in Canada of the King's birthday, I have the honour to propose, seconded by the Acting Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Graydon) the following motion:

That an humble address be sent to His Majesty, King George VI, in the following words:

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, the members of the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, desire to extend to Your Majesty, on this day set apart for the celebration in Canada of the King's Birthday, our loyal greetings and heartfelt good wishes."

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Acting Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions of this kind it has been customary for the leaders of the various parties to express in some way the feelings of the members of those parties. It would seem to me most appropriate, however, if on this occasion we were to refrain from comment, and the house were simply to rise and to sing God Save the King.

Motion agreed to.

(The members rose and sang God Save the King).

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAMEN'S STRIKE—PRESS REPORT AS TO USE OF TROOPS IN CORNWALL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, of which I have not given him notice. Has the minister any comment to make on the statement so widely publicized in the press of last Saturday that Colonel R. E. A. Morton, officer commanding, Camp Borden, had troops in readiness to proceed to Cornwall if necessary in connection with the strike? This was regarded as intimidation.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I have no comment to make other than that contained in a statement which was issued by my department. No such instructions were given, and Colonel Morton was speaking on his own authority. The statement which I authorized indicated that the district officers commanding are bound to be prepared in the event of the local attorney general calling for aid for the civil power by having troops available to meet that demand. No special arrangements were made, no leave was stopped, and no troops were alerted. I think the statement which Colonel Morton made was no doubt accurate, but it was made entirely on his own authority and responsibility.

Mr. COLDWELL: The point of my question is, should an officer make such a statement without first consulting the department?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is no.

ADVERSE DECISION OF REGIONAL BOARD IN JOINT APPLICATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would the Minister of Labour explain why the regional war labour board of Ontario refused to approve a wage schedule which was mutually agreed to by the management and the union? This question arises over a dispute in connection with an increase in wages between the united steelworkers of America, Fittings Limited and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman knows that his question should be brief and to the point.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I have already given notice to the minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: My answer is—

[Mr. McCuaig.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to place his question on the order paper.

Mr. HANSELL: Would the minister explain why regional boards refuse to approve wage schedules which are agreed upon by management and unions? I have particularly in mind the case of the united steelworkers; I think the minister is aware of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: That question is easily answered. As my hon. friend knows, or probably the people who ask him know quite well, there is a formula, with which any decision made by a regional board has to comply. That obviously is the reason why in some cases the regional boards have turned down applications, even joint applications by employer and employee.

EXPORT OF TRUCK SPRINGS TO DETROIT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): On June 6 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked a question as follows:

> I am informed that steel truck springs are being exported from Canada by War Assets Corporation and Ontario Steel Products to Detroit Steel Products, where a strike is in progress; and in this telegram the charge is made that this is being done in order to break that strike.

I have looked into the circumstances and I may say at once that no springs have been sold or are being shipped to Detroit Steel Products. Some weeks ago a sale of springs was made to the Chrysler Corporation of the United States. These springs had been manufactured by Chrysler Corporation for inclusion in trucks for shipment to England. Certain supply of these was surplus at the Longue Pointe depot, and was sold, with the approval of War Assets Corporation of the United States, to the Chrysler Corporation of the United States. The price was satisfactory and the springs are being shipped in accordance with the terms of the sale.

Mr. COLDWELL: When these springs are badly needed in Canada, is it the policy to sell them to a foreign country?

Mr. HOWE: They are not suitable for any vehicle made for the Canadian market. They were made for a special purpose for shipment overseas.

SUGAR BEET INDUSTRY—PRISONER OF WAR LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize for not answering earlier the question asked on Wednesday last by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) and questions asked by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in reference to the employment of German prisoners of war in the sugar beet industry, but the orders of the day were not reached in time to enable me to reply before.

I am glad to say that with the cooperation of my colleague the Minister of National Defence, Navy and Army (Mr. Abbott) an additional 400 prisoners of war have been made available for the cultivation of sugar beets. Two hundred will be allotted to Ontario and 200 to Manitoba. This means that we shall have a total of 1,222 prisoners of war working on sugar beets in Ontario, 1,116 in Manitoba, 1,449 in Alberta, with others making up a total of 4,000 doing work at various points in the country.

It should be explained that the distribution of these prisoners of war is decided upon by the representatives of the provincial and federal agriculture departments and not by the Department of Labour.

As I have indicated, most of these prisoners of war will be employed on the cultivation of sugar beets. The allocation to southwestern Ontario is considered ample to assure the production required.

Mr. HACKETT: Can the minister say when the two hundred additional prisoners of war mentioned in his answer will be sent to the beet growing industry of southwestern Ontario?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the question should be asked, when will they be sent home? However I may say to my hon. friend that my understanding is that they are on the way now.

STRIKES IN VARIOUS TRADES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Is the minister in a position to make a statement to-day in regard to the seamen's strike, the loggers' strike, and the threatened strike of steelworkers?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): All I can say about the seamen's strike is that the ship operators are meeting in Toronto to-day. As to British Columbia, I am constantly in touch with the provincial authorities, and the situation there is just the same as it was last week.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR COPIES OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT OF MAY 29

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources if he would have copies made of the statement on immigration which he made on May 29 last? Letters are beginning to arrive from people who desire to get relatives out and the simplest way to reply to them would be to send a copy of that statement.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. gentleman is suggesting that I should have copies made for distribution among the members?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: I will do that.

BEEF

INQUIRY AS TO RETAIL PRICE CEILING INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. McMASTER (High Park): In view of the fact that the wholesale ceilings on both red and blue brand beef have advanced four cents a pound, will the Minister of Finance consider raising the retail ceiling, allowing a corresponding increase in the retail sale price to allow the retail butcher a fair margin of profit?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I would not like to give any encouragement whatever to the idea that the retail ceiling on beef may be raised. The wholesale ceiling on red and blue brand beef were adjusted a few weeks ago as an experimental measure. There has been much dispute whether the retail margin was too great or not. If the present arrangement is not working out well, consideration will have to be given to something better, but as I said at the beginning I cannot encourage at all the idea that there will be any raising of the retail price.

Mr. LOCKHART: Are deputations coming to Ottawa to discuss this matter?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

COAL

DOMESTIC FUEL SUPPLY SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement on the coal situation.

In my last review of the coal situation on May 24 I referred chiefly to the position with regard to the supply of coal for industrial use. I did advise the house briefly of the domestic position and stated that it might well be that the household consumer would have to reduce his fuel consumption in the coming winter.

Since that time the anthracite miners in the United States ceased work on May 30. While it has been reported that production will start in these mines on June 10, this stoppage of production has accentuated the short supply situation in domestic fuel and there may not be sufficient of this type of fuel to give every customer his full supply.

It has been the practice for many householders to order and accept delivery of their winter's requirements of coal during the summer months. It is evident that when the supply of preferred coals is short this practice will, unless controlled, lead to a situation where some householders have a full supply and others who, for one reason or another, cannot order their supply in the summer, will be unable to secure their fair proportion.

It has been decided, therefore, to put out an order restricting the delivery of coal for domestic or household consumption. Since the future supply position will remain uncertain for some time to come, it has been necessary to divide the season into two parts. The order provides that no dealer may deliver nor may any consumer accept before November 1, 1946, more than sixty per cent of his normal annual requirements of the preferred classes of coal otherwise defined as class A fuel. The consumer may, at his option, secure in this period an additional twenty per cent of his annual fuel requirements in the form of other coals. In other words, the consumer may, before November 1, order and store eighty per cent of his total annual needs, but only seventy-five per cent of the coal he secures in this period may be class A fuel, which corresponds to sixty per cent of his total annual needs of the preferred type of coal.

Before November 1 I shall be in a position to see what can be done to make up the balance required, and I would assure the house tha every possible effort will be made to provide additional supplies before that date.

Measures have been taken to divert from the railways in western Canada a supply of low volatile briquettes which are acceptable as a replacement for the class A fuels, as defined in the order of last year and are included as a class A fuel in the new order. It is also expected that there will be a substantial increase in the output of these briquettes as soon as the necessary construction material can be secured. Steps are also being taken to increase the output of other western coals both to protect the consumers in western Canada and to provide some surplus for movement to Ontario. It must be realized, however, that the movement east of any large tonnage of coal will conflict with the movement of grain, and not only will it not be difficult to coordinate these two volume movements to secure the most efficient use of the available transportation, but there is also a definite limit to the tonnage which can be moved because of the limit set by the railway facilities available.

In conclusion, I would advise the house that the situation is grave and that unless there is some improvement in the near future it probably will be necessary to take other and more severe measures to ensure a fair and equitable distribution of the fuel that is available.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Is the minister able to make a statement on the additional tonnage of coal from Nova Scotia that will be available in the ordinary course this season for shipment to central Canada?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to make inquiries. The output of Nova Scotia coal has improved considerably. I shall require advice before I can answer the question.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I suggest to the minister that the instructions sent out make clear whether deliveries can be made concurrently of class C and class A fuel, or whether it is permissible to deliver them separately as the dealer may desire? There was considerable confusion over that last year.

Mr. FULTON: In view of the emergency outlined in the minister's statement, will the government consider granting an increase in the subsidy on coal to encourage production in small or marginal mines?

Mr. HOWE: The coal controller is constantly in touch with mines of the class mentioned, and is using his best discretion to do what is necessary in that regard.

RESEARCH COUNCIL

APPOINTMENT OF VICE-PRESIDENTS AND EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, ETC.

The house resumed from Monday, June 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe for the second reading of bill No. 154, to amend the Research Council Act.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): In the remarks made on the resolution which preceded the bill, I set out the purpose of the amendments to the Research Council Act. The intention is to strengthen the top structure of the national research council in order to enable it to carry out its greatly enlarged responsibilities, arising from its growth during the war years.

In the discussion on the resolution it was suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite that the national research council had little revenue other than that voted to it by this parliament. I would point out that in the six years ended April 1 last, the revenue of the research council in payment of services rendered by the council amounted to $4,360,997.13, in addition to which funds were provided by other government departments to pay for work on their problems in the amount of $6,632,122. In addition, the council received the following sums during that period: contributions to the Sir Frederick Banting fund of $1,346,386.66, and in addition a return of $363,496.56 for work performed at the cost of that fund. An amount of $1,900,000 was received from Research Enterprises Limited in payment for development work carried out by the council on radar. This amount was turned back to the consolidated revenue and not accepted by the national research council. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it will be appreciated by hon. members that the work of the national research council involves the expenditures of great sums of money partly voted by parliament and partly earned by the research council itself.

It will perhaps be of interest to hon. members if I run over the purpose of the several amendments proposed.

The amendments to section 4 provide for the appointment of two vice-presidents and for an increase in the size of the honorary council in order that the vice-presidents may sit on the council and also that the various scientific interests covered by the scope of council activities may be represented. Provision is also made for an executive committee with the normal functions.

The amendment to section 2 defines the term "vice-president", and amendments to sections 5 and 8(a) detail the functions of the vice-presidents, the necessary provision for fixing salaries by order in council, and also defining the powers of the executive.

Section 3 makes formal provision for the privy council committee on industrial and scientific research. This committee has functioned since the Research Council Act came into being, but its existence has never been formalized by an act. As it is desired to have the proposed atomic energy board report to cabinet through this same committee, it is necessary to have this committee formalized in the Research Council Act in order that it may be so referred to in other legislation.

The amendment to section 10 merely details certain additional powers of the council in connection with establishing pilot plants and the handling of licensing and patents. There is nothing particularly new in this, but it was thought wise to set down these functions which have already been carried on by the council in the past under the general authority act but which may become more extensive in the future.

Section 14 is a new section which gives the council power to set up corporations to carry on activities that cannot now be easily looked after as part of the general administrative work of the council. For instance, as an incident of the normal work of the council, many inventions arise which must be covered by patents. During war time, most of the inventions were secret and have not been formally patented, but it is certain that during the next few years there will be many patents arising in connection with the council's work on atomic energy developments and the whole range of industrial research. These patents should be exploited in the public interest, but it has been found that the normal set-up of the scientific organization is not suitable for such work. After a great deal of study the council recommended that a corporation similar to the Research Corporation of America be set up. The corporation should be a non-profit organization equipped to receive patents from the research council, other government departments, and any scientific organization, such as universities and public institutions which desire to make use of its facilities.

The Research Corporation of America has served the public welfare in an eminently satisfactory manner, and it is proposed that the Canadian corporation shall function in a similar way. After considering carefully the recommendations of the council, I came to the conclusion that the most satisfactory way of setting up such a corporation would be to have the Research Council Act amended, as proposed, which gives the research council the right to set up and control such a corporation.

It was also recognized that there may be many cases in which an idea originating in one of the council's laboratories would be of no great value until it had been tested out in a pilot plant, yet, after such development, might be very valuable to the country as a whole. The present amendment will give the council adequate facilities in such cases to set up a pilot plant and do the necessary work in order to prove the value of a promising idea that might otherwise never be utilized.

Section 15 is a new section, giving the council power to establish and support a pension scheme, if the governor in council so approves. At the present time very few members of the regular research council staff are under any pension scheme. After a great deal of study of the matter, and after consultation and examination of pension schemes in connection with similar scientific organizations in other countries, the national research council has recommended that a special pension scheme be set up for the national research council scientific staff which will permit the desirable transfer of scientific personnel as between government services, industry and universities, without undue loss to the individual. Such a system has been in satisfactory operation for some years in scientific branches of the British civil service, and there can be little doubt that such a system is desirable in the case of the national research scientific staff.

It should be noted that it is the intention of the council to bring clerical administrative and non-scientific staff under the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and that this amendment is needed for the purpose of enabling a special pension scheme to be set up for the scientific staff if the government so approves.

This is an important bill, Mr. Speaker, but fairly simple in its terms, and I do not think that any further remarks of mine are needed at this time.

Mr. IRVINE: Does the council have in view any investigation or research into social science as well as physical science?

Mr. HOWE: No. That is not within the scope of the Research Council Act.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): This bill, which is numbered 154, amends the Research Council Act. That act was first passed in 1924, and there have been no amendments since it was originally adopted, which is something very unusual in the history of legislation in recent years, either in this house or in any of the provincial legislatures.

The duties of the research council are set out in section 6 of the act as originally passed, which reads:

> The council shall have charge of all matters affecting scientific and industrial research in Canada which may be assigned to it by the committee and shall also have the duty of advising the committee on questions of scientific and technological methods affecting the expansion of Canadian industries or the utilization of the natural resources of Canada.

[Mr. Howe.]

The committee referred to in that section is the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research. I think the minister will agree with me that that committee of the cabinet has in effect not been functioning in recent years. The other day he was asked to name the members of the cabinet on that committee and he could not do so, at least he named some but could not name them all. He said also that they met only once a year and that to consider the annual report of the research council. I am afraid therefore that the committee of the cabinet has had very little to do with the operation of the research council in recent years.

The bill before the house to-day does not propose any changes in the duties of the research council but it does aim to give the council the power to carry on the expanded work which it undertook during the war. Naturally the demands of war time meant a great increase in the work being done by the research council and also a great increase in staff. The council and its employees are to be congratulated on the work done for Canada and for the other allied nations during the war.

The official opposition take it that the main purpose of this amending bill is to provide for the continuation of this expanded work during peace time, and deeming this to be the main purpose of the bill we are glad to support it, although at the same time we disapprove of some of the provisions of the bill.

The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has given us this afternoon a brief summary of the provisions of the bill. He has pointed out that whereas formerly there was just a president, there are now to be a president and two vice-presidents. I believe the intention is that one of the vice-presidents shall be in charge of the scientific work of the council while the other will be in charge of administrative work. The minister pointed out also that further provision is now being made with regard to the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research, and we hope that committee will take this new work very seriously. If a cabinet committee is vitally interested in research, that in itself should mean a great deal in the development of research activities in Canada.

The minister mentioned the fact that there is to be an executive committee of the research council. Under the original act there were only fifteen members of the council. That number is now raised to twenty and provision is made for a small executive committee, to consist of the president, two vice-presidents, and three other members. Perhaps that is necessary in order to strengthen the functioning of the council, but it may also have the effect of taking away some of the responsibilities of the council as a whole. Probably the council will not meet so often, and a good deal of the work hitherto done by the fifteen members will in future be done by the six members of the executive committee.

The bill gives power to the council to carry particular works past the stage of pure research. That is to be found in section 7 to the provisions of which, this afternoon, the minister made some reference. One of the powers is the power to manufacture. We should like to know just how far the council is to go in manufacturing. If the intention is that it shall not go into manufacturing as that term is generally interpreted in Canada, then there is no serious objection. But if it is the intention that the council shall go into manufacturing as an ordinary business man would understand it, serious objection can be taken to the change.

There is also provision for licensing, selling or otherwise granting or making available patent rights or any other rights owned by the council. Under the original act all inventions made by technical employees of the council vest in the research council. Here power is given to the council to dispose of these rights. This provision calls for a more detailed explanation from the minister, and I propose to say something further about it in a few minutes.

There are two further powers of which we on this side of the house strongly disapprove: first, the power to procure the incorporation of crown companies, and, second, the power to assume the shares of crown companies which have already been incorporated. I shall have something further to say about these questions also.

The Progressive Conservative party favour the active promotion of scientific and industrial research in Canada. We believe that research is vital to Canada, perhaps more so than to any other country. The war has given Canada a great impetus. In this country there has been a tremendous development of production of both manufactured goods and foodstuffs. Canada has made great strides. One reason for that, of course, was that we were not subject to attack; we were free from bombs and invading forces; therefore we had every opportunity to make progress. Among the nations of the world Canada has reached a position quite out of proportion to her population.

In order to retain that position we feel that Canada must make the best possible use not only of her natural resources but also of Canadian brains. Already we have many fully trained and talented scientists doing research work, and we have the young men and women with the native ability to become great scientists. Hundreds, I dare say thousands, of them have already done so. In every part of Canada we have universities which are well able to train young people for this scientific research.

Not only have we the human resources but we have large areas practically untouched. Take for example, the northwest territories, where uranium has been found, probably the most valuable natural resource in the world to-day. No one knows how many more deposits of uranium may be found there. Prospecting parties go out each year to find other deposits, and there can be little doubt that many valuable deposits not only of uranium but also of other minerals will be found in that territory. In the northern part of British Columbia large coal deposits are lying untouched. Explorations are by no means complete. It might be possible to find there sufficient coal to change the whole picture of Canada's fuel production. Canadians cannot go too far in trying to develop their natural resources, particularly in parts of the country which are as yet unopened.

In any event, whether this is so or not, research is of vital importance to Canada, and in order to do that research we have the research council; but it is only one body doing that work. We also have certain departments of the dominion government. Take as an example the Department of Agriculture. Outstanding research work has been done by scientists in that department. One example is the development of wheat. We would not be producing anything like the wheat crops we do now if it had not been for research work carried on here in Ottawa by scientists of the Department of Agriculture. The same thing is true of the Department of Mines and Resources. Scientists in that department are carrying on research in many different fields. The Department of Fisheries are also working along that line. The fisheries of Canada are limited largely to the maritime provinces and the west coast, although there is also an extensive fishing industry in Manitoba. On the two coasts excellent research work has been done by the Department of Fisheries. We should not get the idea that the only research in Canada is that which is carried on by the research council.

The provincial governments too have been carrying on useful research, largely in connection with industries which are the most important to the respective provinces. Private industry also has been carrying on extensive research. There are all these ways of developing research in Canada.

We doubt very much the wisdom of putting the research council into business. Its name has been made by research, not by doing business, and yet there are changes in this bill which indicate that from now on the research council may be put into business, may be operating companies. As an example, the minister said that the council may be operating a plant at Chalk River. There is also the suggestion that it might be carrying on mining operations in the northwest territories, where uranium is found. We suggest to him that the research council is not designed for that type of work, and if there is placed upon it the responsibility for carrying on such operations, it is possible that the efficiency of the council will be undermined.

The house has not been given complete information with regard to the policy on patents, and we would like to have further explanation from the minister. We do notice that section 11 of the Research Council Act had this provision with regard to patents:

All discoveries, inventions and improvements in processes, apparatus or machines, made by a member or any number of members of the technical staff of the council shall be vested in the council and shall be made available to the public under such conditions and payment of fees or royalties or otherwise as the council may determine, subject to the approval of the governor in council.

I direct attention particularly to the words "shall be made available to the public". I take it that the intention, when the Research Council Act was passed originally, was that any inventions of officers of the council, who are public servants, would be made available to any Canadians who could use them in carrying on their business. I would ask the minister if there has been any change in that policy. Those words do not appear in the bill before the house, and it may be the intention now to make money out of these inventions —

Mr. HOWE: It always was.

Mr. GREEN: —and that if an officer of the council makes an invention, it shall be sold to the person who can pay the highest price. The minister had something to say on the point on May 27, as reported at page 1898 of Hansard. I quote:

Discoveries of the national research council are patented and it is now the practice to patent all discoveries of reasonable value. Many are in use and many patent holders already pay fees to the council for the use of the patents. Hon. members will agree that anyone wishing to use a patent of the national research council should pay its full market value, and it is to obtain the revenue that should properly come from the patents of the council that the proposed corporation to handle patents is to be established.

We must consider where a policy of that kind may lead. Let us suppose for example that an invention of an officer of the research council is sold to a firm which forms part of a cartel. In such event the research council is, in effect, helping to strengthen cartels. In so doing it may be going directly contrary to the ideas expressed in the report on Canada and International Cartels which was brought in by Mr. F. A. McGregor. It may also mean that Canada would be helping in the formation and functioning of international cartels. Surely that is not the purpose for which the research council was set up. I would refer hon. members to page 45 of that report, where we find a section dealing with the relation of patents to cartels and combines. Mr. McGregor sets out, for one thing, the following:

The essential purposes of the patent law of Canada are expressed in the following extract from section 65 of the Patent Act:

"Patents for new invention are granted not only to encourage invention, but to secure that new inventions shall so far as possible be worked on a commercial scale in Canada without undue delay."

I suggest it should be basic that, rather than having patents sold, for example, to one firm, inventions made by research council officers should be made available as widely and as quickly as possible to all Canadians who can make honest use of them. In any event, in his speech this afternoon the minister used words which indicated that these patents were to be exploited in the public interest. He should go a good deal farther in explaining what he means by that statement.

I now come to the provision for the setting up of crown companies. This is contained in section 9 of the bill, where it is set out as a new section 14 of the Research Council Act giving the research council power to incorporate crown companies. This of course is done with the approval of the governor in council. Under this provision the research council will now have the right to form any number of crown companies. The minister was asked about this during the debate on the resolution. The discussion on the point is reported at page 1897 of Hansard as follows:

Mr. Howe: . . . I have no desire to limit the number of companies which the research council can have. If it needs twenty, then it should have twenty.

That, of course, is carrying this business of crown companies much farther than it has been carried hitherto, because until the introduction of this measure, crown companies were set up under the minister's department. Here, however, the power is no longer in the department, but rather in the research council. If this can be done, there is no reason why the national harbours board or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation could not be given power to set up crown companies. Amendments could be brought in authorizing such procedure by those organizations. This is going just one stage farther than up to this date the government has gone. These companies will be just one step farther removed from parliamentary control.

In the debate on the government companies operations bill I enumerated our objections to crown companies, and I do not intend to repeat those objections in detail to-day. I stated that crown companies are not subject to municipal, provincial or federal taxation; that they establish a super civil service which does not function under the Civil Service Act; that they will compete with private industry, and that they open the flood gates to socialism.

The minister admitted in the debate on an earlier occasion that the research council could do anything these companies will be able to do. That is recorded at page 2188 of Hansard, where we find this, in reply to my question:

Mr. Howe: Of course, but my hon. friend will remember that anything the companies could do, the national research council could do without the companies.

Mr. Green: I suggest to the minister that that is a very good reason why the national research council does not need to set up companies at all.

We suggest to the minister that if companies are required to carry out some of the functions of the research council, such companies should be set up by separate bills. If the minister wants a company to deal with patents, and other rights of that type, then let him bring a bill before the house, at which time he could explain the need for such company. All the powers and all the surrounding facts could be thoroughly considered by the house. I understood the minister to say this afternoon that the crown company to be set up to deal with patents would have to do not only with those owned by the research council but also with inventions made by the universities and other bodies doing research work. I may have been wrong in taking that meaning from what he said, but his words led me to believe that that is what he meant. It is another reason why the proposed companies should not be set up by the research council, but rather under statute of this parliament.

In conclusion may I repeat what I said in opening. We approve the main principle of this bill because we are strongly in favour of research being carried on to the utmost, but we reserve our right to oppose certain provisions of the bill as it is at present before the house.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the leader of this group made our position clear the other day when he spoke briefly to the resolution. I quote from page 1886 of Hansard:

Speaking briefly to this resolution, No. 14, may I point out that we welcome the proposals contained in it, and look forward to the introduction of the bill. We have long been of the opinion that an expansion of our scientific activities is essential at this time. As a matter of fact, what I fear is that people in public life—political leaders, and in some degree men in charge of our defence forces—are failing to exercise, in the matter of scientific progress, that degree of imagination the scientists themselves are exercising.

When we consider the contribution that scientific workers made during the war years I am sure all members of parliament will support any resolution that will enable Canada to play a more prominent part in the scientific progress of the future than we have in the past. Like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I am fearful that we shall be unable to recruit in Canada or retain in Canada sufficient scientific personnel to cope with the problems before us.

This problem is not peculiar to Canada. I have been interested in reading "Endless Horizons", written by Vannevar Bush, in which he outlines some of the problems confronting the United States. He mentions that President Roosevelt wrote to him on November 17, 1944, requesting recommendations, in the following words:

(1) What can be done, consistent with military security, and with the prior approval of the military authorities, to make known to the world as soon as possible the contributions which have been made during our war effort to scientific knowledge?

(2) With particular reference to the war of science against disease, what can be done now to organize a programme for continuing in the future the work which has been done in medicine and related sciences?

(3) What can the government do now and in the future to aid research activities by public and private organizations?

While I do not go all the way with the writer of that book, I think some of his observations would apply to the Canadian scene. In the chapter entitled "War against Disease" he writes:

The death rate for all diseases in the army, including the overseas forces, was reduced from 14·1 per thousand in the last war to 0·6 per thousand in world war II.

Such ravaging diseases as yellow fever, dysentery, typhus, tetanus, pneumonia, and meningitis have been all but conquered by penicillin and the sulfa drugs, the insecticide DDT, better vaccines, and improved hygienic measures. Malaria has been controlled. There has been dramatic progress in surgery.

The striking advances in medicine during the war were possible only because we had a large backlog of scientific data accumulated through basic research in many scientific fields in the years before the war.

In the last 40 years life expectancy in the United States has increased from 49 to 65 years largely as a consequence of the reduction in the death rates of infants and children; in the last 20 years the death rate from the diseases of childhood has been reduced 87 per cent.

He mentions some of the diseases which affect us in middle life and which so far have not been conquered. He refers in particular to cardio-vascular diseases, including chronic disease of the kidneys, arteriosclerosis, cerebral hemorrhage and other diseases which now account for such large loss of life. He says that if we are prepared to carry on scientific work in peace time as we did in war time we can expect great discoveries in these fields. In the chapter on the deficit of scientists, he says:

As a result an accumulating deficit of trained research personnel will continue for many years. The deficit of science and technology students who, but for the war, would have received bachelor's degrees is about 150,000. The deficit of those holding advanced degrees—that is, young scholars trained to the point where they are capable of carrying on original work—has been estimated as amounting to about 17,000 by 1955 in chemistry, engineering, geology, mathematics, physics, psychology, and the biological sciences.

While a similar study has not been undertaken in Canada I am sure the situation is identical here.

In the annual report of the national research council for 1944-45 there is a summary of the scholarships which have been granted since 1917-18. A total of 168 fellowships have been granted; 483 studentships, and bursaries totalling 542. The amount actually expended by the council was $827,788.81. When one considers the contribution made by many of the men and women who have been working as a result of these scholarships, one must agree that this is a very small amount to expend. The research council should have available much larger sums so that continuous work may be carried on in a great many other fields.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who seems to be much concerned about certain sections of the new bill. I think he was hardly fair in suggesting that the research council will be able to establish crown corporations without reference to the minister.

Mr. GREEN: I said, subject to the governor in council.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I did not hear the hon. member mention governor in council. It says, "the council may with the approval of the governor in council." I think that should appear on the record. That means that the research council cannot proceed to set up a new company or take over a company without some reference to the elected representatives of the people.

Mr. FRASER: Just to the governor in council.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We have some say as to what will be done. From time to time we shall have a chance to express an opinion as to whether the action which has been taken has been in the public interest or not. I cannot see any good reason why the national research council should not set up crown corporations to engage in the manufacture of certain products that are for the use of the people.

May I remind the house that when insulin was discovered the late Sir Frederick Banting was offered, so I am informed, over a million dollars to make his discovery available to private industry. But being a great scientist and humanitarian he was not tempted by the offer. Fortunately for those who suffer from diabetes, insulin has been made available to patients without some private corporation having a tremendous rake-off.

One of the recent contributions of the national research council was the discovery of glycol, which I understand has performed very well as an anti-freeze in automobiles. This discovery, I understand, has been turned over to the Saskatchewan wheat pool, which will use it in the public interest. I think the national research council would have been within its rights if it had decided that this anti-freeze, developed at no little public expense, should be produced to serve the Canadian people at the lowest cost and that any profit made should go into the general revenues of the country rather than into the pockets of Imperial Oil or of some cartels that my hon. friends were worried about. This would not be something new. In Saskatchewan some years ago when the farmers were suffering heavy losses from encephalomyelitis in horses, the university of Saskatchewan manufactured and sold chick vaccine, which had proved a successful remedy in combatting this disease. Otherwise the farmers would have been obliged to pay a much higher price for it and would have lost more of their live stock, thereby imposing a much greater burden on the people of the province. I can see no reason why, if from time to time valuable discoveries are made by research council scientists in fields hitherto unknown in Canada, the results of their investigations should not be used for and by the people. It is true that the national research council has not had experience in this field, but there is no fundamental reason why an organization which made such an excellent contribution during the war should not extend its activities and produce additional revenue in further justification of its existence.

One would not expect that we would go along with the Progressive Conservatives in their protests against section 9, which gives authority to incorporate or take over crown companies already in existence. It was demonstrated during the war that we could not depend upon private industry to do all the research work that was required, and the council having done research work in so many fields there is no reason why the people generally should not enjoy the benefits of that work.

When the resolution was before the committee the minister said, at page 1891 of Hansard:

> There should be a considerable turnover of research men. In other words, people should move from universities into the government service, and after they have made their contribution there they should move back to the universities. In government there should be a good deal of moving from one department of research to another department, from one type of research to another. There should be moving from public research into private research, and from private research into public research.

At the time I questioned the wisdom of that policy in an organization such as the research council. I can understand the younger personnel might like to spend some years in western Canada, or in the maritimes, or on the frontier, studying various problems. But many research problems require for their solution the work of a lifetime, and I think that a policy such as the minister outlined should be applied very cautiously. My point the other day was that these men should not leave the research council because of more attractive salaries outside the service. When the agriculture estimates were before the committee I had something to say on a comparison between the salaries of the scientific personnel in the Department of Agriculture in Canada and the salaries for similar work in the United States and Great Britain. The information I gave at that time indicated that in practically every classification the agriculture scientist in Canada received much less attractive remuneration than his fellow scientist in Great Britain or in the United States.

I have here the report of the royal commission on technical and professional services, published in 1930, better known as the Beatty report. The commission consisted of the late Sir Edward Beatty, then president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, J. George Garneau, and Walter C. Murray, of the university of Saskatchewan. In its report the commission pointed out:

> It is only within the last three generations that even the most advanced of modern democracies have felt sufficient confidence in their mechanism of public administration, to launch boldly upon their new tasks. The change in the attitude of government to national problems and its willingness to satisfy demands for legislative action, to meet new and complex economic and social conditions, were preceded by the creation of a body of trained experts and administrators, in the service of the state, who could safely be entrusted with the important responsibilities of efficient government administration . . .
> The problems of government are becoming ever more complex; the effectiveness of government action must be limited, to a substantial extent, by the quality of the civil service, which is called upon to investigate many subjects of national importance demanding consideration by the government, as well as to make governmental policies effective and governmental decisions operative; and we believe that no more important task confronts those in charge of the country's affairs, than that of improving, and continuing to improve, by every means at their disposal, the quality of the Civil Service of Canada.

They were disturbed in 1930 at the tendency of civil servants, particularly scientific men, to leave the government service for private industry. They say in their report:

> In certain respects, it is true, the civil servant is at no disadvantage, or even at a positive advantage, when compared with other workers of his own kind in private employment.

They observed that those who continue in the service find in a very few years that those who have left it for private industry have much more remunerative positions. In appendix C is given a table showing the average earned income of McGill graduates in engineering at certain intervals after graduation, from which I find that after twenty years those who are with the government service average an annual salary of $3,560; teachers, $4,250; all classes, $9,300; which would indicate that the graduates in engineering who select government employment for a career are sorry after they have been in it for a year or two, because the government employees after twenty years receive an average salary only about one-third of the average remuneration of all other classes.

The report has a special section dealing with the national research council, in which it is pointed out that:

The Canadian scale of salaries under the lowest grade (grade 6) is very slightly higher than that of the United States (grade 9), but in the higher grades the salaries proposed for Canada are substantially less than those paid under the United States scale; for example, the salaries on the scale proposed for Canada range from $2,100, the minimum for the lowest grade, to $8,000.

—whereas in the United States the maxima are a great deal higher. Away back in 1930 this commission made certain recommendations as to what salaries should be paid to the employees of the national research council if we were to hold in Canada the type of men and women essential to do the work which must be done by the national research council. I was interested in the opinions expressed by the Canadian Association of Scientific Workers, Ottawa branch, in a statement presented recently to the Gordon commission, having to do with the problems of the scientific worker from their point of view. They express this opinion:

For years prior to the war it has been the accepted custom for many of our best scientists to proceed to the United States to pursue their careers. This caused no great concern because at that time Canada had no large scientific programme. With the advent of the war the situation changed radically. The national safety and welfare required the immediate inauguration of a large scale programme of scientific research in a number of fields. To-day it is almost universally recognized that Canada must continue to carry on scientific research at the war-time level, and that in fact, the scope of this activity must be expended if Canada is to take her rightful place in the post-war world . . . To-day our experienced scientists and those just graduating from the universities are acutely aware of the better opportunities in the United States, where in some cases the salaries offered are two to three times those being paid for similar work in Canada.

Last January and February I visited the university of California at Los Angeles and Berkeley, and was surprised to find so many Canadians had gone down there. While they like the climate of sunny California, they are loyal to Canada, and if they could return here at half the salaries they are receiving in the United States they would be interested in coming. True, the cost of living is higher down there, but even so they feel that the standard of living is a great deal higher in the United States for men in scientific work than it is in any part of Canada.

The association goes on to point out:

We do not need to look to the future to find a serious threat to the maintenance of an adequate programme of scientific research. To-day, even with the restriction placed on the movements of our scientists, whole projects are being jeopardized because key men have left and are leaving. The loss of these individual specialists is serious enough, but the real calamity lies in the fact that in many cases they are indispensable members of research teams. When one of these men leaves, the whole programme is disrupted for a considerable period. This is the situation to-day and it will become worse until the status of Canadian scientists is radically improved.

Certain definite recommendations are made:

1. The first and most important consideration is the implementation of a salary schedule that will be commensurate with the training, experience, and abilities of the personnel engaged in scientific and technical work. The Canadian Association of Scientific Workers proposes a salary schedule which corresponds roughly to the recommendations of the Beatty commission made in 1929, although the scale is appreciably higher for the more senior grades. This schedule is equivalent to that proposed by the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario and supported by the Federation of Employee Engineers and Scientists.

They suggest that those who are doing scientific work should be given an automatic annual increment of $150 up to the top of the professional grade 3, $3,900, and that beyond this level promotion should be at the discretion of a review committee consisting of scientists and others. They add:

It is emphasized that this is proposed only as an essential minimum for qualified scientific personnel, and that those individuals with special ability are expected to advance more rapidly. An important feature of the schedule is that the senior scientist is not required to carry out specific administrative duties in order to receive the higher salaries. It is felt that the public service of Canada should be prepared, when the occasion demands it, to obtain the very best scientific man available. He may be a man with no inclination or special ability for administrative work, and it is felt that no arbitrary ceiling should be placed on his salary on this account.

The most significant distinction between this recommended schedule and the Beatty report is the guaranteed annual increment up to $3,900 per year. This, we submit, is absolutely indispensable to the maintenance of efficiency and morale of the scientific branches of the public service. It means that the requirement of a special order in council to enable a scientist to be promoted from one grade to the next would be eliminated.

Another recommendation is:

In recent years a number of women have entered the scientific and engineering professions, and, in spite of the important contributions they have made, almost without exception they have received salaries lower than men with similar experience and training. It is recommended that steps be taken to eliminate this discrimination as it leads only to dissatisfaction and reduced standards, and tends to discourage women from entering these professions at a time when the country urgently needs people with the special abilities required of the scientist.

I am sure that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mrs. Strum) would underscore this suggestion. The third recommendation is:

We urge that every effort should be made to remove all considerations of colour, race or religion from the choice of applicants for civil service positions so that there will be no danger of the public service of Canada being deprived of the services of competent scientists on these grounds. There appears to be no satisfactory explanation for the query regarding race which exists on the application for employment of the National Research Council.

4. It is urged that there be greater cooperation and interchange of personnel between the universities and the government scientific services. This type of cooperation has already been carried out in a commendable way through the various associate committees of the National Research Council, but it should be extended both in relation to the National Research Council and other government departments.

If the minister had it in his mind to suggest that research workers should move around, I think it should be supported. Work in other countries might be of great value to the council's personnel; and, as the universities have found it practicable and useful to provide a sabbatical year for their staffs, I believe the national research council would find it a very good investment to make it possible periodically for those who are doing research work to visit other parts of the world, without loss of salary.

6. A superannuation scheme is required that will ensure that term appointees suffer no loss when they leave the service after a reasonable period of time.

7. We urge that in all reclassifications of the salaries of scientists, and in other matters concerning their welfare, representatives of the scientists themselves, drawn from all grades, should be consulted before such decisions are made, and every effort should be made to acquaint these representatives with all the factors governing the decisions. We submit that if this policy were to be carried out it would result in improved efficiency in the scientific services, and would constitute an important step toward solving the critical problem of keeping our scientists in Canada.

There is one other matter with which I should like to deal briefly before I conclude. I have been speaking chiefly of the work of the scientific personnel. I understand that the technical staff of the national research council are in an even worse position than the scientific personnel. I find that the maximum salary available is very low, taking into account the importance of the work they must do. It is folly to have well-qualified scientists in a laboratory if the technical personnel, who are essential if the research work is to be done, are not adequately paid. I am told that some of the technical personnel who have been there for several years receive much smaller compensation than the janitor staff. I know the janitor's work is important, and I should be the last to suggest that anyone doing such work is overpaid. But those who have special qualifications and are doing important work should be paid at least as much as those who are doing janitor's work. I hope that when we are in committee the minister will make some statement as to the salaries being paid to the technical personnel in the various departments of the national research council. I hope he will also answer questions regarding the years of service of members of his staff and tell us something about the promotion they have had. I am thinking of the salaries I have seen set out in the public accounts as being paid to some of the men who were with me in the university twenty years ago. I had the greatest respect for them in those days, and have always had. I know that many of them worked nights and on Sundays in the investigation of research problems which were more important to them than playing rugby or hockey or basketball, and many of them have been as conscientious since joining the staff of the council as they were in their undergraduate days.

I cannot see any good reason why many of those who have their doctor of philosophy degree and have been for so many years with the council should not be in higher salary brackets than they are, and the same applies to the president. I know that the president is receiving a substantial salary, but I attach much more importance to the job he is doing than I do to that of the governor of the Bank of Canada. I suggest that from the president down the salaries of the scientific and technical employees of the council should be revised upward.

During the war the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply adopted the policy that whatever was physically possible and necessary would have to be made financially possible, and many unorthodox things were done. I suggest that now the national research council is under his supervision those engaged in research should receive as much as those in comparable positions in other government departments and in private industry.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): The bill before us is a bill to amend the Research Council Act in the year 1946. We have passed through the most tragic war in history and we are now in the age, above all ages, in which mankind can produce, or has the best possible chance of producing, all the good things that are necessary for a high standard of living in the world.

We are now considering a Research Council Act which, I take it, might be assumed to point out the ideals of the government with respect to the needs of Canada for national research during the next few years. Let us view the act for a short while in the light of that fact. The bill is a good one as far as it goes, but it does not go nearly far enough. In fact, it stops practically where it ought to start.

The war caused the expansion of the research council's work. What for? To help Canada and her allies to win the war. The close of the war ought to cause the expansion of the council's work. What for? To help Canada and her allies win the peace. Shall we consider the act for a few moments in the light of that state of affairs? In order to do so, shall we ask ourselves this most challenging question: What is the problem which, above all other problems, needs to be solved in order that Canada should aid her allies in winning the peace? After answering that question to our satisfaction, let us ask this other question: Does this act apparently envisage the carrying on of such investigations by the national research council as would enable Canada to solve that problem?

To help the united nations win the peace, the council ought to study the problems of social science, the problem of how to enable mankind to live together. Surely that must be obvious. The science of producing goods and services has already progressed so far that production has far outstripped consumption. It had done so fifteen years ago. Canadians do not know how to distribute fully what they have now learned to produce; yet this act is apparently to concentrate on the problem of greater production and to give no attention whatsoever to the problem of consumption or distribution.

Any government that is willing to face realities realistically should have provided that its research council should concentrate much of its effort upon the problem of how to distribute. Recently it has been said that the science of living together has lagged far behind. It is well said. Then let us by all means bring up to date our social science or science of living together.

Even before the war Canada needed a new method of distribution. What caused the depression which blighted this nation in the ten years preceding the war? What caused it if not the fact that we had learned how to produce more than we could distribute? An hon. member will recall, it was commonly said in those days that we had overproduction. After the word had been used for about five years, someone suggested that we ought to say underconsumption instead of overproduction. That was the wise thing to say under the circumstances.

During the war our productive capacity expanded tremendously, and to no man in Canada will history accord more honour for that achievement than to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), who is now piloting this bill through the house. The figures which have been used rather commonly are these, that during the last year of the war Canada was producing nine billion dollars' worth of goods in a year. If that seems to the minister not the right figure he might interject a correction, but, as I recall, those are the figures which were used by the Bank of Canada.

Surely, now that the war is over, the necessity for a new and scientific method of distribution is greatly aggravated. If we needed such a method before the war, how much greater is our need now? This was true even before the discovery of atomic energy. To use the abundance resulting from the industrial employment of atomic energy, we simply must have a scientific method of distribution. Great numbers of machines have never been permitted to come into use because they would have thrown so many men out of employment that the millions of the world would have been thrown into chaos. What an inconceivable number of men are likely to be thrown out of work by the industrial use of atomic energy, the mind really dreads to contemplate. What unimaginable chaos would result from the stupendous production attainable through the use of atomic energy, coupled with the tragically ineffective distribution system which has afflicted mankind and still prevails, one recoils from considering.

To illustrate how serious the situation is for the world, may I refer to a statement made during the war by the late President Roosevelt? As I recall it, he made the statement in October, 1944. He said that after the war he wanted the United States to find sixty million jobs by trebling her exports of goods into the markets of the world. In other words, the United States was planning to export sixty millions of her unemployed and distribute them hither and yon among the populations of the helpless peoples with whom she traded. That fact is tragic, is it not? If under the system we were using, the United States felt she had to export enough goods to give sixty million unemployed a job, what can be said of Britain and Canada? What must their needs be? The United States is one of the most fortunate nations on the face of the earth. She is practically self-sufficient; she has over 130 millions of people; she has an industrial equipment second to none in the world; she has a transportation system adequate to the carrying to and fro of all her goods to her people; she has financial strength which dominates the whole world. How can one possibly find a more complete condemnation of the method of distribution which we now use? Where can one find more potent evidence that we should set our national research council to work learning how we can distribute the goods which we produce without such extravagant measures as President Roosevelt was meditating when he made the statement?

In my judgment the bill—and I speak with all deference to the minister, a man for whom I have the highest esteem—is simply utterly inadequate. If you ask me what we Social Crediters think of the principle of the bill, there it is. It provides for more productive science discoveries, but no social science discoveries whatsoever.

How serious is the need of a new system of distribution in Canada? It can be shown by a letter which was written to me on September 25, 1945, by Mr. J. L. Forsyth, statistician of the dominion bureau of statistics, dealing with the wage rates prevailing in Canada in the years 1940 to 1941. This letter shows up the kind of problem which, above all others, the Canadian government should, in my judgment, be concerned with. To-day we have strikes in every direction, trouble and unhappiness. What is the matter? Surely we should be examining into that problem, and it looks to me as though the national research council ought to be the body charged with the responsibility of so doing. May I read Mr. Forsyth's letter? It is as follows:

> Further to our telephone conversation of this morning regarding the percentage of wage-earners receiving various amounts of income.
> The percentage of wage-earners earning less than $450 for the twelve months' period prior to date of the census, June 2, 1941, was 32·9 per cent; 28·7 per cent of the wage-earners reported earnings between $450 and $949; 29·9 per cent earned between $950 and $1,949, and 6·8 per cent earned $1,950 and over. 1·7 per cent of the wage-earners did not state the amount of earnings for the year.
> For your information I am enclosing herewith census bulletins showing the earnings of wage-earners by occupation and the earnings and employment of wage-earners for the various census divisions or counties as well as a number of urban centres in Canada. The above statistics are taken from these bulletins.
> Yours very truly,
> J. L. Forsyth,
> Statistician.

In reviewing the letter we notice the following salient facts: 32·9 per cent of the Canadian wage-earners received in the year prior to June, 1941, less than $450 a year. I submit this simple question to hon. members: Do you suppose that any person in Canada should be obliged to work for an income as low as that? Yet apparently nobody knows what to do to change that tragic situation except by strikes. Then 28·7 per cent of the wage-earners earned between $450 and $949. This means that 61·6 per cent of the wage-earners of Canada received less than $950 a year, during a time when in order to support a family in decency and with the necessities of health they should have received $1,500 a year. If you want a problem for the national research council to sink its teeth into there you have it; how to adjust that grotesque, fantastic imbalance in our Canadian way of life. And 91·5 per cent of all the wage-earners in Canada received less than $1,950 a year. I do not believe that any family in Canada, if it has one or two children, ought to be called on to live on less than $2,000 a year. What are we going to do about it? There is the problem. I think I have said enough in a general way.

Mr. GRAYDON: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We have "hear, hear" from the helpless creatures who have no idea what to do about the situation and who are quite contented to rest and leave it as it is. That is a pathetic situation, and yet they call themselves progressive. If you need anything to point to the complete irony of the situation there you have it.

This bill reflects upon the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). While we were discussing the atomic bomb question last year he said, as reported at page 3638 of Hansard of December 17, 1945:

> We should, by every means in our power, support and strengthen every agency of international cooperation and understanding which can help to make the world community a reality.

I submit that it is utterly impossible for Canada to do to-day what the Prime Minister said we ought to do, so long as we depend entirely upon international trade as a mechanism for the distribution of goods. All we are doing at the present time is depending upon international trade as a mechanism for distribution. Under the circumstances failure to make provision for the submission of this problem to the research council is a reflection upon the membership of the house, and especially upon the government.

This bill could have offered means of supporting the ideals behind the Atlantic charter, but it fails to do so. In fact, if this is all the government has to offer for the solution of our problems—and I presume it is—it betrays the Atlantic charter.

I would assume that all hon. members have received copies of this excellent booklet "Into the Atomic Age", which has been distributed by the Montreal Standard. At page 18 they will find an article by Albert Einstein, from which I should like to quote briefly:

> We delivered this weapon into the hands of the American and the British people as trustees of the whole of mankind, as fighters for peace and liberty.
> But so far we fail to see any guarantee of peace, we do not see any guarantee of the freedoms that were promised to the nations in the Atlantic charter. The war is won, but the peace is not. The great powers, united in fighting, are now divided over the peace settlements. The world was promised freedom from fear, but in fact fear has increased tremendously since the termination of the war.
> The world was promised freedom from want, but large parts of the world are faced with starvation while others are living in abundance.

This serves to indicate the lines along which this man's thoughts are travelling. I wonder if that great scientist would look with complete approval upon the bill we are considering today. I wonder if he would say that it makes provision for the solution of the problem upon which he puts his finger.

I have no further remarks at the present time. I am sorry the bill is no better than it is. Our group will approve it, so far as it goes. But may I most earnestly urge upon the minister that he do not leave this matter of how we may live together in the world without first making provision, even in this session, for some competent body of eminent students to take over the problem and endeavour to learn how we may live together, how we may distribute that abundance internally and internationally which the great Creator has enabled us in this remarkable age to produce. I leave that earnest request with the minister.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to express my support of the principle of the bill, and to make a few observations with regard to two sections in it. I have listened with keen interest to the debate. In my view, our aggressive Conservative friends are too nervous in respect of this legislation from their point of view, and some of our other hon. friends are too optimistic regarding its socialistic possibilities.

As I view it, this is a minor development of state capitalism, and common sense indicates that it is correct action. But I want to say this, that I object to the new section 14 which provides that with the approval of the governor in council the council may procure the incorporation of one or more companies.

We are at a time in our history when, whether our development along the lines of state capitalism will be democratic or whether it will evolve into a fascist state, depends upon our actions in this parliament. If one studies carefully the early history of the fascist regime in Germany, and gives careful consideration to the legislation passed in those early days of Hitler's power, he will find that a number of bills of this type, which gave the government wide power and established what we would describe as crown companies, or organizations, which could carry on their future operations without reference to the representatives of the people, were forced through the German reichstag. In Germany that was a development of state capitalism, the real motives of which were covered with a facade of socialist terminology; but that facade of socialist terminology actually concealed monopolistic intentions and developments.

That is why I take strong objection to the section which provides that the governor in council only may give permission to incorporate companies. I believe that if these companies are to serve the people and if we are to assure the democratic development of this type of state capitalism, such companies must be born as the result of parliamentary action, and should report to parliament. In my opinion, the representatives of the people should have an opportunity to examine the objectives of these companies, as well as their financial arrangements and development, how their whole scheme of organization is related to our economy as a whole, and to decide whether the work they are doing is in the interests of the general public. Therefore I believe that we are taking a step in the wrong direction when, under the authority of the governor in council alone, we consent to the organization of crown companies for the purpose of implementing public ownership.

In addition, I believe that the patents covering discoveries should remain the property of the people, through the companies concerned. Section 7 (i) reads:

> To license or sell or otherwise grant or make available . . .

I object to the word "sell". I believe that the right of ownership in these patents which will be and have been developed at public expense, and as the result of public and social action, should be retained by these companies for the people.

My major point is—and I repeat it before taking my seat—that if we are to assure the democratic development of this type of state capitalism, parliament must retain control.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words respecting the principle of the bill. The government shows, through the bill, that it desires to promote scientific research. I am in full accord with that desire. I believe that we must of necessity, in a true scientific spirit, follow through to the logical destiny of this scientific age. But the expression "scientific research" is a blanket one, leaving the implication that it includes all kinds and all branches of all science.

I am afraid, however, that in this bill the government is limiting itself to a narrow field. The bill is confined to the narrow field of physical sciences, those which may be most readily adaptable to industry and those discoveries which may most readily lead to profit making by individuals. I should like to be assured by the minister that sociological science will also be tucked in beneath this blanket phrase of scientific research. No hint has been given that this will be done. In fact, in answer to my question the minister gave a direct negative, that there is no thought of studying social science, that we are just going to carry on with the study of the physical sciences.

It has often been remarked that the physical sciences have progressed far beyond the social sciences, that they have gone far beyond our power to control them and use them properly for human needs. This fact has been deplored by those concerned with the stern facts of our social and economic life. I noticed that when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) was speaking on atomic energy he made reference to this fact and said that the physical sciences have far outstripped the advances made in social science. It is not hard to understand why that should be. I believe it was Pope who said that the greatest study of mankind is man. It is probably because of the greatness of the study that we have been loath to take it up. Perhaps it has been neglected because it is not quite as remunerative a subject to follow as some of the other branches of science.

As between physical science and social science, the physicist has all the advantage. If he makes a discovery that is marketable, then he not only has a chance of being kept at his job or of selling his discovery, but also has the satisfaction of seeing the job to which he has given his life applied to something of value in human experience. That gives great encouragement to those who are studying in the physical sciences. But it is a very different matter when you start out to make discoveries in the field of social science. A newly discovered energy or an invented gadget which will make $2 grow where $1 grew before will be snatched at avidly, but a Christ with the discovery of a human brotherhood in his heart is quickly crucified. Such a man spends his time in the study of the social questions of life. However, such discoveries have hitherto not been wanted by the few who have dominated the economic system based on the economic conquest of the many by the few.

The failure to pursue and apply social science has brought about dangerous results which we now face in both the domestic and the international sphere. As I see it, society has been left like a child to play with the matches and fire furnished by the physical sciences. There have been no signs of indicating the objective to which the discoveries of physical science should be devoted. We have given ad lib to the physical sciences. I have no quarrel with that; my quarrel is that we have not given equal study and equal attention to the social side of the question.

Human experience through a long period has known of what are supposedly antinomies, that is, antagonisms which seem to be irreconcilable quantities ready to rend asunder all human relationships. I should like to mention just a few as an indication of what I am driving at in my implication of the study of social science. We have seen in the great historic struggles of man such conflicts as the struggle between the ideology of the natural and the supernatural, between the human and divine in man himself and the struggle between the sponsors of mind and matter as interpretations of the universe. Finally we have come down to one of the sharpest struggles of all, the struggle of individualism against society or of society against the individual.

But all these antinomies have been proved by history to be false or incomplete. These conflicts proved to be reconcilable. Conflict came about because each point of view was treated as being final and complete in itself. In fact, those historic conflicts now appear in the light of wider knowledge as two partial views of the same reality. The great struggle to-day is that between the ideology of individualism and that of socialism.

Neither of these concepts can be regarded as absolute any more than the conflict between the natural and the supernatural could be regarded as absolute, or any more than the conflict between what is human and what is divine, and between what is mind and what is matter. The philosophy of individualism is no more absolute than the philosophy of socialism. In fact they are reconcilable. Free private enterprise and the social objective of socialism are not necessarily antinomies. Free private enterprise, of course, is essential, but it must flow like individual streams into the great current of social purpose and well-being. Ten million people with ten million free enterprises, not one of which cares for society, would not create the kind of society that any of us would want to live in. But ten million enterprising people working for the common good of all would be a very satisfactory condition as I conceive it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I do not think his remarks are relevant to the bill which is before the house at the present time.

Mr. IRVINE: I am sorry if I have to argue that with Your Honour. The bill before the house is for the promotion of scientific research, is it not? If that is so, am I to understand that the Speaker of this house is ruling out one of the greatest branches of modern society and precluding its discussion under the bill? If so, then I have nothing more to say. Do I understand that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman will understand that it is most disagreeable for the Chair to interrupt during a speech, but it is the duty of the Speaker to keep the discussion relevant to the bill before the house. The rules are very clear that on second reading the principle of a bill should be discussed.

Mr. MacINNIS: On the point of order, may I suggest that the principle of the bill is scientific research, and it seems to me that any scientific research would come within the purview of the bill and consequently would be a matter for discussion on the second reading.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member has suggested that additional amendments be made to the bill, and I think on a discussion of the motion for second reading he is quite in order to bring up matters which he believes should be included in amendments to the Research Council Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman has the unanimous consent of the house he may proceed.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not wish to ask for the unanimous consent of the house to discuss something which I am quite convinced is in order. If you say it is not in order I will sit down. I want to know whether or not I am in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that the house is master of its own rules. If the hon. gentleman has the permission of the house to proceed, he may proceed.

Mr. IRVINE: I shall proceed until either you or someone else stops me.

Mr. MacINNIS: Or until you have finished.

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. IRVINE: Or until my forty minutes have elapsed. I think what I am getting at will be quite clear and I do not think, sir, you will consider it to be out of order. If social science had been directing human affairs to the same degree as physical science has figured in industry in the last half century, we would not have many of the problems that we have to-day. I am arguing that while it is well that we should maintain and support further research in the physical sciences and apply them to the great systems of production and distribution, the principle of scientific research should be extended into the social field so that we may thereby be in a position to give direction to physical science in bringing about the best possible solution of human problems. Because this has not been done, the industrial application of physical science, which should have relieved man of drudgery and brought him within the compass of economic security, has brought such things as total war and wholesale slaughter in the international field and unemployment and want in our domestic economy, where leisure and abundance might have been the reward.

I suggest, sir, that such a matter as enforced idleness without adequate income to make living possible is a very serious problem indeed. I suggest further that the advances in the physical sciences have helped to increase the numbers of those who have to put up with enforced idleness on an inedequate income, and therefore it is right within the compass of this bill to be discussed.

It is common knowledge that science may be used to achieve any end. It may be used to destroy; in may be used to construct; it may be used exclusively for the achievement of personal gain; it may be used for communal benefit. It may be used for either one or all of these, so that if we are to subsidize scientific research it is important that we should know what is to be done with what we discover. What is the end we strive to achieve? If we are to spend public money on scientific research, we should have, I repeat, some say in how that will affect mankind. It is the very business of human nature itself to decide the ends toward which all scientific knowledge should be directed.

Science has two functions: one, to give man a realistic view of the whole phenomena of existence, and, second, to provide man with the means of controlling his environment and his destiny. Says Huxley in his "What Dare I Think?":

> Science as a principle and body of knowledge is essentially a means. It provides the only way of achieving distant and elaborate ends.

If, therefore, the great advances made by science are to be applied to human life it is time that we should be considering how science can make that possible. If science is a means and if we are to promote it we must ask ourselves: To what achievement is our proposed scientific research to be the means? Since the social sciences will assist us to determine worthy ends for the application of physical science, which this bill proposes to promote, then the social sciences are at least of equal importance with the physical sciences. Indeed I would say that they are of greater importance, for what is the use of discovering atomic energy if it is to be used to destroy us wholesale? What is the use of hitching atomic energy to industry if it will rob the great bulk of the workers of employment and expose them to starvation in the midst of abundance? These are not rhetorical questions. They are practical. They are now facing us. For example, steam, electricity, the internal combustion engine—all these were the products of scientific research and all held great possibilities for the benefit of mankind. All were revolutionary. But because of a neglect of the social sciences, the beneficial ends which applied physical science might have achieved were never reached. If atomic energy comes anywhere near the expectations of those who speak of it most it will create a still greater revolution, and that revolution not only will be industrial but will reflect itself immediately in social relationships both within the national economy and in the field of international politics and trade.

But apart entirely from atomic energy there is still urgency for research in social science with a view to bringing it abreast of modern scientific progress. If that is not done the further pursuits of physical science are of doubtful benefit. We in this parliament are, I believe, quite up to date in our industrial technology. We would not wish to be represented as standing in the way of passing a bill of this sort because it would show us to be back numbers in the scientific sense. We want to be abreast of the times. We want to see our government lead and sponsor investigations of physical science. Of course we do. We are up to date in our physical science and in our industrial technology, but I suggest to you, sir, that we are antediluvian in our social studies and in our politics. I suggest again that the minister should give some thought at least to the point I am trying to make, and I hope that he will see fit to do something along the lines I am suggesting.

I assert also that this parliament should have something to say as to the degree of secrecy to be exercised concerning scientific discoveries resulting from this publicly financed enterprise of research. I am wondering whether our scientists to-morrow under this act will be subject to the Official Secrets Act. Will they be liable to a charge of espionage if they happen to mention to some other scientists what they are working on, the progress they have made, and the hopes they have for what they are engaged in? I note that there is some mention of provision for liaison offices in London, Washington and Ottawa. I wonder whether that principle is to be extended. I believe that to bottle up scientific discoveries for any reason is to do violence to the very spirit and principle of science itself, and I hope that in any research furthered by this government every precaution will be taken for the fullest exchange of scientific knowledge between Canada and every other nation of the earth and that no attempt will be made to keep secret anything which our scientists may be fortunate enough to discover. By the same token they should have the suggestions and the opinions of other scientific students across the entire world.

I have referred to the apparent opposites which history has revealed in the human struggle. These struggles will appear later, say five hundred years hence, insignificant. To-day some of us are struggling in this house against each other and we are quite serious about it; I imagine that five hundred years from now some of these questions will have come within the range of science and will seem extremely petty. I do not suppose that people at that time will pay much attention to them; rather they will wonder how anybody spent any time on them at all.

I am bringing this out because, lacking confidence in this particular branch of science, namely sociology, people have gone very much astray. Men have been tortured and slain for causes which a few centuries later would be relegated to the funny papers. One finds the same antagonisms here; even in this parliament, racial, religious and political prejudices exist. All these thrive where the light of science is precluded. Our own parliament reflects these fears and prejudices in its wrangling over the basic ideas of the various parties. There is nothing either creative or scientific in that practice, and this I say even though I have my share in it. I think it is well for us to remember that no political idea, no political philosophy, no political party is absolute; it will be much nearer to say that they are obsolete. For that matter, neither private ownership of industry and enterprise, nor public ownership of industry with social objectives, nor the most complete control and administration of systems of finance, can be considered in themselves a complete solution of all or any of our modern human problems.

It is for these reasons that I urge the necessity of having a competent branch of research into sociological questions joined with researches into other branches of science. Each view held by the various parties in this house, however valuable, is only a partial view of a greater reality to which we are all striving to attain. The only way that that reality can be achieved or even seen is by the impartial approach of the scientific mind. As long as we are stirred with emotionalism and racialism and all the prejudices of the past it will be difficult for this parliament to find scientific solutions of the economic, social and political problems of this country.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I have listened with interest to the debate this afternoon, and there are two or three remarks I wish to make, mostly arising from the ideas expressed by members of the group to my immediate right. They seem to assume, as so many do to-day, that science has the answer to every question and that you have only to get larger and larger aggregations of people and then you can solve larger and larger problems. But surely it is fundamentally true that life is not a science and that science is not the answer to life; it is not the explanation of it. So I cannot assent to the idea that all we have to do to solve our problems is to set up huge bureaucracies and hand over to them our responsibilities as individuals, and they will automatically find the solutions, much as we can turn out material things by mass production. Surely, if any fact is true, it is that all the greatest and all the most beneficial discoveries in this world have been made by individuals. That is as true to-day as it has always been. You could gather together all the expert teachers of English grammar and form an English bureau, and is there any likelihood that they could produce any worth-while literature? We owe the art of poetry to such humble people as Robert Burns. So with music; for instance, suppose you assembled all the music teachers in Canada and formed them into a bureau and set them to work, is it likely that they would produce a single bar of worth-while music? All the music which is worth listening to to-day has been produced by men who have been inspired as human individuals and not as scientific machines. That is the point I wish to make.

One of the books I have read on the atomic bomb has been quoted to-day, and apparently the scientists who have produced this terrible weapon presume—and it seems that others are willing to allow them to presume—that they are the ones who are to tell us how and when this weapon is to be used. Of course, it takes scientific training to produce a bomb; but what I want to make clear is that the greatest scientist who ever lived is no more competent to say when that bomb shall be used than is the most humble man on the street. More than that, if individuals were left to their own devices, it is not likely that they would have produced such an evil thing as the atomic bomb. It took billions of dollars, and hundreds of scientists, and they ceased to be human individuals and became scientific automatons. It is they who produced the atomic bomb; it is they who presume to tell the world how it should be used; and if we do not obey their dictates we shall be blown off the face of the earth.

All human progress has been made through the divine revelations made to individuals. Science is no answer to the major problems that confront the world to-day. We have to go back to first principles, to Christian principles. Without that the world is lost.

Recently a book has been sent me "The Anatomy of Peace," and the very purpose of it is to prove that Christianity has utterly failed and cannot help the world out of its present troubles. I would not say anything if the views that appear in that book represented only the opinion of its author, but the book is endorsed by numbers of public men in the United States. I will not mention their names, but I might say that one was a scientist who was referred to this afternoon, Professor Einstein. That, I believe, is the chief trouble with the world to-day. It thinks that science can solve the problems of the world when only a return to Christian principles can save us from the disasters with which we are faced.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I did not intend to take part in this debate, and I do so only in reply to the last speaker (Mr. Jaques), who has ascribed to this party certain views and attitudes which we do not hold. He stated we believed that all that was necessary to have a perfect world was to have larger and larger aggregations of people come together and appoint what he calls bureaucrats over them, and everything would be fine. I do not think it is necessary for me to refute this idea. The hon. member who preceded the last speaker made it as clear as it could possibly be made that we do not believe that anyone has a corner on absolute virtue, that collectivism is not a sufficient answer by itself to the present problems of the world, and that certainly individualism is not a sufficient answer to those problems.

What are we to make of the hon. gentleman's statement that what we must do is to go back to first principles? What are first principles, and how do we get back to them? The position we are now in is that there have been scientific developments; that because of those developments man has multiplied upon the earth, and that by using those scientific developments to live together we have raised ourselves, perhaps not to any great height, but certainly beyond the conditions of the cave man. Does he suggest that we go back to the cave man? He should define first principles. He should define his concept of the fundamentals of religion.

An hon. MEMBER: Who says there was a cave man?

Mr. MacINNIS: I assume there must have been.

Mr. JAQUES: I made it clear that I meant a return to the principles of Christianity.

Mr. MacINNIS: But the principles of Christianity are only two thousand years old, whereas our human life goes back over a very considerable period. People who ought to know say, billions of years. So that to ascribe to us certain ideas, and to make statements such as the hon. gentleman made, merely indicates a lack of knowledge on his part. I have heard my hon. friends time and again state in this house how much more productive an individual is in this modern world than were our ancestors even a few score years ago.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is it not true?

Mr. MacINNIS: It is quite true, but it is not the individual man that is productive. The individual man is no more productive to-day than he was ten thousand or a million years ago. What is productive is the social man, and if you put a man to work producing anything to-day or put him to make his own living, the individual man to-day is less capable of producing his own livelihood, as an individual apart from society, than was his grandfather or his great-grandfather, because he is farther away from the simple principles of living upon what he produced himself. But social man is so productive that we do not know what to do with the volume of the things he produces, so we have to call a war every twenty-five years or so in order to destroy our surpluses. What we are here trying to do is to get away from that and to use our scientific achievements in production; and, as the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) said, to use those scientific achievements also in distributing the things we can so abundantly produce.

That is what this party stands for. We do not maintain that we have any corner on knowledge or even on good intentions, but we do maintain that by making use of the knowledge which the human race has acquired over the years we can make progress.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): There is very little that I need to say at this time. The principal suggestion in the debate is that the scope of the amendments should be enlarged to include the social sciences, as well as the work now encompassed in the Research Council Act. I think it is inevitable that the work of the research council will centre primarily on applied science rather than on pure science. The reason for that is that it is possible to organize the work of applied science. A project can be organized that has as its objective the applications of known facts of science to a particular problem. For example, it is possible to work out a method for producing magnesium, which has been mentioned in this debate. That was worked out, and I will later say a few words about Dominion Magnesium Limited in reply to the question of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), which I agreed to do. But it is not possible to organize research in the field of pure science in the same way.

The council can assist universities in organized research on these lines, but it is not usual that the discoveries of pure science come from organized efforts. Reference has been made in this debate to the discovery of penicillin. Last summer I had the good fortune to spend a day with Sir Alexander Fleming, the discoverer of penicillin. We both received honorary degress from Harvard on the same day. I was interested in his description of how penicillin was discovered.

Sir Alexander was relieved from his ordinary duties as a teacher and he was doing some independent research on the virus of a malignant disease. He left his cultures by an open window and when he came back the next morning he found that they were dead. He was a highly trained man of science and he thought there must be some reason for it. So he tried it again and again; each time that he left his cultures by an open window he found them dead the next morning. He then set out to discover what was killing them and he traced the cause to a mould which was being blown through the air. He then started to work on the mould to see what medical properties it contained. From that research came the discovery of penicillin.

This country needs more men in the field of pure science. There is no question about that. It needs more work in pure science.

Europe has constantly led the Americas in work in this field. The reason, according to men who have studied the matter, is that there are more highly trained men of leisure in Europe than there are in this country. I listened to a discussion on how pure science could best be advanced in this country, in which it was suggested that if well-trained university men were put on a pension of $12,000 a year, with the undertaking that if they would care to spend any of that $12,000—they would spend their time as they liked—on any particular line of research, such expenditures would be added to by the state in the proportion of three to one. These highly trained men would be assigned no particular task. They would be on pension and they could do as they liked. If they cared to take up any particular line of research, their expenditure in that work would be supplemented. By such means it might be possible to develop scientifically trained men of leisure who could be expected to contribute discoveries in pure science. I am simply throwing that out to explain why the national research council does not primarily organize research work in the field of pure science.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not having a thorough understanding of the men of Europe to whom the minister refers, may I ask if the developments over there were brought about on their own initiative, or organized by some government?

Mr. HOWE: On their own initiative, for the most part.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the difference between a man working on his own initiative and working under government auspices. The men of whom the minister is speaking who may be paid $12,000 a year would be working under the government. Men of that type have not the initiative. Not having that initiative, they would not rate one, two, three with the men who are working under their own initiative. That is the difference between private initiative and government control.

Mr. HOWE: I hardly suggest that a large income is a necessary corollary of ability. My hon. friend will find that in the field of pure science discoveries have been made not so much by men of wealth, as by men of leisure. Certainly Sir Alexander Fleming was not a wealthy man when he undertook to discover what was happening to his cultures, what caused them to die when he left them by an open window. It is a fact that in Europe there has been a leisured class of men trained in science. In this country we expect men trained in science to buckle down and be producers. Perhaps that is the reason why this continent does not advance as rapidly in the field of pure science as do the older countries.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, to continue my remarks before the hour of recess, I would refer to the comment on the permission sought in the bill to build pilot plants. In the past, the national research council has taken the view that its duty was to work out the scientific process, and leave the actual development work to others. It has been found, however, that, in some cases, the proving of the scientific work by means of a pilot plant is necessary to carry out the objectives of the national research council.

In explanation, I would refer to the Dominion Magnesium plant, and in doing so I shall carry out my promise to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) to explain the position of that plant.

In 1937, experimental work on the production of metallic magnesium was initiated by the division of chemistry of the national research council under the direction of Doctor L. M. Pidgeon.

Until 1939, this research was largely confined to the established electrolytic methods when work was started on thermal reduction methods, or what later became known as the Pidgeon process, which uses the reaction taking place between calcined dolomite and ferrosilicon.

At the close of 1940 the situation was as follows:

(a) The national research council had financed work on the production of metallic magnesium through the reduction of dolomite by ferrosilicon, at a total cost of approximately $22,000. At this stage no patentable discovery had been made.

(b) It had been demonstrated that magnesium could be produced by this process on a laboratory scale, but it was not known whether it was practicable successfully to expand the laboratory retort to a commercial plant size, and it was realized that this involved problems of more than ordinary difficulty.

(c) The council had discontinued investigations on this process as the questions indicated in (b) above could only be answered by greatly expanding the investigation to pilot plant scale, at an estimated cost of at least $25,000 per annum. The council did not consider that the process was sufficiently promising, in competition with existing established processes to justify this expansion at public cost...

(e) At the close of 1940 it did not appear probable that the Pidgeon process would be used commercially for the production of metallic magnesium, even for war purposes, as there was no certainty that this process could operate commercially, or would produce metal at a cost that would compete with established processes. The associate committee on magnesium of the national research council, which includes members of the staff of the Departments of National Defence and Mines and Resources, and the research council, about this time officially recorded its view that if the dominion government desired to establish a commercial magnesium plant immediately, one of the established existing processes be used, rather than a plant based on the experimental work of the council up to that date. That was the situation at the end of 1940.

In January, 1941, Doctor Pidgeon showed Mr. W. E. Segsworth a four-inch retort which was in successful operation in his laboratory, and on the following day Mr. Segsworth and Mr. R. J. Jowsey called on the acting president of the national research council and discussed possible business arrangements to finance a pilot plant for the production of magnesium by what is now known as the Pidgeon process. As a result, an agreement between the council and Dominion Magnesium Limited was signed in April, 1941.

This agreement provides that the company pay not only the entire cost of the research carried on thereunder, including the salaries and expenses of the staff employed thereon, the cost of equipment and supplies required in connection therewith, and the sum of $4,000 per annum in respect of overhead, but also an additional sum of $30,000. The total expenditures of the council on the investigation of this process prior to the agreement were $23,165.66. In addition, the company had to expend each year on research work considerably more than the $25,000 estimated by the council as the minimum amount required to expand the investigation to pilot plant scale.

Following investigations carried out at the expense of the company under the above agreement, the company established a plant for the manufacture of magnesium by the Pidgeon process near Renfrew, Ontario, but before this plant was ready for commercial production, it was taken over by the dominion government under arrangements made by the Department of Munitions and Supply.

It will be seen from the foregoing that Dominion Magnesium Limited has invested considerable money and has taken considerable risk in developing the Pidgeon process for the manufacture of metallic magnesium, and that during the war period it made no profit on its investment in this process. In addition, it still remains to be proven whether in the post-war period this process can successfully compete with other established processes for the production of magnesium.

Reference has also been made to the plan of the council to establish a corporation to patent discoveries of the council, and to exploit those patents. Every country in the world follows a similar plan in connection with its governmental research activities. It is the practice of all governments to own patents discovered by scientists in its employ, and it is the practice of all governments to make these available to the public either by lease or by outright sale.

In my earlier remarks, I made reference to the corporation that attends to these duties in the United States. To handle duties of that type by means of a corporation is in the public interest, in that its transactions are readily available; the manner in which it handles patents and the proceeds derived from such patents can be ascertained without difficulty. The purpose for which the proceeds are used can also be readily ascertained.

All those associated with the national research council believe that patent work should be handled by a separate corporation under direction of the council; and that is the purpose of the bill.

In the matter of crown companies, I do not know that anything further need be said, except to point out that the national research council can perform no act through the corporation that it cannot perform directly, if it desires to take appropriate action. The national research council cannot create a corporation which will have any power in excess of that held by the council itself. The establishment of a corporation will be simply for the purpose of enabling the council to carry out its duties in a way that is considered more efficient than the method of direct operation. I do not think hon. members need have any concern about the authority being given by this bill to the national research council to establish corporations.

The matter of employment was referred to during the discussion of the bill setting out the duties and privileges of crown corporations. A corporation set up under this bill would have no right that is not enjoyed by the national research council itself. As I stated before the recess hour, the provisions of this bill are few in number and simple in language. As we pass into committee, I do not think hon. members will have any difficulty in agreeing with the government as to the desirability of the proposals that are now being placed before the house.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not going to make any extended remarks on this section or on the bill, but I want to express the fears that I have expressed before as to the gigantic business into which the government is apparently going to enter. I am a private enterprise man and I believe that private enterprise can do a job better and at less cost than the government. After the results of experiments have been arrived at, I submit that private enterprise can carry on better. I am afraid of what this country is going to get into.

The minister was a big business man, and I often think he must laugh to himself when he looks back at the days when he had to figure everything carefully on a business basis and compare that with what is going on to-day, with the possibility of the government setting up a long line of businesses. I am not going to oppose the bill, but I am not in favour of that sort of thing.

There is nothing new about a research council. The Ontario government set up a research council in 1928, and I understand that the dominion act was passed in 1924. It was around 1924 that I went out of business. The Ontario set-up is entirely different from what is now before the committee. I should like to read from the Ontario act which is chapter 57 of the statutes of 1928:

1. This act may be cited as the Research Foundation Act, 1928.

2. There shall be established a corporation to be known as the Ontario Research Foundation, hereinafter called the "foundation," which shall consist of such persons as may from time to time be designated by the lieutenant governor in council to be members of the foundation.

3. The objects of the foundation shall be the carrying on of research work and investigations having for their purposes,—

(a) the improvement and development of manufacturing and other industries by the introduction of advanced methods and processes;

It was felt by manufacturers and others that the government could assist them materially along general lines, and it was for that reason the foundation was set up. They became members of the foundation and subscribed in amounts of $100 or more. The particular section reads:

6. (1) The foundation may enter into an agreement in writing with such persons as may desire to become subscribers to the foundation for receiving from such persons subscriptions of money in sums of $100, or multiples thereof, until the sum of $1,000,000 has been subscribed.

In 1929 there was an amendment to permit of a total of $2,500,000. The basis of the Ontario foundation was to give direct service to the whole manufacturing industry. It was something to which they themselves subscribed. If anything worth while was discovered, the action to be taken was set out in section 10 (a), as amended in 1929, which reads:

The foundation may apply for, or acquire by purchase, assignment or otherwise, rights in any patent of invention for industrial or other processes of any nature or kind whatsoever, and may sell and dispose of the same, or any interest therein, and grant or assign any rights which may be acquired by the foundation thereunder.

I do not take it, either from the act of 1928 or the amendments of 1929, that the foundation was to do any processing of the patents obtained. They were to dispose of them, and in my opinion that is the right thing to do. I have nothing but the highest regard for the minister and I realize the tremendous activities he has carried on. I know he has a great knowledge of affairs in general, and particularly of business affairs. I cannot figure out why he has not followed the programme which was set up by the Ontario government. There will be no limit to the number of plants that may be set up under this bill, and there is no limit to the total cost. The minister is a business man, and he knows just as well as I do that the government cannot begin to do anything of a business nature at anything like the cost that private industry can do it.

The minister has two striking examples of this before him. The first is the Abasand Oil company at Fort McMurray. He says he did not put that through, but I find his name all through the agreements with the old Abasand company and the crown company which took the place of the old Abasand company. Then there is Dominion Magnesium, On May 21, 1943, I asked some questions which were answered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). I do not know why they were answered by that minister. I asked how much capital was at that time invested in Dominion Magnesium and was informed that the capital cost was $3,349,504.03. In reply to further questions I was informed that the working capital was $820,000, or a total capital of $4,169,504.03; that 1,186 tons had been produced up to April 30, 1943, at an average cost of 39·70 cents per pound; that the capacity was ten tons a day and the actual production 8½ tons a day.

After the country had put up all that money the plant was disposed of to a private corporation, I presume. Just how much did the country get out of that big investment? The figures have been given in the house. We were to get so much out of production, but the actual immediate cash return was small. That is one example of what it has cost this country to put up a pilot plant, like the one at Haley's.

At page 5023 of Hansard of July 30, 1942, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said this:

> I would reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) this afternoon by saying that the national research council were engaged on certain preliminary investigations in connection with the production of magnesium metal before the Dominion Magnesium company came into the picture. None of the work up to that time resulted in a patent. Subsequently, Dominion Magnesium entered into an agreement with the council—

I presume that means the national research council.

> —to have the work undertaken on its behalf and its cost, plus 50 per cent overhead on the actual cost. Certain patents then developed. If these prove to be as valuable as is expected, a further sum of $30,000 will be paid by the company under their agreement with the council.

If the national research council did develop a patent for magnesium metal the minister knows, and he knows there are several good methods of making magnesium metal. As a matter of fact, the Dow company in the United States, using their own system, have during the war made a large amount of magnesium metal, and it was apparently for that reason the company was set up.

On the next page, 5024, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) said:

> I wish to protest against the procedure which has been followed in the development of magnesium metal.

I protested myself, too. He went on:

> Here we had a discovery made in our own research laboratories, and once they knew they had something, the process was turned over to this private company to develop it commercially, instead of the government building a pilot plant and developing it commercially.

The only comment I have on that statement is that it should have been advertised to the world and tenders should have been asked for from all who wished to purchase the patent and come in here and manufacture magnesium metal.

Mr. HOWE: The government did not develop the patent.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what it says here. I think I can prove it too. If the discovery of the Pidgeon process was made and developed at the national research council in government time and at government expense—

Mr. HOWE: It was never patented by the research council. The council reported that it was no good.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what I want to find out. I have nothing but the highest regard for Doctor Pidgeon, or whoever did it. They are good men; they have ability; but if the process was developed by him or those associated with him in the research council, working on government time and at government expense, that patent belonged to this country.

Mr. HOWE: They did not develop a patent.

Mr. MacNICOL: That does not exonerate the government.

Mr. HOWE: I have just given my hon. friend a lengthy and detailed explanation. I do not think he listened to me.

Mr. MacNICOL: The men at the national research council did the groundwork there. You can read in different books all about the different processes of producing magnesium metal. The men of the research council got out a new process or a combination of the others. The minister spoke of the electrolytic method. One inventor of that was Ralph Keemle, of Hamilton, Ontario, before Dominion Magnesium came into the picture.

Mr. HOWE: It was developed long before that.

Mr. MacNICOL: I went to see Ralph Keemle's pilot plant in Hamilton. It was in a big plant past the Westinghouse plant and on north from Westinghouse. Perhaps the hon. member for Hamilton West knows the name of the plant.

Mr. MITCHELL: Otis-Fensom.

Mr. MacNICOL: You go past the gun plant and turn to your right at the corner. You have to go a quarter of a mile and then you find this big plant on the lefthand side of the street. I am sure that the Minister of National Defence for Air will know it.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): Otis-Fensom.

Mr. MacNICOL: I asked Mr. Keemle, "Why don't you get in touch with your member so that your process may be used by Canada?" I have forgotten his reply. But he did have a small pilot plant in that big plant I am speaking of, to develop magnesium metal by electricity out of the Dolemite limestone which abounds in that great range running north of Hamilton to Guelph and on to lake Huron. Mr. Keemle said to me, "We could make magnesium metal for a million years for the whole world out of that vast source of supply that we have from Hamilton north to lake Huron."

The hon. member for Melfort said something else:

The minister stated that the company which developed the Pidgeon process had paid for the development of that process itself. I have here the minutes of the privy council, and I find:

"That the company will build the plant at cost and without profit but will be paid the sum of $41,500 to cover its costs heretofore incurred in the development of the Pidgeon process."

If the Pidgeon process was developed in government time, with government materials, and at the government expense, I do not see why they should be paid anything for it. The report, quoting the minutes, continues:

"Included in the cost (but not in the $41,500 above-mentioned) will be certain commitments and sums already incurred or paid by the company for the purposes of construction of a magnesium plant, not exceeding however the sum of $12,000; the benefits of such commitments and expenditures shall be used for the construction of the initial plant."

It appears from this that the company are to be reimbursed for their expenditures in connection with the development of the process.

Then the Minister of Munitions and Supply replied:

I have forgotten the details, but I think that applies to a certain pilot plant which was built to develop the process actually being used in our plant.

That is, in the government plans.

I think we paid for building a full-scale unit,—

That is, the government paid for it.

—using tubes and furnaces of the size we intended to instal in the new plant. The $41,000 certainly does not cover all costs incurred by the company in developing the process.

I do not want to prolong my remarks. The point I am making is that if that magnesium process, the so-called Pidgeon process, were, developed in our own laboratories on government time and the salaries of the men engaged there were paid by the government, that process, to my way of thinking, belonged to this country. The whole thing has now been disposed of. What did the country get out of it? Little but loss.

Mr. HOWE: It got a lot of magnesium out of it.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: I beg the minister's pardon?

Mr. HOWE: It got many, many thousand tons of magnesium out of it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree, and I am not wholly opposed to what was finally done with the plant, because I do not believe in the government being in business. If the agreement they made with the people now operating the plant is a provident one, and if the present operators keep it going and give men employment—that is what I am interested in, giving employment to men—we shall have that much out of it, and in time the country will derive some return in taxation, income tax and so forth. At any rate I hope so.

So I come back to where I started. Frankly, I am alarmed at the government going into business on such a wide scale. There seems to be no end to it, from what one sees in this bill and in the other bill which either has been before us or is coming up. As a business man I cannot understand how the minister has allowed himself to be led into this course of action. If this research council, which I am in favour of and whose development I would support as a service to the country and to manufacturing, just as the Ontario research council is doing, can produce something worth while, put it on the market and sell it, someone can be producing for the public welfare through its activities and the country will reap returns much as it does from business in general. While I am not going to oppose the contribution, my position is that which I have taken right along. I believe that private enterprise will do these things far better than a government can do them.

I remember what the minister said before the house rose, and I thank him for saying it. He had been speaking of scientific and other developments by private citizens in Europe who had the time and means to devote to the work, and I asked whether they were on government pay. The minister kindly answered, no. Well, I know that type of man. I think I am one of that type. I have worked many a night, week in and week out, month out and month in, trying to develop processes in the business in which I was engaged. A twenty-four day did not mean anything; I was pursuing something and I wanted to get to the end of it. I am sure the minister has had the same experience. I am certain that during his business life he has often worked all night planning the construction of elevators, in which business he was such an expert. He could not take a chance where experiments were involved; he had to see to the thing himself. I am sure I am right in this supposition. I know you cannot expect that kind of thing in the government service. This country has as good a civil service as any in the world. It is staffed with men and women of high character and excellent capacities, but they are not asked to work all night long, as the minister and myself and many another pioneer have done in business and professional life. Government men are not expected to do that. We do not pay them to do it. But those engaged in private industry are bent on reaching a particular goal, we aspire to reach the top in a big company; we reap our return in that way. But government employees are only paid salaries and they are not expected to work like that. This is one reason why I favour the government, if it gets out patents, putting them up for sale and disposing of them to the highest bidder who can pay for them, on condition they put the production of it on the market. Only in that way can we provide employment; the result of research must be placed on the market. In my judgment, the research council will be doing good and worth-while work if they confine themselves to that procedure. But to manufacture stuff themselves—well, they cannot do so profitably. They can, of course, do it on government money, in the way magnesium was developed at Haley's and as might have been done from the $2 million expenditure at Abasand, where we did not secure a process for extracting oil from the sands, or at least, if we did, the plant burned down before it was in operation, so that whether or not it would have been successful we do not know.

I am not in favour of the government carrying on business on so wide a scale. If what the minister said this evening about employment is correct, there would be a good deal of temporary employment in the various pilot plants. As the minister said, the employees will be entitled to benefits of superannuation. I am in favour of superanuation, and I would favour private companies doing much more in that direction than some of them are doing to-day. Before I left home last night a man came to see me who, after being with a company for twenty years, had just been let out without a pension. I think that is an outrage. During his period of service his salary was at no time sufficient for him to accumulate a competence. He was not an officer of the company, he was working in the plant, and I may say that he was just about heart-broken. So with that part of the government's proposal I agree, that whoever is engaged in the government's plants should be under civil service conditions as to pensions and the like if he is retired from government service. Anyone who has worked in the public service for twenty years should, on retirement, be entitled to a substantial pension, because the government, having the country's money to operate with, can afford to do that and can thereby show an example. As the minister knows, private industry cannot always do that. No doubt, many times, when tendering for a big elevator contract which he had to get by competition, he had to sharpen his pencil and found it "pretty close skating" to get out even and without losing his coat. But the government is not subject to such conditions.

That expresses my opinion with regard to this bill.

Mr. HOWE: I just wish to put my hon. friend straight on the position with regard to magnesium. To review what I said earlier, in 1937 the national research council undertook to develop a new process for the manufacture of magnesium metal. It was carried out under a strong committee representing not only the research council but also Mines and Resources and National Defence. In 1940 the work was reviewed by the committee, and it was found that they could make magnesium metal in a testtube by the process which later became known as the Pidgeon process. But it was represented that there was nothing patentable in the matter and that if the government needed magnesium metal in the war they had better try a proven process. That was the official report to myself as Minister of Munitions and Supply. However, Doctor Pidgeon, who had been working on the process and had done development work, did not agree with the committee. He said, "All right. I am cut off from the funds of the research council by the decision, but I still believe in the process," and he interested private investors in carrying on the process. Messrs. Segsworth and Jowsey went to the national research council and said, "We will pay all costs up to date, but we want to own the thing from now on". They made arrangements to finance from that point on, and as a result of work in the pilot plant certain processes were patented, not on the time of the national research council but on time paid for by this private syndicate. The government overlooked no opportunity to patent the process. They never had the opportunity. If they had carried on the work farther, if they had followed Doctor Pidgeon in the matter, they might have had a patentable process. The syndicate, having been satisfied with their process, undertook to build a plant at their own private expense—it was only a very small plant—for the production of magnesium on a commercial scale.

At that time it became evident to the Department of Munitions and Supply that Canada must have a source of magnesium of its own if it were to continue to build aeroplanes on a large scale. A good deal of time was taken in investigating other processes, and it was finally decided that the firm best able to build was Consolidated Mining and Smelting which had an electrolytic process which seemed to be very modern. It was found, however, that the estimate of that company for building a plant of the size required was $9,500,000. It was also found that by spending a little over $3,000,000 on the Pidgeon process the same production could be obtained, though there was no guarantee as to what the cost would be. I decided that it was a better gamble for Canada financially to take the Pidgeon process than to spend nine and a half millions on the electrolytic process, and the gamble was justified for the reason that magnesium was produced in the required quantity. It was sold at the then world price and it showed a very small loss. Nevertheless, when the war ended, instead of having nine millions of capital tied up in the plant we had three millions in it. We were able to dispose of the plant in a manner that should net the government $1,400,000, so that we got magnesium when it was required for a very reasonable sum. We now have in Canada an industry that has a fair chance of success. I do not think, therefore, that the government has anything to apologize for in the manner in which it handled its production of magnesium in the war years.

My hon. friend has referred to Abasand as a losing venture on the part of the government. Let me assure him that the government never went into that undertaking to make money. It did so for the purpose of testing a process. It was a pilot plant. The government obtained 95 per cent of the information required, and the information was of such a character that it was not believed necessary to rebuild the plant in order to get the other five per cent. It was pretty well proven that the plant could not produce at present costs for petroleum products. It paid for the information. The information was obtained and the books are closed so far as I am concerned.

Mr. JACKMAN: There is one point in particular that I should like to bring to the attention of the committee and it has to do with the accountability of the national research council. As I see the bill, it seeks to enlarge and streamline the activities of the research council, but no attempt is made in it to make the council more accountable or responsible to parliament. May I give to the committee the provisions which appear in the Research Council Act in regard to reporting to parliament. It might have been all right when the council was a small affair with a small annual appropriation, but now that it is going to take on not only a new lease of life but a greatly enlarged life I believe—and I hope the minister as well as his own party and the C.C.F. and Social Credit and other members of the house will agree with me—that something should be done to make the national research council more responsible to members of parliament.

As the situation now stands, the president of the council reports annually to the council itself. Report is then made to the committee and, after fifteen days, the report is tabled in parliament or, if parliament is not sitting, the report need not be tabled until fifteen days after the opening of the next session. I presume the report will be supplemented by the auditor general's report on the accounts, as well as the president's report on the work of the council itself. The auditor general's report, however, is usually fifteen months after the close of the fiscal year. That is to say, some of the operations of the council which take place now will not be accounted for twelve months plus fifteen months, or twenty-seven months after the actual work has been done.

That, I submit, is too slow if we are to have any check on these matters, and I believe most members of the house will agree with me in that regard. The minister has said in connection with all these government controlled companies that they are accountable to parliament and that parliament is to have supervision over them. But I ask the members of this committee, what possible useful control we can exercise if the report on the activities of the council in its enlarged state is to be so long delayed and we are not to know what they have done for at least twelve months or two years afterwards? When I first raised this point the other day the minister said that the members of the house would probably take affront at the council reporting to the press, or to the public generally if you like, rather than to the house itself. I suggest, however, that it must be the opinion of most thinking members who have the interest of the council at heart that it is not material whether the report goes first to the members when the house is sitting so long as they have the information before them upon which they may act and form their own judgment, and perhaps bring the necessary pressure to bear, or pass on suggestions of a constructive nature to the minister himself, so that he in turn may pass them on to the council, and in that way have a closer control over the operations, and certainly a closer reporting of what is being done by the national research council than we have at the present time.

I would, therefore, suggest to the minister that he bring in an amendment whereby the report of the president will be made not later than three months after the close of the fiscal year. That would seem to be a reasonable period, and one which would not press upon the work of the president or of the council. It would give the members of the house a reasonable period within which to act and a period before the facts, upon which they sought to act, had become too stale. Therefore I would ask the minister to thaw out a bit so that those in the opposition and hon. members generally may have at least a snowball's chance to keep up with the activities of the national research council and to report any recommendations which they may have.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend seems to suggest that parliament would not have the same control over the expenditures of the national research council that it would have over the expenditures of the Department of Public Works or any other department of the government. I point out that when the estimates of the national research council are before parliament hon. members have the same opportunity to examine the operations of the national research council that they have to examine the operations of the Department of Public Works. It seems to me that the objection just raised is wholly fallacious.

I take it that the presentation of estimates to the house is made largely to enable hon. members to find out the details of any expenditures of public funds contained therein. That privilege would certainly apply to the appropriation of the national research council.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I just say to the minister that it is one thing to appropriate certain moneys to carry on the work of the national research council and another thing to have a report on how these moneys were spent and the general stewardship of the council itself. The two are entirely different and I believe that the point is well made. We should have a report of the council within a reasonably short time. May we just ask ourselves, why is the minister unwilling that the national research council should make its report within three months? From his point of view I can see no objection to the council making a report within that time, and I do not understand why he should not be amenable to the suggestion I made. My second point is that he said this afternoon the national research council does not live entirely from funds which we in parliament may vote. I am not sufficiently familiar with the technique of the matter upon which we voted the other day which showed that there are certain sums which the minister may draw upon which are, I believe, passed en bloc, to discuss it. Perhaps someone else will take up that point later.

The point I wish to make just now is that this afternoon the minister said the national research council during the war years had received $4,360,900 from the funds within its own confines, if you like, revenue which it had received for work done, to say nothing of $6 million which it had received from other departments of government. I presume that $6 million was voted upon in this house and carefully gone over during the consideration of the estimates; but as to the $4,360,900, the national research council received this money, and it was not responsible to parliament as to the spending of it. While that sum may not be so large when it is spread over the whole period of the war years, we now find that the national research council is to be greatly expanded and may develop new processes and patents from which it will receive revenue. That revenue is not to be returned to the consolidated revenue fund from year to year, but it is to revolve within the accounts of the national research council alone. The reason this is important is that while it may start off in a small way with a few companies under the aegis of the national research council, the history of this country has shown us that the average small town in Ontario or in the whole dominion has started out in this way. Within that small town one chief industry was started by a man with $25,000 or less; and over a period of ten or twenty years or longer by ploughing back the earnings, not taking them out, those little companies have grown to a substantial size and in many cases now employ three or four hundred men. That is the history of enterprise on this continent and also in the old country. These things start in a little way, but if they are successful and are allowed to retain their money, they expand. In the case of the national research council there is no share of the tax burden being borne by them; and it would be only a short time, with the compounding of these earnings that they might make, before they might earn substantial sums. For that reason parliament itself has no direct control over the total sums which the national research council has at its command.

I believe the council should report—and the minister has advanced no reason why it should not—within a reasonable time after its fiscal year ends, which time I suggest might be about three months.

Mr. HOWE: I must say it is extraordinary to hear of my hon. friend worrying because the earnings of the national research council are not subject to taxation. It is a strange situation. I should be very happy if the national research council could earn enough to carry on its activities; and I would not be particularly worried about the size of the activities. Recently I read an article about the United States research, and I found that the government of the United States spent in the four years they were at war over $10 billion on research. That is more than half the total cost of the war to Canada. They believed that that money spent on research during the war was perhaps the most effective of any of the war expenditures. I certainly hope that Canada will spend very much larger sums on research in future than have been spent in the past. Therefore I am not worried that the national research council will earn enough money to be subject to tax or earn enough money to be free of appropriations by parliament. Unless that happens my hon. friend need not worry about the ability of parliament to extract all the information that it cares to ask for about the operation.

So far as the annual report of the council is concerned I am sure that the council make their annual report as rapidly as they can. The research council as a whole meets only four times a year. Whether the report can be compiled and approved by the council within three months after the end of the fiscal year I am not sure, but I have had no complaint to date that the report of the national research council is not filed as promptly as the report of any other branch of government which makes a report to parliament.

Mr. GREEN: Is the report for 1945-46 out yet?

Mr. HOWE: I could not say. The fiscal year closed just two months ago.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This afternoon I expressed concern about the salaries being paid to the scientific workers in the national research council, particularly those who have been there for a great many years. Has the minister available the salaries paid? I mentioned that in the Beatty report of 1930, sixteen years ago, it was suggested that scientific workers should start in at $2,100. I understand that some start in at a salary a great deal less than that. I understand that $1,680 is the salary being paid some workers with a Ph.D. degree. Has the minister available, or can he obtain the information while we are in the committee stage, the number of Ph.D.'s receiving less than $2,000, and also could he give us the average salary that is being paid to scientific workers in the different groups? The Beatty report broke them down into different classifications. Could the minister give us some indication as to whether the recommendations of the Beatty report have been implemented, or how many are receiving less than these suggested classifications?

Mr. HOWE: I have no information. I suggest that there is nothing in the bill before the committee referring to the salaries of scientific workers. My hon. friend is easily shocked. I can remember distinctly the first work I had after graduating from college, with what I considered a superior degree. I remember receiving $40 a month, and worked for that for some months. It does not shock me that these young men out of university, even with a Ph.D., are working for $1,800 a year.

Mr. FLEMING: I wish to say a word respecting the point raised by the hon. member for Rosedale, and it relates to the principle involved. That principle, so far as we Progressive Conservatives are concerned, is one of parliamentary control. We have expressed the view that all these enterprises which the government believes ought to be carried on under crown company control should first be submitted to parliament.

But then as an alternative the minister says, "Give us certain blanket powers, and parliament will have an opportunity to review reports at the conclusion of the year." The discussion we have had to-night bears directly upon the minister's contention that parliament has full opportunity of reviewing the administration of those crown companies. The point made by the hon. member for Rosedale is a substantial one, because the provision in the Research Council Act which refers to reports to parliament is, if I may say so, loose and inadequate. It does not contain a time limit.

In the short space of time I have been in parliament, I believe in every case where any body has been given power a stipulation has been included in the statute that a report must be submitted to parliament within a fixed period. If hon. members will refer to section 13 of the Research Council Act they will see that, first of all, there is a provision that the president shall report annually to the governor in council, and make certain recommendations. Then, what about the council's report? Subsection 2 states:

The council shall, after the conclusion of the fiscal year, make a report to the committee—

That is the committee of the privy council. That is the privy council committee on scientific and industrial research. Then the section continues:

—containing the report of the president to the council and also containing a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the council during the preceding fiscal year.

I draw attention to the fact that there is no time limit on the report to be made to the privy council committee from the research council. Then, subsection 3 makes this provision:

3. Such reports shall be printed and laid before parliament within 15 days of the making thereof or, if parliament is not then in session, within 15 days after the commencement of the next session of parliament.

If one reads subsection 3 with subsection 2 he sees that there is no time limit within which these reports are to be completed and laid before parliament. The fifteen-day period is related to an event to which there is applied no time limit at all.

What is the situation with regard to reports of the national research council? I understand that the fiscal year in question—and I am speaking subject to correction—is the government fiscal year ended March 31, 1945. But if one goes to the distribution office to-day he will not find a report of the national research council. I have been trying to get one, and I know there is no report of the research council available. I take it that the last report would be for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945. If it has been tabled—and again I speak subject to correction—it was not tabled either at the fall session or at this session of parliament. That illustrates, I suggest, the inadequacy of the present provision in the act with regard to reporting to parliament.

Mr. HOWE: It would not be distributed, under the three months' rule. It is only two and a half months since the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. FLEMING: But we are speaking of the report for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945.

Mr. HOWE: It was distributed to the members. Whether it was tabled or not, I cannot say; but if it was not, it was an oversight on my part. It has certainly been distributed to the members.

Mr. FLEMING: It has not been made available to me, because I have been trying to get a copy of it.

With regard to the provisions now before us, I urge that if the minister is determined to embark upon a policy of setting up a number of crown companies, two things will have to be done if parliament is to exercise any effective power of review at the end of any year's operations. In the first place, there will have to be some method of getting these reports before parliament at an earlier date, so that parliament may have before it the report for the fiscal year immediately concluded, when it is reviewing the estimates of expenditures for the ensuing year.

In the second place, there will have to be evolved within parliament itself some better method both of reviewing those reports and of conducting a detailed examination of such officials as may be in a position to give parliament information.

If the minister is urging on parliament, as he has been during the debate on these related measures, that parliament has had a good opportunity to review, then I say that before that argument can have any validity there will have to be evolved a better method than now exists both for getting reports before parliament more quickly and for reviewing such reports.

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that a method has to be devised of reviewing the work of these crown companies and related organizations. But I submit it is impossible to control such organizations from a legislative chamber, such as a parliament. With the multiplicity of our economic enterprises to-day we have to find ways and means of dealing with reports which are substantially different from the manner in which these bills have been considered in the house. We have had interminable debate, and have listened to the same arguments hour after hour, until one has become thoroughly tired of listening to the reiteration of those arguments.

I can understand there are some who are opposed to public enterprise of this description. I do not think this type of enterprise is going very far. Indeed, I think it is most modest, and is only an attempt to do for ourselves what every other country is doing for itself. The manner in which crown companies are being set up and functioning is, it seems to me, in line with the trend everywhere in the world.

I rose to say that I agree with the minister that when some of us who are reaching middle age began our activities, we did not earn very much; but neither did we pay out much for our board.

Mr. HOWE: We could not.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, we could not; but we did not, and we managed to get along with very little.

But times have changed, and it seems to me that if Canada is to retain her young scientists —and certainly in this age we need to retain them—we have to do something better than we have been doing, through the research council and other organizations of that description. We are losing too many of our bright young men and women to our great neighbour to the south. Some, as I said the other day, are even going to Great Britain to engage in scientific and other activities. We must see that our scientific organization is properly financed.

We have heard a good deal about substantial sums at the disposal of the national research council. What do they amount to? I have not the exact figures, but I think they total around $14 million or $15 million. That is the amount at the disposal of the national research council in a country with such great undeveloped resources, resources to which science must be applied if we are to reap the benefits from them. When one compares that amount with the amounts being spent by other countries for scientific research, we find that in this country the percentage of national income being spent in that field is small in comparison. It seems to me that instead of criticizing the setting up of this organization, as has been done, we should say that we are glad to see something of this sort being done in a comprehensive way and that we are going to support the measure. I know my Progressive Conservative friends dislike the idea of many other things that are being done for the benefit of the ordinary man and woman in Canada.

Mr. JACKMAN: Not so; never.

Mr. COLDWELL: It certainly is so.

Mr. STIRLING: Not at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am trying to think in terms of 1936, not in terms of 1846 or thereabouts. It seems to me that this is a bill which should command the support of the house.

Mr. GREEN: It got the support of the house to-day.

Mr. COLDWELL: It got the support of the house, but it was grudging support according to the discussion that has gone on. As far as controls are concerned, it seems to me that the proper way in which to handle this is the way in which we now handle crown companies already in existence, such as the Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The matter could be handled through committees. I do not say that the organizations to which I have referred are perfect, but—

An hon. MEMBER: Far from it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Far from it, if you believe that.

An hon. MEMBER: I do believe it.

Mr. COLDWELL: If you do believe it, all right but let us improve them. What I am saying is that this parliament has an opportunity, through appropriate committees, if it desires to use it, of going into every detail of the activities of any one of the organizations that we have already established. It seems to me that that is the way we should handle crown companies. I know these are on a different footing; but when the minister is before us with his estimates in connection with the national research council we shall have an opportunity of inquiring, not only into the actual expenditures that have been made in the past year but into the expenditures that are being contemplated and into the policy that is to be followed by means of those expenditures.

I do not think we are paying enough attention to scientific research. I do not think we are spending enough of our national income on scientific research. I submit that if we spend public money on research, the benefits that accrue from that research should come back to the people of Canada. One proposal in this bill that I do object to is that the right is given to sell patents on things that have been developed by the publicly owned national research council. I think that is all wrong.

Mr. FLEMING: Is my hon. friend talking against the bill?

Mr. COLDWELL: I am talking for the bill, but I am pointing out one defect in it.

Mr. JACKMAN: The same as we are doing.

Mr. COLDWELL: You kept up a constant barrage for days on the other bill, for weeks even.

Mr. GREEN: You did not hear what we said this afternoon on the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: I read and listened to the discussion which my hon. friends engaged in for hours and hours on the crown companies bill.

Mr. BROOKS: It is wrong when we say it, but it is right when you say it.

Mr. STIRLING: That is just it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I must ask hon. members to keep order. It is not according to the rules to interrupt a speaker.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you. However, I do not mind if guilty consciences sometimes express themselves. I think anything done by one of our publicly owned institutions for the benefit of Canada should be used for the benefit of Canada. One of the matters that will come before this house in connection with the combines legislation is the question of patents. One of the evils that we have to fight in this country is the patent evil. I would hope that before we reach the particular section in this bill which deals with the matter the minister will agree to remove from it what I regard as an objectionable feature. In the main this bill is a step in the right direction. All I can say about the national research council at the present time is that we have not provided the wherewithal for it to carry on the functions that are contemplated in this bill.

Mr. BOUCHER: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the C.C.F. party, has undertaken to censure the members of the Progressive Conservative party for reiteration. I should like to refer to some of the matters he has reiterated. I do not think I need recall to members of the committee the fact that almost every C.C.F. member who spoke on this bill, or on the preceding crown companies bill, deplored the fact that scientists were going south, that there was a great need for further research, that more money should be spent on research and that the terrible combines and cartels were crucifying the people of Canada. The leader of the C.C.F. who has just sat down reiterated everyone of those points ad nauseam. I would have hoped that he would not attempt to censure others for his own sins and then go on to give an example of his adherence to those sins.

He turned around and talked about money for the national research council being brought before parliament in the form of estimates, and he said that we of the Progressive Conservative party did not appreciate the policy that was being placed before the committee. If he had understood what the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said on the Government Companies Operation Act he would know that grants to crown companies, whether set up under the national research council or otherwise, are made in the form of allocations before estimates are drawn up or before there is any survey of contemplated expenditures made. Apparently he did not get that point.

Mr. COLDWELL: I got it all right.

Mr. BOUCHER: You did not indicate that you had got it. You spoke one way and thought another.

Mr. COLDWELL: I showed you how to get around it.

Mr. BOUCHER: The hon. member says he showed it; he says that he understood it, but we shall see how much he really does understand it. He stated that the national research council had only something like $14,000,000 a year to spend on research. We are now dealing with a bill that gives the national research council the power to set up crown companies. Under the provisions of section 9 of the bill these companies are made applicable to the Government Companies Operation Act, which we passed the other night. The governor in council has power to allocate to each crown company, including crown companies set up under the national research council, one-half million dollars for operations and another half million dollars a year for extensions.

Mr. HOWE: There is a little reiteration there.

Mr. BOUCHER: I have to reiterate in order to get the members of the C.C.F., particularly the leader thereof, to say what they think.

Mr. HOWE: This is the twentieth time.

Mr. BOUCHER: And to get the minister's attention. How can an hon. member get up in this committee and say that the national research council has only $14,000,000 to expend when it has the power to incorporate crown companies and when those crown companies can get money out of the people's treasury without its being appropriated? The minister stated definitely that it was to be out of unappropriated money and our C.C.F. friends fought against changing that word to "appropriated." How can they now say that estimates will be set before parliament which will give hon. members plenty of time to scrutinize proposed expenditures when the fact is that the expenditures will all have been made by the crown company before they will ever come to parliament?

I should like to ask the minister who is piloting this bill another question. I know there are crown companies to which money has been allocated out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. They are tabled in the reports, having already been allocated by the Government Companies Operation Act. Expenditure can come before parliament for scrutiny and discussion in only one of two ways: an estimate, which is a proposed expenditure, or a statutory appropriation under a statutory appropriation act, as I think the Government Companies Operation Act is. What opportunity will parliament have to discuss expenditures, increased earnings from the operation of these crown companies, together with grants for operations, extensions, maintenance or improvements? If the minister would enlighten us on that point it might allay our fears.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has asked that question five or six times, and I have tried to explain the situation in the simplest language I could use, but I have been totally unable to make him understand. I am not going to start all over again. Reiteration can be carried too far, and I am not going to reiterate again.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Committee of the P.C. on scientific and industrial research.

Mr. GREEN: This section deals with the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research. Apparently in past years that committee has not functioned to any great extent. I think that is a tragedy. There is some scope for such a committee if it is possible to get busy cabinet ministers to devote enough time to meetings of the committee. Is there to be any change in the situation in the future? Is it now intended that there shall be an active and aggressive committee of the cabinet dealing with matters of research, or is this committee of the cabinet to continue to be largely a matter of form?

Mr. HOWE: There is and always has been an active committee. It meets to decide any question of policy referred to it. It is composed of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Mines and Resources, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Labour.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How often did the committee meet last year?

Mr. HOWE: I have attended five or six meetings, and I did not always go until I became chairman. I spent at least an hour a day on affairs of the national research council acting in my capacity as chairman of that committee. The committee met three or four times in the last year, not on routine matters, but to decide matters of policy, to discuss the size of the appropriation and the nature of the projects that should be undertaken.

Mr. GREEN: Does it deal with any business other than the conduct of the research council?

Mr. HOWE: That is all.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Appointment of council.

Mr. JACKMAN: Subsection 4 provides:

> There shall be an executive committee of the council consisting of the president, vice-president (administration), vice-president (scientific) and at least three other members selected by the council.

I suggest to the minister—and I do not see why he would not accept it if he has the best interest of the committee at heart—that the last line but one of that subsection be amended to read: "and at least four other members selected by the council." The reason I suggest that is that only the executive members are in receipt of remuneration; the others serve voluntarily. It is not easy to get men to attend. If only three other members are appointed it would mean that the executive officers would be in the majority at all times. If at least four outside members were appointed to this executive committee, or even five or six, there would be a better chance of the committee not being dominated by or of even having a majority of executive officers at all times. I think that is a reasonable suggestion which I hope the minister will accept.

Mr. HOWE: I would not argue at length whether the executive committee should be six or seven. The council itself in the past has consisted of fifteen, distributed geographically from coast to coast. It is now proposed to make the council twenty. Because of geographic and travel difficulties, it meets four times a year. Between meetings of the council the responsibility for decision has been carried in the past by the president of the council. The creation of an executive committee which can meet frequently will relieve the president and paid officers of some responsibility for decisions between meetings of the full council. I question whether an executive committee of seven would be better than one of six members. I think usually an executive committee consists of five. The smaller it is, the better the responsibility is carried.

Mr. JACKMAN: But this executive committee, as I understand it, has powers which did not exist before. The executive committee itself did not exist before, only the council. Now we have an executive committee which has all the powers in law, as well as in fact, of the council. I believe that it would be better for the carrying on of the work if this executive committee, which legally has all the power, were not composed of at least fifty per cent of executives in receipt of a salary. The general council, now fifteen in number, can be overlooked between meetings because of the power that will reside in the executive committee itself. May I ask the minister, when he replies, to say whether a quorum has been fixed for the executive committee, and is there a quorum for the council itself?

Mr. HOWE: The amendment provides that there shall be a minimum of three, but there would be nothing to prevent council from appointing four members to the executive committee.

Mr. JACKMAN: I pointed that out.

Mr. HOWE: The executive committee has power only between meetings of the full council. It can exercise power for three months, but its actions can be overruled by the full council whenever it meets. The authority of the executive committee can be limited by the full council if the full council loses confidence in the executive committee. There is nothing in the measure to prevent the appointment of four members from the council at large if council decides that is desirable.

Mr. GREEN: Why not make it four, then? Pretty wide power is given to the executive committee under section 5 of this bill, which provides:

> The executive committee of the council may exercise the powers of the council and shall submit at each meeting of the council minutes of its proceedings since the last preceding meeting of the council.

There is no provision for a review by the full council. I suggest that there is some merit in the point raised by the hon. member for Rosedale, and I would suggest that the word "three" be changed to "four" in section 3 of the bill.

Mr. HOWE: The council itself recommended that there be a minimum of three. I would dislike to overrule the council without consultation. This bill was not invented in the office of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply; it was invented in the research council, and was sent to myself as chairman of the cabinet committee with the recommendation of the full council. On a matter which is wholly for the council I would dislike to overrule the opinion of the council. I might say, however, that the executive committee is appointed by the council and it exercises its brief authority only between meetings of the council. It can be dismissed and reappointed by the full council at will. So that I think there is no great authority carried there.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—President of the council.

Mr. JACKMAN: I asked the minister with regard to a quorum, and he pointed out, what I pointed out myself, that there must be at least three other members selected by the council, but that is merely the nominal role of the executive committee. What I am asking him is, is there a provision as to the quorum of the executive committee, and also a provision as to the quorum of the council itself?

Mr. HOWE: The original Research Council Act provides in article 10 thereof that the council may exercise the following powers, namely, (a) to make by-laws for the conduct of its business. The matter of a quorum is a matter for the by-laws of the council, and the council has the authority to make its own by-laws.

Mr. JACKMAN: It certainly seems strange that the minister should come to parliament asking for legislation setting up a certain organization, and saying that this organization has the right to make its own by-laws and determine exactly how it should be run, as if parliament did not have something to say as to how these institutions and committees should be run. I think what is suggested is preposterous, and I suggest that we as a committee should determine how we want this council run, within the field of our own discretion and with what background we have of experience in committees, et cetera. If we feel that a certain procedure should be followed it is up to us to incorporate that in the bill, and not say to a committee, "Here is carte blanche; make your own rules; come when you like; delegate powers to a few paid executives, and carry on; after a while report to us; then after fifteen months or two years report to parliament, and by that time it will all be forgotten about." Might I emphasize, while I am on that point, the need for this council to report to parliament in a much shorter time than is allowed under the provisions of the bill as it now stands. The minister has said how the national research council erred in declaring that the Pidgeon process for making magnesium was not a good process. What happened? Private enterprise went in; one of my constituents—now dead—Mr. Segsworth, took up the process and developed it and made a great contribution to the war effort on that account. Then the minister mentioned another matter in which the national research council or his own department erred, namely the expenditure on the Abasand development. I remember talking with an official of an oil company some years ago when this matter of Abasand was brought up in this house, to a large extent by one of my own colleagues, and I was told then virtually that the process was not feasible, although there was no doubt that oil was contained in the various sands.

So, in view of the fact that everyone is apt to make errors from time to time, I believe, on the record as displayed by the minister himself, that the national research council should make its report to parliament or, if parliament is not sitting, to the public, so that we and our constituents may know of it. As I pointed out, one of my constituents took up the magnesium process where the national research council left off, and did a real job. So I believe that the council should make its report available to the public in short order, not in a period of fifteen months or two years.

Mr. HOWE: I have in my hand the report of the National Research Council of Canada, 1944-45. It was tabled at the session of parliament preceding this. I cannot give my hon. friend the exact date; I shall have to look it up. I am sure, at least I am reasonably certain, that this parliament will not adjourn before the report of the national research council for 1945-46 is laid on the table. It is published as quickly as it can be published after the close of the fiscal year, just as the reports of other departments of government are published. It so happens that the Canadian National Railways closes its year with the calendar year instead of the government's fiscal year.

Mr. JACKMAN: But it reports monthly.

Mr. HOWE: No, it does not report monthly.

Mr. JACKMAN: Well, it reports its earnings monthly, which is what we are interested in.

Mr. HOWE: I am sure my hon. friend cannot find monthly earning reports of the Canadian National Railways for the last twelve months. It just does not make them any more. He is thinking of the Canadian Pacific Railway company.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. JACKMAN: No, I am thinking of the C.N.R.; and if the minister will read the evidence in the committee he will see where I made the statement.

Mr. HOWE: In any event, I think the matter of the report is somewhat exaggerated. No government department is required to report to parliament within a certain time limit, but as soon as it can prepare its report and have it printed.

Mr. JACKMAN: Now the minister is branching into new fields and streamlining the national research council.

Mr. HOWE: Let us take the nonsense out of this talk of streamlining. What new field am I branching into? I am setting up a corporation to patent discoveries of the national research council and market the patent.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is it new or old?

Mr. HOWE: It is new.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is what I said.

Mr. HOWE: That is all I am doing. We are told that a vast enterprise is started. But this is all that is being discussed under this bill. Another possibility I have mentioned is that a corporation which the government owns and bought as a corporation, not a government corporation, may have a home found for it under national research, and it may not.

Mr. GREEN: Which one is that?

Mr. HOWE: Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, which has been a corporation for many years. It is wholly owned by the government, and there will be no change, whether it is placed under the research council, or the atomic energy commission, or under a department of government. It is there today. Then I mentioned that the atomic energy plant at Chalk River may very well be operated as a corporation. That is three, and that is all there is any intention of handling at the moment. One would think we were running the whole country by government corporations. It is perfect nonsense. I never heard a debate conducted in just this style in discussing serious matters, because the national research council is a serious enterprise, and all that we are doing here is to stream-line the work of the corporation at the request of the council which is responsible for these matters. Let us see whether we can use a little less extravagant language.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Additional powers of council.

Mr. FLEMING: Section 7 proposes to add two powers to those now enjoyed by the council under section 10 of the act. There are quite extensive powers in section 10, to which this proposes to add two, and I am concerned with the first one, under paragraph (h). It is in these words:

To carry on experimental and development work and manufacturing with respect to the matters referred to in paragraphs (c) and (d) of this section—

I do not want to take time to read these two paragraphs. They are quite lengthy, and include within their broad scope much that is involved in research work. Then the new paragraph proceeds:

—so as to render the processes, methods or products to which the said matters relate more available and effective in useful arts and manufacturing and for scientific purposes and otherwise.

The minister has indicated, in the course of his remarks on, I think, two occasions now, that it is desirable that the research council—we are not talking now about corporations, but about the council—should have power to carry through its research work to the point of testing in pilot plants; and I think we would all be in agreement with that position. As long as the manufacturing which is intended to fall within the scope of this new power is confined to manufacturing in the pilot plant stage, then I think no one will take exception to it. But, with respect, the section as it now stands is unnecessarily broad. It will be noticed that it is not confined to experimental and development work, but it says, "and manufacturing". If I am not mistaken, the minister's intention is to confine manufacturing as it appears in that subsection to manufacturing in the course of experimental and development work or manufacturing incidental to the experimental and development work, not manufacturing in the commercial sense.

I think I have made my point clear on that. It is desirable that the unnecessary breadth of the language should be reduced in keeping with the purpose which the minister has indicated to the committee this section is intended to serve. It has been indicated that the research council is not a body which has at all times practised the most efficient business methods, and the desirability has appeared more than once in the debate of clearly distinguishing between business on the one hand and research on the other. The minister stated at page 1904 of Hansard:

I think those who are best acquainted with the council realize that its business administration has not been all that could be desired.

That is the reason he gave for appointing a vice-president who will be a business executive.

Again, the minister stated at page 1906:

It has never been the practice of the national research council to go into the manufacturing business.

If the intention of this section is to give the council power to carry on such manufacturing, that is to say up to the pilot plant stage, as is incidental to experimental and development work, then we are in complete agreement as to what is desirable. But we say that the language for that purpose is unnecessarily broad, and I would therefore ask the minister to agree to amend the new paragraph (h) by inserting after the word "manufacturing" these words:

incidental to such experimental and development work.

I hope the minister will agree to that, because it will make clear what he has already indicated to be the purpose of the amendment to the act. It does not take away anything except unnecessary breadth in the language. The paragraph as it stands is broad enough, I fear, to permit the council to carry manufacturing actually to the commercial stage, and we have been assured by the minister that that is not his intention.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. FLEMING: An hon. member in the C.C.F. group says, "why not?" We can have a long debate on that. I am content to discuss that question with my hon. friend at any time, but if the minister will indicate now his view of this phase of the matter we may be spared another debate on the question the hon. member raises.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest to my hon. friend that a careful reading of the section will indicate that with the pilot plant work it is definitely limited:

To carry on experimental and development work and manufacturing with respect to the matters referred to in paragraphs (c) and (d) of this section so as to render the processes, methods or products to which the said matters relate more available and effective in useful arts and manufacturing—

Mr. FLEMING: Go on.

Mr. HOWE:

—and for scientific purposes and otherwise.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, "and otherwise."

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps "and otherwise" is superfluous. Without that phrase the limitation would be just as exact in the present wording as in that suggested by my hon. friend.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it we are in agreement on the purpose which the section is intended to serve. It is simply a matter of the breadth of the language used, and I would urge upon the minister that the language I have proposed gives the council all the power for which he has been contending on two different occasions. It does not take away from the council anything that is desirable, and it will contribute something to the clarification of the section if we add the words "incidental to such experimental and development work" after the words "manufacturing."

Mr. HOWE: I suggest again that a careful reading would indicate that the limitation is there now:

. . . so as to render the processes, methods or products to which the said matters relate more available and effective in useful arts and manufacturing

And also more available and effective for scientific purposes and otherwise.

Perhaps I might state the experience of the war years. In the war years the research council did a great deal of work in radar. It did not manufacture radar for the public, but it did manufacture one radar set as a pilot model and that was sent to Research Enterprises where the manufacturing process was carried on. I suppose in the narrow sense of the word the manufacture of that one radar set could be called manufacturing, but it is manufacturing, following the wording of the act, "to which the said matters relate" so as to be more available and effective in useful arts and manufacturing. It was simply the manufacturing of a pilot model.

Mr. FLEMING: Would that not be the kind of manufacturing that would clearly be incidental to experimental and development work? My amendment, I repeat, would not take away from the council anything which the council ought to have in the way of power. What the minister says substantiates what I stated before, that we are at one on the purpose, and it is simply a matter of reducing the unnecessary breadth of the language in the section. For the sake of clarification, what objection can there be to the insertion of the words I have suggested?

Mr. HOWE: My suggestion is that it would be redundant. The act says exactly what the hon. member wishes it to say:

so as to render the processes, methods or products to which the said matters relate more available and effective in useful arts and manufacturing.

It is not manufactured except in the sense of making the product available and effective in useful arts and manufacturing and making it available and effective for scientific purposes and otherwise. It is to make the discovery effective to the manufacturer.

Mr. STIRLING: What in the minister's mind does "and otherwise" mean? It seems to me to mean et cetera, et cetera.

Mr. HOWE: I do not mind proposing an amendment which might clarify the position.

Mr. FRASER: Could the minister not say, "for scientific and other purposes"? Would that not cover it?

Mr. HOWE: That is what it does say.

Mr. JAENICKE: The objection I have to the section refers to paragraph (i) and not to (h), because there is an altogether new principle involved—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I suggest that it would be better to finish with (h) before we go on to (i). An amendment has been proposed by the hon. member for Eglinton that section 7 be amended by inserting in the eighth line on page 3 after the word "manufacturing" the words "incidental to such experimental and development work".

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend read the section as it would appear with his proposed amendment?

Mr. FLEMING:

To carry on experimental and development work and manufacturing incidental to such experimental and development work with respect to the matters referred to in paragraphs (c) and (d) of this section so as to render the processes, methods, or products to which the said matters relate more available and effective in useful arts and manufacturing, and for scientific purposes and otherwise.

It is then both clear and grammatical.

Mr. PROBE: It is clear that our hon. friends to the right are definitely trying to ensure in this paragraph that under no circumstances shall manufacturing for commercial purposes be carried on by the crown. I presume that is correct. That is the purpose of the present amendment, to guarantee that the research council shall under no circumstances step into the manufacturing business for commercial purposes.

Mr. FLEMING: I think it would be more accurate to say that the purpose of the amendment is to clarify the section so as to establish that which he has said to be clearly the intention.

Mr. PROBE: That is the intention?

Mr. FLEMING: Yes. It is a matter of clarification only. The minister is in agreement on the purpose.

Mr. PROBE: Is the minister also in accord with that as the function of this corporation, that there shall be no commercial manufacture at any stage of the work of the national research council so far as the Canadian people are concerned?

Mr. HOWE: Under this act it is not the intention to permit manufacture. It has never been the practice of the national research council to do manufacturing or development work beyond the preliminary stages, and there is no intention on my part to change that situation. My legal advisers believe that the amendment is wholly redundant, but there is no objection to it. If my hon. friend wishes to press it and the committee wishes to carry it, it will be quite all right with me.

Mr. PROBE: As I see this section, the Conservatives are quite consistent. They want to make sure that we undertake all the expense of the original research in the early stages. The cost can be cheerfully borne by the Canadian people as a whole in the early stages. Then when we come to the time that it is commercially feasible, after we have set up a pilot plant to show that the process is feasible, then they suggest that we turn it over to Messrs. Conservatives and Company—

Mr. MacNICOL: You mean you will sell it?

Mr. PROBE: —and let them exploit it. That is the history of their party as far back as you care to go.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Cheap.

Mr. JACKMAN: Just like Marquis wheat; it is the same idea—for the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. PROBE: Provided that the grain exchange can handle Marquis wheat; provided that the friends of the hon. member for Rosedale can buy or otherwise.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks to the section under discussion. It has nothing to do with wheat.

Mr. PROBE: The hon. member for Rosedale brought it up as an example, and I am quite insistent that I want to be clear with respect to both what our friends to the right see in this section and what the Minister of Reconstruction sees in it on behalf of the government.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps you will not like him so much then.

Mr. PROBE: The hon. member for Rosedale and his confreres see in this section a definite step. Once the experimental expense has been undertaken and the product is feasible for manufacture they will take it over at their price. The minister has indicated that he is prepared in general to adopt the same idea. Am I right in that? I should like the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to say whether or not he believes the crown should step out. Once the thing is proved to be commercially feasible? Is the government then going to step out after the expense has been undertaken, and turn the rest of the production over to private enterprise?

Mr. HOWE: I should not care to give a reply to that, but I would say that when the experimental work is finished it is no longer a matter for the research council. It has never been the practice of the research council to manufacture anything for sale, and I sincerely hope that that will always be the policy, because research is one thing and manufacturing is another.

Mr. PROBE: With that, of course, I am in accord so far as the research council is concerned, but I hope that the purport of this is not to stop necessarily a crown company of some other sort from carrying on with the commercial development—

Mr. JACKMAN: That is another matter.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Fleming) negatived.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister said he had no objection to it.

Mr. JAENICKE: With regard to the proposed new paragraph (i) of section 10 of the act, we of this group have some objection to it because it involves a great change in the previous act. The new section 11 replaces the old section 11 and omits the provisions covered by the new paragraph (i) of section 10. I should like to read the old section, which is as follows:

> All discoveries, inventions and improvements in processes, apparatus, or machines, made by a member or any number of members of the technical staff of the council shall be vested in the council and shall be made available to the public under such conditions and payment of fees or royalties or otherwise as the council may determine, subject to the approval of the governor in council.

As I read this section it means that the crown would always obtain the patent rights in any inventions or discoveries made by the research council. I think we should retain that; but paragraph (i) of the new section 10 changes that and proposes that the council shall have power to sell or otherwise grant the patents or discoveries which are made. We know that to-day patents are one of the causes of the grip which monopolies have upon our economic life. While personally I have no objection to making any inventions and patents available to private enterprise, so to speak, I think the crown should at all times retain the absolute right in them so that they can license not only one but two or three, because our hon. friends who support private enterprise say that competition is the life of trade. I therefore move that the words "or sell or otherwise grant" in the first line of paragraph (i) of the new section 10 be deleted.

Mr. HOWE: I think my hon. friend is mistaken about the nature of the transaction referred to. The national research council is the agency of the corporation of the United States which handles patents in that country. The national research council handles the Canadian rights to patents owned by the government of the United States, through this corporation, and also handles Canadian rights for the government of the United Kingdom, and it may lease or sell as instructed by the owners of the patents. Though it is not the practice of the national research council to sell its own patents—usually the practice is to grant non-exclusive licences—nevertheless there may be a patent which has no value so far as the commission can see. Take magnesium which we have discussed to-night. Had there been a patent, and had the commission reported the process not desirable for the government to enter into, nevertheless private enterprise saw possibilities that warranted further development. If private enterprise had been unable to do so because they could not acquire the patent, that would have been an unfortunate result. In other words, the fact that a patent has been granted should not be allowed to prevent others from carrying on further with the development if they are prepared to pay a reasonable price for the work that has been performed and for the patent that has been obtained. Therefore there are many reasons why refusal to sell might be contrary to the public interest.

Mr. JAENICKE: What section would that be?

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member read it himself, section 11.

Mr. JAENICKE: With great respect I suggest to the minister that section 11 does not mean they have the right to sell.

[Mr. Jaenicke.]

Mr. HOWE: The section reads:

. . . shall be made available to the public under such conditions and payment of fees or royalties or otherwise as the council may determine—

What is "or otherwise"?

Mr. JAENICKE: I would say the implication there is that it simply means to license.

Mr. HOWE: Are you a lawyer?

Mr. JAENICKE: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: I will sit down. I am told by my legal advisers that under this section the council has been selling these foreign rights for a great many years. I presume my hon. friend would not give it as his legal opinion that they have been violating the act in doing so?

Mr. JAENICKE: I would not be prepared to answer that at the present time, but I will look into it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Which is a good legal answer, incidentally.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I shall not enter into the legal interpretation; but the thing that does amuse me is this: A minute ago when we were discussing section 8 the hon. member for Kindersley seemed to be very much concerned lest the research council would not be able to sell products which they manufactured. He took strong objection to that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: He said he did not care what happened to it.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Now he takes the other stand and wants to make sure that they do not sell them.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, nothing of the kind.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I am pleased that the minister has clarified section 8—and I understand that section has not been passed; at least, if it were, I did not hear it. The minister has said that the council as set out will not go into business of manufacturing articles for sale. I think that policy is sound.

With respect of section 7 (i), I agree that the research council should not sell patent rights. I have no objection whatsoever to their retaining possession of patents, and then letting them out for royalties, or by some other means, so long as they keep control. I am expressing my own personal view when I say that I believe there have been and still are cases where large companies have deliberately prevented the manufacture and sale of certain inventions. I think the government should control that policy. That has always been our stand, and we have been consistent in it.

In my view the government should control the policy, but should not enter into the production of articles for sale. I think it can be more effective if it controls the policy in respect of the development of these resources. For that reason I am in doubt as to the explanation the minister has given, and I wonder whether his explanation is sound when he said the word "sell" would not prevent the research council from going into the commercial business of selling patent rights. If it does, then in my view it should not be so. I believe these patent rights are of interest to the whole nation. They should be retained by the research council, but should be let out to companies which should pay royalties for the use of them.

Then, those companies should be compelled to use such rights. I say that because in the past there have been examples of companies retaining important patent rights and refusing to develop them. That is not in the interests of Canada. When the government retains ownership and control of rights, letting them out on a royalty or rental basis, it would be in a position then carefully and judicially to control policy. I believe it should stay out of the market.

Mr. GREEN: What is the underlying policy of the research council with regard to these patents on inventions made by technical employees of the council? There seems to be some confusion on the point, and I did not get clearly from the minister's statement just what the policy has been?

It is quite clear that there have been many worth-while inventions during the war. With the council carrying on an expanded peacetime programme, there are likely to be more in the future—and we hope that that may be so. Is it the policy that, as these inventions are made and patents obtained, the right to use such patents will be given as widely as possible in Canada to any business concerns which can make use of them or, on the other hand, is it the policy to sell the right to a patent to some firm at the best price obtainable? It seems to me there is a big difference between those two policies, and I should like to know what the plan is.

I realize that if rights are being sold to another country, or to people outside Canada, it is only right and proper that they should pay a proper price for those rights. But it does seem that within Canada a different rule should apply.

Mr. HOWE: It has been the practice of the national research council to patent inventions made by employees of the council in the right of the crown in Canada. It has not been the policy of the Canadian government to sell its patent, so far as use in Canada is concerned. It has been the policy to grant non-exclusive licences.

My hon. friend asks if everyone who wants a licence can get one. That does not necessarily follow.

Mr. GREEN: No, I did not go that far. I referred to those who could honestly make use of the right in their business.

Mr. HOWE: It has been the policy to grant non-exclusive rights. How many non-exclusive rights will be granted in the same field is a matter of policy for the research council to decide.

Mr. COLDWELL: If it has been the policy of the national research council not to sell, then why include the provision at all?

Mr. HOWE: I was coming to that.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is the change in wording that is puzzling us. It looks like a change in policy.

Mr. HOWE: If I could finish my statement without interruption, perhaps I could make it clear. We have referred to the use in Canada of patents of the national research council. But the handling of patents goes much beyond that. As I say, by arrangement with similar organizations, the national research council is the agent of the United States research authorities for the handling of United States patents in Canada, and also for the handling of United Kingdom government patents in Canada. It may be the policy of the government owning the patent that it should be sold rather than leased.

There is also the matter of the foreign use of Canadian government patents. For instance, the patent rights in Egypt or in China of a Canadian patent might be better sold than leased. This simply gives flexibility to those who determine policy as regards the handling of patents, so that they can act in the interests of the Canadian government in the disposal of either their own patent or the patents of other governments which have been placed in their custody for disposal.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This afternoon I mentioned the discovery of a process to make glycol from low-grade wheat and damp frosted wheat. I understand that this glycol has stood up well, when compared with Prestone. My information is that the process was made available to the Saskatchewan wheat pool. The argument was that this organization has large quantities of low-grade wheat in its possession from time to time, and that it would be the logical organization to manufacture.

On what terms would a process, such as the making of glycol from wheat, be made available to the wheat pool? Is it sold, or what charge is made for turning over the process?

Mr. HOWE: No Canadian patent is involved in the process of making glycol from Canadian wheat. It is a well known process. We give them the information, as one government to another. I believe there is no charge, as a rule.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some of us, and probably also the hon. member for Vancouver South, are interested in securing patents for the Canadian people with the title remaining in the crown. I can understand the minister's point of view when we are acting as the agent, say for the United States, or if we are sending a patent to Egypt; the probability is that we would sell for the United States or sell for ourselves in Egypt. Could this section not be so worded that there would be no doubt that what we have in mind is that we license or grant in Canada and authorize the council to sell on behalf of another government or beyond the borders of Canada?

Mr. JOHNSTON: If the Canadian government had a patent in connection with which they were negotiating in Egypt, what would stand in the way of the development of an Egyptian company by the Canadian government, merely granting them permission to use the patent on a royalty basis? I cannot see any reason why a company in Egypt would refuse to go ahead and manufacture on a royalty basis and not go ahead when it was not on an outright sale basis. I cannot see the logic of the minister's argument.

Mr. HOWE: The policy that we are discussing to-night is not a policy imposed by parliament upon the national research council, it has been the policy of the national research council since its inception not to sell its own patents in Canada but to grant non-exclusive rights. We are not changing that policy. It is contended that under the present act it was not possible to sell, but they have been selling for years. I doubt if they have been violating their own act.

Mr. JAENICKE: Not in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: They have been selling foreign patents in Canada as agents for other governments, and they have sold their own patents abroad. I do not think anyone will argue that there is anything in the present act to prevent them from selling a patent. In any event, it is not the intention to change the policy of the national research council, and for that reason I see no purpose in restricting the generality of the present bill.

Mrs. STRUM: Is this bill bringing the act into harmony with the practice?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It is not changing the previous act particularly. I contend that the previous act gives authority to sell. The purpose of this is not to change the policy that has been the policy of the national research council since its inception; it is simply to clarify the language.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am far from satisfied with the explanation that has been given. It is stated clearly in paragraph (i) of section 7, "to license or sell or otherwise grant." Then it says, "any other rights, vested in or owned or controlled by the council." It is definitely changing the policy, if the policy has been not to sell patents that are owned by the council in the name of the crown. It states here, "or owned or controlled by the council." If it is not the intention to sell patents in Canada that are owned by the council, then that is not stated here.

I think what is required is a revision of paragraph (i). I believe that a new subsection is needed so that these patents may be handled in Canada for Canadian industry, as well as patents for other governments or for this government beyond the borders of Canada. I think it would be well to let the section stand and reword this paragraph because we shall talk about it for two hours and not get anywhere. I do not think the committee is satisfied with the explanation.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe the hon. member for Dauphin has made a suggestion which should be followed. There is a general feeling, not only in this house but all over Canada, that in many respects the patent business is a great evil. We are anxious to see that this bill shall not give some future council some powers which we do not want to give out. I do not think any patent in the hands of the crown should be sold. I have no objection to making a patent available to business, but it should not be on an exclusive basis. I suppose, when we come to the Combines Investigation Act, we shall have an opportunity to go into this whole evil of patents. There are some examples of it in the field of radio and so on. I certainly object to the paragraph as it is worded; I think it needs rewording as the hon. member for Dauphin has suggested.

Mr. HOWE: I can assure my hon. friend that it has been very carefully considered. I doubt whether the national research council could carry out the responsibility it is taking under this act without the right to sell. For example, it appoints a university as an agent. Suppose that university develops something that is patented and asks the national research council to sell the patent for the account of the university. Surely it should have that right.

Mr. PROBE: That is as agent.

Mr. HOWE: If it cannot sell a Canadian patent, then it cannot sell it; that is all. Let us take another case. Supposing a milling company came to the research council and asked them to carry out certain research work at their expense. Technically, anything that was arrived at by the staff of the national research council would be the property of the council, and it would be necessary to sell the discovery back to the milling company in order to give it value for the payment it had made. I am simply putting a hypothetical proposition. This policy was not invented by parliament; it has been the practice of the national research council since its inception. For this parliament to take this opportunity to move in and impose restrictions on the activities of the council is, to my mind, not only unwise but immoral.

Mr. COLDWELL: I believe it is immoral for us to give rights that may lead to monopoly.

Mr. HOWE: We are giving no rights.

Mr. COLDWELL: As far as my opinion goes, I would not give an exclusive right by law for the use of a patent to anybody. I think the time has come when we have to protect the Canadian public against the kind of patent scalping we have had in this country for a long time. The minister gave the example of a milling company. If the milling company hired scientists to do a particular job in the way of developing a particular process and they were successful, I suppose that would be their property?

Mr. HOWE: Not under the act.

Mr. COLDWELL: Unless an agreement otherwise is made. I should like to see it provided that any patent obtained by the national research council shall be held permanently as an asset of the crown and leased, if necessary, to those who can use it. I do not want to see these patents sold within Canada for the exclusive use of anyone.

Mr. HOWE: They never have been.

Mr. COLDWELL: It seems to me that a simple change in this section would meet the difficulty. We are anxious to support the minister with his bill.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Does the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) wish to have his amendment stand?

Mr. PROBE: Unless we can have a compromise.

Mr. JOHNSTON: The minister referred to a university which might develop a patent and then give it to the research council to sell as agent. It seems to me that that would not require legislation because they would be acting merely as agents. As far as the milling company is concerned, if the research council developed a certain process it seems to me there would be grave doubt as to whom the patent belonged to once it was developed. A milling company might pay a scientist to develop a patent, and if it paid all the costs, probably the resultant patent would belong to the company. In that case you would not need legislation because the patent would already be the property of the milling company. The same is true of a university which developed a patent and gave it to the research council to sell as its agent. I do not think that would require a statute. The same would be true of United States concerns that put a patent into the hands of the research council as their agent. I do not think that would require a statute. The agent could go ahead legally and sell the patent wherever he wished. So it seems to me that "sell" is redundant and unnecessary. The minister has certainly not convinced me that these words are necessary, and if they are not necessary and redundant they should be struck out.

Mr. HOWE: I think my hon. friends are quite mistaken. Section 8 reads:

> 11. (1) All discoveries, inventions, or improvements in processes, apparatus or machines made by a member or any number of members of the technical staff of the council or a company and all rights with respect thereto shall be vested in the council.

That covers the milling company case.

Mr. JAENICKE: But you are repealing that.

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. JAENICKE: Yes, you are repealing it by section 8.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. COLDWELL: That makes all the difference. Could this section not stand over?

Mr. HOWE: I should like to get this bill through to-night. I am busy too, you know.

Mr. COLDWELL: If this section could stand, I think we might probably get the rest of the bill through. It is not likely to go through to-night with this section as it is.

Mr. HOWE: Will my hon. friend promise to reexamine it from his point of view to see if I may not be right just as well as he?

Mr. JAENICKE: The minister says that it has been the practice not to sell patents belonging to the crown in Canada, but paragraph (i) of section 7 says that council shall have the right to license or sell or otherwise grant or make available to others Canadian or other patents. So that there is certainly a change in policy.

Mr. HOWE: It has been the custom to sell Canadian patents abroad. A patent is not valuable unless used reasonably soon. This is the proposal of the national research council. It has asked for this amendment to clarify its rights. It has no intention of changing its policy. An invention belonging to the council is transferred to the crown company. That would have to be a sale. Otherwise how could you transfer rights? The crown company can act as agent not only of the research council but of other governments which desire the council to handle patents; also for educational institutions which want a patent marketed. The council asked for this amendment and I am in favour of giving it to them and would be obliged if hon. gentlemen would support me. I do not think I would be justified in accepting a snap amendment which may or may not be wise.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is why I suggested letting the section stand. No doubt the national research council knows exactly what is intended, but in three or five or ten years from now we may have an entirely new council, and one day some one may want to buy a patent for use in Canada. Their lawyer looks at the act and says: Yes, we have the right to sell this patent in Canada and we are going to do so.

Mr. JOHNSTON: No matter how good the intentions of the minister or of the council may be, the fact is that when you interpret a statute you must go by the language of the statute. I think the minister should reconsider this section.

Mr. STEPHENSON: I am not a lawyer and am speaking only as a layman, but the wording of the section seems very clear to me. Reading it this way it says:

To license to other Canadians, or to sell to other Canadians or to make available to other Canadians patent rights.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

The word "sell" is definite. After all, the grants that are made to these corporations or to companies formed under the council come out of the taxpayers' money, yours and mine. Therefore we have already paid for these discoveries and inventions with our own money. Why should they not be made available to the Canadian people without being sold to them?

Mr. HOWE: That is a fallacious argument. It has been made many times in connection with War Assets Corporation. We have heard it repeatedly said that the country has paid for such-and-such equipment, and why should the people have to buy it back again? That is a ridiculous argument. The taxpayer is entitled to a run for his money just as well as anybody else. If a man creates a valuable invention it is ridiculous to say that it has been paid for by the taxpayer.

Mr. STEPHENSON: If, for instance, I were paying a man working for me, and if he created something while he is working for and being paid by me, it belongs to me, his employer. So, if a person works for the government and is paid by the taxpayers' money, whatever he creates belongs to the people.

Mr. MacNICOL: There seems to be a lot of talk about patents by many who seemingly know very little about the subject. I could not dream of a manufacturer getting a patent from the national research council if it were to be made available to scores of other manufacturers, because then it would be of no value to anybody. Suppose that the research council developed a solvent for boilers and they notified all and sundry to see what they had developed. Nobody would want to take it. It would have no value unless someone had an exclusive right to it. Most patents can be got around by clever, able men. I do not know of any ordinary business patent that could not be got around. I think the government should put the patent up for sale and sell it to the highest bidder on condition that he uses it. That would create employment. If he does not use the patent, take it back.

Amendment (Mr. Jaenicke) negatived.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section carried.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I was up, Mr. Chairman, before you declared section 7 carried. I am not satisfied with the conclusion we reached. We seem to have got back to where we started. We made a perfectly reasonable request to the minister, that the first paragraph of section 7 stand until such time as the two types of patents involved in it can be separated. There are definitely two types of patents to be considered.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. Section 7 is carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was the amendment which was lost, and when the amendment was lost the section was not carried.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Yes; I said that section 7 was carried.

Mr. COLDWELL: No; my hon. friend was on his feet.

Mr. HOWE: Let us go back to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was declared "carried," but I think we might revert to it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The amendment was lost, and then I asked if section 7 was carried. As far as the chair is concerned it is carried. If it is the wish of the committee to revert to section 7 I am in their hands.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: As I pointed out, I was on my feet before it carried.

Mr. MITCHELL: Do not argue about it. We have gone back to it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I will not argue about it now. I was pointing out that two types of patents are involved: first, patents developed and owned by the research council. Then there are those of which the minister spoke, which are held on behalf of this country or other countries by the research council which acts as agent for these patents. In order to avoid confusion, it is quite clear that we shall have to have another paragraph dealing with the other half of this question. Unless they are separated we are definitely giving the research council the right, almost an instruction, to sell patents to private enterprises or private industry, if you want to call it that. Regardless of what the minister may say as to the policy of the council, we are taking the responsibility for this legislation; we are passing on it; from now on parliament will be responsible for this act, and I for one will not agree to have it stand as it is.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Discoveries and inventions vested in council.

Mr. FRASER: I wonder whether the minister or the research council has made any provision for rewarding the technicians who may make a discovery. Do you reward them in any way?

Mr. HOWE: Section 11 of the act states:

2. The council, with the approval of the governor in council, may pay to its technical officers and to others working under its auspices who have made valuable discoveries, inventions, or improvements in processes, apparatus and machines such bonuses or royalties as in its opinion may be warranted.

Mr. FRASER: Has a special fund been set up for that? What I want to know is, has a limit been put on the amount?

Mr. HOWE: Certain receipts from patents and royalties have been set up in a fund, but I have been told that no awards have been made from it. In other words, it would need to be an exceptional case to call for a reward, since research is the ordinary occupation of members of the research council, and the finding of patentable devices is part of their daily task.

Mr. FLEMING: I understand that the national research council does not receive fees for work done on behalf of outside persons, that, for instance, unlike the Ontario research foundation, it does not run a research service. Does it collect a fee only in the event of a sale or leasing or granting of patent rights? Am I right in that?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is quite mistaken. Industry is charged fully for any work which is done for industry. I pointed out that the earnings of the national research council for work carried out for industry over the past six years have amounted to about $5,000,000.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes. The minister spoke about a number of government departments in that respect.

Mr. HOWE: That is something else. That it another source of income.

Mr. FLEMING: I now have the report of the council for the year 1944-45, and I am informed that none has been tabled or submitted to members of parliament hitherto. On page 14 there is a financial statement, but I had not an opportunity of checking into it before the bill came up.

Mr. HOWE: The financial statement is on page 14. The revenue from patents is shown there: royalties, and sales of patents; revenue for the year was $42,836.51.

Mr. FLEMING: The next item, laboratory fees, is, I take it, the answer to my question.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; that is correct.

Mr. FLEMING: That is a fee for a particular service rendered at the request of someone?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct, yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Council may procure incorporation of companies.

Mr. GREEN: Section 9 adds two sections to the original bill: section 14, which deals with crown companies; and section 15, which deals with the setting up of a pension fund. My remarks will deal only with the proposed section 14. Under it the research council will be able, with the approval of the governor in council, to procure the incorporation of any one or more companies under the provisions of part I of the Companies Act, and as I said the other evening with regard to the Government Companies Operation bill, we do not believe that this is a proper way to set up crown companies. We believe that if there are to be crown companies set up to do the work to which the minister has referred, for example to handle patents and other rights, he should bring in a bill providing for the setting up of that particular company. I do not intend to repeat the arguments which have been made on that question, but I would point out again that the minister explained this afternoon that that company to handle patents would be handling not only patents on improvements made by the staff of the national research company, but also patents made by the staffs of universities or acquired from other outside sources. I suggest that it is not correct to have the research council given the power to set up a corporation of that type, and I would appeal to the minister once more to bring in a special bill providing for that proposed corporation. Furthermore, he has said that he intends to have that section apply only to the maximum of three companies. The second one was the Eldorado company, and I am not sure of the third.

Mr. HOWE: Chalk River.

Mr. GREEN: The possibility of setting up Chalk River. I suggest to him that this is not the proper way to provide for the setting up of a new company in the case of Chalk River, or for taking over the Eldorado company. I move, seconded by the member for Davenport, that section 9 of bill No. 154 be amended by deleting section 14 added to the research council act thereby.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. FLEMING: In the proposed new section 14 (b) there is a word that needs some clarification. In line 42 we find the words "existing companies". That word "existing" is ambiguous in this context. It might be considered by some members that it means existing at the date of the enactment of the present bill, but it will be found that "existing" will mean any company that is in existence at any time that this new section 14 is in effect. Therefore the scope of the section is very wide. It can apply to any company which happens to be in existence at any particular time that the national research council with the approval of the governor in council, decides to assume control of it. That is not what the minister indicated as the purpose behind the amendment. As one followed his argument, it was to the effect that there were certain companies now in existence. He mentioned two, with the possibility of a third. For the sake of clarification, would the minister indicate the interpretation he proposes to put on the word "existing"? Does he intend to take advantage of it in future to take over companies existing at any time—crown companies which he desires to bring under the control of the council?

Mr. HOWE: I see no harm in it. If a company is wholly owned by the government and the government desires to divorce its direction from one agency and submit it to another, I cannot see why any hon. member would object. For example, the Eldorado company is at present administered by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. It is not crystalized as yet, but there is a suggestion that the control of that company might be exercised through the national research council. Has my hon. friend any objection to that?

Mr. FLEMING: I think the minister has missed my point. He has made out from time to time what he considers to be a case for three companies. The first is a company to hold patents which would be set up presumably under the proposed new section 14 (1) (a), but he is asking for power to bring under the research council other crown companies which may come into existence at any time. He referred to two companies now in existence—

Mr. HOWE: No, one now in existence.

Mr. FLEMING: The Eldorado now in existence, and the Chalk River plant whose ownership may be vested later on in the crown. The power under section 14 (1) (b) goes far beyond the scope which the minister indicated he attached to the section. "Existing" will not be interpreted as meaning only those companies in existence at the date of the enactment of this bill before us. It will mean, if carried in its present form, any crown corporation in existence at any time as long as this section 14 is in effect, and it is therefore broader than the case the minister made out. If he can make out a case for broader provisions than he has done up to the moment, we can consider that; but this goes far beyond the case he has tried to make out up to the moment.

Mr. HOWE: I have stated the intentions of the government in that regard, but I see no objection to my hon. friend making a case against any corporation wholly owned by the government being placed under the national research council. Is he doing so?

Mr. FLEMING: I submit that in every case parliament should say whether it should go to the research council or not. I do not think it should be done by executive act.

Mr. HOWE: There is a Transfer of Duties Act, which allows the Prime Minister to transfer any activity of government from one agency to another agency of government.

Mr. FLEMING: That does not in the least affect the point I am making. Here you have joint stock companies whose stock is owned by the crown and you have a provision that the council may, with the approval of the governor in council, assume ownership of the stock of those companies and the direction of them. Parliament should have an opportunity of passing on these individual cases, and it should not be left to be accomplished simply by decision of the governor in council without reference to parliament.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: There are references in the proposed new section 14 to shares necessary to qualify persons as directors. To what type of shares does this refer? Is that a provision of the Companies Act, making it necessary for the directors to own shares?

Mr. HOWE: Under the Companies Act a director must be a shareholder of the company. That is effected by turning over a share which has been previously endorsed by the director in favour of the crown, and the share is deposited with the crown so that it can be transferred back to the crown at any time by action of the crown independently of action of the director. It is necessary to preserve that fiction, if you like, in order to comply with the Companies Act.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Is there any stipulation as to the number of shares?

Mr. HOWE: One share.

Mr. GREEN: The new section 15 provides for the establishment of a pension fund or other pension or superannuation arrangement for the benefit of members of the professional scientific staff of the council. This afternoon I understood the minister to say something about the other employees of the council. I thought he said they were to be employed under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Does that include the non-technical employees of any crown companies set up or taken over by the council?

Mr. HOWE: The crown companies have the right to set up their own pension plans. I was talking about employees of the national research council. The provision there is that scientific employees will have a special provision for reasons I have already explained. The non-technical employees would come under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Crown companies will come under such superannuation act as may be proposed by the companies and approved by the governor in council.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the minister to say that the other employees would come under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. HOWE: The Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. GREEN: I take it, it is the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PUBLIC CONTROL AND SUPERVISION OF DEVELOPMENT, APPLICATION AND USE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the second reading of bill No. 165, relating to the development and control of atomic energy.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister not making a statement?

Mr. HOWE: When the resolution was under discussion I made a rather full statement of the objects of the bill. I appreciate that other hon. members will wish to discuss the contents of the bill; therefore I suggest, sir, that you call it eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Howe the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, June 11, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

CARDS SENT TO MEMBERS PURPORTING TO BE SIGNED BY CONSTITUENTS

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before the business is proceeded with I wish to rise to a question of privilege, affecting not only myself but I am sure other members of the house as well. Hon. members have been receiving cards purporting to be signed by their constituents, and supplied by the Income Tax Payers' Association, which read:

I respectfully urge:

1. That the government apply income taxation on exactly the same basis on all forms of commercial enterprise, including cooperatives, crown companies, municipal and governmental undertakings and mutual concerns.

2. That patronage dividends, and like payments, be disallowed as an expense before arriving at taxable income.

Some of us have acknowledged a number of these cards. We are now getting letters from the persons who were purported to have signed them; and some are returned marked "no such person." I shall just read one to give the house an indication of the type of letter we are receiving. This reads:

I received your letter this morning and I wish to state that no such card was ever sent by myself or any member of my family. It seems that some one is signing false signatures and sending these cards in, as I have heard others of this district complain of getting letters they could not understand.

The letters that hon. members are getting in acknowledgment of the letters written by hon. members indicate that apparently no such cards have been sent by these people.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): On the same question of privilege, I have received 1,270 cards, but I was smarter—I have not answered one of them.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a good thing that somebody answered them so that we may know who is sending them.

WHEAT

PAYMENT ON 1943-44 PARTICIPATION CERTIFICATES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am now in a position to make a brief statement in respect to the payment on 1943-44 wheat participation certificates. The surplus in the 1943-44 board account is approximately $36,000,000, which on deliveries of 293,375,116 bushels will provide an average final payment of about 12 cents per bushel.

In connection with the surplus on the 1943-44 board account, it is necessary to mention that on sales in the domestic market, the intention is that there shall be no loss or gain as far as the producer is concerned—this wheat is sold at $1.25 per bushel, basis No. 1 northern, in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver, with the dominion government assuming carrying charges. 1943-44 wheat for export was sold over a period of approximately a year and a half, commencing in October, 1943.

The actual payment on 1943-44 participation certificates will begin as soon as the barley equalization payment and the Ontario wheat flour equalization payments are completed. Requisition forms will be distributed through country elevators within a week or ten days time. These are the forms upon which producers will list their 1943-44 wheat participation certificates for forwarding to the board for payment.

It is expected that the payment on the 1943-44 board account will be much more rapid than the payment in respect to participation certificates for 1940-41, 1941-42 and 1942-43. In these latter crop years, about five to six million participation certificates were outstanding and approximately twenty per cent had been lost or misplaced, which retarded the rate at which payment could be made. In respect to 1943-44, there will be fewer lost certificates, and the payment should proceed much more rapidly. Approximately 2,500,000 participation certificates are involved in the 1943-44 payment, and it is estimated that about 400,000 cheques will be issued.

Last year some areas in southern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta experienced poor crops, and in some points in Saskatchewan low yields per acre were harvested in 1943 as well. In making payment on 1943-44 participation certificates, the Canadian wheat board will arrange to make payment first in these areas to which I have just referred. The 1943-44 production was very uniform, and with the exception of a very few grades, the payment per grade will be about twelve cents a bushel in each case.

Mr. BRACKEN: Could the minister state approximately when the cheques will go out?

Mr. MacKINNON: As far as I know, in about ten days' time.

UNITED NATIONS

ELECTION OF MEMBER NATIONS TO SECURITY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs when the next election of member nations to the security council of the united nations will be held, and what member nations are due to retire from the security council prior to such election?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs): The next election to the security council of the united nations is due to be held at the general assembly of the united nations which is called for September 3, 1946. No member is to retire before that date. But Egypt, Mexico and the Netherlands were elected to the security council for a one-year term ending in January, 1947, and they are due to be replaced by those who will be designated at the election to be held at the September meeting of the general assembly of the united nations.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF MARRIED STATUS FOR INCOME TAX PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether in his preparation of the forthcoming budget he will give favourable consideration to permitting unmarried persons, widows, widowers, and separated married persons to claim married status in their future income tax returns where such persons maintain a self-contained domestic establishment?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the government is not closing the door to suggestions affecting the welfare of the people—

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, while I received notice of the question I did not really expect my hon. friend to ask it, because it is an attempt to elicit advance information about the budget.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was not seeking advance information. I was asking the minister to give consideration to my suggestion.

Mr. McCANN: Favourable consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: I would not expect the Minister of Finance to divulge in advance anything about the budget.

COMMISSIONER TO INQUIRE INTO STEEL INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of inquiries I am receiving from the steelworkers' union at Sydney, Nova Scotia. Has the Department of Labour been requested by the national steelworkers' union and the minister of labour in the Nova Scotia government to set up a commission to inquire into the wage rates paid in the steel industry? If so, can the minister name the personnel of the commission? If not, is the government considering the appointment of such a commission?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the answer is simple. Most people know, particularly my hon. friend, that we are having our troubles one way or another in many parts of Canada. I have received a wire from the minister of labour for Nova Scotia suggesting that a commissioner be appointed in connection with the dispute that exists in the steel industry. I have no knowledge of having received any request from the steelworkers' union, but it is my intention to appoint a commissioner in the near future. When that is done I shall be glad to acquaint the house.

SEAMEN'S STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I might just as well mention another big strike in the country, the seamen's strike, because I shall probably be asked a question about it. The parties are closer together to-day than they ever were before. I think that is a fair thing to say. May I add that we are getting all the old tricks of the trade in this dispute. We have the usual gang of overnight revolutionaries, professing to give leadership to the rank and file of the seamen's organization. Only last week the same old communist trick was played: I was billed to address a meeting in Welland, my constituency, along with Mr. Pat Sullivan, a Mr. McLean, and C. S. Jackson of the electrical workers' union, but I had not been consulted. At least somebody did send a wire to me but my office wired back that I could not be there. Those who know the intimate workings of the labour movement appreciate this kind of dodge.

As I have said before, I am prepared as Minister of Labour to support any just cause. I always endeavour to be fair and decent and to avoid taking sides except when absolutely necessary. This kind of gag, you understand, does not fool me or further the interests of the working people of this country. I repeat that the communist crowd in this country do not want a settlement of strikes. Let me say this to them: Speaking as an individual, if they want a battle, well, the battle is on.

LUMBER INDUSTRY—STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Will the minister deal with the situation in British Columbia?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have not had any further information about British Columbia.

HAROLD LASKI

INQUIRY AS TO RECENT STATEMENT ON CANADIAN JUDICIARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): May I ask a question of the appropriate minister?—I think it would be the Minister of Justice. I am sorry I did not give notice of the question. What action has the government taken or is it contemplating in regard to a statement made by one Harold Laski, prominent in government circles of another country, smearing the Canadian judiciary, particularly when the spy cases are sub judice?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has taken no action and feels that it can leave it to the good sense of the Canadian public to form its own impressions of the statement made.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

ANNIVERSARY OF 1945 ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Have any steps been taken to mark this June 11th anniversary of the last federal election as a day of national thanksgiving?

ATOMIC ENERGY

PUBLIC CONTROL AND SUPERVISION OF DEVELOPMENT, APPLICATION AND USE

The house resumed from Monday, June 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howe for the second reading of bill No. 165, relating to the development and control of atomic energy.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) is not speaking at this stage of the discussion on the motion for second reading of the bill, but I presume that he will be making a statement in concluding the debate.

The atomic energy control bill, unlike most of the bills that come before this house, breaks new ground. It is an attempt to deal with a new problem, that of the control of atomic energy, and to do so at a time when no one can be sure of the potentialities of this new power either for good or for evil, its potentialities for the improvement of the lot of humanity or for the destruction of our civilization.

Canada is directly concerned for several reasons. In the first place, in our country there is one of the main sources of the mineral from which this atomic energy is produced, namely uranium; it is found away off in the northwest territories of Canada. Secondly, Canadian scientists and manufacturers have taken a very big part in discovering the secret of atomic energy and of putting that energy to use. Canada is concerned for a third reason, in that we share with the United States and the United Kingdom many of the secrets of manufacture, and finally, because this nation is a member of the united nations atomic energy commission. Membership of that commission is confined to the eleven nations that have been elected to the security council, with the addition of Canada. So I repeat that we are directly concerned with this question of atomic energy.

Now Canada must devise methods to control and supervise the development and the application and use of atomic energy. I think the situation is very well described in the preamble to the bill we are considering, No. 165:

> Whereas it is essential in the national interest to make provision for the control and supervision of the development, application and use of atomic energy, and to enable Canada to participate effectively in measures of international control of atomic energy which may hereafter be agreed upon;

The Progressive Conservative party, for whom I am speaking to-day, agree that it is essential in the national interest that there should be a measure of this type. We are willing to cooperate with the government and with the other parties in working out the best possible methods for the development and control of atomic energy. Any suggestions we make about this bill to-day are made in that spirit, with a desire to be helpful, and I am sure that any other member of this house who speaks on this bill, no matter to what party he belongs, will approach the consideration of the measure in exactly the same spirit.

We suggest to the house that it would be wise, after second reading of the bill, to refer it to a special committee for study. We think that the best type of committee would be a joint committee of the senate and of this house. We make this suggestion believing that this is the most important subject for legislation which has been before a Canadian parliament perhaps since confederation, certainly since the turn of the century. We believe that very careful consideration should be given to the bills which have been brought in in the United States and in the United Kingdom, and we do not believe that that can be properly and thoroughly done with the house in committee of the whole.

The minister has been kind enough to lend me a copy of the United Kingdom Act. One cannot get a copy of that act in the parliamentary library. Nor can one get a copy of the bill, known as the McMahon bill, which has just passed the United States senate; I believe the minister has a copy but copies are not available in the library. I have here the Congressional Digest for May 1946, which features what congress is doing to solve the problem of atomic control, (1) domestic, (2) international, and I recommend to any members who are interested in the subject that they look at this copy of the Congressional Digest. It gives a very fine review of the legislation and of the discussions which have taken place in the United States. I think it would be helpful if the minister could have printed in the Votes and Proceedings of the house for to-day a copy of the United Kingdom bill and also a copy of the McMahon bill. If that were done, every member who wished to do so would be in a position to study these bills.

The minister has told me that the United Kingdom bill to which I have referred has been passed by the United Kingdom parliament. I am not sure of this; perhaps he will confirm that to-day. I am unable to find from the records in our library whether or not the bill has actually gone through the House of Commons and the House of Lords. It was presented to the House of Commons on May 1, but the copies of the British Hansard which have come to hand so far do not contain any discussion on the bill, and so far as I can find, although I may be wrong, it has not yet actually become law.

Another reason for our suggestion that this bill be studied by a special committee is that the drafting of atomic energy legislation is very difficult. The Americans found that. For example, I quote from page 143 of the Congressional Digest this statement:

> Just what is the problem in drafting atomic legislation? The chief difficulty is the fact that never before in history has any government attempted to make a law governing the forces of nature. It presents a multitude of technical and legal problems.

At page 139 of the same issue is a statement by Doctor Vannevar Bush. As hon. members know, Doctor Bush was a member of the committee which was appointed by the late President Roosevelt, two and a half months before the atom bomb was used, to consider atomic legislation. Doctor Bush is the chairman of the United States office of scientific research and development. This is what he has to say about the legislative difficulties involved in atomic energy legislation:

> No more intricate and exacting problem was ever posed to government than this one. It is inherently complex because the science of the atom is complex. . . . The fact that the deadly military potentialities of the atomic bomb and the beneficent industrial applications of atomic power are inextricably intermixed complicates it further. Preventing war is a long task, which must be done bit by bit, step by step; so also is the development of peaceful atomic power. The two must be related in our thinking, and what we do toward achievement of the one must be weighed in the balance of its effect on the other.

Again, there is an almost complete lack of knowledge of this whole question, not only in this house but, I submit, throughout the country. There have not been discussions on the radio and in open forums across Canada such as those that have taken place in the United States. Our people are not informed on all the facts in connection with atomic energy. It should be fundamental that the people as a whole have some understanding of these problems before legislation is passed in this house; otherwise our democracy is not functioning properly. It cannot function properly if there is not a chance for the people to understand something at least of what is being discussed in the legislatures.

I think it would be most unwise to rush this bill through, to put it through second reading this afternoon and through committee to-night and to-morrow. Instead of doing that, we should give the bill second reading to-day and send it to a special committee. It can be dealt with again by this house in committee when it comes back from that special committee. But no matter where or how the bill is to be considered, there are many features which should be borne in mind, and this afternoon I propose to deal with eight of them. There will be many more, but I have picked out the eight which in my opinion are of vital importance.

In the first place, we should compare the controlling authorities which are to be set up in the United States, in the United Kingdom and in Canada. Under this atomic energy control bill we are providing for a board to be called the atomic energy control board. There will be five members on that board. In the United States they have set up a board of five, known as the atomic energy control commission; but in the United States they have in addition three watch-dog committees. I will explain these in greater detail in a minute or two.

In the United Kingdom bill there is no board at all. There, all the responsibility as well as the power is given direct to the minister of supply. He is the one named throughout the bill as the person in charge of development and control of atomic energy, and that of course has one very great advantage. It puts the responsibility right in parliament, because the minister has to stand up in parliament and answer for everything he does under the powers given him by the bill. There is no suggestion there, as I interpret their bill, of having an outside board or commission given these powers.

The powers are the most far-reaching given for many a long year by any parliament. These powers are to be given in Great Britain to the minister of supply, in the United States to the atomic energy control commission, and in Canada to the atomic energy control board, and they are tremendous powers. That is the only way in which they can be described. I repeat therefore that the first question that must be carefully considered is what type of controlling authority is to be set up in Canada.

The second consideration should be this. If we are to have a board such as the bill provides, should there or should there not be watch-dog committees? I have pointed out that in the United States legislation, under the McMahon bill, which, by the way, has passed the senate only and may not get through the house of representatives, they have a board of nine civilian advisers serving in an honorary capacity, being paid only a certain amount for their expenses. They get no remuneration. They are appointed by the president. At page 140 of the Congressional Digest there appears the following explanation:

> A board of civilian advisers is to be appointed by the president to meet at least four times a year and consult with the commission on scientific and technical matters relating to materials, production, research and development.

In Canada we are making no provision in this bill for any such advisory boards. In the United States there is a second watchdog committee which is known as the military liaison committee, and it is described in the following language:

> A military liaison committee, appointed by the secretaries of war and navy, is to consult with the commission on all activities relating to the military applications of atomic energy. This provision has been adopted to give the armed forces a proper voice in such matters as development, manufacture, storage, and use of bombs; allocations of fissionable materials for military research; control of information relating to the manufacture and use of atomic weapons. Upon receiving the recommendations of the military liaison committee, the secretaries of war and navy may at their own discretion carry to the president a protest against any of the commission's actions or failures to act in reference to the matters described. In such event, final decisions are made by the president.

The minister may say that in Canada we are not going to be manufacturing atomic bombs, but I submit that some consideration should be given to the setting up of a military liaison committee because of the fact that the mineral from which atomic bombs are made is found in Canada. This brings us to the question of defence. We must accept responsibility for defending these minerals. I suggest therefore that there is a good deal of merit in having some sort of military liaison with the atomic energy control board.

The third watchdog committee in the United States is a permanent joint committee of the congress. It is composed of nine senators and nine representatives. Their job is to make continual studies of the development of atomic energy and to keep congress fully acquainted with such developments. Under the Canadian bill there is no such provision. In the United States there are these three watchdog committees, and I think there is some merit in having committees of that type. Mind you, they are not supreme; at all times the atomic energy control commission is supreme. These committees are merely there to check on its activities and have been appointed because the power given to the atomic energy commission is so tremendous and atomic energy may mean so much both in the civilian life of the nation and in the event of war.

The third question which should be given careful consideration is this: Is there or is there not sufficient control over this new board so far as parliament is concerned? In the explanatory notes to the bill hon. members will find this statement:

> Control by parliament is provided for by sections 15 (making the board generally subject to the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931), 16 (providing that expenses of the board are to be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose except to the extent that the board or a company may receive funds through the conduct of its operations or by gift or otherwise), 17 (providing for audit by the auditor general), 18 (declaring that works or undertakings relating to atomic energy are works for the general advantage of Canada) and 21 (providing for an annual report by the board to the committee—

Which means to the committee of the cabinet on scientific and industrial research.

—to be laid before parliament and for the making of such other reports as the committee may require.

These provisions are all right as far as they go. I have already pointed out that in the United States they have a permanent joint committee composed of nine senators and nine congressmen. In Great Britain the minister is directly responsible to parliament. That, of course, gives far more control than we can have under the Canadian system. But there is a further control, and a very beneficial one, provided for in the United Kingdom bill. The minister has wide powers to make orders. For example, under section 10 of the United Kingdom bill the minister may by order provide for prohibiting, except under the authority of a licence granted by the minister, the production and use of atomic energy. These are sweeping powers which he can exercise by order, but every order he makes must be laid before parliament and is subject to what is called negative resolution,—by the way a negative resolution not only by the House of Commons but by the House of Lords. Either house can bring in a resolution revoking the order which has been made by the minister. That provision is found in section 15, subsection 1. It reads as follows:

Every order made by the minister under this act, except an order made under section 7 thereof or an order varying or revoking such an order,—

Those are orders in connection with expropriating property. They are the ones which are exempt from this provision.

—shall be laid before parliament forthwith after it is made, and if either house of parliament, within a period of forty days beginning with the day on which any such order is laid before it, resolves that the order be annulled, the order shall cease to have effect, but without prejudice to anything previously done thereunder or to the making of a new order.

In reckoning any such period of forty days no account shall be taken of any time during which parliament is dissolved or prorogued or during which both houses are adjourned for more than four days.

That, of course, gives parliament drastic control. No such provision is to be found in the Canadian bill.

The fourth feature which I suggest for consideration is, should the Canadian atomic energy control board be on a full-time or a part-time basis? Should it be advisory or operative? The United States commission is a full-time body. Five men serve full time. According to the statements made by the minister during the debates of the last few days the Canadian government has not decided on this point. I shall refer hon. members to page 1905 of Hansard of May 27, 1946, where the minister used these words:

The atomic energy control board is primarily a policy board.

A little later on he said:

The operation of the Chalk River plant, however, would be associated with the national research council. The atomic energy commisison would determine policy in the use of the product and in disseminating knowledge of atomic energy as it affects the people as a whole. But the operation of the Chalk River plant would naturally and, I think, necessarily be under the direction of the national research council, from which it would draw practically all its scientists.

On June 3 the minister made a further statement which is found at page 2120 of Hansard. He was asked what power the board would have, whether it would be advisory or operative. He said:

It will depend upon the view of the board when it is appointed whether it should be an operating board or simply a policy board. The board will be closely allied with the national research council in any event, and it may be the decision will be that the national research council shall do the actual operating or it may be that the board itself will be the operating body.

On page 2123 the minister made another statement to this effect:

The decision as to whether it will, in fact, be an operative body will be left largely to the board itself. The present intention would be to clothe the board with the duty of actually operating the project.

He was there referring to the Chalk River project. I continue with the statement:

However, no decision has finally been taken, and I should not like to commit myself at this time and say that the board will be an operating body.

Hon. members will notice that in section 4, subsection 2, of the bill, provision is made for salaries, if any; there is that proviso, "if any," showing that there is some question as to whether or not the members of the board are to be on a full-time basis. Provision is made in section 6 that the board must meet at least four times a year. Then there is the fact that the president of the research council is to be a member of the board. Obviously he cannot be a full-time member because he has many other pressing duties. It seems to me that the decision whether the board is to be a full-time one or not is fundamental and should be made by the government or by the house without further delay, because it makes a great difference in the way the controls are to be set up.

There seems to be a doubt as to the relative positions of the atomic energy control board and the research council. The measures that have been brought in obviously provide for either eventuality. They constitute what one might call double barrelled legislation. Under the legislation either the board or the research council can operate. I repeat that consideration should be given to the question whether we are to have an advisory board or an operative board.

The fifth feature that I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members is that the bill may unduly hamper research. I notice that both in the United States and in the United Kingdom there was great concern lest there should an interference with research work. Apparently scientists are very much afraid that they may not be allowed full scope; they are afraid of being interfered with. The Canadian bill does give power, and I think ample power, for research work by the board itself or by its employees; but what about research by other bodies? It seems to me that the bill should be extended to make it perfectly clear that certain types of research can be carried on by other bodies. They have done that in the United Kingdom. I shall read from paragraph 6 of the explanatory memorandum which accompanies the United Kingdom bill, where we find this statement:

> . . . the minister is to ensure, so far as practicable, the availability of materials and plant for research and educational purposes and for commercial purposes not related to atomic energy.

That is set out in section 10, subsection 2 of the United Kingdom bill, in the following terms:

> The minister shall secure so far as practicable, by the issue of licences in such cases or classes of cases as he thinks fit, that such minerals, substances and plant as aforesaid are available for purposes of research and education and for commercial purposes not involving the production or use of atomic energy.

The Americans have a similar provision. In the Congressional Digest for May we find this statement at page 141:

> In drafting the bill, the committee has been particularly careful to refrain from inserting prohibitions or restrictions of any nature on scientific research (other than) the minimum necessary to protect national security and prevent hazards to public safety and health.

The sixth feature—and hon. members will be glad to learn that there are only two more after this—is what should be done about inventions in the field of atomic energy. The Canadian bill deals with inventions made by the staff, and I think it covers them fairly well. But what about inventions made outside? What about private inventions? Both the Americans and the British have dealt with this subject specifically in their legislation. This is a description of the American provision:

> In considering the patent implications of these provisions, the committee concluded that private patents can play no role in fields of activity reserved exclusively to the government. The bill provides that inventions and discoveries in these fields shall not be patentable matter. To assure the commission of access to new inventions and to provide inventors with financial inducements in lieu of patent rights, the bill requires that such inventions be reported to the commission and creates a patent compensation board with authority to make awards to inventors.

In the United Kingdom also they have dealt with that subject. I quote now from paragraph 8 of the explanatory memorandum:

> Special provisions regarding inventions in relation to atomic energy are contained in clause 12. The comptroller general of patents, designs and trade marks is required to prohibit or restrict the publication of information concerning an application for a patent of this nature, and to notify the minister, serving a copy of the notice on the applicant.

I believe no such provision is in the Canadian bill, nor does it contain power to carry that out.

> The minister may inspect the deposited documents; and, if he is satisfied that the invention is not of importance for purposes of defence, the ban on publication will be lifted by the comptroller general. In addition, the clause prohibits, except with the written permission of the comptroller general, the making of applications outside the United Kingdom, by a person resident therein—

That is, for a resident of England or Scotland to apply for a patent in France having to do with atomic energy.

> —for the grant of patents in respect of such inventions, unless application for a patent for the same invention has already been made in the United Kingdom, and either no ban on publication has been imposed or any such ban has been lifted.

Then it goes on:

> The powers of the minister under section 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, are extended by clause 12 so as to include power to make, use, exercise or vend an invention for purposes relating to atomic energy; and the minister may authorize the use of any drawing, model, plan or other document or information.

There is no such power in Canada, as I read the statutes. We have a Patent Act, it is true, and under section 19 of that act we find the government may use—and the word is "use"—a patented invention. The section reads:

> The government of Canada may, at any time, use any patented invention, paying to the patentee such sum as the commissioner reports to be a reasonable compensation for the use thereof, and any decision of the commissioner under this section shall be subject to appeal to the exchequer court.

The British go much further than that. The government takes not only the power to use but the power to sell any of these private inventions made outside the government service, and I think consideration should be given to the whole question of the treatment of inventions under this bill.

The seventh feature is the power given in the bill to set up crown companies. I am not going to repeat the arguments we have offered against these crown companies which are set up under part I of the Dominion Companies Act. We have no objection to their being set up by special statute, but we do object to this general power being given the national research council, and now the atomic energy control board, to set up one or any number of companies without coming to the house. There is no such provision in the United Kingdom legislation, or in the McMahon bill which has been passed by the United States senate. Just to give hon. members an illustration of how the power given under the Canadian bill might work; if the atomic energy control board is to be merely an advisory board rather than an operative board, then it will be functioning through these crown corporations; that means the real power will be in the hands of the president and officers of the crown company, just that much further removed from any parliamentary control and just that much closer to the dangerous position of allowing private individuals to take control of atomic energy.

I believe that is one danger which must be considered in connection with atomic energy; the possibility of a group of gangsters getting in a position where they control atomic energy. Perhaps some hon. members read the funnies. Judging by what I see around here when the afternoon papers come in, I guess they all do.

Mr. REID: They fill a useful place in life.

Mr. GREEN: That is right. Those of you who read Little Orphan Annie will remember that two or three years ago Daddy Warbucks was manufacturing "eonite" and what great concern there was lest it should get into the hands of someone who would use it against the best interests of the people of the world. I think there is always this danger in connection with atomic energy, that individuals rather than nations may get control and use it to subjugate their fellow men. In any event I do suggest that this power of setting up crown companies should not be included in the bill.

The final feature which I suggest should be given the most careful consideration is the question of whether or not the atomic energy control board is to be involved directly in international agreements, whether for the control of atomic energy or for any other purpose. I think the minister said the other day that the board was to be concerned only with the domestic use of atomic energy, but we find in section 9 (1) (f) provision giving the board power to make regulations——governing cooperation and the maintenance of contact, through international organizations or otherwise, with scientists in other countries or with other countries with respect to the production, use, application and control of, and research and investigations with respect to, atomic energy—

I suggest to hon. members that the time has not yet come when this board set up by the Canadian parliament should have any power to negotiate with other countries. Anything of that sort should be done by the Canadian government as a whole. They have been very careful on this point in the United States. No similar power is given to the atomic energy control commission there. In fact I find at page 141 of the Congressional Digest these words:

To ensure that provisions of S.1717—

That is the McMahon bill.

—do not interfere with the operation of international control machinery, when established, section 8 expressly provides that to the extent any provision of the bill, or any action of the commission under the bill, conflicts with the provisions of an international agreement hereafter approved by the senate or the congress, the provision is to be considered of no further force or effect.

There is no provision in the British bill similar to the regulation in the Canadian bill to which I referred a moment ago. Certainly the overriding documents as between states should be whatever agreements this parliament passes upon. I do not understand why the power is being given to an atomic energy control board to make regulations having to do with other countries.

Those are the eight features which we ask the house to consider. It will be obvious that they cannot be adequately considered by this house in committee of the whole, particularly in view of the lack of knowledge of the measures that have been brought in in other countries and of the whole question of atomic energy. It may be that the bill in its present form is the best bill that could be drawn; I am not in position to say, and I do not think many hon. members of the house are in position to pass on that question.

I repeat the suggestion made earlier in my remarks. After the bill has been given second reading it should be referred to a special committee of this house or to a joint committee of the senate and of this house. I repeat also the statement I made in opening, that the official opposition will be only too glad to cooperate with the government and with the other parties in the house in working out a bill that will be the best that can be enacted in the interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that after second reading this bill should be sent to a special committee of the house or a joint committee of the two houses has considerable merit. I am sure that in that way a great deal of information could be revealed to the public at large, and certainly to the members of the committee, with regard to atomic energy, information which hitherto has been denied to us.

I should like to speak briefly on the bill as it appears before the house. I feel that the introduction of this bill at this session is of major importance. I doubt if there is any subject more widely discussed by thinking people everywhere in the world than atomic energy and how it is to be controlled. The bill makes provision for the control and supervision of this new and potent force. The supervision of the development, application and use of atomic energy is of utmost importance to every man, woman and child, not only in our own country but in every other part of the world.

It is believed among scientists that atomic energy can provide the answers to many if not all of the power problems of the world within the course of a very few years. Such an important discovery as this new form of energy may prove to be a boon to mankind if it is controlled by the proper authorities; if it is not properly controlled, it may well prove a menace to all. If it is owned or controlled by private enterprise more interested in profit than in humanity's welfare, industrial chaos might well occur. That is what may happen should this powerful energy be thrown into the competitive market. One can visualize coal mines closing down and oil operators ceasing their operations, resulting in millions of people being unemployed, should atomic energy be produced cheaply enough to compete successfully in the commercial field with coal and oil.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Do you object to that?

Mr. McKAY: No, as long as there is some social security for those people. I am referring to the economic chaos that may result if there is not proper control.

[Mr. Green.]

There is every possibility of a cheap source of atomic energy being discovered. In the field of research there are tremendous prospects, of which we should take cognizance, of developing cheap sources of this new energy. Indeed these sources may have been already successfully explored. John O'Neil, writing in the Toronto Saturday Night on December 8, 1946, states:

> New York: More powerful sources of atomic energy are now the goal of the scientists. If they succeed, they will obtain one thousand times more energy from the new source than is obtained from uranium sources, and the latter source provides 2,500,000 times as much energy as an equal weight of coal, oil or T.N.T.
> Uranium, the element used to produce the atomic energy substance plutonium, is among the rarer elements, although it is as plentiful as copper in the earth's crust. The cost of plutonium produced under military control, can be estimated at $25,000 a pound, but this figure may be wrong by a very large factor.
> The unquestioned fact is that under any circumstances it would be many times, perhaps many thousands of times, as expensive as coal on a pound basis. It would be, nevertheless, very much cheaper than coal on an energy production basis.
> The new substance to which the scientists are looking as the new atomic energy source is the cheapest substance on earth . It is hydrogen, one of the two elements composing water.

Peace-time application of atomic energy properly directed and controlled may do amazing things. Doctor Julian Huxley reveals some astonishing prospects for a peace loving world bent on improving the lot of man. This great scientist paints an amazing picture of the world to be which with the proper application of the scientific knowledge obtained in a study of atomic power may be realized even in our day. Speaking recently in the United States, Professor Huxley referred to atomic energy in the following words:

> If turned to beneficent uses, it might in the future do for mankind great and amazing things.
> The most spectacular possibilities of the new power lie in its use in what we may call atomic dynamite. Dams could be built in a fraction of the time now required because atomic explosions would do the work of cumbersome excavating machinery. Atomic heat might dissolve the ice and snow over the north pole. If this were done the level of the sea would rise over one hundred feet and many Atlantic seaboard cities and towns would be submerged.
> If the polar caps were blasted the climate of northern and southern hemispheres would change. Foggy Great Britain would become as pleasant a country as Spain were it not inundated. Regions now uninhabitable for lack of fuel or capacity for growth could be made available for migration.

That is Doctor Huxley speaking. There is no question as to this man's ability to forecast. There are, however, less pleasing prospects than the one set out here. Any apparatus producing atomic energy will also produce by-products from which poisonous gases could be made which could kill all living creatures within thousands of square miles. This is quite conceivable should control of this energy be permitted to fall into private hands.

With reference to the possible use of atomic poison gas, may I quote from an article appearing in the Ottawa Citizen—before the strike of course. This appeared on the 29th of May, under the dateline New York, May 28:

> One small drop of atomic poison gas, in liquid form, can endanger every person in a great industrial plant, or its equivalent.
> A concentration of this so-called gas could kill every person within about one kilometer (six-tenths of a mile) of a central point.
> In either case the killing would be done, not by the chemical reactions of true poison gases, but by the radioactive rays from atomic fission products.
> These are the basic facts behind the report in Washington, by W. A. Higinbothem, chairman of the Federation of Atomic Scientists, that along with germ warfare, there is another new method of war potentially as dangerous as atomic bombs.

An unscrupulous person or country might collect radioactive materials formed as a by-product in producing nuclear power and spray them over the countryside, destroying all life thereon. Unless proper control of this new form of energy, which could well be used with malicious intent is established, it could be a terrible threat to the safety of all mankind.

Atomic energy is a most awesome power. The world is still marvelling and horrified at the instantaneous destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

The presence of this potentially dangerous atomic power demands the setting up of a powerful united nations organization to control its use. It would be an almost hopeless outlook for the future of humanity should the united nations organization be incapable of controlling the application of nuclear energy to other than peaceful pursuits.

Without effective control all of us will live in constant fear of sudden and violent death and apprehension will be our lot and that of our children.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that a method must be devised by the security council of the united nations organization to police the laboratories and industries of every nation utilizing atomic energy if satisfactory control of its production is to be effected.

It is my earnest hope, and the hope, I believe, of all humanity, that fear of this new energy may hasten the establishment of a democratic and powerful world government. No other organization can make mankind secure. An awful and immediate challenge confronts every nation of the world. Man faces the prospect of world destruction or the alternative of uniting all peoples with the common urge of self-preservation.

In the modern atomic world it is essential that we learn the cooperative way of working and living together. Only that society can survive the members of which are prepared to work together in a spirit of cooperation, each man for his neighbour, each nation for the other. We shall either live together, Mr. Speaker, with a common objective, or we shall not live, that is a true statement of fact.

We are dealing with a subject which can well determine the destinies of the world. I am sure the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is cognizant of this fact and will act accordingly. I feel that we all have a grave responsibility in connection with the future development and control of atomic power. To do other than place it under the control of parliament is inviting trouble. Not only would our economic stability be endangered under private control, but the security of the world would be gravely menaced. The world is looking to Canada for cooperation in establishing a new world order. Let us not be a party to disturbing that trend toward a peaceful and happy world that so many young men laid down their lives to achieve.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this measure for the control of atomic energy, this will be one occasion for my handing a little compliment to the government in that it has pursued this particular course, although at the same time I do not know that I agree with all the details of the measure.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) on giving to us what I believe to be a very sensible treatise on this subject. I liked his idea of watch-dog committees. I would support that idea and carry it further and suggest that annually joint parliamentary committees should be set up for the purpose of doing just what the hon. member signified by that term watch-dog. Such committees in order to accomplish their work effectively must have complete access to all pertinent information. Let me illustrate what I mean by reminding the house that during the war, Canadian scientists, under the supervision or direction of the minister of munitions and supply, contributed greatly toward what is known as the discovery of the atomic bomb; and although that work was under the minister of munitions and supply this parliament and the people of Canada knew nothing whatsoever about what was happening until the news flashed out of the operations over Hiroshima. I point that out, not because it would have been wise for us to know, but to indicate how inadequately even in this democratic country we were able to scrutinize all the expenditures of government in wartime.

I do not know how much money was spent in that respect, but I do know that during the war, when we were discussing estimates of the departments of defence and of munitions and supply, the discussion went on week in and week out and the parliamentary session was drawn out into months and months. We were talking about the tiniest things: about soldiers' underwear, whether they should be given new underwear or whether the old might be patched and still used. We attempted to show our wisdom by scrutinizing the exepnditure of every dollar, yet we missed the money which was spent on Canada's share in the discovery of the atomic bomb. So I say that all information in respect to atomic energy for peace-time purposes should be available to such watch-dog committees.

I have risen in this house on many occasions as a supporter of the principle of private enterprise. I believe in it. I do not, however, believe in private monopoly, and I go so far as to say that in such a matter as the use of peace-time atomic energy we cannot permit that monopoly to go into private hands. I have here a paper to which I subscribe and from which I might quote a few lines to illustrate and reinforce this particular point. The writer, referring to the time when atomic energy will be available to the public for the uses of peace, states:

> When it is done, and it may be soon, the corporation—

Referring to any private corporation.

> —doing it will have a monopoly over a new source of power which will give to that corporation as much economic power as though the TVA, Grand Coulee, Bonneville and Hoover dams, wtih all their electric generating equipment, plus all privately-owned electric light and power plants and transmission lines in the country, plus all the railroads were dominated by a single monopolistic combine.

That simply means that one private enterprise having all the patent rights and so forth could control the economic destinies of the nation, and that is why I agree that in a case of this kind a measure at least similar to the one we are discussing should be favourably considered. I would not for a moment advocate, nor, I believe, would the most ardent supporter of private enterprise, the private ownership of war planes, tanks, artillery and battleships. We all know that private ownership of such things would give to private persons power over the lives and livelihood and destinies of our people, and I do not think we could regard that as any more dangerous than to put in the hands of the private corporation such power over the life of the country as would be attained through the control of atomic energy. I go that far.

But now there are one or two other things which I wish to say. I think we can go that far and yet retain within our Canadian life a degree of private enterprise in respect to these matters. What I have in mind is that while the government should be in possession of all patent rights in respect to atomic energy for peace-time purposes, they should not go so far as themselves to set up a great state monopoly for manufacturing all articles producible by the use of that atomic energy. I believe they could very well be the licensing authority, having possession of the patent rights, but giving to private individuals the right to use atomic energy for such manufacturing enterprises as they might choose to enter upon.

I wish to bring one other point to the attention of the house. It came to our notice when the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) interrupted a while ago the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay). We must have some method of giving economic security to the people of Canada when atomic energy finds its real place in the life of our nation. I am particularly concerned about this matter because, as I think is recognized by us all, we must consider the possibility of finding ourselves living in a new world, a world of atomic energy which will, perhaps, disrupt our entire present economy. For instance, in my constituency there is a very large coal mining industry. What is going to happen to the coal miners of Macleod constituency or the thousands of coal miners all over Canada if atomic energy in peace-time is put to its greatest use? There are two arguments one can use. One can say: Well, we cannot let Canada have the use of this atomic energy if it is going to put these men out of work. Is that a satisfactory answer? Would anyone rise in this chamber and say, "Of course, that is what we shall have to do"? If he did, he would be the enemy of the progress of civilization. Just the same, have the government, parallel with this measure, any ideas as to how to take care of that situation? If they have not, then I think some discussion should be had in that regard, and some statement should be forthcoming from the government. Our railroads may be affected in the same way. It is quite obvious to anyone who will face the facts that the day of full employment is gone. Let us recognize that. And yet just a year ago to-day this government was elected to office on at least one great promise, that it was going to put everybody to work—jobs for all.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is why the flag is at half mast to-day.

Mr. HANSELL: I am glad to receive a little applause from my own party here, but it does not come from any place else in the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Because they are all guilty.

Mr. HANSELL: It is because every party except this one went out with the same idea—jobs for all, and now the atomic energy age is on our doorstep and knocks that argument, that plea, that promise, into a cocked hat. I repeat, the day of full employment is gone; the plea of jobs for all is antiquated and can never be used again—until the next election, as an hon. member says. Perhaps the atomic age will not be in the door far enough by that time.

Let me ask the government this question: What measures are they now taking—because this is certainly a grave national issue in the light of this bill—what measures are they taking to care for a situation of that kind? We must have some method, some plan of giving incomes to our citizens from some source other than the old source of jobs for all. To those who believe in the full employment theory, I say that if the government is still of that opinion, if any other party in this country still believes in the old philosophy of full employment, then neither that government nor any party in office would dare to release the discovereies of atomic energy, in all its fulness, for peace-time purposes. They dare not do it. What have they to say as to what they are prepared to do when the atomic age dawns upon us?—and that may be soon.

This bill is not the first step that has been taken in the world in connection with the use of atomic energy. We all know that the large electrical corporations of the United States have spent millions upon millions of dollars upon the very thing that this bill proposes to do, and those corporations are not going to be retarded in their progress. But there is another matter that is commensurate with this. This atomic age brings about what some people would call the problem of unemployment—though I do not call it a problem, because I think it is one of the greatest blessings of the day that men can have a little time to themselves. But with the dawn of this new day, what is going to happen to the millions of dollars that are invested in these industries? I might refer again to the coal mining industry. Millions of dollars are invested in that industry in this country. What will happen to that investment? Are we simply going to say, "Oh well, those corporations, those companies, those people, all those shareholders will simply be broke, that is all." We have to be fair all round. The government in office must be far-seeing in this matter and should be willing to bring down to the house legislation which will parallel this bill for the control and development of atomic energy, which will care for the security of our people who are going to be affected by it; and they should at the same time provide some compensation for the financial loss that may be incurred by the many shareholders—and remember there are a good many small shareholders in many of these industries.

This measure is more far-reaching than simply a bill of the kind I have suggested. This bill, if commensurate bills are not introduced along with it, will affect the entire economy of the country. Now are we going to move on to the great and glorious civilization we could have, or are we going to monkey around with things in this rapidly expanding scientific age where we meet one problem after another, only to find ourselves after all only in a morass?

I think the problem can be solved, and Canada with all her natural resources, all her wealth in the form of uranium and what have you, with all her scientific knowledge, should be able to solve it. I am simply overwhelmed, Mr. Speaker, when I think what a wonderful country we have. I take a trip out west over hundreds of miles of wheat lands; I go into the mountains and see gorgeous scenery, vast areas of timberlands, and I say to myself, "This transcends all". Then I come down here and visit the southern part of Ontario and I see the most beautiful country—more beautiful than anything I have ever seen in my life: dairy lands with fat cattle grazing everywhere, so that the voice of scripture comes across to me, "The cattle upon a thousand hills are mine". I said to the train conductor: "What a country we have! What a country Canada is!" It is a country all the advantages of which are worth making available to the people; and what a glorious civilization we could have here. That is my plea. Let us tackle the problem. Let us not tackle it in any picayune way. Let us look upon it as a problem of civilization; let us build up here a civilization which will be a glorious example to the rest of the world. If we do that, we shall not have very much trouble with opposing philosophies of life.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to compliment the minister on his address of June 3. There should be no politics in an important scientific discovery or in any statement that is made in relation to it. I wish to speak solely from the scientific point of view. I believe it is the privilege, function and duty of a member of parliament to take an unbiased view of a matter like this which concerns the welfare of the country as a whole, and civilization at large. In his statement of the case the minister told us where Canada stood before the war, during the war and since the close of the war. He said that Canada was linked up with the mother country and the United States. He referred to the recent developments in the field of atomic energy and said that they:

> Placed Canada in a unique position among the nations of the world, in that Canada is an important source of raw material and, as well, shares with the United States the position of having a plant able to produce the final product from which atomic energy can be released. For that reason it is essential that legislative action be taken by parliament to control both the production of atomic energy and the materials from which this energy is derived.

He referred to the part Canada played in the development of the atomic bomb and the Eldorado mine on Great Bear lake. He also said that it is the second most important deposit of uranium oxide that has been discovered to date. He referred to the expropriation of the mine near Great Bear lake in the northwest territories, together with its refinery located at Port Hope, Ontario. He then said:

> Activities in the field of atomic energy have been carried on in close association with the United Kingdom and the United States. In 1942 the Montreal laboratory was established.

He also gave a fair statement of what took place in the pre-war years regarding the work in the United Kingdom and the contribution of the joint British-Canadian laboratory at work in Montreal. He then said:

> Prior to the war, Eldorado mine and its refinery at Port Hope had been concerned primarily with the production of radium, with uranium as a less important by-product.

He then went on to describe the plant at Chalk River which was set up for the purpose of exploring one particular process for producing the ultimate material. Then in three or four small sentences he went on and referred to the three-nation declaration on atomic energy, signed at Washington on November 15, 1945, and which he said was approved in this house on December 17, 1945. He then went on to say:

> Much has been said and written about the form of international control that should be initiated. The government is giving earnest study to this immensely complex problem.

Further on, he said:

> Until such time as the united nations atomic energy commission has made its recommendations, and has translated these recommendations into action, it remains the responsibility of Canada, as well as that of the United States and the United Kingdom, to establish and maintain conditions under which these recommendations can be made fully effective. Canada and all other nations possessing raw materials, or productive apparatus, or special knowledge with respect to atomic energy, have a very special responsibility to establish and maintain conditions which will ensure the effective carrying out of any recommendations that may be made by the commission to provide for international control of atomic energy.
> In the United Kingdom, first reading has already been given to an atomic energy bill which will empower the United Kingdom government to establish control over the production or use of atomic energy. In the United States the McMahon bill has been drafted.

In conclusion, the minister said:

> To build up a Canadian source of raw materials the government will carry out its own prospecting and development programme, and will encourage private prospecting, even though all the materials related to the production and use of atomic energy are to be under government control at all stages.
> Thus the bill will provide means for continuing the important deevlopments that have placed Canada in the forefront of war-time developments in the field of atomic energy. The bill will provide also an appropriate legislative basis for the domestic control of this highly dangerous substance.

I think that was a fair statement of the case. I refer to it because I wish to give the government some constructive suggestions relating to the history of warfare. From the time of the dark ages it has always been the surprise discovery that has won the battle. That was true of the days of Hannibal down to the great war. It has always been the destructive agencies sprung by surprise in war that have won wars. He who discovers the most surprising weapon wins the war. If it had been possible for one invention automatically to destroy the defensive possibilities of the up-to-date war nation the world would have been destroyed years and years ago, since the dark ages. We would have had the destruction of the world by the very same agency that we are discussing to-day, science. But warfare progresses. The initiation of defensive weapons from the time of the Greeks on has overcome offensive weapons. That has been true of the Greeks, the Carthaginians and on down to the two great wars. A great text-book writer and scientist—Isvestia, August 17, 1945—gave the constructive history of warfare. He said:

> The war was brought to an end not by sensational miracles but by the powerful joint efforts of all the allies. . . . it is ludicrous to believe that the atomic bomb can eliminate ground fighting . . . the sensation of the atomic bomb has blinded some people. . . . They seem to regard science as some wizard's incantation.

According to "Watchman", an English scientist, in the National Review:

> There is no doubt that a great deal of sensational public opinion has been worked up.

Again and again some sensational war-happening has shocked and stupefied public opinion. But no one weapon can really revolutionize war; the answer to it is soon found, and in the general balance between attack and defence it will always, all other things being equal, be superior resources which in the long run will dominate and beat down the attack, whatever the means by which it is conducted. That defence will soon be found in any up-to-date nation that has an active defence policy. That was so in the recent war. The atomic bomb was a great discovery and may mark the first stage of a social evolution in economic affairs. But the entry of Russia into the war had rendered the Japanese military position helpless and hopeless. The possession of Manchuria was vital to the Japanese war economy; it was impossible to hold Manchuria against the flood of vastly superior Russian armies; the use of the atomic bomb accelerated at most by a couple of weeks or so a surrender which would have been inevitable. But had it been the Japanese who had led the way with this particular weapon, the effects would scarcely have been of greater military importance than the German use of flying bombs and rockets in 1944, when it was thought we were going to win the war in the spring of 1944. There would have been but few such bombs available; to have used them the Japanese must have dropped them from aircraft. Attempts to bomb vital Anglo-American bases would have come up against a crushing Anglo-American superiority in fighting aircraft, plus radar, and other means. Manchuria is a land of immense spaces, an atomic bomb dropped here or there would have been of no particular importance. The Russian armies would have continued to flood Manchuria; the Anglo-Americans would have continued to push forward their own plans for invasion; the use of atomic bombs by the Japanese would have been a temporary shock but would scarcely have affected the issue or its outcome.

The very fact that every new means of attack evolves from older means connotes that the older means of defence can be swiftly improved and expanded to meet the new danger. That has been so in every war in history. Whether the new means of defence become available in time depends upon the strength and vigour of the social organism attacked. Once you consider the vast distances of the United States or Russia, the wide distribution of their social and industrial centres, the magnitude of their resources and so on, the assumption that either state could be knocked out by any sudden atomic bomb attack becomes merely absurd. After making all allowances for developments with the atomic bomb likely in the near future, such bombing would certainly be no more effective than the high explosive bombing of Germany, and the probabilities are that it would be far less effective.

The atomic bomb is merely an extension of the power of the high explosive bomb and the rocket bomb developed in the spring of 1945 by Germany. Views as to its war-preventing or war-shortening or war-cheapening qualities are likely to be just as fallacious as views expressed on the older weapon. The gain with the atomic bomb is that you get from an explosive weighing only eight pounds a destructive effect exceeding that of many tons of high explosives. As against this, however, must be set the cost of producing the eight-pound atomic bomb, which greatly exceeds the equivalent destructive power to be gained by the use of high explosives. Even with the great resources of the United States, just before Japan collapsed the United States was forced to establish factories and workshops on islands very close to Japan in order to place fuses on their new weapons. With their great resources the Americans could spend millions, which no other country could have spent, in the development of this new weapon; but Germany lost the war, as military critics point out, because at the expense of her armies and her air force she went to work and developed the high explosive and rocket bombs beyond the limits of her natural resources. As a result, while Germany had air forces superior to those of the allies on the western front for a time, even when that situation was reversed we had to depend upon our land armies to win the war. On the eastern front Russia had vast armies but an inferior air force; yet in spite of this situation Russia swept all before her.

The Kilgore subcommittee in the United States proved this to be true in an important report to congress and the senate in connection with the allied bombing of Germany.

When it was all over, Germany still had four million tons of machine tools capable of producing immense quantities of armaments; with minor repairs the iron and steel industry was capable of producing twenty-five million tons yearly, while the dye and chemical industry was virtually untouched. The general damage done to German war output was estimated at only twenty per cent. Bombing on a scale fantastically exceeding the wildest pre-war fantasies of Mr. H. G. Wells and other enthusiasts failed to produce anything like the social chaos predicted. Germany survived this bombing successfully enough but succumbed finally to the impact of allied armies. Lacking overwhelming air support the Russian armies won victories no less important than those of the Anglo-American armies, which had overwhelming air support. World war II lasted six years, as compared with four and a half years for world war I. It cost two or three times as much money; yet the 1935 air experts thought air power, even if it failed to prevent wars altogether, would exercise such destructive power that the side inferior in air power would be reduced to chaos in a few days or weeks.

As I have said already, the atomic bomb is just an extension of the high explosive and rocket bombs; and any cheapening of production which will bring atomic energy into civil use is extremely doubtful. Next to the atomic bomb, dynamite and high explosives are the most destructive agents known to man, but we do not use dynamite or high explosives for driving machines. The cost of producing these destructive agents is far too great, and there is also the difficulty of controlling them. According to scientific writers, it will be a long time before atomic energy becomes harnessed to production in the fashion popularily predicted. One such writer, who signs himself "Watchman" says, in the National Review:

> Should this occur, a large proportion of man's energies are going to be directed underground. Tunnelling, the sinking of deep shafts, will be greatly speeded and civilization will become honeycombed with vast subterranean workings. When this time comes, any real menace to mankind from atomic energy will die of itself, the rival processes of atomic bombing or rocketing can go on indefinitely, inflicting on both sides loss and destruction, and leaving neither side one step further to decisive victory. To achieve a decision, one side or other must push forward with an army, the advance of which will be covered either by superior bombing or by other means. After all the confident predictions as to wars won by bombing to the exclusion of fleets and armies, we were forced, in the present war, to fall back upon the old-fashioned process of landing armies which fought decisive battles and won them. The wars of the future are likely to be won by similar means.

[Mr. Church.]

In conclusion, I should like to say that a learned and great writer, philosopher and scientist, the late W. MacNeil Dixon, justifies the stand taken by the minister and the government. This scientist delivered the Gifford lectures at the university of Glasgow, and spoke on science in peace and war alike, as the minister did in his remarks on June 3. Mr. Dixon gave a history of what it was hoped would be achieved by atomic energy for the good of mankind, and went on to say:

> And science? However you regard her attitude and aims, deplore her emphasis upon the body rather than the soul, you cannot deny the benefits she has conferred upon humanity. True it is that worldliness has under her regime superseded other-worldliness. Yet so impressive, so far-reaching are her achievements as not merely to silence all criticism but to arouse a noble enthusiasm, and enlist in the cause of humanity legions of recruits, missionaries of her gospel.

He goes on to refer, as the minister did, to modern medicine, which he calls the child of science, and says:

> Plagues and pestilences have been stayed, a multitude of diseases—diphtheria, rabies, smallpox, typhus, yellow fever, Maltese fever, to name only a few—almost exterminated. Great scourge-ridden tracts of the earth's surface rendered habitable, food values understood, vaccines and anti-toxins discovered, antiseptic surgery so established as to open up new fields of remedial agency, ailments of the mind as well as of the body controlled and relieved. This is a record, indeed, to which no previous age in history can produce a parallel. Within a century the expectation of life in all civilized countries has been amazingly increased.

Then he gives the figures for various countries. In conclusion, he states:

> A static world it is not, never was and never will be. There have been revolutions in the past, there will be revolutions hereafter, in the world of thought as in the world of events. We must expect the sudden and unpredictable. You may desire a stabilized system, an international agreement to keep things much as they are in respect of national boundaries, material advantages in wealth, coal, oil, trade facilities. It will not be given you. For all your entreaties the world will not cease to revolve. Nature is no friend of stagnation.

The minister said practically the same thing.

> Climates change, economic conditions change, birth rates rise and fall, labour is cheap here and dear there, a new invention, a new commodity is in demand, and cities spring up to meet it. Factories are built, populous districts are deserted. The seats of ancient empires are lost in the desert or in the jungle.

I would not go as far as to predict that the minister or any of us will live long enough to see this new energy developed in peace for the good of mankind, as the minister and the scientists hope it will be developed, but I believe the government will have the unanimous support of all hon. members, free from politics in the development of science along the lines that have been suggested.

I think if the bill were referred to a small committee of the house, as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has suggested, that committee could meet privately or publicly as it liked and get the required information. I believe that procedure would meet with unanimous agreement on the part of all sections of the house.

In warfare I do not think this new atomic bomb would last a very long time without a defence, because any civilized nation would soon provide the answer. In addition, the cost would be prohibitive along the lines that I mentioned relating to Japan. I hope the minister will have every success in his work, and the government is to be commended for trying to advance the scientific standards and encourage the future progress of human life.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a very few words about this matter of atomic energy and the control thereof. In the light of recent publicity it seems to be the general opinion that atomic energy is an easy thing to realize and that the greatest problem is how to control it. As I understand it, actually it is one of the most difficult things in the world to split the atom and to release the energy inherent in it.

The splitting of the atom is not a new feat. That phase did not come into effect only at the time of the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Scientists have been working on it for years. This development has been carried on by colleges and private undertakings for some considerable time. Recently the approach has been somewhat different by virtue of the fact that certain radioactive materials were discovered. Years ago the method adopted to split the atom was virtually brute force. Generators were set up to develop as much as ten million volts of static electricity and they were used to bombard certain molecules and atoms with such great force that the electrons could be knocked from them, thereby achieving the splitting of the atom. As I say, it is not a new thing.

I point this out simply to show that, although the government has come into the picture and has exerted a great amount of control for the benefit of mankind and for the winning of the war, in time private research would have arrived at the same point. The atom was being split and great progress was being made in the simplification of the process. Therefore I think we must regard the control of the atom not as a "shut-out" proposition but simply as a means of guiding the energy we now have, along proper channels, and seeing that the use of it, for the time being, does not fall into the wrong hands.

I am sure we all realize that in this respect Canada has no monopoly on scientific brains. It is true that Great Britain, the United States and Canada enjoyed a head start and went farther than anybody else, but the fact remains that private research was making good progress before the government came into the picture. That leaves one with the clear impression that any other nation could start now and in due course could catch up to where we are at present. Therefore we must realize that we cannot shut out the other nations, and probably we cannot shut out private research in our own country. What we must achieve is the best possible coordination; the best possible cooperation and have the greatest possible freedom from suspicion between nations and between individuals in connection with the manner in which this energy is to be used.

Down through the pages of history we find evidence of many problems of scientific control. For example, electricity opened up fields that had been unheard of before. There is enough electricity being directed around the streets of Ottawa to-day to wreak untold destruction if it were not controlled. The first public demonstration of atomic energy was one of destruction and it left us all pretty well awestricken. We think of atomic energy as being an energy of destruction, whereas the fact is that an energy which can be used for destruction can be used also for constructive purposes. This energy will undoubtedly be used to benefit mankind; to relieve many of the hardships that we now suffer. For the present time we are primarily concerned here with the matter of control and this bill is the best vehicle for asserting the essential control. I think it is an excellent thing; it is all to the good, as hon. members have said.

I should like to refer for a moment to the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). The hon. member was worried about atomic energy possibly causing a great deal of unemployment. That would appear to be a short-term outlook. All down through the centuries we find many cases where new developments caused people to fear that they would be thrown out of work. That was true, for example, of steam, of internal combustion and it was certainly true of electricity. It was true also of radio. I well remember when radio first came into prominence there was a great cry from musicians and manufacturers of phonographs that they would become unemployed. But the economists pointed out that with the advent of radio people would become conscious of music and would demand phonographs in ever-increasing quantities because they would become familiar with music through the use of the radio and would want to hear over and over again that which they were able just to catch in snatches on the radio. Many people thought that this view was entirely wrong; that if people could just turn a dial and get music when they wanted it from all over the world, they would not buy phonographs. But that has not been the case; the demand for phonographs has increased ever since radio was developed. The discovery of radio has resulted in a demand such as never existed before for music and art of all kinds.

When electricity was developed it was thought that people would be put out of work, but the fact is that it has widened our horizons beyond anything that was ever expected. Every day articles such as clocks and household appliances are now powered by electricity and are manufactured in far greater quantities than ever before. This progress has created a demand for labour which was not thought possible years ago. I feel quite confident that the same will prove to be the case with atomic energy.

The hon. member for Macleod referred particularly to coal and said that the coal industry might be upset and coal miners put out of work. Certainly there is that possibility. We know that coal is an important source of energy through the development of heat, but we know also that the heat from coal is derived and utilized on a most inefficient basis. Coal is used, in many instances, to generate steam which in turn may be used to generate electricity; but, as I recall, in most power plants the efficiency is not more than thirty per cent, and certainly not more than forty per cent. It may be, now that we can look more closely into the atom and study the nuclear side of the physics of coal, that we shall find a means of releasing more energy from this source. I do not know whether that is as yet the case in fact, nor have I any inside information, but I would say to the hon. member for Macleod that he should not be too pessimistic in thinking that coal is finished as a means of energy.

If our scientific brains are concentrated on the development of atomic energy we are bound to progress. I do not think we can backslide. With the direction scientists are getting; with the attention that is being focused on this problem, I believe these efforts will be used for the welfare of mankind. Certainly the atom is a source of energy that is far beyond anything we have ever dreamed of. The number of people in the world who are able to come even close to realizing the enormous amount of energy in the atom is exceedingly small indeed. With this source of energy now available to us, we have seen something of what it can do destructively. If we can turn the tables, control this energy, guide it and use it constructively, then I would say we have really something to look forward to.

In concluding these short remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to dispel as far as possible any gloom the hon. member for Macleod has regarding the danger that we are likely to create a world of unemployment by progressing in the scientific field. I think that is the wrong deduction. It has been proven to be wrong all down through the ages. So that, in conclusion, I would simply say to him, "be of good cheer."

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as members who have already spoken have said unanimously—it is difficult for any member of the house to foresee the great consequences which the release of atomic energy may have upon the world. I wonder if it is not like other great inventions, which first were used as a weapon of destruction. I think we are not a little inclined to focus our attention too much upon the destructive aspect of this great discovery. Truly we in Canada are in a particularly favoured position not only by having contributed to the production of the atomic bomb but in having seen its use bring a quick termination to the war. Now that the war is over for the time being, in looking upon this great source of energy I think we should, so far as we can, look upon it as a blessing to mankind rather than as a death-dealing weapon. All new inventions when first discovered, have brought apprehensions into the minds of many people. Fear is a very common result of invention. Fear probably deters to a great extent the practical use of inventions.

In discussing atomic energy this afternoon, I think we must all feel that the minister who introduced this bill has gone a considerable way. I do not think there are any who will criticize the best endeavours he has made. I believe that everyone of us is sincere in urging that the best possible be done under the circumstances.

Atomic energy may be viewed in two aspects, one the international and the other the domestic. So far as its international use is concerned, we fear that a potential enemy may learn our secret. I do not think history will vindicate anybody in the belief that any great invention can be permanently retained and restrained from the use of mankind in general. It is a matter, as I see it, of controlling the use of atomic energy internationally only so far as is practicable to delay its use until its domestic uses have been properly developed. Looking at it internationally, we must realize that it is only for a short time that we can keep our secret locked up in our own hearts.

I prefer to look upon atomic energy from the point of view of its domestic use. I believe that atomic energy will be a great blessing in peace time and that, like so many other discoveries, it will completely revolutionize our peace-time mode of living. Atomic energy by virtue of its great potency may be a great deterrent to war because, when all nations have the secret, any and all nations must fear the use of the death-dealing atomic bomb as a menace even to the aggressor. I think we should take that into our primary consideration.

Atomic energy must be kept under rigid surveillance. If I were to use the word "control", I might be misunderstood, for I do not think science is capable of being controlled beyond a limited extent by other than scientists. That being the case, I would urge the members of the house to look upon atomic energy as something that we want developed for peace-time use to the greatest possible extent. Having focused our attention in this parliament on atomic energy really for the first time, we should deliberate carefully before we put on the statute book any enactment dealing with atomic energy. For that reason I am heartily in approval of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that before this bill is passed parliament should take every possible means of getting the very best possible measure. I think his suggestion was a good one of setting up a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate before which scientists, technical experts, businessmen and administrators could be called, so that from a coordination of the viewpoints of the best we have in Canada a measure might be framed that would best serve our purpose. True, any measure we may pass to-day may have to be amended many times before it is perfect, but let us get the firmest possible foundation at the very earliest stage in dealing with atomic energy.

The hon. member for Vancouver South also mentioned the necessity for vigilance in the use of atomic energy and proposed the setting up of what he called watch-dog committees but which I prefer to call vigilance committees. In the last few days we have all heard a great deal about and have lent our voice to a great expansion of national research. But we must remember that there are people in private life who also contribute greatly to research and invention, and therefore in studying this measure we must take into consideration not only the activities of the research council and the experts employed by the government but also private enterprise and individual scientists or inventors who may also be able to contribute a great deal. History has shown that private scientists have, often by accident, discovered great potentialities of further developments. Therefore I say that it is of no use for us to consider the control of atomic energy nationally unless we are vigilant with regard to the developments of its use internationally. We must realize that in addition to the paid civil servants, scientists and agents employed by this government, private individuals will also be exploring into this as yet largely unknown field.

I should like to draw to the attention of the house a number of matters which I consider important in our approach to passing legislation of this kind. In the first place, the war has shown us that great secrecy must often be preserved. But the war has also shown us the difficulty of restraining secret discoveries from the general use of mankind and the danger of the secret getting out to those who might use it to our detriment. Consequently we must regard secrecy in the light of a danger as well as a protection, because if secrecy retains the use of atomic energy in the control of the few, they can make it more dangerous than if it is in the hands of the many, for the few may impede the development of further uses of this power, and one's imagination at present is hardly equal to realizing to what uses it may be put which would be detrimental to mankind. We must look with a vigilant eye upon developments eleswhere than in our own country. Canada is fortunate in containing the second richest deposits of the fundamental substances required for atomic energy, but it is doubtful whether some or all other countries will not be able to prepare the same product from like or similar materials.

As regards control, the reason the three great nations in possession of this secret, namely Britain, United States and Canada, have not shared it with Russia holus-bolus is not that they selfishly desire to use it for their own ends, but that they want to keep somebody else from using it to our detriment. The joint committee that met in Washington agreed that as soon as practically possible, full knowledge of atomic energy should be extended to our allies. By the same yardstick, it must be spread out to scientists and to the public for maximum peace-time use. I am a firm believer that the development of atomic energy, like the radio, the telephone and electricity, will arouse the imagination of our youth, our scientists, our merchants and our industrialists, all of whom in their own way will probably undertake some forms of research. These movements should be sponsored. I am glad that the bill to some extent, though I believe insufficiently, sponsors that development.

If one looks upon atomic energy from the viewpoint of the history of inventions of bygone days, one recalls that there was much fear of the printing press and its effects upon mankind; likewise hindrances arose to the development of applied electricity, the telephone and, above all, the radio; but, despite fears and predictions of possible trouble, the extension and the use of inventions increased rapidly. It is said that the theory of gravitation was discovered by someone who, sitting under a tree, was struck by a falling apple. So, great new uses of atomic energy may be discovered accidentally. Therefore we should be concerned to see that as much atomic knowledge as possible should be made public. While certain developments no doubt should remain secret and be kept under control, I believe that governmental responsibility is such that a member of the cabinet, responsible to parliament, should be included in the atomic committee so that he can bring to parliament all information which can possibly be disclosed, for dissemination by members of the house in our various ridings. So I urge that, in setting up the committee, not only the president of the national research council be an ex-officio member, but so also should a member of the government.

I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South that this legislation should not be rushed, but that a special committee should be appointed and given full power to call for papers and documents, to examine experts, and to decide whether a better bill than the one before us can be produced. The best possible methods of controlling atomic energy are none too good for us in this day and age. I do not think we are going to gain anything by rushing the matter through. There are some sections of the bill which the hon. member for Vancouver South has mentioned which may prove to be either helpful or detrimental, but personally I am not convinced that the bill in its present form is the best that can be adopted. In an attempt to guard the secret, we may be merely impeding progress, and I think more attention should be given to that consideration. The prime concern of members of this parliament should be the extension of the peace-time use of this great force in all possible directions, for power, for light, for medical and medicinal purposes. There are indeed so many potentialities that we should be careful in drafting legislation that the horse we run with is not a horse which will hinder us in the race.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister and the government are receiving from all sides of the house congratulations upon the presentation of this bill for the control of atomic energy. I want to join in those congratulations, although I feel that some member of the government might well reply that they have done only what they ought to have done and that therefore congratulations are hardly necessary. As a matter of fact I can hardly conceive in this day and age of any government of a democracy not realizing that they should take steps exactly along the lines of those proposed in the bill before us.

As I see it, the matter is a very simple one. Almost all of those who have spoken in the course of this debate have referred to the two aspects of atomic energy. On the one hand, it has terrifying possibilities with respect to war. On the other hand, it holds tremendous potentialities for us in the domestic field. On both counts I suggest that the government is absolutely right in bringing down a measure providing for public control of this new power.

I say that with a view of what has happened in past history. In the matter of armaments I think we are all aware of the terrible part that has been played in human history by private manufacture. That has been true with armaments of a much lesser force than that of atomic energy, and I suggest that all our experience adds up to the fact that this tremendous power, so far as war is concerned, must be under public control. I think we are all aware that control must not stop with national control; it must become truly international; but in order to move in that direction, we must make within our own country the beginning which is foreshadowed by the bill now before us.

On the other hand, in domestic matters, as the leader of this group (Mr. Coldwell) pointed out when he spoke at the resolution stage, history gives us a sorry picture of new sources of power getting into private hands with the result that their advantages are not made available to the people as a whole but rather are misused, thus bringing misery to thousands and indeed millions of people. That having been the case with sources of power much less in extent than that which has now been disvovered, it seems to me to be of the utmost importance that as we launch upon the atomic age we see to it that this power remain in public hands.

I consider it highly significant that from all sides of the house, although in many debates we divide along party lines, in this debate there has been general approval of the bill now before us. I make that statement because I wish to refer in passing to something that was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green); and in replying to something he has had to say, I wish to be perfectly fair and to recognize that he did give support, both on his own behalf and on behalf of his party, to the principle of the bill. I felt, however, that in his remarks there was a certain fear about the bill, because to him it seemed to give to the government or to an agency of the government far-reaching and sweeping powers. In fact, I believe he used words something like these, that in this bill were contained the most far-reaching and sweeping powers ever given to any body of any kind.

I think that is true as far as Canadian history is concerned. Certainly it is true that any person or body or group of people exercising control over atomic energy will have just about the greatest power that any individual or any group ever had. But it is precisely because control over atomic energy is such a tremendous power that I do not want to see it get into private hands. It is for that reason that I support the principle of the bill before us, namely, that atomic energy should without question be brought under public control.

Mr. GREEN: I did not question that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I recognize that. But in all kindliness may I say—I do not mean that I am not prepared to fight with my hon. friends to the right, but in this debate we are pretty well agreed as to the general principle—hence the manner in which I am dealing with this point. This issue seems to come up so often—the fear of some of my hon. friends, particularly to the right, of delegating great powers to the government or to agencies of the government—and every time I hear that fear expressed it reminds me of my own greater fear and my own dislike of powers being entrusted to private individuals and corporations especially in view of the results of that policy in the past. So I suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver South and those associated with him that they think this question through a little farther and realize that there is not a great deal to fear in the course that is being followed. It is far more democratic than leaving great powers in private hands.

I am sure my hon. friend will agree that it is a good day for civilization that something of this importance is to be protected from private exploitation and definitely put under the control of the people of the country and eventually under the control of the people of the world.

Mr. GREEN: I was not advocating private exploitation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I quite agree that my hon. friend was not advocating private exploitation. I have given him full credit for supporting the principle of the bill, but I am trying to assuage the fear he expressed about delegating such tremendous powers as this bill provides.

Mr. GREEN: To a board.

Mr. KNOWLES: My hon. friend interjects, "to a board." That reminds me of the frequent request which is made, in the name of democracy, that all sorts of details on things that are taken care of by governments should be brought here and discussed in detail on the floor of parliament. I am one of those who will always insist on the overriding authority of this parliament. That is an essential in democracy as we know it, and we must not give in on that point to the extent of one iota. But if we are going to move on—and I believe that we are; history is pushing us, and we have an example of it in this very measure—if we are to move into the atomic age and into economic democracy, parliament will have to become the place where, because we deal with more matters, we learn to lay down basic principles, while delegating details to responsible boards that can act on our behalf. Otherwise, if we insist on every detail regarding all kinds of things that should be publicly controlled, and ask that those details be discussed in parliament, we shall become bogged down and we shall defeat the very purpose of democracy.

Far from having the fears my hon. friend has expressed, I feel quite pleased that the government has brought down this measure, and I trust that when the time for the vote comes it will receive the unanimous support of the house. Having said that, I should now like to support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South with regard to referring the matter to a special committee. There is something in me that will not allow me to support the suggestion of a joint committee of this house and the other place. My hon. friend is not surprised at my wanting to leave the other place out; but I support the idea of this matter being referred to a special committee of this house, and I suggest to the minister, whatever he may have thought of the suggestion from the hon. member for Vancouver South, that it is coming now from one who supports the bill, supports its principle, and is for it all the way through. My reason for suggesting that it be referred to a committee is by no means to hamper or hinder the progress of the bill through parliament. I feel, however, as expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South and others, that this matter is of the greatest importance, and we have no idea of what the future may hold as we move into the atomic age, so that the more we know about the matter, the more publicity that can be given it throughout Canada, the better it will be for our understanding of this subject and for the decisions we and the Canadian people may have to make in the days that lie ahead.

If we move into committee of the whole following the second reading, we cannot have before us any scientists or others who might be able to give us all the available information on this subject. We cannot go into the whole matter in the way we could in a select committee in some other part of the building. I think it would be all to the good if that proposal were carried out. It might not result in the change of a single item in the bill; the bill might come back to committee of the whole in exactly its present form, but if in this way publicity can be given to what is involved it will be all to the good. Therefore I hope that the minister will give consideration to the suggestion, and I once again have great pleasure in supporting the bill.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): I should like to say a few words in support of the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). In passing, I should like to call the attention of the house to the reasons which have been advanced by the members of the C.C.F. party for public control, which seems to be the purpose of nearly every bill which comes up in the house. The socialist argument that public control makes for peace and security is, I say, denied by all the facts of history. The socialist idea that private enterprise is another word for private exploitation has no truth in it. If we wish to know where real exploitation has been in the last twenty-five years we can look to the example set by the great dictatorships. There you have socialism actually working. It is one thing to talk about socialism theoretically, but what did they have in Germany if it was not national socialism? What did they have in Italy if it was not guild socialism? What have they in Russia if it is not Marxian socialism? Each one is, or was, a tyranny. I think the Russian is as great as the other two put together. It is those dictatorships, those socialist countries, which have brought about the terrible revolutions and wars of the last thirty years.

You cannot blame private enterprise for the ills of the world. All the progress which the world has made up to the present time has been due entirely to private initiative and to the genius of individuals. As the minister well said yesterday afternoon, governments can exploit applied science, but pure science is the result of the efforts of private individuals. He said that one of the necessities of pure science was more leisure for those individuals who have a scientific mind, and that it was the greater amount of leisure formerly enjoyed by people in Europe which had brought about most of the advances in pure science there rather than on this American continent.

In connection with increased leisure, I should like to quote Major Douglas. I do not know of anybody who has expressed this idea as well as he has. The quotation is from "Credit-Power and Democracy", and reads as follows:

> The more the maintenance of life can be shifted from the backs of men on to the backs of machines, the more important it is to find a creative outlet for the human energy released, and the more certain is it that a considerable portion of this energy will, without compulsion, be devoted to the improvement of the industrial machine. That is to say, if a practical policy based on these considerations be pursued there will be a fall in the man-hours required for routine or operating work, and a consequent rise in the man-hours available for design and research work. The industrial machine is a lever, continuously being lengthened by progress, which enables the burden of Atlas to be lifted with ever-increasing ease. As the number of men required to work the lever decreases, so the number set free to lengthen it increases. It is true that, owing to the defective working of an outworn financial system, the lengthening of the lever has been offset by obstacles to its beneficent employment, but these very obstacles, by raising up a world-wide unrest, will secure a rectification of the means of distribution, which is the first step to a better state of things.

Before we can solve the problem of distribution we must realize that we face a new age of increasing leisure, and that any efforts to distort the economic system into providing more jobs will meet only with failure. There is only one real solution, namely, to admit freely that we face an age of leisure. Provision must be made for that. If we do that, then, as a consequence, we shall have also an age of increasing liberty and freedom.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I rise to say just one thing, and to say it briefly. Before I do that may I take the opportunity to compliment all those who have spoken on this measure, from the minister who introduced the resolution in the earlier stages of the measure to those who have spoken since. This is one measure on which every member who has spoken has spoken in a constructive and non-partisan manner. They have approached the problem from its broadest possible point of view.

My reason for speaking at this time is to supplement what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and supported by many other hon. members. In view of the importance of this measure, I ask the minister to give careful consideration to referring it to a special committee of this house, or, if it is desired, a committee of this house and of the senate. I do that for no other purpose than that the house be as well informed as possible on this subject and on the plans which the minister has in view for the control of this new form of energy, and to consider if possible how the measure can be improved.

I have no doubt that the minister and his advisers have brought forward a measure which in their judgment they consider satisfactory. But it has been pointed out that in other places several aspects of it have been treated somewhat differently. I am not arguing now in favour of any other plan or of any modification of the present plan, but I think it would be expressing our appreciation of the importance of this measure if we were to give it further consideration. I think the minister would be recognizing the importance of the matter if he would consent to that being done. I need not repeat that atomic energy is a new form of power which may be of tremendous importance to man in the economic field and which also may be a great danger to society. That is recognized by everyone. Let us put our heads together and, with the best technical advice we can get, bring forward a measure which the house will agree unanimously is the best we can draw up at this time. I respectfully urge that this suggestion be favourably considered by the minister and the government.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) this afternoon, and to the other addresses that have been made, particularly to the suggestion that the bill now be sent to a special joint committee of this house and the senate for study and revision. I find myself in sympathy with that suggestion and would be very glad to support it and urge the minister by all means to yield to it. I believe that in a committee of that kind much can be done to improve the measure or, if not to improve it, at least to assure everyone that it is the very best measure that can be devised by the government and put into effect in this country. So I strongly urge the minister to give effect to the suggestion.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): If I may say just a word I shall be as brief as was the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). I too think it would be a good plan to send this bill to a committee, not because I feel that it should be altered in any fundamental patricular, but because I feel that too few people in our country fully realize the implications of this great new source of energy. We may pass this bill through the house; while we shall get some views here, we discuss it more or less from the point of view of the political set-up in Canada. If we got it before a committee we could call some outstanding scientists and others whose views could be publicized throughout Canada, which I think would be a great advantage both to the government in promoting this bill and to the house in adopting it. By this means we could give our people for the first time some outstanding opinions on the subject which would give them an understanding of just what this great new source of energy means. It is for that reason and none other that I warmly support the view which has been advanced, though I believe this house should appoint the committee. If a joint committee were appointed a recommendation would have to be made and to come back from the other place, and I do not think it would be quite feasible, altogether apart from what we may think of the other place. I think it should be a committee of this house which would report back to the house in the normal way. Then the hon. gentlemen of the other place could pursue a similar course, if they wished.

Mr. GREEN: That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am certainly glad that so many hon. member agree with the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), because I consider that suggestion definitely worth while. As has been said, the people of Canada know practically nothing about atomic energy. If this committee were set up it would be able to bring out the facts, and no doubt hon. members would advance suggestions which would be of value in setting up the board. In this connection I should like to quote a paragraph from a news item dated yesterday:

Experts here do not foresee much chance of atomic energy being available for commercial use for about fifteen or twenty years, even though Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, expressed the opinion that commercial heat from atomic energy could be looked for in about five years. When one large consumer of coal asked the national research council regarding atomic energy, he was told to proceed with his original plans to use modern heating equipment but to allow for possibility of installing equipment which could use atomic energy some time in the future.

If this committee is set up I think it should ask the board to do everything possible in research and development along the line of the production of heat by atomic energy. The minister has said, and we all know, that we are faced with a fuel famine next winter. There is no doubt of that. In many parts of the country less cordwood has been cut this year than ever before, because it has been impossible to get men to go into the bush. In my own district, though trucks are going down No. 28 highway every day, there is not the quantity of cordwood going to the city that there was last year, and it is almost impossible to buy a load of it. I understand that the same situation exists in the Parry Sound, Muskoka and other northern sections. That is one thing this committee should impress upon the board, namely, the need to develop heat first. I believe that if the research men devoted their attention to the production of heat from uranium some result might be achieved not in fifteen years or five years, but in much less time. The development of the atomic bomb did not require the full six years of war. Some of the research work had been done before that, of course, but it was hurried along, and there is no reason why the production of heat by atomic energy cannot be hurried along in the same way. The explanatory note on page 2 has this to say:

Sections 7, 8 and 9 empower the board to undertake or facilitate research and investigation with respect to atomic energy, and to engage in, facilitate and control as the public interest may require the production and utilization of atomic energy, the dissemination of information with respect thereto and the production and distribution of materials requisite therefor.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is six o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of Natioinal Defence for Air): It is my privilege to announce that His Excellency the Governor General, accompanied by General Vokes, arrived at Rockcliffe airport this afternoon from England by R.C.A.F. plane, at five o'clock. I may add with some pride that the estimated time of their arrival at the airport was five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CHURCH OF THE NAZARENE

The house in committee on bill No. 82, to incorporate the executive board of the Church of the Nazarene—Mr. Warren—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 3 inclusive agreed to.

On sections 4—Objects.

Mr. HACKETT: We should have some explanation of this legislation. We may feel quite friendly toward it, but at least we are entitled to the courtesy of being provided with some details. I think most of us would feel very much embarrassed if we were asked for information concerning this bill and were forced to say that we could not get it.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is entitled to any information it may desire. Do I understand that the hon. member for Stanstead has some questions to ask on section 4?

Mr. HACKETT: I have not even a copy of the bill. I suggest that it stand until someone is here who can give us some information about it.

The CHAIRMAN: The sponsor is here, and if any member of the committee would like to ask any questions I am sure the sponsor will be prepared to answer.

Mr. HACKETT: I would ask the sponsor to give us a resume of the purposes of the bill.

Mr. WARREN: This bill went through the senate, through the private bills committee of the senate; it received second reading in this house and has been approved by the private bills committee. If I were asked what I know about the denomination known as the Nazarenes I would have to say that I do not know personally a great deal about them, but I do know the man whose name is mentioned in this bill, Mr. Collins, who wrote to me from Red Deer asking if I would be willing to sponsor this bill. I have known Ernest Collins ever since he was a boy and I would be willing to endorse anything that Ernest Collins would endorse. My more or less limited knowledge of the Nazarenes as an organization is that their doctrine is the old-time Methodist doctrine. I think it was Macauley, the English historian, who said that the Wesleys did more to save England from bloody revolution than all the armies and navies that they could produce. I happen to know one of the leaders of the Nazarenes who practices his calling in the United States, and I know he is one of the finest types of Canadian citizen that one could meet. I also know this man Collins, who has been appointed now as principal of their college at Calgary. So far as I am concerned I have no hesitation in endorsing anything that Ernest Collins belongs to.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps we can take as read his recommendation of the gentleman who is responsible for this bill, and I think my hon. friend is to be congratulated on his faith in his friend's good judgment. But we are now dealing with section 4, which sets out the objects of the corporation, and I was wondering if my hon. friend could indicate to the committee whether it differs in any material way from the objects of other religious organizations of a similar nature which parliament has incorporated in the past because I think it is well to follow as far as possible precedents that have become established. I think my hon. friend will appreciate the good will that prompts my suggestion.

Mr. MAYBANK: If the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill and the hon. member for Peel will permit me, I think I can answer the question. It came up in the private bills committee, and it was pointed out at that time that this bill, compared with other bills of a similar sort, was alike with others as two peas are alike to each other. Practically a standard form of incorporation has become established, and this follows that form slavishly. I think that was the point the hon. gentleman had in mind, was it not?

Mr. GRAYDON: I had in mind the thought that in bills of this kind there is usually one set form used with respect to the objects of the corporation, just as there is a general form used in the incorporation of companies. My hon. friend the member for Winnipeg South Centre, who is chairman of the private bills committee, has explained that this is on all fours with similar church incorporations in the past. That was my only point.

Mr. MAYBANK: Quite so. We have had several similar bills in the last two years that I have been chairman of the committee. This is what one might call the stock form.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Management.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask my hon. friend—either one who may possess superior knowledge of this subject—whether the same remark applies to this section?

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes. There were certain bills of this kind last year; there is another one to follow this, and they follow the usual form word for word.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Capacity to acquire and hold property.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the membership of the body to be incorporated?

Mr. WARREN: I believe about 200,000.

Sections 9 to 17 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EVANGELICAL CHURCHES OF PENTECOST

The house in committee on bill No. 137, to incorporate Evangelical Churches of Pentecost—Mr. Dechene—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. COCKERAM: Would the sponsor give us an explanation of the bill?

Mr. DECHENE: Mr. Chairman, this bill is one of several bills of this kind that we pass from year to year, providing for the incorporation of religious organizations, particularly when they have grown so large that it becomes difficult for the minister in charge to administer the property. Then, for the protection of the minister himself and of the congregation, it has been the custom to apply for incorporation in order that the organization may operate efficiently. It will be noticed that this bill is practically in the form of a model bill which parliament has adopted for many years, providing for this class of incorporations. The bills are drawn, as I said, from both a spiritual and a temporal point of view to provide for the proper administration of these congregations. It is provided that such bills are subject to some limitation as to ownership, in order that a church may not speculate, for instance, because the properties are exempt from taxation. There is a section providing that if a parcel of land is held, say for fifteen years and no longer, as a meeting place for the followers of this particular denomination, and is not so used, they shall dispose of it or the property will become taxable, the idea being that only properties actually used for religious purposes shall be exempt from taxation.

This bill came to me from a minister of the gospel who lives in Athabaska and whom I have the honour to know. I am convinced that he is doing valuable work in many parts of the far north. His denomination operates mainly in northern Alberta and Saskatchewan; and I was much flattered, following the belief which I myself hold, that the Rev. Mr. Marshall entrusted me with the introduction of this bill. The bill was first presented to and passed by the senate, who recommended it to us. Yesterday, at a meeting of the committee on miscellaneous and private bills, this bill was gone over section by section and, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has mentioned, it was found by the committee that it conformed to requirements and procedures followed by this house for many years in incorporating religious institutions. As to the kind of gospel preached by these people, I am unable to give any information.

Mr. ADAMSON: May I ask the hon. member who sponsors this bill whether this Evangelical Churches of Pentecost is what is known as the holy rollers?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DECHENE: I am sorry that my religious knowledge is not extensive enough to answer that question. I do not know of any religious community called the holy rollers. I do know, however, the minister who conducts this congregation in a district of Athabaska, and I know he is doing a lot of good. He is a Christian, and I have never questioned his methods or the name he goes under. Personally I was pleased to sponsor the bill, because I believe it is a good one.

Mr. ADAMSON: I entirely agree with the hon. member. I was merely asking for information.

An hon. MEMBER: The answer is "no".

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Directors.

Mr. COCKERAM: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said that there was great similarity between these bills. I cannot see it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Management.

Mr. GRAYDON: A few moments ago the chairman of the miscellaneous private bills committee was good enough to explain the other bill which was before us. He then said, regarding the objects of the corporation and the clause relating to management, that it was a stock form, one used generally in the incorporation of church bodies of this kind. I would be the last one to attempt to place any obstacle in the way of passing this bill, but in the interests of the churches concerned we ought to have the bills right so that there will be no difficulty later on from their point of view. The objects in section 4, relating to management, are so different from those in the bill which we have just passed that perhaps we might have an explanation from the hon. member as to why this departs so far from the stock form which has been used.

Mr. MAYBANK: When I made that statement before, I made it with reference to that bill, not of course with reference to this bill, but I believe I did say at that time that I was under the impression that the bill which would follow was in many and probably in all respects similar, and if there is that difference which has now been pointed out I was in error in saying that something which would come after was the same as something we then had before us. However, dealing with this bill, I cannot say why there is some difference here from some others. After all, I am not sponsoring it. But those who desired this bill, and those who had their representatives deal with it at first—that is, not the private bills committee of the House of Commons but the corresponding committee of the other place—apparently must have felt that this way of arranging the management of the church was preferable from their point of view. That is the only explanation I can give. Looking at it from the viewpoint of persons enacting legislation, we on the private bills committee could see no objection to granting to these persons desiring incorporation the power which they ask, with respect to both management and other matters. We would not feel that it was any part of our duty to insist upon a precedent, upon having this follow the form of some other bill. It is true that some little time ago I was under the impression that these bills are very similar, and in a general way I think they are. However, these powers which are granted, in case this becomes law, are natural powers; there is no objection that I can see to them; those who framed this plan desired it that way; and after all, since it is for their purposes and for those who will join with them, I believe the private bills committee considered that a sufficient reason. I do not know that there is any better explanation I can give.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is perhaps so. The only thing is that the powers they propose for themselves in this bill seem to be restricted rather than amplified.

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: My hon. friend overlooked that point.

Mr. MAYBANK: Probably they did not want quite as wide powers. They were satisfied the way it was. I suppose that would be the answer.

Mr. LENNARD: Are these bodies not asking really for some relief from taxation? I think they should have it, but, to get down to brass tacks, is that not so?

Mr. MAYBANK: It never so occurred to me. Of course I do not know. I have not the sponsorship of this bill. I would say that when it came before me that did not strike me, and certainly, had I felt that there was a hidden clause—

Mr. LENNARD: No, not hidden.

Mr. MAYBANK: —providing for taxation relief improperly I certainly would have looked rather carefully at it. If there is anything in this bill which suggests that I think we ought to consider it carefully, before we attempt to grant any relief from taxation, although I doubt whether we can grant relief from taxation except such taxation as is dominion in its nature. I think I am right in saying that no federal taxation laws would apply to such bodies as churches. The only law that I can think of which would be applicable would be municipal.

Mr. LENNARD: There is no objection whatever.

Section agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Application of mortmain laws.

Mr. COCKERAM: May we have an explanation of this section, especially the statement that "a licence in mortmain shall not be necessary for the exercise of the powers granted by this act."

Mr. MAYBANK: Does the hon. member ask me to explain it? The answer is, no.

Mr. COCKERAM: But what does it mean?

Mr. McMASTER: The Secretary of State is here and I would ask him to tell us whether the government would object to a longer period than ten years. Both these churches that we have been discussing have branches in Toronto. The other one has a large number of adherents in the United States, and this Pentecostal church has a great many branches in Ontario. Is it because of some policy of the dominion government that the period allowed them is only ten years? That is a very short time in the life of a church.

Mr. GARIEPY: The section under consideration is word for word the same as the section that we passed in the other bill a moment ago. This bill passed the senate private bills committee; it went before our own committee on private bills and was passed, and there was a report from the law clerks indicating that the bill is not out of the ordinary. Its provisions conform to the standard used in similar religious bills. I have no interest in it except to say that I can see no reason for delaying its adoption.

Mr. COCKERAM: I want an explanation and I think the member sponsoring the bill should give us that explanation.

Mr. McMASTER: I would ask the Secretary of State to answer my question. After all, there must be some reason for the ten-year period being there.

Mr. MARTIN: The Secretary of State, speaking for the government, has no objection to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the Secretary of State repeat what he has just said.

Mr. MARTIN: The Secretary of State thought that his words had penetrated even the uttermost recesses on the other side. Speaking for the government, he has no objection to this bill.

Mr. McMASTER: But has he any objection to a longer period than ten years?

Mr. MARTIN: Again speaking for the government, that is a provision to which I have no objection.

Mr. COCKERAM: Has the Secretary of State any opinion?

Mr. GRAYDON: My colleague is suggesting that this church should have wider powers and a longer land tenure. In other words, he is desirous of helping the church by granting it as many rights as possible; and since the ten-year period seems restrictive he is asking the Secretary of State whether the government has any objection to making that period of tenure longer under this mortmain section.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend is an old parliamentarian. He is a good lawyer, and he knows that this is a private bill and that the applicants have come forward with clauses that are presumably pursuant to their wishes in the matter. Consequently the government is not at all anxious to interfere with what obviously must have been in accordance with the terms of their own application.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Has the government any policy?

Mr. MARTIN: The government's policy has been stated already, but the hon. member has been preoccupied and perhaps he did not hear it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was preoccupied; that is quite right. But there have been many times in this house when the Secretary of State has been preoccupied, so we can just balance that. I am sorry if I missed the words of wisdom which fell from his lips some time ago, but will he not grant me this much sufferance, now that I ask him the question, and tell me what the government policy on the bill is.

Mr. MARTIN: The Secretary of State has three times stated the policy of the government, that it has no objection to the bill.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thank you, sir.

Mr. COCKERAM: I come back to the same point. I should like some of the brilliant lawyers across the way to tell me what this provision means with regard to the licence in mortmain not being necessary for the exercise of the powers granted by the act.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): There are no brilliant lawyers across the way.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. COCKERAM: No.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for York South has asked a question and if it has not been answered all I can do is to inquire of the committee whether they are prepared to carry section 10?

Mr. COCKERAM: No. I still think the member who sponsors the bill, or the chairman of the private bills committee, should be able to tell me what the section means. I should like to know.

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps the Secretary of State has not read the bill.

Mr. MAYBANK: I have been asked—I believe the hon. member had me in mind when he put the question—to explain the meaning of the section in question. Some time ago he put the question in this way: Will the hon. member—referring to me—explain this clause? I gave an answer which was in the negative. I simply said, no, and that answer stands. It is no part of my duty to explain the clause, and instead of doing so I suggest to him a course whereby, bright as he is, he can understand it himself. That course is simply to read the clause. He will find in it a sentence made up of nouns, verbs, adverbs and adjectives, and all he has to do is to study the meanings of those various parts of speech, and when he has read it through that will be the meaning of the clause.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sure we know what the verbal harmony of the hon. gentleman who sponsors the bill means, but he does not say anything. He was asked the simple question. "What does this section mean?" May I frankly admit my stupidity—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I appreciate that applause because I know exactly where it came from. It came from over there, the right wing of the Liberal party who now sit on my left.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ABBOTT: Where did that applause come from?

Mr. MAYBANK: Will the hon. gentleman permit an interjection?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Either I have the floor or I have not. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Calgary West has the floor.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): For this relief, sir, much thanks. That is a Shakespearean phrase. I think what the hon. member who sponsors the bill just said was that it means what it says; and "don't be stupid". I wonder if in the kindness of his heart—because he is a big-hearted chap—he will tell us what it means. That is not much to ask of the brilliant lawyer from Winnipeg who once drove an engine of the Canadian Pacific Railway company. He has had a very broad experience; therefore, aside from the literati end of it, will be please tell us what it means.

Mr. MAYBANK: I just wish to say as a matter of courtesy that I cannot admit that the committee is unanimous with reference to the quality of stupidity of which the hon. member has just boasted. He may insist that it is so, but I am not going to agree with him on that point. As a matter of courtesy, I say, I am not going to agree with him.

I do not think the hon. member is right when he says that the sponsor of the bill said so-and-so. That is not a fact. The sponsor of the bill did not say what the hon. member has attributed to him. Finally, I should like to make this remark with reference to the bill. If hon. members will be serious for just a moment, may I say that it is something being done for persons who desire to organize themselves in a fashion in which they believe they can better exercise their religion. The bill has been drafted by them and has been found to be unobjectionable. While one may indulge in a certain amount of fun, perhaps at their expense this evening, as the hon. member for one of the Calgarys has been doing—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the hon. member please speak so that I can hear him?

Mr. MAYBANK: I hope the hon. member hears this. He is making a grave mistake in persuading himself that impudence and intelligence are synonymous; they are not. All this heavy fun from just this side of the foothills is a greatly belaboured type of humour. It would be well if he would for a moment imagine that he is grown up and act as an adult.

The CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. member for Calgary West replies, may I suggest that after he has replied the committee confine itself to a discussion of the section now before us. I will allow the hon. member for Calgary West to reply.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am happy, Mr. Chairman, that you have taken that position. What you have achieved is to prove the stupidity of the remarks made just one moment ago, and I too agree wholeheartedly with you. Let us get on with the business of the committee and not be bothered by the intransigent nonsense which has just been uttered about the hon. member for Calgary West by the hon. member for one of the Winnipegs.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I just heard the word "Order". It was not spoken by the Chairman, but by one of the cheer leaders from the other side of the committee. The word "stupidity" has a particular application. I think it is quite unparliamentary to suggest that an hon. member is stupid, as the hon. member who sponsors this bill, if I may say that again, has done. He used that expression; therefore I am glad that being the cheer leader of the back-benchers he finds a number of people so ignorant that they support him.

Mr. MAYBANK: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I did not use the expression which has just been attributed to me; it was used by the hon. gentleman himself with reference to himself. He drew attention to what he said was his stupidity; I did not.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): One of us is right and one of us is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Sit down.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The word "stupidity" has been used quite freely on both sides of the house. Ordinarily the word "stupidity" is unparliamentary; but when it has been used in a jocular manner, as it has this evening, I do not think the Chair should pay too much attention to it. The chairman of the committee must consider the tone of voice which is used with the word. May I now suggest that there has been sufficient discussion on both sides with regard to section 10. Shall section 10 carry?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No. Will not the hon. member withdraw the word "impudence"? He is a youngster and a lawyer. I am an old fellow and also a lawyer. I ask him to withdraw the word "impudence", and I shall meet him back stage and shake hands, and if he is unable to do it, perhaps I shall even find someone who can accommodate him.

Mr. MAYBANK: Anything that will advance the business of the committee I shall be only too glad to do. I shall not merely withdraw the words that the hon. member desires that I should withdraw, but in addition to that I shall withdraw all the things I was thinking of saying and have not said.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Chairman, we have to follow parliamentary practice. The chairman of the committee of the whole should see that unparliamentary words should not be used, and the Speaker should do his duty. The other night I listened with great interest to an able speech delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver South. He made a well-reasoned address, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs rose in his place and said—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for St. Paul's must not refer to a previous debate of the present session on a different subject.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was only going to say what the hon. member for Vancouver Centre—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for St. Paul's has emphasized the fact that the chairman should see that order is maintained, and I am going to ask him to assist me in performing that duty.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I certainly will assist the chairman in that regard, and I hope that no other hon. member will rise in his place and call anybody stupid on this side of the house.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PUBLIC CONTROL AND SUPERVISION OF DEVELOPMENT, APPLICATION AND USE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) for the second reading of bill No. 165, relating to the development and control of atomic energy.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had just read the explanatory note with regard to sections 7, 8 and 9, which stated that the board to be set up under the bill would have power to produce and distribute the materials requisite for the production of atomic energy. Uranium would be included among those materials. The other day the minister stated that at present Eldorado mines were just breaking even owing to the fact that uranium was being sold at cost. I suggest that the minister see to it that this board, when set up, sells the materials going into the production of atomic energy at a profit when they are exported, because he has to consider the taxpayer as well as the welfare of the people of Canada. The minister should see to that at once. Then, when the board is set up it should see to it that none of these materials are shipped from Canada except to countries authorized by the international atomic energy commission set up under UNO. The board should not allow any outside powers to dictate to it as to the price at which the material should be sold.

I feel that this board can do a good job if they forget politics. Men can be chosen in this country who are far above politics, and who will give good service to be country. In many instances the trouble with boards set up by the government has been that they listen to members of parliament and political ward heelers when it comes to making appointments. People should be taken on their merits; that is the way it should be done in this case, because this is something far beyond anything we have ever had in this country before, and the board must be composed of men of the highest integrity.

This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) raised a number of points, each of which should be studied by all hon. members. When the minister speaks to close the debate I hope he will deal with the points that have been brought out by the hon. member. The people of Canada, together with people throughout the world, are reading various articles in the daily press expressing opinions by scientists and technicians. Some of these may be correct; without doubt some are wrong. That is another reason why this bill should be referred to a committee of the house. From all sides of the chamber the minister has been pressed to adopt this step after second reading has been given, and I hope he may see his way clear to meet that suggestion.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOCH (Assiniboia): This afternoon I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), and I am quite in agreement with his proposal that this bill should be referred to a committee of this house, or possibly a joint committee of the house and senate. I would also recommend that the scientific workers of this country, those who were instrumental in discovering atomic energy, be given a real and definite part to play in connection with such a committee. To-day we have developed atomic energy and, no matter how we handle it, that problem is with us.

In my first remarks I should like to compliment the government on introducing this legislation. There is no other problem so urgent as far as the Canadian people are concerned, and perhaps as far as the whole family of nations is concerned, as this problem of atomic energy which has been tossed into the laps of governments all over the world. We of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation particularly welcome this bill because it puts under public control in a democratic way the most urgent problem of our day. In the past we have said that our economy in this country is outdated and outworn; that our science and invention have advanced so rapidly and we have become so proficient in producing the things we need that the system under which we have laboured, the capitalist system, is outmoded and leads to such things as unemployment, economic stagnation and finally war. So that we welcome this bill heartily. It is true that private enterprise knows only one law; that is, its legal right under the present system. Private enterprise feels no responsibility for unemployment or any of these other great tragedies which sometimes confront us. So that we say this great problem must and shall be solved.

I should like to refer to a statement which was issued by the association of scientific workers located at Canberra House, 73 High Holborn, London. They refer to the growing fear of destruction in the hearts of people. That is the result which we have to-day. If we are to allow individuals or private enterprise to have control of these things and use them for private profit we shall eventually be led into war. So we must change the situation. Now that atomic energy has heen achieved, it seems to me that the members of all political groups should recognize that this is the one thing which should be brought under control so that we may be able to distribute the things which we produce in this country among ourselves rather than be faced with the terrible possibility of having a potential production on the one hand, and poverty and unemployment on the other.

If we allow this problem to go unanswered we shall eventually create such forces of fear and distrust among the nations that it will not be long before we shall be faced, perhaps not with an armament race like in the last war, but a race to produce atomic bombs or to make other destructive uses of atomic energy. This frankenstein which one of the united nations has been successful in creating will be used against us and we shall be annihilated and blown to atomic fragments by the very machine we have created.

I am in agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver South who contended that this bill should be sent to a special committee of this house or a joint committee of both houses. The scientific workers of this country should have some say in the formation of policy. We have made only a beginning. There are world problems that must be solved. We cannot force other nations to accept our ideas any more than we can force hon. members of this house to accept them. This government must be commended for having made a beginning so that we can show other nations that we have taken under our control this power which can be used for the betterment of man.

Perhaps we have not placed enough emphasis upon what atomic energy can do for the people. There is fear and distrust among races and we live from day to day in fear of what is going on. As long as that feeling exists, there is the possibility that this energy may be used for destructive purposes rather than being developed for peaceful uses. I think it was the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. McKay) who said that we should use this power for industrial purposes. It could be used also for medicinal purposes. Quite often when our scientists have worked to develop certain scientific formulas they find that they are used for diabolical purposes. There are many instances of this. Those men, like the rest of us, are wondering where the world is going.

This is a splendid step in the right direction. Into the lap of the government has been thrown one of the most urgent problems of all time, the problem of atomic energy. I hope that we can meet this challenge; I hope that we can find the solution of this great problem. The matter is of such urgency that members of all groups should be ready to get together.

In conclusion, let me say that this is just the beginning. We know that our scientists will be able to go ahead along the lines they have already adopted. Let us hope that this great discovery will not be used as some inventions of the past have been used. If we can bring that about I feel sure we shall have the collaboration and cooperation of nations all over the world so that eventually, through the united nations or some other organization, we shall be able to have a free exchange of scientific knowledge in order that the peoples of the world will be able to have real peace.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I feel strongly about this bill and I feel strongly about the situation in which we find ourselves, that is, the control of the atomic bomb or fission. This thing means life or death; it means either good or evil. How do we propose to deal with the situation? It can be the greatest thing for good that the world has ever seen. I wonder if the world is capable of receiving it under the present circumstances?

What disturbs me more than anything else is just how we are to choose this board. I know something about the situation in the United States where they have done a pretty good job. The minister knows about that. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said something about it this afternoon. How do we propose to choose this board that we are to have in Canada? We cannot have all scientists on the board. We have to have some way of choosing this board.

I have the greatest admiration and the greatest respect for the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe). He has done many things very well and he has done other things not so well, but I will forgive him for those. I submit that the presidents of all the universities in Canada should be on this board. That is what should be done to start with. I do not think it would be too big a job for them. Then, to get the thing done they could call in the best brains on this board.

Mr. MITCHELL: Including yourself.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is that the Minister of Labour speaking?

Mr. MITCHELL: I said, including yourself.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I would bring more brains to bear on it than you would. I know a little about what I am talking about because I had an opportunity of hearing lectures by Sir Ernest Rutherford when I was at McGill university many years ago.

Mr. MITCHELL: What did he tell you about atomic energy then?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): He told us something about it. As a matter of fact he told us that this desk on which I now have my hand has more space than it has matter. He said that this is a system of constellations. I know a little concerning what I am talking about, and if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will keep quiet and attend to his own business and settle some of these strikes all across the country he would be helpful. I have a lot of men on strike in my riding. I have a great deal of sympathy for the minister but I have also sympathy for the fellows on strike in my riding. There are also a lot of ships tied up there, and in Toronto we want to know where we are to get coal for next winter. If we do not get coal, where are we to get atomic energy to take care of us next winter?

We have some great presidents of our Canadian universities. We have Sidney Smith of the university of Toronto, and Principal James of McGill, my old university, and there are a great many fine people there. We should have a board consisting of the presidents of the universities. They are capable of choosing the right people. Some may say that Principal James has not chosen quite the right people, but that is only a matter of opinion. Some may say that there are some reds in the university of Toronto. Maybe there are at McGill. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that the presidents of our universities can choose the right people, and that they know what they are doing. There are many good scientists that such a board could choose. If you want to get a chief for a medical school you do not just pick out a man yourself but you go to the heads of medical organizations and to the universities and find out whom they would recommend. That is only my suggestion and I give it for what it is worth.

This whole question of atomic energy is a question of life or death so far as this world is concerned. If I did not think so I would not be speaking in this debate to-night. Only in to-day's paper we read what a distinguished scientist said about the atom bomb tests, that an atomic bomb, if exploded under the ocean surface, might crack the earth's shell and there might be no survivors to report on the experiment. So that we certainly do not want to get atomic energy into the hands of the wrong people. I hope hon. members will take what I have said in the spirit in which I have given it to the house. This is an extremely serious question.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): Mr. Speaker, this has been an interesting debate and I suggest that an unusual amount of unanimity has been shown toward the objectives of the bill. Certain points were raised in the admirable address of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), and perhaps I might take up first the eight questions he raised.

His first one was: Should there be a board or should atomic energy be placed under the direct control of a minister? As my hon. friend pointed out, in the United States atomic energy is under a board, and in the United Kingdom it is directly under a minister. I think Canada's proposal of a board under a minister is a good combination of the two. It enables a group of men with diversified knowledge to be placed in charge of administration, under a minister who is chairman of a cabinet committee and who is directly responsible to the House of Commons. It seems to me that the plan proposed by this bill gives Canada the best of both arrangements and is consistent with Canadian custom.

Then my hon. friend mentioned watch-dog committees. I dare say that, as developments proceed, it may be desirable to have committees, and perhaps a standing committee of this house on problems of atomic energy may be warranted; I do not think that is so at the moment. We should obtain more experience in the work of atomic energy before a standing committee is established. But that may very well be a logical development of the future if and when atomic energy takes a more important place in the Canadian economy. There is nothing in the bill that would prevent the establishing of advisory committees or the setting up of a parliamentary committee, should the future indicate that that is desirable.

My hon. friend also asked: Is there sufficient control by parliament? As was pointed out, the British bill provides for a negative resolution. The Canadian bill provides by section 9(2):

> Regulations under this section shall forthwith be published in the Canada Gazette and laid before parliament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

That is not quite equivalent to a provision for a negative resolution, but it does draw the regulations of the board to the attention of parliament, and it would be within the privilege of any member to bring any regulation before the house for discussion. So I think that point is covered.

Mr. GREEN: Is provision made for tabling the regulation in the house?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, that is provided by section 9(2), which I have just read.

Another question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South was: Should the board be a full-time board? The government has not fully decided that point. The decision hinges on the question whether it shall be a regulatory or an administrative board. Should it be an administrative board, should it actually operate all phases of atomic energy, it should be a full-time board. Should it be merely a supervisory board to publish regulations, leaving the operation to others, then it should be a part-time board. That decision will be made within the next few months and parliament will be able to examine the situation at its next session.

Another question was: Does the bill unduly hamper research? My hon. friend will note that section 9 of the bill provides that the first responsibility of the board will be to make provision for research. It says:

> The board may make regulations,—
> (a) for encouraging and facilitating research and investigations with respect to atomic energy.

That is an instruction by parliament to the board. There is no doubt that research will be provided for.

Another question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South was: What shall be done about inventions? Section 9(1) (e) covers that subject. I think that provision is about as broad as the present position of atomic energy makes possible at the moment.

Then my hon. friend mentioned crown companies. I have heard somewhere that he does not like crown companies; I think that has been made clear.

Mr. GREEN: Not the way they are being set up now.

Mr. HOWE: The next point is, should the board make international agreements? The bill does not provide that the board will make international agreements; it provides that the board will keep abreast of developments in other countries. All international agreements will be made by the government through the Department of External Affairs and be subject to ratification by the House of Commons.

My hon. friend has suggested that the bill should go before a committee of the house for further study, and hon. members in other sections of the house have supported that view. I should like to give the arguments against that procedure.

The first is that there is some urgency about having this bill enacted. The atomic energy commission of the united nations commences its sittings to-morrow. Each member of the commission is desirous that he shall have the support of a bill from the country he represents as guidance in the position which he will take in the proceedings of the commission. This government is therefore doing what it can to expedite the study and passage of this bill.

Mr. GREEN: On that point, may I ask the minister if it is not the fact that neither the United States nor the United Kingdom have yet passed bills dealing with this matter?

Mr. HOWE: I am told that the United Kingdom has enacted a bill. The senate of the United States has passed a bill, and it is expected that passage by the house of representatives will be only a matter of a few days.

The second objection to a committee is the secrecy which still surrounds atomic energy. Hon. members who have spoken in the debate have indicated that they would regard the hearings of the committee as a forum for the dissemination of information about atomic energy to the public. I hardly think the position is such that that would be possible. Only a few men in North America or in the world know the whole story of atomic energy. Some two thousand scientists, engaged over the past three or four years, have taken part in research which culminated in the production of atomic energy.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. HOWE: When I finish my address.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said that only about two thousand people know about atomic energy. Did the professors in these various universities know who they were?

Mr. HOWE: I do not think the list is difficult to obtain. But I would point out that the research on atomic energy was carried out in very much the same style that a carpenter would use in building a ladder. A ladder is built rung by rung. Each rung is a separate unit in the ladder, but the whole is the ladder. The research in atomic energy was carried on in very much the same way. A group of scientists would work on one phase, and only one phase, of the atomic energy problem. At the top level was a committee who were able to take these individual efforts and fit them into a comprehensive whole; I suppose there are not twenty scientists in the world who know all phases of the development of atomic energy.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister permit one question? Among those twenty are there any of those who are under arrest at the present time?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am so happy to hear that.

Mr. HOWE: The science of atomic energy has been made known to the world to the extent that the story can be told at this time. A publication called the Smyth report was brought out shortly after atomic bombs were dropped. That report received careful study from the policy committee in charge of the development of atomic energy, and contained all the information as to the science of atomic energy which it was felt could be made public. I may say that, regardless of secrecy, it is a complete report on the subject.

As far as methods of production are concerned, those are still matters of secrecy. I assume that if a committee of the house were appointed the first move would be to ask to visit Chalk River. I would have to tell the committee that such a visit was quite impossible, because Chalk River was built under an agreement that all three partner countries would approve any visitor to that enterprise. The process continues to be a secret process, and it would not be possible to bring scientists from Chalk River to explain to a committee of the house, and to the people of Canada, just how we produce atomic energy at Chalk River. I think my hon. friend will appreciate that fact. What could be done usefully would be to bring men who have a comprehensive knowledge of the subject before the committee, and ask them whether the bill now before parliament is a satisfactory bill, and to ask for their suggestions for its improvement. That has already been done by the government. The government has consulted the eight or ten men in Canada who are best entitled to give an opinion on that subject. This bill has been under study for at least six months. The first draft was made as long ago as that. It has been revised to conform with Canadian opinion; it has been studied in connection with decisions taken in the United Kingdom and in the United States, and to-day it represents the best opinion of men who are most thoroughly familiar with the subject matter of the bill. Therefore I think there is little probability that the bill could be greatly improved by being submitted to a committee.

There is the further fact that the men best able to advise a committee would be greatly embarrassed by being brought before the committee and subjected to cross-examination by its members. I have been associated with this problem since its inception in North America. I have been in at the top-level discussions. I have heard a good deal which to-day is public knowledge, and I have heard a good deal which to-day is not public knowledge. I would be hesitant about appearing before a committee and being subject to cross-examination, for fear that I would disclose knowledge which I have undertaken not to disclose. The top scientists who would come before the committee would be in the same position. If they were asked a question about the science of atomic energy they would need to have a consultant to tell them whether the question fell within the ambit of the Smyth report. If it did they could answer the question; if it did not they could not. They would not be able to answer questions about the method of producing atomic energy; they would be barred absolutely by the agreement which has been entered into between the countries that have pooled their knowledge. Therefore the committee could make no progress through questions along that line.

For these reasons I suggest that the bill should not be sent to a committee. It is a bill that is in parallel with bills being passed in the United Kingdom and in the United States. It is as good a measure as can be drafted at this time. I daresay that two years hence it will be desirable to amend the bill. At that time the secrecy provisions may be altogether different, and it may then be quite in order to have the bill studied by a committee of the house.

A further objection to sending the bill to a committee at this time is that the subject is being discussed by an international commission; therefore it would be embarrassing to Canada's member on that commission if newspaper reports emanated from this capital giving the opinion of the parliament of Canada on a question being discussed on an international level. For that reason I cannot agree with the suggestion, much as I should like to adopt it. I know it was made in good faith and it is one that would ordinarily commend itself to me.

I believe that the study of a bill by a small committee is usually helpful, but in this case the circumstances are such that I must ask hon. members not to insist that the bill be referred to a committee for public hearings, but instead that it be studied clause by clause in committee of the whole. I can assure hon. members that I shall take a reasonable view of any suggestions that are proposed in committee of the whole for the improvement of the bill. I hope that the bill will receive early consideration and become law as soon as hon. members can arrange.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask the minister a question?

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. HOWE: Moved that the house go into committee on the bill.

Mr. GREEN: May I suggest that we do not go into committee to-night but that we have the British bill and the McMahon bill printed in Votes and Proceedings for to-day, so that hon. members may have them available for study to-morrow. We could then go into committee on our bill to-morrow afternoon or on Thursday.

Mr. HOWE: The difficulty is to know what precisely the etiquette of the matter is, whether it is proper to publish in the Canadian parliament a bill that is being discussed in the United States congress. The United States bill has not been enacted into law, and I doubt the propriety of acceding to my hon. friend's request, much as I should like to do so.

Mr. GREEN: Could not the British bill be published and the United States bill be printed and distributed to members instead of being included in any of our formal publications?

Mr. HOWE: If it will meet the wishes of the hon. member I shall have the two bills mimeographed and distributed to the members.

Mr. GREEN: That is sufficient, and would help a great deal.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, on the bill, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On Section 1—Short title.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 1 carry?

Progress reported.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AS TO RULES FOR READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed from Thursday, June 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to effect an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Representation in the House of Commons is a matter which, for many years, has given rise to numerous comments, and occasioned rather sharp protests, owing to the fact that some provinces did not have a number of representatives in keeping with their population. The resulting injustice becomes more obvious whenever the redistribution of electoral districts is contemplated, and the government is to be commended for proposing to redress that wrong.

The resolution that is now before us involves our requesting the United Kingdom parliament to amend the provisions of the British North America Act with a view to the establishment, in a clear and precise manner, of the basis of representation in the House of Commons, according to population, and the elimination of the injustice resulting from a legal interpretation opposed to the spirit of the covenant entered into by the provinces at the time of confederation.

Let us first examine this measure on its merits.

No one will deny that in a democracy the principle of parliamentary representation based on population is the fairest and the most equitable.

Now, if we take the figures of the last census and apply that principle, Ontario would have 83 members and Quebec 73, each member representing an average population of 45,578 while through the application of section 51 of the British North America Act, according to the legal interpretation given thereof by the London courts, Ontario would have 82 members with an average population of 46,190 for each constituency, Quebec having 65 members with an average population of 51,213. Is that fair and equitable?

Yet, the spirit of the federal covenant entered into by the provinces was that the citizens of all provinces were to be placed on an equal footing. Reference to the parliamentary debates that were held on the resolutions which constitute the true covenant shows that such was unmistakably the intention. I shall deal again with this point later.

Can we indefinitely tolerate that the Quebec citizens should be considered as inferior beings, and that they should not be entitled to a representation equal to that enjoyed by the Ontario citizens? That is the question which comes up at this time. If we are to keep on living in the same house, it is time that such a situation be clarified, for otherwise we shall have to consider getting out of it.

It is perhaps proper that I should recall the slogan originated by George Brown, the founder of the Toronto Globe, "Representation by population". That was under the Act of Union which had granted an equal number of representatives to Upper Canada (Ontario) and Lower Canada (Quebec), at a time when the population of Lower Canada was much greater than that of Upper Canada. Indeed, in 1841, Lower Canada, a French province which is to-day called Quebec, had a population of 650,000, as compared with 456,000 in Upper Canada, an English-speaking province which is to-day Ontario. But in time the population of Upper Canada increased to such an extent that it exceeded the population of Lower Canada; and it was at that time that George Brown thought it unfair that Lower Canada with a smaller population than Upper Canada should retain an equal representation. Hence his slogan which has become famous in our political history, "Rep. by pop."—representation by population.

That is the principle which the fathers of confederation wanted to embody in the pact of 1867, a principle which a legal interpretation by the London court has changed or in some way distorted.

All that is asked in this resolution is that this principle of representation by population should be applied, with the formal exceptions provided in the amendment to the constitution which was agreed to in 1915.

The question of national unity is being put forward. We are in favour of national unity, but under fair and reasonable conditions, and not always at the expense of Quebec.

What are the reasons given for opposing this measure? There are a variety of them. I shall discuss a few.

First, the increase in expenditures is mentioned.

The hon. member for Lake Centre has raised that point, and the hon. member for Nanaimo has devoted his whole speech to it. The latter hon. member feels some concern about the ratepayers.

Let us think seriously. Granting to the province of Quebec the representation to which she is entitled would involve an additional expenditure of $60,000. What a huge sum for people who are used to being treated as poor relations. Is that not enough to disturb the conscience of those same hon. members who, hardly one month ago, enthusiastically voted for a gift of $425,000,000 to England, apart from the numerous gratuities we extend to her under various forms: interest-free loan, subsidy to offset the difference between the on-credit sale price of the goods we ship her and the price paid to the producer, all that making up an additional sum of a few hundred million dollars, apart from the gifts of billions of dollars which have already been made.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the least that can be said about such an argument is that it is not serious.

The hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Davenport have, besides, expressed their concern about the rights of minorities for the future, should the resolution be agreed to. I hope I am not reflecting on them when I say that we had not been used to so much solicitude on their part. At least, they have never evidenced in this house any particular sympathy for minorities. Moreover, we have not forgotten the legislation passed under the Anderson government in Saskatchewan, the province where the hon. member for Lake Centre lives. No legislation has ever so brutally spoliated the rights of the French and Catholic minority. And the hon. member belonged to the party of Mr. Anderson, whom he later replaced as leader.

Nor have we forgotten that it was the party with which the hon. member for Davenport is connected that put through in Ontario the famous Rule 17, of woeful memory.

No, this passing regard for minority rights leaves us quite skeptical.

I now come to the more momentous argument of a constitutional character.

It cannot be gainsaid that the province of Quebec has long been subjected to an ever-growing unfairness. Must this unfairness be allowed to subsist or should we attempt to redress it? Such is the question at issue, and we, of the province of Quebec, are interested in knowing the attitude of this house, as well as that of the other provinces, in order to chart our future course.

The problem, however, is to determine how we should go about it?

In view of the legal construction placed by the Privy Council upon subsection 4 of section 51, it may be wondered if the government could not have attained a similar purpose by using section 52 in connection with subsection 2 of section 51, without tampering with subsection 4 of section 54, nor resorting to some amendment to the constitution.

Under section 37 of the British North America Act, representation at the time of confederation was established in proportion to the population, allowing 81 constituencies to Ontario, 65 to Quebec, 19 to Nova Scotia and 15 to New Brunswick.

Sections 51 and 52 then provide for a revision of representation following each decennial census.

Section 52 states:

> The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

This section therefore enables parliament to increase the number of members of the house without any amendment to the constitution, provided the representation proportionate to the number of population of the provinces be not disturbed, with Quebec serving as a basis in establishing the quotient. Subsection 2 of section 51 states that representation should be proportionate to the number of population in each province.

Of course, subsection 1 of section 51 states that "Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members." But no one will claim that when Parliament was granted the power to increase the number of members, it was the intention to increase solely the number of members of other provinces, at the prejudice of Quebec, despite its growth of population. It would have been an unspeakable injustice. Besides, this is a point which has already been clarified. Reference to the debates on Confederation, at the 1865 session of the Parliament of the United Province of Canada, will show that the question was brought up as to whether the number of 65 members allotted to Quebec was subject to increase with the growth of population. Now here is the answer, given by Sir Hector Langevin, solicitor general, on behalf of the government, as reported on page 391 of the Debates for the year 1865:

The hon. member for Lotbinière, getting over his fears and predictions and speaking of the sixty-five members from Lower Canada, put the following question—"Suppose the population in Lower Canada should in ten years increase thirty-four per cent, while that of the other provinces increases only thirty per cent, would it not be unjust to Lower Canada that the number of its representatives should remain the same, should still be sity-five, while that of the other provinces will be increased; while in any case the number of representatives from the other provinces is not to be diminished unless their pouplation should diminish five per cent?" The resolutions do not prevent Lower Canada from having more than sixty-five representatives, if its population should increase faster than that of the other provinces. The French translation of these resolutions is erroneous, for it says that "for the purpose of determining the number of representatives from each province at the end of every decennial census, Lower Canada shall never have either more or less than sixty-five representatives," whereas the English version of the resolutions, which is the official version, says: "Lower Canada shall always be assigned sixty-five members." This does not mean that Lower Canada can never have more than sixty-five members, but that it can not have less than sixty-five members. That is, I think, a categorical answer to the hon. member's objection.

It is true that the British North America Act which came back to us from London said under section 51-1: "Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members" whereas the resolution passed by the various provinces mentioned: "Lower Canada (Quebec) shall always be assigned sixty-five members."

But if this difference in phrasing gave rise to any misunderstanding, we should refer to the official interpretation of the resolution, which really constitutes the pact entered into by the provinces, and which I quoted a minute ago.

It follows from these provisions of the British North America Act, therefore, that parliament has the power to increase representation at the House of Commons, according to the population of the various provinces, without infringing upon section 54-4, which is effective only in the case of a decrease in the representation of a province. Moreover, section 51-1 does not prevent Quebec from having a greater number of members.

Why did the government not raise the number of members to which Quebec is entitled, in view of its population, under these provisions? I do not know, this procedure might have given rise to legal interpretations, such as we have had before, endangering the principle of representation according to population or at least delaying its application.

[Mr. M. Raymond.]

In any case, since the government wish to resort to a constitutional amendment, I revert to the resolution as introduced.

The resolution, as I have pointed out, calls for an amendment to the British North America Act.

According to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the bill calls for the most radical change to our constitution since the passing of the confederation act in 1867.

If the change is as fundamental as he contends, we must conclude that the idea of the agreement was to give Quebec an inferior status to that of the other provinces, and that the party which he represents is resolved to perpetuate that subordinate position. In that case, it is high time to take action and to put an end to this situation.

But such is not, to my mind, the aim of this measure, which, far from violating the spirit of the agreement, tends to restore its proper meaning.

I have shown that the pact was designed to allot the number of representatives from the various provinces to the House of Commons proportionately to their population. This is the principle embodied in the resolution.

How should we proceed to amend the constitution? The British North America Act does not indicate any solution. We should fill in this gap.

The custom followed has been to petition the imperial parliament. Here is another remnant of colonialism which must disappear. It seems illogical that we should be required to amend our own constitution through a foreign country, after our rights as a sovereign nation have been recognized by the Statute of Westminster.

Up till now, in spite of various attempts to put an end to this anomaly, the dominion and the provinces have not yet succeeded in finding a method of procedure acceptable to all parties. Let us hope that this will not be too long delayed. For the time being, I will merely observe that the constitution should not be left simply to the mercy of a parliamentary majority which might alter its spirit.

It has been claimed that the provinces should have been consulted.

In the first place, I must say that I cannot accept the argument propounded by the Minister of Justice to the effect that this matter of representation in the House of Commons concerns the dominion exclusively and affects the provinces in no way whatsoever. To my mind, this problem takes on a dual aspect and has a bearing on both the dominion parliament and the provinces since it is in the interest of the latter to have in the federal sphere a fair and equitable representation. I believe the Minister of Justice would have been well advised if he had consulted their delegates at the recent interprovincial conference held at Ottawa or otherwise. The fact that the provinces were not approached, however, should not prevent a member of the dominion parliament from voicing his opinion on the merits of the resolution now before the house.

What is the object of this resolution? It seeks to right the injustice inflicted on the province of Quebec to an increasingly marked degree in violation of an agreement entered into by the provinces relating to representation on the basis of population. We are not concerned with passing legislation to amend the British North America Act; we have neither the right nor the power to do so, nor have the provinces, for that matter, since the B.N.A. Act is an imperial statute which the Imperial Parliament alone may alter. We are concerned only with expressing a recommendation with a view to righting an injustice which springs from the legal interpretation given a clause of the B.N.A. Act and distorting its spirit. This recommendation, according to the practice observed due to the lack of some other recognized procedure, is presented to the United Kingdom Parliament which is alone authorized to amend our constitution and grant our request.

As member for a Quebec riding affected by this situation, I deem it my right and duty to support this resolution. In expressing this attitude, I feel that I am carrying out the spirit set forth in the resolutions passed by the provinces which subscribed to the agreement; these resolutions, of which the B.N.A. Act is but the legal embodiment, intended the provinces to be represented in the Dominion Parliament in proportion to their population. We were to be on an equal footing, but we are not. Let us put things right.

As far as the provinces are concerned, nothing prevents them from voicing their opinion on the merits of this bill.

Those wishing to see this obvious unfairness rectified could express a recommendation identical with the one set forth in the resolution; they might even have done so earlier, since the injustice has been manifest for some thirty years at least. On the other hand, those wishing to perpetuate the injustice inflicted on Quebec could protest against the step taken in this instance by the dominion parliament and express their grievances to the only authority at present entitled to hear them, that is, the imperial parliament which is empowered to amend the text of our constitution and to render a final decree. I hope all the provinces will voice their opinion so that the people of Quebec may know what guarantee of fairness confederation holds in store for them in the future.

The hon. member for Lake Centre moved his amendment obviously with the intention of defeating the resolution.

The resolution would correct an injustice while the proposed amendment would perpetuate that same injustice. Such, in brief, is the situation.

According to the terms of the amendment, the government would be required to consult with the different provinces and could only proceed with the resolution upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations. Who shall decide whether the consultations gave satisfactory results and who would such results have to be satisfactory to? From the stand taken by the Progressive Conservative group, only one solution would be satisfactory to them and that would be to deprive Quebec forever of her right to a fair representation.

In fact, the amendment leads but to the maintenance of a status quo perpetuating an injustice.

Before closing my remarks, I wish to underline certain contradictions in the attitude of hon. members who have put forward the constitutional argument.

In 1943 the government moved an amendment to our constitution which seriously affected Quebec's right to a fair representation. Not only were the provinces not consulted, but the Quebec legislature protested unanimously.

Here is what Bernard K. Sandwell, editor of the Toronto weekly Saturday Night, wrote on August 7, 1943, regarding the consequences of such an amendment. I quote:

> The present amendment does very gravely affect the right of the people of Quebec, not as electors of the Quebec legislature, but as electors of the dominion parliament. It considerably curtails the proportion which their representation, as provided by the B.N.A. Act, bears to the representation of certain other provinces and therefore of the rest of Canada taken as a whole.

Neither the hon. member for Lake Centre nor the hon. member for Davenport tried to uphold the constitution; on the contrary, they both supported the amendment. Quebec was to be treated unfairly, so there was no question of consulting the provinces or of respecting their views; there seemed to be no principle involved and there was no need then to quote so extensively from the utterances of former statesmen.

To-day, three years later, we have before us a bill which would correct an injustice with regard to the representation from the province of Quebec, in accordance with the spirit of the confederation pact, and immediately there arises the question of principle. The text of the constitution must not be tampered with, even to give it its true meaning. I find with amazement that those same hon. members are also asking for a postponement of the redistribution until 1952, thus renewing the injustice of 1943—which would necessitate our amending the constitution—without consulting the provinces. Rarely have I witnessed a more glaring example of inconsistency.

As a parting remark, I submit to the consideration of those who so often speak of national unity, the following extract from an article on Quebec's representation, which appeared in the 15th of March edition of Maclean's Magazine. I quote:

Redistribution of parliamentary seats likely will be one task of parliament's new session. It will perhaps do a service to national unity if English-speaking Canadians realize that Quebec is underrepresented in parliament as we stand now, and some of the English-speaking provinces are overrepresented.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse) (Text): Mr. Speaker, there are two principles involved in the resolution before us. First, there is that of the representation in the House of Commons from each province, and then that of the amending of the British North America Act, which latter question leads us to the broader aspect of our whole constitutional set-up. Let us admit at once that the government had no alternative but to bring forward a measure providing for the redistribution of seats at this session or at least before the next general election. It was strange to hear some speakers urging us to follow strictly the provisions of the British North America Act and then immediately afterward suggesting that we should postpone redistribution until after the next census. If it was wise, and in my opinion it was, to postpone such a measure during the war, it is imperative that such a measure be introduced now.

When considering whether or not we approve the new basis of representation, we are faced with a principle that has been the subject of long deliberations since the advent of democratic parliamentary institutions, that is, representation by population. It is not by far the only method in countries where there are minorities, but there, as in more homogenous countries it has been recognized as the most equitable.

Representation by population was not provided in the Union Act of 1840. Article IV provided for the appointment of the legislative council and fixed the number of councillors at twenty or more, to be appointed by the governor, but did not provide that they should represent any district or section of the united province. Article XII provides:

And be it enacted that in the legislative assembly of the province of Canada, to be constituted as aforesaid, the parts of the said province which now constitute the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada respectively, shall, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, be represented by an equal number of representatives to be elected for the places and in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

In 1840 the population of Lower Canada was 716,670 and the population of Upper Canada was 432,159. It is to be noted that opinion on this question of representation has varied considerably. You see those who at one moment would have lost seats or proportionate influence by its application objecting strenuously to it, and the same people a few years later claiming loudly that they should get it when the position is reversed and they would benefit by it. As I stated a moment ago, in 1840 the population of Upper Canada was substantially less than that of Lower Canada, so that representation by population was opposed by Upper Canada and, despite the protests of Lower Canada, the representation of each section of the united province was set at an equal number; it was forty-two for each section from 1840 to 1854, when it was raised to sixty-five members for each. That arrangement lasted until confederation.

The census of 1851 showed that Upper Canada had gained considerably and had reached 952,000, while Lower Canada had at that time only 890,000. In 1855 a movement was started in Upper Canada claiming representation by population, and when the census of 1861 revealed that Lower Canada had only 1,100,000, while Upper Canada had 1,400,000, the movement gained momentum and the situation became acute as to the respective representation of the two sections of the united province. By that time Lower Canada also had reversed its stand. It was of the opinion that if equal representation has been considered good by Upper Canada when that section was less populous, it was equally good when the relation between the population of the two provinces had changed. When Sir John A. Macdonald reviewed the unsatisfactory conditions that marked the last years of the Union he had this to say:

The next mode suggested—

He was speaking of the difficulty of settling conditions as between the two provinces.

The next mode suggested was the granting of representation by population. Now we all know the manner in which that question was and is regarded by Lower Canada; that while in Upper Canada--

Mark these words:

—the desire and cry for it was daily augmenting, the resistance to it in Lower Canada was proportionately increasing in strength. Still, if some such means of relieving us from the sectional jealousies which existed between the two Canadas, if some such solution of the difficulties as confederation had not been found—

Mark again these words:

—the representation by population must eventually have been carried; no matter though it might have been felt in Lower Canada as being a breach of the Treaty of Union, no matter how much it might have been felt by the Lower Canadians that it would sacrifice their local interests, it is certain that in the progress of events representation by population would have been carried.

The fathers of confederation provided for it in article 17 of the resolutions of Quebec and in article 18 of the London resolutions in the following words:

The basis of representation in the House of Commons shall be population.

This principle was implemented by article 40 of the British North America Act which determined the respective number of members from the four provinces at the first election.

Article 51, as we all know, provides for readjustment and sets the rules that should govern it.

Previous speakers have wondered why Quebec was taken for the pivot province, and some nationalists in my province appear to have seen in that fact some sort of protection or guarantee for them. I would say this, that nowhere can be found in the documents or speeches or letters available on the question anything that would warrant ascribing that motive to those who drafted the resolutions. The idea that Quebec gained by being the pivot province is a myth. The interpretation of article 51(4) has even worked against the pivot province by doing away with true representation by population. The moment that true representation by population exists, every province is in the same relation to the others whether there is a pivot province or whatever is the device used to determine the representation. The method of amending the act constitutes the only way to prevent any dangers to the rights of any province. I will treat that later in the second part of my remarks.

As to the choice of Quebec as the pivot province, we have the declaration of Sir John A. Macdonald, made in February, 1865, when he explained to parliament the project of confederation. He said, during the course of his monumental address:

(We chose Quebec) that province being the best suited for the purpose, on account of the comparatively permanent character of its population, and from its having neither the largest nor least number of inhabitants.

That satisfies me as being as good a reason as any I know for choosing Quebec at that time as the pivot province. The method had been chosen to ensure representation by population and yet to avoid what Sir John A. Macdonald called "the danger of an inconvenient increase in the number of representatives on the recurrence of each decennial period." The method, as we know, was to divide the population of the province that had neither the largest nor the lowest number of inhabitants and whose population had a comparatively permanent character, and according to her population determine the representation of the other provinces.

Why the number 65, is another question that has been asked. Of course, as we see in article 40 of the British North America Act, Lower Canada in 1867 was divided into 65 electoral districts. One reason for selecting Quebec might be thus related to the method provided in the present resolution before the house in this respect, that both methods devised to ensure true representation by population had also the added aim of not reducing the existing number of members at the moment of the change. As we have seen Lower and Upper Canada has respectively 65 members. Representation by population would have been just as well ensured by keeping Ontario's members at 65, but then Quebec would have lost 14 members. To many people this would have been much less acceptacle than for them to keep what they had and for Ontario to gain 17 members. What we are doing to-day is the same process in reverse. If we had true representation by population and Quebec's representation were still fixed at 65, Ontario would have only 74 seats. By the method followed in the present measure Ontario not only does not lose but gains one seat, while Quebec gains eight. The present government by following this method shows the same regard for the feelings of Ontario that the fathers of confederation had for the feelings of Lower Canada in 1867. Instead of reverting to true representation by population by reducing the membership of certain provinces, it secures that result by a new device which does not reduce substantially the representation of any province but increases that of three.

An hon. member criticized increasing the membership of this house. May I remind him of Sir John A. Macdonald's words in this regard. But before I do so, let me point out that in the parliament under the Union there were 130 members for Lower and Upper Canada when their joint population was two and a half million. That would mean that we would now have 592 members in this house, a ridiculously high number. Taking the representation given in 1867 to Ontario and Quebec, 147 members, we would now have 669 members, which would have been an abnormally high number. But just the same Sir John A. Macdonald did not think the number of members set at the time was high but rather that it was not high enough. I might be permitted to quote him in this regard. He said:

> I was in favour of a larger house than 194, but was overruled. I was perhaps singular in the opinion, but I thought it would be well to commence with a larger representation in the lower branch. The arguments against this were that, in the first place, it would cause additional expense—

That is an argument that is being made to-day by his inheritors. He went on:

> —in the next place, that in a new country like this, we could not get a sufficient number of qualified men to be representatives. My reply was that the number is rapidly increasing as we increase in education and wealth; that a larger field would be open to political ambition by having a larger body of representatives; that by having numerous and smaller constituencies, more people would be interested in the working of the union, and that there would be a wider field for selection for leaders of governments and leaders of the parties. These are my individual sentiments,—which, perhaps, I have no right to expres here—but I was overruled, and we fixed on the number of one hundred and ninety-four, which no one will say is large or extensive, when it is considered that our present number in Canada alone is one hundred and thirty. The difference between one hundred and thirty and one hundred and ninety-four is not great, considering the large increase that will be made to our population when confederation is carried into effect.

That so-called "large increase" at the time meant a total population of four millions. Can it be said that, in order to bring a true measure of representation by population, it is extravagant to increase the membership by ten in order to avoid the necessity of reducing it by seven if we followed the old method foreseen by article 51?

Sir John A. Macdonald also stated:

> In the formation of the House of Commons the principle of representation by population has been provided for in a manner equally ingenious and simple.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the manner provided for in the measure now under study for the restoration of the true representation by population as intended by the fathers of confederation according to their numerous statements is also a manner equally "ingenious and simple", to use Sir John's words, that commends itself to the sense of justice and equity of all those who believe in true representation by population.

The fact, Mr. Speaker, that we have no definite provisions for amending our constitution or our so-called constitution is not conducive to a healthy state of affairs. That very lack constitutes a danger in this way, that it leaves open to argument the methods for amending and the conditions which must be followed. On certain amendments of the British North America Act, about certain clauses, any interpretation is as good as another, whether or not the parties to the pact are to be consulted. Previous speakers have enumerated the eight different amendments of the British North America Act since it came into force, and I am not going into that again; but on no occasions have the provinces been consulted, although it might be said that in 1907 the amendment provided for a revision of the scale of subsidies to the provinces, and that came after resolutions passed by the provincial conferences of 1887, 1902 and 1907. Yet on two occasions the question of representation in the Senate, on one occasion the representation in this House of Commons, were involved and the provinces were not consulted, although the measure changed in a sense the balance of sectional power. The act of 1886 authorized the parliament of Canada to make provision for the representation in the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, or in either of them, of any territories which for the time being form part of the dominion and are not included in any province thereof. The act of 1915, as has already been stated, raised the number of senators to ninety-six and increased the divisions of Canada from three to four, and provided for a different mode of representation for Prince Edward Island. To-day we have a resolution proposing a third amendment affecting the representation.

Having regard to the procedure followed in the past of not consulting the provinces on such a question, I ask myself, has parliament the power to deal with this matter of representation? To this I answer: in default of any definite rules on the matter in the British North America Act, and since the provinces are represented in this parliament, I consider that we have sufficient authority.

My second question is, does the redistribution of seats provide a true way of bringing about a fair measure of representation by population? To this I have already built up my case for the affirmative in the first part of my remarks.

My third question is, are we in this resolution carrying out the wishes of the founders of confederation? My answer is, not only are we doing that, but we are correcting a state of affairs which they had surely not foreseen when they enacted subsection 4 of section 51; that is, representation disproportionate to population given to the largest province.

Having thus satisfied my conscience, I shall vote against the amendment and for the resolution.

However, I am not willing to let the case rest with such a conclusion, and I feel that I must pursue farther the aspects of the question having regard to the future. Does this procedure which has been followed in the past, and which now I am about to support by my vote, guarantee a safe element of stability between federal and provincial rights, and is Canada's constitutional position consistent with its status of a sovereign state? These are two broad questions, and I have very little time to do them justice.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has quoted an impressive list of authorities to uphold the theory that the provinces ought to be consulted in a question of this kind. I have made a review of many of his quotations, and I am quite in agreement with them on one point, that it would be a most unhealthy practice for this house to go on forever assuming the right to press for amendments to the British North America Act without devising some way of obtaining the views of the parties who entered into the contract or the treaty whose terms are the Quebec resolutions. I do not intend to start an argument as to the nature of the agreement which led to the passing of the British North America Act. Surely the latter is not an instrument which should be continually amended at will by the federal parliament alone. I may be wrong, but I feel I am in good company when I say that.

Parliament appears to have been created by the act of a superior legislative body; yet this is not true, and the appearance results from a situation peculiar to our condition of colonies at the time of confederation, because the pact was the resultant of negotiations and agreements between equals at the time. The Act of Union of 1840 was de jure and de facto the mere expression of the will of the British parliament about the management of some turbulent colonies to which it was granting its first responsible government. Therefore it could have been amended by the constituting authority without any consultation with the colony. The British North America Act, however, was not imposed on Canada. It came as the result of long negotiations initiated by the colonies and taking place among themselves without the intervention or control of Great Britain. All the correspondence and the documents pertaining to these negotiations point to the origin from within and not to the imposition from without. They show the desire and anxiety of a group of enlightened men who were far from being geniuses but who were men of good will and courage, who understood that their respective and joint interests would be better served if they united together.

Speeches made at the time of confederation and the interpretations by all constitutional authorities lead to the conclusion that Macdonald and Cartier wanted to create a strong central government, while at the same time assigning to the provincial legislatures definite and enumerated powers. We do not have to go over all the reasons which made a federal union the most acceptable scheme to the colonies and the most practicable in the circumstances; but it is evident, not only by the text of the British North America Act but by the speches made by the fathers of confederation, that they wanted a strong Canada with the central government as the predominant factor. On the other hand, we know from Sir John A. Macdonald's own lips that not only Lower Canada but the maritime provinces would not have joined in a legislative union. By what has happened since then, and even very recently, we know that the provinces are jealous of their powers and prerogatives, not only as concerns personal and property rights or minority rights, but also on the other items over which they have been clearly given authority, not to mention those which they are trying to get by broader interpretations of article 92.

Mr. Speaker, hearing some provincial leaders, one might think the Canadian parliament is a foreign institution instead of being made up of representatives of all the provinces.

I am one of those who believe that Canada must emerge out of these differences a bigger and better country with strong national legislative institutions, and I believe that the interests of the nation are not well served by the constant expansion of provincial authority in fields where no civil rights are involved and no minority rights are endangered. Nevertheless, if we have a federal form of government as a result of agreement between different bodies such agreement should not be tampered with in matters of respective powers without some sort of consultation. Instead of arguing repeatedly in academic debates whether this method or the other should be used for amending the act of confederation, we should recognize once and for all that, since it does not contain in itself the necessary provisions for its amendment, we should take the necessary steps to provide for them by agreement between the dominion and the provinces.

There are three known methods of changing the constitution: First, by growth of convention or custom; second, by progressive judicial interpretation; finally, the method of formal amendments. Speaking before the special committee on the British North America Act sitting in 1935, the late Doctor O. D. Skelton, then under-secretary of state for external affairs, had this to say of these methods of changing the constitution which had been advocated as sufficient by the previous witness:

I think that, however useful and necessary these two methods may be, they are not adequate, they are not certain, they are not sufficiently rapid to meet rapidly changing needs. Courts may modify; they cannot replace them. They can revise earlier interpretations as new arguments, new points of view are presented, they can shift the dividing line in marginal cases, but there are barriers they cannot pass, definite assignments of power they cannot reallocate.

Other speakers have wondered why the resolutions of Quebec did not advocate any method or provide any method of amending the provisions therein contained. It may be said that in 1867 Canada was still a colony and the only authorized body to legislate on the shaping of our institutions was the British parliament. It had done so in 1771 and in 1840. Neither act provided for its own amendment. Britain alone could amend the act it had consented to pass at the time, and I suppose that with the mentality of the time it was not considered decent for a colony to tell the mother country how to act. That was the period when Sir John A. Macdonald, despite his strong expressions of Canadian nationalism, yet qualified meekly some of his statements, as follows:

Instead of looking upon us merely as a dependent colony England will have in us a friendly nation, a subordinate people.

And later on he said:

She—

Britain.

—will be able to look to the subordinate nations in alliance with her.

Well, we are no more a subordinate nation and the time has come for us to enact our own constitution. As Doctor Skelton also stated in 1935:

The Canadian constitution, or the British North America Act, which is the backbone of it, is unique in that we alone of all peoples do not know how our constitution is to be amended, are not clear as to what parties are to act in securing amendment, what procedure is to be followed, or what majorities are to be required.

Our sister dominions all have power to amend their constitution. In the case of South Africa, it passed a constitution act in 1935, which modifies the British act of 1909. New Zealand was constituted by an imperial act in 1852, and it had a system, federal only in name, with the power for parliament to alter from time to time any provisions of the act. The constitution of Australia dates from 1900, and provides specifically for amendments.

Referring to the changes between these constitutions and the British North America Act, Doctor Skelton stated:

A generation later, when Australia came to frame its constitution, and nine years later still when the South Africa Act was passed, a marked change in interimperial relations had come about and continued control by the United Kingdom was no longer conceivable. Neither dominion was prepared to leave future amendment to Westminster and definite provision was made for amendment at home. Canada was mainly responsible for the growth in interimperial relations which brought this about but its own constitution remained in form the vestige of an earlier day, while its younger sisters obtained up-to-date models.

We shall always have with us that problem of dominion and provincial powers; we shall always have these recurrent disputes about amending the act of confederation until we tackle the broader problem of enacting for Canada a truly national constitution. Professor F. R. Scott of McGill university stated lately:

The practice of going abroad for such national legislation seems too incongruous to survive for long.

But it is not only the awkwardness of the process that concerns us, which should justify a change in our constitutional set-up. Our status as an independent and sovereign state makes it imperative for us to remove once and for all that vestige of colonialism. Instead of sharing the fears of certain timid souls in my province for a truly Canadian constitution which should be amended according to definite rules, I have always believed it could easily be framed so as to protect essential rights.

Professor Angus of the university of British Columbia is of the same opinion when he states:

It is imperative to make provision for the formal process of constitutional amendment for the sake of protecting provincial governments against the insidious development of constitutional conventions of preserving a federal form of government.

There is another and most serious argument operating in favour of our having a constitution of our own and of our being able to amend it according to definite and sufficiently pliable lines or rules. It is Canada's present position in the field of international affairs. It is Canada's necessity at times to enter into treaties and conventions. More and more, the influence of economic conditions throughout the world will have a bearing on the maintenance of peace. More and more, the nations of the world will have to collaborate in economic and social matters. More and more, agreements will have to be negotiated to ensure and implement such collaboration.

At the present moment the social and economic council of the united nations is meeting in New York; its six committees are studying a multitude of problems whose effective solution would demand international collaboration and would demand, afterwards, the implementing of those resolutions by national legislation enacted by all the signatory members. Mr. A. G. B. Fisher, writing recently on "International economic collaboration and the economic and social council," aptly stated:

> Talk about cooperation, coordination, or collaboration is rather hollow if we are prepared to participate in international conferences and discussions only with the implicit reservation that we are not to be expected to make any substantial modification of policies which we have already decided to apply.

Canada, because of the position she has secured in international affairs, due to her potentialities, but mainly due to the role she has played in the economic and industrial field during the last war, cannot to-day remain indifferent to world trends in economic and social matters. She cannot shirk the responsibilities and obligations imposed upon her.

How would Canada be able to implement agreements she might enter into under our present constitutional set-up? Professor Angus of the university of British Columbia, in an article entitled, "The Canadian constitution and the united nations charter," states:

> The existing policies which me may have to modify may be either federal or provincial, and it will therefore be extremely serious if constitutional impediments continue to obstruct the conclusions or the implementation of agreements on economic and social matters.
> In short it is not safe for Canada to leave the constitutional position with respect to the implementation of treaties as it stands under the British North America Act. It is not easy to point to a solution which would maintain the fundamentally federal character of the Canadian constitution. If the process of treaty-making is easy, as it is in Canada, the power to implement any and every treaty would be tantamount to the power to amend the constitution at will and the exclusive legislative powers of the provinces would exist merely on sufferance.
> If treaty-making were difficult, as it would be apt to be if the consent of a large proportion of the provinces were required, then the progress of international cooperation would be blocked at the outset. It would, therefore, not meet the difficulty if the Canadian government were to be given full power to enact legislation designed to implement Canadian treaties but were required to secure ratification of these treaties by some process designed to protect the provinces.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have two objects to attain: first, do our share of the work to bring about better international cooperation in the economic and social field; and, second, do it in such a way as not to affect the rights of the provinces as attributed to them under article 92, or so as to secure an understanding with them on such matters as regards our multilateral international agreements.

The federal government, of course, can enter into a treaty with any foreign power; but, on the other hand, it cannot under the British North America Act do things or pass laws that are within the legislative competence of the provinces.

At the present time we have no machinery devised to enable us to correct this situation. If we assumed these rights by a process similar to the one we are using in the present instance, our form of government would ultimately lose its federal aspect. On the other hand, if we had to secure approval or ratification in each and every case through the medium of dominion-provincial conferences, the processes would be too clumsy and too slow. Such situations could be foreseen in the drafting of a Canadian constitution and the proper machinery provided for amending it.

A constitution is the basic and most important feature of legislation that any country may enact. A constitution is the foundation-stone of a state; it is the compound of general principles that govern the political life of a country. As Professor Mirkine-Guetzevitch says in his book entitled, "The Constitution of New Europe":

> The constitution of each state is always the result of a compromise between existing political traditions and the general principles of constitutional law, and its elaboration and drafting are of the competence of juridical science. Constitutional law is not something immovable; it is modified by the march of ideas and of political events.

The famous Sieyes said at the time of the French revolution:

> The positive laws that can emanate only from the will of the nation are the constitutional laws. These are called fundamental, not in the sense that they may become independent of the national will, but because the bodies created by them acting according to them cannot touch them. The constitution is not the work of the constituted but of the constituent power.

What body, then, in Canada should be the constituting authority? I wish to quote here a brief extract of the evidence given by Doctor Beauchesne, K.C., C.M.G., LL.D., before the committee that sat in 1935. Doctor Beauchesne said:

> Drafting a constitution is a serious matter, particularly in a federated country like Canada. Suggestions have to be weighed with calm deliberation and reconciled with the needs of the nation. Some plan embracing the whole life of the nation has to be accepted. Geography, natural resources, avenues of trade, transportation, social legislation and racial harmony have to be considered. It is idle to think that this can be done in the same formal way as an amendment to a public statute. The new constitution must leave nobody with a grievance. A spirit of conciliation should predominate. For these reasons, the task must be entrusted to an independent body in which all the elements of the country will be represented. I, therefore, beg to suggest an imposing constituent assembly formed of eminent men coming from all parts of Canada. Provincial conferences, attended by a few ministers meeting behind closed doors, would hardly satisfy public opinion. The debate should be public. I submit that a constituent assembly, chosen by the provincial legislatures and by the House of Commons, representing the main political parties and groups in proportion to the votes given at the last general elections, should meet in session and discuss the constitution from all its angles.

Later on, Doctor Beauchesne said:

The number of members representing the dominion and each province would be equal to one-fourth of the membership of all those legislative bodies in Canada.

Then he gave a suggestion that the British North America Act should be transformed into a constitution which would meet the requirements of present conditions but still preserving the minority rights guaranteed by the said act. Then he went on to state that:

Once a constitution has been passed by the constituent assembly, it should be adopted by each province and by the dominion, but before coming into force it should receive the assent of His Majesty.

The British North America Act should be the basis of the new constitution. Some articles which are now spent could be well left out. A method of amendment should be provided, and special clauses should deal with the powers of the federal parliament in relation to the implementing of multilateral international agreements.

May I at this point commend the reading by everyone who is interested in our constitutional problems a book entitled, "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty" by Doctor Maurice Ollivier, K.C., LL.D., which has already been quoted by the hon. member for Lake Centre. It is a most remarkable book. Doctor Ollivier also made a splendid contribution to this subject when he appeared before the special committee of 1935, and his whole evidence is food for thought.

I do not want to enter into the details of the procedure suggested by Doctor Ollivier. The hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) has already touched on one point in the good speech he made last Thursday, namely, the order in which the constitution should cover the different items of the British North America Act. The procedure for amendment of the different articles of the constitution, would also demand longer time than I have at my disposal, but I should like to quote the following from Doctor Ollivier's book:

The fundamental principle, which is at the basis of social, political and parliamentary institutions of British democracy, is that the state exists to serve the individual and in doing so that it serve the general interest, not only of the nation, but of all nations. The state should take note of the aspirations and rights of its different parts, in the present instance, of the provinces, but the provinces themselves should in their turn be careful not to destroy the unity which the fathers of confederation tried to create.

Here, as in England, political liberty is the goal of the constitution, for rulers are created for the benefit of the people and not people for the benefit of the rulers. We should, therefore, bend our efforts to maintain in this country popular government, individual liberty and social justice as the only means capable of assuring to all, an equal chance to work and to profit from the better life that comes with material progress, in other words, of guaranteeing to all, freedom from want and freedom from fear, remembering that economic and political nationalism has always, in the past, created racial strife and world disasters.

In line with these words, I personally would include in the constitution not only the provisions of the British North America Act but such an act as was suggested sometime ago by the hon. member for Lake Centre, namely, a bill of rights, which should be part of our constitution.

In conclusion, may I say that Canada has reached the adult stage. She has emerged from the war as one of the very few creditor nations. She is now the third largest trader in the world. She has a role to play in the after-war commensurate with her new stature. She has outgrown her outmoded, colonial style constitution, and it is time for her to assert her national will and to take her place among those nations of the world which have elaborated constitutional monuments as their basic law. Canada owes it to herself to nominate a constituent assembly and to draft a new constitution. How fitting it would be if the party which has always been to the forefront in the enactment of forward and emancipated measures and the Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has attached his name to so many progressive moves and who has for longer than anyone led our country through war and peace with such ability, should initiate the necessary steps to give the people of Canada a long-awaited Canadian constitution.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the motion which the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has brought before the house entails the consideration of at least two questions: that of giving adequate and fair representation to the people of each of the nine provinces, and that of determining if an amendment of the British North America Act is necessary to bring about the desired equality of representation. In the latter hypothesis I am willing to endorse what has been said by the hon. member who immediately preceded me, who reiterated what is known to every hon. member, namely, that unlike the constitution of the United States and those of the other members of the British commonwealth, our constitution is without any specific means of amendment. An attempt to amend a document, especially a constitution, when no specific method is provided for carrying it out, is a perilous undertaking.

At this juncture I should like to say to the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) that any reluctance on the part of the party to which I owe allegiance to entrust the right to amend the constitution to the whim of a party should not be interpreted as direct opposition to rectifying the inequality of representation at present existing between the different provinces. I can assure the hon. gentleman that if he allows the generosity which guides his steps in so many walks of life to dictate his appraisal of his opponents he will come to the conclusion that there may be sound and salutary reasons for objecting to the present suggested means of amending the constitution, reasons in fact quite other than that of desiring to retard the hour of equality of representation within the dominion of the province of which we are both citizens and devoted sons.

On motion of Mr. Hackett the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 10.57 p.m.

Wednesday, June 12, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

COAL

UNITED STATES EMBARGO—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the United States embargo placed on coal and fuel on the great lakes, and the grave peril of Canadian homes being without any supply during next fall and winter, and as to the announcement on June 11 by the Ore and Coal Exchange of Cleveland of said embargo in view of the Canadian lake shipping strike.

This is a very grave emergency, as grave as in 1917. A year ago we had a coal pile of 800,000 tons in the ship channel in my constituency. On Sunday I visited it and it was down to 10,000 or 12,000 tons, and the coal piles of other municipalities are down in about the same proportion.

I understand that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) is away today. I do not wish to interfere with the business of the house, but perhaps I might be allowed to speak for three or four minutes. I am doubtful, however, whether in that case the discussion could be revived to-morrow because of standing order 31(6)(c). But as there is a grave national emergency, the worst in our history, I suggest that I might be allowed to speak for a few minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has asked for leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the United States embargo placed on coal and fuel on the great lakes, and the grave peril of Canadian homes being without any supply during next fall and winter—I emphasize those words, "during next fall and winter"—and as to the announcement on June 11 by the Ore and Coal Exchange of Cleveland of said embargo in view of the Canadian lake shipping strike.

I wish to make a comment, for the benefit of the house more especially, on one point made by the hon. gentleman on the question of urgency. Urgency within the meaning of the rule is not a question whether a matter proposed to be discussed is of urgent importance. It may be of infinitely urgent importance to those affected. The question is whether it is urgent within the meaning of citation 239, Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms; in other words whether it is a matter of such urgency that harm would be caused to the public interest if by the ordinary opportunity provided by the rules of the house an hon. member were not able to bring the subject before the house soon enough. In the present case I am of the opinion that there is no urgency to adjourn the house today to discuss the subject, because the minister of the department concerned is not in the house this afternoon. Consequently I would rule the motion of the hon. gentleman out of order.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, in reply I would like to say that we get our coal very largely from lake Erie ports, from Buffalo, Cleveland and others, and as a result the situation of our people is a matter of great urgency.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman, if there is no other opportunity to discuss the matter, should wait until the minister is back in the house.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the rules, Mr. Speaker, you have the responsibility of deciding whether a matter is urgent or not. Surely, in view of the condition prevailing in Toronto, and all Canada, the urgency is more important than adherence to some rule made three hundred years ago, particularly in view of some of the secondary subjects with which we have dealt since the beginning of the session.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have explained why in my opinion the motion of the hon. gentleman is out of order, and I would ask that the house proceed with its business.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand from Your Honour's statement that I may bring the matter up to-morrow when the minister returns. That is satisfactory to me.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

RADIO BROADCASTING—CLASS 1-A WAVE LENGTHS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. On what date was it decided that class 1-A wave lengths now being used by privately-owned broadcasting stations would be reserved for the ultimate use of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

2. Were the privately-owned stations operating on such wave lengths advised of this decision? If so, when?

3. Do licences of such private stations carry an endorsation to that effect? If so, since when?

Mr. McILRAITH:

In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned:

1. April 16, 1937.

2 and 3. When the North American regional broadcasting agreement came into force on March 29, 1941, three of the six class 1-A channels assigned thereunder to Canada were already in use by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The remaining three class 1-A channels were assigned provisionally to station CFRB at Toronto, station CKY at Winnipeg, and station CFCN at Calgary.

The licences issued for these stations for the fiscal year 1941-42, which were dated April 1, 1941, and were forwarded to the respective licensees under covering letters dated May 15, 1941, bore the following endorsation:

"This frequency is assigned subject to the provisions of regulation 15 of part II of the radio regulations issued by the minister in accordance with section 4 of the Radio Act, 1938."

Regulation 15 provides as follows:

"The allotment of a frequency or frequencies to any station does not confer a monopoly of the use of such frequency or frequencies, nor shall a licence be construed as conferring any right or privilege in respect of such frequency or frequencies."

Licences issued for these stations for the fiscal years 1942-43, 1943-44, and 1944-45 carried the same endorsation.

Licences for these stations dated April 1, 1945, bore the following endorsation:

"The frequency of ....Kc/s per second being a clear channel is definitely reserved for the national system of broadcasting and this station is authorized to use this frequency provisionally until such time as it may be required for and assigned to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation."

WARTIME HOUSING—YORKTON, SASK.

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What different types of houses are being built in the city of Yorkton by Wartime Housing Corporation?

2. How many of each different type will be built under the present contract?

3. What will be the cost to the government of each type of house?

4. How many of these houses are being built with basements?

5. Has any arrangement been made whereby these houses will be exempted from municipal taxation?

6. If so, for what period of time?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Three types: 4-room, 5-room and 6-room houses.

2. Type

	Number of houses
	Project No. 1	Project No. 2
4-room	23	9
5-room	21	12
6-room	6	4
	50	25

3. Type

	Estimated unit price
	Project No. 1	Project No. 2
4-room	$3,671 44	$4,090 48
5-room	4,720 42	5,250 57
6-room	4,812 95	5,360 16

4. None.

5. These houses are the property of His Majesty the King in the right of Canada and therefore exempt from taxation. Under agreement between the municipality and Wartime Housing Limited, however, the latter agrees to make annual payments in lieu of taxes of $24 for each 2-bedroom house and $30 for every house with more than 2 bedrooms; also $1 per house per annum for street lighting.

6. For project No. 1, period is to March 31, 1960; for project No. 2, period is to October 31, 1961. Both projects numbers 1 and 2 are subject to the following provision made in the escalator clause:

"Should the cost of construction of each house exceed or be less than $4,000 the period provided in the agreement shall be increased or decreased by one year for each full amount of $200 by which the said cost exceeds or it lessens $4,000."

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—WORK IN SOUTH AMERICA

Mr. FULTON:

1. Did the National Film Board send a party including a M. Andre de Tonnancour to South America to make a film?
2. If so, how many were in the party and what are their names and their duties for that trip?
3. What is the approximate mileage to be covered, and expected duration of the trip?
4. What is the estimated cost of this trip, and of the film when it is completed exclusive of salaries of those who are engaged in making it but including any expense accounts arising by virtue of the voyage?

Mr. CLAXTON: The information asked for is as follows:

1, 2, 3 and 4. No. Arrangements are under consideration to send a cameraman, M. Andre de Tonnancour, on a 7,000 mile trip in a schooner which is sailing from Gaspe to Rio de Janeiro at an expense of $125 per week for not more than 20 weeks. This would result in a coloured film on the voyage and places visited at a cost of approximately $6,500, besides several thousand additional feet for use in future films for the cost of film stock and processing.

GOVERNMENT COMPANIES

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. What are the names of all government companies?
2. When was each incorporated?
3. What are the powers of each?
4. Who are their directors and senior officers?
5. What was in each case the cost of operation or profit or loss during the last year of record?
6. Are any of these companies dormant at the present time?

Mr. McILRAITH: I would point out that the answers to parts 1, 2, 3, 4 and 6 are to be found in order for return No. 49 which was tabled as sessional paper No. 136 on March 15 of this year. I think the full information will be found in that order for return. As to part 5, the information is in the public accounts report tabled in the house. I suggest that the question be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Parts 1, 2, 3 and 4, answered.

Mr. JACKMAN: Numbers 5 and 6 are unanswered, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McILRAITH: It is answered.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, what is the answer?

Mr. McILRAITH: The answers to 1, 2, 3, 4 and 6 are contained in sessional paper 136, tabled in the house on March 15, 1946. The answer to part 5 will be found in the public accounts.

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know the names of all the government companies, and I ask the minister to supply the information. Furthermore, I might say to the house that we do not have secretarial help for all the digging that we would like to do, and we are entitled to some help from government departments in answer to reasonable questions.

Mr. GRAYDON: These things are all buried, and the hon. member wants them exhumed.

[Later:]

Mr. JACKMAN: With reference to the question standing in my name, Mr. Speaker, I did not catch what your final ruling was on parts 5 and 6. Are they answered or do they stand?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question has been answered.

Mr. GRAYDON: Officially answered; unofficially not answered.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is impossible for me—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The matter is not debatable.

GRAIN—ASSISTANCE TO ARGENTINA

Mr. ARGUE:

1. Has the Canadian government, since 1939, given assistance in any form to the government of Argentina, or to any persons or companies located in the Argentine, for the purpose of improving the production, handling, grading, shipping, storing or milling of grains in the Argentine?
2. If so, in what way was the assistance given?
3. What was the cost of such assistance in each year since 1939?
4. What benefits will Canada receive from the provision of such assistance?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have had inquiries made at several of the departments which might be concerned in what is referred to, and the information I have obtained is that the only assistance, if it can be called assistance, which was made available is five or six samples, each of four or five pounds of wheat not more than half a bushel in all which were delivered in 1945 to Doctor Vivot, who was then the ambassador here, and that that was done as a usual courtesy and on the understanding that it was the kind of thing which is reciprocal. If the hon. member has in mind anything further and can give us any indication which would be helpful in making searches, I will have further searches made, but from what I have been able to learn, that is the only assistance which was given to Argentina in connection with any of the matters referred to.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member (Mr. Argue) is not in his seat this afternoon, and I suggest that the question stand so that the hon. member may give the information to the minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: The information is on the record.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member will see the answer, and if he has further indications he can give us we will be glad to have them followed up.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK LOANS

Mr. THATCHER:

1. How many loans have been made to date by the Industrial Development Bank since its inception in each of the three prairie provinces?
2. What is the total dollar value of such loans made in each of these provinces?
3. Have any new manufacturing enterprises been started in the above provinces, through making loans from the Industrial Development Bank?
4. If so, how many, and what was the nature of each?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1 and 2. The Industrial Development bank is not a branch of the dominion government but a subsidiary of the Bank of Canada.

Section 29(1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act requires that "The bank shall, within twenty-one days following the end of each calendar month, make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance in such form as he may prescribe, a statement of its assets and liabilities at the close of business on the last day of the preceding month." This statement as at April 30, 1946, appeared in the Canada Gazette of May 18, 1946, and showed Loans and Investments (excluding dominion government securities) at $3,174,342.64.

In addition, section 29(2) provides that "The bank shall make up and transmit to the Minister of Finance at least once in its fiscal year or more frequently if so directed by the minister, in such form as he may prescribe, a classification of loans and investments and of the loans guaranteed by it." This return, tabled in the House of Commons on December 6, 1945, showed that on September 30, 1945, there were 80 authorized credits on the books of the bank totalling $3,198,050, of which $871,752 was outstanding as shown by the balance sheet.

The classification of loans and investments by provinces at September 30, 1945, was shown by this return as follows:

	Authorized	Outstanding
Prince Edward Island ..	$	$
Nova Scotia	115,000
New Brunswick	200,000	66,064
Quebec	1,052,500	459,912
Ontario	1,192,550	212,189
Manitoba	335,000	105,000
Saskatchewan	30,000	17,100
Alberta	135,500
British Columbia and Territories	137,500	11,487
	$3,198,050	$871,752

3. Not of government record.
4. Answered by No. 3.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, WINNIPEG

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. On what date did the dispute between the typographical union and the newspaper publishers in Winnipeg start?
2. On what date was the department made cognizant of the dispute?
3. On what date was Mr. Justice Major appointed as a commissioner to investigate the dispute?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. The stoppage of work affecting the international typographical union and the Winnipeg Tribune and Free Press commenced on November 8, 1945, being the culmination of a dispute which had been developing for some weeks previously because of failure to agree on the terms of a new agreement to replace one which had expired September 30, 1945.

2. On October 31 my department received information that a dispute existed and that a strike was possible. On November 1, the publishers of the two newspapers requested the intervention of either a conciliation officer or an industrial disputes inquiry commission. A conciliation officer was appointed on November 2.

3. Mr. Justice Major was appointed a commission on November 9.

WAR EXPENDITURES AND REVENUE

Mr. POULIOT:

Referring to the statement of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance at page 1881 of Hansard, May 27, 1946, was the difference of $2,557,559,903 between the war debt until March 31, 1945, and the total war revenue until February 28. 1946, on one hand, and the non-war expenditures and war appropriations from September 1, 1939, to February 28, 1946, on the other, a surplus?

Mr. MAYHEW: No, a surplus is an excess of revenues over expenditures. In the period September 1, 1939 to February 28, 1946, total expenditures of the government were $22,069,226,313, and total revenues were $12,681,719,279. resulting in a deficit of $9,387,507,034.

The figure of $2,557,559,903 which is the difference between the increase in total debt from September 1, 1939 to March 31, 1945, together with revenues in the period September 1, 1939 to February 28, 1946, on the one hand, and total expenditures in the period September 1, 1939 to February 28, 1946, on the other, represents an excess of receipts (including borrowings) over expenditures. This excess would be reflected in the books of the government by increases under various accounts classified as active assets (cash, loans, investments, etc.)

RADIO BROADCASTING

ENFORCEMENT OF REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I sent to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply notice of a question which perhaps I may address to his parliamentary assistant. In order that the standing committee on radio broadcasting may inquire fully into the extent to which the regulations under the Radio Act (1938) are enforced, will the minister make available to the committee information from licencees of stations for the year 1945 as outlined in regulation 31(A) (d), approved by the minister and dated June 23, 1943?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the hon. member is in order in putting to the minister questions that should be asked in the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: I suggest that this question must be asked of the minister before the information necessary for the committee can be obtained, and that is why I chose this way of putting it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is out of order. If there are any questions to be asked, they should be asked by the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I have given notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STEEL INDUSTRY—APPOINTMENT OF INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Yesterday, in reply to a question from the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), I stated that I hoped to be able to make an announcement regarding the appointment of a commissioner in the steel industry to investigate differences between the Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, Sydney, Nova Scotia, the Steel Company of Canada Limited, Hamilton, Ontario and the Algoma Steel Corporation, Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, and their employees, represented by the united steelworkers of Canada.

I am pleased to announce, with the concurrence of the Ministers of Labour of Ontario and Nova Scotia, the appointment of the Hon. Mr. Justice W. D. Roach, of the Ontario Appeal Court, an industrial disputes inquiry commission, under the provisions of section 8 of P.C. 4020.

The commissioner, who expects to begin the inquiry very shortly, is required to investigate the dispute and to endeavour to bring about a settlement of the matters at issue, failing which, he is to report to me with his recommendations.

Mr. Justice Roach has a very successful record in dealing with industrial relations problems. Recently he was chairman of the conciliation board which effected a settlement in the dispute betwen the International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited and the mine, mill and smelter workers' union.

Mr. CHURCH: Has the government any new legislation to control these strikes in the public interest? Does it intend to bring down any legislation? There is no use playing with the question any longer. They have not done so in Washington; action has been taken there to protect the consumer and get results.

Mr. MITCHELL: Our record with reference to strikes is probably better than that of any other country in the world where freedom exists. My Conservative friends smile. I do not know whether they like strikes; that is for them to say. But you cannot have a perfect record, and I believe that with the machinery we have, given cooperation on both sides, there is no valid reason at the moment for any dispute to exist in the dominion. If my hon. friend has any better machinery, I wish he would give it to me. Those are the people we want.

Mr. CHURCH: I appreciate the fact that the minister has done quite a bit, but I suggest that he bring in more modern and efficient legislation to cover these strikes, in the interests of the suffering public.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AS TO RULES FOR READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to effect an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, in considering the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the readjustment required by the British North America Act, it is necessary to consider the censuses that have been taken, and it is enlightening to have the information which those censuses have revealed, indicating what the population of each of the provinces has been, and the ebb and flow of population from one province to another. To assist the members of this house and provide them with the necessary information—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but there is so much noise in the house that it is impossible to follow him.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It is all behind the curtains.

Mr. HACKETT: It is not the noise in the house, may it please Your Honour; it is the noise behind the curtains that is a little disturbing. I was about to say that this information has been compiled by the Department of Trade and Commerce and has been distributed to members. It enables them to proceed, in the light of easily accessible information, to the work before them. This document, styled "Bulletin No. A-10, population of Canada, 1941 by provinces, electoral districts and sub-districts, with introduction on representation in the House of Commons", contains the following useful table at page 7:

Representation in the House of Commons by Provinces and Territories, as at the commencement of each Parliament from 1867 to 1940(2)

Députation à la Chambre des Communes, par Provinces et Territoires, au commencement de chaque Parlement de 1867 à 1940 (2)

Provinces	1867	1872	1874	1878	1882	1887	1891	1896	1900	1904	1908	1911	1917	1921	(1) 1925	(2) 1935
Ontario	82	88	88	88	92	92	92	92	92	86	86	86	82	82	82	82
Quebec	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65	65
Nova Scotia	19	21	21	21	21	21	21	20	20	18	18	18	16	16	14	12
New Brunswick	15	16	16	16	16	16	16	14	14	13	13	13	11	11	11	10
Manitoba	–	4	4	4	5	5	5	7	7	10	10	10	15	15	17	17
British Columbia	–	6	6	6	6	6	6	6	6	7	7	7	13	13	14	16
Prince Edward Island	–	–	6	6	6	6	6	5	5	4	4	4	4	4	4	4
Saskatchewan	–	–	–	–	–	4	4	4	4	10	10	10	16	16	21	21
Alberta	–	–	–	–	–						7	7	12	12	16	17
Yukon	–	–	–	–	–	–	–	–	–	1	1	1	1	1	1	1

The table shows that at the time of confederation the four provinces that went into confederation in 1867 were allotted respectively: Ontario, 82 seats; Ontario has the same number to-day. Quebec, 65; Quebec has the same number to-day. Nova Scotia, 19; It has 12 to-day. New Brunswick 15; it has 10 to-day by reason of the amendment to the B.N.A. Act which was enacted in 1915 and which provided that at no time should representation in this house of any province be less in number than its representation in the senate. Therefore I am not dealing with the exception to representation by population which was created by that amendment to the British North America Act, which was passed in 1915.

I should like to open up a parenthesis here and say that that amendment was enacted after a prolonged conference with all of the provinces. Their representatives came to Ottawa and various methods of amending the act were discussed. At that time there was not only a great Canadian leading the government, but a man who had at all times the interest of his native maritimes, I was going to say predominant, in his mind and ever present in his heart. Therefore it can be said, it must be said—the records show it—that in 1915 when that amendment was made, all the provinces concurred in it.

I now turn to the motion made by the minister. I must say that the suggestion contained in it is, like nearly everything that the minister does, complete and well-reasoned. If I were to find fault with it as a scheme it would be because of its rigidity. It has not that elasticity which allows for growth and change, which the original document possesses. One of the recitals of the motion of the minister is:

> And whereas the effect of the aforesaid provisions has not been satisfactory in that proportionate representation of the provinces according to population has not been maintained.

I am going to argue that proportionate representation has not been maintained, but that was not because the act was defective, it was either because those who were administering it failed to comprehend its full purport, or those whose duty it was to criticize the action of government were not as alert as an opposition should be.

I turn now to the section itself, and I would ask hon. gentlemen to follow me while I read it, because I submit that its interpretation means necessarily that no amendment need be made to the act in order to reestablish representation by population in all the provinces other than the maritimes. Section 51 reads as follows:

> On the completion of the census in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-one, and of each subsequent decennial census, the representation of the four provinces shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules:
> (1) Quebec shall have the fixed number of sixty-five members;
> (2) There shall be assigned to each of the other provinces such a number of members as will bear the same proportion to the number of its population (ascertained at such census) as the number sixty-five bears to the number of the population of Quebec (so ascertained).

I shall not read subsection 3; it merely says that if the fraction is less than one-half, it is not counted; if it is more than one-half, it is counted as a whole number.

Subsection 4 is the one which we have to interpret; it reads as follows:

(4) On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards.

I submit that this subsection means that there shall not be any reduction in the representation of any province unless the fraction representing its quota of the population of Canada is reduced by five per cent. Let me take an example. Let us assume that in 1931 the population of this dominion was ten millions. Let us assume that the population of British Columbia was three millions. The proportion of the population of British Columbia would be thirty per cent. It would have thirty per cent of the population of the dominion; and if on that proportion it had twenty members it would hold those twenty members until when?—until that thirty per cent was reduced by five per cent. Five per cent of thirty per cent is one and a half per cent; therefore the representation of British Columbia in this house would remain at twenty members until its proportion of the population was reduced to 28½ per cent. That is the meaning of this section. I submit that it can mean nothing else. People have wondered why it was inserted. The reason for which it was inserted is clear to me. The reason was that it was not the intent, it was not the desire, of the fathers of confederation that changes should be made in representation every time that there was the slightest shift in population. The fathers of confederation said that once an allotment of a specific number of members had been made to a province it should keep that number until there was a substantial change in the proportion or the fraction of the whole population of Canada represented by the population of the province in question. That is simple; it is reasonable, it seems to me almost beyond dispute.

Mr. KNOWLES: Would the hon. member permit a question, to clarify his illustration? In the illustration which he used, if the province in question were to lose just one per cent in three successive decades, would it then lose any of its members?

[Mr. Hackett.]

Mr. CHURCH: That is irrelevant.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is very much to the point.

Mr. HACKETT: I thank the hon. gentleman for asking me the question. I do not wish him to think I am discourteous. I shall answer it, but I shall answer it a little later.

I am going to ask the house to bear with me while I read subsection 4 from the French version of the act.

En procédant à une répartition, on ne réduira pas le nombre des députés d'une province...

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the hon. member what he is reading from now?

Mr. HACKETT: I am reading from the British North America Act, the French version.

Mr. BRACKEN: Not the document he previously referred to?

Mr. HACKETT: I am reading from "Acte de l'Amérique du Nord britannique et lois connexes" from 1867 to 1944. I am reading subsection 4 of section 51.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If the hon. member will permit a question, does he suggest that the version issued in French can have any effect upon the construction of the act? My understanding was that the act was passed by the imperial parliament in English only, and that there is no official text in anything but the English language; that any translation which may have been made for convenience was the best effort of the translator to reproduce the meaning of the English text. Does the hon. member agree with that?

Mr. HACKETT: I am prone to agree with almost any proposition of law that may be advanced by the right hon. gentleman, but I am going to say to him, with the greatest respect, that I shall deal with that particular problem in a moment. At present I should like to read the French text. Subsection 4 of section 51 of the French text is in these terms:

(Translation):

On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced . . .

On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained at the then latest census to be diminished by one-twentieth part or upwards:

(Text): There we have it thrown into even bolder relief that what determines the right of a province to more members, or what determines the right of other provinces to see a certain province reduced in membership, is a comparison. There is no dispute that one side of the comparison is the last census, that of 1941; but how far back must we go? Here I come to the question put to me a moment ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). You go back as far as it is necessary to go to get to the point where, to use the French expression, "lors de l'attribution précédente des sièges à la province" and in the English version, "to the last preceding readjustment of the number of members for the province." I submit that you must go back to the last time the members were reallocated to the province; not to the last census but to the time the twenty members were allocated to British Columbia, in the example I gave a few minutes ago. Let us assume that British Columbia had twenty members assigned to it by the census of 1911; and again to answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, let us assume that British Columbia had lost one and a half per cent in one decennial period and two and a half per cent in another decennial period, and that finally in the third it lost a fraction sufficient to make the total five per cent. Then in my submission the fourth subsection of section 51 of the act would come into play and the reduction in number of members must follow.

Mr. KNOWLES: Has it worked that way in case of Ontario?

Mr. HACKETT: It has not worked that way, and that is just my complaint. A few moments ago I said I considered that the sub-section is beyond criticism. I wish I could say as much of those who had to do with its operation. I submit that the act itself provides for representation by population, with certain exceptions which we are not discussing at the moment; I say to the minister that under the act this house should be reduced to 230 members, and that this may be done by observing the text of section 51, without amending it in any respect whatsoever. The minister has put on record the number of members who would be allotted to the different provinces if the act were followed, but I do not agree with him when he gives the province of Ontario 82 members. It is my suggestion that the province of Ontario is entitled only to 74 members; and again to answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, it was entitled to 74 members and no more at the last redistribution.

Here someone may say to me, "Well, you were in the house at that time. What did you do about it?" I was in the house; like the majority of those who sit opposite I sat on a back bench, and I had just about as much to do with the policies of the country as they have at the present time. Now let me say this. I have read the debates carefully. Right Hon. Mr. Bennett spoke of a reduction of one-twentieth in population as being the requisite to the application of subsection 4. Mr. King sat opposite, and he was much more concerned in working parishes and townships into electoral divisions and matters of that kind than with the principle of readjustment of the number of members among provinces. Mr. King acquiesced. That good and honourable gentleman who has gone to his reward, Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, said, "I wonder why this subsection 4 was put in. I can find no reason for it. I think it should be deleted." At that time nobody referred to the Prince Edward Island case, which I am going to discuss. Possibly it required the deep knowledge of the law and the intimate acquaintance with the decisions of the privy council which is possessed by the right hon. Minister of Justice to bring that to the assistance of his government; but at no time until he came on the horizon was it mentioned. In November, 1932, they seem to have proceeded on the basis that because the province of Ontario had not lost five per cent of its population, this subsection did not apply.

Mr. KNOWLES: They proceeded on the assumption that Ontario had not lost that percentage in the ten-year period.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, and that was all they considered; the ten-year period. I went to the trouble of looking up the bill. In those days bills contained a great deal of information on the fly-leaf. There I found set out the article of the British North America Act and a great deal of other information. Nothing was said about the Prince Edward Island judgment, but I do find on turning to the census of Canada, volume 2, at page 3, that in 1911 the proportion of the population of Ontario to the whole population of Canada was 35·07.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The second volume of which census?

Mr. HACKETT: The census of 1941. The representation of Ontario in this house could not be reduced under the section of the act I have read, unless that proportion or percentage of 35·07 per cent was reduced by one-twentieth, or five per cent. If one takes his pencil in hand, he will find that five per cent of 35·07 per cent, which was the fraction of Canada's population which represented the population of Ontario in 1911, amounts to 1·75 per cent. If he subtracts 1·75 per cent from 35·07 per cent he will find that the fraction is 33·31 per cent, and that Ontario was entitled to eighty-two members until the proportion of its population was reduced to 33·31 per cent. In 1931, according to the same book and the same page, it was reduced to 33·07 per cent. At that time the representation of Ontario in the house should have been reduced. It should be reduced to-day, under the terms of the act, unless we are going to say that there is something which limits the computation to the ten-year period between censuses.

Here I must tell the house how amazed I was when reading this bulletin No. A.10 put out by the Department of Trade and Commerce, which cites verbatim section 51 of the British North America Act and its subsections in the English text, to find in the French text in the place of subsection 4 I have just read, the following:

(Translation):

(4) On any readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the population of that province bore to the aggregate population of the dominion has diminished by at least one-twentieth part from one census to the next.

(Text): That is an entire perversion of the sense of subsection 4 of section 51; and not only is it a perversion but it is a denial of its sense and meaning. It is a substitution of the word "census" for the word "readjustment," or in the French language, the words, attribution de la population.

I should like to add another word in support of the interpretation I have put forth. I know this probably is not the place where one might hope to make a protracted legal argument. But I submit to the house that unless the interpretation I have given to these words is the real interpretation, then the words found in the third to the last line of subsection 4 are entirely superfluous; they are:

On any such readjustment the number of members for a province shall not be reduced unless the proportion which the number of the population of the province bore to the number of the aggregate population of Canada at the then last preceding—

Not census, but—

—readjustment of the number of members for the province is ascertained—

And so on. If we were to interpret this act, as it is being interpreted for the purpose of this redistribution, the words "of the number of members for the province" would be entirely superfluous, because they add nothing to the sense of the sentence, and the same result would be achieved without them.

[Mr. Hackett.]

I want to say one further word about the interpretation. With the exception of section 51A enacted to protect the maritime provinces by the amendment of 1915, the fundamental theory of this section is representation by population. Any interpretation of this subsection which would exact the loss of one-twentieth of the population between two succeeding censuses would be a complete denial of the theory of representation by population. As suggested by the hon. member from Winnipeg, it would mean that a province could lose 4·99 per cent of its proportion or percentage in one ten-year period, and the same in the next ten-year period, and the same in the next, until a period was reached where there might not be enough population in a province to supply the members to which it would be entitled under the section.

Mr. KNOWLES: In principle that is the way it has been done.

Mr. HACKETT: It has been done that way once. I believe it was done that way in 1932. We had a leader and men in the front benches, as we have them to-day, who were overwhelmed and harassed, at a time when we were in the depths of depression. Things were hurried through, and possibly, good lawyer that he was, the leader of that time did not realize what was happening.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. HACKETT: Well, one may laugh if he wishes. But I have not been critical of men on the other side of the house when they have made misstatements and when they have taken positions which they have had to abandon within a few minutes, because I knew that they were overburdened with work, that they were harrassed by strikes and troubles and endless worries. I submit that is a possible explanation for what happened in 1932 so far as the leader of the government is concerned. I should have to stretch my imagination a little further to find an excuse for the seeming negligence of the leader of the opposition and those who sat beside him at that time.

In 1905 the privy council handed down a judgment in the Prince Edward Island case. People from that province, and from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, felt that the act was working a hardship on them; their grievances were heard on reference to the supreme court of Canada. Prince Edward Island submitted this question to the supreme court—and just listen to it:

Although the population of Prince Edward Island as ascertained at the census of 1901 if divided by the unit of representation ascertained by dividing the number of 65 into the population of Quebec is not sufficient to give six members in the House of Commons of Canada to that province, is the representation of Prince Edward Island in the House of Commons of Canada liable under the British North America Act, 1867, and amendments thereto, and the terms of union of 1873, under which that province entered confederation to be reduced below six, the number granted to that province by the said terms of union of 1873?

The supreme court answered in the affirmative, and said that its representation must be reduced below six. The privy council answered the same way. Its answer is found in just a word. The privy council found that it was stipulated that the representation of Prince Edward Island in confederation would be determined by the act and by the section I have read. Then the privy council went on to say in what I call an obiter dictum—not something which had any bearing on the question, not something which was necessary for its decisions, not something which had been submitted, although there had been a reference to it when a judge of the supreme court had asked a question and Mr. Newcombe had answered it but the question had never been raised as an issue, so the statement of the bench is purely an obiter dictum which was never argued and is not a binding authority:

> This argument assumes that there has been no readjustment for any province unless there has been alteration. Their Lordships think this is to give too narrow a meaning to the word. In their opinion, when as a result of a census the representation of the provinces is reconsidered and the necessary changes, if any, made to bring it into harmony with the results of the census, that is a readjustment within the meaning of subsection 4, whether there be or be not any change in the case of any particular province. Their Lordships, therefore, think that the answer of the supreme court to the question submitted to it was correct.

That is an obiter dictum. It has no bearing on the case then at issue. It was not argued. Mr. Newcombe did say in the supreme court that he considered that the count to determine if the proportion had been reduced began every ten years.

We are not here dealing with petty matters. We are dealing with the most sacred thing we have in our national life, our constitution, and are we going to amend it without some serious reason? We have before us an agency which enables us to effect redistribution and deal fairly with each province of the dominion. I have an idea that this motion is just another phase of the old feud between the provinces and the dominion, and that the dominion is seeking to exact by promises, by gold, and by favours of different kinds, the assent of the provinces to the proposition that the British North America Act may be amended by the mere whim, by the smallest majority of a political party in the two houses of parliament. I say, Mr. Speaker, that such practice, if tolerated, is prejudicial to parliament; it is prejudicial to our national life. It is in my estimation the first note of the requiem of confederation.

There may be another reason for introducing this act. It may be to save the face of those who were asleep at the switch in 1932. The government may now seek to make it appear that the amendment is necessary to go behind the census of 1931, to warrant a reallocation of seats to the provinces. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that there is no reason to amend the British North America Act. Its terms are explicit; they are clear. I admit that an advocate and a great advocate, in the supreme court, taken by surprise, did answer a question in a way which might be construed as contrary to the view that I have expressed here. The statement in the P.E.I. case was an obiter dictum of the privy council in a case where this question was not argued and where it was not in issue and where it has not authority.

I ask is there a reason for us, we here in adult Canada, to seek an amendment to our constitution when there is no provision for amending the act? The other day when we wanted to amend the act to incorporate in section 91 the subject of unemployment insurance we went to each of the provinces and got them to acquiesce. Oh, it may be said, but that was a provincial matter. The people of this country, peoples and nations, do not deal in subtleties of that kind. If there is a right in parliament alone to have the constitution amended, there will always be those who are clever enough and subtle enough to make a good case for the amendment, whether it affects provincial or national issues. I agree with what was said last night on the point by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard). No means have been provided to amend this act, and until those means are found we must in the interval proceed warily. The only way in which the act can be amended decently and properly is with the consent of the high contracting parties, the dominion and the provinces.

My hon. friend the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) argued the case in the house the other day and put on the record the statements of every great constitutional lawyer. I would mention just two or three of them. There was Doherty; there was Borden; there was Blake; there was Meighen; there was Laurier; there was Lapointe—and not one of them said that this act could be altered without the consent of the provinces and it should not be altered now without their consent for purposes which appear to be highly strategic.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I am taking part in this debate because I realize the full import of the resolution now before us. First may I congratulate the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) upon his masterly presentation of the redistribution resolution on the 28th of last month. If I read public opinion aright, from the press and the opinions of my own constituents, this resolution has been wonderfully received by almost every section of our population. It deals with an important problem. So far as I am concerned I strongly support the resolution.

I listened attentively to the learned address made by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), and as I listened to him my conviction strengthened that our redistribution arrangements should be changed. It would be impossible, I should think, for any member to explain in a way that would be grasped clearly by most of our people what was meant by subsection 4 of section 51 of the British North America Act. No one can challenge or be against representation by population. It is a primary principle which has been adopted by all nations that call themselves democracies. It is the only just and fair way to decide the number of our representatives.

The previous speaker mentioned that Ontario under the present system had more members than she was entitled to for at least ten years. But let us take the 65 members assigned to the province of Quebec, and suppose that twenty years from now the population is 20,000,000 people. If Quebec then has a population of 6,000,000 the unit of representation will be 92,300 people per riding. That would give the rest of Canada 152 members, or a total for the whole country of 217 members, and that process would be accentuated as time goes on and our population grows. The present method of representation by population, dividing the population of the province of Quebec by 65 to give the unit of representation, has worked fairly well up to the present, but it will not work in the future, and it has not worked well under certain circumstances and conditions.

I am also in favour of the resolution because it confers no special privileges and is not unfair to any province. If I thought it would help or would be partial to the province of Quebec, for example, I would be against it, or if I thought it would help the province of Ontario, I would be equally against it. I believe that this resolution is the very best way to rectify an anomaly in our present system of representation—I do not want to call it an injustice—and to bring about a fairer representation so far as the whole country is concerned.

Before I proceed any further I want to quote a statement by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), which in effect is endorsed by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). Speaking on June 6, the leader of the C.C.F. party said, as reported in Hansard, page 2236.

> But in fairness to other members of the house who agreed to deferring redistribution in 1941 I am not at this moment asking that another privilege of that kind be granted to western Canada. I believe that the proposal placed before the house by the government at the present time is fair, just, sound and constitutional.

Those are the words of a true Canadian. On a discussion of this kind it would be very easy indeed to arouse the passions even of members of parliament; very easy for them to speak in local or provincial terms. Those two hon. members did not do that. They may have some arguments against redistribution based on the census of 1941, as was so well expressed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in 1943 when we asked for an amendment of the British North America Act, on account of the shifting of population from the western provinces to the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts and also to the two central provinces. It would have been easy for these hon. members to make a passionate appeal to their own people and demand that we take as a basis the census which is at present under way in the western provinces. They did not do that, and I want to praise them for their attitude on that score. It shows a real federal spirit.

As to the amendment brought in by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) I am strongly against it. My views in this respect are influenced by section 52 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

> The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

In this section is given to the federal representation all the authority and responsibility that could be required. I for one am not going to throw away the prerogatives of members of this parliament for a mess of pottage. I for one am going to take the full responsibility imposed on me in accepting the mandate to represent my people in the federal house. I for one will always deal with any matter on which we have full jurisdiction, not in a local or regional way but in a truly national way, as was done by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the hon. member for Peace River and several other hon. members during the discussion. If the amendment brought in by the Progressive Conservative opposition were adopted, it would simply stultify the federal prerogatives and shackle the activities derived from our national autonomy, and I for one would be the last to be a party to that. In this instance, as in many previous ones, we have the spectacle of the premier of Quebec talking of provincial autonomy and alleging centralization under the federal government. It is an old bugbear which has been worked time and time again, in many instances with absolutely no reason, and generally speaking the people of Canada are getting wise to that situation. In many instances these charges are simply political dodges, and are advanced so as to embarrass the central government, purely for partisan and political reasons. We have here all the safeguards needed for the preservation of political autonomy. As was so well stated by the Minister of Justice, the members of this house come from the different provinces of the Canadian confederation, and along with our great and overpowering loyalty so far as the nation is concerned, we are yet primarily what may be called municipalists. So far as I am concerned I have a great pride in living in my own little town of Cochrane, in northern Ontario. I am proud of it, and I will work and fight for it. We are also what may be called regionalists. I like the region in which I live; I like the section in which my constituency is located; I like northern Ontario and am loyal to it. I will fight its battles, I will participate in everything which is for its benefit. And then I am a provincialist. I am proud to belong to the great banner province of Ontario and to have fought, as I will continue to fight, some of its battles. I am proud of all the governments we have had with their headquarters in Toronto, and I am not averse to proclaiming that pride even in the federal field. But beyond all that I am, like other speakers whom I have mentioned, also a federalist. I believe that federation is what made this nation. It was found possible in times of hardship and turmoil for four provinces of Canada to get together and lay this wonderful foundation of Canadian confederation. Every member of this parliament is proud of confederation. I repeat, however, that there is no necessity for Mr. Duplessis to raise the old scarecrow of provincial autonomy or to charge that the dominion government wants to centralize everything. For many years I have been a member of parliament, and whether Conservatives or Liberals were in power I never saw in the action of any of our governments any suggestion of overcentralization. I never heard from any member of parliament, no matter from what section of the country he came, any advocacy of intensive centralization. There have always been within our constitution safeguards for the provinces and safeguards also for the national government. No federal member would dare to do anything which would tend to weaken or abolish those safeguards. I say these things with some feeling, because we have heard in the past and will probably hear again in the future that the central government is a great octopus which seeks to spread its tentacles into every section of our provincial life. That is not true, and it does not voice the opinions of the people of Canada as a whole. One might say that the best safeguard, as indicated in the present discussion of the redistribution bill, is that two parties in the House of Commons are ready and willing to surrender to the provinces some of the prerogatives which are given to the federal government by the constitution. That shows the spirit which animates on many occasions the federal representation, which at times will go as far as to throw away our own prerogatives.

There has also been an objection from some quarters that we should be very careful about an application to the British parliament for an amendment of the Canadian constitution. I am going to speak very briefly on a subject which is in the minds of a great majority of the Canadian people, and has been for many years. To some of them it is still puzzling why we should have to request the British parliament to amend our constitution. It is true that it is a British statute, but in the full sense of the word it is really a Canadian statute. No doubt the British people and the British government have long been surprised that we have not been able yet to find a formula which will enable us to become masters of our own destinies, of our own legislation. I say that it must be puzzling to our British friends, because we speak a good deal, and rightly, of our autonomy, more particularly since the statute of Westminster. Somewhere something is lacking; but it must be within the powers and the intelligence of our people to find the necessary formula.

Consider, for example, the state of our dominion-provincial relations. Looking into the last two or three dominion-provincial conferences, what do we find? What happened at the last one which was held in April of this year? Seven provinces were willing and ready to come to an agreement with the federal government, but apparently the two central provinces did not find it possible to accept the agreement. Many Canadians asked themselves, "What is the principle that governs us in these matters? Is it not true that the majority of the provinces, if not a majority of the total population of the country, were willing and ready to agree with the central government? What then is the reason for the failure to come to an understanding? That is the question that must be settled." At the next dominion-provincial conference we must devise some means whereby agreements that are acceptable to the great majority of the provinces will be endorsed without the necessity of complete unanimity. What machinery will be adopted. I do not know, but surely that question calls for our earnest consideration. Will one province have the power to veto an agreement arrived at by the rest of the dominion, or will two provinces be able to brush that agreement aside, or on the other hand will the question at issue be decided on the basis of ratio of population represented by the indivdiual provinces? These are problems that we shall have to solve.

The moment this country finds a formula whereby it can request the British parliament to facilitate our dealing with our own constitution, it will, I believe, be an easy matter to bring this about, and I do not think there will be any objection on the part of the British parliament. But in the meantime any appeal that is made to the British parliament must come from the central authority here, because precedents have been established and judgment has been rendered in one case whereby it is not possible for any individual province on its own initiative to make such representations before the British parliament.

It is the view of many Canadians that we should move cautiously in making any change in our constitution such as I have suggested. Are we prepared now to set up a commission representing every section of the population for the purpose of considering the question of the Canadian constitution? There will be some reactions from minority groups. No doubt the rights pertaining to the French language will be protected, just as the rights with respect to education being left entirely in the hands of the provinces will be safeguarded; and this applies also to the question of a civil code so far as the province of Quebec is concerned.

My own belief is that we shall soon be ready to play the part of masters of our own destiny. I think it must be puzzling to the British government itself as to why it is that we in Canada have not yet reached that stage where we can really call ourselves our own masters in regard to the constitution. I remember hearing some years ago certain striking remarks made by the then member for Labelle, Mr. Bourassa, in a speech which he delivered on minority rights and appeals to the privy council and to the British parliament for amendments to the Canadian constitution. One statement that Mr. Bourassa made at that time has always remained vivid in my mind. Let me try to repeat, if not his exact words, at least the meaning he sought to convey. Speaking of minority rights he said: We know that at the foot of the British throne, before the privy council, the French Canadian people, generally speaking, will receive justice in an impartial way. But suppose some of the rights of those people were crushed by one particular province in the Canadian confederation. Do we in Canada expect that Great Britain would send troops to defend those rights?

At the time I realized the full import of the statement by the then member for Labelle. He meant that if it were not within our own competence to solve the question of minority rights we could never expect to have that problem solved in any physical sense by Great Britain. That, I believe, was a strong lesson to the Canadian people, and I have tried to learn it. As far as I am personally concerned, I hope that within a period of ten years at most we shall have an all-Canadian constitution and that that constitution in its spirit and application will consist of more than merely written words.

It has been well said in this debate—it was said at an earlier stage of the debate by the member for Rosetown-Biggar—that the great glory of the British constitution lies in the fact that it is unwritten. There is profound meaning in that statement. It means that in the heart and mind and soul of the British people the ideals of democracy, the ideals of justice, are ever uppermost. I believe that these wonderful qualities are just as strong in the Canadian people. Canadians are just as much imbued with them as the British.

I myself belong to the minority of French descent, but I have no fear of the future. I am acquainted with nearly every section of our population, and I can say that I have never suffered by reason of my racial affiliations or of my faith. In my section of northern Ontario that circumstance has never been thrown up to me. I know something also of my own native province; and I would leave this thought with hon. members. Observe any English-speaking person who has resided for a number of years in the old province of Quebec and who returns to one of the English-speaking parts of the dominion, and you will notice that he carries with him evidence of some of the finest characteristics of that old province of Quebec because the people there are naturally fairminded and broadminded. In a word, they are naturally Canadian, just as the people in the other sections of our Canadian population are Canadian.

It is for this reason that I say the time is almost ripe, if it is not here already, for the formation of a commission to deal primarily with the structure of our dominion-provincial relations and to study the question as to what should constitute a majority, so far as compromise is concerned, as to what should constitute a veto, and what should be the actually functioning of such relations. I believe that the Canadian people generally are thinking a great deal about what happened at the last dominion-provincial conference, and they feel that because seven provinces out of the nine were ready to come to an agreement, some action should have resulted from the conference. The question is left completely undecided.

I submit that we must put our own house in order before we can go to the British parliament and ask them to amend the British North America Act in order to provide us with a new Canadian constitution. I do not wish to elaborate this argument; I think I have said enough to convince my own compatriots that there is no reason for entertaining any fears for the future. Safeguards with respect to minority rights must of necessity spring from ourselves, from the fairmindedness and the spirit of justice of the majority; for if those safeguards do not come from that source, we shall not find them anywhere. I believe we have it within ourselves to provide the solution. We all come from stocks that believe in the principles of democracy and justice—stocks from old France, from central Europe and from Britain, transplanted to this half of the north American continent—and I for one shall rejoice in the day that we are masters of our own constitution. I say that for the reason that in my opinion it is within ourselves, within our own ability, to deal with all matters of this sort in an impartial and Canadian way.

Before I conclude I wish to quote from an article that appeared in Saturday Night on June 8, 1946, entitled "Provincial Veto." The title of the article is illuminating. It may give a new angle to this question which may also prove illuminating. I quote:

Mr. Duplessis seems to us to have chosen a bad moment for the assertion of the right of the provinces to veto proposed amendments to the Canadian constitution. If the principle which he invokes is sound to-day it will still be sound next year, by which time a better occasion for raising it may have presented itself. For we have to note that numerous occasions for raising it have presented themselves in the past and have not been utilized, and that neglect has not prevented Mr. Duplessis from raising it now; so presumably one more neglect would not damage it for the future.

The reason why we think this is a bad moment for Mr. Duplessis is that by raising it now he is claiming for Ontario—which has just as much veto power as Quebec—the right to veto a proposal which adds eight parliamentary seats to Quebec and leaves Ontario unchanged. On Mr. Duplessis' principle the present proportions are just as much the perpetual right of Ontario, removable only with Ontario's consent, as the sixty-five seats of Quebec are the perpetual right of Quebec. (We do not ourselves regard either right as perpetual, but Mr. Duplessis does.)

The situation is very embarrassing for Mr. Drew. Either he goes along with Mr. Duplessis, in which case he maintains the right of Ontario to veto the amendment, and will scarcely dare to accept the responsibility of not vetoing it, or he splits with Mr. Duplessis and abandons a rather substantial part of that concept of provincial supremacy in which the two premiers have been in agreement for several years. Mr. Duplessis is in no such dilemma; he has no objection to the redistribution as redistribution, and all he asks is the right to say "O.K." But Mr. Drew cannot say "O.K." if he has a right to say "No." The redistribution takes away something which, if Mr. Duplessis is right, is the indisputable and irremovable property of Ontario, and no Ontario government, however devoted to Rep. by Pop. and however friendly to Quebec, would dare to toss away eight seats which are Ontario's indisputable and irremovable property, even if the retention of them can only be defended by throwing Rep. by Pop. into the discard and explaining (as the Globe and Mail's Ottawa correspondent explained the other day) that Quebec should not have the same proportional representation as Ontario because its people are too much addicted to voting in a solid bloc.

If the last part of the statement, which is taken from the Globe and Mail, were applied it would not show the true Canadian spirit, the spirit of tolerance that I mentioned a moment ago. If we followed that principle it would mean that Saskatchewan, because it voted C.C.F. at the last federal election, should not have the representation to which she is entitled. It would also mean that because Nova Scotia voted almost solidly Liberal at the last federal election she should not have the representation to which she is entitled. That kind of attitude is not Canadian; it is not even good Canadian journalism. So far as I am concerned I shall highly resent any appeal to passion on the question of redistribution. I shall always resent that any so-called national paper should have the audacity to say to the rest of Canada that Quebec has not the democratic right, the national right, the individual right, the personal right, to have the representation that she has, because during the last few years she happened to vote solidly Liberal. If the Globe and Mail correspondent knew the history of Quebec, he would also admit that years ago, and for a long period of time, that old province voted almost solidly Conservative. These are things we must keep in mind. This is no time to raise one section of the country against the other. It is not Canadianism; it is not conducive to the making of a Canadian nation. I know whereof I speak, sir, because I live in a section of the country which has a mixed population, and it is typical of the rest of Canada. It is typical of the fine city of Toronto. In Toronto they have tolerance too. There are right-thinking fair minded people there. Statements of this kind are not conducive to tolerance, and we do not want to hear them when we are dealing with a bill having to do with redistribution.

I am sometimes shocked at the attitude of the historical—no, it is not historical, because it is too new—Progressive Conservative party on matters of this kind. I do not understand their amendment, particularly when they are willing and ready to destroy the prerogative and initiative of the federal representation. Why do they do it? It is not even good politics. I cannot understand why they do it, particularly in view of the fact that at some time in the future they may be called upon to assume government responsibility. If that time comes they will be caught by their own motion; they will be caught by their own resolution; they will be hamstrung by their own action; they will be caught by the statements they have been making from time to time in trying to destroy the prerogative and the initiative of the national government, without adding anything to the rights of the provinces.

I hope the Canadian people are getting sick and tired of the bugbear, often put out in the form of political propaganda, that the federal government is trying to centralize more and more in this country. Why do they do it? The activities of our provincial, federal and municipal governments are well defined, particularly provincial and federal, in our constitution. Individually no federal member will ever agree to any government trying to infringe upon provincial activities or autonomy. There may be some borderline cases in which the central government must of necessity seek advice and cooperation from the provincial governments, but that does not apply in all cases, and certainly it does not apply at the present time. These are things that are worth remembering in questions of this kind.

I am completely in favour of the resolution, for one simple reason, namely, that I am convinced in my own mind that it does not favour any one province or any particular section of our population, but it is fair because it follows the principle of representation by population; and no matter what the learned constitutionalist or the learned debater may say, or what anybody else may say, they cannot destroy the argument for the justice and the fairmindedness which is implied in representation by population, implemented in this resolution.

Mr. W. ROSS THATCHER (Moose Jaw): First, I should like to congratulate the previous two speakers this afternoon on their fine presentations. One can easily see what an advantage a lawyer has in this chamber. I am going to speak briefly as a layman because the motion before the house is one which directly affects my province.

Unless the present provisions of the British North America Act are changed, Saskatchewan will shortly see her representation in this chamber cut, and cut unfairly, from twenty-one to seventeen members. This group does not believe that such a loss can be justified. Originally the British North America Act was meant to provide representation by population. However, in recent years, because of certain protective clauses, discrepancies have crept into the representation. Under the act, redistribution would unjustly deprive Saskatchewan of four members and Manitoba of three, and at the same time it would give Ontario eight extra members, to which, on a population basis, she is not entitled. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Alberta would each receive one extra and Prince Edward Island two extra. In other words, the present provisions of the British North America Act do not give us representation by population. Therefore the members of the C.C.F. group would not be satisfied with redistribution under the act as it stands at present.

We think the resolution we are now discussing would help to rectify the situation. It would provide for fairer representation in the House of Commons. Nonetheless we also believe that the proposed amendment has certain shortcomings, and I should like to deal briefly with them. Before doing so, perhaps I should comment on the position of the Conservative party in this matter. So far, no speaker of that group has actually criticized the resolution. Rather in principle, they have argued that the Canadian parliament has no right to ask for an amendment to the constitution without having previously secured the consent of the provinces. To me this attitude does not seem logical. Furthermore such a principle might actually be vicious. It might mean that one province could veto progressive legislation which would be to the great benefit of the other eight provinces. Certainly in the past, if I have read my history correctly, there have been numerous occasions when the federal government amended the constitution without the consent of all of the provinces. For instance, in 1915 Sir Robert Borden sponsored a constitutional amendment to increase the number of senators from western Canada. On that occasion Prince Edward Island objected; yet the amendment was proceeded with. Again in 1943, as has been pointed out, Quebec objected to an amendment on redistribution, but again the amendment was proceeded with. I think it is significant that in both cases the Conservative party took a completely different stand than from what they are taking to-day. On those occasions they voted to amend the constitution, despite the opposition and dissent of one province. It seems to me they are not being consistent. We believe the Canadian parliament alone must decide who shall represent the people at Ottawa. This is purely a federal matter. We can see no reason why parliament should first consult the provinces. Those who are opposing this resolution, whether it be directly or indirectly, intentionally or unintentionally may prevent some of the provinces of this nation from having their fair number of representatives in the House of Commons.

What are the shortcomings of the resolution? First, as the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Townley-Smith) has suggested, we believe that because of its size and wealth the northwest territories should have at least one specific representative. Second, the proposed amendment contains no reference whatever to a change in the other branch of government which was set up by the British North America Act, the Canadian Senate. In my opinion this is unfortunate, because there are even more glaring inequalities of representation in the Senate than in the House of Commons. For instance, in 1941 the three maritime provinces had an approximate population of 1,130,000 persons; and they have twenty-four senators. All western Canada, including the northwest territories, Yukon, British Columbia and the three prairie provinces, had an approximate population of 3,300,000 persons, or three times that of the maritimes, yet it also has only twenty-four senators. To be even more specific, the province of New Brunswick, with an approximate population of 450,000, has ten senators. The province of Saskatchewan, with about 900,000 people or double the number of New Brunswick, has only six senators. The resolution before the house to-day makes no provision for fairer senate representation. Apparently old inequalities in that body will be allowed to continue.

As hon. members know, this group has always favoured abolition of the senate. If and when a C.C.F. government is elected to power, one of the first questions with which it will deal will be such abolition. In the meantime, however, if the senate must be continued, we think it should be reformed. Such action has been talked about for many years but nothing has ever been done about it. I am told that as far back as 1891 the Liberal platform contained a plank called "senate reform". When are we to have this reform? I suggest that we should have it at once. The motion before us proposes to amend the British North America Act to rectify injustices in House of Commons representation. Why should it not also rectify injustices in Senate representation?

Aside from unjust representation there are a number of other serious shortcomings in the Canadian Senate. Hon. members know those shortcomings probably better than I do, but I should like to take several minutes to run over them. In the first place, senators are appointed rather than elected. They are in no way responsible to the people. It is conceivable that some senators might be appointed not so much for their ability as for their past party service. I say that it is conceivable. Certainly it is a fact that in the past the senate has been a haven for ex-members of parliament, cabinet ministers, and ex-members of provincial governments.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that he should not refer to the other place in what I might call uncomplimentary language. I think I have allowed him considerable latitude.

Mr. THATCHER: I am not referring to the present senate in any way, Mr. Speaker. I believe that subsection 3 of section 51 bases the number of the members of the House of Commons in certain provinces upon provincial representation in the Senate, and therefore I submit that the Senate is related to the resolution we are discussing. However, I am not referring in any way to the present Senate.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: My point is that the hon. member must not reflect upon the other place in any way.

Mr. THATCHER: Very well; I shall not be offensive. In the second place the members of the other house are appointed for life, and I think the lack of any age limit robs that body of its freshness and youth. For instance, not so long ago I read in the paper where one of their hon. members died at the age of ninety-six. In the third place, minor political parties have no representation in that body. It has been stated that it was set up to protect minority rights; yet Canada's smaller political parties, such as the C.C.F. and Social Credit, have no representation. Finally, this non-elected body has the power to frustrate the declared will of the Canadian people for a period which may run to several years, and it has done so on occasion in the past. I need not go into the matter farther—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member is now reflecting upon the other place, and I must ask him to discontinue.

Mr. THATCHER: I shall not go into the matter farther at this time, Mr. Speaker, but I would remind the house that only last October one hon. gentleman from the other house described that body as the finest old age pension club in the world. As I have said, our group favours the abolition of the senate, but if the government is not prepared to do that at the present time I suggest that it bring about much needed reforms in the Senate. May I suggest that, first, it should rectify unfair representation in that body; second, it should put an age limit on the members; third, it should make the Senate an elected body, and, fourth, it should place a curb on its power to veto parliamentary legislation.

The resolution before the house to-day is good as far as it goes, but in my opinion it does not go far enough.

Mr. JEAN LESAGE (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I listened with the greatest interest and admiration to the magnificent constitutional study given this afternoon by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). I also commend the spirit of justice which inspired the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette); let us hope that a great majority of the members from his province will follow him. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) also made a practical and interesting contribution to the debate.

Every hon. member is familiar with the sections of the British North America Act dealing with redistribution. They are sections 51 and 52. I submit it is important that we first study the origin of the sections in order to distinguish between principles and procedure. The Quebec conference which led to the adoption of the Quebec resolutions was held in October, 1864. At page 32 of annex IV of the report to the honourable the Speaker of the Senate of Canada by the parliamentary counsel of the senate, referring to the enactment of the British North America Act under the title, "The Quebec Conference of 1864", I find the following:

Although the Quebec resolutions cannot, in my opinion, for reasons assigned and to be assigned, be accepted as the basis of the British North America Act, it does not follow that they, or the minutes of the conference or any available records of discussions thereat, are not quite material to the purposes of this report. What was resolved at Quebec and what was afterwards resolved at London differed not much in principle, although it differed immensely in detail. That the union should be one of a federal character—that the legislative residuum should be in the central parliament—that parliament's power should be general and provincial powers local—that there should be an upper and a lower house—that there should be three districts in the confederation, each equally represented in the upper house—that the commons representation should be based upon population . . . was all easily settled.

It is important to note, for the benefit of the argument I intend to develop that what was resolved at Quebec, and afterwards at London, did not differ much in principle, although it differed immensely in detail, from the British North America Act itself. The Quebec resolutions dealing with representation in the House of Commons were numbered 17 to 22 inclusive, and also 25. I shall read them, as a basis for my argument:

17. The basis of representation in the House of Commons shall be population, as determined by the official census every 10 years; and the number of members at first shall be 194, distributed as follows:

And then follows the distribution, which I need not quote. Then, they continue:

18. Until the official census of 1871 has been made up, there shall be no change in the number of representatives from the several sections.

Provinces were called sections, in the Quebec resolutions. Then:

19. Immediately after the completion of the census of 1871, and immediately after every decennial census thereafter, the representation from each section in the House of Commons shall be readjusted on the basis of population.

20. For the purpose of such readjustments Lower Canada shall always be assigned 65 members, and each of the other sections shall at each readjustment . . .

And then follows the readjustment, as set out in section 51. Then:

21. No reduction shall be made in the number of members returned by any section, unless its population shall have decreased, relatively to the population of the whole union, to the extent of five per centum.

22. In computing at each decennial period the number of members to which each section is entitled, no fractional parts shall be considered, unless when exceeding one-half the number entitling to a member, in which case a member shall be given for each such fractional part.

25. The number of members may at any time be increased by the general parliament, regard being had to the proportionate rights then existing.

It is our section 52 of the act. The London resolutions were approximately the same, except for some minor changes, and also for the fact that they were renumbered. We find that 17 became 18, and 18 became 19. Some inconsequential words were added. Then, 19 became 20, and 20, 21 and 22 were renumbered as 21, 22 and 23. In each instance the word province was substituted for the word section.

Let us compare the London resolutions dealing with representation and redistribution with the text of the British North America Act. We cannot find section 18 in the text of the act. I offer it as my opinion that it was the most important one regarding representation in the House of Commons. Resolution 18 contains the very principle of representation in the House of Commons. Although I have read it I shall read it again:

The basis of representation in the House of Commons shall be population as determined by the official census every 10 years.

Two things: First, basis of representation shall be population; and, second, as determined by the official census every 10 years. The other sections 19 to 24 inclusive are reproduced in the statute in their spirit if not in their form. They are sections 51 and 52. They do not deal with the principle of representation, but they deal with the procedure of redistribution.

It is of the utmost importance that we distinguish between principles and rules of procedure to implement those principles. The principle or basis of representation in the House of Commons is not expressly worded in the British North America Act; but it may be inferred from sections 51 and 52, especially if one refers to the Quebec and London resolutions. That is most probably why so many people have always felt that the basis of representation was the number of 65 members for Quebec. Even the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) the other day as reported at page 2229 of Hansard said, when dealing with section 20 of the Quebec resolutions:

For the purpose of such readjustment Lower Canada shall always be assigned 65 members.

Then he went on to say:

That was the basis upon which the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick entered confederation.

It has not and never has been a basis. It is only a means of attaining the implementing of the principle which is, and always has been, proportionate representation by provinces according to population.

This afternoon the hon. member for Stanstead contradicted the hon. member for Lake Centre when he said that the basis of representation is population. If the number of 65 members for Quebec was the principle on which the fathers of confederation intended to base representation in this house, what, then, is the use of section 52 of the British North America Act, which reads as follows:

The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

Everyone will admit that the rules of interpretation of statutes require that a meaning be given to any section in any act. A section cannot have been enacted just for the purpose of putting words one after another. Section 51 already provide a mechanism which may bring about, and effectively brought about, an increase in the number of members when the population of provinces other than Quebec increase more rapidly than that of Quebec.

If paragraph 62 refers to the same occurrence it is useless, unless one concludes that because only the word "increase" is used, no decrease can be made if the population of Quebec grows more rapidly than that of the other provinces. Nobody has ever thought it could mean that, because, first, section 52 would contradict section 51; and moreover it would be in direct contradiction of the principle of proportionate representation by provinces according to population.

The only meaning we can give to section 52 is that not only is the figure 65 for Quebec not the basis of representation but it could even be increased without amending the constitution provided—and I quote from section 52:

. . . proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

I do not want and I do not think it is necessary to discuss that point at length. It may be that some other meaning can be given to section 52. But I sincerely wonder which one, if we follow the rules of interpretation. The least we can say is that the wording of section 52 emphasizes the principle of representation which has to be inferred from sections 51 and 52. If what I have tried to show is true, namely, that the principle or the basis of representation is "proportionate representation by provinces according to population" and that section 51 contains the rules of redistribution to put the principle into effect, the question that comes to our mind is the following: Have the said rules been so interpreted or have they worked in such a manner that the principle of representation has been safeguarded? The answer is certainly no, and everybody admits it. A great injustice has been created by the actual interpretation and working out of the rules. One province has so benefited by the interpretation of one rule that eight of its representatives in this house should not be here because they represent nobody according to our principles of representation. Here we have a resolution that will bring us back to the application of the true spirit of confederation and that will give the same measure of justice to each province.

I was much surprised to hear the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) state in the house the other night as reported at page 2250 of Hansard:

It is a political bill. It is not in the interests of the constitution or of real parliamentary representation. It is a half-baked scheme that will lead to more disunity than anything else.

I wonder which is the more political, the bill or his speech. How would one characterize what he added as reported at page 2251 of Hansard:

You will not have in this country any longer one province the representatives of which will continue to urge all the things they have urged since the beginning of the session, small secondary matters which do not result in any effective legislation.

I resent deeply that last part of his speech. I contend that any member from any province may urge any measure in this democratic parliament. Even the hon. member for Broadview cannot be denied this right. We do not contest his right to expound his antediluvian ideas about the status of Canada; we only discuss his opinions.

I repeat that the interpretation given by a tribunal, which is not Canadian, to subsection 4 of section 51 of the British North America Act has implied the creation of a privilege for one province to the detriment of all the other provinces. The decision of the privy council has always been considered as binding, whatever may be the considered opinion of the hon. member for Stanstead. Subsection 4 must disappear if we want to reestablish the true principles of representation as set forth by the fathers of confederation. Not only that, but the number of 65 members laid down in 1867 for Quebec when confederation embraced only four provinces and when the population of Canada was very small, is not convenient any longer. As was said by Mr. Georges Henri Dagneau:

(Translation):

In 1867 the extent of Canada's future development was surely not and could not have been fully realized. That is precisely why, by and by, the precautions taken in 1867 in favour of Quebec became useless and, I would say, detrimental to that province. Mr. St. Laurent's argument regarding the injustice of the clause under which a province stands to lose one or more members because of events which have led to an increase in another province's population, seems irrefutable. Quebec's population increases so rapidly that the quotient rises steadily, with the result that certain provinces whose development is held up, for some reason or other, witness a decrease in their representation at Ottawa.

(Text):

As far as I am concerned I cannot conceive that the rules of representation should permit a decrease in the number of members in this house when the population of the nation increases.

The resolution that we are now studying offers the only means of returning to the real spirit of the constitution. Mr. Lorenzo Paré made one of the best comments I have read. I quote:

(Translation):

Canadians are attempting to repair a part of the democratic machine which has become warped through wear. They are trying to restore an essential right of free citizens, inasmuch as the time has come to restore to each the democratic authority to which he is entitled within our parliamentary institutions. At the same time they are trying to respect, according to the spirit of the constitution, a right of which the French-Canadian minority was deprived by the very letter of the constitution. Indeed, the object and the principle of the bill introduced yesterday in the House of Commons by the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, is to restore the democratic function of our dominion parliament, by reinstating representation based on population.

(Text): It has been said that we should not base redistribution on the census of 1941, that it would be unfair and that any redistribution should be postponed until after the census of 1951. If in 1943 redistribution was postponed for special and serious reasons it cannot be said that the situation is the same to-day, and I feel most strongly that the fear of small changes in population since 1941, which changes have always occurred in any previous period of ten years, is no reason for delaying redistribution any longer. It is our duty to proceed not only to amend the rules of redistribution but also to proceed with the actual process of redistribution itself. I say this because if the number of 65 members set for the province of Quebec was only a means of attaining the realization of the principle of the proportionate representation of population by provinces, the requirement that redistribution should be proceeded with after each census is part of the principle itself. I have already read resolution 18 of the London resolutions—resolution 17 of the Quebec resolutions—but I think it is important that I should read the resolution once more to emphasize that last point:

> The basis of representation in the House of Commons shall be population, as determined by the official census every ten years.

Consequently, not only do I approve this resolution, but I ask that redistribution according to the new rules should be proceeded with as soon as the amendment to the constitution is approved by the British parliament.

An important amendment to the resolution we are studying has been introduced by the hon. member for Lake Centre. His amendment is to the effect that the provinces should be consulted on the expediency of amending section 51 and that no such amendment should be made unless a satisfactory agreement is reached at such consultations. His amendment is based on this claim, and I now quote what the hon. member for Lake Centre said, as reported at page 2228 of Hansard:

> One of the most consequential provisions of this resolution is the proposal to amend section 51 without consultation with the provinces which will be affected.

I admit that it is a difficult and important matter, and that it should not be dealt with without due consideration. The question is, can a majority of this house ask for an amendment to the constitution without any consultation with or the concurrence of a majority or of all the provinces?

First, let me say that if we amend section 51 it will not create a precedent. Section 51 has been amended many times since confederation at the request of both houses of this parliament and never has there been consultation with the provinces. In an able speech delivered in this house and recorded in Hansard, at page 2239, the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) proved that point beyond any possible doubt. I do not intend to repeat what he has already said, but let me remind the hon. members for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and Peace River (Mr. Low) that I was astonished to hear their sudden solicitude for the province of Quebec; we could not but listen with scepticism to the warnings they addressed to us with pathetic voices. It is surprising, or is it surprising to hear them raise the point for the first time when the proposed resolution is necessary to correct an injustice. In 1943 two of the hon. members I just mentioned were in the house when an amendment was introduced to postpone redistribution, but they did not oppose it. Is this good faith? I will go so far as to say that the mere fact that they take the stand they do convinces me that the present resolution should be adopted. However, I want to discuss for a few minutes the constitutionality of the proposed method of amending section 51.

Is the B.N.A. Act a contract, a treaty, a compact, a compromise, or a statute? That question has been the subject of lengthy and profound studies by constitutional lawyers, able professors and great statesmen in this country. I am not in a position to give a final word, but my opinion is that the B.N.A. Act is a statute based on an understanding which may be called a compact or a compromise between the two great races who were here, in Canada, in 1867.

At the time of confederation, neither Lower Canada nor Upper Canada was satisfied with the working of the system of union and they desired another constitution. Representatives of the province of Canada and of the maritime provinces met in Quebec and London, England, to establish a system of federation in which the rights of the dominion and the provinces would be divided and the rights of the minority would be protected.

The fathers of confederation, when they met at Quebec and afterwards in London, did not write the statute which is now our constitution. They passed resolutions which contained principles. In reality, they made a compromise between the two races, but they did not write the statute, which was in fact written by what I will call a third party. Our constitution is not even part of our own statutes. We have to make a distinction between the compact itself which was the work of the fathers of confederation and the statute adopted by the British parliament.

It is of the utmost importance that we distinguish between the spirit of the compact and the letter of the statute.

I have already tried, and I hope, succeeded, at the beginning of my remarks, to establish that the principle or basis of representation in this house is proportionate representation by provinces. I have already read section 18 of the London resolutions, and I am sure hon. members still have it in their minds.

The other resolutions and section 51 provide only for the mechanism set out at the time, in 1867, according to the then existing conditions, to arrive at the realization in fact of the principle which is part of the compact.

If the principle, the basis, of the compact is not recognized any longer because of an interpretation of the statute which is not ours, and because of a change in conditions which affects the expected result of the procedure, then I say that we must request a change in the letter of the statute so that the letter of the statute is in accordance with the compact. Let me emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that in asking for the change in the statute as we are now doing, we are far from breaking the compact; on the contrary, we are preserving it. Not only is it the right of this house, but it is its duty to take all means to ensure the preservation of the compact. We cannot risk the refusal, not of one province, but of a provincial government or legislature, especially if that province has been privileged owing to a departure from the principles of the compact.

One may ask, who shall decide the issue? Where does the letter of the statute differ from the spirit of the compact? Who shall decide whether a proposed amendment to the constitution is on a question of principle or on a question of detail, on a material or on a subsidiary issue? Up to now, it has been up to this parliament. All the precedents that we have were "des cas d'espèce." This time, it is once more "un cas d'espèce."

In his speech last week, the hon. member for Lake Centre quoted Doctor Ollivier as follows: Hansard, page 2229:

...it is easy to understand the danger in which the province of Quebec stands if it lacks the right to take part in deliberations on the subject of our constitution.

I will answer that in his most remarkable book, "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty," and in his testimony before the committee of 1935 on the B.N.A. Act, Doctor Ollivier divides his proposed new constitution into provisions which, amongst others, could be amended without the consent of the provinces because they affect the federal government alone and others which may require the consent of one, of the majority or of all the provinces, as the case may be.

It is important to note that Doctor Ollivier was referring not to amendments as they have been made since confederation, but to an ideal method of amending the constitution upon which the dominion and the provinces were asked to agree. He was not by any means suggesting that when a certain method has been in use for many years it should be repudiated the moment that the issue is one of rendering justice and fair play to all the provinces.

As I have already said, all previous amendments in matters of representation were "des cas d'espèce" which tended to lead us away from the principle agreed to at the time of confederation. Now that the time has arrived to reestablish the principle, should we raise any objection to the same method of amendment which has been followed in the past?

[Mr. Lesage.]

But I do not say that we should necessarily proceed in the future as we proceeded in the past. I approve the proposal made by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay to set up a commission to study the procedure for amending the constitution. Moreover, we should have the right to amend our own constitution without suffering the humiliation of having to apply to London every time we want a change made.

I concur entirely in the words of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville in his interesting speech on the present resolution, as reported at page 2249 at Hansard:

Our country now has the right to proclaim to the world its complete sovereignty. It owes to itself, by reason of the reputation it has acquired, alike at home and in international councils, to have that document which characterizes most of the sovereignty and the independence of a nation—its own constitution.

Before I close my remarks, I want to answer the plea, addressed directly to members from the province of Quebec by the hon. member for Peace River. After having opposed the procedure set forth in the resolution, he asks us to join with him in approving the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre. He said, as reported at page 2256 of Hansard:

Members from the province of Quebec have an opportunity now to strike a blow for unity and good feeling amongst the people of this country.

Let me answer, respectfully but firmly, the leader of the Social Credit group, that we will not follow him. He is asking us to strike a blow for Canadian unity in striking a blow to our own rights. Of course, it would be very easy to save Canadian unity if one of the two main racial groups who compose this nation would bow to all the wishes of the other. We have here a perfect case where Canadian unity will be preserved by applying the full measure of justice. The proposed resolution does not carry any disproportion of privilege to anyone. It gives a full measure of justice. That is the way of reaching Canadian unity, and I stand by it. The hon. member for Peace River asks us to abandon rights for the sake of Canadian unity. Did we not at all times make concessions for Canadian unity and were we not criticized by our own people, and especially by his own supporters in my province, for not having resisted with sufficient energy the requests of the majority?

I will ask the hon. member for Peace River to try to inspire his own party with the same desire for unity and sincere cooperation that has inspired the policy of the party to which I am proud to belong. There is no one in this house who wants unity in Canada more than I do. Unity in this country is a great end to attain because of the very difficulties involved in giving to each and all an equal measure of justice. Let us hope that all together, with all our good will, we shall bend ourselves to this great task so that Canada will become an example of unity in the divided world of our time.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): For the few minutes left this afternoon I am pleased to give my opinion on the resolution which is before the house. First, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) on the brilliant speech he made this afternoon. I am sure that those who followed his remarks will consider that he gave one of the most logical interpretations, if not the most logical, of subsection 4 of section 51 of the British North America Act. I hope I shall be pardoned if I confine my remarks mostly to the effects of this resolution upon the maritime provinces.

I do not intend to deal with the resolution in general, but I shall try to point out how it will affect the three provinces by the sea. I may say at the outset that, in my opinion, if any section of Canada will be more adversely affected than others it will be the three maritime provinces. The maritimes are, as we all know, to-day only a very small section of this great dominion. We have not the importance that we had in the days of confederation. As a matter of fact, one great Canadian statesman said that we were just the rags and tatters of confederation. This, of course, we do not consider to be a fact. However, we sometimes feel that, in view of the treatment we receive, possibly there are others who hold the same opinion.

This question of confederation, which is one that gave our provinces at the time of confederation the greatest concern, has given us also great concern ever since. The strict application of the letter of confederation, as laid down in the British North America Act, has resulted in the representation of these three provinces being reduced materially from the days of confederation. I would point out that we are the only section of Canada which has really lost in representation.

As a matter of history, the province of New Brunswick in 1867 had a population of 250,000 and at that time we had fifteen members. In 1941, with a population of 453,000 we had, as we still have, ten members, a reduction of five members or one-third of our representation. The province of Nova Scotia in 1867 had a population of 364,000 and nineteen members. In 1941 their population had increased to 577,000 and they now have twelve members. Prince Edward Island, as hon. members know, had six members at confederation and to-day it has four.

The point I wish to make is this. While the population of New Brunswick has increased 80 per cent from the days of confederation, the representation of our province has decreased 33⅓ per cent, despite the fact that these three provinces have sent people all over Canada to build up the great west. Possibly more than any other section of the Canadian population, the people of the maritimes have helped to build up the west and this great Canada of ours.

We have protested on two different occasions against the reduction in our representation. The hon. member for Stanstead this afternoon cited the case of Prince Edward Island's representation before the supreme court of Canada and the judicial committee of the privy council. We thought that we had good grounds, that we had solid arguments. I am not going to repeat them here but the fact remains that we lost out in those courts. We are not finding fault to-day with this decision. The question of representation, as I say, was decided by the courts of the country, by the supreme court of Canada and by the judicial committee of the privy council. The letter of the law possibly was correct, but we feel that the spirit of the constitution, as represented at the time of confederation, was not carried out. The decision was made on the status, not the intention of the parties, and we are satisfied that it was not intended by those who drafted the British North America Act in 1867.

Quebec was selected as the unit, not because, as someone stated here, it had the largest population, but because the variations in that province would possibly be less than in any other province At that time, however, it was not anticipated that there would be a great increase in the territory of Quebec. The Quebec of to-day is not the Quebec of the days of confederation. Quebec has increased greatly in her territory and the unit of representation so far as Canada is concerned has been greatly increased. As I say, it was never anticipated that there would be such an increase in the unit of representation that the smaller provinces would have their original representation reduced.

I should like to read a quotation which was given by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), the other day. It consists of a statement made by the Hon. George Brown at the time of confederation when he introduced a resolution with respect to representation. He said:

The practical result will be that while Lower Canada certainly will not be less—

I would point out that it has not been less. Quebec has had sixty-five members from the days of confederation; she has sixty-five to-day. I continue with the quotation:

—and the lower provinces may increase in population, they cannot decrease in the number of representatives.

That was the intention of the act at that time, whether it was the letter of the act or not.

I should also like to quote what Sir Alexander Galt said three years before confederation when the terms were being considered. He said:

We have supposed that the population of Lower Canada being tolerably equable in its character, would afford the best basis. But having respect to the rapid increase of Upper Canada, we think the lower provinces should not be reduced if they do not increase in the same ratio. Therefore the lower provinces would have the same as they have now—unless in the very improbable case of any one falling off by five per cent or more.

I would point out that both these men did not anticipate that there would be a decrease, or such a decrease in the representation of the maritime provinces. We have heard this afternoon an explanation of why this five per cent was put in the act. We have heard other statements that it was doubtful just why it was put there. If hon. members would read the history of confederation they would come to the conclusion that five per cent was put in the act to protect the maritime provinces. I confess that it has not acted in that way. These men did not have the vision or possibly the foresight. It has reacted to the benefit of the great province of Ontario, but it has never reacted in any way to the benefit of the three maritime provinces.

I am also satisfied that had the two provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which formed two of the great pillars of this confederation and to which this country owes possibly more than is realized by many hon. members here, known that their representation was to be reduced even to what it is to-day I do not believe that they would have joined confederation, and I do not believe that there would be any Canada to-day. We lost all along the line. We lost our trade. Before confederation, the maritime provinces were perhaps the most progressive and the most prosperous parts of the British part of North America. We traded with the New England states; our ports were busy; our farmers received good prices and markets for all that they produced. This was all lost after confederation. We lost our manufacturers. Every small city and town in the maritimes had its manufacturing interests. After confederation, they all moved to Quebec or Ontario. We have now lost our representation and our United States trade.

When I was in London a little over a year ago I had the honour and the pleasure of visiting Sir Andrew Rae Duncan, who, as hon. members will remember, wrote the Duncan report on the rights of the maritime provinces. He asked me what part of Canada I came from. I said: "I come from the province of New Brunswick." He said: "Well, there is only one thing I can say about you people in the maritime provinces. You are the most long-suffering people that are to be found most anywhere in the world." He told me that the Duncan report had never been implemented; that we had in no way received from the rest of Canada the rights to which we were entitled, and which he recommended.

After confederation, we expected our province to increase in population. For instance, Saint John was told that it would be the Liverpool of America. Anyone can go to Saint John to-day and see how the trade of that port has decreased, except in war time. I might also point out that before confederation Saint John was the fourth largest shipping port in the world.

A few moments ago I mentioned that the yardstick of representation had been increased. I would point out that in 1898 100,000 square miles were added to Quebec. In 1912 another 400,000 square miles were added to that province. The unit of measurement became completely out of line.

There has been an increase in population in other provinces out of proportion to the maritime provinces, because not only did Quebec receive a great increase in territory, but Ontario was greatly increased. All this northern country, these great rich mines which Ontario and Quebec have to-day, were given out of the realm of this country which belonged as much to the maritime provinces as it did to any other part of Canada. They purchased from the Hudson's Bay company great stretches of territory. This territory was purchased with money belonging to the people of the maritime provinces and from other parts of Canada. We in the maritimes cannot increase in area; we are circumscribed by the sea. The little province of Prince Edward Island is an island. There is no possibility of its increasing its territory. Nova Scotia is almost completely an island. She cannot increase in area. New Brunswick could not increase in area unless we took a part of Quebec. If we took part of Quebec we would have to take over the constituency of Temiscouata, and as everyone knows that would only be borrowing trouble for New Brunswick, much as we would feel honoured by having the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) a representative of the province.

Some people think our provinces are not densely populated, but to show the house that we have the most densely concentrated population in Canada I shall read from the Canada Year Book of 1941, which shows that in that year the number of persons per square mile was as follows: Prince Edward Island, 43.52, the highest in Canada; Nova Scotia, 27.86; New Brunswick, 16.65; Quebec, 6.36; Ontario, 10.43; Manitoba, 3.32; Saskatchewan, 3.77; Alberta, 3.20 and British Columbia, 2.28. From these figures it will be seen that while the population of our provinces has in no way reached the saturation point, yet we have far more people to the square mile than has any other part of Canada. There is no possibility of increasing our territory and we cannot hope for a greater population because, as I say, we are the most densely populated part of Canada to-day. They speak about representation by population. That sounds very good, but I should like to ask when we have ever had in fact representation by population in this country. If hon. members will read the history of Canada they will find that such has not been the case. For instance, when Manitoba came into confederation in 1870, according to her population and taking Quebec as the yardstick she was entitled to only one member, but she was given four. In other words, her representation was four times that to which she was entitled. In 1881 she was entitled to three members and was given five. In 1873 Prince Edward Island was entitled to five members and was given six. At confederation British Columbia was entitled to two members and was given six.

Mr. REID: Three.

Mr. BROOKS: British Columbia was given six members at confederation.

Mr. REID: Three members of parliament and six senators.

Mr. BROOKS: My understanding is that British Columbia refused to come into confederation unless she was guaranteed six members; and if the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) will look up the records I think he will find that to be the fact. In 1881, quite a number of years after British Columbia came in, she was entitled to only two members, but she still had six. I mention these facts to show that while we speak about representation by population, that theory has never been followed in this dominion. Population has never been the exclusive yardstick.

We may be told that the maritime provinces are given special consideration under the provisions of this resolution. We have had those special provisions since 1914. Nothing new is being given the maritime provinces; as a matter of fact, if we analyse it, something is being taken away In 1914, I think it was, Mr. E. N. Rhodes was responsible for the inclusion, in the petition then being sent to Westminster, for the following:

> Notwithstanding anything in this section, if upon completion of a computation under rules one and two, the number of members to be assigned to a province is less than the number of senators representing the said province, rules one and two shall cease to apply in respect of the said province, and there shall be assigned to the said province a number of members equal to the said number of senators.

This principle, though perhaps not in those words, was enunciated by Mr. Rhodes, and he was responsible for the consequent amendment at that time. As I tried to point out a few moments ago, we do not consider our representation fair and adequate in view of the importance of our three provinces. In the first place, they are important from a geographical point of view. I ask hon. members to think what Canada would be without the maritime provinces. We have just passed through a great war, during which the great port of Halifax in the maritime provinces played a part as important as that played by any port in the British empire or possibly any of the allied nations. I have seen from a hundred to a hundred and fifty ships lined up in Bedford basin carrying food, munitions and soldiers. Our soldiers fought a great fight, but the port of Halifax played a great part in preserving liberty not only in this country but throughout the world. I could point also to the contribution made by the city of Saint John in the same way, and to many other contributions we have made of our resources, which were handed over to the dominion at the time of confederation. It is not necessary for me to go into details; I am sure if hon. members will stop and think for a moment they will realize the great importance of the maritime provinces. During the winter, when the great ports of Montreal and Quebec are sealed with ice, the trade of this country depends upon Saint John and Halifax.

It may be said that this is not the pact of confederation. Well, I would point out that as far as this pact is concerned the letter of the bond has not been observed in the past. On that point I should like to quote a gentleman who left this house not long ago, who I consider was one of the great members of this parliament in recent years. I refer to Hon. Mr. Ralston, who in 1933, at page 5519 of Hansard for that year, referring to the British North America Act said:

> The letter of the bond has not been observed and nobody has insisted upon it being observed in the matter of relief. The letter of the bond was not observed in the matter of the return of the natural resources which were the property of the dominion. The letter of the bond has not been observed with regard to the extraordinary efforts which have had to be made in order that our people may be clothed and fed and in order that the emergent conditions in which we find ourselves may be met.

Our provinces have always felt that if the spirit of the British North America Act had been carried out, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia would have the same number of members to-day that we had at the time of confederation. Australia, possibly bearing in mind what happened in Canada, took care to see that the smaller states were not affected in this way when that country was united into one great commonwealth. Of the 75 members in their house one state had 26, another had 23, another 9, another 7, and two others 5 each. Their act contained express provision that none of these states should have fewer members than it had at the time of the union, and that provision has been carried out. In 1907, when Mr. Hughes of Prince Edward Island brought up in the House of Commons this matter of representation, many of the leaders of that time, including Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and others, spoke on the question. The hon. member for Lake Centre has placed on Hansard many of the opinions expressed on that occasion by these great statesmen. At page 2202 of Hansard for 1907 Sir Robert Borden said:

> I am inclined to think that the larger provinces would answer a question of that kind very much in the spirit which the Prime Minister himself has expressed and would be inclined to give the three maritime provinces, whose population has not increased so rapidly as that of other parts of the dominion, representation which should never be smaller than at the time when those provinces entered confederation.

Instead of the same representation, as I say, our representation is growing smaller as time goes on.

In 1907 Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke in the same debate, and discussed the question brought up by the hon. member for Lake Centre, a question which is of vital importance to hon. members from the maritime provinces. I believe it is more vital to us than to the people in any other section in Canada. We stand to lose the most. I hope every member from the maritimes, be he Liberal or Progressive Conservative, will support that which I believe will be in the best interests of our three provinces.

Mr. BRIDGES: What about Canada?

Mr. BROOKS: We are part of Canada.

Mr. BRIDGES: What about the best interests of Canada?

Mr. BROOKS: Let me point out to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Bridges) that he is a representative from New Brunswick; and we expect him to represent that province, and to see that it is looked after.

Mr. BRIDGES: And I also represent Canada.

Mr. BROOKS: I would also point out that the other day when he voted to change Dominion day to Canada day he did not represent more than one-tenth of the people in his constituency. He is a new member in the house—and a very fortunate one. As I told him, when I congratulated him some time ago, it was possibly a Hobson's choice which placed him in the position he occupies to-day.

Mr. BRIDGES: I am at least a Canadian.

Mr. BROOKS: I am as good a Canadian as you are.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): You do not show it.

Mr. BROOKS: I should like to quote the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as they were expressed in 1907:

> Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces, who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

That was a leader of the party opposite. No one, least of all, I am sure, the hon. member for York-Sunbury, will question the Canadianism of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He continued by saying:

> My hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket), stated in the course of his argument that we have announced in the speech from the throne that we are going to ask parliament to alter the financial terms of confederation. That is very true; but my hon. friend should know that we did not come to that conclusion except after conference with the provinces and after all the provincial governments had united in a prayer for the same.

That was on a financial matter; and I would say that representation of the people is of far greater importance than a matter of finance.

Then, speaking on the same day and in the same debate Sir Robert Borden said this, as reported at page 2200 of Hansard:

I agree with what has been said by the right hon. gentleman regarding the undesirability of lightly amending the terms of our constitution and am inclined to agree with him on the necessity of some consultation with the provinces, although of course all the provinces are represented here. But inasmuch as this is a federal compact which we are asked to vary, it is only right that each province should be consulted and its decision given, in the right of its separate entity. But I am not inclined to agree altogether in some of the suggestions urged by my hon. friend.

I could go on quoting the words of leading statesmen and, as my good friend the hon. member for Stanstead has said, from the words of the best constitutional lawyers this country has ever produced. One could quote from them all where they have said that in a matter of this kind the provinces should be consulted.

I hold in my hand a quotation from the words of E. M. Macdonald, who at one time was a representative of Pictou in this chamber. At page 2186 of Hansard of the same year, 1907, he stated most emphatically that in a matter of this kind the provinces should be consulted. If my memory serves me correctly, E. M. Macdonald was one of the leading Liberals from that province.

We do not fear so much some of the older provinces in the dominion. We do not fear Quebec; she has been our neighbour since confederation, and I think no one will say that the maritime provinces and Quebec have not got along well together. We feel, so far as that old province is concerned, that with their generous nature we shall be used properly.

We do not fear the old province of Ontario which, too, was one of the cornerstones of confederation. The history of that province is old, like that of the maritimes and Quebec.

So far as the west is concerned, one might say they are new. Possibly they do not have the same ideals as the older provinces have. Those provinces have been populated with people from all parts of the world, to a greater extent than in the other provinces. The ancestors of the families in these older provinces came to them 300 or 400 years ago. But in the western provinces—and I have no criticism in this regard—many of their people came from different sections of Europe. They filled western Canada, and I do not believe they understand fully the history and traditions of Canada, as do the people in the older provinces.

I am reminded of this when I hear statements such as those made this afternoon by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) who said that when or if the C.C.F. party comes into power, the first thing they would do would be either to abolish or reform the senate. What would it mean to the protection of the maritime provinces, with the section in the act as it now is, if the senate of this country were abolished? What protection would we have?

It is for reasons such as this, that I appeal to the house not lightly to allow a change in the act so that, if by any chance—and God forbid that it should happen—a C.C.F. government should take office, with their ideas of reforms, the old traditions and customs might be preserved.

Mr. KNOWLES: Time marches on.

On motion of Mr. Brooks the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 13, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

RIGHT HON. C. D. HOWE

APPOINTMENT TO HIS MAJESTY'S PRIVY COUNCIL

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before the proceedings of the day are entered upon I should like to refer to a matter which I am sure will be of interest to every member of this house. I refer to a report in the morning press that one of our number has been distinctly honoured since we met here yesterday. I wish to take this opportunity on behalf of my associates and myself, and on this occasion I think I can speak for every member of the house, of extending to the Right Honourable Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) our sincere congratulations.

We regard it occasionally as a privilege, sometimes as a right, always as a responsibility, to tell the minister how he can do his job much better than he has done it before or is doing it now. But on an occasion like this, when his war-time service has been recognized by the crown and when it has been expressed in his appointment to the high position of member of the king's privy council, it is one time when we can extend to him our warmest congratulations on this recognition of a war-time task well done. I make these comments whole-heartedly on behalf of every member of this group and, I would like to think, of every member of the house. It is an outstanding honour which has come to one of our members, an honour which is richly deserved.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like on behalf of this party to associate myself with the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). We may not always agree with the minister in some of the policies which he is placing before the house or has placed before the house in days past. But I think we all recognize that the distinction conferred upon him to-day is a mark of the appreciation not only of Canada but of the British commonwealth of the remarkable services which he made to the common cause during the war.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the members of my group would want me to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in expressing our sincere and warm congratulations to the right hon. gentleman who has been distinctly honoured by being made a member of the king's privy council. It is not inconceivable, sir, that the contribution of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply during the time that he was also the minister of munitions during the war was responsible for the victory of the united nations. I think that that is quite possible. While, as the other two gentlemen have said, we may not always have agreed with the things done by the right hon. gentleman, we must admit that all he does is done with a whole heart and a good spirit and with real intent; and we congratulate him upon his success and upon the signal honour which has come to him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Speech!

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the leaders of the opposition parties for their very kind words on this occasion. I feel that the cordiality of the reception of the news in this house almost equals the honour itself as conferring on me a real distinction. I can only hope that I can continue to serve Canada in a manner worthy of the honour which has been bestowed upon me.

COAL

UNITED STATES EMBARGO—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite emergency, a matter of great and urgent public importance, namely, the United States embargo on coal, issued on June 11 to the Ore and Coal Exchange of Cleveland and on account of the great lakes shipping strike, which embargo was temporarily suspended, and also the tie-up of nearly 25,000 hopper coal cars at United States lake ports ready to unload coal for Canada to Canadian ships, and to discuss the grave peril of drastic shortages of supply to Canadian homes without any supply whatever, especially in central Canada next fall and winter, and the urgent need of an all-Canadian national coal policy accordingly.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not quite sure that this is a matter of urgent public importance, but of course, under standing order 31, if twenty members rise the hon. member may proceed.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. CHURCH: I shall not detain the house for more than a few minutes. I first brought up this important question of a national fuel supply and a national policy for Canada on March 19, 1923. I am not going to repeat now what I said at that time, and what I have reiterated several times since, but I wish to impress upon the government the gravity of the present situation, especially to central Canada. An opportunity will be afforded me, I have no doubt, under the main estimates to go into this matter more fully, but at the moment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. CHURCH: Louder? Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to speak for more than five minutes this afternoon, and I want to impress the importance of this matter on the government and on the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. By the way, I knew him when he was a young engineer and I should like to congratulate him now on the honour that has come to him. To come back to the coal question, we are faced with the most awful winter that Canada will ever have experienced. I have urged upon the government from time to time the importance of a national fuel policy. According to the latest reports we have received, we shall be shut out from the United States this winter by embargo as far as a coal supply is concerned. Geologists there say that they have a supply for seventy-five years, and I do not think that Canadians should depend further upon the United States for their coal. Thousands of cars are tied up in the United States—twenty or twenty-five thousand American cars at lake Erie ports—and I suggest that the time has come for us to take action and move them. In Alberta and in the maritime provinces, I suggest, lies the solution to our problem, through a national fuel policy. Although, as I have said, I first brought this matter to the attention of the house on March 19, 1923, little has been done about it by the government. The problem is largely one of transportation, and the shortages are in the central provinces, in which there are no coal deposits. The east should move coal as far west as possible; Alberta should move it as far east as it can, and it is for the government now to take active steps to solve the problem by a national supply.

I would ask the hon. gentleman who is seconding the motion to say a few words on the subject.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) deserves the unstinted praise of the whole country for his energy and foresight in bringing this resolution before the house, and Your Honour also deserves unstinted praise for allowing it to be presented for discussion. I wish also to thank the house for allowing it to be discussed.

Before I proceed to address a few words to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) may I pause to congratulate him personally upon the high honour that has been conferred upon him. I have said on many occasions across the floor of the house that he is one minister who invariably knows what he is talking about, who knows all the answers; he has a vast fund of information such as few other men in this house can draw upon. Once more I congratulate him sincerely on the high honour that has been conferred upon him.

A few days ago the minister made this statement, as quoted in this morning's Globe and Mail of Toronto, which brings it up to date:

> Unless the production and transportation of coal is resumed in the United States in the near future, the central provinces of Canada are faced with nothing less than a calamity, and our people and our industries may be faced with hardship and distress on a scale never experienced during the war years.

That announcement by the right hon. gentleman has caused in my part of the country very grave anxiety over the possible experience next winter. It was quite right that he should warn the people of the calamity that is facing them, and it devolves upon the whole House of Commons to see that that threatened calamity is averted, or at least the severity of fuel conditions mitigated as far as possible.

We take up a lot of time in this house on matters of little or no importance, the decision of which is of little consequence to the people, but here is something that is of colossal import to everyone. When I was last at home I went to my old coal dealer and was informed that it was useless leaving my order for coal. I have quite a number of buildings and the comfort of their tenants depends upon me. For their safety I may have to order oil burners. In my own home I have to take out two boilers and have them replaced with a single boiler equipped as an oil burner. I do not mind doing that, but everybody cannot do it. In my own section of the city there is a large working-class population. It would be certainly financially impossible, for one out of twenty-five to buy an oil burner. They have to burn coal. It is a tremendous problem for these humble homes, in which from ninety to ninety-five per cent of the population reside. They will be the sufferers if they cannot get coal. The other five or ten per cent may be able to purchase oil burners. If they are able to obtain the oil they will not suffer, but the great mass of Canadians, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, which provinces have no coal of their own, are in jeopardy.

I am sorry to learn that the anticipated production of coal in the lignite area of northern Ontario is not to be had. It has been found that the moisture content of the lignite coal there is so great that the cost of production would far exceed the value received. That will be a serious blow to northern Ontario, because, as the hon. member for Timiskaming will say if he speaks on this subject, they have been expecting to get coal from northern Ontario. Therefore from whatever point of view it is considered it is a serious problem and a great menace to Ontario people.

I am now going to speak particularly for the people of Toronto. In Toronto we have an energetic mayor. He is always keenly alive to the best interests of the people. A few days ago he issued a solemn warning which can be found in the Toronto Telegram of June 7, as follows:

> The mayor pointed out that last year, to June 6, eighty-six coal-carrying ships had docked in Toronto harbour, with 418,849 tons of coal. This year to date, only twenty-six ships have arrived with 97,440 tons, a loss to date of 321,409 tons.

This is a most serious threat to the comfort of the people of that city during next fall and winter. Within three months time we shall start burning coal in Toronto. The month of June is half gone. How many homes in Toronto have coal I do not know; I have not any, I could not get it. The great majority of homes in Toronto are without coal, and within three months we shall have to start burning it, because many of the homes in that city are heated in the winter with hot water. That system of heating has the reverse effect in the fall months if the heat is not on. The radiators, being full of cold water, will cool the house down to an almost unbearable degree. Therefore it is a matter of vital importance to these people. The minister is probably doing all he can with the staff under his control, but we have to do more than that. What more can be done at the moment I do not know.

Yesterday the coal controller issued a statement in which he said, according to the Toronto Globe:

> The shortage in the central provinces this winter is estimated at somewhere near 5,500,000 tons.

This is a serious problem for the people in the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. I wonder if hon. members realize what it means for the two provinces to be short 5,500,000 tons of coal. It has been said by some that we might use hydro-electric power. Well, the hydro commission in Toronto issued a statement in which they said that to heat five per cent of Toronto homes would require one-third of the hydro power, which is somewhere in the neighbourhood of two and a half to three million horse-power. It would mean that if the homes of Toronto and environs were to be heated by electricity, one-third of all the power that hydro has would heat only fifteen per cent of all the homes.

I am not going to proceed at any length. I am sure that what will be said by the mover and what will be said by the hon. members will attract the attention of this house. That is what we must do—attract the attention of the house to the serious threat to the health of the people of these two great central provinces—I shall not speak of the other provinces at the moment—I certainly will support the minister in anything he can do to expedite shipments of coal and its delivery to the dealers in Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): There is no doubt about the seriousness of the matter raised by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), but in reading the document that he passed to Your Honour I find that he has it chewed up in such a fashion that it is difficult to understand exactly what subject he wants action on at the moment.

The seriousness of the coal situation in Canada did not develop yesterday or the day before. It has been slowly developing over the last twenty years, and it has been heading inevitably toward what we have at the present time.

In his motion the hon. member for Broadview deplores the fact that the United States has placed an embargo on coal. I would not expect them to do anything else. The people of the United States have developed their own resource to take care of their own requirements. In addition, in the last three or four years they have been exporting twenty million odd tons of coal to Canada to help us out. It is an indictment against us. We should not scream because the United States government is protecting its own people in their fuel requirements. The indictment in the statement made by the hon. member for Broadview is against ourselves, in that although, a nation of eleven million people, are in possession of one-half of the north American continent, which has as great fuel resources as has the United States, we have neglected to develop our own resource to meet the requirements of our own people. I have no argument or quarrel with the United States government for seeing that the requirements of its own people are met at this time.

As to overcoming this fuel shortage, I do not expect the minister to do it, because you cannot cure in a short time a disease that has been growing for more than twenty years under both Liberal and Conservative administrations. For the last twenty years particularly I remember pilgrimage after pilgrimage leaving the mining areas, both east and west, and converging upon Ottawa with briefs, the preparation of which cost a great deal of money, pointing out to both Conservative and Liberal administrations the situation which was slowly developing and indicating that the time was approaching when, if Canada did not expand her own resources, we could not expect to lean on the United States. I have said that in this house many times during the last five years. The mechanics of a national fuel policy have been set out time and again by representatives of the miners' union, by provincial governments and by interested citizens. Unfortunately all these submissions went to the archives, and nothing was done.

In my opinion the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) is helpless to do very much at this time. You cannot develop a mine overnight; you cannot increase production in old, worn out mines. In the beginning of the last war the recommendation was advanced in this house, and in briefs submitted to the government, that new development should be undertaken in the coal fields. That requires a large capital outlay. The present operators are not going to spend the money; they have made this abundantly clear. No agency in Canada, other than the government, is going to tackle that problem and make the capital expenditure necessary to increase both the quantity and quality of fuel available in this country. The government cannot meet the present emergency, either, because I do not think production can be stepped up in the industry as it exists at present. A royal commission has been set up to study this question, and by this time I suppose that commission knows more than anyone else in Canada about the possibility of increasing production and the problems of marketing our coal. I suggest to the minister that he get in touch with the personnel of that commission and ask for an interim report on the possibility of getting additional production. I do not expect the minister to be able to do anything about it. I do not know what the royal commission would suggest, but I see no possible chance of improving the situation to any great extent from Canadian production; so if we are to depend upon our own production this year a great many people in Canada will go cold. The only solution is to get assistance from the United States, as we have done in the past.

The hon. member for Broadview also points out that some fuel is available in the Untied States, but that because of the strike on the great lakes that coal cannot be brought across to Canada. As I understand the hon. gentleman's motion, there are some 25,000 cars at lake ports. I am not going into the merits or demerits of that strike on the great lakes, though I will say that it too is the result of neglect. I do not think the strike on the great lakes ever should have developed. The only question at issue there is the establishment of an eight-hour day, something every other classification of worker on this continent secured many years ago by legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend speaks of neglect. Neglect by whom?

Mr. GILLIS: Neglect by both Liberal and Conservative governments.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: They have been in power.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the C.C.F.?

Mr. GILLIS: We have not been in power yet. When we are, you will not have any discussion of this kind taking place. If we had been sitting over there when this war broke out there is no doubt about what we would have done in connection with fuel. Do you know our policy? We would have developed new mines.

An hon. MEMBER: We would have lost the war.

Mr. GILLIS: I get a lot of fun out of this sort of thing. Every time you throw a stone into a pack of wolves you hear a howl from the one you hit. This is just a natural development; I don't mind it. He who has a guilty conscience is very susceptible to criticism.

Mr. GRANT: You would not have won the war.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, if there were enough C.C.F. governments in the world, there would not be any war. There would be no hungry people, no poverty and insecurity, and no reason to go to war. I say to the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), in a kindly way, that the matter has been neglected. As I said a moment ago, most of the other workers on this continent have the eight-hour day by legislation, and have had it for a long time.

Mr. MacNICOL: Coal miners should have it. Why haven't they?

Mr. MacINNIS: They have it.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the fishermen and farmers?

Mr. GILLIS: They regulate their own hours; there is no boss over them with a whip. If a farmer or fisherman wants to get up at four o'clock in the morning, that is up to him. In the field of industry, however, legislation is possible, and the seamen come within that category. I think back in 1919 or 1920 the Canadian government signified by an international understanding that it was favourable to an eight-hour day for seamen. The only point at issue in the seamen's strike is the granting of an eight-hour day and the establishment of a three-watch system on the boats.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not like to say this, but my hon. friend should look into the thing. I agree that one of the points of dissension is the eight-hour day, but that is not all.

Mr. GILLIS: There are other incidentals.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are more than incidentals.

Mr. GILLIS: I think that is the basic problem at issue in the strike. If that question could be satisfactorily dealt with, I believe the other matters of wages and so forth could be ironed out without great difficulty. When

I say it is a matter of neglect, I say any government that entered into an international understanding twenty odd years ago that seamen should have an eight-hour day should have done something about implementing that understanding. Hon. gentlemen to my right had a chance to do something about it from 1930 to 1935, but they neglected it also. In addition to the government not having implemented that international understanding, however, there is the problem of our present labour legislation. A few days ago the minister stated—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I wonder if the remarks of the hon. gentleman are relevant to the question before the house. He will see in the motion of the hon. member for Broadview these words:

—and to discuss the grave peril of drastic shortages of supply to Canadian homes without any supply whatever, especially in central Canada next fall and winter, and the urgent need of an all-Canadian national coal policy accordingly.

An hon. member has the privilege of moving the adjournment of the house to discuss an important and urgent matter, but the remarks made should be relevant to the motion before the house.

Mr. GILLIS: I have read the motion very carefully, Mr. Speaker, and I am following it clause by clause. As I said when I rose, the motion is so badly twisted that it is difficult to understand exactly what is required. I do not blame you, Mr. Speaker, for being confused. When I discuss a subject I always try to speak with relevance to that subject. I have read carefully the part of the motion which deals with the embargo—the preamble, one might call it—and I am trying to follow the suggestion contained in the hon. member's motion that there are certain reasons for the shortage of fuel in Canada. The hon. member says this:

The United States embargo on coal, issued on June 11, to the ore and coal exchange of Cleveland, and on account of the great lakes shipping strike—

That is it.

—which embargo was temporarily suspended, and also the tie-up of nearly 25,000 hopper coal cars at United States lake ports.

One would get the impression that the hon. member for Broadview is telling the house that there are 25,000 cars of coal on the other side of the border which could be made available to the country if the strike on the great lakes were settled. If that is so, I believe I am in order in discussing the relevancy of that strike to the Canadian fuel situation, and in suggesting to the minister ways and means whereby the strike might be avoided and settled, in order to get the coal into Canada by ships.

I had begun to point out to the minister that I believe much of our difficulty to-day in the field of labour has arisen from the fact that there have grown up in Canada during the war a series of emergency measures in respect of labour which, while applicable during the time of war, after the termination of hostilities are not suitable, because we are now facing a completely new problem. The mechanics available in the Department of Labour to-day for the settlement of disputes should be revamped to meet the new conditions. Instead of having to go through all the ramifications of war labour boards, there should be a shorter cut. Those boards create antagonism in the minds of the workers, with the result that we have upheaval. I say the time has come when the Minister of Labour should consider seriously the abandonment of regional and national war labour boards. Instead of having that kind of machinery the minister should have regional and national industrial councils, with equal representation from employers, employees and governments. Then instead of the seamen or the steelworkers or any other group employed on certain specific jobs having to sit down and talk to the members of a war labour board, the chairman of which may have studied law and may be most competent in his own field, but who does not understand judging the merits or demerits of a dispute, they would discuss the matter with those more competent to judge.

In my opinion many of the decisions made to-day are faulty because the problems are not well understood. The minister knows these problems, and I believe if he were meeting with those who have specific grievances, together with representatives from industry and from his own department, he could sit around a table with them and could understand what was being said. Each group would understand what the other was talking about.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just completed a four-hour session before coming to the house to-day, and I have been doing that every day all week.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but the minister does not make any decisions. His decisions must go back to the national war labour board. I call the minister's attention to the Sydney plant, and the five-cent differential in rate. I know he would have granted that five cents four years ago. But he has not the power; the matter has to go back to the national war labour board. They rejected it again last week—after four years of discussion. And we wonder why there is trouble!

I am suggesting to the minister the time has come when he should accept more responsibility, by meeting with those concerned, dealing with both sides, talking bluntly and with common sense, to find out which side may be at fault. If that had been done five or six months ago with the Canadian seamen, we would not be confronted now with a strike on the great lakes to-day, and would not be relating that strike to the shortage of fuel in Canada. I ask the minister to consider that seriously.

I believe this strike could be settled; it should have been settled long ago. I do not see how any employer in this country can be permitted to sit down and say, "I am going to tie up the ships on the great lakes because I do not want to recognize an organization, and I do not want to grant an eight hour day to my employees." That is not his prerogative; it is the prerogative of the Canadian government. The eight hour day has been an accepted principle throughout the continent—and was accepted many years ago. When an employer takes the dog-in-the-manger attitude, then I say he is defying the accepted laws of the country. He is being unfair with anyone who is trying to deal fairly with him.

On the other hand if the Minister of Labour, or the government, as indicated a few days ago by the minister, believes that a small group in the leadership of any organization is taking advantage of the fact that the membership are not as well posted as their leaders, and if the minister and government feel that such leaders are manipulating those organizations for political purposes or for their own purposes, then I say the minister should be just as frank with that small group guilty of disruption of production as he would be to the other side. There cannot be any middle-of-the-road policy in a matter of this kind. Neither should one use the big stick on one section and refuse to use it on the other. If the minister takes the position that he is going to be fair to both sides, then he should use the same language to both sides. If the minister believed for a minute that the union was at fault, he should tell them so, and should tell them what they should do. On the other hand he should also tell the employers and owners what they should do, when they say the eight-hour day is not going to be accepted. Let him tell those people that the eight-hour day is accepted, and that it is time they got in line. Let him say: You will fall in with it, or we will put a controller in and take over your business, so that you can have an opportunity to study labour legislation which has been in existence in other parts of the world for many years.

I am not going to occupy more of the time of the house. I leave with the minister this suggestion, that the time has come when he should be facing the situation squarely, when he should be changing existing laws which in my opinion are promoting strikes. Let him be fair to both sides, if it is in the best interests of the people of Canada. Let him not pull his punches when talking to either side; and if he does that, I believe the Canadian people will support him.

I am sorry to find the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply facing this problem. It pleased me to see that he received some recognition for services rendered by him during the war. My experience in dealing with him has been that he wants to get things done. In this instance, however, he has inherited a problem that has been developing for twenty years, and has now reached a point where there is no easy or early solution.

The minister might as well take time by the forelock and make a large appropriation of money to deal with this matter. Let him tap some of the potentially rich seams in Canada, so that we may get ready for the next generation, and will not be left at the mercy of the United States, when they put on an embargo to protect their own people.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I should like to straighten out one or two points, to prevent the discussion in this debate from going too far afield. It has been suggested in the motion that the United States government has put an embargo on coal for shipment to Canada from United States ports. That is not the fact. The fact is that coal has been moving into United States ports in excess of the unloading and yard capacities to handle the cars. The embargo is of a type that is sometimes imposed at the head of the lakes during the grain rush, that is, an embargo against the loading of grain until the congestion at the lakehead could be cleared away. Any boat that can take coal to Canada is being loaded, and coal is moving freely in cars to the extent of the availability of the equipment and the ability of the railroads to move that equipment. I may say that the United States government has always recognized the position of Canada, and is doing so on the present occasion. It is, as it always has been, and is being most helpful in aiding Canada in obtaining her coal requirements.

On several occasions I have sounded a note of alarm with regard to the present position of our coal supply in this country. We entered the summer season with stocks unusually depleted. Canada, owing to the fact that her coal movement must take place in the summer months, has been accustomed to carrying comparatively large stockpiles of coal. The movement of coal was difficult throughout the war, and gradually those stockpiles were reduced until at the beginning of this season of navigation we had very little coal in stock in the country. The movement of coal after the opening has been disappointing. Up to the time of the bituminous coal strike in the United States, the movement had been very much smaller than was usual in any corresponding period in the last few years. The bituminous strike stopped the movement almost wholly. The anthracite coal strike which followed greatly curtailed the movement of domestic coal into this country, and the shipping strike which followed closely on the heels of both has practically brought the movement of coal into this country to a standstill. The result is that we are at least 5,500,000 tons short of the position that we should be in at this season of the year, with no present indication that the situation can be corrected. The fact is that Canada produces 17,000,000 tons of coal and imports 25,000,000 tons, the imports being almost wholly into the central provinces. That coal is imported from the United States.

Much has been said about correcting the situation by mining more Alberta coal, and by shipping more coal from Nova Scotia. The movement of coal from Alberta is limited by the ability of our railroads to move the coal. We have planned for this year a movement of 1,000,000 tons from Alberta to the central provinces, which will be twice the movement that we have ever had in a similar period. That is a phenomenally large movement of Alberta coal to Ontario, and it is all that the railroads believe can possibly be moved. When that coal is moved it will represent one twenty-fifth of the requirements of the two central provinces.

Shipping limitations would make it impossible this year to move more than 3,000,000 tons of coal from Nova Scotia into central Canada. However, we shall be fortunate if we are able to move 1,000,000 tons of coal from the east owing to the fact that production in the maritime provinces provides little surplus over the actual requirements of the maritime provinces. If we could increase the production of coal in the maritime provinces from 5,000,000 tons to 7,000,000 tons, we could probably ship 3,000,000 tons into the central provinces. But there again, if we are able to do that we would be receiving from the maritime provinces only three twenty-fifths of the requirements of the central provinces.

The cold fact of the matter is that we are dependent for the bulk of our coal supplies in the two central provinces on shipments from the United States, and there is no physical means of replacing that coal from other sources. That is a situation which I have never attempted to minimize. Anyone who interjects any note of optimism into the present fuel situation in Canada is misleading the people of Canada. It is a serious situation. Steps have been taken to increase the supplies of fuel oil, both light oil for domestic purposes and heavy oil for industrial purposes. I am happy to be able to report that some progress has been made in that direction. But there again if the coal equivalent of all the fuel oil that can be brought in and stored in this country, or that can be refined in this country, is added to the movement from eastern and western Canada, it means only a matter of two million additional tons of coal. Once again I say that our position next winter will depend wholly on our ability to move coal from the United States into the two central provinces.

It has been claimed in some sources that Canada has no national fuel policy. As a matter of fact it can be said that since 1928 the government has had a definite national fuel policy. In the years 1928 to 1944 there was paid out as assistance to the movement of Nova Scotia coal to Quebec and Ontario a sum of approximately $25,000,000. During the same period there was paid out for the assistance of the movement of coal from Alberta and eastern British Columbia approximately $10,000,000. In addition, between the years 1931 and 1944 the British Columbia industry received assistance on exports and bunker shipments totalling approximately $1,250,000. Nor is that all. From 1930 to 1945 approximately $3,500,000 was paid to the steel industry of Nova Scotia as a bonus for coal entering into the manufacture of steel, and up to 1944 a further sum of $630,000 was paid out under the Domestic Fuel Act on coal entering into the production of gas and coke. Further encouragement to the Canadian coal industry is provided by a duty of seventy-five cents a ton on bituminous coal and fifty cents a ton on United States anthracite. In short, I say that Canada has had a national fuel policy.

I would point out that it is not practical from a short-range viewpoint, for Canada to become self-sufficient as regards coal. The present estimated consumption of coal in Ontario and Quebec, practically all from the United States, is around 25,000,000 tons per year. Based upon our experience after the last war ended, considering the immense backlog of orders and requirements for manufactured goods, and the probable necessity of moving large tonnages of grain and other food products for export, it can be expected that our coal requirements in this area will remain over 20,000,000 tons for some years.

With a prospective heavy grain movement from western Canada, the present railway facilities will be pressed to the limit to move east 1,000,000 tons of coal, and this requirement, plus the extra coal needed by the railways in the west, will take up practically all available output. From eastern Canada, if production was up to a figure of 7,000,000 tons instead of approximately 5,000,000 tons, it might be possible to move up to 3,000,000 tons. Because of the heavy demand for steel and manufactures of all kinds, it is not practical to consider any substantial increase in railway facilities, since our capacity in that direction will be more or less fully employed in replacing the present equipment that has been worked to capacity during the war. Therefore for some time yet it is simply not practicable to supply our central Canadian coal requirements to any large extent from Canadian sources. The longer range policy is at present under review by the royal commission on coal, and will be examined in the light of the report. An interim report has been requested of the commission, and it is hoped that something will be obtained from that source which will help us in planning a shorter range project. Let me say again, however, that the government cannot change the geography of Canada, nor can it ignore the immutable laws of economics.

The hon. member for Broadview, who introduced this motion, has been for many years an advocate of a national coal policy. I notice that as early as March, 1923, he proposed a resolution in this house demanding that the government institute a national coal policy. I believe that his insistence in advocating such a policy has been a spur to succeeding governments in doing what has been done in that direction. I am only sorry that some steps cannot be taken at this time which will represent an effective short-range policy. But I can assure the hon. member that when the report of the royal commission is received, steps will be taken by the government to see that so serious a situation cannot arise in the future.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion may I make a preliminary observation: I am a little disappointed that the minister rose in his seat just when I did. I am quite happy, of course, to have you, Mr. Speaker, see the minister before you saw me. He has been honoured to-day, and is a much more important gentleman than the hon. member for Macleod. But I might just mention that too often in debates of this kind our Conservative friends are heard, our C.C.F. friends are heard, and then a minister rises as though there were nobody else in the house to be heard. That very often happens.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make it clear that I must go to a garden party: that is the reason for my rising when I did.

Mr. HANSELL: We shall have a little party here for a while. The minister is not the only one who wants to go to the garden party. It may be that the group in this corner of the house, speaking, as it does, usually with some authority, causes ministers to rise first in order that they may not be embarrassed by having to answer certain questions which we in this corner might put to them.

However, I am glad that the minister did speak, because what he said is to me an apology for a poor case. He sounded an alarm. He has risen on other occasions and sounded an alarm as to the seriousness of the situation, advising the coal dealers to cut down on their sales because there might be a serious shortage before winter. That is not good enough. We in Canada should have no need of these alarms. Then, again, he tried to focus some of the responsibility and cast some of the blame upon the railroads, on the ground that their capacity was limited. We have had railroads in this country for a good many years, and during the war years they were taxed to capacity, but certainly to-day their capacity cannot be more heavily taxed than it was then. To me, therefore, the minister's apology in that respect was a weak one. He goes on to tell us why this emergency exists to-day. Well, what we rise to tell him is why the emergency should not exist to-day. He tried to convince us; in fact his words were definite, that Canada did have, and has had since 1928, a definite fuel policy. If that is so, it must have broken down somewhere; and if his statement is correct I should like to ask him why it was found necessary last year to bring into existence the Carroll coal commission, whose terms of reference were to study the whole problem of the coal industry in Canada and report back with some definite fuel policy for the future. His argument there, I am afraid, does not hold water.

The present emergency does not directly affect the Macleod constituency, for we have in that area many mines which can well supply our own people. But it affects my constituency to the extent that we have a large coal mining industry there, in the Crowsnest pass, and that industry is well aware that over the years Canada has not had an adequate national fuel policy. Commissions have been set up, and many committees and boards have reviewed from time to time the coal situation in this country. In fact, we have had a Canadian fuel board whose business it is to go into all branches of research and advise the government on the coal problems of the day. In spite of this, we are in a situation where the people of Canada, a country which produces 18 per cent of the world's coal supply, are likely to go cold and industry is likely to have to stop its wheels of production.

When the war broke out I took a particular interest in this matter, for I recognized that if the coal mining industry did not function properly our war industries would be seriously affected. I took the time to write an exhaustive letter to three ministers of the crown, —the then Minister of Labour, the then Minister of Mines and Resources, and the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I explained in my letter to them that the past records of production of coal in the United States, on which we were dependent for our own coal, showed that should there be any disruption in the coal mining industry there, even to a slight extent, it would seriously affect the industrial war effort of Canada. I put before the minister the seriousness of that situation, for this was before the United States came into the war. I visualized the eventuality of strikes taking place in the United States and I wanted him to guard against the results of any such strikes. I tried to persuade him to tackle the problem before such an emergency arose.

What was the result of those three letters? The Minister of Mines and Resources—not the present minister, but the hon. gentleman who then occupied the office—did not reply to my letter at all; and since that time he has been politically rewarded, for to-day he sits in another place. I do not believe the Minister of Munitions and Supply answered my letter, but I may have to stand corrected in that regard because I am trusting to my memory. The only minister who replied was the then Minister of Labour, the Hon. Mr. McLarty. He told me that he had submitted my letter to his officials for study and advice.

I spoke to him personally on the matter, again trying to show him the seriousness of possible events. Eventually I received a reply from him to the effect that his advisers had gone into the matter very carefully and had even gone so far as to interview—perhaps it was by way of correspondence, because I do not recall—the officials at Washington, and he stated that they were not overalarmed about the situation. They thought they had everything under control.

It was just fortunate perhaps that events did not turn out adversely during the war; but the war is over now, and have they had everything under complete control? We are now faced with an emergency which might have occurred in those days. Fortunately for us it did not, but we are now faced with it, and the government is at a loss to know what to do.

There are one or two other things that have affected the production of coal in Canada in the past and are perhaps still affecting it. One of these is the taxation policy of the government with regard to incomes, because there are many coal miners who will not work six days of the week when by working five days their income remains within certain brackets, whereas by working the extra day—in fact, it is not an extra day but one of the six days in the week—their incomes jump to a higher bracket and, by reason of taxation in that bracket, they work for much less for that extra day. They say, "What is the use? We will stay at home." The coal mines have stayed open just the same. They do not close down altogether because of that extra day, but many man-hours have been lost and a great deal of the production of coal has been curtailed. The result is that we have not mined as much coal because of that particular income taxation policy.

Again, there have been times when coal cars have not been available for the transportation of this coal, and it has not always been because these cars were used for some other purpose. Many times they have stood idle on the side tracks.

The government of this day and governments of the past must take the responsibility themselves for this emergency. No one else is to blame in a country of this kind, endowed with rich coal deposits such as Canada has. There is no excuse for such a situation. If the people of Canada go cold—well, they will not be cold to-day while the minister is at the garden party, but if they go cold this winter, then they should know where to place the blame; they will put it there and they will speak in a voice that political parties will hear at the next election.

There is one other matter I wish to bring to the minister's attention. Perhaps it will be considered as not so important, but there has appeared in some of the newspapers recently the suggestion that a good deal of natural gas in Canada could be piped to our eastern cities. I have not gone into the practicability of that suggestion. I think it is a matter of finance, finding the money to do it. I am quite sure the minister will be able to find the suitable expressions to tell us that it is not practicable, but my constituency happens to take in a part of the Turner valley oil fields. I have wondered many times, as many tourists must wonder, and many honest Canadians must have wondered, at the tremendous waste of natural gas that goes on in those oil fields. There have been days when millions of cubic feet of gas simply burned in the air—every day, as someone says. I have been in those parts and have seen huge flares. You could not get within two or three hundred yards of them without being scorched. There they were burning, day in and day out, year in and year out. I sometimes think such waste is not only a tragedy but an insult to omnipotent creative genius; for the kind Creator has put these things in the ground for the use of his creatures, and what happens? We take them and blow them back in his face.

An hon. MEMBER: Throw them away.

Mr. HANSELL: We throw them away.

Mr. REID: May I ask the hon. member a question? Are these resources not under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments?

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, but the provincial governments do not want this gas to go to waste any more than anybody else does. The provincial governments certainly are not responsible for piping the gas to Toronto or Montreal or some other city. That certainly is a federal responsibility. The provincial governments would be only too glad to tap natural gas into the pipelines if only the federal government will see that the pipelines are built. There is another point, of course, namely, that it takes a lot of money to build these pipelines.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would take $30 million; that is not much.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Davenport says it would take $30 million. That is just peanuts, small potatoes, chicken feed, anything that is small, small change, collections. It can be done.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend agrees that $30 million would not be too much to spend to pipe gas from Alberta?

Mr. HANSELL: Certainly it would not be too much to spend.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what I meant.

Mr. HANSELL: It would be not only a cheap experiment, but one which would turn out to be of great advantage to the Canadian people. It might mean a little disruption in something else; some other industry might be affected by it. Well, governments in power have the responsibility to bring in other legislation so that the whole economy of the country can run smoothly year in and year out. In spite of any praise that can be given to the government for that which they may do—and that applies to all governments—I say to the house that they have miserably failed in respect of a fuel policy for Canada and the Canadian people.

Mr. D. A. CROLL (Spadina): I had originally intended to reply to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). But in the course of his speech he told the story of the three letters which he wrote to ministers, the first one to a minister who became a senator, the second one to a minister who did not reply to him and became a right honourable, and the third minister who replied to him and has now passed to the great beyond; consequently I have decided to leave the matter as it is.

The motion contained two points. First of all, it dealt with the embargo, and, second, with the great lakes strike. The minister's words on the embargo warmed the house when he assured us that there was no such thing as an embargo. Then the question about the great lakes strike comes up for consideration. I appreciate that there is a great deal of confusion in the country as to responsibility. To-day's papers carry the story that the government have laid down a formula which has been accepted by the seamen but has been rejected by the operators. My hon. friend said that the blame ought to be placed where it belongs. All I say is that the house ought to point at the people who are to blame for not settling the strike, and it certainly is not the seamen's union.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to say a few words in connection with this matter. There is no doubt that we are confronted with a grave emergency so far as the coal situation is concerned. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said, it is not something that has developed overnight, and it has not developed because of any one particular circumstance. Undoubtedly what has intensified the situation is the strike on the great lakes. If that strike should be settled quickly, perhaps some of the urgency of the crisis would be overcome, but it would not be overcome entirely.

There is a general shortage of coal to-day, pretty well all over the world, and Canada cannot fail to be affected by that to some extent. It is not solely a matter of providing the necessary money. Some mention was made of the fact that $30 million would be required to do certain work in connection with taking natural gas from Alberta and bringing it to Toronto. Perhaps the $30 million could be found much easier for that kind of work than the material and the labour. What the world is confronted with to-day is not that we cannot find the money to do these things. It has been demonstrated that we can find the money. The difficulty which faces us now is that of finding the material and labour, and finding the material is largely a matter of finding the labour to produce the material. It is a matter of organization.

The providing of the necessities of life—and this is one other proof that the providing of the necessities of life can no longer be left to the vagaries of private enterprise which may or may not do the things required—is of paramount importance.

The failure in the coalfields began shortly after the last war. The failure of the coalfields to meet satisfactorily the requirements of people in the various parts of the world began after the last war and it has developed progressively ever since. It is a matter of coal competing with another and cheaper fuel, namely electricity. What the government should do now, regardless of how soon the seamen's strike is settled, is to formulate a national coal policy so that this country can make the best of its great natural resources in western and eastern Canada.

I happened to be in Halifax in October, 1938. There I met a delegation which came from the village of Thorburn, Nova Scotia, to meet the government when the proprietors of the coal mine there, the Dominion Steel and Coal company, I assume, had decided to close that mine. By that action they not only deprived the country of a certain amount of fuel but completely deprived the fifteen hundred or so people of that village—I believe there were some three hundred men working in the mine—of their only means of subsistence. This delegation pointed out that while the existing mine was about depleted of its coal, right within that very district there was an enormous amount of the best coal in Nova Scotia which could be developed; but the owners of the mine said they were not going to develop it until times were more propitious for that to be done. So I repeat that the people of Canada are not going to overcome these difficulties until the government, on behalf of the people, will organize a national fuel policy in order to make available to ourselves the fuel, coal and other fuels, with which this country is so richly endowed.

All I would say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, is that of course we should adopt every means possible to settle the seamen's strike quickly. Since the eight-hour day is the root cause of the trouble, it is up to the government to see that the eight-hour day is put into effect on all Canadian ships. That would be the first step in ending this emergency. The next step, as I said, is the creation of a long-term national fuel policy which will make use of all our fuel resources.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with what I had intended to say, might I refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) who has just taken his seat. The hon. member never misses an opportunity of casting a slur against private enterprise. He pretends to argue that if only the mines of Canada were in the hands of the government there would be no difficulty with respect to this coal situation. Once more the hon. member completely misses the point. Even if the government owned every mine in Alberta and every mine in Nova Scotia, if the government were not prepared to subsidize the transportation of that coal into Ontario and Quebec and to adopt other policies which would result in the distribution of Canadian coal throughout Canada, then certainly the government would have no solution of the problem and we would be in exactly the position in which we are now.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the hon. gentleman allow me a word, since he has brought my mind into his argument? I think he is the one who is missing the point. I would assume that if the government organized a coal policy for the people of Canada, they would do that very thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the hon. member had only said that, instead of continuing his incessant slur against private enterprise, he might get somewhere.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not cast any slurs against private enterprise.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We shall let Hansard decide.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend can come to their assistance if he wishes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend and I will settle this some time in the future. Just now we are talking about a coal policy, and the important thing is to keep one's eye on the ball. In this case the ball is to get all the coal needful in Canada mined and distributed to Canadians. Government ownership or private ownership of the mines makes not the slightest difference; there are other matters involved.

A national coal policy for Canada has been neglected up to the present time, as has been pointed out by several hon. members who have already spoken; and because of that neglect we are now facing this dangerous situation. Why has a national fuel policy been neglected? When I first came to Ottawa in 1936 and began to have some contact with ministers of the crown I tried to urge upon those who were then in power the necessity of developing a national fuel policy, for very much the same reasons which were advanced by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). But I found nothing but deaf ears, which quite confounded me. There were thousands and thousands of unemployed in the mining areas of Alberta. The railroads lacked freight to haul. There was every reason that could be conceived why we should develop our coal industry and bring Canadian coal into Ontario and Quebec. Yet I found no interest; or if there was interest there was only a sort of indulgent and helpless shrug of the shoulders and hands, which quite astonished me. I wondered why, and I have wondered ever since. I have wondered if it is because a great deal of Canadian money is invested in certain mining concerns in the United States, and if certain Canadian interests wanted to have the coal from those mines brought into Canada to find a market here. I have never been able to have that question answered to my own satisfaction, but I have heard rumours which would indicate that the thought was perhaps not entirely without justification.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that not a slur on private enterprise?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is not a slur on private enterprise; it is an instance of mismanagement on the part of the government. Of course private enterprise needs to be taken care of, just the same as any ordinary man driving on the street has to be taken care of. A man driving an automobile has to be taken care of by wise traffic regulations; otherwise he may get into trouble. So we introduce and support regulations to see that an automobile drive does not injure people. Why cannot hon. members of the C.C.F. think straight? How is it they are forever short-circuiting their intelligence like that?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Some of these days there will be a real free for all between myself and the C.C.F. I will take them all on, if I can get them one at a time. I will gladly take them on one at a time, on this question, at any time, because they are just all wrong in their thinking.

There has been a definite neglect on the part of Ontario and Quebec. It is all very well for hon. members from Ontario to rise now and complain about the shortage of fuel in that province. I deeply sympathize with them. But, Mr. Speaker, Ontario and Quebec have been in charge of the policies of Canada for fifty years now; and if those policies have not resulted in a sane development of our Canadian coal resources, then the hon. members from Ontario and Quebec have no one but themselves to blame. It is quite certain that the people of Nova Scotia and the people of Alberta have been eager to develop a national coal policy at least ever since confederation.

Mr. MacNICOL: I might say that during my first term in this house I advocated a national coal policy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I quite appreciate that there have been some men of vision like the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), but I must say I have heard no other hon. member of the Progressive Conservative party advocate a national fuel policy until the present time. On other occasions I have heard hon. members from the maritimes rise and plead for a national coal policy, and I have seen hon. members from Ontario and Quebec leave the chamber and refuse to listen to them. They are now going to suffer for their misdeeds. So let us not entirely blame the government, because, after all, governments are controlled by the people who elect the members who support the government; and the people who elect the members who support and control this government are the people of Ontario and Quebec. Let that be thoroughly impressed upon the minds of the people of Ontario and Quebec in all their anxiety about fuel. The solution is in their own hands.

One of the main reasons why governments in Ottawa have not adopted a national fuel policy has been that for some reason or another those governments have rigidly refused to consider a policy of national self-sufficiency. We see that with respect to every commodity that might be named. I have faced it for years in connection with the sugar question. One cannot rise in this house and advocate a national sugar policy for Canada, but immediately the answer is that we must have trade. I suppose the reason we have not had a national fuel policy for Canada is that we must have trade, even if we have to bring in coal from the United States and run divers dangerous risks in order to have that trade. There has been danger, and there is danger to-day of a serious adverse trade balance between Canada and the United States, a balance against Canada. Every well informed person knows that. Notwithstanding that fact, we have persisted in importing millions and millions of tons of coal from the United States, thereby aggravating the adverse trade balance, instead of developing the coal industry in this country. How can that possibly be excused?

It has been clear to every man charged with responsibility for the last twenty years that there was the greatest kind of danger of an economic struggle in the United States which would tie up production there, and render us vulnerable in the matter of a fuel supply, exactly as has happened to-day. How is it that there has been such a complete lack of vision on the part of those in control of the policies of this country? It will not be so serious if we can have repentance now.

I speak as a representative from one of the major coal producing areas in Alberta. I say that when coal has been shipped from my province to Ontario, our coal, according to reports reaching me, has been mixed in Ontario with trash, with fine pulverized material, literally muck in some cases, and has been delivered as Alberta coal. The object was purely that of discrediting Alberta coal in the minds of the people in Ontario and Quebec, and especially those in Ontario. Nefarious practices such as that are beyond any possibility of condonement. Those things have happened.

Then, we have seen United States producers dumping coal, with apparently nothing being done about it. I am informed that coal producers in the United States have adopted a policy under which they have sold the coal necessary to supply their own needs, and to give them a profit. Then they have had available a vast quantity of coal to be dumped in Canada at almost any price. That coal has been dumped here, while the government has supinely allowed that to take place, notwithstanding the danger involved so far as Alberta and Nova Scotia producers were concerned.

I am informed that as a result of these dumping practices coal from United States coal fields has been delivered at Winnipeg, a city which unquestionably should be a market for Alberta coal. But that whole process has been allowed to proceed.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Let me repeat that there is only one group of people in Canada to blame for all this, and those are the people in Ontario and Quebec. While the people in Ontario and Quebec have been buying their coal from United States mines, Alberta coal miners by the thousands have been working only two or three days a week, and Alberta coal producing areas have become distress areas, with resultant bad fortune to Ontario producers of goods. How can that possibly be justified? This sort of thing must change in the future if we are ever to be independent of such mishaps as those from which we are now suffering.

There has been too much of determination on the part of people at Ottawa to look at money rather than goods. They have refused to grant adequate subsidies. The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) spoke about a national fuel policy in 1928. What was the matter with that national fuel policy of 1928, and thereafter? It was the simple fact that they would not grant large enough subsidies to make sure that coal from Alberta could be put on the Ontario market in a position to compete with the United States product. At any time they could have increased the subsidy so as to have allowed Alberta to sell her coal in Ontario in any quantities desired. That would have resulted in a fuel policy which would have rendered us more or less self-sufficient, and invulnerable to such mishaps as now confront us.

What has been the real situation with regard to Alberta? We in Alberta have, according to our estimates, 14 per cent of the world's total supply of coal. We have 21 per cent of the coal on the north American continent. We have 72 per cent of the coal in the British empire, and 87 per cent of that in Canada. It is estimated by one authority that in Alberta we have 40,200 million tons of coal, consisting of four different types, namely lignite, sub-bituminous, bituminous and semi-anthracite. Surely, from all those different kinds of coal any ordinary needs of consumers in Ontario and Quebec could have been supplied.

The question arises: What are we to do with this situation? After all, there is no use in recrimination. Now that we are in this time of grave danger, let us look to the future and devise, if possible, some solution of the problem. I must agree with the minister in large measure when he says that a real immediate solution of the problem looks uncertain at the present time. At least, however, we can perform a right-about-face in the matter of fuel policy and resolve that as soon as we have an opportunity, we are going to do something sound about it.

Let the government firmly declare to-day —and I ask hon. members from Ontario and Quebec to listen to this, and see how they agree with this procedure—that it will have a national self-sufficient policy with respect to fuel. How many members from Ontario and Quebec would support the government 100 per cent if it indicated its stern resolve and intention that from this day forward it would have a national fuel policy under which we would use coal produced in Canada? That is the test. If hon. members from Ontario and Quebec would not support the government in an all-out policy of that kind, then they must themselves to-day accept blame for the fact that no sound foundation has been laid for a future fuel policy in Canada, and no real commencement made with respect to providing fuel immediately.

The next question is: Would hon. members from Ontario and Quebec support the government if to-morrow it announced a policy under which it would subsidize Alberta and Nova Scotia coal to the extent that they would penetrate the markets of Ontario and Quebec, and to the extent that they would fill the requirements of those markets? I wonder how many members from those two provinces would support the government in such a policy.

Mr. MacNICOL: I can answer for Ontario. For years in this house I have advocated a policy under which the government would bring a million tons of coal from Alberta, store it near Toronto, and send it out from that point.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If I thought the hon. member for Davenport could speak for the whole of Ontario—

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, the hon. member asked Ontario members.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, we have seen one hon. member rise in his place; do I see others? That is the test. As a matter of fact, we people in Canada must have a change in our outlook. We must make up our minds individually, so far as it is possible, that we are going to have a policy of national self-sufficiency, that we are going to produce those things we need, produce them in our own country, and not import them from abroad, or from sources upon which we cannot depend. Until we do that we shall always be in danger of a situation such as that now facing us.

Then, I wonder if the Ontario and Quebec members would support the government in the establishment of plants in which could be processed Alberta and Nova Scotia coals, bringing the products of those processes into the Ontario and Quebec markets. By that I mean this: Just as the Germans during the last war, and before it, produced a high percentage of their gasoline and oil from coal deposits in that country, so we in Canada could produce our gasoline and oil from coal deposits in Alberta and Nova Scotia.

The question is, would the Ontario and Quebec members support the government if it were to bring in a policy of that kind? It would be the solution of some problems for the future. Suppose the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply were to rise in his place to-morrow and say to hon. members, "This government has become convinced, because of the crisis facing us, that its policy in the past has been wrong, and from this time forward the government guarantees all members of the house that if hon. members will give their support it will bring in a national fuel policy under which it will subsidize coal from Alberta, British Columbia, Nova Scotia and other points, to the extent that those coals will supply the market in Canada, and it will subsidize far enough to make sure that they do, and the government will protect the markets in Canada against dumping by the United States or any other place by such measures as may be found appropriate and adequate. The question is: If the minister were to say that, would the members of this house support the government in so doing? Let the minister further declare: The government will institute a pollicy of processing the coal in various parts of Canada in order to obtain the gasoline and other oils that we need in this country and thus make the country independent of any outside source."

If the government would rise and do that, do you know what would happen all over Alberta? Private enterprise, which the hon. member for Vancouver East so much deprecates, would immediately take steps to open new mines, to put in new equipment and to train personnel. The railroads would immediately buy rolling stock and lay tracks so that the coal could be delivered in Ontario and Quebec. There would be a market guaranteed and a price guaranteed. We would then be on a way to a solution of the problem. We could perhaps not possibly overtake the unfortunate shortages which have developed, but we could certainly greatly improve conditions as they now are.

There are in Alberta rich mines capable of vast production which are not producing coal to-day. Why? Because it would cost too much to build railroad lines into them or to do certain other things Private enterprise does not dare to go in and spend the money, because probably by next year there would be no Canadian fuel difficulty and all the equipment that had been put in would be left idle. If the government put in the equipment right away now, then we would have the members of the Progressive Conservative party next year painting the air in this chamber blue because the government had wasted a lot of money on the projects.

There is only one thing to do. We should make up our minds that we are going to become nationally self-sufficient. We must make up our minds that we are going to have an adequate fuel policy, no matter what it costs. We should go to work on that policy. Then we should find that private enterprise would be doing its part. There would be no need of any government enterprise as far as coal is concerned. A great deal of improvement in our situation could be brought about even between now and Christmas, or February.

Let me repeat that the great question is: Are Ontario and Quebec repentant? Are they ready to break new sod? Are they ready to blaze a new trail with respect to a fuel policy in this country? Is this house ready to make new resolutions with respect to a fuel policy? If not, then I must say that we shall just go on in the dangerous way we have been going these many years. I see no other way in the world out of our difficulty.

Before I resume my seat, I should like to refer for a moment or two to the matter of gas wastage which was brought up by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). The hon. member was referring more to the condition which had obtained in the Turner valley before the Social Credit government took charge in Alberta. At that time there was immense wastage of gas in the Turner valley; there were flares burning all the time. But the Alberta Social Credit government, by its introduction of a wise conservation policy with respect to gas, has reduced the number of those flares to two small ones. In the past four years there has been a laudable curtailment of the waste. Gas which was formerly allowed to escape has been conducted back into the chambers within the earth, so that it will help force the gasoline up through the wells. The whole process is called repressurizing.

Because of this policy there is not nearly as much waste as once occurred. However, the argument advanced by the hon. member for Macleod still holds good. There is in Alberta a tremendous amount of natural gas that could be brought into this part of the country if pipes were laid and a market guaranteed. We could process the coal in Alberta so that we should have gasoline and other kinds of oil that could be piped to any other part of Canada to supply the needs for these products just as long as those needs exist. All that is necessary is to guarantee a certain market and a suitable price. Then private enterprise will know that when it invests its money it is not going to lose it. If the government invests money the government will not then be accused by some excited opposition of having wasted the country's money. I leave this discussion for the time being at that stage.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I come from Cumberland which contains the second largest coal fields in eastern Canada. Our people are interested in the Canadian coal requirements. I have been associated with those who have advocated a national coal and steel policy for many years. The leader of that movement was the late Hon. Gordon S. Harrington, who was minister of mines and minister of labour of Nova Scotia. He advocated this policy in 1925, and from then on, with some success. The result was that a million and a half tons of coal were shipped per year from Nova Scotia into central Canada which had never been shipped before. The people were educated to the use of our coal and they soon began to appreciate its qualities.

There was an oversupply of productive capacity in Nova Scotia and a limited local market. Mines were operating only one, two or three days a week and there was an uncertain market for what was produced. Our coal came into competition with cheap coal which was brought from overseas as bunker coal and with coal imported from the United States. At that time we were told that coal was being produced in coal fields in Ohio which had been owned by the Grand Trunk railway and taken over by the Canadian National Railways for ninety-one cents a ton, and later as low as eighty-nine cents a ton.

It was difficult to put this Canadian fuel policy into effect. It was necessary to increase the duty on coal and to pay subventions which were largely paid for by the duty. I was disappointed at hearing the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) state that the production in Nova Scotia is only 5,500,000 tons for the current year; this in the face of a great need for coal.

The production in Nova Scotia was a minimum of 7,000,000 tons, with the expectation of an increase to 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 tons per year. On two or three occasions I have asked the minister what efforts were being made to canvass the situation in Nova Scotia to get greater production. I asked him if the miners and operators were being consulted to obtain more coal to supply the needs of Ontario and Quebec.

One reason for the reduced production in Nova Scotia is that many miners entered the armed forces early in the war. Those were trained miners who were capable of the greatest production. Unfortunately some of them were killed; many were wounded, and some are not willing to go back into the mines. However, I think much could be done to increase production in Nova Scotia if all concerned were approached in the right way. We are fortunate in having a capable royal commission studying the coal question under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Carroll and we are waiting patiently for their report. I am hopeful that when their report is presented to parliament a coal and fuel policy will be agreed on that will not only prove beneficial to the producing areas but will make central Canada more secure in obtaining the utmost supply of Canadian coal.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I rise to close the debate. I admit under the rules I have no right to say any more, but I should like two or three minutes to do so. This doctrine of a national fuel supply has been Conservative doctrine since I first introduced it on March 19, 1923. Ontario and Quebec have no coal.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. According to the rules the hon. gentleman cannot reply; he can only withdraw his motion.

Mr. CHURCH: I shall speak for only two or three minutes. I did not have any opportunity to say anything in presenting the motion. I say that what I advocate is Conservative doctrine—a national fuel supply. We should have been more active about it and so should all parties have been since 1923; and we should be more active about it now. I am very much disappointed at the government's reply. Coal equivalent to 25,000 United States cars is tied up in the Erie ports, and no Canadian ships to move it. The government must have a policy to move it from the lake ports. By treaty they are required to do so and keep shipping open on the lakes. There will be another opportunity to discuss this matter when the minister's estimates come up. Unless something is done at once we are going to be frozen out next winter to a worse degree than at any time since 1917.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but for him to speak at this time is absolutely against the rule. Does he withdraw his motion?

Mr. CHURCH: I withdraw my motion, but may I say that I have not had any opportunity to discuss it at all.

Motion withdrawn.

GRAIN CARRY-OVER, 1942 CROP

Mr. WINKLER:

1. What percentage of grain grown in the year 1942 was marketed in the same year?

2. What were the main reasons for the carry-over?

3. Were the officials of the income tax department made aware of the amount of the carry-over and the reasons therefor?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Crop Year 1942-43

	Production (Million bushels)	Marketings [1] Aug. 1/42 to July 31/43 (Million bushels)
Wheat	556·7	273·0
Oats	651·9	120·7
Barley	259·2	85·6
Rye	24·7	9·8
Flax	14·9	11·4

	Per cent Marketings Aug. 1/42 to July 31/43 of 1942 Production (Per cent)	Increase in farm carryovers on July 31/43 as compared with July 31/42 (Million bushels)
Wheat	49·04	186·8
Oats	18·5	94·2
Barley	33·02	36·2
Rye	39·67	5·8
Flax	76·5	·4

[1] Including wheat marketed after July 31/43 under extensions of 1942-43 permits.

2. The main reasons for limited marketings from August 1, 1942 to December 31, 1942, were:

(1) Lack of available storage space in country elevators;

(2) An over-all limitation on wheat marketings to 280 million bushels under the dominion government's grain policy for the crop year 1942-43;

(3) Limited export demand in relation to quantities of grain available for shipment;

(4) Limited transportation available for the movement of grain.

3. No. On March 25, 1946, Hansard, page 211, the following statement was made:

"....With this objective in mind the government has made an arrangement whereby wheat, which producers may not have intended to deliver at the present time, can be marketed and sold over the next three months, with cash settlement made at any time the producer may choose in 1946, 1947 or 1948. The arrangement will become effective on April 1, 1946...."

There was, therefore, no necessity to advise the income tax department in the crop year 1942-43.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—FARM DWELLINGS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How many houses are now under construction under the terms of National Housing Act in places having a population of 5,000 or less?

2. How many farm dwellings under the National Housing Act are now under construction in Canada?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Figures are not available to show the number of houses actually under construction at a given date in places having a population of 5,000 or less. However, in such places, the number of approved loans to home owners and to builders for sale under the National Housing Act, 1944, up to May 31, 1946, was 2,956 for a total amount of $13,124,025.

2. At the present time there is one farm dwelling under construction under part III of the National Housing Act, 1944.

PURCHASE OF CANADIAN BONDS BY UNITED STATES AGENTS AND INDIVIDUALS

Mr. BLACKMORE:

How many dollars worth of Canadian bonds were purchased by American agents and individuals in each of the months of 1945 and each month of 1946 to the end of May?

N.B. Excluded from the above statistics are some sales of securities not executed through agencies reporting monthly.

Available incomplete returns for the period following March indicate a falling off in the capital inflow from the high level of the first quarter.

A. H. OATWAY V. WHEAT BOARD

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What is the total amount of legal fees and disbursements paid to date or in respect of which accounts have been rendered in connection with the defence of the case of A. H. Oatway vs. the wheat board?

2. What are the names of the solicitors or counsel retained or engaged in this case, and how much did each receive?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. The defence of the case of A. H. Oatway vs. the Canadian wheat board was handled for the board by its own legal department. No special or separate legal account was rendered in connection with this case. Mr. J. B. Coyne, K.C., was also employed to collaborate with the board's legal department, but was later retained by the crown. No account has been rendered by Mr. Coyne in this connection.

2. The solicitors were J. B. Coyne, K.C. (who was also retained by the crown), and H. B. Monk, K.C.

AIR TRANSPORT BOARD—LIEUT.-COL. A. S. MCDONALD

Mr. HODGSON:

What is the salary of Lieutenant-Colonel A. S. McDonald as examiner of the air transport board?

Mr. McILRAITH: $4,800 per annum.

2. How many applications of pre-war members of Canada's permanent army who being of proper physical standard and who have seen service in any theatre of war during world war two, have been rejected to date for service in the proposed post-war army?

6. How many officers from each of the provinces of Canada have been retained for service with the post-war army, as of May 15, 1946 (a) who served with the permanent force pre-war and who had service in a theatre of war; (b) who were in the permanent force pre-war, but who had no combat service; (c) who were not in the permanent force pre-war and who had service in a theatre of war; (d) who were not in the permanent force pre-war and who have had no combat service?

REPORT OF NEW ZEALAND FEDERATION OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): The leader of the opposition wished me to ask the Minister of Labour whether he could table a copy of a report of the New Zealand federation of labour, referred to in this morning's press, of which a copy is said to have been received here, and also provide members with a copy of the report.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My information is that there is only one copy of this report in Ottawa, in the office of the high commissioner for New Zealand. The report has been accepted by the New Zealand government as an official report according to a statement by Hon. Walter Nash, Minister of Finance of New Zealand. In view of the interest in the report, the high commissioner for New Zealand in Ottawa has agreed to make his copy available for duplication. I expect to obtain copies and shall be glad to supply the hon. gentleman with one as well as other hon. members who are interested.

LUMBER INDUSTRY—STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour a question. Have the unions in British Columbia offered to return to work in the box industry and, if so, have the operators refused to accept the offer?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have no knowledge of the information which apparently is available to my hon. friend, but I am in constant touch with Victoria and he can rest assured that I will inform the house of any developments.

COAL

INQUIRING AS TO POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING IMPORTS OF ANTHRACITE FROM ABROAD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): May I ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. This afternoon, when reference was made to 25 million tons of coal, did that include anthracite? If it did, is there any possibility of securing anthracite from Great Britain, Belgium or Russia?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The figure did include anthracite. Our total coal consumption is about 42 million tons, of which about 25 million tons represent our total import requirement. There are practically no imports of anthracite from either the United Kingdom or Europe, and there is no possibility of obtaining such imports. The supply of domestic coal this winter will depend upon anthracite supplemented by briquettes from western Canada, coke from the steel industry, such substitutes as can be made available from the western mines, and from certain other coals that are obtainable.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister not mean 22 million tons of bituminous and 3½ million tons of anthracite?

Mr. HOWE: About that, as far as imports are concerned.

OPERATION OF FISH CREEK MINE, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): May I ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply whether he has yet answered the question I asked him on Wednesday, June 5, with reference to the Fish Creek coal mine, Alberta?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I apologize for not having answered the question. I obtained the information, which is that no steps are being taken. The reason is that the nature of the coal, its quality, and the lack of transportation make it unlikely that the particular mine will contribute to the solution of the present problem to an extent that would warrant the dominion government in taking steps to open it up.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the minister be specific and indicate whether he refers to sub-bituminous or bituminous coal?

Mr. HOWE: I regret that I have not the documents here. I had them the other day, but the orders of the day were not called until late, and I was absent. If the hon. member will regard his present question as notice of a further inquiry I will undertake to answer it to-morrow.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AS TO RULES FOR READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to effect an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): When I moved the adjournment of the debate at six o'clock yesterday I was discussing the assertion of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) that if and when the C.C.F. party obtains power in this country one of its first acts will be either the reform or the abolition of the senate, and I was pointing out what effect that eventuality would have upon representation here of the maritime provinces, or if any other party felt the same way. According to the proposed amendment to the British North America Act, the maritime provinces must depend upon their representation in the senate for their minimum representation in this house. If the suggestion of the hon. member for Moose Jaw were an isolated case, possibly we would not need to pay much attention to it, but I should like to quote also from a statement made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the leader of the Social Credit party. I do not use this quotation to cast any reflection on the hon. member for Peace River, as I may say I have always found him fair in debate and possibly one of the most broad-minded men in the house. However, he had this to say, as reported at page 2254 of Hansard:

> It is pleaded, of course, that we must not reduce the House of Commons representation for any province below the number of senators that the province enjoys at the present time. My answer to that is this. Let us then reduce the number of senators to the rightful level while we are at it.

As I said yesterday, we know what effect it would have in the maritime provinces if the senate were again reduced and the representation in our province were based on the number of senators.

I wish to give another quotation which was used by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he spoke a few days ago. He was quoting from a speech made by the late Mr. Woodsworth. I should like to say here that I wish to cast no reflection on the memory of this man for whom I, and, I know, every member who knew him, had great respect. Mr. Woodsworth said on November 25, 1932, as reported at page 2299 of Hansard for that year:

> There cannot be two or three different classes of Canadians in this country, with certain classes having superior rights to others. If a mistake was made in giving a fixed number of representatives to Prince Edward Island there is no reason why we should follow a bad precedent. The way to get away from that is to amend the British North America Act so that Prince Edward Island would have only its due number and not a number out of proportion to the rest of the country.

Mr. GRANT: That would be half a member.

Mr. BROOKS: I hope that the hon. member for Prince, who has just spoken, will bear these things in mind when he comes to cast his vote in a few days because, as I have said before, if the British North America Act can be amended without consultation with the different legislatures, we of the maritime provinces stand to lose more than any other province.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is time you did lose something.

Mr. BROOKS: If the provinces are not consulted a precedent will be established and the hon. member from British Columbia and hon. members from any other part of the country may laugh as much as they wish. We have lost much—

Mr. GRANT: This is not the first time the act has been amended.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BROOKS: We have been reduced from forty to twenty-five members.

Mr. GRANT: This is not the first time it has been amended.

Mr. BROOKS: My hon. friend can make his speech, and if he does it will be the first except one he has made in this house in the ten years he has been here. We have sat here and listened to him clap his hands and pound his desk like a child and interrupt practically every member who has spoken, but he does not take the trouble to prepare a speech or rise and deliver one in the house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Or read it.

Mr. GRANT: I do not have to read it when I do rise to speak.

Mr. BROOKS: Nor do I. My time has practically expired. I do not intend to speak much longer to-night. As a matter of fact, I did not intend to speak as long as I have done, but I felt impelled to speak on behalf of the maritime provinces, and especially the province from which I come.

I should like to give a short quotation used in the speech delivered by the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen), as reported at page 2268 of Hansard of June 6: He quoted section 52 of the British North America Act to emphasize the point which he made. Section 52 reads:

> The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

We of New Brunswick have ten members out of 245 in the House of Commons. If this amendment is passed we shall have ten members out of 255 and, as the hon. member for St. John-Albert said the other day this section of the British North America Act will be violated because the proportionate representation of New Brunswick will be greatly disturbed. As I say, we have ten out of 245. Ten out of 255 is not the same proportion, and any hon. member who will take the time to consider it will see that that is a fact.

I wish to make this further statement. Last night one hon. member suggested that because I was speaking for my own province I was not a good Canadian. I have sat in this house and listened to practically every hon. member from Quebec who has spoken, and each has spoken almost entirely on the effect that this amendment would have on that province. I and no other member would suggest that, on that account, he was not a good Canadian. The same is true of hon. members from western Canada. They have all considered this matter almost entirely from the point of view of their own section of the country, and I contend that when I debate this question as it affects New Brunswick I am no less a Canadian than are those members from Quebec or from any other part of Canada.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In rising to take part in this debate, I quite realize that what I have to say will not be popular on this side of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Do not worry.

Mr. REID: I wish to make it clear at the outset that I intend to vote against the resolution introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). Following the remarks made by the speaker who has just taken his seat, let me make it clear that I am going to deal with the matter from the point of view of British Columbia, and I do not want any taunt hurled at me that I am not thinking as a Canadian. Let us be frank. There is not a man sitting in this house but must and does think provincially. Every hon. member here is thinking of his own constituency and of his own province. Why have accusations hurled across the floor that those who do are not Canadians? The man who does not think of this resolution in terms of his own province is somewhat derelict in his duty. He is no less a Canadian if he thinks of it in terms of his own province.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). Although I am not a lawyer, I think they entirely missed the point of the resolution, and I shall tell the house why. If one looks over the British North America Act he will see that there are certain sections dealing with general clauses and powers given to the dominion. Then there are certain powers specifically defined as powers of the dominion and of the provincial governments. It is my opinion as a layman that if the dominion government were interfering or asking the British parliament to amend any of the sections under which the provincial governments have power they would then have, first of all, to go to the provinces and ask for the right to do so. But under the general clauses dealing with redistribution it is my opinion that the dominion government has the power to bring in this resolution without consulting the provinces. However, I shall say that when the British government read the resolution in its present form they will be in just as much doubt as the members of the house were when it was first introduced, because I doubt whether many hon. members would have understood the resolution had it not been for the explanation given by the Minister of Justice. In my opinion it is extremely clumsily worded and in fact somewhat misleading because it says:

> And whereas it is considered that a more equitable apportionment of members to the various provinces could be effected if readjustment were made on the basis of the population of all the provinces taken as a whole.

We are not doing that. I think it is explained in the last two clauses that we are not taking the population of the provinces as a whole, because when we come to divide by 250 we leave out Prince Edward Island, the northwest territories and the Yukon. Therefore the wording of the resolution is certainly misleading in the beginning, and it is not until you get to the end of the resolution that you find the meat of it. I was not at all surprised that the Minister of Justice, when asked by an hon. member how he arrived at the figure 250, should reply, "Well, I don't know." I doubt if many hon. members could say how that figure was arrived at as a quotient; but I say it was a clever piece of mathematics, whoever was responsible for it.

Before I pass on to some figures and further statements, may I say that in the amendment I believe the hon. member for Lake Centre, if he spoke for his party, inadvertently or otherwise has tied up his party with the principle of the Canadian government going to the British parliament for amendments to the British North America Act. Probably he did not intend to do that, but that is the actual effect of the amendment. Of course I for one believe that this Canada should have the right to amend its own constitution without going to the British parliament.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F. party, spoke in favour of the resolution, and I am not altogether surprised at that, since Saskatchewan stands to gain under it. He and every other leader know the troubles that arise when you have to reduce the representation of a province. The hon. gentleman comes to this house with a large number of members from Saskatchewan, and I can visualize his difficulties if he should be told that there would be four less constituencies, for he then would have to say to the members of his party, "Well, which of you boys are going to stay home?"

An hon. MEMBER: All of them, I hope.

Mr. REID: Then last evening the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) gave his views as to what that party would do in regard to the senate, should they come to power. May I say to him and to the leader of the C.C.F., after having looked into the number of members, that if this resolution passes the house and the increased numbers are given the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, the C.C.F. will wait an additional twenty-five years before they take over the reins of government; and I say that in all sincerity.

In regard to the increased representation for the province of Quebec, I think under the present set-up that province has a real grievance. It has been known for years that Ontario has had seven or eight members too many, according to population. Rather than reduce the number of members from Ontario, however, after someone found out how this new proposal would work, they come along and add one member to Ontario and eight to Quebec. In all kindliness, I want to tell hon. members from Quebec that if they look over the figures they will see that most of the eight members to be added to the representation of that province are likely to go to the city of Montreal and not to the great hinterland outside. Coming back to what I said a moment ago, however, to my way of thinking this resolution has been introduced at this time to, shall I say, placate Quebec because Ontario has had seven members more than it should, and to help out the other provinces, especially Saskatchewan, which otherwise would lose four members.

The leader of the C.C.F. party spoke about representation by population. I wonder if he has studied the situation in Canada to-day, if he has looked at the great shift of population which has taken place, at the great number of people who have left Saskatchewan, particularly, and who have gone principally to British Columbia. I know one cannot always judge by the number of electors in speaking of representation by population, but if one looks over the figures for the last election he will find that on the voters' lists of the province of Saskatchewan they had only 445,601 names, with twenty-one members in this house, while we in the province of British Columbia had 545,077 names on the voters' lists and only sixteen members. In other words, we had five members fewer than Saskatchewan, although they had 99,000 fewer on their voters' lists.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: A lot better members, though.

Mr. REID: Well, this is one time I think I can agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). Then, when one speaks of representation by population, one should look at the various constituencies. I know criticism has been offered concerning Prince Edward Island. It has been said, "Oh, they have four members and their total population is not more than 95,000." If one looks over the various ridings in Canada it will be seen that the constituency with the smallest population is not in Prince Edward Island at all but in Ontario. Just consider: in Ontario there is one constituency with a population of something like 18,732, and another with a population of 113,000, and it is not a city constituency.

Mr. KNOWLES: What are those two ridings?

Mr. REID: The smallest one is Glengarry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. REID: But the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who represents that riding, had nothing to do with the number of people in it. I was a member of the last redistribution committee, and at that time I swore I would never serve on another redistribution committee. I never saw as much selfishness or as much fighting as I saw there. Talk about being Canadians and working for the whole of Canada! In that committee it amounted almost to warfare. I remember one gentleman who has since gone to his reward coming into this house with the redistribution map and poking his cane right through it; he was so wild. Many hon. members will remember that. I can tell the present official opposition that members from this party had nothing to do with shaping the constituencies. The maps were simply placed before us and we were told, "That's that. Take it or lump it." If anyone cares to look over those maps he will be reminded of one of those cross-word puzzles. The government of that day endeavoured to carve out the Tories from certain districts and the Liberals from others.

Mr. MacNICOL: Not in Ontario.

Mr. REID: I heard complaints from the province of Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member has mentioned Ontario, and I said, "Not in Ontario." Thirty-one seats in Ontario were not altered, and some of the others would not have been altered had it not been for this mess here in eastern Ontario.

Mr. REID: Well, you were a member of that committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was Ontario chairman of it, and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. REID: To those who laughed about the constituency of Glengarry, I commend that statement; the hon. member was chairman of the committee for Ontario at that time.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know the hon. member wants to be fair, and would not impute anything like that to me. We did our best to put—

An hon. MEMBER: Be fair.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am always fair. We did our best to put Prescott and Russell together, making one seat, and Glengarry and Stormont together, which would make one seat; but such a hubbub was kicked up in certain places in the east end of Ontario that, sooner than have a political civil war in eastern Ontario, we let it go. You may have to do the same thing.

Mr. REID: The house will be pleased that the cat has got out of the bag at last. I was on that committee, and I do not want to go on one again, because it was just one of those terrible headaches.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would the hon. member favour the setting up of a judicial commission, independent of the house.

Mr. REID: I am not convinced that a judicial commission would be the solution. But one thing I am convinced of is that we should be careful about representation in the house; I believe we are overgoverned. I will give an example. I looked up some figures in regard to Great Britain and in regard to some other countries. In Great Britain the unit is 70,000. I know somebody will say that that is only a small country. But let us take the figures in some old country cities. Let us first take the city of Glasgow.

Mr. GARDINER: How many councillors have they?

Mr. REID: The Minister of Agriculture asks how many councillors they have. Well, how many councils have we, and how many provincial legislatures have we? We have well over 500 provincial members of legislatures, and councillors in every municipality from Halifax to Vancouver island.

I was about to answer the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The city of Glasgow has fifteen members. The population of that city at the 1939 census, the last one, was 1,280,473. The nearest comparison I can find in Canada is Montreal with its sixteen members and a population given officially as something over 903,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Not for the island; that is for the city.

Mr. HACKETT: That is not greater Montreal.

Mr. GRANT: This is not Scotland.

An hon. MEMBER: Take some other town.

Mr. REID: Just be quiet. You and I are good friends; and don't be throwing it up to me that I am not a Canadian. I am as good a Canadian as you are. Don't let us fall out, doctor. We have been good friends up to now, but—

An hon. MEMBER: You don't know your Montreal.

Mr. REID: We will try Toronto, then.

Mr. CLAXTON: Does the hon. member know if the area for which the population was given is the same area for which the number of members was given in respect of Montreal? It seems to me that the population would be about 1,200,000, to correspond with the area for which there are sixteen members.

Mr. REID: I have before me the report just out from the chief electoral officer, which shows the figures of population for the island of Montreal. I take it that that comprises all members of parliament in the house from the city of Montreal. The total population—and I may be wrong; but what I say is subject to correction—is 903,370.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): For the island only.

Mr. REID: For the island only; that may be correct.

Then, turning to Toronto—and I suppose the Toronto members are waiting to hear what I have to say about that city—I find that Liverpool with a population of 865,688 has eleven members. Toronto has eleven members for 667,491 of population, or a difference of 198,197. I mention this particularly because both the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and I came from the British isles. In his speech he made considerable reference to representation by population. The thought came to my mind: Were they not as well represented there, in the cities in Great Britain, as we are in this country?

However, let us come nearer home, to the United States. What do we find there? We find that they have 435 in their house of representatives, with a unit of 304,000. Will any hon. member say that representation in Washington is not as good for the people of the United States as is our representation in this country? I do not think so.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How do the countries compare in size?

Mr. REID: Well, so far as area is concerned, I think Canada is just about the same size as the United States. In fact, I believe it is a little larger. I do not see any point in asking that question. If the hon. member is talking about population, he might have something on that point.

Mr. MacNICOL: Their unit is 304,000.

Mr. REID: What about the shift in population? What about the situation to-day? We have at the present time in British Columbia 949,000 people. We have had an increase during the war to the extent of 90,000. In fact, only three provinces have had increases in population, increases from one province to another. Those three are Nova Scotia which, according to the official document I have, had an increase of 8,000 in three or four years; Ontario, with an increase of 58,000, and British Columbia with one of 90,000.

Saskatchewan has been gradually losing its population from 1935. It is estimated that in the past three or four years they have lost something like 97,000. Are we going to take any note of those serious changes in population throughout the country? Are we, shall I say, from British Columbia, with a population of 949,000, going to be content with eighteen members, under the new proposal, as compared with a lesser population in Saskatchewan, and their being granted twenty members? Surely there is nothing fair about that, when one considers the matter in the light of the great shift in population which has taken place.

I would have had the temerity to move an amendment; but I understand that such would have been a negative motion, and therefore not in order. As I have said, however, I intend to vote against the resolution for the particular reasons I have outlined. I am going to suggest to the government that they take into consideration deferring this matter until after the next census.

Every member in the House of Commons is sitting here as a result of the census figures of 1941.

Mr. GREEN: It is 1931.

Mr. REID: But have there been any complaints? There have been no complaints from members, at all. Why take hold of the British North America Act and cause all the suspicion, and unrest, shall I say, that we are doing something wrong?

I want to say this to the Minister of Justice, that while it is true from a legal point of view, as he will argue—and I will agree with him—that we have the right to go to the British parliament without consulting the provinces, yet in this particular matter—not in other matters, but we have in this particular one—citizens will look upon the request by this government to Great Britain as something that should be made when we consider further social legislation.

I have just looked at a paper which came from the coast, and I find that the editor of the Vancouver Sun, thinking along the same lines, namely, with respect to by-passing the provinces in this redistribution proposal, has this to say:

> It would seem on the face of it that this is purely a federal concern, since it affects only the matter of popular representation in the federal parliament. Yet the precedent is of the greatest importance. If Ottawa can establish the principle that a petition from the dominion parliament alone is necessary to win amendment of the British North America Act, then the principle holds good in every matter affecting the jurisdiction of the provinces and dominion.

Some will argue that the editor of the Vancouver Sun is wrong, and I would argue that legally he may be wrong because there are certain sections of the British North America Act—I am not going to delay the house by reading them—in which the powers of the provinces are specifically defined. Most people, when they see that this government is going to London to ask for an amendment to the British North America Act, will ask, "What for?" They will be wondering why this is being done when they are told in connection with social legislation that the British North America Act prevents certain things from being done unless the consent of the provinces is first obtained.

I am afraid the average citizen—even more than the average citizen, because here we have the editor of the Vancouver Sun taking the same view and asking the same question—will feel that this action does more harm than the expediency which would seem to have prompted it, that is, the fear of having to reduce the representation of certain provinces to what it should be according to actual population.

I am going to plead with the government to defer taking this action until the next census has been taken. This parliament could go on until 1948 or 1949, at which time it would be within a year or a year and a half of the next decennial census, and it would be much fairer if we were to wait until that took place. If we proceed with the present proposal I am afraid that the high sounding phrases which have been uttered during this debate about representation by population will not carry a great deal of weight.

I realize that I am one of the few on this side of the house who is opposing this proposal. I do it conscientiously because I feel that what is being done is not a proper and correct thing to do at this time. I felt it was my duty to rise and state exactly where I stand on the matter.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, a few words will enable me to express my views on the matter under discussion. It would be useless for me to deliver a lengthy speech on a measure which meets an obvious need and in favour of which some fellow-members who are well versed in constitutional law have put forward learned opinions. Besides, it is not my habit to deliver long speeches; this session has already been going for such a long time that I would not wish to delay it further.

When the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) moved in 1943 the postponement of redistribution until the end of the war, I was one of the nine members who took exception to the proposal. I opposed it because it was a departure from the constitution which provides that the redistribution of constituencies must be proceeded with after each decennial census; I opposed it because in the event of an election being called before the end of the war, the government would have enabled seven or eight members to sit in the House of Commons in violation of the constitution, while Quebec, even with a material increase in its population, had the same number of representatives. I made the following remarks on July 5, 1943:

Do you not believe, Mr. Speaker, that an injustice is being done as regards the rights which the province of Quebec enjoys under the confederation agreement, and that, under the pretext of war the democratic character of our parliamentary system is being set aside? In my opinion, to postpone the redistribution is simply to check the influence which Quebec is entitled to have on the political destinies of this country.

I went on:

I am opposed to this resolution for the reasons which I have just stated. I consider that I have no right to take any other stand; a principle is involved, and it is also a matter of justice for my province. Besides, this resolution interferes with the constitution, and my province is especially affected. The government has no justification for overriding the constitution.

Redistribution was postponed; the reason advanced was that we were at war. I thought at that time that such a reason was unconvincing and I still think so, since the redistribution bill affected neither directly nor indirectly our war effort, but was purely and simply a matter of administration.

As regards the proposal that is now before the house, it has my unqualified approval. My first reason for supporting it is that it does justice to my province. The British North America Act, passed in 1867, was perhaps equitable at that time; the fathers of confederation certainly acted in accordance with the circumstances and with due regard of what were then the best interests of the people. However, time has shown that the British North America Act has not given the expected results. For instance, was it believed in 1867 that the province of Quebec would take such an expansion, as regards population, and that seventy-five years later the constitution would cause an injustice toward Quebec, whose population has increased almost threefold since 1871.

The British North America Act sets at 65 the number of Quebec representatives. With a population exceeding that of Quebec by 450,000 only the province of Ontario now has 82 members, 17 more than Quebec. The new plan will give Ontario one additional member, or a total of 83; Quebec will have eight more members, or a total of 73. The balance will be restored and I for one am quite glad of it.

Under the present rules, Quebec, with a number of representatives permanently fixed at 65, is the province whose population determines the representation of other provinces. The continuation of the present system would mean a marked decrease in the number of dominion members, which is inconsistent in view of the expansion achieved by Canada during the last twenty years. The new plan gives to the provinces a representation based on their respective population, and that is a matter of fair play for all of them.

The Progressive Conservatives are opposed to the resolution on the ground that the rights of the provinces are infringed upon and that the provinces should have been consulted. They go so far as to move an amendment along those lines. The prime minister of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, was the first to expound that argument in a statement he made some time ago. The Conservatives have taken up the argument, which shows the true feelings of the prime minister of my province, to whom the autonomous mantle affords a poor disguise. The Conservatives, in taking up the argument, do not bare their whole thought. The true reason of their opposition lies simply in the fact that the proposal will give eight additional seats to the province of Quebec. And eight additional seats which will never be theirs because the Conservative party, which has barely kept alive in Quebec since 1920, cannot take a new lease on life unless it discards that fanaticism which is so obnoxious to my province and so much at variance with its typical traditions. That fanaticism is well known. We have had fresh evidence of it, and the electors of Quebec will not forget it.

It is suggested that the provinces be consulted. But why should they be? Learned jurists have established in this house that the central government could legislate in the matter now under discussion without consulting the provinces. Besides, it is plain common sense that if a province may change its own representation without permission from the central government, why should the latter seek provincial consent in order to modify its own? Consultation of the provinces would merely kill the plan. It is well known that certain provincial prime ministers are systematically antagonistic to this government, as was strikingly shown at the last dominion-provincial conference. How could Mr. Drew, for instance, agree to the plan when his friends in this house are dead against it? Could Mr. Duplessis favour it when he was frankly opposing it even before it was brought up in this house? The plan would then be set aside just to please some petty politician and Quebec would lose, in parliament, eight additional units of influence on the destinies of this country. We, federal members, are just as ardent advocates of autonomy as Mr. Duplessis, but with a broader outlook. True autonomy also consists in minding one's own business. We, Quebec members, have been elected to represent the province of Quebec in this parliament; and it is for us, Quebec federal members to say whether or not the province of Quebec is entitled to have eight additional members in the next elections. Such are my full views in the matter.

I favour the resolution. It redresses an injustice toward the province of Quebec. It recognizes Quebec's development and importance. It grants it, in proportion to its population, the number of representatives to which it is entitled. The only feature I dislike is that we should have to apply to London for permission to make changes in our constitution. This is said to be a mere formality. But it is nonetheless quite annoying. I understand that we can, at any time, eliminate this formality merely by a vote. This we should do without delay. There remains no reason why, as a nation, Canada should seek authorizations overseas. I therefore hope that before long—and the sooner the better—parliament will rid itself of this ridiculous obligation.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland) (Text): Mr. Speaker, I first wish to compliment the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) on the address he gave to-night. I believe he has approached this question in the right way. When confederation was first enacted it was viewed, not from the point of view of political expediency, as he said this resolution is, but in a spirit of statesmanship by leaders of both the parties in the different provinces.

I have no written manuscript to-night, but I consider it to be my duty to voice what should be, and I believe are, the views of the electors in Nova Scotia. Someone has the right and the duty to speak for Nova Scotia and, as my seat-mate the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) has said, I do not consider that I am any less a Canadian because I do so.

Nova Scotia has special claims to sympathetic consideration as regards her standing in confederation. Nova Scotia has contributed much in relation to the benefits she has received. There have been disappointments; there is dissatisfaction, and if this resolution is carried and put into effect it is going to accentuate the present discontent in our province. I feel that Nova Scotia should be consulted, and they will not be satisfied unless they are.

When confederation was enacted it was approved by the leaders of both the great parties, but there have been public men in Nova Scotia who have made it a political issue from that day to this, and thereby profited politically. They ran elections on the cry of repeal. They ran elections in Nova Scotia on the discontent as to its relations with the rest of Canada. To this day hardly a week passes but in my province representations are made against confederation and our relation to the rest of Canada. The point I wish to make is that, if that party was opposed to confederation, if they made a political issue of it for almost eighty years, they will support the hon. member for New Westminster and others, and will surely require that the electors, or the legislature, or the government, or the Premier of Nova Scotia shall be consulted. This has been made a political issue from the day of confederation to the present time. The party with which I am associated has suffered. Not long ago I heard the former premier of Nova Scotia, Hon. A. S. MacMillan, say that he would be favourable to erecting a monument in Nova Scotia to that great Nova Scotian, Sir Charles Tupper, not because of what he did for Nova Scotia and Canada in seeing that confederation was enacted, but because of what he did for free schools in Nova Scotia.

Nova Scotia did not derive its legislative authority from the British North America Act, as stated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent); it was constituted a province, with its own legislature, by royal charter years before the Province of Canada—Quebec and Ontario—was finally ceded to Britain. If my memory serves me correctly, it was so constituted back in 1757. It also had responsible government and it had a flag of its own. It is the only province or colony in the whole world which had that status. It had sovereign rights. Although not as large as some other territories, it had sovereign rights, and its part as regards the British North America Act justified it in believing that that was a treaty and that it had equal rights with the federal government in seeing that the conditions of that treaty were carried out down through the years.

The province of New Brunswick was constituted as a province, never as a colony, in 1784, with her own legislature and by royal charter.

Confederation had its genesis in Nova Scotia. The Charlottetown conference originated in Nova Scotia; the Quebec conference resulted from the conference at Charlottetown, the London conference from the Quebec conference, and the British North America Act from the London conference. I repeat, confederation had its genesis in Nova Scotia. Surely, if that is so, and in the light of history, that province has the right to be consulted at such a time as this when a major change is being made in the constitution of Canada. I will read from the Journals of Nova Scotia, of February 4, 1864, from the King's speech opening the general assembly, paragraph (8):

The importance of consolidating the influence and advancing the common progress of the three maritime provinces, whose interests are so closely identified, has for some time attracted a large share of public attention, and I propose to submit for your consideration—

This is from the speech from the throne.

—a proposition in which the cooperation of the governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island will be invited with a view to the union of the three provinces under one government and legislature.

Here is a further minute from the Journals of Nova Scotia, general assembly, March 21, 1864, page 74:

The provincial secretary presented to the house the correspondence re union of the maritime provinces.

Then again, on March 29, 1864, at page 87:

The provincial secretary moved the following resolution, which was unanimously passed:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the administrator of the government requesting him to appoint delegates, not to exceed five, to confer with the delegates who were appointed by the governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island for the purpose of considering the subject of the union of the three provinces under one government and legislature, such union to take effect when confirmed by legislative enactment of the various provinces interested and approved by Her Majesty the Queen.

Again, on April 7:

The preceding resolution sent to the legislative council for concurrence . . .

And so on.

Nova Scotia made its full contribution to the formation of Canada and the development of the Dominion of Canada ever since. It participated in the cost of acquiring the Hudson's Bay company's lands, the purchase thereof, out of which lands the prairie provinces were formed. It sent troops to put down the northwest rebellion, and contributed its proportion to the cost of building the Canadian Pacific railway, and that great railway was never granted running rights into Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia's statesman, Sir Charles Tupper, supported by sixteen members from that province, advocated the national policy which was the foundation of industrial Canada, the basis upon which industrial Canada has been built up, under which this country made such remarkable achievements in the first great war and again in this recent great war, the pride of the whole of Canada. The very basis of this accomplishment was the national policy of 1878, which was sponsored by the public men of Nova Scotia.

Not only have we had war industries resulting from this industrial development; we have also the peace-time industries upon which the national income of the country depends. Moreover, the sons and daughters of Nova Scotia have gone to all parts of Canada, to the prairie provinces and to central Canada, to British Columbia, to assist in building up those sections. Just a few days ago the newspapers of Canada lamented the death of that great banker, that great Canadian, Morris W. Wilson, a native of Nova Scotia and head of The Royal Bank of Canada. He was succeeded by Sydney George Dobson, another great Nova Scotian, and they have as their associates other Nova Scotians, Mr. Enman of the Bank of Nova Scotia; Mr. Spinney of the Bank of Montreal; Mr. Logan of the Canadian Bank of Commerce; Mr. Elderkin, who is supervisor or inspector of banking in the Department of Finance, and many others. I mention this to indicate the contributions that Nova Scotians have made in the business life of Canada.

It was through the instrumentality of great statesmanship that Canada has developed and will last for centuries, for thousands of years. Nova Scotia had a prominent part in achieving confederation, and the province has supported all the great measures that have aided in building up Canada ever since. I believe that under a proper legal interpretation Nova Scotia should be consulted in any amendment to the B.N.A. Act. At any rate it would be only the part of decency that it should be consulted before any major amendment is made to the British North America Act, the very basis upon which our sovereign province came into confederation.

Surely our province is not simply to be sacrified in confederation. I consider it an obligation of all members of this house, from all parts of Canada, to see that Nova Scotia prospers in confederation and that her people are happy. That, unfortunately, is not so today. I believe that a special duty rests upon the leader of the Progressive Conservative party (Mr. Bracken), who inherits the responsibilities of his predecessors, to see that Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces generally are prosperous in our confederation. We get no political kudos because of discontent under confederation. Others do; we do not. We have to justify it, and I am proud to justify it. For better or for worse, we are part of Canada for all time. But I appeal to the house to see that we have our place in confederation and share in the prosperity and happiness of the rest of Canada, and that Nova Scotia is consulted before any changes are made in the act under which we entered confederation.

My deskmate, the member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), pointed out in his able speech that there is no room for expansion geographically in the maritime provinces. There is none in Nova Scotia. That is not true of the other provinces. They have all expanded. There are many constituencies—I will not enumerate them—that were not in existence at the time of confederation, some of them indeed not in existence at the beginning of this century, and they now have large populations which go to make up the total population of Canada.

Representation in Nova Scotia, since shortly after confederation, has gradually diminished. In 1867 Nova Scotia had nineteen members to 181 for all Canada, or one for Nova Scotia to 9·53 for all Canada. In 1882 Nova Scotia had twenty-one to 210, or one to ten for all Canada. In 1904 Nova Scotia had eighteen to 214, or one to 11·88. In 1925 Nova Scotia had fourteen out of 241, or one in 17·21. In 1945, the present time, Nova Scotia has twelve members out of 245, or one to 20·42 for all Canada. Under the British North America Act as it now stands, if it were not amended, Nova Scotia is entitled to twelve out of 238 or one in 19·83. It is unfortunate, and we lament it in Nova Scotia, that there was a reduction in our membership, but we accepted it census after census; but this is the first time that any of the western provinces have had to suffer, and they will not accept it as it was accepted in the maritime provinces.

According to the Canada Year Book, the population of Nova Scotia bore the following percentages to the population of the rest of Canada. In 1871, 10·51; in 1881, 10·19; in 1891, 9·32; in 1901, 8·56; in 1911, 6·83; in 1921, 5·96; and in 1931, 4·94 per cent. In 1941 we went up a little bit to 5·02 per cent. If that percentage were measured in the area that constituted original Canada I do not believe that our loss of percentage of population would have been one-half of what it is. It would show a far more favourable percentage if only the population of the original parts of Canada were taken into consideration.

Under this resolution Nova Scotia is offered an increase of one member. The membership will be increased from twelve to thirteen, but that is a fleeting concession. Personally I prefer not to accept it. Why? Because there is no permanency to it. Under the British North America Act, which Nova Scotia by sovereign right approved, it was possible to increase the membership as it was increased after different censuses in the prairie provinces and British Columbia, so that we did not suffer. But under this resolution introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) we have a fixed membership of 255. If Manitoba, or Quebec, or Ontario, or Saskatchewan, or Alberta, or British Columbia gets an increased number in the future, where is it to come from? It must come from the remaining provinces; and just as certain as we are discussing this resolution to-night it is going to come from Nova Scotia. If the trend of the past years continues not only will one come from Nova Scotia but two and three, and then we shall be down to the minimum of ten members out of 255, which violates, I believe, the legal rights of Nova Scotia; it violates the spirit of confederation. That is why I personally am not disposed to accept this increase of one member. There is no permanency to it under this resolution, because in the future the representation of all Canada will never be above 255. It must remain at that figure, and when there is an adjustment some of the provinces will suffer. I warn Saskatchewan and Manitoba that with their mass production machine age which appears to be taking place in the prairie provinces and with the days of the homestead being a thing of the past, they too may suffer as Nova Scotia has suffered in the past. New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island would suffer and we would likely go below ten members in the house if it were not for the amendment to the British North America Act which was put into effect under the government of Sir Robert Borden by which we could not have fewer members than that amendment provides for, which is ten for Nova Scotia, ten for New Brunswick and four for Prince Edward Island, although the population of Nova Scotia has always been and probably always will be larger than that of New Brunswick, we shall have the same minimum.

Poor old Nova Scotia down by the sea has suffered in some respects ever since confederation. I was reading some of the debates of previous years but I am not going to quote them to-night. In those debates I found that Mr. E. M. Macdonald, a prominent Liberal, said that Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island would never have entered confederation unless they were assured that they would be able to retain the membership which they had when they entered confederation.

This increase in membership to 255 is not going to be fair to Nova Scotia. I do not believe there is any justification for it in the British North America Act. I believe it violates sections 51 and 52 of that act, but it also imposes increased expenditures for the government of this country. I have been opposed to that. When I first entered the Nova Scotia legislature twenty-one years ago we had a membership of forty-three, which we considered too large. We reduced it to thirty-seven; later we reduced it to thirty, and I believe they have got along just as well ever since. According to the last census in Nova Scotia, they are entitled to a redistribution of seats. If the basis of representation that we proposed at that time is followed I believe that there would be an addition of seven seats in that legislature. Anyway the electors of Nova Scotia felt that we were overgoverned and we reduced the membership. But that policy is not being followed here if this resolution becomes effective.

Under this resolution neither the electorate of Nova Scotia, nor the legislature, nor the government, nor the premier of that province is being consulted. There may be communications with the governments of the provinces, but, if so, they should be tabled in the house.

What was the basis of confederation? What did the fathers of confederation have in mind when the basis of representation was established? What would they say to-day? What stand would they expect me to take as a representative from Nova Scotia? I am just as sure as they enacted confederation that they would require that I speak for them, and no one has more right to speak for the fathers of confederation than I have. Four of them came from my native town of Amherst; one of them, a Liberal, is in my family tree. What would they say? They would say that this government has no right to attempt to put into effect an amendment to the British North America Act without consulting Nova Scotia. The government should stand not by the letter of the law but by the spirit of what was intended. Surely, over the years, from the time of confederation down to this day, Nova Scotia has earned the right to sympathetic consideration from public men from all over Canada and not the kind of treatment which appears to be attempted here.

What has been the attitude of the public men from Nova Scotia? I shall not quote them all, but I do not believe there is a single public man from Nova Scotia at any time, irrespective of his party, who in this parliament or on the floor of the legislature of Nova Scotia, would ever approve any changes in the British North America Act without the sovereign province of Nova Scotia being consulted. I am sure that Sir Robert Borden did not. What he said has been quoted here by previous speakers, and it would not be out of place for me to quote him again. This was on February 10, 1914:

> Speaking for myself, I do not see how it would be possible for this parliament to attempt any alteration in the representation of the provinces without the consent of the provinces themselves.

What did the Hon. Layton Ralston say, the hero of two wars, the man we saw walk the plank here because he stood for duty? He supported the stand taken by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, that the provinces should be consulted. I need not quote what he said. What did Viscount Bennett say when he was Prime Minister of this country? What were his actions? What stand did he take in 1931, when legislation affecting the merchant shipping legislation was being enacted in Great Britain? Here is a record of the stand taken by Mr. Bennett and his associates. On February 23, 1931, Mr. Bennett issued an invitation to the provincial governments to meet the federal representatives at a dominion-provincial conference to consider the statute of Westminster in 1929, which was the outgrowth of the imperial conference of 1926. This was a conference on the operation of dominion legislation and merchant shipping legislation. The meeting was held in Ottawa on April 7 and 8, 1931, and the delegates agreed that the following sections should be inserted in the statute of Westminster:

> 1. Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Act of 1867 to 1930 or any order, rule or regulation thereunder.

That is specific. Other recommendations were:

> 2. The powers conferred by this act upon the parliament of Canada or upon the legislatures of the provinces shall be restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within the competence of the parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures of the provinces respectively.
> 3. The provision of the section (relating to the Colonial Laws Validity Act) of this act shall extend to the laws made by any of the provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such provinces.

I continue reading the report of that conference:

> Once more the provinces were attempting to safeguard their rights. Mr. Bennett promised the delegates that at a near future date he would summon a conference on constitutional issues with the purpose of considering any further amendments to the British North America Act.

Actions speak louder than words, and those were the actions of Mr. Bennett and his associates. But those are not the actions of the present able Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) or the government and party which are going to support him and make this a political issue. This never should become a political issue. As I said earlier, confederation came about through the combined efforts of the leading men of all parties; but, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) said, this is being treated in the light of "political expediency". I have one more quotation to offer; it is a statement by the late Hon. Norman McL. Rogers.

Mr. HACKETT: Who was he?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): He was private secretary—and an able one—to the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Later he was Minister of Labour and, still later, Minister of National Defence, which position he occupied when he met his untimely death. I do not know whether he was in the Prime Minister's office at the time he made this statement, but he was arguing against the theory that it was necessary in law to consult the provinces. This is what he said:

It would appear that federal practice and political expediency call for a limited measure of provincial consultation and consent in the future amendment to the Canadian constitution, and for definite guarantees with respect to the rights of certain minorities.

I could also quote Hon. E. M. Macdonald, who at different times went on record as stating that the provinces should be consulted with respect to any amendment of the British North America Act.

Mr. HACKETT: Who was he?

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): He was Minister of National Defence at one time. I am going to repeat what I said earlier, that there is not a single instance on record of any public man in Nova Scotia, irrespective of politics, admitting that the British North America Act, under which that province entered confederation, can be amended without consulting the province; and, if I can speak for Nova Scotia, I say that such amendment should not be adopted and put into effect unless that province is at least consulted and, I believe, until it has approved. I have quoted certain public men. What do the leading newspapers of that province say? Without exception they are opposed to this form of redistribution at the present time. I quote from the Halifax Herald of June 8, which said:

This redistribution will be carried out on the basis of the decennial census of 1941—but, if the 1941 census was undesirable as a basis for redistribution in 1943, how can it be made desirable and fair and satisfactory and efficient by any plan that may be brought forward now? That aspect of the matter may rest for the moment.

What really counts is this: if government and parliament are to go ahead with the present plan, then they will not be getting down to the roots of the situation at all.

The present plan may be criticized on the grounds of basic census figures . . . it may be criticized because the provinces may not be consulted respecting the necessary constitutional amendment . . . it may be criticized because it is unfair to one province and unduly "fair" to another . . .

Then it goes on to quote the Prime Minister of this country, supporting what he advocated some years ago. The Herald continues:

What Canada needs, of course, is a modern and efficient measure of electoral reform to replace an archaic system producing undemocratic and impossible results . . . The present prime minister made this positive declaration more than ten years ago: "I am in favour of the alternative vote and am also in favour of proportional representation."

I need not quote more of that editorial, and there are several others along the same lines. I would refer to the editorial in the Halifax Chronicle of June 3. I am not going to read it all; it is too long, but it says:

There has been very little demand for redistribution at this time . . . it takes second place now to more pressing problems. Most Canadians are waiting with anxiety for a budget already long overdue. We have a fuel crisis on our hands, and the prospects for next winter demand that greater attention be given immediately to the formulation of a national policy for native coal.

. . . the need for additional housing is still acute . . . We need, too, a far more serious consideration of industrial reconstruction and the upsurge of labour unrest that is shackling efficiency . . . Taxes, housing and strikes are the things that need the first attention at the moment . . . If we must have a redistribution bill, why must it be one that increases the membership of the house?

. . . Yet an increase in house representation means an increase in taxation. If the proposed bill goes through as presented, it will cost the country a minimum of an additional $60,000 a year in salaries and allowances for the new members.

If on the other hand we were to allow one member for each 50,000 people, reducing the number of seats to 233, there would be an annual saving of $72,000, or of $132,000 if the proposed bill bringing total representation up to 255 is passed.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) elaborated on that point in his excellent address the other evening. The Chronicle goes on:

Such economies may sound small business in a country where we have a government accustomed to talk in billions. Yet economy must begin somewhere, and before this bill is debated opinion might well be canvassed as to whether its provisions look in the right direction.

I could quote from the Sydney Record-Post and other Nova Scotia newspapers, but I shall not delay the house by so doing. I may add, that many newspapers all across Canada are expressing the same view.

The Minister of Justice, in his able speech when presenting this resolution, made the following statement:

> Another question, which has arisen each time there has been any move to ask for an amendment of the British North America Act, has been whether or not the provinces had been consulted and had agreed to it, I think that when the question is put in that form it is ambiguous. The provinces, that is to say the people of the provinces, are all represented in this parliament, and for the purposes of such matters as are confided to the jurisdiction of this parliament it is by those representatives here that the people of the provinces speak.

I am a representative from Nova Scotia. Four of the fathers of confederation came from my home township. I have not been consulted. None of my colleagues has been called into consultation. The Minister of Justice has not called me into consultation, and I do not believe that members from Nova Scotia, as a body, have been consulted. Some of them, more subservient than the hon. member for New Westminster, may support the government because of "political expediency." But on behalf of the people of Nova Scotia I am not going to support this, for political expediency, or for any other reason.

I shall now quote from the remarks of the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell). He said that he does not think we should be consulted in Nova Scotia. Speaking on June 6, as reported at page 2235 of Hansard, he said:

> Therefore I suggest to the hon. member that if this parliament decides that something should be done in the interests of all the people of Canada, and it is within its constitutional right to do so, the will of this parliament should prevail.

I question that statement; I disagree with it. If I have a voice to represent the feelings of the people of Nova Scotia, a voice which comes down from 1864, when confederation had its very beginning in Nova Scotia, then I say he does not represent the views of that province.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. With the unanimous consent of the house the hon. member may proceed.

[Mr. P. C. Black.]

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I shall quote briefly from the remarks of the leader of the C.C.F. party, as they are reported at page 2238 of Hansard:

> The whole history of this country since confederation surely points to the fact that this parliament has the right to deal with representation in this parliament.

I do not agree with that, and the people of Nova Scotia do not agree with it. They have no right to change the basis under which Nova Scotia entered confederation, without first consulting that province. I could quote the words of his predecessor in office as leader of the C.C.F. party, the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, whose words have already been recorded at page 2233 of Hansard.

I note that the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), at page 2254 quoted the words of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) the leader of the Social Credit party. I shall not repeat the quotation, but shall point out that he argued that representation of all the maritime provinces in the senate should be reduced to the rightful level, while we are at it. To be fair to the hon. member, I must point out that afterwards he modified that statement, when at page 2255 he said:

> I did say before that no material amendments of the British North America Act should be sought without consultation with the provinces.

So far as the hon. member for Peace River and his party are concerned, there is no menace to representation in the maritime provinces being reduced below the number of senators they now have.

The Minister of Justice has said that we have no right to be consulted in Nova Scotia, and that is the view of the leader of the C.C.F., and that of his predecessor.

Mr. COLDWELL: Within the spirit of the constitution.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The spirit of the constitution does require that we should be consulted.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about it if you are consulted, and do not agree.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I shall leave that to the people of Nova Scotia, and abide by their decision.

There is also the question that if this is passed it will be taken as a precedent for all future time. This point is touched upon by the hon. member for Peace River. He warned members of the house that if this were passed without consultation with the provinces it would be taken as a precedent, and the same was said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the C.C.F. party.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member was permitted to continue his speech only with the unanimous consent of the house. If he has not unanimous consent I shall have to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I do not impose upon this house very often, but on this occasion I am endeavouring to express the viewpoint of the people of Nova Scotia. I appreciate the unanimous consent given by hon. members.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): No.

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I am sorry some do not agree with my arguments, but I am expressing the viewpoints of the people for whom I am speaking.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): No, he has not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And a member from British Columbia cuts him off.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Because he is quoting what other members have said. He could have said in five minutes what he has said.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to discuss the constitutional question which has been raised by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, for the very good reason that no doubt, as the debate proceeds, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) will deal with that question in his usual competent manner.

I do, however, wish to answer on the basis of the position taken by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), namely, that one in the house should speak for his constituency or for his province, and feel free to do so without arguing any notions he may have with regard to the necessity for unity in Canada. I can speak to-night with the unanimous consent of all political parties represented in the legislature of Saskatchewan, when I say that they are not interested in having the government of that province consulted on this particular matter.

I state that advisedly, because I was just reading the Regina Leader before I came to the chamber, and noticed that in interviews given the press by the premier of Saskatchewan and by the leader of His Majesty's opposition in that province, both had agreed with the principle of the resolution introduced by the Minister of Justice, and both had suggested that it would not be necessary for an appeal to be made to that province. It is not necessary for me, coming from Saskatchewan, to discuss the constitutional question as it is related to this issue, that is, that the provinces ought to be consulted when an amendment of this kind is being asked for.

The suggestion was made a few moments ago that this question has been raised because of political expediency. I do not know just what was meant by that suggestion, but I would say that the question has been raised on this occasion for a very different reason from that which caused the raising of a similar question in days gone by. If one goes back to the days preceding confederation and reads the history of that time he will agree that there was a great deal of discontent, lack of unity and discussion of questions largely from the point of view of local community interest, with the result that, after conferences had been held and discussions had taken place, the act of confederation, or the British North America Act, was passed with the object of bringing about a condition of unity as among the provinces, or as among the colonies which then constituted the maritime provinces and what we sometimes speak of now as the central part of Canada, namely, Ontario and Quebec.

It was only natural that at that time very little discussion should take place related in any way to what we know to-day as the prairie provinces or very little discussion, in the initial stages at least, in so far as British Columbia was concerned. The discussion largely had to do with the differences of opinion that had existed among the colonies in the eastern part of Canada, and so the provisions of the British North America Act in relation to this matter, as well as to other matters, had to do largely with the discussions which had taken place in what is to-day Ontario, Quebec and the three maritime provinces.

Therefore, I was not at all surprised when the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), who has just taken his seat, made the statement that the discussions as to redistribution that had gone on were carried on by members from the maritime provinces and from the two central provinces, but that very little had been heard from the western provinces until such time as it became necessary to reduce the seats in western Canada under the system of redistribution which is provided for in the act. I do not agree with the hon. member when he says that the maritime provinces always took without any protest, the decisions which were brought about by the terms of confederation. As a matter of fact, the chief reason for the discussions which are now taking place in the house is the fact that an amendment was made to the constitution in 1915 to provide against the representation in the maritime provinces dropping below the numbers which represented them in the senate. For that reason Prince Edward Island at the present time has four members instead of two; New Brunswick is protected with its membership of ten, the act providing that it cannot go below that number, and Nova Scotia, with a present membership of twelve, is protected by the act against that membership dropping below ten.

If there were any provinces in the Dominion of Canada that have a right to protest against that amendment it is the western provinces, beginning with Manitoba and extending to British Columbia. Why? The only protection we have under that clause is the protection which says that, no matter if our population be twice the population of Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick, we shall have six members for each province. Your population as compared with that of Canada drops to those proportions. All we are entitled to under the constitution is twenty-four senators from the four western provinces, which gives us a membership of six in each. If there are any protests that should be made about the provisions which were placed in the statute because of the protests made by the maritime provinces, they ought to come from the western provinces. But up to the present time we have not made any protest. The hon. member for Cumberland has invited protests along that line when he intimates that in the past the maritime provinces have taken the constitution as it is, but that immediately the membership of the western provinces comes under consideration we want the constitution amended. Well, the constitution has been amended before and the protection given which I have indicated.

There is one other feature of the discussion to which I should like to call attention. We have been in the habit in this country of discussing everything from the point of view of its effect upon Ontario and Quebec. That is natural because, as we go back and read Hansard, we find that it was in connection with the representation of those two provinces that most of the discussion took place. When we quoted matters with regard to redistribution we were led naturally into a discussion of representation in the province of Quebec or representation in the province of Ontario. Perhaps that has been given undue emphasis on this occasion, not only in this house but outside the house.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

This is not a proposal coming from the province of Quebec. It so happens that the Minister of Justice, in his most capable manner, introduced the resolution because he is the Minister of Justice, but the fact that he comes from the province of Quebec does not indicate that this was a suggestion by the province of Quebec. No one is hurrying redistribution at the present time. Under our constitution redistribution should have taken place in 1943, prior to the last election. We amended our constitution to provide that it should not take place then. It was stated at that time that redistribution would take place in the earliest possible session after the war. I venture to say that if that had not been provided in 1943 the proposal to postpone redistribution would not have passed this house. It was insisted that redistribution should be brought into this house in the first possible session after the war was over, so that now in 1946 we are discussing redistribution, in the first full session after the end of the war.

That being the case, may I say that two important matters are involved. The first is the fact that in the early constitution it was provided that a province had to vary its population by one-twentieth before its membership could be reduced. As a result of that, Ontario is entitled to possibly eight more members than it would be under a simple basis of representation by population. What was the issue raised in 1943 by those who came from the province of Quebec? It was not based on the proposal which is being made at this session. The contention was that Quebec had been used from the time of confederation down to the present time as the province in which the basis of constituency representation would be figured. In other words, you take the population of the province of Quebec and divide it by sixty-five, and you get the representation for each constituency in that province, and then you divide the population of the other provinces by that unit in order to get the representation in the other provinces.

The constitution sets sixty-five members for the province of Quebec, and the province of Quebec said in effect in 1943, "We have had that condition now since the time of confederation. We would like to suggest that Ontario be taken as the province where the unit is determined; that our population be divided by whatever that unit is, and that we proceed from now on with that as the basis of our redistribution in Canada." That has stood in my mind from that time down to the present as the proposal which was made by those who represented Quebec in the house at that particular time. But that is not the proposal which is contained in this resolution. If anyone is looking for the reason for the suggestion that the old provision be removed one does not have to think in terms of political expediency; one should think in terms of what the constitution was really intended to bring about in the first place, namely unity among the people of this country. It seems to me that if we want to have unity in Canada one of the first things to be done is to remove the necessity of any discussion whatsoever as to any different relationship at between Ontario and Quebec, or as to the relationship existing between any other province in Canada and Quebec, or between any other province in Canada and Ontario. So that it has been thought wise in bringing down this resolution to remove all reference to any of the provinces in so far as that particular point is concerned and to make it possible for us to figure out a unit for representation which is based upon the population of Canada. If we were going to submit to the condition which was raised a few moments ago by the hon. member for Cumberland; if we had intended to create the condition which he has outlined as existing, then of course we would not have done what is contained in this resolution. He has suggested that by some means or other Nova Scotia can be reduced below ten members under this resolution, and that New Brunswick can be reduced below ten members. Well, he has not read the resolution carefully, or he would know that Nova Scotia can never at any time under this resolution be reduced below ten, and that New Brunswick can never be reduced below its present ten.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): If the minister will allow me, I did not make that statement. I said that this would be taken as a precedent; that further amendments may be made, without consulting the maritime provinces, which would result in a further reduction of our membership.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, of course, if we are to take under consideration all the possibilities of what any house of commons or any parliament in Canada might do, and make them as ridiculous as some people think they might be, we would be warranted in following an argument of that kind. But the fact of the matter is that the only reason that this question could not be stated in the resolution in the simplest possible form is for the purpose of retaining the protection which Nova Scotia has and retaining the protection which New Brunswick has. If it had not been for that consideration, all that it would have been necessary to say in order to make plain to the people of Canada what is intended would be this: "We are going to deduct the population of the province of Prince Edward Island and of the Yukon Territory and of the Northwest Territories from the whole population of Canada; then divide the remaining number by 250, and so get your unit; then divide the populations of each province by that unit of population, and we will get the membership for each province, and the total membership in these provinces will be 250, and then we will add back on the five that we have already taken off from Prince Edward Island and the Yukon, and you will have 255." There would have been no necessity of saying anything more than that, had it not been for the fact that some day Nova Scotia may drop below a figure which would entitle it to ten members. If it ever does, then instead of subtracting five members we will subtract fifteen, and we will also subtract the population of Nova Scotia and of Prince Edward Island and of the Yukon Territory from the population of Canada and divide by the number which is left, which in that case would be 240, and you get your unit. When the seven provinces are provided with 240 members, the fifteen are added back in to make the total of 255. In other words, the resolution absolutely provides that the membership of this house can never be more than 255 so long as the meaning of this resolution is put into a bill and passed first by this parliament and then by the British parliament. That is what is being asked for.

Someone suggested this evening that if we went on the same basis as they have in the United States we would have a very much smaller house than we have here at present. I would ask my hon. friend to let his mind go back to the time when the United States had a population of only twenty-five million, and take his figures, based upon the membership of the houses then, and divide them into the population and see what he would have got. This resolution provides for an amendment to the constitution which retains the membership of the House of Commons at exactly the same figure when we have forty million people as it provides for at the present time when we have less than twelve million people. In other words, the membership of the house would not under this resolution ever increase beyond 255. It would remain at that throughout all time until someone undertook to amend the constitution further in order to provide for something else. But we in this parliament cannot take into consideration all the things which people may do fifty years hence, or all the things they may do even twenty years hence. We can only act in the light of the information and the knowledge we have and do the thing which we think advisable. Under this resolution what we are proposing as advisable is to have the House of Commons composed of 255 members, and we are providing the means under which it will not increase beyond that figure but will remain at it.

I wanted to make that plain. But there is another thing I wanted to say in relation to this. The hon. member for New Westminster seems to base his opposition to the resolution upon the suggestion that Saskatchewan and perhaps some of the other prairie provinces are going to benefit by this being done now, and that probably British Columbia is going to lose something by this being done now. If he intended to argue from that that the prairies had something to do with proposing the plan I will agree. I can not understand his computations on the figures which are available. If we are going to follow what he has suggested, namely do nothing until after 1951, when the next census will be taken, British Columbia would remain with two members less than are provided for under this resolution and Saskatchewan would remain with one member more than is provided for under this resolution. In other words, Saskatchewan would remain at twenty-one until 1951, and British Columbia, with what he says is a greater population than Saskatchewan—and I do not admit that—would have a representation of only sixteen, not eighteen. So that if we want to do something at the present time in favour of British Columbia in order to give it a representation which is more comparable with the representation which Saskatchewan has, I would suggest that this resolution does it to much better advantage than the suggestion made by the hon. member for New Westminster. He would still maintain in his province a representation of eighteen until the next census, and we would retain in Saskatchewan only twenty until the next census is taken. I find it a little difficult to follow his reasoning to the effect that it would be twenty-five years longer before the C.C.F. would get into power in Canada under this scheme than under some other. I do not believe they will ever get into power under any scheme, though that is a matter of opinion. That, I think, has little bearing on the question which is under discussion.

I do not believe that the hon. member for New Westminster has justified the position which he says he is to take. If he is thinking in such terms as he indicated, in terms first of the welfare of his constituency and then of British Columbia, under this proposal his constituency might be smaller than it is now, but I do not know whether that would help him. But under this proposal British Columbia would certainly have two members more than under his proposal until the next redistribution, in which case that province, I think, would be more fully represented here than otherwise it would be.

I am inclined to agree when he suggests that British Columbia is on the up-grade in the matter of increased population. I am not sure that Saskatchewan is on the down-grade in matters of population. We have been on the down-grade for some time in other respects but not necessarily in population. Probably the fact that we were on the down-grade in matters of population for two or three years had something to do with some other things that have happened in Saskatchewan during that period of time, but I do not believe that we are always going to have that government, and I do not think we shall always have the reasons for population being down that we have had during those two or three years. Looking at the western provinces, I have always felt that Saskatchewan had a great deal to be proud of, and one fact that she has had a great deal to be proud of is that she has always had a greater population ever since people began to go there and to learn of conditions in Saskatchewan. She has always had a greater population than the other western provinces.

An hon. MEMBER: Not now.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, she still has, just by about the margin of two members that are being allowed under this resolution. We may have to wait until 1951 to be able to prove it, but in the meantime we are taking it for granted that the condition which is shown by every past census taken is still the position, that Saskatchewan has a greater population than any of the other western provinces, and one of the reasons why that has been the case in the past is this. People tell me, "Look at the undeveloped natural resources they have in the foothills of the Rocky Mountains". I agree with people who call attention to that fact. But in the next breath they say that Saskatchewan has nothing like the resources they have in the foothills of the Rockies. Let me say this. More real wealth has come out of any similar extent of territory in Saskatchewan, without any foothills; more real wealth has come out of any similar number of square miles in that province, than will ever come out of areas in mining districts where mining is the main reason for the development of any such area

We have an agricultural province. We depend upon the top six inches of soil; and if anyone takes a pencil and figures out the wealth that is coming out of that top six inches—the wealth that has come out ever since the province was first developed up to the present time—he will find it difficult to discover any other part of the world where a similar amount has been taken out of the natural resources of the country in order to provide for a similar number of people to live therein. That is the chief reason we have always had a higher population up to date.

An hon. MEMBER: Up to date.

Mr. GARDINER: Up to date, yes. My friends over the mountains think they will have a greatly increased population and I wish them luck, because if they get a greatly increased population in British Columbia and Alberta and a greatly increased population along the foothills of the Rockies on the east side, then I may tell them that three-fifths of the cultivated farm lands in Canada are located between the foothills and the city of Winnipeg. If any area is going to benefit by the fact that there are more people living in British Columbia, more people living in the foothills in Alberta, that area will be an agricultural area, and the greatest and best agricultural areas in western Canada are in Saskatchewan. I believe that as their population goes up ours will go up, and I hope their goes up very fast, because the faster it goes up, the sooner we shall be able to overtake anything that they are entitled to in the way of representation in this house.

I wanted to say these few words with regard to the situation as it exists, in order to emphasize the fact that this is not a Quebec proposal but a western proposal. I wish to make this appeal to members of the house and to those outside. This is not a question which concerns the maritimes alone. This is not a question which concerns the province of Quebec alone. This is not a question which concerns Ontario alone, nor does it concern the province of British Columbia alone; and to make this statement—in spite of what the hon. member for New Westminster says—that a member in this house should discuss public questions from the point of view of his own constituency and his own province, is to say that we shall never have unity in this country so long as we have a membership here that speaks only from that point of view.

What we want in connection with redistribution is a constitution which thinks the necessity for considering Ontario as against Quebec, Quebec as against Ontario, the maritimes as against western Canada, and western Canada as against some other part of the country, is entirely out of the picture. In order to take these questions entirely out of it there are two things to be done. One is to remove from the constitution any provisions that deprive us of the opportunity to have representation in this house according to population, with one exception, that exception being the provision which protects the maritime provinces against a reduction of membership until industry with population returns.

I am not so pessimistic about the maritimes as the hon. member for Cumberland. I do not agree that there cannot be a greater population in the maritimes. I believe that there is no part of Canada that has been dealt with more harshly by a policy which has built up central Canada at the expense of other parts of the dominion than the maritime provinces, and one of the reasons for that is illustrated right in the city from which my hon. friend comes.

I have gone to his city. The first time I drove through Amherst I wondered what I was looking at—one of the finest little cities in the dominion, a city which a few years ago was one of the most prosperous industrial places in Canada A gentleman,—my hon. friend knows him very well,—a good Irishman with the Irishman's usual wit, was driving me around the city, and I said to him, "How does it happen that I can see right through that building? I can see the windows on the other side." He answered, "Because everything has been taken out of it." I asked him who had taken it out and he said, "Those fellows in central Canada. They came to the conclusion that they could make something cheaper there than we could make it in Amherst; so somebody came here, bought the plant and closed it up, and now in central Canada they are making what we want to utilize here." He took me to one plant after another that was closed, and then finally said, "Here is one that is still operating." I said, "What are they making in there?" He said, "Coffins." Well, there is something in an illustration of that kind. What we want in Canada in order to protect us against that kind of thing is not a different kind of redistribution bill, but something entirely different. That thing which would be entirely different could put the maritime provinces back on the map industrially. I wish to say to my hon. friends from the maritime provinces that I do not know of any way of bringing it about quicker than to have those provinces think more in terms of the development of western Canada than they have been doing.

and in thinking in those terms to believe that there are the possibilities of entering western Canada by more than one route.

Over a considerable part of the year, western Canada can be entered by water through Churchill. As we get the improvements to navigation which have come about during the war applied, western Canada will be entered for a greater number of months of the year than at the present time. The maritimes can operate into Hudson bay with boats and put their products the same distance from every prairie farmer at Churchill as they are putting them to-day at Fort William.

Mr. BENTLEY: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) agree with that, because only a short time ago he told us that two and a half months was the limit for the port of Churchill.

Mr. GARDINER: The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply is an engineer. He built the elevators at Churchill; he had something to do with building some of the other equipment. He knows more about that question than I do; but in addition to that, being an engineer, he is going to be on the safe side. Being an optimist, and one who looks to the future, I do not need to look at it that way. I believe that with the improved facilities in navigation which we have, if we could navigate into Churchill for two and a half months at the time the elevators were built and at the time these investigations were made, then unless everything that we have heard about atomic energy and everything new is wrong, we ought to be able to operate into that port for at least a month longer, and I would hope for even more than a month longer. Whether we can or can not, in two or two and a half months the maritime provinces, manufacturing as they ought to be manufacturing, sitting right on the edge of the seas as they are, with ports unmatched in any part of Canada, ports open all the year round into which they could take the commodities of the world and manufacture them into the things that Canadians in the central part of Canada need, if they have the kind of vision as to what this country can become, they will have plants running twelve months of the year, and they can ship all the products that are required in western Canada in a year, in the months that the port of Churchill is open. If they cannot get it in through Churchill I am sure they can still navigate boats up the St. Lawrence and through the great lakes, and have just as much more come up by that route.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

They do not need to be always saying that the central part of Canada has ruined the maritime provinces. I am going to say to them that I do not understand why this war did not bring more industries to the maritime provinces than it did. I do not understand why the war did not bring more industry to Alberta than it did. It brougth a lot more industry to British Columbia than they had before, and that is why they are optimistic. But I do want to say that I believe the people themselves had more to do with getting that industry into British Columbia than anyone else. I do not know of any place in Canada where the people right on the spot did less to get industry into it than did some sections of the maritimes and Alberta. Let me repeat, there are no sections of Canada which have a greater future industrially, if brains and capital, if you like, are applied to their possibilities, than the two extreme ends of this country, the maritime provinces and British Columbia, and the foothills of Alberta. They are the gates of the country. By developing the possibilities of these routes I have been speaking about, and the possibilities of the natural resources located in their areas, they can make it possible for greater and greater populations to live in those areas.

Why, we talk of this country as though it consisted only of the St. Lawrence river basin and only the half of it on the north side. This country consists of an area which is driving farther north all the time. It was that area which made possible the production of equipment during war time, and which makes possible the production of equipment now. These cities along the St. Lawrence could not exist at all with their present populations were it not for the enormous wealth contained in the back areas of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and on into the prairies. Let me repeat, give us the industrial population to which we are entitled, first in the maritimes, because they are older, and then in Alberta and British Columbia, and we of Saskatchewan and the other prairie provinces will show you a prosperity which will match anything that has taken place in Canada down to the present time.

Tell us that there is no future for this country, that we can never have a population of more than twenty million and that we are going to have only a few millions in 1990, and proceed from that basis and this country will die on its feet. What we want in Canada to-day is vision. If the people who live in those areas feel that they are not getting what is coming to them, applying that vision will put those areas over, and by putting them over—

Mr. McCUAIG: The C.C.F.

Mr. GARDINER: We will get rid of the C.C.F. and all these other isms.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): May I ask the minister why the department and the government will not agree to the request of the provincial governments to reclaim the marshlands? They have deteriorated to a greater extent than the industries of that part of Canada, and the maritime provinces and some hon. members in this house have been demanding that these marshlands be reclaimed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his question has nothing to do with the subject under discussion.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to be good enough to call it eleven o'clock and permit me to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Jaenicke the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. St. Laurent the house adjourned at 10.53 p.m.

Friday, June 14, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

STATUTORY AUTHORITY FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a measure to make statutory provision for foreign exchange control now exercised under the authority of orders in council passed under the War Measures Act and for that purpose, inter alia, to (a) continue the special exchange fund account in the name of the Minister of Finance established under the Exchange Fund Act; (b) establish a foreign exchange control board which will be the successor of the existing foreign exchange control board and have power, under the direction and control of the Minister of Finance, to regulate and control transactions in foreign currencies and related transactions and to manage and operate the exchange fund account; (c) authorize the Minister of Finance to make advances to the exchange fund account out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may prescribe; (d) authorize the payment out of the exchange fund account of such remuneration to authorized dealers as the governor in council may prescribe.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MOULDERS' STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPRESENTATIONS OF ENGINEERING FIRMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. I am informed that representations have been made to the minister by certain engineering firms in Vancouver whose business has been affected by the prolonged moulders strike. May I ask the minister whether he has any statement to make and whether the Department of Labour is able to do anything in the circumstances?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was good enough to send me notice of his question. The wartime labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003, are administered in British Columbia by the Minister of Labour for British Columbia. That was the original arrangement when the regulations were drafted. As a consequence, all industrial disputes in that province are dealt with by the conciliation service of the province except those which are ordinarily within the legislative authority of parliament, such as disputes affecting railways, navigation or shipping, and by arrangement disputes affecting the coal mining industry. The foundry dispute is being handled by the provincial department of labour.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask a supplementary question? Has the minister been advised by the premier of British Columbia or by any official, that they consider this a matter that comes under the federal department of labour?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no knowledge of that. I believe the statement I have made is a fairly practical one. It is obvious that the federal department of labour cannot get into every dispute in every province. I know that some newspaper editors, with little experience of these things, have expressed opinions to the contrary—

Mr. MacINNIS: They do on everything.

Mr. MITCHELL: —but that dispute is being handled by the provincial department, and I have no knowledge of any communication either to my department or to anyone else with respect to it.

CANTEEN FUNDS

ALLOCATION AND DISPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I sent the Minister of Veterans Affairs notice of a question, but I see he is not here. Since the question has to do with the three defence departments, I will ask that it be taken as notice. Has the government complied with the recommendations contained in the fourth report of the canteen committee, which was set up in 1942, to arrange machinery for the allocation and disposition of canteen funds accumulated during the war?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Perhaps I might answer that question now. We are giving careful consideration to the whole question of canteen funds. I have asked the officers of my department to get me certain information in connection with them. Although I will not make any positive statement to this effect, I think I shall wish to suggest that at the next session of parliament we set up another committee on canteen funds, because the question is an important one. Substantial sums of money are involved. My present view is that it would be well to have the question considered by a committee of this house, but I do not think it would be possible to do it at this session. I make that statement in reply to my hon. friend's question in order that he and others interested may know the way we are thinking about it at the moment.

Mr. COCKERAM: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? What is to be the disposition of the funds of regimental canteens and clubs? Are they to go into the canteen funds?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is a complicated question. As my hon. friend knows, some of the funds come from regimental canteens and some from other sources, and the matter would have to be considered as a whole. At the moment I am not in a position to say just what will be done with respect to these funds, any more than any others.

SERVICE PERSONNEL

STEPS TO FACILITATE TRANSPORT OF FIANCEES TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources in his capacity as Minister of Immigration. On behalf of a number of Canadian servicemen who have fiancees in Holland, Belgium, France or other European countries, may I ask the minister whether he will try to find a way to facilitate their coming to Canada at an early date? Is it possible to give these girls the same consideration as that given to overseas war brides?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. member gave me notice of this question. The problem of the movement to Canada from the continent of Europe of the fiancees of Canadian servicemen is primarily one of transportation. A similar situation exists in the British isles, where many fiancees are awaiting an opportunity to proceed to Canada to join their intended husbands. It is not possible to make provision for the movement of fiancees on the same basis as the wives and children of servicemen. There are still approximately 25,000 servicemen's wives and children in the British isles, and 2,400 on the continent. These are being brought forward just as quickly as transportation is available and they are, of course, entitled to preference.

I can assure the hon. member that everything possible will be done to facilitate the movement of servicemen's fiancees. The situation is a difficult one. There are still many Canadians overseas who have been waiting for many months to secure accommodation for return to Canada; in fact some of them have been endeavouring to return since early last year. There will, of course, be an immediate improvement in the situation when the movement to Canada of service personnel and their dependents is completed.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PUBLIC CONTROL AND SUPERVISION OF DEVELOPMENT, APPLICATION AND USE

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 11, consideration in committee of bill No. 165, relating to the development and control of atomic energy—Mr. Howe—Mr. Macdonald, (Brantford City) in the chair.

On Section 1—short title.

Mr. GREEN: Press dispatches of this morning indicate that the United States government has released information about the use of atomic energy. Can the minister give a statement to the committee telling us just what the United States action means?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I am afraid I did not read the article. I saw the headlines and intended to read it, but I have not had time; therefore I cannot answer the question.

I know of no special release of information about atomic energy, although there very well may have been such a release. Canada, in any event, was not consulted in the matter.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister indicate what the expenditures in connection with atomic energy control will be during the fiscal year? I notice that in Great Britain an estimate was given when their bill was introduced into the House of Commons. The Canadian ministry must have some idea as to what the cost will be.

Mr. HOWE: So far as the current fiscal year is concerned, there are two types of expenditure involved, one on capital account and the other on operating account. At the moment the two pretty well overlap, because there is still some work going on in construction, and also some on operation. The construction of the Chalk River project will entail a cost of about $20,000,000. I am not sure how much will be spent this year; perhaps it will be five or six millions, which will be a carry-over from last year

Mr. GREEN: The total capital expenditure on Chalk River will be $20,000,000?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The operating is estimated to cost $3,500,000 annually.

Mr. GREEN: Are there any other expenses involved in addition to those at Chalk River.

Mr. HOWE: No, not directly on atomic energy. At the moment the activities of the Eldorado company are self-supporting, and I know of no expenditures outside of those I have mentioned.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GREEN: This is the section which deals with various definitions. For example, it defines the board, the president of the board, and a member of the board. Has any consideration been given to having the minister, who is over the board, a member of the board itself? It does seem to me that there might be some merit in having a member of the government an actual member of the board. It would tie the House of Commons in that much closer with the activities of the board.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that it would not be good organization. I think the board should have some body capable of sitting outside its orbit to review its work. For example, in my department the deputy minister is never permitted to be a member of a board of directors, the theory being that the job of the deputy minister is to see that the work of the board is kept in order. I rather think there should be a wholly outside body to check this work. If the minister was on the board there would be no one except parliament, or the government as a whole, perhaps, to check the work of the board.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I point out to the committee that we are now dealing with the definitions. Section 4 of the bill sets forth the composition of the board. Probably this discussion would be more appropriate under section 4.

Mr. GREEN: Section 2 defines a member, the board and the president. Surely we are in order in asking questions such as I asked on this section; and I think we will get along a great deal faster if we are not tied down too rigidly on the sections. I believe my question was quite in order.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not saying it is not in order, but I should think any discussion as to who sits on the board should be taken up when we are considering the composition of the board. I thought it would facilitate the work of the committee if we discussed that matter when discussing the composition of the board. However, I am entirely in the hands of the committee.

Mr. HACKETT: I want to ask the minister if he believes the rule—and I consider it a good rule—which precludes deputy ministers from sitting on the board of a crown company would necessarily apply to a minister. It seems to me that it would be a proper thing to have the minister on the board, because the company is administering and spending crown moneys. With the minister on the board the house could feel that it had a watch-dog on the board, and it would have a representative responsible to the house whose presence on the board would do away with much of the criticism that has been levelled at crown companies in that they are spending money without control on the part of the house.

Mr. HOWE: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the objection to having a deputy minister as a member of the board would apply with even greater force to the minister himself. After all, this board reports to a committee of the privy council, of which the minister is chairman. I never think it is very good organization, though many people would disagree with me, to have the president of a company act also as general manager. I believe the management should be separate, in a sense, from the policy-making branch, so that there may be a check on the management without the policy-making body necessarily becoming part of the technique of management.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not want to press the argument unduly, but I submit that while the theory to which the minister has just given expression may be good in business, there is a difference between ordinary procedure in business and the procedure which should be followed when crown moneys are involved. Does he not feel that a distinction should be made where a crown company is spending crown moneys; would it not give parliament more security and the government a better opportunity to maintain control of the moneys spent if it were represented on the boards of these companies?

Mr. HOWE: It occurs to me that there would be two or three objections. For example, sitting on a board of five the minister might be overruled and outvoted four to one, which would hardly be consistent with the line of authority. Then if a recommendation came from a board of which the minister was a member and it became the duty of the deputy minister to overrule the decision of the board, or to recommend to the minister that he overrule that decision, there would be some difficulty. I am strongly of the opinion that the board will function very much better if no minister of the crown is a member of it.

Mr. GREEN: Would that difficulty be overcome if provision were made in the bill that the minister be an ex-officio member of the board? That would give him the right to sit in at any time.

Mr. HOWE: He would still be a member of the board, and I think the same objection would apply.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister has some direct tie-up with the board it brings parliament that much closer to it. As the minister knows, in the United Kingdom the minister of supply is the whole board; there is no one else. Everything is handled directly under one minister. Perhaps we could get around the difficulty in the way I suggest.

Mr. HOWE: I would call my hon. friend's attention to section 7 of the bill, which reads:

> The board shall comply with any general or special direction given by the committee—

That is the committee of the cabinet.

> —with reference to the carrying out of its purposes and shall advise the committee on all matters relating to atomic energy which, in the opinion of the board, may affect the public interest.

In other words it is a board under the minister and subject to direction by the minister. I have never found that boards exceed their authority in spending money. The boards with which I am familiar have been most careful to make sure a project is approved before any expenditure is undertaken. The fact that the minister can change the personnel of the board at will, and the fact that the board must be subject to a specific direction if the minister gives it, I think set up a relationship better than would result if the minister were to act as one of the five members of the board itself.

Mr. CHURCH: Section 2(a) provides:

> "Atomic energy" means all energy of whatever type derived from or created by the transmutation of atoms.

In his able address on June 3 the minister mentioned the possibility of this energy being applied to civilian pursuits for the benefit of mankind, and he referred particularly to heat. The cost of producing this energy will be so prohibitive that in my opinion it will never be used to furnish heat and for other social and civilian purposes. The other day I quoted authorities to support this opinion. Electrical energy in Ontario, which in 1923 amounted to one million horsepower, at that time was the equivalent of twelve million tons of coal. I believe we have some 47,000,000 horse-power in Canada, only one-sixth of which has been developed for the benefit of the cities, towns and farms of this country. The atom will never accomplish anything like that. Fancy that, Mr. Chairman; in your own province the electrical horse-power developed in 1923 was the equivalent of 12,000,000 tons of coal. The other day I quoted the opinions of two of the greatest scientists in the world to-day on the cost and distribution of atomic energy. As you know, after every war some new invention comes along which causes people to have fabulous dreams of big things which, when examined from the scientific standpoint, do not measure up. If atomic energy would do anything comparable with what electrical energy has done in taking the place of coal, then we would have something to look forward to. The cost of using the atom to produce heat and the cost of transmitting that heat would be prohibitive.

There are other matters dealt with in section 2 to which I referred the other day. I do hope the real men of science will be in charge, not just gentlemen who may be presidents of universities, with administrative power, but men who know something about science itself. It is only in the last ninety years that science has discovered the power inherent in coal, oil and falling water, and the great benefits resulting therefrom to mankind. Those three discoveries did more for science than any other agencies. After all is said and done, in the last ninety years science has won the admiration of the world. It argues from facts, realities and examinations. It makes discoveries after taking great pains, with care and toil. The work of many thousands is devoted to science; they are the missionaries carrying on their explorations for the benefit of mankind.

Science is not like politics, or some other branches of endeavour. It is not always up in the clouds; rather it argues from facts. If the atom can be developed as a producer of power, as have coal, oil and falling water, it will be worth while. I am very very doubtful, however, about that development because, as I said the other day, sometimes we have on these scientific research boards men who are just executives and who have no knowledge of science. They are appointed because they may have been the heads of some department or other. I should hope that the board would consist of Canadians, because people in this country have shown that they are second to none in scientific endeavour.

From his experience in this connection, I believe the minister knows more on this subject than most of us in the house. I do suggest to him that any development of atomic power, while commercially costly, would most certainly be an important factor in a country such as Canada which requires heat for ten months of the year. Does he hope that from atomic energy heat will be developed, as it has been from the other discoveries I have mentioned, so as to relieve the people of this country from much of the cost involved in heating houses, hospitals and other buildings? Does the minister hope that the very laudable object mentioned in his speech of June 3 will be attained?

Mr. HOWE: I am hopeful that means will be found to convert atomic energy into usable heat at reasonable cost. When one stops to consider that a person could put enough plutonium in a capsule the size of a fountain pen to drive a battleship around the oceans for three years, it seems conceivable that means can be found to make use of atomic energy as valuable to the world as is the use of electricity at the present time.

Mr. FLEMING: A few minutes ago the minister referred to a committee of the cabinet to which the atomic energy control board will report, of which committee I believe he said he was chairman. Who are the other members? I suggest it would be particularly desirable to have the Minister of National Defence a member of that committee.

Mr. HOWE: As I said the other day, the committee consists of the following: The Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, chairman; the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Mines and Resources, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Labour.

Mr. GREEN: I note there is a definition of the expression "prescribed substances." It is my understanding that wide powers are taken to deal with the production and use of prescribed substances.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: The definition reads:

> "Prescribed substances" means uranium, thorium, plutonium, neptunium, deuterium, their respective derivatives and compounds and any other substances which the board may by regulation made under this act designate as being capable of releasing atomic energy, or as being requisite for the production, use or application of atomic energy.

Those last few words would seem to be wide indeed, because there must be many substances which could be regarded as requisite for the production, use or application of atomic energy. Is it necessary to have a definition as wide as that? Are the last two lines required?

Mr. HOWE: We are only at the beginning of the age of atomic energy. At the present time the only element capable of setting up chain reaction is uranium. Uranium is the heaviest of the elements. The next heaviest is thorium. While it is not believed at the present time that chain reaction can be set up with thorium, it may be used to supplement uranium by using the two together. It is quite possible that improved methods of setting up chain reaction will be found, and that the metals lower in the scale of the elements may be used. Therefore it is felt the board should have power to extend the list of metals over which it may exercise control, as the advance of science may indicate.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, but the words to which I have referred go much farther than the matter of defining substances. They cover articles used in the production of atomic energy. For instance, those words could be construed as being applicable to machinery, and many other articles. I refer in particular only to the words "or as being requisite for the production, use or application of atomic energy."

It may be necessary to have those words, but it seems to me there is a question whether the definition is too broad.

Mr. HOWE: I have no doubt the hon. member has the British act, which is considerably broader than ours. That act says that a "prescribed substance" shall mean uranium, thorium, plutonium, neptunium, or any of their respective compounds, or any such other substance as the minister may by order prescribe, being a substance which in his opinion is or may be used for the production or use of atomic energy, or research in matters connected therewith. The United States act contains a broader definition than this measure does. I suggest this provision is no wider than may be required to meet further developments. I can assure the hon. member that the board will not take action in respect of a substance unless it can prove to the minister, and through him to the house, that such action is justified.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Board constituted.

Mr. FLEMING: While section 3 makes the atomic energy control board a body corporate, and gives it the right to contract in the name of His Majesty, and to acquire property, it does not contain any provision that such body corporate may sue or be sued. I suggest that in that respect it is out of line with the policy we have heard enunciated in recent days. Of course we are not dealing with companies which may be set up by the board; but when the board itself is a body corporate, one would think the same principle ought to be adhered to.

In bill 155, respecting the operation of government companies, there is provision in section 7 under which every company may sue and be sued in respect of any right acquired or obligation incurred by it, as agent of His Majesty. It is true that the atomic energy control board is not to be a joint stock company; it is to be a body corporate, and it would seem only reasonable and logical that the same principle should be applied, that it may sue or be sued.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will appreciate the fact that we are not organizing a business; we are organizing a corporation to deal with atomic energy. It is intended that that corporation shall have the same immunities as the crown in acting for the crown in connection with that subject. I have suggested to the house on several occasions that if the board intends to do business, for instance if it intends to run Chalk River as a business institution, a company will be set up under the Companies Act which would not enjoy these immunities. This is simply to give the board a corporate identity with immunities similar to those enjoyed by the crown.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not think the situation is completely covered by the minister's answer. It may be intended at the moment that the actual transacting of business in respect to the devolopment of atomic energy shall be carried on by companies to be set up under a later section. Under section 3 certain powers are being conferred upon this board, which is to be a body corporate. Situations may arise which we cannot foresee at the moment, where the board would have dealings with individuals out of which contractual rights would arise. Section 3 provides that the board may contract in the name of His Majesty and that property acquired by the board shall be the property of His Majesty, but a situation might conceivably arise in which persons would acquire contractual rights against the board, and it would be a hardship to compel such persons to apply for a petition of right to sue the corporation. If we recognize the principle that business is to be carried on through a corporation, we should recognize the principle that such corporations should be able to sue and be subject to being sued.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to supplement the questions put by the hon. member for Eglinton by referring the minister to section 8, subsection (h), which seems to contemplate the actual carrying on of business and which would seem to be in line with what the hon. member for Eglinton has said about the impropriety of there being immunity.

Mr. HOWE: Section 3 indicates that the atomic energy control board can act only as the agent of His Majesty, and that the powers exercised by it shall be exercised only as an agent of His Majesty.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is not that true of all crown companies?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, yes.

Mr. HOWE: They are not restricted.

Mr. GREEN: That is provided in the bill we passed the other day.

Mr. FLEMING: I would refer the minister to section 7 of the bill we passed the other day respecting the operation of government companies. It reads:

7. (1) Every company is for all its purposes an agent of His Majesty and its powers may be exercised only as an agent of His Majesty.

(2) Every company may on behalf of His Majesty contract in its corporate name without specific reference to His Majesty.

The minister's answer may have reference to the second subsection, but the first subsection makes it quite clear that every one of the companies set up under that bill, or under the research council act, shall act as agents of His Majesty.

Mr. HOWE: A corporation set up under the Companies Act contracts in its own name, whereas this board will be able to contract only as an agent of His Majesty. In other words, if it buys land, it will buy it in the name of His Majesty, and the land will be registered in the name of His Majesty. There would seem to be no purpose and every reason against putting in a provision that this board may sue or be sued.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would it not be a corollary that there is nothing in this act which does apply to the carrying on of business or which empowers the board to carry on business in the ordinary course of events?

Mr. HOWE: Under section 9 the board is to make regulations for developing, controlling, supervising and licensing the production, application and use of atomic energy. It has power to regulate those matters, but those are not matters of business. They are matters for the crown, and in carrying out its duties the board will be acting only as the crown. Would it not be better to discuss these matters under the proper sections? It is hard to jump back and forth.

Mr. GREEN: Section 3 is the one that provides for setting up the board. It seems to me that some consideration should be given to having an advisory committee, such as I referred to the other day when we were discussing the bill on second reading. When the minister closed the debate on the second reading he did not deal with the advisory board that is to be set up in the United States. They are to have an honorary board of nine members, presumably scientists or manufacturers, which will check the activities of the atomic energy control commission. Could not something of that type be set up here? The other night the minister told us that perhaps in time it would be well to have a committee of the house check the activities of our atomic energy control board, but how about an advisory board made up of civilians?

Mr. HOWE: It will be remembered that the atomic energy control commission in the United States will take over more than two billion dollars' worth of property. They are to take over a going concern which is spread over a great deal of territory. The position here is quite different. We are setting up our board at the inception of the development, and there would seem to be no purpose in having an advisory committee. It will be difficult enough to get five men who can make any real contribution at this time, and I would not know where we could get nine more. While consideration has been given to the matter, the decision has been taken that at the present time, rather than having an advisory committee, the board will report to a cabinet committee.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not a fact that the advisory board in the United States is to be appointed because such tremendous powers are being given to the atomic energy control commission? Those powers may be so far-reaching that no one can tell just exactly how broad they will be, and that is why the advisory board is to be appointed.

Mr. HOWE: The advisory board in the United States is not in position to regulate the authority of the commission. It simply advises on scientific and atomic matters.

Mr. GREEN: I know the atomic energy control commission is supreme at all times, but I understand that the advisory board is to act as a check.

Mr. HOWE: Not as a check—simply to advise it on scientific matters; that is all.

Mr. GREEN: What about the United States plan of having a military liaison committee? We have no provision for a committe of that type in Canada. It does seem that there would be some benefit in having our Department of National Defence tied up in some way with the atomic energy control board, particularly in view of the fact that uranium is found in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: I think it would hardly be wise to try to duplicate in Canada the machinery in the United States. Their organization is quite different. For example, the members of the cabinet in the United States are not responsible to congress. They are not even members of congress; therefore the tie-up is quite different. My hon. friend will appreciate that the link between the army and the board is through the minister who is a member of the committee on scientific and industrial research. As a matter of fact one of the highest ranking army officers in this country, one of our only two full generals, will probably be a member of the board, if only for the reason that he is Canada's representative on the atomic energy commission. Therefore there is no trouble about a link with the army. It must be remembered that from the start and up to the present the development in the United States has been carried on by the army, and carried on for the purpose of developing military weapons. That situation in the United States does not obtain in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: There will be—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, would the minister take a seat further down the aisle so that we can hear him? Where he is now it is becoming a hole-in-the-corner discussion, and this sort of thing goes on until it becomes unbearable.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to do that. I apologize to my hon. friend, but the other seat was occupied when I attempted to move.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I thank the minister. We are deeply interested in this subject, and we simply cannot hear these Conservatives when they start whispering.

Mr. GREEN: Then there is no direct connection between the Department of National Defence and the atomic energy control board?

Mr. HOWE: There is the same connection between the Department of National Defence and the board as there is between the Department of Finance and the board or between the Department of Reconstruction and the board or the Department of Agriculture and the board. The Minister of National Defence is a member of the committee to whom the board reports.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister that consideration be given to having a closer tie-up with the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HOWE: We have one of Canada's two full generals as a member of the board, and reporting to a committee one member of which is the Minister of National Defence. What closer tie could we have?

Mr. GREEN: After all this may be a matter of life and death to the Canadian people.

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. GREEN: And the uranium is in Canada. I am suggesting that there is some merit in having a military committee in liaison with the atomic energy control board. But under the proposed set-up there is no direct connection between the Department of National Defence and the board.

Mr. HOWE: The United States Act provides:

There shall be a military liaison committee consisting of representatives of the departments of war and navy, detailed or assigned thereto, without compensation, by the secretaries of war and navy in such number as they may determine.

[Mr. Howe.]

In Canada we have the secretary of war—the Minister of National Defence—a member of the committee to which the board reports. Surely he can assign to the board through that committee any person he wishes.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has told only half the story. In the United States the secretary of war and the secretary of the navy, if they do not approve a decision made by the atomic energy control board. can go direct to the president and complain about the action of the board, and in that case, as I understand it, the decision of the president is final.

Mr. HOWE: May I point out that the reason they must go to the president is that they cannot go to parliament. I am not sure that going to the president means any more than going to the prime minister here.

Mr. MACDONNELL: Does not that mean anything?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly. But in the United States it is the last resource remaining to the members of the cabinet.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I say this, following up what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South. The minister says that as things are now the board reports to a committee on which the Minister of National Defence sits. I presume by that he means the cabinet.

Mr. HOWE: No; the committee of the privy council on scientific and industrial research.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Is it not one thing to have a department of national defence with a definite responsibility for decisions taken and on the other hand only a vague or partial responsibility? Nobody wants the civil power to be omnipotent more than I do. But surely to have military people with definite responsibility as the developments go along is very different from their being only vaguely concerned with those developments.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend will appreciate that the military are responsible for the defence of Canada at all times. It is proposed to appoint in the person of General McNaughton a man who was chairman of the joint defence board of the United States and Canada and Canada's representative on the atomic energy commission of the united nations, one of Canada's only two full generals. Surely he would not close his eyes entirely to defence matters associated with atomic energy.

Mr. GREEN: It is admitted that there is need for the greatest secrecy with regard to some aspects of atomic energy. Is that not primarily the concern of the Department of National Defence? Are not they the ones who should decide whether certain information should be given out? Surely they are at least partly concerned with the decision as to what must be kept secret and what need not be. Is not the whole need for secrecy based on defence?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps it is based on defence, but the decisions are not taken on the military level. The united nations commission on atomic energy is not a military body.

Mr. GREEN: Why is there need for secrecy at all if it is not for defence purposes?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps it is for defence purposes, but all defence decisions need not necessarily be taken by military men. If my hon. friend will read the debates in the United States congress he will see that at first the May bill provided for military control, but they finally adopted the McMahon bill, which provided for civilian control.

Mr. GREEN: There is a big difference between military control and having a member of the military sitting on the committee.

Mr. HOWE: Does my hon. friend suggest that there is a better defence authority than the man I have mentioned as Canada's probable member on the commission?

Mr. GREEN: I do not think the minister should get down to personalities.

Mr. HOWE: I am not. I am getting down to rank, the rank of a full general.

Mr. GREEN: The rank does not always make the best man for certain purposes.

Mr. HOWE: I give up.

Mr. GREEN: General McNaughton may not be there all the time. The question is whether there should be any closer tie-up with the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HOWE: The government will take the responsibility for the membership of the commission, and I think it can be left to the government.

Mr. KNOWLES: The dispatch to which the member for Vancouver South referred—a number of us have read it, but the minister did not have time to read it—gives new information with respect to atomic energy not only in the field of armaments but also in a good many other fields affecting humankind. One of the items in particular had to do with what it was now believed atomic energy might mean in the medical field, covering the entire question of health. We are so definitely on the fringe of the whole question that it would be a mistake to set up the kind of board or relationship that would imply that our only interest, or our main interest, was in the field of defence. If it is to be a boon to humankind it will not give all its benefits if it is to be regarded as a means to more efficient methods of warfare. It will have to be used in all these other fields. If I were going to make a case for any special relationship on the part of a particular department of government, I would prefer that it be with the Department of National Health and Welfare or some other department which is equally important from this point of view. I am not asking for that. What I am saying is by way of antidote to the remarks of the member for Vancouver South, and I am suggesting that it is far better to have the general all-inclusive kind of relationship which the minister is proposing. If a committee of the cabinet includes all the ministers whom the minister has mentioned—I listened closely to the list, and it embraced about all those who are involved in the matter—and if the board is similarly wide in its interests, then I suggest that this approach is the best one to make at the present time. It may be that later we shall have to weight it in the direction my hon. friend suggests, though I hope we shall find it better to weight it in the direction of other matters that are in the interests of the human race. In the meantime this general all-inclusive set-up which the minister proposes in the bill is a good one, and for my part is quite satisfactory.

Mr. SKEY: Speaking of property in clause 3, and coupling that with defence, I would ask the minister if the government is making full plans to ensure the defence of Canadian mines, the atomic energy plant at Chalk River and other atomic projects.

Mr. HOWE: Yes; that is taken care of.

Mr. SKEY: And adequate security measures?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. SKEY: The commanding general of the army ground forces of the United States is reported in to-day's press as having predicted that the peace of the world depends upon the ability of the United States forces to move in and destroy the atomic energy plants and installations of any aggressor country in the near future. He says they will drop their ground forces; therefore we should make sure that our own plants are adequately protected against a similar form of attack from beyond this continent.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister say something about the extent of the knowledge that is possessed or will be confided to the members of the atomic energy control board and the members of the cabinet committee who will be receiving reports from the board? In the fall session of this parliament the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply said, if I recall his words correctly, that he was the only person in Canada who knew the secret of the atomic bomb or atomic energy—one or the other. I take it that secret has been imparted to others within the limited official circle, or will be imparted to those who are to compose the board and the cabinet committee who will be reviewing reports from the board. Otherwise, on the one hand reports of the board will be of little value, and the review by members of the cabinet, on the other hand, will be valueless unless they share the secret knowledge which the minister said then that he possessed.

Mr. HOWE: I think my hon. friend has gone rather far afield. If I made any statement it was that I was the only man in Canada, except for the Prime Minister, who knew that a bomb was in the making or that a bomb was to be dropped. I am sure my hon. friend did not know it, and I do not think he will find anyone who did. It is a very well kept secret.

Mr. GRAYDON: Did the cabinet not know that?

Mr. HOWE. No.

Mr. FLEMING: How much knowledge is possessed or will be possessed by the members of the board? Will they have all the information in relation to atomic energy and the development of it? I take it these men will be appointed on the basis of their ability to sift out the knowledge thus far developed and apply it to continuing and increased uses. Will that be their particular function?

Mr. HOWE: The board will have all the information there is. It will be in charge of the project, and will decide how much information other men may have; but I can see no possible way of limiting the amount of information they will have, or any reason for limiting it.

Mr. FLEMING: How many people within the official circle will have that information? To how many will it extend?

[Mr. Skey.]

Mr. HOWE: I cannot imagine what information my hon. friend has in mind. People have all the information they need to do their jobs. That is about the status of the matter to-day.

Mr. FLEMING: By information I mean all the information available in Canada as to the secret of the development of atomic energy, and such knowledge as may exist as to its potential use for other purposes in the future: in other words, that part of the information which is secret, because very few of us know anything about it. I refer to the kind of information which the minister referred to several days ago as information which he felt should not be made available to the public or to a parliamentary committee. What I want to know is, how many people will be possesed of this secret information. Will it be confined to the cabinet and members of the board as well as a few top ranking scientists working under the direction of the board? How far will it extend?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot imagine what information my hon. friend has in mind. Without such information as I have indicated, a vacuum would be created for lack of knowledge. The position to-day is that if a man has a job to do, he has all the information he needs to do that job. There are people, I presume, who have comprehensive information regarding the whole field, but I am sure I am not one of them. I am not one of those who can answer all question about atomic energy. There are people who know certain phases of atomic energy, and that will always be so. If a man could absorb everybody's knowledge in every field he would be the wisest man on atomic energy. I cannot think of any question my hon. friend could ask that I could not answer; nevertheless I would not want to be cross-examined by people who were posted by scientific men who were in need of more particularized information.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not think the minister has completely answered my question. There is certain information, perhaps a good deal of it, in relation to the development of atomic energy which is not public property. A good deal of it is highly secret, so secret that the minister the other day intimated he did not think it was wise that a parliamentary committee should be set up to review what might be a proper form of control of atomic energy, lest much of that information might leak out. My question is a simple one. How many people are going to be possessed of this secret essential information under the proposals contained in this bill? Obviously the members of the board must have it. I should think the members of the cabinet would need to have it. Certainly the members of the committee who will be reviewing reports from the atomic energy control board must have it. How many others must have the information which the minister does not think should be possessed even by a select committee of the house?

Mr. HOWE: The science of atomic energy is there for all to read. As I said, it has been published in the Smyth report. The processes by which atomic energy is created are secret processes. I do not think this committee would be particularly interested in how the thing is done; they are interested in results.

Mr. KNOWLES: Or lack of results.

Mr. HOWE: Or lack of results. I suppose the people who built the pile know how it was built, and they probably know how it works. They may or may not know the whole story. A great many people know certain phases of this work; very few people know the entire chain, and there is no disposition on anybody's part to widen the circle of those who do know the whole chain.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is it not a fact that there is confusion—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Eglinton has not quite finished.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have no objection to giving way, but I notice that others do not give way when I rise occasionally to follow up questions that I have in mind.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Eglinton was asking a question. If he feels that he has not received his answer, he should be allowed to continue.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think he has received his answer.

Mr. FLEMING: I thank the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for giving way. I wish to get this point cleared up; his point may be a different one. If I understood the minister's answer correctly, the members of the atomic energy control board are not necessarily to be possessed of the secret of the processes by which atomic energy is being developed. If there is to be that limitation on the knowledge of the members of this board, how useful is their work to be? It may be that the committee has taken an exaggerated view of the function of the board under the bill. Most of us understood that this board was to be a body possessed of all the information in this field, and was to give direction to development. If we have to take a narrower view of the functions of the board, in the light of the suggestion in the minister's last answer that they are not necessarily to have all the information about the processes by which atomic energy is to be developed, then we should have further elucidation from the minister as to exactly what powers the board is to have.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can give an analogy. No doubt my hon. friend drives an automobile.

Mr. FLEMING: It is pretty nearly done for now; I need a new one.

Mr. HOWE: It is something that he does. Does he know how it works? I doubt whether he can take it apart and put it together again.

Mr. FLEMING: No.

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing to prevent him from learning all that if he cares to do so; therefore the amount of knowledge he has of the automobile is just what he chooses to learn. It is exactly the same with this atomic energy commission. The atomic energy commission can direct the work of atomic energy just as my hon. friend can drive a car. If they want to delve into the construction of the pile, learn how to make a pile, no doubt that would be possible, though it might be a lifetime job. The amount of knowledge they will have is just the amount that they think it is necessary for them to take the time to acquire.

Mr. FLEMING: But that information would be available to them?

Mr. HOWE: Certainly; they will be the people who will own the atomic energy plant.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are we not rather confusing the matter of secrecy with the secrecy about the bomb, and secrecy as to the basis of atomic energy? It seems to me that they are two different things. It is pretty well known that a first-class scientist—and there are not many of them—in each country knows what is the basis of atomic energy. The council that we are setting up might conceivably consist of people who have not the scientific knowledge to understand the whole process. Once before I referred to a conference which I attended in December, at which there were many of these first-class scientists. They told us that there were not three hundred first-class scientists in the United States who were qualified to follow through the whole process of atomic energy. If there are not three hundred in the United States, there would be fewer than three hundred in this country, by a long way.

Mr. HOWE: Not thirty.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is all this talk about secrecy, but you cannot keep secrets from scientists. As a matter of fact it would be wrong to prevent scientists from exchanging scientific information, because to that extent you would retard the development of science all over the world. Therefore when we talk about secrecy, I think that probably scientists could come before a parliamentary committee and tell us all there was to know about atomic energy.

Mr. HOWE: About the science.

Mr. COLDWELL: And when we were all through with the examination probably most of us would be as wise as we were before—

Mr. GRAYDON: It would not be the scientists' fault.

Mr. HOWE: And quieter.

Mr. COLDWELL: I quite agree that this is a matter that has to be left to this commission, the best qualified commission we can get. Unless he devoted a great deal of time to it, I doubt very much whether the minister himself, an outstanding engineer, would be able to follow all the steps leading up to the production of atomic energy.

Mr. CASE: How does the commission propose to control the production of uranium? There is a company operating now under the name of International Uranium. They are offering their stock for sale to the Canadian public, contending that they are the only private company in the world producing uranium. If they are producing uranium they must find some place to dispose of it. Will they dispose of their product to this government agency, or will there be a free market eventually in which this uranium can be disposed of? If there is a free market, then there would be competition in the development of atomic energy. Competition itself might not be too bad, but the fact remains that unless we can control this substance—and I hope we shall be able to do it through the agency being set up by the government and by research, so that atomic energy will reveal itself as a great instrument for peace and for the welfare and general well-being of mankind—there will be difficulties. There are agencies in the world which are seeking out this latent power to be developed solely for destructive purposes. We have uranium deposits in Canada, and they are largely concentrated in the northwest territories. There is a private concern known as International Uranium which is going to seek to develop and produce uranium and to offer it for sale on the markets of the world, if I may use that term. If they cannot do that, where will they dispose of their product? How will this proposed commission control the production of uranium?

Mr. HOWE: No uranium has ever been produced in Canada except by the Eldorado Mining and Refining company, which is owned by the government. There will never be a free market for uranium in this or any other country. If uranium is produced, the government will take steps to acquire and control the product.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hardly know how to ask the minister exactly what I have in mind, but the members of this committee ought to have some means of learning, confidentially if need be, one or two important matters. The first has to do with the possession by Canada of the actual knowledge of processes requisite to the creation of atomic bombs. We ought to know whether or not there are in Canada and available to this board men who have knowledge of all the processes involved. Then we ought to know whether we have in Canada the necessary equipment to manufacture bombs. When the news first came out I gathered that the United States had been entrusted with full responsibility, first of all for the knowledge of how to make the bomb, and secondly for the equipment with which to manufacture it. Now I see this difficulty: Suppose we should get into another war under conditions similar to those which obtained in the beginning of the last war, when we were involved as a commonwealth with a prodigious enemy and the United States were not yet in the war. Would this mean that we as a British commonwealth would not have access to atomic bombs which we could use in case of need, until we could get the United States into the war?

Mr. HOWE: No one in Canada to-day knows how the United States make their bombs. No one has asked for the information. I am sure if they did ask for it, the information would not be given unless it was thought Canada needed the information, which I do not think it does at the moment. I have no doubt that having the explosive material which we make in Canada, our ordnance people could make a bomb of their own. I doubt very much whether they will do so, but that will be a matter for the military forces. I do not think it is particularly difficult to make a bomb, and I do not think it is necessary for us to have knowledge of how the United States make their bomb in order to do so.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: An interesting thought occurred to me when the minister said we have in this country the explosive material from which the bomb could be made. Apparently it is being produced now. Can the minister tell us what is being done with it, how it is being disposed of?

Mr. HOWE: It builds on itself. It is being used to build more. There is no disposable plutonium at the moment.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It is being accumulated?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and we are building up the chain reaction. It will be used for experimental purposes, for medical purposes. For instance, there would be no objection to distributing some of the by-products of plutonium for use in medical laboratories for experimental purposes. I take it from what has been said here to-day the article referred to the fact that the Americans are beginning to distribute the by-product material for medical use. We shall do the same.

Mr. SKEY: Has the minister considered the appointment of the Minister of National Defence for Air to his board?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. SKEY: It seems to me that the air side of the use of atomic energy for military purposes is just as important as the ground side, and I believe the government should give consideration to this appointment.

Mr. HOWE: The suggestion was made that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply should be a member of the board, and there would be objections to that. The same objections would apply to any minister of the crown.

Mr. SKEY: I am referring to the committee.

Mr. HOWE: The cabinet committee on scientific research?

Mr. SKEY: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: That would be a matter for the cabinet to discuss. I dare say if the minister for air thought he should be on the committee it would not be difficult to arrange the appointment. It is not one of the prize appointments of the government.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the board to be set up under this act assist and foster private research and development in respect to atomic energy, or will it discourage private research and development and limit it to the board itself and its subsidiaries?

Mr. HOWE: I would refer my hon. friend to section 9(a):

(1) With the approval of the governor in council the board may make regulations,—

(a) for encouraging and facilitating research and investigations with respect to atomic energy.

Mr. GREEN: But what is to be the policy? Is it to promote private research?

Mr. HOWE: It says so. That is the mandate to the board.

Mr. GREEN: That is only the power to make regulations. Can the minister tell us whether governmental policy is to give private research every encouragement?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes; certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to know if any requests have come to the government for these by-products for medical purposes.

Mr. HOWE: I know medical science is looking forward eagerly to the day when these by-products will be available. I could not say whether definite applications have come in, but certainly we know where to put the by-products when they are available, which will be in a few months in the future.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I take it, then, that hospitals, colleges and so on will have priority?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. CASE: Is there a fixed price for the product? The minister says the market will be restricted, that the commission will buy the uranium which is available. Will the International Uranium company, which is listing its stock and producing this material, sell to this agency at a fixed price? Is that price fixed the same as the price for gold is fixed, or how do you measure its value?

Mr. HOWE: I know something about the sale of stock of International Uranium, but I do not know anything about the sale of uranium by the company. Eldorado sells its uranium based on the cost of production, and I presume the largest seller would fix the market for anyone else.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there to be a free sale of uranium in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: No. I said there would never be a free market.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It must be obvious to everyone that if Canada does not possess the knowledge necessary to manufacture bombs; if she does not possess the mechanical equipment with which to manufacture bombs, then in effect Canada is practically subservient to the United States.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I hope not, but I am interested in this question. Already during this session a number of hon. members have been exercised over changing the name of Dominion day to Canada day so that we can be more independent of Britain. We are supposed to do several other things in order to assert our sovereignty, but no one seems to be at all concerned about taking precautions to see that we do not lose our sovereignty to another power. Certainly we can lose our sovereignty completely if we have the United States right alongside of us possessing the knowledge and mechanical equipment to manufacture bombs and, as the minister said, in a position to use her discretion as to whether or not she will let us have the knowledge. If she thinks we ought to have it, she will let us have it. Surely that is a grotesque situation.

Mr. HOWE: If I may interrupt my hon. friend, Canada is perhaps the only country in the world that is not that position vis à vis the United States. I said we had sufficient skill in this country to design and produce a bomb if we wished to; we do not need to go to the United States for that information. I did not indicate that we intended to do so, but I said our ordnance people certainly could produce a bomb that would use the material we make in this country. We have made it a point not to ask the United States for any information we do not need. We never ask for things that are likely to be refused, and I could not think of any good reason at all for asking the United States to tell us how to make the bomb. I think they would say, "Go and do what we did; find out for yourselves."

Mr. BLACKMORE: I feel reassured. There are some people who do a great deal of talking and worrying about non-essentials, but who completely ignore things which are fundamentally essential. I have been accused in the house of being an imperialist—which is complete nonsense. I want to see Canada great and free in every respect. My reason for concern in this matter arises partly from the fact that we are entering a time of great danger; surely everyone realizes that. As a member of the house I feel it my duty to probe into the general situation sufficiently to find whether we are still a sovereign nation.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Composition and appointment of board.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontorio): What are the proposed salaries?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say. Salaries will be fixed by the governor in council, and I presume they will be on the scale required to obtain the type of men needed. For example, the chairman of the national research council is ex officio a member. He would receive only one salary, his present one. I presume that others might be in a position where they would require no salary. But if a person considered desirable required a salary, I am sure the governor in council would fix one sufficient to attract him to the job.

Mr. GREEN: Is the minister in a position to say at this time whether the board will be operative, or merely advisory?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. McIVOR: We can rest assured the salaries paid will not be much higher than those paid in the United States. I see in the United States act the general manager appointed by the president is to receive $15,000. I was surprised the amount was not larger. The director in the research division is to receive $14,000, or less than our cabinet ministers.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Duties of the board.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain this section?

Mr. HOWE: It says:

> The board shall comply with any general or special direction given by the committee with reference to the carrying out of its purposes.

I should think that is sufficiently clear. Then it continues:

> —and shall advise the committee on all matters relating to atomic energy which, in the opinion of the board, may affect the public interest.

It has the responsibility for advising with respect to atomic energy in all matters which may affect the public interest.

Mr. GREEN: When the resolution was under discussion on June 3 the minister said, as reported at page 212 of Hansard:

> The bill provides that the board will operate by directives.

I presume he was referring to section 7 when he said that.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: And he continued:

> —that all directives will be published and tabled in parliament by the chairman of the committee of the privy council to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member is discussing section 9. He will find provision for that when we reach that section.

Mr. GREEN: Section 9 deals only with the regulations passed by the board. Section 7 deals with directives given by a committee of the cabinet to the board. The minister said on June 3 that those directives would be tabled in the house.

Mr. HOWE: No; the directives of the board.

Mr. GREEN: Then he went on to say:

As set out in the bill, it will be the duty of the chairman of the privy council committee to bring to the attention of parliament any regulations or orders issued by the board and to give parliament any information acquired by the board that it would be in the public interest to publicize.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention that the directives given by the cabinet committee to the board shall be laid on the table of the house?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GREEN: The provision is merely for the regulations and orders issued by the board itself.

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: They are to be laid on the table of the house?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any provision under which parliament can override or reverse any of these regulations or orders? It will be recalled that last year when we passed the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act a provision of the type I have indicated was inserted, under which parliament has power to override an order.

Mr. HOWE: That is a negative resolution.

Mr. GREEN: That is the way it is described in the United Kingdom, but I have never heard it described as such in Canada. Would it not be well to have some such provision inserted in this bill?

Mr. HOWE: Parliament is being asked to pass the bill. If it desires, parliament can repeal the act. I cannot think that the regulations of the board would be such that they would require the action indicated. My hon. friend has referred to the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. That is the only act ever passed by this parliament which required a negative resolution. If such negative resolution were included in this measure, then I cannot think of any measure which would not require it.

Mr. GREEN: There is only one purpose for a provision of that kind, and that is to give parliament more control over the actions of a board. The board indicated here is given very wide powers. It may be almost completely out of the control of parliament, and I suggest we should consider the suggestion of giving power to parliament to override regulations or orders issued by the board. For example, it may make a drastic order respecting the use of property. Would it not be well to give parliament the right to override an order or regulation passed by the board and laid on the table of the house?

Mr. HOWE: I think there is a distinction between this and that done in respect of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. In that instance the governor in council was given permission to legislate. This board has no such power; it operates under the direction of a minister. It has not as much power as certain boards I could mention. For instance, it is not as independent as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is not a board under a minister.

Mr. GREEN: It might be a good idea to have some control over the broadcasting corporation, too.

Mr. HOWE: My own view is that it is unwise to set up boards which are not under ministers. Nevertheless, parliament has done so frequently. This board is under a minister. That minister is responsible to parliament. He holds a seat in and is a member of parliament. I suggest the situation is quite different from that which obtains in connection with the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act.

Mr. GREEN: In Great Britain that power has been given, namely that parliament can override a regulation passed by the minister.

Mr. HOWE: I know.

Mr. GREEN: The other point I would mention is that the bill says the board shall advise the committee on all matters relating to atomic energy which, in the opinion of the board, may affect the public interest. Should that not be "in the opinion of the committee"?

Mr. HOWE: The committee might not know about it.

Mr. GREEN: Should not the board report everything to the committee?

Mr. HOWE: What is "everything"? The committee can ask the board for any information it likes, anything it wishes to have. That is one privilege. The other obligation on the board is to inform the committee of everything coming before them which may affect the public interest. I do not think the hon. member would suggest they should tell everything; that would be a heavy responsibility to place on any man.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be wiser to leave out the words "in the opinion of the board", so that the section would read:

—shall advise the committee on all matters relating to atomic energy which may affect the public interest.

Mr. HOWE: How could the board be sure? That would be putting upon the board an obligation which the board might be reluctant to accept, to tell everything that in the opinion of the board would affect the public interest. The board might think a certain thing did not affect the public interest and then find later that it did. I do not see how one could place an obligation of that kind upon the board.

Mr. COLDWELL: It would have to exercise its opinion anyway.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The wording of section 7, coupled with what the minister said a moment or two ago in answer to a question, raises a question in my mind which may have some substance. Is it the board or the committee that would exercise initiative? Does the board go ahead subject to questioning by the committee, subject to suggestions by the committee and complying with any general or special directions by the committee? In the answer given by the minister I got the impression, perhaps wrongly, that the board sat back and waited for the committee to direct it to do things. If I am wrong, then I suggest that the wording of section 7 does not seem to be apt. This may not be a substantial point, but it seems to me that the way the board is instructed is a substantial point.

Mr. HOWE: I have said on one or two occasions that the position of this board is analogus to the position of the national research council. The national research council is the driving power. The committee of the cabinet does not tell the national research council what kind of activity it shall carry on. That is bound to be the case with a board that is spending its full time on a certain problem as against those people who are spending only a small fraction of their time on it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does not section 8 answer that question? It says that the board may undertake. Is that not a partial answer to the question?

Mr. HOWE: I think so.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. STIRLING: Several times the minister has referred to the fact that the board is under the minister. The bill does not describe the minister. True, it relates to the chairman, who must be the minister, but does that mean that the board in a sense will be under the direction of the minister who at the time being is the chairman of the board?

Mr. HOWE: That is right.

Mr. HERRIDGE: The commission set up under the security council for the control of atomic energy is sitting in New York. The press to-day reports that the commission is considering the following specific proposals: First, extending to all countries the exchange of basic scientific information for peaceful work; second, the control of atomic energy to an extent necessary to ensure its use only for peaceful means; third, the elimination of atomic weapons and other major weapons which could be used for mass destruction and, fourth, effective safeguards by way of inspection and other means. I should like to ask the minister from whom our representative on that commission would get his instructions. Would he receive them from the board, from the committee or from some other body? What would be the chain of responsibility between our representative on the commission and the government of this country?

Mr. HOWE: The representative is advised by a scientific panel, but he is instructed by the committee of the cabinet. The committee of the cabinet met with our delegate only three or four days ago; written instructions to the delegate were approved by the cabinet and the delegate proceeded with those instructions.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Powers of the board.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Perhaps what I have to say might more properly come under section 12, but in case it does not I am bringing up the matter under this section. I think the committee realizes the dangers involved in working with fissionable material, despite the care that is taken. Two or three weeks ago an accident took place in New Mexico. A young Winnipeg scientist, Doctor Louis Slotin, was working with several other physicists and some fissionable material was released. This young man placed himself between that material and his companions. He went farther than that; he seized it with his own hands and put it out of harm's way. He saved their lives but unfortunately he himself died. He was one of the most brilliant young scientists that Canada has produced, and now he is lost to us. My question arises out of such a tragedy happening here. Will the board have power to ensure that relatives will not suffer economically through the death of one upon whom they are dependent?

Mr. HOWE: There is no way of compensating for the type of accident my hon. friend has mentioned. That is comparable with an accident that would happen to a workman in a hazardous occupation. For instance, men were killed in our explosives plants during the war, not many fortunately, but their dependents received only the compensation that is provided by law under the workmen's compensation acts. The board will have a retirement fund, but I doubt if any special provisions will be made for accidental death. Accidents occur everywhere, but I do not think our accident rate at Chalk River is likely to be any greater than the rate in other classes of hazardous occupations.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Take a young scientist who is married, perhaps with one child. He is killed because of an accident and he may have very slight financial resources. What responsibility will the board or the government take to see that his widow and child do not suffer?

Mr. HOWE: There is no special provision. A young scientist is just as likely to be killed in an industrial accident in a private laboratory as in a public laboratory. A private firm might make certain compassionate allowances and the government has been known to do that as well. I think it is impossible to make provisions which will ensure that the family will not suffer when the breadwinner is killed.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Are scientists who have to work closely with this material required to pay an additional premium for life insurance?

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure, but my impression is that it is not regarded by life insurance companies as a hazardous occupation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are they not covered by the workmen's compensation laws of the provinces?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Deplorable as the accident would be, their survivors would receive 100 per cent compensation.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The pension is just as deplorable.

Mr. MacNICOL: A hundred per cent pension would be comparable with the annual salary of the scientist. I have had a lot to do with compensation matters. In the days when I was in business a machinist would be paid perhaps $6 or $7 a day. In the event of his being killed in the plant his wife would be compensated with an amount equivalent to that.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Oh, no.

Mr. MacNICOL: She would get a 100 per cent pension.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not 100 per cent of his wages.

Mr. MacNICOL: She would get a substantial pension and all other expenses would be taken care of. Everyone deplores the death of a workman, especially those who employ him and know his value. The only means we have to-day of taking care of accidents of that kind is the workmen's compensation act.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to ask a couple of questions with reference to the powers given to the board under section 8 (a) to undertake research. Am I right in understanding that the actual research will be carried on through the instrumentality of the national research council or by a body set up by the board itself? Would the minister indicate if patents have already been issued with reference to any of the processes involved in the production of atomic energy and, if so, whether they are issued in the name of His Majesty or otherwise?

Mr. HOWE: The work is being undertaken both directly by the board and indirectly. At Chalk River there are extensive laboratories which are now operated by the research council but which will probably be operated by the board. In addition, every university in the country is doing certain work in the atomic energy field, some of which is financed by the board in whole or in part.

Mr. FLEMING: My second question was with respect to patents.

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say whether patents have been taken out or not. They will be taken out if patentable discoveries are made.

Mr. FLEMING: Will such patents be taken out in the name of the board or in the name of His Majesty if there are developments in the field of atomic energy? I ask that question in view of what the minister has just said about the work being carried on under the direction of the board instead of the council.

Mr. HOWE: Section 13 provides:

> All discoveries, inventions and improvements in materials, methods, processes, apparatus or machines, made by a member or any number of members of the technical staff of the board or of a company shall be vested in His Majesty.

In other words, they become the property of His Majesty. I am told that certain applications for patents have been made arising out of the work of the Montreal laboratory.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Would the minister give a little more information with respect to paragraph (i), which provides that the board may grant:

> . . . scholarships and grants in aid for research and investigations with respect to atomic energy, or for the education or training of persons to qualify them to engage in such research and investigations.

Would the minister inform us what plans he has in mind to implement this provision?

Mr. HOWE: It has been the custom of the research council ever since its inception to offer scholarships in universities for students to pursue certain lines of research. The board would have similar authority to set up scholarships to encourage young science students to pursue certain lines of investigation in the universities.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Will that be done soon?

Mr. HOWE: It is being done now.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is the same objection to section 8 that we made to the bill dealing with the control of patents. Section 8 (h) provides that the board may:

> . . . with the approval of the governor in council license or otherwise make available or sell or otherwise dispose of discoveries, inventions and improvements in processes, apparatus or machines, patent rights and letters patent of Canada or foreign countries acquired under this this act and collect royalties and fees thereon and payments therefor.

I realize that the safeguard in that clause is "with the approval of the governor in council". I presume that the public interest would be carefully studied by the governor in council before the sale was made, but it seems to me that at this stage there should be some limitation on the sale. I would quite agree that we might sell to any one of the united nations a patent that had been developed in our own organization, but I do not think it is wise to contemplate the sale of important patents for the exclusive use of an organization within Canada. My view is that we should not sell but license the use of these patents. I am not suggesting for one moment that under circumstances which now exist in relation to industry we should not make available to industry discoveries that are important in our economic life to improve it. What I am suggesting is that any discovery of that sort should be made available to anybody in Canada who would use it in the public interest. We should not sell it to a particular group which might give them in this particular field such an advantage over anybody else as to upset our economy. I realize that the safeguard is "with the approval of the governor in council", but I should like to see the sale limited to other members of the united nations. We advanced that point the other evening in connection with the control of patents, and I think it is even more important in this case. I quite agree that we should license or make available, but we should not sell the exclusive right to a patent within Canada itself. That is the point I am making.

Mr. HOWE: It is always dangerous to set up prohibitions unless they are necessary. In this case the recommendation would come from the board, which itself is charged with the responsibility of safeguarding the public in matters relating to atomic energy. Then the board has to recommend it to the committee, and more than that that it must be recommended by the committee to the full cabinet. So that you have your safeguards there.

Mr. COLDWELL: It depends on the cabinet, of course.

Mr. HOWE: It depends on the board, plus the committee, plus the cabinet.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: My argument is that the safeguards are ample without setting up a prohibition. We have also the fact that over the years no patent has been sold in Canada by the research council.

Mr. GREEN: There are two points I would bring to the attention of the minister. The first is this. What about a patent taken out by a private individual or private firm? I see no power given under this bill to the atomic energy control board to take over such patents. I think there is that power in the United Kingdom bill. In the United States a private firm cannot take out a patent on anything having to do with the development of atomic energy.

My second question has to do with the right to inspect. In the United Kingdom bill, in sections 4 and 5, power is given to obtain information on materials, plant and processes, and power of entry and inspection is also given to the minister of supply. I do not think any such power is contained in this bill. It seems to me it might be helpful to the atomic energy control board to have that power.

Mr. HOWE: Paragraph (c) is very broad. It reads:

The board may,—

(c) with the approval of the governor in council acquire or cause to be acquired by purchase, lease, requisition or expropriation, prescribed substances and any mines, deposits or claims of prescribed substances and any works or property for production or preparation for production of, or for research or investigation with respect to, atomic energy.

Mr. GREEN: That does not deal with patent rights. It refers to works or property. There is no word there covering the taking over of private patent rights.

Mr. HOWE: A patent right is surely property.

Mr. GREEN: No. I submit that the minister's legal advisers have not given him the proper interpretation of that clause. If the intention is to have the power to take over private patents having to do with the development of atomic energy, I suggest that that power be written into the bill specifically. I do not think anyone can contend successfully that these words "works or property for production or preparation for production of, or for research or investigation with respect to, atomic energy" would entitle the board to take over any patent rights.

Mr. HOWE: I think it is far-fetched to believe that there would be private investigation, entirely independent of the board, which would lead to patent rights which the crown would wish to take over. There is sufficient latitude so that a man would have material to work with on his own without restrictions from the board, and he would be quite entitled to keep his patents. I do not think we would want to say at this time that the crown would own every patent relating to atomic energy.

Mr. GREEN: But suppose the board wanted to take over certain patent rights. How could they do it?

Mr. HOWE: I think paragraph (e) of section 9 would cover that: "for the purpose of keeping secret information respecting the production, use and application of, and research and investigation with respect to, atomic energy, as in the opinion of the board, the public interest may require." In other words, they could stop publication of a patent.

Mr. GREEN: That is under the next section, which provides for regulations, and that particular provision deals only with keeping information secret. But that still does not give the board the right to take over patent rights. I am trying to help the minister and I suggest that he give further consideration to having a section added. It certainly is not clear under either of the clauses that he has read that the board will have the power to take over patent rights. The Americans have gone so far as not to allow any person to obtain a patent having to do with the development of atomic energy.

Mr. COLDWELL: Where it is not clear it should be clarified.

Mr. HOWE: My officers advise me that the question of acquiring patents was considered and it was felt that to put a prohibition for all time on the acquisition of patents resulting from research carried on privately would be to discourage that type of research unnecessarily. It is felt that paragraph (e), which provides for secrecy, would be sufficient. Presumably no patents would be issued without the approval of the board in the light of the secrecy provision as long as that was necessary. We all hope that the necessity for secrecy and for the control of patents will have a time limit. We trust that in ten years' time everyone will have all the scope he requires in the field of atomic energy.

Mr. GREEN: I was not suggesting a prohibition. What I am suggesting is that the control board should be given the power to acquire private patents if it wishes to take them over.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the objection to the hon. member's suggestion?

Mr. HOWE: I do not think there is any objection to it.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would not weaken but would rather strengthen the provision.

Mr. HOWE: I will ask my officers to see where that proviso can best be inserted in the bill. The reason it was not included originally was that it was thought it might discourage private invention which might be entirely independent of the board. There would be no objection to putting it in if it were regarded as desirable.

Mr. GREEN: What about the power to inspect? The minister has said nothing in reply to my question.

Mr. HOWE: That is covered by the broad powers with respect to property as set out in paragraph (c): "Works or property for production or preparation for production of, or for research or investigation with respect to, atomic energy".

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I would again call the attention of the committee to a section which has already been referred to by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, namely that, with the approval of the governor in council, the board may license or otherwise make available, "or sell or otherwise dispose of discoveries, inventions, processes, apparatus or machines." I wish to say in the strongest terms possible that I am in disagreement with the words "or sell". This is of such importance, and situations may arise in such a way that if that portion of the clause were left in with the words "or sell", the country might be prejudiced. I suggest that they might very well be left out. I consider that the exclusive right which would be given to any company under the words "or sell" would be too great. Therefore I recommend that those words be struck out, because the other portion of the clause would give power to make available to companies the information which scientists might impart to us. I respectfully submit this to the committee.

Mr. HOWE: That subject has been discussed at some length and we have already pointed out the safeguards. Although the power to sell has always been present in the Research Council Act, no licence has been sold for use in Canada. It is difficult to know what may develop. There may be an exchange of patents with another country. We might sell patent rights to a country and purchase in return certain other patent rights. In my opinion the provision to sell should be retained. It has been put in the bill for a purpose, and the safeguards are adequate to ensure that the power to sell is not misused.

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I hate to repeat, but once such rights or information were sold to any company, it would be difficult to rescind these privileges. I submit that the people's government should have the right to control such inventions and patent rights, and I insist therefore that the words in clause 8 to which I have referred should be deleted.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Regulations.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is provided that "with the approval of the governor in council the board may make regulations governing co-operation and the maintenance of contact, through international organizations or otherwise, with scientists in other countries or with other countries, with respect to the production, use, application and control of, and research and investigations with respect to atomic energy." The only question I have to raise there is whether or not it is good policy to give powers to this board to deal with what seems to be governments of other countries. It may be that the minister will not assent to that interpretation of this particular paragraph. But if there are to be dealings with other governments, then this government is the only agency through which this country should deal with other countries on the government level. Would the minister clarify this paragraph for us, because it is not too clear as it stands?

Mr. HOWE: There might be an arrangement between governments covering atomic energy, possibly arising out of the atomic energy commission of the united nations. The bill simply specifies that this body is the body which would issue rules which would carry into effect in Canada such regulations as might be agreed upon with other governments either through the united nations organization or by direct treaty between these governments. I cannot read into the paragraph the implication that this board would deal with boards of other countries. That is not the intention and I think it is not indicated by the wording of the paragraph.

Mr. GRAYDON: In other words, the minister assures us that there will be no interference with the dealing which normally takes place on the government level between the governments or various boards involved.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Most of the subparagraphs indicate that these regulations are made for encouraging and facilitating research and so on, but paragraph (b) refers to developing. Does that mean that the board will proceed to the actual work of developing?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It gives the board that power to develop.

Mr. KNOWLES: To make regulations.

Mr. HOWE: Developing the use of atomic energy. I think that is a reasonable interpretation. It is to make regulations; that is right. The board may make regulations.

Mr. STIRLING: It does not necessarily envisage the board actually doing the work?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister another question arising out of the previous one. As a country we are one of the twelve nations comprising the atomic energy commission in the international field. Some weeks ago an announcement was made that General McNaughton would be Canada's representative on the atomic energy commission. To whom would General McNaughton be responsible? Under what ministry would General McNaughton find his jurisdiction? To what department would his responsibility be attached?

Mr. HOWE: External Affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: He will report to External Affairs in each instance. Will the board which is now being set up have any direct liaison with the atomic energy commission other than through the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. HOWE: I mentioned here that it is the intention to have Canada's representative on the atomic energy commission a member of the board, but it is the duty of External Affairs to pass on communications of the type which would come from our representative on the atomic energy board, to the interested departments. In other words, if there is any agency of government which requires to be advised of work of that kind, that department would be so advised.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Board may procure incorporation of companies.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the minister, if he thinks it desirable to do so, give the committee some idea of the number of companies that he has in mind setting up? The sentence reads: "One or more." If more than one, the number; for that matter, would he tell the committee what companies may be set up?

Mr. HOWE: I have in mind only two possibilities, and they are only possibilities. One is that it might be decided to put Eldorado, which is an existing crown company, under this board, and it might be decided to operate the actual industry at Chalk River as a crown company under the board. I can think of no other possible crown company.

Mr. MacNICOL: There was another question I intended to ask, but it was answered by the previous bill. It had to do with whether or not the government intended to set up these companies under a separate bill, by statute.

Mr. HOWE: It was provided not by statute but by an order in council. The previous bill required an order in council.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister is going to follow the same procedure in this case?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

May we revert to section 8, Mr. Chairman? I ask my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, to move that paragraph (c) of section 8 be amended by inserting after the word "substances" in line 4 of paragraph (c) the words "and patent rights relating to atomic energy."

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STIRLING: With regard to section 10, I want to record once more our strong objection to such power being in the hands of the board with the approval of the governor in council. In the other bill our arguments thereon were presented, and they did not receive the support of the committee; but I should not like this to pass without our objection being again recorded. Our opinion is that if such a crown company is set up it should be set up by a charter which it receives from parliament.

Mr. SKEY: I should like to ask a question on section 10. My question arises out of newspaper reports that the Manhattan project and the atomic energy plant in the United States are about to be unionized, or that the C.I.O. and the A.F. of L. have gone in with the purpose of organizing the employees in these projects. Where in Canada's atomic energy projects do the civil service leave off and the companies, projects or corporations, which can be subject to unionization, commence?

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing to bar any government activity from being unionized if the employees wish to join a union. To-day all crown companies are unionized.

Mr. MacNICOL: As a rule it does not hurt a company to be unionized. In my experience I have found that good unions have done splendid work as far as the operation of companies is concerned. A union properly operated and conducted in harmony with the management of a company can do great good. I have found that such unions set as their objective the keeping of the company in operation, if at all possible, and the workers employed. If they give co-operation to the company their working conditions are bound to be better than they otherwise would be, and their protection more assured. In my experience I have found that good unions have done a great deal along those two lines, keeping plants in operations and providing greater safety and security for those employed therein.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was interested in the minister's statement with respect to employees of government corporations having the right to unionize. Does that apply to every corporation set up by the government that employs help of various descriptions?

Mr. HOWE: I can think of no exceptions.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps I might ask the minister a question which I have asked on one or two previous occasions, to which I have not obtained a clear answer. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for instance, is a corporation set up by the government. Have its employees the right to unionize, or have they not? At one time they had not; I think the government would not permit them to form a union. I am not informed as to the latest developments, but it would seem strange if the employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation should not have the right to unionize, while the employees of these crown companies were treated in a different way. I should be glad to have that point clarified by the minister.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that my hon. friend will have to ask a minister who has some knowledge of the situation. I would remind him that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is not a board under a minister. It is an autonomous board, reporting to parliament through a minister. I have not been in touch with the affairs of the corporation for many years; therefore I could not answer the question.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the employees of these companies, which as the minister says are perhaps closer to the crown than the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, have that right, it would seem only natural that employees of the broadcasting company also should have the right to unionize. Perhaps that is the case. For my own part I should like to see them all have that right, and I am wondering if the minister can give us any information along that line.

Mr. HOWE: I have no information.

Mr. GRAYDON: When I asked the question of the appropriate minister his reply was that he had never heard that they had asked for it. That was not exactly the answer I expected, but no doubt it was a convenient one for him.

Mr. HOWE: The officials of the corporation are now before a committee of parliament, and I am sure if the hon. member asks that question in the committee he will get a full explanation from those competent to give it. I really do not know the answer.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I appreciate the minister's attitude in the matter. It may be that he has no information, and I appreciate his frankness in admitting it.

Mr. SKEY: When I brought up the question of unions I had in mind the immense benefits that the unionization of Research Enterprises had brought that company. They had a union there which was under the ablest and best of leadership. They achieved cuts in the cost of production, and contributed to improvement in the efficiency of many operations. I also had in mind the thought of secrecy concerning atomic projects, and whether under those conditions the minister will allow his atomic energy projects to be unionized.

Mr. HOWE: I do not think the secrecy would have anything to do with unionization. The secrecy might interfere with the physical means of organizing. I mean we could not permit people to enter the Chalk River project just for the purpose of unionization; but if a union grew up within the organization there would be no objection to it, and I see no breach of the secrecy regulations arising in that connection. The secrecy regulations are paramount. If within those regulations it is the desire of the employees to unionize there would be no objection to it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the hon. member has said either too much or too little. Am I to gather from what he has said that workers who are members of a union are less trustworthy than workers who are not?

Mr. SKEY: Not at all, if I may at once correct the hon. member I did not mean to imply that. I meant to imply that the secrecy relating to the project might make it difficult for a union to have contact with the employees.

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot see how that would enter into it. As long as the employees are allowed to organize there can be no question of that difficulty arising. As I understand the situation, scientific workers are organized in their professional groups, for their own benefit and protection, in the same way that trade unions are organized for the protection of other classes of workers. I think the hon. member has made the point quite clear, and it would not be a good thing for that impression to go out. My understanding at the moment is that an order in council was passed in 1943 making it possible for crown companies to enter into and sign working agreements with trade unions. Whether or not there is an agreement with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would not be a matter of prohibition, but it might be because of the attitude of the company. However, I do not know the situation there.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to ask a question or two regarding the directors of the companies which might be set up under the board. Section 10 states:

The board may with the approval of the governor in council:—
(a) procure the incorporation of any one or more companies . . .

Then I notice in the last two lines of paragraph (a):

. . . of section eight of this act as the board may from time to time direct and all the issued shares of the capital stock of each such company shall be owned or held in trust by the board for His Majesty in right of Canada except shares necessary to qualify other persons as directors . . .

I am wondering about those directors. How many directors would be involved in one of these companies, and how many shares would it be necessary for a director to hold in order to qualify as such?

Mr. HOWE: The Companies Act provides that each director of a public company shall own one share of the stock. The ownership of the stock of a crown company is more or less a legal fiction. The share is made out in the name of the director and is endorsed for retransfer by the director and returned to the custody of the crown. It has been the custom to obtain the resignation of a director at the same time his appointment is made. In other words, that is held in trust as well, so that the crown is amply safeguarded as far as the actual ownership of the property is concerned.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It means in effect, then, that all shares will be in possession of the board?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, in effect, though I am told by the Secretary of State that is illegal. Nevertheless it has been the practice in crown companies. The share is actually registered in the name of the director, but the director has already endorsed the certificate for transfer. The certificate is in the possession of His Majesty and can be transferred at the will of His Majesty.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: To come back to this question of unionization, a short time ago the minister said that employees at the Chalk River plant are free to unionize if they wish. Is this privilege extended to all employees working there, or is there a restriction on scientific workers, engineers, or any other types of workers in that project.

Mr. HOWE: I have no knowledge of any restrictions against the unionizing of any group of people in the government service, in any capacity.

Mr. MacNICOL: Perhaps I might add a word here, in reference to the observations made a few minutes ago by the hon. members for Trinity and Vancouver East. I am not criticizing the remarks of either of them, but what they said impels me to refer to the experiences I have had in which the loyalty of workmen has been clear to me. I am sure your experience, Mr. Chairman, has been the same as mine. If companies trust their workmen or officers as they should, they will receive loyalty from those workmen and officers. No class in our community is more loyal; that has been my experience. That loyalty is best shown when secrets are given under their care; and it is well known that many big companies have important secrets, of which their workmen have knowledge. My experience was that workmen were absolutely loyal; in fact I cannot think of one instance of disloyalty. I suggest, therefore, that we need not fear that the secrets of our country will be betrayed by Canadian workmen.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Pension fund.

Mr. GRAYDON: Are these employees to be hired or employed by the civil service commission, by the governor in council, or partly in one way and partly another.

Mr. HOWE: Entirely by the governor in council.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the same system be followed as was described by the minister in respect of the crown companies bills, namely that there would be a sort of super civil service?

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend is putting words into my mouth. I wish he would not do that, because I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not know whether I am putting words into the minister's mouth; but whether he used those words or not, he certainly in his description of the system implied that it was to be a super civil service.

Mr. HOWE: That may have been my hon. friend's inference; but I wish he would keep it for himself, and not give it to me.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have no objection to accepting the words, if the minister wishes to give them up. In any event, does the minister not think that, as in respect of the crown companies, he is in this instance driving a coach and four through the Civil Service Act?

I believe he will find that this situation will give rise to considerable difficulty, so far as the whole civil service set-up is concerned. I have no desire to be critical without being constructive; but as we find more crown companies being set up, and the government going into business from time to time, one wonders what the attitude and reaction of the ordinary civil servant employed by the government in ordinary government enterprise will be. We now have the civil service commission, which has set up certain standards of salaries and promotions. At the same time the government is setting up companies, and in doing so abandons the civil service scale and establishes a different structure altogether. I believe this situation will lead to grave difficulties. In the light of the necessity which the minister no doubt feels in this connection, where higher salaries are to be paid, I suggest that the government should give consideration to a complete review of the whole position of the civil service in Canada. We should have nothing short of a complete overhaul and review of the general picture in respect of the new companies together with normal civil service requirements. I do not believe we can have operating in this country successfully and concurrently two civil service standards, one set much higher than the other. It seems to me that some day one will run counter to the other, to the detriment of one or the other, or both.

I do not wish to be unduly critical of the present set-up, but I am wondering why we have to leave the scale of the present civil service at what would appear to be substantially lower levels of returns than are offered in these crown companies. It would appear that we are creating a superstructure which in the end will lead to trouble for the government, or for any government which may succeed it. I would ask the minister to consider finding some way by which the two systems may work together concurrently, without effecting discrimination to the extent which I believe will develop within a reasonable time.

Mr. HOWE: The national research council has operated along these lines since 1923. As a matter of common sense, the salary scales in the two are kept comparable. In other words, the national research council consults with the civil service commission in respect of what it shall pay stenographers; and those stenographers are graded in the same way. Appointment by gvernor in council means appointment by treasury board. Naturally treasury board keeps a careful watch on salaries, to see that they do not get out of line. My hon. friend suggests that people in corporations are much better off than those in the civil service. It seems to me, however, that there has been much more said in the debate about low salaries paid to scientists appointed by the national research council than there has been about the great benefits accruing to employees of corporations with the national research council rather than with the civil service. The hon. member may rest assured that the matter is being watched carefully.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Application of R.S., c. 30.

Mr. MacNICOL: What would be the compensation of these government employees in the event of death, as was discussed a short time ago?

Mr. HOWE: The Government Employees Compensation Act means the workmen's compensation act of the province affected. Payments into the compensation fund are made by the government.

Mr. MacNICOL: The compensation act of Ontario would apply in that province, that of Manitoba in Manitoba, and that of Quebec in Quebec?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Claim for compensation may be referred to exchequer court.

Mr. HAZEN: This section provides that in the event an agreement cannot be reached as to the amount of compensation to be paid, the claim for compensation shall be referred by the Minister of Justice to the exchequer court. No time limit is set within which the Minister of Justice shall refer the matter. I do not know if other acts contain a section similar to this; but it seems to me that it would be well to have a provision whereby the Minister of Justice would be obliged to refer the matter to the courts within a reasonable time.

Mr. HOWE: I think it should be assumed that the Minister of Justice will act in a reasonable way. I do not think we need to pass laws in this parliament to regulate the methods of the Minister of Justice in carrying out the duties of his office.

Mr. HAZEN: Are there similar sections in any other acts?

Mr. HOWE: In the War Measures Act and, I think, in other acts as well.

Mr. HAZEN: Is the wording practically the same?

Mr. HOWE: Always the same.

Mr. FLEMING: Following up that question, in what form is the reference made? In what particular form do the proceedings commence in the exchequer court?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The usual procedure is to have an information in the name of the Attorney General of Canada filed in the exchequer court setting out the facts and praying the court to award such remedy as may be appropriate in the premises.

Mr. FLEMING: Then pleadings are delivered?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: Could an owner under this clause bring the matter to the attention of the court, or must the initiative be taken by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The owner could always submit a petition of right but that, like the other action which may be taken, would be subject to the recommendation of the Minister of Justice. There have been cases under the Expropriation Act where a plan has been filed and, as a consequence, expropriation has taken place. Sometimes there have been regrettable delays in filing an information to get court action. In such circumstances an owner has submitted a petition of right and, if there appeared to be unjustifiable delay, there has been a recommendation that a fiat issue.

Mr. FLEMING: Take the converse case. Suppose there has been a delay. There is no provision in this bill that the provisions of the Expropriation Act will apply. I am thinking about periods of limitation. Within what time must a claim arising out of expropriation or requisition be lodged before it becomes barred?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not sure just what the hon. gentleman is fearful about. In the administration of the department I have tried to act as I would have hoped the department would act if I were still practising at the bar. I found at times that there were regrettable delays. For instance, a petition would come in and a report would be requested from the department concerned. Then the matter appeared to be pigeon-holed until the report came in, and sometimes that took a very long time. I made it a rule that in an application to a department for information they should be told that if we did not get it within thirty days we would assume that they had no special objection to bring to our attention and we would proceed without waiting any further to hear from them. I think the same procedure would be followed in a case of this kind. As soon as the Department of Justice is advised that action on its part is required, I feel confident that anyone having the responsibility for the administration of the office will endeavour to see that it is done in the way he would want it done if he were on the other side.

On section 16—Expenses.

Mr. MacNICOL: This section reads:

> All expenses under this act shall be paid out of moneys appropriated by parliament for the purpose or received by the board or a company through the conduct of its operations, bequest, donation or otherwise.

Should not something be added after the word "company" so that it would read, "company set up by and under the control of the board"?

Mr. HOWE: That is covered by section 2(e).

Mr. STIRLING: Does this imply that each year there will be a vote in the estimates for the atomic energy control board, provided, of course, that its other revenues are insufficient for its purposes?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Sections 17 and 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Oath of fidelity and secrecy.

Mr. KNOWLES: I notice that both subsections refer to the schedule which is to be found on page 8 of the bill. I am wondering whether the phrase "affairs of the board" in the oath of secrecy is broad enough to include everything one might think of. That phrase "affairs of the board" might not be understood by a party taking the oath to include more than business affairs of the board. What about technical and scientific secrets? The second thing about which I am concerned is the atomic energy secrets that become the possession of an individual working under the present set-up at Chalk River and who may in due course return to full-time employment with the private company from which he may be on loan. Would this oath of secrecy have a bearing on those?

Mr. HOWE: This refers to information relating to the affairs of the board. If a man has learned a lot about atomic energy in a university or in books which he has read that is his affair, but if he indicates particulars of the work the board is doing he would be violating his oath.

Mr. KNOWLES: "Affairs" does not mean just business affairs but technical and scientific information as well?

Mr. CASE: This oath would apply only while he was employed by the board. Should he leave the board and seek other employment there would be no importance to the oath.

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure about that. No; it is not limited in time. If he disclosed the affairs of the board, whether employed by the board or not, it would be a violation of the oath.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Is it not possible that a scientist working with the board might learn a certain process, perhaps not overly important from the defence point of view, and then leave the board to take up employment with some private corporation. Then, in the course of his work with that corporation he might unwittingly divulge what he had learned with the board. How could you guard against that?

Mr. HOWE: I think he would have to prove that he had done it unwittingly. I believe there will be very little danger of that because it does not relate so much to processes as it does to the affairs of the board.

On section 20—Offences and penalties.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This section reads:

> Any person who contravenes or fails to observe the provisions of this act or of any regulation made under the authority of this act shall be guilty of an offence . . .

That opens the door to a wide variety of offences and punishments. I wonder by whom these regulations are to be made and what opportunity parliament or a parliamentary committee will have to review the regulations. We are conferring on whoever is to administer the act tremendous powers. I can understand why there should be prosecution and punishment under section 20 for any infringement of any clause of the bill which parliament has scrutinized and passed, but to make the same punishments apply possibly to any regulation passed under the act, with such regulations not being subject to the scrutiny of parliament or any parliamentary committee, seems to me to be going very far. Would the minister comment on that?

Mr. HOWE: May I refer my hon. friend to section 9(2) which provides:

> Regulations under this section shall forthwith be published in the Canada Gazette and laid before parilament within fifteen days after they are made if parliament is then sitting, and, if not, then within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: That clears the point up.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Will the regulations be in effect before parliament has had an opportunity to scrutinize and approve them? They are to be submitted to parliament, if not then sitting, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next session. Would it not be a safeguard to provide that the regulations will not come into effect until parliament has approved them?

Mr. HOWE: No. After the regulation is made with the approval of the governor in council it is in effect. The statute provides that it must be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette, and laid before parliament at the first opportunity. But the regulation is in effect as soon as it is sanctioned by the governor in council.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That confers wide discretionary powers on whoever is administering the act, but I presume it must be necessary.

Another question. The section also says:

> . . . at the election of the Attorney General of Canada or of the province in which the offence is alleged to have taken place, be prosecuted upon indictment, and if convicted shall be liable to a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

Would the minister explain, so that we can understand, what sort of set of circumstances would impell the attorney general to cause a man to be tried upon indictment and possibly punished with a fine of $10,000. The fine is double that provided in the preceding paragraph.

Mr. HOWE: The seriousness of the offence would be the reason. The attorney general of any province would not be moved to prosecute a man for trivial cause. The offence must be in keeping with the size of the penalty, and the penalties prescribed are maximum penalties.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What was passing through my mind was the very possibility that was implied by the hon. member for Bow River. Suppose these regulations are made and published in the Canada Gazette and that before parliament has had a chance to review them, someone offends against one of the regulations. A severe punishment may be inflicted on the offender before parliament has had a chance to approve or review the regulations. If that is quite in order, I suppose there is nothing further to say, but it seems to me to be drastic.

On section 21—Annual report.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to say a word, although I know it will have no effect now. It is a suggestion for the future. I have long asked myself if it would not be possible for Canada and its crown corporations to have their fiscal year end as the financial years of the majority of companies do on December 31 instead of March 31. We may not receive the annual report of the board until June 30. The house will then be in session and the report cannot be dealt with until the year after that. That is one reason why we cannot keep close check on what business the government does through these companies. I throw out the suggestion to each and every member that we start considering bringing the fiscal year to an end on December 31. I know that for a few years it would not fit in with the reports for previous years, but after a few years it would be 100 per cent better than the present system.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I find myself in sympathy with that suggestion. I see no reason why the crown companies cannot end their financial year on December 31, even though the fiscal year of the government ends on March 31. As has been pointed out, the financial year of the board ends on March 31. Although it has to submit an annual report to the committee within three months after March 31, parliament will not get the report for some time after that and we cannot discuss it in the same year. If the financial year of these crown corporations were made to end on December 31 we would have a reasonable chance during the next year to discuss its transactions. I strongly support the suggestion that the financial year end on December 31.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

National health branch—

212. Civil service health division (including medical investigation division), $180,078.

Mr. FLEMING: Under this item, the services for which the minister intends to provide, as outlined by him at page 3608 of Hansard of the previous session, are covered by a six-point programme. The minister referred to the fact that in May, 1945, he was authorized by the government to announce a programme involving an expenditure of $328,000 for the first year to provide a number of health services for civil servants. The six-point programme mentioned by the minister was to cover: (1) Examination before entrance into the civil service, including X-ray for tuberculosis; (2) periodical examinations; (3) emergency service; (4) educational facilities; (5) advice; and (6) the establishment of sanitary standards. The item approved at the previous session called for an expenditure of $145,750. I do not recall whether there was a supplementary estimate in connection with the item, but the item now before us involves $180,078, and we are shown the same figure as having been appropriated in the preceding year.

Will the minister indicate the relationship of the item shown here to that appearing on the page in Hansard to which I have referred, and also the development of the programme as outlined by him at that time, and the relationship of the item to the expenditure of $328,000 for the first full year of service which he indicated was then intended?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): When the civil service health programme was approved by the governor in council in May, 1945, as the hon. member said, and as I mentioned last week, the estimated cost of providing full service for one year was, as I intimated, $328,000. It was not found possible to inaugurate the programme in full and it is not yet in operation in several important respects. Our inability to put it into effect has been due to shortage of doctors and dentists, shortage of nurses and shortage of space. These shortages are being gradually overcome and the programme is now being carried more fully into effect. I described it last session, and I do not propose to take the time of the committee to-night in going over again the objects of the programme in detail.

Generally speaking, it aimed at giving a health service comparable, if not superior to that generally in force among the employees of leading employers. We had in mind the services provided by the Canadian National Railways, the Bell Telephone company, the Metropolitan Life Insurance company and other large employers who had instituted services of this kind and who, we were informed —investigation proved this to be the case— had found that these services not only improved the health of the employees but also improved employer-employee relationships. It was demonstrated in other cases that the cost of the service was more than met out of the savings in illness, premature retirement, sick leave and the like.

As hon. members no doubt know, there has been a serious shortage of doctors in Canada, since so many were engaged in war services, and every public health service and every community are consequently suffering from the shortage. The same is true of this department; and it has not been possible for that reason, as well as because of the shortage of space, to implement the programme more fully. I may tell the committee, however, that there already was a health service provided for civil servants in Ottawa under which X-rays were taken; and a very large proportion of the civil servants in this city were examined in the year 1943-44. In consequence of that, a number of cases of active tuberculosis were discovered; a number of persons were hospitalized, and the results obtained have more than justified expenditures.

In addition, at that time—the same is true to-day—civil servants on becoming permanent were required to be examined; and also, in connection with retirement and sick leave, examinations were undertaken by the medical investigation division of the department. That division really laid the foundations for the more ample service that we are now giving. The service, we hope, will be centred in the offices in the Jackson building where the department's headquarters are now situated.

We hope there will be health units in a number of office buildings in different sections of the city where there are large numbers of civil servants, and there will be preliminary examinations on entrance and regular laboratory tests, medical advice and emergency service. There will also be a programme of health education which will be an important feature of this service. Altogether it is expected that with the return and discharge of members of the armed forces who are in medical, nursing and dental professions, it will be possible to bring this rapidly into effect by stages in the different buildings in which we hope to establish units.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has not dealt with one or two of the points that I raised. I notice that last year the amount voted for this item was $145,750, but it appears on page 27 of the estimates as $180,078. Is that a mistake, or was there a supplementary appropriation last year? That is the first question. In the second place, I should be obliged if the minister would indicate the exact expenditure, if he has it, under this heading during the past year so that we may have some reference to the actual expenditure in considering the proposed appropriation.

Mr. CLAXTON: During the year 1945-46, the expenditure was $31,590.01. The difference in the two items mentioned by the hon. member is not due to a supplementary. The item is $180,078 in the estimates under item 212 for both the years 1946-47 and 1945-46.

Mr. FLEMING: There must be a mistake in the year 1945-46, because the item voted on December 15 last was $145,750. If there was not a supplementary it must be a mistake in the book of estimates.

Mr. CLAXTON: This represents a consolidation of two items. The previous division which carried on this service was, as I mentioned, the medical investigation division. If my hon. friend will look at the estimates for 1945-46 he will see an item for the medical investigation division which, taken with the item for the civil service health division, makes up the total of $180,078 which he mentioned. There has been a consolidation of two divisions.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister add a little more to the statement he made a little while ago that before becoming permanent a civil servant had to undergo a medical examination? If the medical examination discloses that the civil servant has an impairment of health, what is his status? Would he or she receive a permanent position, or what would be the result following the examination?

Mr. CLAXTON: The purpose of the examination first of all was to show if the person was fit to do the work, and if he or she were found to be unfit then the employee would not become permanent. In the translation from the status of temporary to permanent the civil servant would be dealt with as if he or she were sick at that time. Its purpose also was to discover what defects the applicant for the civil service might be suffering from so as to advise him or her of any treatment that should be undergone.

Mr. MacINNIS: The impaired condition of health would not result in the civil servant losing his employment?

Mr. CLAXTON: My understanding is that it would not necessarily, but he would not become permanent and entitled to superannuation.

Mr. BLAIR: I notice that there is a travelling expense bill of $4,500. The greater part of the work is done here in the city, is it not?

Mr. CLAXTON: It is intended that this work will cover all Canada. The places where we shall have our own units will be Ottawa and the other places where we already have units of the Department of National Health and Welfare. In other parts of Canada the work will be carried on by part-time doctors if there are no federal government doctors to do the work. That will require a certain amount of travelling in order to coordinate the work, check records, give advice and so on.

Mr. McLURE: I notice that there is quite an item for publicity and advertising; as a matter of fact, $68,000. What is the total amount of publicity and advertising in the Department of National Health and Welfare? There is a big increase over what it was last year. Even if we leave out the film board it is a couple of hundred thousand dollars extra. What will be the total amount?

Mr. CLAXTON: That was gone into when item 200, departmental administration, was under discussion. Under this item the amount for publicity is $18,000. Particulars were given of the expenditure last year which totalled only $230. It is intended, as part of this civil service health service, to carry on an educational campaign. The item of $18,000 would be intended to cover short films dealing with health, a film strip, film distribution, booklets, leaflets and posters.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
213. Nutrition service, $142,992.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is an item in which the amount asked for this year is $6,000 less than what was asked for last year. If I may say so, I am sorry to note that reduction because it seems to me that it might turn out that there is nothing more important in the field of national health than nutrition. I notice in the details given on page 164 of the main estimates that, although there may be some explanation which the minister can give for it, the top person listed in this division is a grade 2 stenographer. That is hardly good enough for nutrition. Perhaps in the temporary assistants' item there may be amounts for the employment of people of a little higher grade. But I want to impress upon the minister my feeling—and I think it is shared by a good many—that this is a field in which research ought to be done, and in which all possible information should be got out amongst our people.

The idea that care of our health consists not only in curative and corrective measures but also in preventive efforts is now pretty well established. When we stop to think of it I believe we all recognize that if we are to encourage preventive attempts to improve our national health, probably this is the place where we shall have to do some real work, namely in connection with the whole question of nutrition and diet. I think it must be admitted that even though there is the will to eat according to the best ideas of the correct diet we do not yet know what is the best diet for the human body. I was interested in a press dispatch which appeared in the newspapers earlier to-day, to which reference was made this afternoon, about developments in connection with atomic energy. In that dispatch it was suggested that very soon it would be possible, because of the research being done in atomic energy, to learn more about the chemistry of the human body, what it does with medicines that are given to it and what it does with food, so that possibly we may be on the threshold of new discoveries and greater knowledge about the effect on our national health of nutrition, diet and the foods we eat from infancy throughout the whole of life. Therefore I would urge most strongly that in this field the minister not pay too much attention to those who are trying to pinch pennies here and there. I urge that he fight within the cabinet and treasury board for all the money he can get for this kind of work.

While I am referring to the importance of nutrition as far as research, knowledge, publicity and information are concerned, I hope there will be no request for this item to be cut down, because I want to see it extended. But I think one must also tell the minister again what has been said to him a number of times on this subject, that it is not enough just to find out what is the proper diet, to give publicity and information in regard thereto, and to ask the people to eat the best foods, if at the same time the government takes off the subsidy so that the price of milk goes up, fails to give old age pensioners adequate allowances, and so on. I suggest that it is part of the minister's job, as guardian of the national health, to fight for measures on the part of the government to which he belongs which will make it possible for people to get the foods which, nutritionally, are best for them. This is really something pretty basic, pretty fundamental to the health of our people. Not only is that so with respect to the generation now living in Canada, but it is also possible that if we really put some effort and research and money into this subject we may receive the thanks of two or three generations ahead, if by having done so we find ways and means of so feeding ourselves that we become a healthier and happier race of people.

My tune, as the minister recognizes, is a little different from that which he hears from some hon. members with respect to these estimates. I regret that there has been a reduction this year in this item, and I should be glad to hear what plans the department has in the field of nutrition service.

Mr. CLAXTON: I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the importance of this subject. The reduction in the estimates—which is not very great, amounting to $6,039—is due entirely to an adjustment with regard to the amounts provided for temporary assistance and cost of living bonus. If the hon. member will look at the estimates for 1945-46 and compare them with the estimates for 1944-45 he will see that there was a considerable increase as between those two years. As a matter of fact they went up from $63,181 to $149,031. Our experience during the year has shown that we can make this adjustment without impairing the service.

With regard to the type of work done by the division, it includes research activities, including dietary and nutrition service and tabulations. There we work closely with the provinces, and at the request of provincial health authorities have made surveys of a considerable number of places. Surveys are being carried on to bring to light nutritional deficiencies due to one reason or another so that proper nutritional standards may be built up. The work also includes education with regard to nutrition, both through contacts with the provinces and communities and through various media. These include the use of films; wall charts, which are distributed wholesale and are colourful and useful with regard to diets; small sheets that were distributed on street cars and which had a general distribution; a wide range of pamphlets, and posters. The division also gives advice on group feeding in connection with quantity food services to industries, camps, small hospitals and so on. An active correspondence is carried on and a considerable amount of field work is done. Finally, the division works closely with other agencies of the government, as, for example, the armed forces, veterans affairs and others, in seeing to it that as far as possible the nutritional standards of the country are built up.

It is common knowledge that during the war the nutrition of the Canadian people was greatly improved, partly due to higher take-home wages, partly due to improved knowledge, and partly due to the development of good nutritional practices in industries and other places where groups of people were fed. We hope that work will be continued and extended. We find there is a great deal of room for work in marginal areas, as, for example, in the far north with our Eskimo and Indian people, and in various parts of Canada where nutritional standards are not as high as they should be. We hope to continue along that line, working closely with the provinces and any other agencies engaged in that field.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are two questions I should like to ask the minister. First, I want to repeat a question I have asked already; that is, as to what liaison there is between the division of nutrition and the Department of Finance. After all, it is in the finance department that decisions are made which affect the amount of money our old age pensioners receive, which affect the price of milk, and things like that. Is there any means whereby the knowledge gained by these people as to what the nutritional standards should be is brought impressively to bear upon the colleague of my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance?

The other question I should like to ask—and I am not being facetious nor am I being critical of the people employed there—is in regard to the nutritional standards of the cafeteria in which many of us in this house eat from day to day. I feel that the employees there do a good job with what they have, and give as good and courteous service, but my question is, are this department's nutritional standards really put into practice in connection with the meals members of the house must live on? Or is there some conspiracy to keep us at a low ebb so that we shall not be too hard on the government?

Mr. MacNICOL: They are certainly good in the main dining room.

Mr. KNOWLES: Certainly, for those who can afford to eat there all the time.

Mr. CLAXTON: The answer to the hon. member is that the nutritional standards and practices of hon. members are within their own control. Through Mr. Speaker they can exercise that control, by working through the proper agency, namely the committee on the restaurant. I feel that Mr. Speaker and hon. members would not wish us to engage in any campaign in that field without their express invitation. If they invite us we shall be glad to serve them, as we are glad to serve any other group in Canada.

Mr. BRACKEN: Will you not give them the benefit of your service?

Mr. CLAXTON: If we are invited.

With regard to the other question, as to the awareness of the Minister of Finance respecting the need for high nutritional standards, I believe it can be said that he is well aware of it; indeed all of us are. The best answer I can give the hon. member is that I do not think there has been any period in the history of Canada which compares with the last five years, so far as the average incomes of Canadian people in all classes are concerned. We hope that will be maintained and improved.

Mr. CASE: May I call attention to the item now before us appearing in the estimates for the fiscal year 1946-47. Item 213, for nutritional service is placed at $142,992, and it is stated in the next column that the amount for 1945-46 was $149,031, showing a decrease this year of $6,039. Then, if I can read correctly, I turn to the estimates for the fiscal year 1945-46, and under item 203, and the heading "nutrition service", I find the sum of $69,027 for 1945-46 as compared with $63,181 for 1944-45, or an increase of $5,846. My point is this: While the estimate for last year, in the estimates for 1945-46, is shown as $69,027, we find in the second column of the estimates of 1946-47 the sum of $149,031 for that year, as having been granted. Is there some explanation for that? If so, what is it?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall have the answer for the hon. member in a minute.

Mr. FLEMING: While we are waiting for the answer, may I put to the minister with respect to the item for publicity and information amounting to $50,000 the same question we have asked with respect to all such items in the estimates of this department? First, what were the actual expenditures under this heading during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946? Second, what are the projected expenditures for the current year?

Mr. CLAXTON: In answer to the hon. member for Grey North, I would point out that the difference is due to the supplementaries. We obtained large supplementaries last year, which are included in the comparable vote.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely the supplementaries would not be as great as that.

Mr. CLAXTON: They were.

Mr. GRAYDON: Then the minister must have been a poor judge of what was coming if his supplementary estimates were nearly twice as large as the original amount. What is the reason?

Mr. CLAXTON: I was not minister at the time; in fact I do not think the department was then in existence. The division was just in process of being set up. That is my recollection, and that would no doubt explain the failure to make a more accurate estimate. Then, too—and I shall verify this in a minute—I believe there was some adjustment between the war appropriation item and the civil item. I shall check on that.

In reply to the hon. member for Eglinton, the expenditures on publicity and information —that is, educational activities—in 1945-46 were $16,213.01. Does the hon. member want the items? They are lengthy.

Mr. FLEMING: Might we have a breakdown of them?

Mr. CLAXTON: They are classified under the different types of publicity, as follows: Canadian nutrition notes, $381.51; a pamphlet prepared for the national radio farm forum, $213.77; an eight-page booklet illustrating good business principles in selling food and food sanitation, prepared for the trade at a price of $78.60; a leaflet to improve the health and welfare of Canadian children by promoting good school lunches, which was prepared at the request of the dominion-provincial nutritional committee, and was distributed by the provinces to the schools, 800,000 copies in English and 200,000 in French at a cost of $3,145.27. Then, a poster which hon. members may have seen, called "Canada's Food Rules", 5,000 in English and 1,000 in French at a cost of $298.23. There is a poster to promote a contest in schools, 20,000 copies in English and 5,000 in French, for $1,573.58, and prizes in connection therewith of $602.25. Then, a street-car poster, "Eat the foods that keep you fit", at $6,356.31; camp feeding, which has been referred to already, $235.95; reprints of scientific articles from professional journals, $39.13; forms of diet, $14.63; Canadian food nutritional statistics, $17.57; writing of nutritional plays and pageants for school children, $115; Canadian Press clipping service, $19.96; nine displays on nutrition for use in schools, $192.56; "Start the Day Right", newsclip for commercial theatres and broadcasters, $990.75; a film strip, "Canada's Food Rules", in colour, $27; "Let's Talk Food, Mother", prepared at the suggestion of the dominion-provincial nutritional committee, 300,000 copies in English and 100,000 in French, $135 for the preparatory work, the printing bill having not yet been received; eight health exhibits from the Cleveland health museum, $1,657.50; "Lunch Boxes on the March", to improve the health and welfare of Canadians in industry, schools and offices, distributed through the provincial departments of health, $742.94. This makes a total of $16,837.51.

Mr. FLEMING: The other question was as to the projected expenditures for the current year.

Mr. CLAXTON: Some bills for part of the work are still outstanding—quantity food service, nutrition survey, winter diet poster, and the caterers' bulletin. They enter into the present year's estimates.

Mr. FLEMING: What is the total?

Mr. CLAXTON: The matters in process of production are in great detail. They go up to $48,400, leaving an unallocated amount of $1,600: periodicals, "Canadian Nutrition Notes" and "Caterers' Bulletin", $500 and $100 respectively; pamphlets for teachers, on school lunches, $1,000; for mothers on school lunches, $1,000; for a revised edition of "Healthful Eating", $3,000; Camping Manual, $2,000—

Mr. FLEMING: I do not wish to interrupt the minister, but I did not want that much detail.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member asked for it.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not think we need those items in such detail. Might we have just the larger ones, anything over a couple of thousand dollars?

Mr. CLAXTON: For posters and coloured maps showing the food production areas in Canada, $5,000. A kitchen wall chart which has been issued and reissued and which is to be issued in revised form, 100,000 copies in English and 25,000 in French, $5,300. Those are the only large items.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister referred to a map showing the food production areas in Canada. What is the purpose of that?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is to bring home to the people and school children of Canada by means of an illustrated map the kind of food that Canada produces which they should eat to make up a suitable diet and the importance of eating different types of food that we produce in Canada in order to make up a balanced diet.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. CHURCH: This department is labelled the Department of National Health and Welfare but, so far as making any contribution to nutrition is concerned, the department is doing nothing that I know of. They have a national health department in Great Britain, and what do they do? They provide meals for the underprivileged children in the schools. What are we doing over here? We have a skeleton department that spends $11,000,000 on public health and which used to spend only $500,000 before the war. All they do is to give advice to the provinces and municipalities regarding public health.

I read a letter in the Globe and Mail this morning criticizing one of the officers of the department because he was travelling all over the world giving advice. They must have an awful lot to do here in Ottawa in the national public health department when they can find time to take trains and planes all over the civilized world. Planes here and planes there, hotel bills everywhere; they have a staff travelling along, secretaries and a whole retinue; almost a small standing army. When the war started and so many men were overseas the municipalities were faced with the necessity of setting up day nurseries to take care of the children in those families where the mothers had to go to work because they did not have enough money to pay the rent. These day nurseries were opened up and the children were taken in and given milk and food. What are we doing? We are spending money to visit security councils when there is no security at all in any land.

The first thing I want to know is: What does a lawyer know about nutrition? Why should a lawyer be heading the Department of National Health and Welfare? When I was chairman of the board of health I had one of the greatest health officers at the head of the department, Doctor Hastings. He knew the whole business from top to bottom. If the government is not prepared to do the right thing, let us abolish the department altogether. They are doing nothing for national health. What has happened to the nurseries which were opened in order to provide hundreds of children with a little bit of lunch when their fathers and mothers were out working? They closed them up. They told the municipalities that that item would be struck out of the estimates, but yet they find money with which to visit New York and travel all over the United States taking up all the hotel space and the reservations on planes. These are the wonderful people who are doing so much for public health.

As far as I can see, the department is doing nothing. All that they do is give advice to the municipalities. I receive their literature but I just throw it in the wastepaper basket because it would be a waste of time to read it. The writers do not know very much about public health and yet they clutter up the mails with all this stuff. If the government want to do something they should do what they are doing in Great Britain. Some of the officers of the department have just come back from the United States. They cannot see a day wasted without visiting Washington, Chicago, Buffalo, Cleveland and New York—all aboard! The whole staff are ready to go to make some investigation or inquiry into public health and make speeches in the United States. What do they care about the children in our public and separate and other schools of the country who cannot get milk, with the two-cent subsidy now cut off? There are a great many of these children in my own constituency. They had a school down at Little Norway. They cannot get houses, they cannot get homes; they cannot get anything. Yet all we have is this skeleton department giving advice to the municipal health officers.

A lot of the health officers are getting pretty sick of it. I was talking to three or four of them about it the other day, and they wanted to know what I was going to do to try to get this item for the day nurseries back in the estimates. Many of these men know more about public health than some of the fellows I have seen in the department. If we are to have a national health department, let us have a good one. Health is the most important thing that I know of. Some of those who have been in this parliament have gone because they could not stand the pace. If we are going to do something for public health let us find the money to do it with. It is the duty of the government to look after the peace, health, comfort and prosperity of its people. Do you think visiting the United States will help the children of this country?

Nothing has been done at all. No houses, no homes, no food, no milk, no day nurseries. All they need is one or two cents for milk to provide the necessary nutrition, and yet they are ready to spend thousands of dollars in carrying on a useles advertising campaign. I often pity the taxpayers of the country. Fortunately there is an election every year in municipalities and here every five years, and the government will have to answer when they are asked: What are you doing for public health? What are you doing for consumption? What are you doing about heart diseases? What are you doing about cancer? One of the finest members of the house suffered from that dread malady. It is just like Santa Claus; one of the officials of the department said that there was no Santa Claus, and there is no Santa Claus as far as this department goes. The municipalities have to be the Santa Claus. They have to provide the funds for real public health.

We spend more money on education in one year than they are spending. Here we are spending $11,000,000 on a skeleton health department of talk. We spend from $12,000,000 to $13,000,000 a year on educating our children. These day nurseries are needed and we should have visiting nurses who could go to the homes of these poor people who are living down in the cellars and all that kind of thing. It is a good thing that we have had the school system we have because the children can at least go to school and be warm in the day time. Some of the schools are beginning to give meals, but they are getting no help from Ottawa.

Ontario is the forgotten province. There has been no cabinet minister from the Toronto district since 1935. Yet there are one, two, three, four, five or six from Montreal. The time is coming when we should either have a real national health department that can provide nutrition and all the rest of it, or we should have no department at all. It is time the government cut out a lot of this waste and duplication. I know the young minister is not to blame for all this because he took charge of the department just at the time of the baby bonus. But I think it would be far better to give bonuses, subsidies and subventions to municipalities to build and maintain hospitals, and liberal grants for cancer, heart disease, consumption, than to spend money the way it has been spent by the government in the past on a national health department that is merely national in name and gives only advice.

Mr. CASE: I come back to the item of $69,000 for 1945-46. According to the answer the minister gave me, he was out only $80,004 in his estimates. In view of that discrepancy, will the minister tell the committee how much money was voted to the department in the supplementary estimates and how much the department spent?

Mr. CLAXTON: I will get that for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was interested in the cards, which the minister described as colourful, for display in kitchens, showing what is believed to be a proper diet. I think he said that 100,000 in English and 25,000 in French of these cards had been distributed. That strikes me as meagre, considering the number of homes and kitchens there are in Canada. Maybe there is some explanation. Would the minister give us some idea as to how they are distributed and whether consideration has been given to distributing these and other worth-while posters to every home in Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: The figure was based on the distribution that was made of the previous wall charts. It was expected that that kind of distribution would be needed to cover the needs calculated for the various provincial and other agencies through which the distribution is made. We have given consideration to the idea of a distribution of wall charts and similar material to all homes in Canada, and such distribution has been made so far in inserts in the envelopes containing the family allowance cheques. The insert is in pictorial form and gives nutritional rules that would be useful in the feeding of children. We have considered whether or not that could be extended along the lines the hon. member suggests, but so far it has been felt that the same results could be achieved through the family allowance distribution, which goes to practically every home in Canada where there are children.

In answer to the hon. member for Grey North the main estimates for 1945-46 were $69,027, and supplementaries, $80,004, or a total of $149,031.

Mr. CASE: I have that figure, but I asked how much was the total voted in supplementary estimates for the department.

Mr. CLAXTON: The total supplementaries for the department were $760,828 for the health branch, and $53,005.27 for the welfare branch. The expenses, of course, were nowhere near the estimates.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What provision is being made to provide a suitable and proper diet for the people of Canada by seeing that berries and other fruits are made available to them? Will the minister give us the assurance that he will try to convince the government that it should take steps to see that berries and other fruits are made available to the Canadian people so that they will get proper nutrition?

Mr. CLAXTON: We are most anxious to see that everyone in Canada gets adequate nutrition and we shall do everything possible to see that that is done.

Mr. PROBE: Is there any place in this estimate for doing something practical in the line of nutrition, not simply giving advice or suggesting diet rules to follow? I was thinking specifically of the distribution of milk in schools for children of public school age. Now that the two cents subsidy on milk has been taken off, a simple calculation would show that all school children of public school age in this country could be provided with a bottle of milk in the morning recess and again in the afternoon recess at a cost of from $1 to $1.25 per student. I know the minister is anxious about the technical side of nutrition, but the practical side is equally important. I think the minister could make a worth-while contribution in a practical way to nutritional standards, particularly of children of school age who are not likely to have enough milk, by providing through the provincial governments a subsidy of two cents a quart on milk, on a distribution of say 200 half pints a year, and the provincial governments could work out a plan of distribution with the school districts so that every child of elementary school age will get the milk he requires. I think that would be something worth while. Would the minister say whether such a scheme would be practical? I am sure the cost would not be more than a million or a million and a half dollars a year, and it would be of as much practical value as sending out a bunch of charts which the hon. member for Broadview says are thrown into the wastepaper basket.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member's suggestion is not in my view a practicable one. We have never had any suggestion from any province that we should make such a grant in aid.

Mr. PROBE: There is no reason why the minister should not take the lead, or at any rate the federal government.

Mr. CLAXTON: I still think we have in Canada a constitution that we ought to respect. What we aim to do is to put the provinces, by agreement with them, in a position where they can discharge their proper constitutional responsibilities, and I simply cannot conceive of any arrangement whereby the federal government could grant money for bottles of milk to individual children across Canada. We have not that kind of constitutional set-up.

Mr. PROBE: What is the constitutional limitation upon the federal government making a grant to the provinces on the basis of the number of school children who would receive such service through arrangements made by the provinces themselves? To me it is highly practical and I do not see any constitutional difficulty.

Mr. FERGUSON: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. PROBE: I should like to get an answer from the minister. He is a lawyer and he might indicate where the constitutional limitation applies. I am not a lawyer but I am interested in nutrition.

Mr. CLAXTON: At present we are discussing an item in the estimates. If the hon. member really wishes to have me develop the constitutional position of Canada, the relationship between the federal government and the provinces, and the constitutional and practical limitations upon a system of grants in aid, I am prepared to do so at the proper time. This, however, is not the time. I repeat, it has never been suggested to us that we should make such a grant for such a purpose and I cannot conceive of the provinces agreeing upon our doing that, nor can I imagine a system under which it can be done effectively.

Mr. FERGUSON: The Department of National Health and Welfare is one of the most outstanding in Canada, but in the administration of it I suggest that the old taxpayer of Canada should be given just as much consideration as he is under any other department. A moment ago the minister mentioned an item of $5,000 expended in the distribution of a map to demonstrate, and to educate the children of Canada in, the various products of this country, where they are produced, and the benefits to be derived from them if they are consumed in certain quantities and in certain ways. I do not think the department gave that item much consideration apart from the fact that it is an attractive illustration of the various products of Canada. Surely the departments of education of the various provinces could look after this matter. Here we are spending $5,000 to impress upon Canadian children where various products come from throughout the dominion. I suggest that this department is treading upon the toes of the provincial departments of education and that this is $5,000 thrown away. The purpose is to reach children who cannot read or who, if they can read, can find in their school books throughout Canada exactly where various products are grown and produced. If the schools in the different provinces cannot spend a little time in instructing their children in the matter of better diets for their general welfare, I suggest that it is extravagant for this department to turn out a $5,000 pamphlet for the purpose of informing the Canadian people where their products are grown. Considering the fact that this government could not give more than $9,000 to the entire boy scout movement for the improvement of the health of young boys, when it can spend $5,000 extravagantly in connection with such a pamphlet.

Mr. CLAXTON: The maps would be distributed to the schools, through the provincial educational authorities.

Mr. FERGUSON: Why is it necessary to spend $5,000 in this way? A well worded letter to all the schools would cost one-tenth of the amount.

Mr. BROOKS: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Regina City was a very good one, namely, that something should be done to see that the health of our school children is improved. It occurred to me that in England—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—under the children's allowance, instead of paying so much money to heads of families they give in part food and milk to school children, the idea being to see that there the benefit of all the money goes to the children. I was wondering whether, under the children's allowance in this country, the minister had thought of giving possibly so much to the different provinces so that they could see that the money which is going here for family allowance really provides the service for which it is intended. We hear reports that people are taking the money and going to the moving pictures and spending it in other ways which are not beneficial to the children, and the department has no way of remedying this. If we want to bring up healthy children in this country it cannot be done if the money is to be wasted on something else. It seems to me that the suggestion of the hon. member for Regina City is a good one, and we should see to it that the money which is being spent is used to build up the bodies of young children attending school. Possibly this will come up under children's allowances, and the minister will be able to discuss it then.

Item agreed to.

214. Combating venereal diseases—administration, $36,970.

Mr. FEMING: Items 214, 215 and 216 relate to the combating of venereal diseases, and perhaps what I have to say now will apply to all three. The first item is administration, $36,000 roughly; the second is assistance to the provinces for control of venereal diseases under regulations approved by the governor in council, $175,000; and the third is distribution of drugs under regulations approved by the governor in council, $50,000.

The first two represent reductions from last year's estimates; the third item is the same as last year's.

In all fairness to the work of the department under this branch, it should be observed that the actual administration of methods of combating venereal disease must fall under the jurisdiction of the provinces, and the contribution of the dominion in this field cannot in peace time be as great as in war time. There was a great opportunity during the war for the dominion, through this department and its predecessor, to take effective measures on various fronts to combat the spread of venereal disease. It requires no further words on my part to establish the seriousness of the whole problem. It is a serious problem in this country; but it is one which, by enlightened methods, can be reduced in its scope if, indeed, it cannot be overcome.

The effect of remedial measures of the right kind is shown by the reduction in the incidence of venereal diseases in the armed forces during the war, by methods carried on under dominion jurisdiction. The report of the department for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1945, at page 62, gives certain figures showing the reduction in incidence in the disease in the armed forces, beginning with the year 1940 and ending with 1944. Statistics for 1945 are not available to us. In the navy the rate per 1,000 in 1940 was 58; in 1941 it rose to 60, and from that point on it was reduced until in 1944 it was 32, which is less than 50 per cent of the incidence of venereal disease in 1941. In the army the incidence of the disease reached its peak in 1940, with 62 per 1,000 in that year. It was reduced each year until in 1944 it had been reduced to 29, less than half of the rate of incidence which prevailed in 1940. In the air force in 1940 the rate of incidence was 29, and it was reduced in each year until in 1944 it was 18 per 1,000. These figures are most significant in showing what can be done by effective measures. Of course it is not possible to take measures with reference to the civilian population in the same way as it is possible with reference to the armed forces. There are not the same opportunities for inspection and control, but there are important lessons to be derived from the experience of Canada in time of war in seeking to combat the incidence of venereal disease in the armed forces.

In a review of this particular item in the estimates of the department last year, the minister outlined a programme on four fronts. His remarks are to be found at page 3600 of Hansard of December 15, 1945. He spoke about a series of advertisements issued by the department emphasizing a four-sector front against venereal disease. These four sectors of the front are health, welfare, legal and moral. If the minister will be so kind I should like him to outline what programme his department proposes to follow this year with reference to this problem, bearing in mind, of course, the constitutional limitations on the powers of the department. In particular, I should like to ask him what measures the dominion hopes to initiate or bring about by education or other methods on the moral front? I am moved to say this, not with a view of repeating what has been discussed more than once in this chamber, but because I think it has a direct bearing on any measures that this department proposes to take to combat venereal disease on the moral front. I am sure that we must put far more emphasis on the moral attack on venereal disease than has been done hitherto.

The deputy minister of this department on the health side has made certain public statements, and I should like the view of the minister in regard to the relation of some of the statements of his deputy to the efforts of the department to combat venereal disease on the moral front. Doctor Chisholm's opinions are his own business; but the statements which he makes in his capacity as deputy minister of national health in the time of the department, the time of the people of Canada, are, I think, a matter of genuine concern to the members of this committee. When Doctor Chisholm speaks in public on these matters, undoubtedly he is recognized as speaking in his capacity of deputy minister of national health, and his remarks must certainly be construed by the public as having some relationship to the policy of this department.

In all fairness, I say that there has been a good deal of misapprehension about the remarks of Doctor Chisholm. There has been so much publicity given to his remarks on the subject of education of children, on the subject of Santa Claus, that some of his remarks which are of greater significance have been lost sight of. What I am speaking of to-night has nothing to do with Doctor Chisholm's views on the matter of instructing children in regard to Santa Claus. His remarks which I shall quote relate directly to what may or may not be the policy of this department in attacking venereal disease on the moral front. I shall quote the exact words used by Doctor Chisholm in his lectures at the William Alanson White memorial lectures in the United States last fall. This is what he said:

Is there any force so potent and so pervasive that it can do all these things in all civilizations?

He was dealing with the question of inferiority, guilt and fear and the effect of these things in controlling people's actions and inhibitions. I continue:

There is—just one. The only lowest common denominator of all civilizations and the only psychological force capable of producing these perversions is morality, the concept of right and wrong, the poison long ago described and warned against as "the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil."

In the old Hebrew story God warns the first man and woman to have nothing to with good and evil. It is interesting to note that as long ago as that, "good" is recognized as just as great a menace as "evil." They are the fruit of the one tree and are different aspects of the same thing.

We have been very slow to rediscover this truth and to recognize the unnecessary and artificially imposed inferiority, guilt and fear, commonly known as sin, under which we have almost all laboured and which produces so much of the social maladjustment and unhappiness in the world. For many generations we have bowed our necks to the yoke of the conviction of sin. We have swallowed all manner of poisonous certainties fed us by our parents, our Sunday and day school teachers, our politicians, our priests, our newspapers and others with a vested interest in controlling us. "Thou shalt become as gods, knowing good and evil," good and evil with which to keep children under control, with which to prevent free thinking, with which to impose local and familial and national loyalties and with which to blind children to their glorious intellectual heritage. Misguided by authoritarian dogma, bound by exclusive faith, stunted by inculcated loyalty, torn by frantic heresy, bedevilled by insistent schism, drugged by ecstatic experience, confused by conflicting certainty, bewildered by invented mystery, and loaded down by the weight of guilt and fear engendered by its own original promises, the unfortunate human race, deprived by these incubi of its only defences and its only reasons for striving, its reasoning power and its natural capacity to enjoy the satisfaction of its natural urges, struggles along under its ghastly self-imposed burden. The results, the inevitable results, are frustration, inferiority, neurosis and inability to enjoy living, to reason clearly or to make a world fit to live in.

Mr. REID: I have listened to what the hon. member has read. What does Doctor Chisholm really mean?

Mr. FLEMING: I should have thought the pith of the remarks of the deputy minister is that the heart of our problem is that we choose to recognize such things as good and evil. His argument here is that the cause of our troubles is the conception of morality which rests on religion and the religious conception of good and evil; therefore he says, do away with that and a lot of your trouble will be over. Further on in his address, he says:

Freedom from moralities means freedom to observe, to think and behave sensibly, to the advantage of the person and of the group, free from outmoded types of loyalties and from the magic fears of our ancestors.

The committee is entitled to know whether that represents the type of attack which this department conceives to be the proper type of attack on the problem of venereal disease on the moral front. I suggest that when we are called upon to vote substantial sums of money to assist this department in combating this dreadful venereal disease; when it is recognized by the minister himself that it has to be attacked on four fronts, not the least of which is the moral front, we want some positive assurance from the minister that statements of this type are disclaimed by the department as representing the policy and view of the department. In the second place, we want an assurance that it is not going to be countenanced by the department on the part of a civil servant, speaking in his capacity as a civil servant, in time paid for by the department. If the deputy minister is to continue in office, and I take it he is since this matter was touched upon last fall, we want some assurance that remarks of this kind will not be made by him in his official capacity.

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon member for Eglinton has raised this question and I am very glad to reply to him. In the first place, I should say that Doctor Chisholm is a doctor and scientist of considerable distinction who during the war rendered great service as director general of medical services of Canada, during the very period when this reduction in venereal disease was effected and when the front against venereal disease included the moral front. He was selected to come to this department and was appointed on the recommendation of the Prime Minister in November, 1944, and he has given great service in organizing the department. When he delivered the speech in Washington just referred to he was speaking as a professional man to an audience of professional men. In no way did he represent himself as speaking for the department or the government of Canada. Incidentally, not that it matters so much, he spoke when he was on leave from the department, his first leave since joining it.

I do not intend to go over the ground covered in the speech to which the hon. member has referred, or what has been quoted by my hon. friend. Nor do I intend to try to explain what Doctor Chisholm meant in the words he used. But I think, if the speech is read as a whole, its general purpose will be seen. It is this: that because of his experiences in two wars, because of his knowledge as a scientist, Doctor Chisholm, like a great number of other people in the world, including the present Prime Minister in speeches in this house, has reached the strong conviction that unless mankind does something to look after its own affairs better than has been done in the past we are likely to have another war which will destroy a very large proportion of civilization, if not mankind itself. That, I think, is clear from this speech and other utterances of Doctor Chisholm, as well as of other people. Holding that view as strongly as he does, he finds that the trouble lies in ourselves, and he suggests some remedies, some changes in attitude.

Certainly I do not pretend for a moment that the views he expresses are my views. I believe, however, that he has sincerely stated his views because of his strong convictions, and has stated them in all sincerity as an approach to the settlement of the question of war and peace, of man controlling himself as well as his environment. The object, I think, is to try to get people to think for themselves. I have discussed this matter with Doctor Chisholm, as hon. members may imagine, and from that discussion I personally do not think one would find anything in what he said which was an attack on morality in any proper sense, or on a proper concept of good and evil, or on any religion. That is the impression he left with me in the discussions I have had with him.

It is quite obvious that in this he was not speaking for the department or the government. I think it is equally obvious from his whole record that he is a man of great sincerity and deep personal conviction. When as deputy minister of the department he supports and, in fact directs a campaign against venereal disease, which includes an attack on the moral front, he means that; and it is an important element in the attack on venereal disease, as the publicity and educational activities of the department have pointed out and as the hon. member for Eglinton has said. It is mentioned fourth in the list for reasons of climax, as being the most important element in it. The publicity issued, either through films, posters, pamphlets or newspaper advertisements, all emphasizes this; and I can assure the hon. member that as long as I have anything to do with the department they will continue to emphasize it.

The campaign to which he referred and the programme about which he desired information is being carried on largely in cooperation with those agencies throughout the dominion which are directly engaged in dealing with the problem. Within the last two months there was held in Ottawa a meeting at which the venereal disease enforcement officers of the various provinces and others representing the armed forces discussed further plans and agreed on a common line of attack. Among the most important things are the distribution of infomation, the cooperation with regard to statistics, and also the possible development of common lines of attack through action in the courts and otherwise, as well as in the all-important field of education. All that activity is being carried on in cooperation with those agencies, in the directions that were outlined previously.

Mr. LENNARD: Then might I ask the minister the reason for this great reduction in the amount for publicity and information in the estimates for 1946-47?

Mr. CLAXTON: The reason for the reduction is the relatively large item which was included in the estimates for the previous year to cover the cost of a campaign that was carried on during the month of November, 1944. That campaign included a large amount of newspaper and other kinds of publicity. It received general commendation and was useful, but it is not the kind of thing we would wish to repeat every year. It was done in conjunction with the war, and also in conjunction with a similar campaign being carried on in the United States. The possibility of holding another campaign will be under consideration, but it is not contemplated for this year.

Mr. BLAIR: While discussing this item of venereal disease last fall, the minister said this, with respect to publicity:

> While the frankness of the advertisements and radio publicity and the motion pictures that were shown from one end of Canada to the other might have been alarming to some people, there was not a word of criticism of them from any quarter.

This year we are spending $5,000 on publicity with respect to this disease, one which is causing so much harm throughout Canada. But I notice that in connection with the civil service we are spending $18,000 for publicity.

If this matter is to be brought before the Canadian people, then I contend we shall have to spend a great deal more money, because the work will have to be done in an educational way. Taking the three items together, we have an amount of $261,970, or a decrease of $45,000 from last year. I am not in favour of spending additional amounts of the taxpayers' money, but I contend that in cutting down this expenditure, and spending only $261,970, we are increasing our own expenses, because many of these people will become public charges. This disease results in mental cases throughout the country; it results in chronic invalides, the birth of children with defective hearing and defective eyesight. In comparison with item 205, where $226,710 is spent for the care of nine leper patients, we find this comparatively small amount for venereal diseases. Nine leper patients are costing us the amount I have mentioned; yet one of these infected people, running loose in the country, could cause a great deal more expense than that.

Last year I suggested that the item should be doubled, and I am still of that opinion. This disease is one of the greatest scourges in the country. The sooner it comes out in the open, through an educational programme, the better. We must take off our gloves and attack the problem in the open, through a complete educational programme. I say that $5,000 will not be sufficient to educate the people in a programme of that kind.

Mr. CLAXTON: I agree with the hon. member in what he says respecting the amount provided. It surprises me, and I shall certainly see that it is reexamined. I noted his statement as to the expenditure of $226,710 for the care of lepers. That, of course, includes the quarantine service. The actual expenditure on the care of lepers was somewhat under $15,000, if my memory is correct.

Mr. PROBE: I congratulate the hon. member for Lanark upon his drawing attention to the serious implications of venereal disease. At the same time, however, I would question the consistency of several of his colleagues who have been attacking the ministers, including the one now before the committee, for too heavy expenditures on publicity. I believe that inconsistency should be explained, because on the one hand we cannot have increased expenditures for some worth-while form of publicity, and decreased expenditures on the other. I believe it was the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard who on June 7, as reported at page 2314 of Hansard, referred to this specific appropriation.

I note that in connection with venereal diseases there is an appropriation to the provinces. Why is it constitutionally sound to make additional grants to the provinces for the control of venereal diseases, for physical fitness programmes, but constitutionally unsound to make a grant in connection with the nutritional matter of supplying milk for school children, which I mentioned a minute ago. It was pointed out that such additional grant was ultra vires or unconstitutional. What is the explanation?

Mr. CLAXTON: Replying to the hon. member for Lanark, might I point out that under the next item, 215, there is included in the sum of $175,000 an amount of $25,250 for education in connection with venereal disease.

Then, replying to the hon. member for Regina City, I could, as I have said, discuss at some length the constitutional question. Offhand I would say, however, that whereas it would be possible for the federal government to make additional grants in aid to the provinces for purposes such as this, and to make them constitutionally and practically, I fail to see how we can make available to the provinces for payment to individuals throughout the provinces moneys for the purpose he has mentioned. I should think that kind of payment would lead to all kinds of constitutional and administrative difficulties.

It seems to me that there is a fundamental difference, and that the answer we have given is the right one, namely that the right way to deal with such a matter is by general arrangement to put the provinces in a position where they can discharge their own responsibilities.

Mr. PROBE: There is no hint in anything I have said that additional grants made by the Canadian government should not be to the provinces in the nature of grants for milk for school children. The details could be worked out, if the approach were properly made in the form of an offer from this government. We have made a much greater grant by way of family allowances. We are told that in the next year it will amount to $250 million. It seems that the expenditure depends on what the grant is to be made for. It seems to me that the minister is not logical in what he says.

I approve entirely the principle of a grant to fight venereal diseases, a grant for a national physical fitness programme, and for payment of family allowances, and hope that the list can be extended, because it is only in that way that we can equalize opportunities as between the wealthier and poorer individuals. It seems to me that the minister has not fully answered my question as to the constitutional difficulties.

Mr. SHAW: What I have to say relates specifically to item 215, wherein it is indicated that grants to provinces for assistance in the control of venereal disease have been reduced by $33,000. I must confess I was a little surprised when I read of the proposed reduction. I appreciate fully that the government must be under great pressure to effect economies, but action of this kind must be characterized as nothing short of false economy.

Mr. CLAXTON: I can answer the hon. member at once. The allotment for 1945-46 is shown as $208,300 as against $175,000 for 1946-47. The $33,300 difference was simply to cover the payment of the amounts outstanding to the provinces from 1944 to 1945. The amount allocated for both periods was the same, $175,000, and it has been the same since 1943 if spread over the years.

Mr. SHAW: The grants were first made to the provinces in 1919 to assist in the control of venereal disease, and then they were progressively reduced until in 1932 they were completely eliminated. When were they resumed?

Mr. CLAXTON: 1943.

Mr. SHAW: Could the minister give us the statistics from 1938 to 1946?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have not the morbidity rates going back that far.

Mr. SHAW: Will those be made available to the committee before we complete these estimates? As I said before, in 1919 the dominion government undertook a policy of making grants to the provinces. In order to qualify, a province had to establish free clinics, free hospital beds for indoor patients, provide treatment to gaol inmates, appoint a specially trained director, all of which was subject to inspection by a federal official. In 1919 the total grant was $180,000. By 1922, all the provinces with the exception of Prince Edward Island had qualified by meeting the conditions I have just stated. If I may repeat, in 1932 the grant was eliminated.

The provinces were left in this position, which has happened in connection with so many federal grants. They were encouraged to establish machinery to meet certain conditions and they banked upon the grant made by the dominion only to find, after the machinery was functioning and could not possibly be done away with—the people demand these services—that the dominion was withdrawing from the field and leaving the provinces to bear the full burden of the cost.

There should not be any reduction this year, next year or the year following in the grants to provinces to assist in the control of venereal disease, unless at the same time it can be said that venereal disease has been wiped out entirely in this country. I realize that health is primarily a responsibility of the provinces; but we have just come through a national tragedy, namely, a war, and we have had to face abnormal conditions in connection with these diseases. Since people migrated from one section of the country to another this has really become substantially a federal responsibility. Let me emphasize what I said a moment ago. I trust that there will be no attempt made, no matter what demands for economy are put forth, to eliminate this federal grant to assist in the control of venereal disease, unless it can be said that veneral disease no longer exists in this land.

Mr. LENNARD: I should like to refer back to the remarks made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Regina City and assure him there is no inconsistency as far as this group is concerned. I wish to assure him personally that when I make any criticism of any department I do so honestly and sincerely and because it is my opinion. Remarks such as his are entirely uncalled for. As far as I am concerned, the members of this group are not hamstrung as are those in his group.

Mr. PROBE: I am very happy to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman, but I would draw his attention to the fact that the Progressive Conservatives were not all of a mind on this.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I expected that the hon. member for Eglinton would follow up his attack on the moral aspect of this venereal disease question, but he appears not to be intending to do that. I find myself somewhat confused by the whole situation. I am not able to gather what the minister conceives to be the moral attack on venereal disease. I could understand his conceiving venereal disease to be the result of a lack of morality in the country and that lack of morality to be owing to a lack of faith in religion and in God and his undertaking to use a method of attack through an educational campaign that would restore the belief of the people in God and Christianity and thereby make the people sense their responsibility to God a little more and refrain from the offences which result in venereal disease.

I can understand some such line of attack as that being a moral attack on the problem, but I must say that apparently the minister has left unsaid the very things that he needed to have said in order that I would be able to see how the speech of Doctor Chisholm, which the hon. member for Eglinton quoted, could have anything to do with the moral attack on the venereal disease question. Perhaps the minister can elucidate the matter for me. I have three questions to ask which will probably assist him.

The first one is: What does the minister mean by a moral attack on the venereal disease problem? Second, does the minister conceive Doctor Chisholm's remarks, as quoted by the hon. member for Eglinton, to be a contribution to the attack on venereal disease on the moral front? Third, the minister has said that Doctor Chisholm is a great scientist; what bearing on the moral aspect of the attack on venereal disease does the minister conceive that fact to have? If the minister will explain that I probably can get myself correctly orientated in regard to this matter.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am not prepared to develop for the benefit of the hon. member for Lethbridge—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why not include the committee?

Mr. CLAXTON: —and this committee my concept of morality. I think every hon. member has his own concept and is living up to it as best he can.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is not a sufficient answer. If a moral attack on venereal disease means anything, it means a moral attack. If remarks are made in the country which tend to destroy the faith of the people in God, in Christianity and in the moral standards which we have had for generations; if those things are being done in a public way and the faith of the people being destroyed, I fail utterly to see how a moral attack is being made on the venereal disease question. I believe a good deal of explanation is due the committee. I represent a constituency in which this is a serious matter, and I believe that a good many hon. members do. What does the minister mean by morals when he speaks of an attack against venereal disease on the moral front? If the minister will explain that, we shall proceed from there.

Mr. FLEMING: The item reads:

Assistance to provinces for control of venereal diseases under regulations approved by the governor in council.

Are those the regulations which were promulgated on April 30, 1946, and which appeared in the Canada Gazette on May 18, 1946? They provide, briefly, for a distribution of the grant on the basis of a minimum organizational grant of $4,000 for each province, and the remainder of the grant is apportioned according to population.

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not at all satisfied about this matter. I think the people of Canada are entitled to a clear statement as to the significance of some of the speeches that have been made by the deputy minister of health. He might have been speaking in an unofficial capacity, and in so far as he was doing so, well and good. I am not particularly criticizing that gentleman. I am criticizing more the attitude which is being adopted by a good many men who call themselves scientists and who assume things that have never been proved and then proceed to make a great many remarks based on their false assumptions and spread them abroad all over the country, tending to destroy the faith of the people.

My judgment is this. At least I am inclined to believe that there is a lot in this, that the venereal disease which has developed in this country has developed as a result of a deliberate propaganda which has been going on now for something like two generations and which is aimed at the destruction of the faith of the people. I had the privilege of going to university, commencing in 1909 and going on to 1913, and what went on in that university was a long, long way from anything that would be conducive to the building up of faith in God. About all that we were taught faith in was evolution. I have an idea that that sort of thing is going on in most of the universities in this land. Certainly it is being propagated in a good many textbooks and in many of the illustrated lectures and in slides. If this sort of thing goes on throughout the country and no attempt is made on the part of Canada as a whole to offset that tendency, we are just throwing good money down the drain when we attempt to cope with venereal disease.

I do not suppose that hon. members will accept this as a particular authority, but I happen to have in my hand a statement by Henry Ward Beecher, which is of interest in this connection. He says: "Morality without religion has no roots." I am inclined to think that philosophy is just about right. "Morality without religion has no roots."

I said the other day, on June 7, that I believed the people had to return to God, and I think that is one of the very first things to do if we are to make an attack on venereal disease on the moral front. If we do not do that, we are not attacking venereal disease on the moral front.

The minister will remember that on June 7 I asked a number of questions designed to bring out the number of films which were being shown by the national film board and which tended to indoctrinate evolution. I do not know whether the minister has had time to get the answers to questions, I asked that day, but if he has, I should like to have him give the answers now. I asked another set of questions on that same day designed to give him an opportunity of telling how many films the national film board is showing which are designed to increase faith in the bible. If he can tell us that I shall be glad. If we find that there are a good many films tending to establish the evolution concept and very few films tending to establish faith in the bible concept, we can get a pretty good idea of what the minister and his department mean by a moral attack on venereal disease.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I had better deal with the hon. member's question with regard to the film board, although it is totally irrelevant to this item, by saying that when the item comes before us I am prepared to deal fully with it. I do not know of any film such as he has in mind.

With regard to his question about the moral front and various other fronts in attacking venereal disease, it is quite obvious that we are doing the job of combating venereal disease through various agencies which are appropriate for each part of the job. With regard to health, that is done through the weapons of modern science, making treatment available, educating people to look after themselves, public health procedure.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would be the intellectual front, not the moral front.

Mr. CLAXTON: No; that is the health front.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is intellectual. You would not call that moral.

Mr. CLAXTON: On the health front you find physicians, health nurses, university medical training centres, hospitals, free treatment centres and so on. On the welfare front are the people who work to improve living conditions, social workers, welfare agencies and all the other instruments used to combat squalor and overcrowding, bad sanitation, neglect and insecurity.

On the legal front the aim is to conduct a vigorous, unrelenting and sustained attack in the courts, through the use of the machinery of the courts, and police agencies whose job is to seek out and bring to justice those who for personal gain cater to man's weaknesses. On all these different fronts the agencies appropriate to each are the ones to take action. On the moral front the battle is led by the churches and by the homes of Canada. They work together to inculcate a moral attitude and uphold the sanctity of marriage and of family life.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If that is the meaning of "moral" I believe that every member of this committee will agree that anything that tends to establish the evolutionary theory or the higher criticism attitude toward the bible or to undermine belief in God, Christ or the bible is diametrically opposed to every one of the elements working in the interests of the moral life of the country, because they are opposed to those elements which are working for the establishment of spirituality in the country. I do not wish to labour this point. I believe that there should be a united effort from coast to coast in this country among the people, not among the lawmakers, to reestablish faith in God, faith in the bible, faith in Christianity and to offset the pernicious effects of the evolutionary theory. The evolutionary theory was never more than a theory and, as the days go by, it is being shown more and more to be unfounded in fact. Why, then, should we have our films filled with it, our textbooks filled with it, our university courses filled with it? It is a problem the people must deal with, and as a member of this house I suggest that the people from coast to coast take this matter with great seriousness.

National health branch—

216. Distribution of drugs under regulations approved by the governor in council, $50,000.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister say a word as to the development of the drug treatment of this disease? There was some discussion last year. There has been much public discussion of the use of penicillin and it may be that the public has been led to expect more of it than it is entitled to. I think the committee would be interested to know what, in the view of the department, has been the progress made with new drug treatments.

Mr. CLAXTON: The purpose of the vote is to distribute arsenicals for the treatment of venereal disease on our basis which has been worked out and stated in the regulations. Arsenicals are used for the treatment of syphilis. I do not think the hon. member would wish me to go into the standard treatment. This vote has been in existence since 1938. Distribution is made to the provinces and it largely meets the need. With regard to penicillin, it is available in increasingly large quantities for all purposes and has proved efficacious in the treatment of one type of disease. It is rapid and its effects a complete cure as far as we know.

Mr. FLEMING: Will this item be used simply for distribution of arsenicals or is any penicillin provided under it?

Mr. CLAXTON: Consideration is being given to the provision of penicillin, but there are reasons which differentiate it from the arsenicals. There are reasons why the arsenicals should be made available through the federal department and penicillin not. We are giving further consideration to the question.

National health branch—
218. Dental health division, $56,785.

Mr. FLEMING: This item contains, under the heading of "publicity and information", an increase from $2,000 in the previous year to $30,000. Will the minister give a breakdown? We need not bother with last year's expenditure, but I think we should have a breakdown of the contemplated expenditure under this item for the current year.

Mr. CLAXTON: This division was established late in 1945, and the amount of $2,000 which was sought in the estimates was to cover publicity contingencies, but no complete programme was worked out at that time. The $30,000 is now asked to cover the purchase of two films, one to encourage dental health among children, and the other an instructional film for use of public health nurses and school nurses. That will take up almost the total amount asked for.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
219. Hospital design division, $72,516.

Mr. BLAIR: The amount has been increased substantially since last year. Is it the purpose of the minister to afford architectural experience or help to municipalities that wish to build a hospital? Is the architect free? Suppose a municipality wanted to build a hospital; would the department advise them and send the architects to look over the plan or to produce a plan.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. The hon. member for Lanark has correctly described the purpose of the division. It was created in consequence of a resolution passed at a meeting of the dominion council of health held in May, 1945. That council consists of the deputy ministers of health of the dominion and the provinces and some laymen. The resolution recommended that this department be established and devolped to provide a special service for the purpose of advising the provinces in respect of the planning and building of modern, practical and reasonably priced public institutions including tuberculosis, mental, convalescent, and general hospitals and public health and other clinics, old age homes and so forth, to collect and tabulate and make available all the latest information on the subject, to be prepared to study problems of construction, and to advise on the planning of buildings and the development of minimum standards as a guide for future types of public institutions. That is a very large programme, and it is intended to achieve this through the appointment, which has been made, of a well-qualified architect. He will also concern himself with the devlopment of plans for the department's own hospitals, advise the other departments of the federal government with regard to hospital design, equip himself by looking at hospitals that have already been built, of different types in different parts of Canada, the United States and other countries; and otherwise acquire the knowledge necessary to develop standard types of design and specifications for different sizes and different types of hospitals. These will then be available to any province or municipality or private hospital which desires to build in order to put their plans and specifications in the hands of their own architect, thus enabling him to start with something from which he can work in order to meet the needs of the particular type of hospital and locality concerned. It will be a free service to facilitate the design and construction of hospitals in the various communities. It is important because it is estimated that to fill the needs of Canada there will have to be an amount ranging from $125 million to $200 million of hospital construction over the next ten years. It is thought that this service will be of use in that connection.

Mr. BLAIR: The architect in charge of the building of a hospital will have the benefit of consultation?

Mr. CLAXTON: He will be available and provide typical plans, et cetera.

Mr. BLAIR: He will not do the work himself?

Mr. CLAXTON: No, that would be done by the local architect.

Mr. HAZEN: Have any of the provinces already consulted with this department about the construction of buildings? If so, what provinces have consulted, and what is the type of buildings regarding which they have consulted the dominion?

Mr. CLAXTON: The chief of the division was appointed only on February 25, 1946, and so far has been busily engaged in planning the design of three hospitals for this department, so that he is just beginning to make available material of interest to the provinces. We hope to develop knowledge on the subject quickly.

Mr. HAZEN: Was the $28,150 voted last year all expended?

Mr. CLAXTON: The amount expended last year was $1,268.98. The position could not be filled until the year was practically over.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
220. Mental health division, $32,285.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to support this item and to compliment the minister on increasing it. A short time ago I had occasion to go to the psychiatric hospital in Toronto near Queen's Park to see a friend who I had not known was sick. Apparently the party I have in mind had a mental breakdown. That was the first occasion on which I had to go to such a hospital, and while there I made it my business to inquire, as much as I could, into what the hospital was doing. I had conversations on other visits and learned that Doctor Clarence W. Hincks was the head of the committee on national mental hygiene, in Toronto, perhaps for all Canada. I arranged to get in touch with him because I was anxious to learn as much as I could about the programme of mental hygiene. I had a conference with Doctor Hincks and made a short memorandum consisting of a number of his statements. I shall read four of them. They are as follows:

(a) That one out of every ten persons examined for the armed services was mentally affected or afflicted.

(b) That thirty-five per cent of illness is attributed to mental disorder of some kind;

(c) That there are only ten mental clinics in Canada to take care of the problem;

(d) That the services to combat the problem are inadequate.

He did not blame anybody for that. I gathered that this is more or less a new conception. I gathered that only in the last two or three years has a department really made an effort to deal with the problem.

Mr. CLAXTON: This is the first year.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then what I was informed was correct. I shall re-read (d):

That the services to combat the problem are inadequate.

I am going to deal with each one of these items, but not from any knowledge I have. I was very happy to read almost a complete description of these four headings in the Toronto Star of last evening. Here is what the Star said in an editorial:

A third of all discharges from the armed forces in Canada were due to psychiatric disabilities.

That bears out what I have been told by Doctor Hincks.

Over ten million persons in the United States require hospitalization for mental illness, but adequate institutions are not available.

[Mr. Claxton.]

That bears out heading (b). I am not reading these remarks consecutively as they are written in the Star, but consecutively to suit the headings I have before me. I continue:

It is deplorable that known methods for the cure and prevention of mental disease are not being applied on an adequate scale. Hospitals for mental disorders are many of them understaffed, overcrowded, ill-equipped and in old buildings unsuitable for modern therapy.

In one year the minister, of course, has not had time to overcome such a big problem; but I am glad to know that the programme is greatly expanding and is to be greatly enlarged. I continue with the Star's editorial:

If the curative and preventive measures developed during the war were applied many now in hospitals might be restored to normal society; many more might be prevented from requiring institutional care.

When I visited that hospital some few weeks ago I had no notion that mental hygiene was of such importance, or that our mental problem was of such a magnitude. In this connection I read to-day an article entitled "The Problem of Prison After-Care," by J. Alex. Edmison, K.C., executive secretary, prisoners' rehabilitation society of Ontario. In the article I found some interesting figures which bear out what I have already said. The article states:

In the annual report upon the prisons and reformatories of the province of Ontario for 1945 it was shown that during the year 2,810 inmates had been in the Ontario reformatory at Guelph. Of these 10·13 per cent were mental defectives . . .

I am glad the Minister of Justice is in his seat because I shall likely be repeating some of this material when his estimates are up for consideration, particularly in connection with the matter he referred to last year on prison reform. I continue:

Of these 10·13 per cent were mental defectives, 14·04 per cent were borderline, 32·79 per cent dull normal.

The evidence from the prison bears out what I read in the Toronto Star article and supports the four headings into which I divided the remarks of Doctor Hincks.

I am happy to notice that this item has been increased. I trust that the programme the minister has in mind will be greatly expanded and that this disease which appears to be a great scourge, something which I had not known of before, or that we had such a great percentage of people who are mental defectives, will be vigorously attacked. I remember what Doctor Hincks said, namely, that if the disease could be caught when people are young the effect of it in after years could be greatly overcome if not wholly eliminated. Therefore I wish to repeat that this item has my undivided support.

I know nothing whatever about medicine. I am sure the hon. member for Lanark could give a much clearer talk on this subject than I can. I am happy to know that the hon. member for Lanark is a medical man. I am pleased to note that every time he speaks in the house the press gives him wide publicity because they know that he knows what he is talking about. I was also glad to note what the hon. member for Broadview said this evening. He is modest in his statements; but I know that the hon. member for Broadview, who was the mayor of Toronto for seven terms, was the father of the well-known, highly-commended medical department of the city of Toronto. I believe he was responsible for urging the late Doctor Hastings to become the head of that department, and everybody knows that Doctor Hastings did a good job.

I wish to compliment Doctor Hincks who, as I have learned from other sources, devotes his entire time to this work, but not for the remuneration that he gets out of it. I was told by a gentleman who was well acquainted with him that Doctor Hincks was offered a large salary to go to New York and carry on mental hygiene work there, but being a Canadian and a lover of the great city in which he lives he decided to concentrate his life's work to that city. I am sure that the minister knows about that great work. I have heard Doctor Hincks speak very highly of the minister. He has a splendid board supporting him. The president of that board is a man whose name has been mentioned earlier this evening, Major General G. Brock Chisholm. The vice-president is Sir Ellsworth Flavelle, bart. The treasurers are Philip S. Fisher and Fred Page Higgins; the latter is the only one I know, and he is an estimable man. The scientific adviser is Professor D. Ewen Cameron. The medical director is Doctor J. D. Griffin, and there is a long list of eminent men who are directors, whose names I shall not take time to read. Perhaps I should mention one who is no doubt well known to the minister, Mr. Morris W. Wilson, C.M.G., chairman, who I believe, lives in Montreal. The list also includes Mr. Norman J. Dawes, Mr. William F. Angus, and quite a number of others, including Doctor F. Cyril James.

That is all I have to say about this matter. As I said a moment ago, personally I know nothing about it, but I became enthusiastic by what I heard, and I was greatly pleased with the improvement in the health of the person I went to the psychiatric hospital to see. If the psychiatric hospital can do that sort of work, can bring about a restoration such as I saw in the person I went to see, a person well up in years, I have a pretty clear conception of what can be done if this type of illness is treated in time.

Mr. BLAIR: Ontario, in common with the other provinces, takes care of its own mental cases. While it is true there is a shortage of beds for mental cases in this province, still it is a fact that psychiatry is really a new science, and a large percentage of the people going into these mental institutions are cured. They are not called crazy people any more. It is recognized now that people can suffer from mental illness as well as from any other kind of illness. I should like, however, to ask a question of the minister, in view of the fact that the care of mental cases falls on the provinces. Of what benefit will be this amount of $32,000? How is it to be expended by the dominion government in connection with mental illness?

Mr. CLAXTON: The purpose is to make available to the provinces, the municipalities and local institutions technical advice on matters of mental health. The chief of the division is to give a series of lectures to public health institutes, doctors, nurses and so on. Already he has given those lectures in British Columbia, where he gave a two-day institute for workers in Vancouver. The division is to act as a clearing house for the provinces in matters of professional information and to provide them with information as to the availability of personnel for all classes of mental health work. A directory is being prepared. The division will plan, in consultation with the provinces, adequate preventive measures and treatment facilities. It will stimulate parent education across the country by making available literature and other educational material to direct the attention of parents to the advisability of seeing to it that the mental health of their children is looked after as well as their physical health. It will carry on the education of the public. It will encourage research in the field of mental health.

This is not designed to be in any sense a large division. It will have a chief and a clerical staff, and I think that is all. Just one doctor will be available in the way I have described. The situation with respect to mental health is described at some length in the green book, the reference paper, "Health, Welfare and Labour," where full statistics are given showing the incidence of these conditions across Canada and the need for a great deal more work in this field. The proposals of the dominion government did include a substantial grant for mental health among the health grants which were proposed, which was to be increased to a total of $6,000,000 a year distributed among the provinces in accordance with population. That was to be a conditional grant. This division will work closely with the Canadian council on mental hygiene, to which the hon. member for Davenport referred.

Mr. BLAIR: I am still not clear on the tie-up with the provinces. Since they produce their own personnel for the hospitals, and the psychiatrists, I am not clear on the part played by this division in giving advice on matters of mental hygiene.

Mr. CLAXTON: I thought I gave a full answer.

Mr. BLAIR: There was just the one point, about giving advice to the provinces.

Mr. CLAXTON: The director will be available to give advice. Already in one case, that of British Columbia, he has given a course of lectures on this subject, and I think that illustrates the way in which he will be available. The division will also act in the interchange of information between the provinces, so that they may exchange professional and technical information and information as to personnel.

Mr. FLEMING: Following up that point, did any of the provinces request that this service be provided? As I understand it, this dominion service is of recent origin. How did it come about? Was it at the concerted request of the provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON: In this sense only, that in 1944 the provinces were called into consultation in regard to the health insurance bill then being considered by the social security committee, and that bill provided for health grants, including the mental health grant to which I have referred. After spending three days in Ottawa, the representatives of the provinces made a number of suggestions with regard to those proposals, and then it was understood that they agreed to them. It was quite obvious that the federal government could not arrive at a plan for the distribution of any such sum as four or five, six or seven million dollars to assist in mental health work unless it had its own professional adviser in that field; and at that time the question of such an appointment was considered. As far as I know, that is the only way the provinces might have known this appointment was under way. I think it was implied in the extent of the project which was under discussion.

[Mr. Claxton.]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would it be correct to understand that an attempt is made to avoid duplication of expert opinion? Is there an attempt by the dominion to get experts of different kinds who will not be in any way duplicating the provincial work, so that it might be considered an addition to the field; or might one find there is duplication?

Mr. CLAXTON: I think I can assure the hon. member that there is no duplication; that the functions we have in mind for the various divisions of the department involve no duplication whatever. The various divisions are charged with the work of securing the interchange of information between the provinces. Attached to almost every division in the department there is an interprovincial committee or a committee of professional experts with representatives from each province. In that way the divisions of the federal government provide machinery whereby views are interchanged and plans are coordinated. I have not known of any case in which there has been any duplication at all.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then is it quite clear that the dominion has become a sort of channel of communication between the provinces, and that the provinces find it more convenient to communicate with each other through the dominion than directly; or are there two parallel lines of communication?

Mr. CLAXTON: The fact is that through these agencies such as the dominion council on health, the Canadian council on nutrition, the national physical fitness council, the advisory committees to the division of food and drugs, the conference of workers on venereal disease, people from the provinces meet at Ottawa, exchange views, receive information and give advice. That is the way in which a large part of the work of the department is carried on. That is, we are in communication with them and they are in communication with us. Then the representatives of the provinces or of professional associations meet at Ottawa and exchange views. It is the best way we know of in which the work in different fields can be coordinated throughout Canada. But it is largely the result of consultation and discussion.

Mr. CARDIFF: I do not know whether the same condition applies throughout Canada, but in most county homes I believe at least a third of the cases could be classified as bordering on mental. Is any assistance given in that regard?

Mr. CLAXTON: No assistance is given by the dominion. That was the kind of assistance contemplated in the dominion government's proposals under which grants totalling $7 million might be made, for assistance in providing care for mental cases. That money would have been paid to the provinces, and distributed through various types of institutions within those provinces. But at present there is no such provision.

National health branch—
221. Blindness control division, $42,566.

Mr. FLEMING: This item contemplates an increase from $10,520 to $42,566. What expansion in programme will there be?

Mr. CLAXTON: The largest single item is an increase of $19,000 to cover the cost of medical specialists' fees in connection with a survey of blind pensioners, together with the cost of treatment of some of those pensioners whose vision may be benefited by medical or surgical procedure as indicated by the findings of the survey. This is part of a programme we have set under way, under which we hope to find out what proportion of blindness can be prevented or cured by treatment.

In the proposals to the provinces we offered to contribute 50 per cent of the cost of providing treatment, where that treatment might result in preventing or curing blindness, by operation or other means. As it is, we are going to continue the survey so as to find out the causes of blindness, what proportion can be treated, and carry on some test work to see how much it will cost to do a really big job in that field, with the hope of reducing the number of blind people from the substantial number there are in Canada to-day. It is believed that expenditures by the dominion and the provinces on this work would ultimately result in a reduction in the amount of pensions payable to blind persons.

Mr. FLEMING: Will that survey involve original research work? Will that not be done in provincial institutions? We are concerned lest the programme contemplated by the minister's department might result in a duplication of the work now being carried on. How will the proposed expansion of expenditures under the item meet a need not at present being met by work done by the provinces?

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe it is correct to say that at present no one is charged with finding out from medical files what the causes of blindness are, from a statistical point of view. This is largely a statistical operation, but it must be done by doctors. It is believed that this is the only way in which the information can be obtained. The work was started some time ago, and this is for an extension of that work. We hope through this means—the only means we know of—to find out all there is to know about causes of blindness in Canada, and to estimate what proportion might be cured by treatment or operation. This is not a duplication of work being carried on anywhere.

Mr. FLEMING: Is the work being done by persons on the staff of the department, or are expert research workers being retained for the purpose?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not think the expression "research workers" would be exact.

Mr. FLEMING: Statisticians, then.

Mr. CLAXTON: This $19,000 additional is to provide payment to specialists who will do the survey work.

Mr. FLEMING: Specialists outside the department?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are six items in the division, and I am not objecting to any of them, because in my view the work supposed to be done is most desirable. The point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton is worthy of consideration. Is there cooperation between the minister's department and the various provincial departments in these matters, or are they matters which are outside provincial departments altogether?

Mr. CLAXTON: The situation is that of the 12,652 known blind people in Canada, some 6,882 were on pension as of January 1, 1946. We have records in the old age pensions office relative to each of those pensioners. Our aim is to go over those records, and also to go over the records of other agencies to find out the causes of blindness in Canada. There is no duplication in the work.

National health branch—
222. Tuberculosis control division, $32,051.

Mr. BRYCE: I do not rise to criticize the minister, but rather to appeal to him for support. I was sorry that the dominion-provincial conference failed, because I had hoped that we would receive from that conference some support in the control of this terrible scourge which sweeps the country.

In Manitoba one person dies each twenty-four hours from tuberculosis. That is a heavy deathrate. I have told the house before just how bad it is. When we send tuberculosis-tested cows to the north country we find that the people give the cows the disease before they are there three months. That is how bad the condition is. I have read in the newspapers where this matter has been discussed by provincial governments, but we find that very little has been done for the control of the disease.

I am pleased to note that another $15,000 is being set aside for that purpose. However, that is not nearly enough. The disease in the northern part of my constituency is spreading like wildfire. I know of one poll consisting of 120 voters. There are about 200 people in the settlement, and it was found that of that number there were seventy-two people infected with tuberculosis. There were twenty-one at home. At the last report eleven were active and probably would require treatment; three needed further investigation and eighteen were reported as having communicable diseases. When you have seventy-two out of 200 people in one little settlement in this condition you can realize how serious it is. This matter was brought up in the Manitoba provincial house by Mr. Hamilton, who represents a northern constituency, and Mr. Richards, but they do not seem to be able to do anything. This is a matter for the dominion to tackle. The dominion will have to step in and do something about it.

I do not want the committee to think I am speaking only about Indians because this is a mixed population. I hope something will be done, because people who go up there and work come back and find that there is something wrong with them. It is so easy to get this disease. I appeal to the minister to try to provide more money to control this disease in the north country, because it is worse there than in the southern parts of the province.

Mr. KNIGHT: I should like to congratulate the minister upon increasing the amount being made available to deal with this scourge of tuberculosis. We have been fighting tuberculosis quite successfully in the province from which I come. Of course, we have no monopoly upon what we are doing, since this is general throughout the country.

I wanted to speak about something not altogether connected with the disease. I should like to draw to the attention of the minister certain privileges which are denied to people confined in sanitaria. I refer to the exercise of the franchise. Prior to the last dominion election this caused considerable trouble in my constituency. The electoral act does not appear to be clear on the matter, and the electoral officers at that particular time seemed unable to give a clear definition of the act. As I say, they did not seem to be sure on the matter, and the information we received at different times prior to the election was quite conflicting. As I understand the act, it provides that people in charitable institutions—I want to protest now against the use of that word—and inmates of sanitaria were to be deprived of the right to vote. As I contended when dealing with citizenship, the right to vote should be irrevocable, and I want to protest as forcibly as I can against the disenfranchisement of anyone unfortunate enough to be afflicted with tuberculosis.

We attempted to have the inmates of a sanitarium in my city enfranchised. We wired the electoral officer several times, and finally we were told that only those who had been in residence for a period of twelve months and had no hope of getting back to their constituencies could vote. We thought that was perfectly clear and we rejoiced when the telegram came through, but it is a sad commentary upon the stupidity of some of the returning officers in this country when I say that they interpreted that to mean that only those could vote who had been in residence for a period of twelve months and were considered to be incurable. After further wiring, we were able to change their minds, and we were permitted to take those people out to vote who had been certified by the doctors to be able to go.

Tuberculosis is not like other diseases and that is one reason why those patients who have been certified by the doctors to be able to do so should be able to go out to vote. I appeal to the minister to use his influence in this particular matter. I see no reason why the electoral act should not be amended to permit or even to compel the setting up of polling booths in these institutions, so that the inmates could vote without sacrificing their comfort or running the risk of aggravating their condition.

Mr. BLAIR: I notice that we have the same situation here as existed in connection with the other matter. When I was discussing the matter of research in tuberculosis two or three weeks ago I got into an argument with the hon. member for Mackenzie. I have here a copy of my local paper, the Perth Courier, and the editor has plastered the whole front page with the statement that free tuberculosis clinics are being provided. That is what is being done in Ontario, and they are doing the same thing in Saskatchewan. I cannot see why $32,000 is necessary when the provinces have control of their own tuberculosis campaigns and their own sanitaria.

Mr. CLAXTON: The answer I would give to the hon. member for Lanark is exactly the same answer that I made with regard to mental health. The relation of the medical officer to be appointed with respect to tuberculosis is the same as the relation of the medical officer appointed with regard to mental hygiene. The positions are exactly the same; the divisions set up are similar, and the provisions for salaries are the same.

Mr. BLAIR: Would the medical officer consult with the Ontario department of health? Would he go out to the Lady Grey or up to the Muskoka sanitarium in order to give advice?

Mr. CLAXTON: He would if he were called in, and he would also be available in connection with work in other provinces. It is easy for any persons coming from Ontario to feel that they are able to look after their own health matters. That is so to a marked degree, but the same situation does not apply in some of the other provinces where the need with respect to certain diseases is much greater than that of Ontario. None of these officers would do work on patients in a province, but they would be available to work with the province in a consultative capacity.

National health branch—

223. Advertising and labels division, $70,463.

Mr. FLEMING: In this item we have an increase from $13,000 to $70,000. Would the minister indicate just what the programme is that would justify this increase in expenditure?

Mr. MacINNIS: Perhaps the hon. member would allow the minister to tell us just what this item covers, just what this branch of his department does? Perhaps the hon. member for Eglinton knows, but I must plead ignorance and I should like to have the minister explain.

Mr. CLAXTON: The Food and Drugs Act is one of the oldest acts dealing with any matter affecting health which the department has to administer. It antedates confederation. There are extensive provisions in the act to protect the public against fraud and against injury to health, and not only for maintaining a service to ensure the purity of food and drugs but also to review the labelling and advertising of food and drugs. There are provisions in the act and in the regulations made in consequence of the act requiring that all packaged food and drugs be labelled and their contents be shown. These provisions are enforced by the enforcement officers of the division. There is also a considerable amount of work involved in ensuring that the advertising matter does not make unjust or unfair claims. That requires close cooperation with those engaged in the production of food and drugs, and with advertising agencies and others who have to deal with advertising.

This division also reviews all radio scripts advertising food or drugs. It makes the cases on which prosecutions under the Food and Drugs Act for contraventions in respect to labelling and advertising are instituted. During the last year it has been working at a code which it is proposed to discuss with those engaged in the trade, in the hope that they will largely enforce this. It is also assembling a series of administrative decisions on the use that may be made of various words and so as to establish uniform practices by those who want to advertise.

The division has hitherto operated under two or three different branches of the department. Those have been assembled this year in one division, known as the advertising and labels division. That is the reason for the increase. There is also an increase in salaries—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You mean that the $13,000 shown for last year is not strictly comparable with the range of work covered by the $70,000 for this year?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is right, but I should add that there is a considerable increase in the provision for salaries, with additional staff.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister has already pointed out that this thing has been going on for many years now, and we like to think that the work has been conducted reasonably efficiently up to the present time. I was going to ask, therefore, why the item has gone up six times, but that question is not applicable after what the minister has just said. It would, however, be well to know just why it has gone up, and to have figures which are comparable.

Mr. CLAXTON: I will repeat that this division is brought into existence through the assembly in one division of work that has hitherto been carried in various divisions. The first vote that was ever made to this division was $13,000. That was in the supplementaries for last year, but it represents only a portion of the year's work.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not quite understand. Why are we not given the whole picture? Let me make this comment. I do not want to appear to be quibbling, but we should all face the fact that when you set up a new department you set up a new kingdom, and a lot of people are continually wanting to extend that kingdom. While these are small amounts, nevertheless we should have a look at them and make sure that we are getting value for these items, and the only way in which we can make sure is to have the figures presented in such a way that we can make a strict comparison and know exactly what is going on. As the hon. member for Vancouver East said the other evening—and I considered it wise—these discussions either mean something or they do not.

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall be glad to get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. BRACKEN: The columns of figures showing the expenditures for last year and this ought to be as strictly comparable as they can be made. From what the minister has just said, these are not strictly comparable so far as this particular item is concerned, and wherever that occurs I think a detailed explanation ought to be made by the minister. Otherwise the comparison set out in the two columns is of no value to us. Where the two columns are not strictly comparable, the first explanation the minister should make is that they are not comparable and are not intended to be. If the different ministers have submitted their estimates in this way I think they ought to look over the figures that have been given to us for, as one hon. member said, either they mean something or they do not. This particular comparison is valueless.

Mr. CLAXTON: Hon. members must recognize that when a new department is formed and takes over the functions of an old department and fits them into the work of the new department, necessary adjustments must be made as it is established. When we planned the work of the department in October, 1944, it was without any administrative staff, and it was not until March 31, 1945, that we were able to establish separate books and begin our own operations. Then the estimates came on in November, 1945, before there was a fully developed administrative staff and before we had had even one full year's operating experience. In view of that, some adjustments were necessary, and these adjustments I am ready to explain. I have answered every question that has been put and I shall be glad to answer any other questions. The item before us is due to the fact that the work which it is proposed to carry on under the advertising and labels division was hitherto carried on by the dominion analyst as part of his functions and with his office and by the director of public health service as part of his functions and with his staff. It was found that the work had developed, and there were complaints from the trade with regard to the efficiency and fairness of administration and the speed with which answers were given. It was felt that it was necessary to establish a new division and this vote is put in for the first time to do that. The explanation that I gave before, that the only time the vote appeared was in the supplementary estimates, being $13,000, is quite correct. If there are any items which appear in this vote of $70,463, which were taken out of the votes for other divisions and appeared under other columns in previous estimates, I shall be glad to let the leader of the opposition know, or on the other hand I shall let him know if this represents an entirely new expenditure over and above the $13,000 put into the supplementaries last year.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister bring in the actual expenditures in the last fiscal year on comparable items?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, if there are any.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, June 17, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE PRIME MINISTER

EXPRESSIONS OF WELCOME ON RETURN FROM OVERSEAS

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure all members of the house are glad to see that the Prime Minister's seat is once again occupied by the Prime Minister himself. On behalf of the official opposition I wish to extend to him a cordial welcome back to Canada and to the House of Commons. I am glad to see that he is looking well after his trip. I trust that he has found his trip not only useful but pleasant as well. I may say to him that during his absence we have done our best to keep the government on the straight and narrow path of rectitude, but in that we have been only partly successful. We have saved up a few things for his consideration on his return, among others such minor matters as the budget, redistribution, and so forth. For these reasons I am sure that those who sit at his back will be as glad as we are in the opposition to welcome him home.

As a matter of interest, the Prime Minister returned on a ship which, according to the papers, carried two thousand brides. I would be the last to offer the Prime Minister any advice in his domestic affairs, and I suppose I would be the last from whom he would accept any such advice, but having failed at least in one respect during his threescore years and ten, I am sure the Canadian people would not have objected had that ship contained two thousand and one brides.

Again let me say on behalf of the official opposition that we cordially welcome the Prime Minister, and we look forward to the report of his visit overseas.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): It is unnecessary for me to add anything to what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has said. We join with him in his welcome to the Prime Minister. We are glad to see him back, and for a change we agree with all that the leader of the opposition said.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): May I join with the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken in welcoming the Prime Minister, and say that I have been looking forward to his return ever since he left, because I am still very much concerned about the hot weather. I am happy he is here again, because it augurs well for some speed in getting through the work of the session, so that we shall not have to sit here through the heat of the summer. We are pleased to see him looking so well.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I need scarcely say I am indeed deeply touched by the welcome extended to me this afternoon on my return from a journey overseas. May I at once thank my hon. friends, the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other parties who have spoken, for the cordial manner in which they have extended greetings on their own behalf and on behalf of their followers. May I say to the members of my own party, to my colleagues in the government and to our supporters, how delighted I am to be back again helping to share with them in the solution of some of the problems and in helping to bear some of the burdens which they have been carrying exclusively, during the time that I have been away.

I should like to say a word of thanks to the house for giving me the opportunity, which I have had in the last five weeks, of paying a very memorable visit to the old country. The main purpose of the visit hon. members know was to participate in the proceedings of the conference of prime ministers which had commenced some weeks before I left, but which had been adjourned in order to give me the opportunity of joining with the premiers of the other nations of the commonwealth in reviewing situations and problems of common interest. I found that opportunity of exceptional value.

I shall keep in mind the wish expressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) that I should report to the house on the conference at a later and more appropriate stage, but at this moment I should like to express very warmly my appreciation of the many courtesies extended by the government of the United Kingdom, and in particular by the Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, and the secretary of state for dominion affairs, Lord Addison; also of the courtesies extended by their colleagues, and the facilities that were afforded for gaining first-hand information on imporantant public matters from as many sources as possible during the period of my stay.

My absence covered a period of five weeks. Two weeks were spent in the trip to and fro. I want to express appreciation of the opportunity that was thereby afforded to get a little rest and, while taking the ocean voyage and having the benefit of the sea air for that length of time, to reflect on many questions which are of real concern to us all. The three weeks in London were necessarily very much occupied with the proceedings of the conference and with consultations with different members of the government. During that period I also had the opportunity of witnessing the marvellous victory parade which took place in that city. That parade I believe will prove a line of demarcation between the past and its associations with war, and the future with its outlook for better conditions for human society. I wish all hon. members might have been privileged as I was to witness that parade. From what they have seen in the illustrated papers of views of the mechanized colum, they must realize something of the tremendous power it was necessary for the nations of the commonwealth and allied nations to exert in order to defend freedom and civilization from the enemies who were seeking to overthrow them. Similarly from a view of the marching column one got a fuller appreciation of the tremendous contribution made by the manhood and womanhood of the different free nations toward victory. It has secured the condition we have in the world to-day which, though still one of unrest, is free from actual war. Looking beneath the surface one could not but feel deeply the tremendous burden mankind seems to have had placed upon its shoulders in the recent past, and could not but wonder what will happen to human society if soon we do not find some way of effecting peace and good will among the nations of the world.

I should like to say a special word about the place our contingents, of the navy, the army and the air force, held in that memorable procession on the occasion of the victory parade. The Canadian contingents were recognized immediately by the multitudes along the streets and were given a wonderful reception. I was never in my life prouder of being a citizen of Canada than as I witnessed that parade, and reflected upon the position which Canada holds in the eyes of other nations as a result of the great part our defence forces have played in preserving the liberty of the world. May I add that I was never more grateful that this country is a member of the great community of nations which constitutes the British commonwealth and empire than I am at this moment, as a result of what I have seen and learned in a more intimate way in the course of this last visit. This is a time when all of us who love freedom cannot be bound together too closely by every possible bond that will cement relations between nations; and we are fortunate indeed in belonging to a great community of free nations which, in free combination with the powerful forces of the United States, have done and will, I believe, continue to do more to preserve freedom than would be possible in any other way.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that on the way overseas or coming back I was not able to improve the opportunity along the lines suggested by my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition. But may I say that while I believe threescore years and ten are something of a handicap, I have not yet lost hope that there may be opportunities of happiness for myself and others, which he apparently so greatly desires should be mine.

I was deeply impressed while away by what I learned of the very serious condition of the world at the present time. It may seem a commonplace in the light of what has been stated from various sources to say it, but one could not participate in conferences such as we had, or have the privilege as was mine of conversing with those who have inside knowledge of the situation, without realizing that at this moment the situation in the world is in some respects as difficult as it has been at any time in history. In England, to appearances at least, there has been some improvement. Outwardly at least the people look better; there is a note of hope, and a happier expression on their countenances. But they know that all the fortitude which was required during the war is still required to carry them through the situation facing them at the present time, and anything that can be done on this side I know will be appreciated over there more than words can express.

May I add that it does seem to me conditions in central Europe are deteriorating rapidly and greatly. Undoubtedly conditions are better in Holland, Denmark and Belgium, but they are still very difficult in France and are terrible in parts of Germany. Unless some means can be found whereby the new world, and countries that have supplies of food and clothing, can furnish those supplies to the people of some of the occupied zones and other parts of Europe, there may be conditions of famine, of strife and of turmoil which will amount to something in the nature of the spread of a new revolution throughout Europe. I think I am not wrong in giving that as an impression—not from what I have seen in Europe, because unfortunately I did not have the chance to pay the personal visit that I had hoped I might, but from what I have gathered from those who have inside information.

The last word I should like to say at the moment is that, as far as one can judge what will go farther than anything else in helping to meet present world conditions is increased production and more effective distribution. The need in Europe to-day is to get industry under way, to get people at work. There is the prospect of a good harvest, but in some areas it has been impossible thus far to find any means whereby large numbers who should be employed can be given work, because of lack of fuel, food and transportation. Anything that can be done in the world to-day to furnish the necessities of life to those parts of Europe which are in dire need will not only mean salvation for them, but may well be in the nature of salvation for the world as a whole.

STANDING ORDERS

Third report of the standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. MacLean.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ACQUISITION OF MANITOBA RAILWAY

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 194, respecting Canadian National Railways and the acquisition of the Manitoba Railway.

He said: Mr. Speaker, by virtue of this bill the Canadian National Railways seeks authority from the house to purchase the Manitoba Railway. The Manitoba Railway is an amalgamation of The Northern Pacific and Manitoba Railway company, the Winnipeg Transfer Railway company, the Portage and Northwestern Railway company and the Waskada and Northeastern Railway company. In the year 1901 these railway companies, the names of which I have just mentioned, leased to the crown in the right of the province of Manitoba their railways and undertaking, for a period of 999 years. The lease was afterwards assigned by the province of Manitoba to the Canadian Northern Railway company; and the Canadian Northern Railway company is part of the Canadian National Railways. One of the terms of the lease referred to in 1901 provided for payment of an annual rental of $300,000 per year. That has been paid by the Canadian National Railways, since its purchase of the assignment of the lease.

The lease also contained an option to purchase the railway for $7 million, and the Canadian National Railways now seek the right, by virtue of the assignment of the lease, to purchase the railway at the price mentioned. This purchase will mean a substantial saving to the Canadian National Railways, and a consequent reduction in its fixed charges. The committee on railways and shipping, in its consideration of the 1946 budget of the Canadian National Railways, approved the expenditure of this money.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Has the minister considered the purchase of the Cumberland Railway and Coal company, operating from Springhill to Parrsboro in Nova Scotia, and the Maritime Power, Coal and Railway company, from Maccan to Joggins in Nova Scotia?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The bill has no reference to the matter the hon. member has mentioned. It seeks power only to purchase the Manitoba Railway, which has some 353 miles of line, as its undertaking.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GREAT LAKES SHIPPING

Mr. CHURCH:

1. 3. Was any reply given thereto by the government or any officer thereof? If so, by whom?

[Mr. Hodgson.]

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes.

2. From His Worship Mayor R. H. Saunders, addressed to the Minister of Labour on June 7. The text of Mayor Saunders telegram was as follows:

"In my opinion a national emergency is being created by the seamen's strike. For the last 24 hours I have endeavoured to communicate with Alderman Ferguson, vice-president of the seamen's union, seeking his co-operation to have the grain and coal boats operate. As you know, prior to the strike, there was already a grave situation with regard to the shortage of coal. This is, of course, becoming increasingly serious and presents a dangerous situation for the people of this and other cities throughout the dominion and next winter.

Last year, 1,735,000 tons were delivered to this city by ship, of which 418,849 tons arrived prior to June 6, 1945. My information is that so far this year we have received only 97,440 tons. I am further advised that scores of thousands of tons are waiting to be placed on the boats. I am also informed there is no way in which the shortage to date can be made up.

Realizing these conditions and looking forward to extreme difficulty the coming winter season for the people whom I represent I ask most emphatically that our government take over and operate the ships carrying grain and coal so that our people will be assured of at least some protection during the coming months and particularly during next winter.

I would be pleased with an immediate reply."

3. Yes; on June 8 and June 11 by the Minister of Labour.

3. Letters have been sent to the mayors in each city stating that the government has given consideration to the requests for extension of financial aid to day nurseries but has decided to discontinue assistance after June 30, 1946. The Ontario government had been notified previously that the dominion contribution would cease on March 31, 1946. However, because of representations made by the province of Ontario the period was extended to June 30, 1946. It is the considered opinion of the government that ample notice has been given and it has been decided not to grant a further extension.

It is submitted that under standing order 51 matters that are required to be produced are those relating to public business and obtainable through public authority but not available in published form.

Mr. POULIOT: All the others were made through his hat.

Question dropped.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PROPOSAL OF UNITED STATES DELEGATE TO COMMISSION—CONSULTATION WITH OTHER GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, as well as to the former acting Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). Was the reported offer of the United States delegate to the atomic energy commission to scrap the atomic bomb monopoly in exchange for a guaranteed world front outlawing the weapons of mass destruction made after consultation with the other two governments including Canada who are in possession of the secrets of atomic energy?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): While there have been numerous informal discussions between the officials of Canada and the United States on questions relating to the international control of atomic energy, there was no specific consultation with the Canadian government on the precise terms of the proposal put before the atomic energy commission by the United States representative.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister if, having read the proposal, the Canadian government is prepared to report on it?

Mr. HOWE: I assume that the situation will receive the consideration of the government in due course.

UNITED NATIONS

BILL OF HUMAN RIGHTS FOR INCORPORATION IN PEACE TREATIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I desire to ask another question. When I drew up this question I was not sure that we should be favoured to-day with the presence of the Prime Minister, and I sent notice of it to the Minister of Justice. I shall direct my question now to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The drafting committee of the united nations economic and social council is reported on Saturday last to have strongly approved a bill of human rights for incorporation into peace treaties with enemy countries. Since Canada has a seat on the council, what position is the Canadian delegate taking with respect to the matter?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): My hon. friend's question was referred to me. While Canada is a member of the economic and social council, I have been informed that the council has not yet received the report from the drafting committee and therefore there has not been an opportunity thus far to consider the contents of the report or the attitude in consequence which Canada should take with reference to the provisions of the bill referred to.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have any instructions gone forward on this point to the delegate?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I say, the draft has not yet been received from the drafting committee. As soon as it is received, instructions will go forward.

COAL

FINANCIAL AID TO OPERATORS TO INCREASE PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Will the minister make a statement to the house at an early date indicating how many Alberta coal mine operators have sought financial aid from federal government agencies in order to increase production, and whether or not such financial assistance has been refused?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I shall be glad to consider the question and make a statement in due course.

Mr. FULTON: Will the minister include British Columbia in the statement that he is to make?

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to do that.

BUILDING MATERIALS

QUESTION OF PRODUCTION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. FLEMING (Eglinton): I should like to ask the right hon. Minister of Reconstruction and Supply if the government is contemplating the manufacture of soil pipe or other building materials?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I presume the question is whether the government itself intends to go into the business. The answer is no.

SHORTAGE OF CEMENT IN SOUTHERN ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance which has to do with the supply of cement. I suppose it should be put to him because I understand the wartime prices and trade board has charge of the matter. Will the Minister of Finance make a statement at an early day explaining why there is a shortage of cement in southern Alberta and whether such a shortage extends into other areas of western Canada?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I am not sure that this is a proper matter on which to make a statement on the orders of the day. If too many statements are made on subjects of this kind, we shall be spending half the afternoon making them. I shall be glad to look into the question and give my hon. friend any information I can get.

BOX FACTORIES AND COOPERAGE PLANTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, in view of the statement just made by the Prime Minister about the necessity of conserving food. Are the box factories and cooperage plants in British Columbia operating to-day? If not, is the Minister of Labour aware that Mr. E. Dalskog, international board member of the I.W.A. union, offered on June 14 to reopen the box plants—

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The purpose of asking a question on the orders of the day is to get information from a minister. A member in putting a question is not supposed to give information.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right. Will the factories be opened to-day under a controller in order to conserve food?

Mr. MITCHELL: The answer to the first question is no. The answer to the second question is no. The answer to the third question is that consideration will be given to the subject matter of my hon. friend's inquiry.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When—next year?

JAPANESE IN CANADA

REPATRIATION TO JAPAN—SAILINGS FROM VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to advise the house that yesterday, June 16, a ship sailed from Vancouver for Japan with 1,106 Japanese repatriates on board. This number combined with the first boatload of 668 persons who sailed on May 31, brings the total of Japanese repatriates who have left Canada to 1,774.

I should add that since these two sailings were arranged several hundred more Japanese in settlement in British Columbia have asked to be repatriated on the same basis, and that efforts are now being made to obtain shipping accommodation for them.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL

STATUTORY AUTHORITY FOR ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution.

That it is expedient to present a measure to make statutory provision for foreign exchange control now exercised under the authority of orders in council passed under the War Measures Act and for that purpose, inter alia, to (a) continue the special exchange fund in the name of the Minister of Finance established under the Exchange Fund Act; (b) establish a foreign control board which will be the successor of the existing foreign exchange control board and have power, under the direction and control of the Minister of Finance, to regulate and control transactions in foreign currencies and related transactions and to manage and operate the exchange fund account; (c) authorize the Minister of Finance to make advances to the exchange fund account out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may prescribe; (d) authorize the payment out of the exchange fund account of such remuneration to authorized dealers as the governor in council may prescribe.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have a lengthy statement to make on this matter,—

Mr. BRACKEN: Would the Minister of Finance permit a question before he starts?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: What is the desire of the minister with respect to this particular measure?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was about to make a suggestion to the committee. As I say, I have to make a long statement at the outset because the bill to be based on this resolution deals with a very important matter, and it is a long bill. If the course is taken which would be most agreeable to me, it will be this: I will make my statement, and as soon as possible afterward, preferably at the conclusion of my statement, the resolution can be reported so that I may introduce the bill and have it given first reading. The house will then have before it the statement, with the table which I shall place on Hansard, and will also have before it the bill. An opportunity should then be given of perhaps a few days or even longer for study of the facts that I have to place before the house. Then we can take up the second reading. That is the course I suggest, but naturally it is not for me to say.

Mr. BRACKEN: I understood that the minister was willing to have this bill go before a committee of the house. Is he willing that it should go to the committee before the second reading?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that course should be taken on a bill such as this. Rarely a small or unimportant bill is referred to a committee without first approving the principle, but I think the principle of a bill as important as this should be approved before it goes to the banking and commerce committee. When it comes back from that committee there will be opportunity to amend it in the committee of the whole and, on the third reading, to defeat it, or move the six months' hoist, if anyone desires to make such a motion. After the second reading I am suggesting that the bill be referred to the banking and commerce committee, as was done with the Bank Act.

Mr. BRACKEN: After second reading?

Mr. ILSLEY: After second reading, yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: So far as the official opposition are concerned we shall be glad to facilitate passage of the measure up to the second reading, on the understanding that there will be an opportunity for study of the bill before the debate on the second reading begins.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall not move the second reading for a few days, because there ought to be an opportunity for hon. gentlemen to study the bill. But I think it is important to get through all these early stages, and I cannot do that without making an extensive speech on the resolution.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is satisfactory.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is well understood that when a measure of this kind is going through the resolution stage there is a wide opportunity for hon. members to ask questions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the minister in a position to guarantee that we shall have an opportunity to ask the questions, whether or not we take time to do it on the resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: My suggestion would be that the questions be asked in the banking and commerce committee. That is by far the best place to ask questions. This is a most inappropriate stage at which to answer, if not to ask, questions on a measure of this kind, because the bill itself is not before the house. It is a 74-section bill. There can be any amount of debate on the second reading—although I hope there will not be any—and every opportunity to ask questions when the bill is taken up section by section in the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the suggestion made by the minister and approved by the leader of the opposition is one that should be followed. Obviously this afternoon we are to have a long statement from the minister on a highly important bill, with much technical detail behind it, if not in the statement itself. It seems to me that when we see this 74-section bill we shall be in a much better position to ask questions about it. It is also usual for the house to adopt the principle of a bill before it goes to a committee, where modifications may be made. I am in favour of the procedure outlined by the minister, that he make his statement, that the bill be then given first reading, and that an opportunity for study of the bill be given before the second reading is proceeded with. After second reading, the bill, I understand, will go to the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this legislation is to provide for the continuance of foreign exchange control. As the committee is aware, exchange control has been in operation in Canada since September 15, 1939, having been introduced by virtue of an order in council passed under the provisions of the War Measures Act.

In asking the committee to approve legislation to continue exchange control, I have felt that I should tell the war-time story of exchange operations and that the committee should have certain information which, for security reasons, was withheld during the war. I have tabled a report of the foreign exchange control board which gives full details and I propose, in introducing this measure, to touch on the high spots of the happenings in this field during the war years. I shall be prepared to make detailed explanations of the various provisions of the bill before the committee at a later stage of the proceedings.

I should like to begin by reminding the committee of the reasons for the original decision to impose exchange control. We were, at the outbreak of war, one of the world's largest debtor countries. One of our main preoccupations was consequently the fear that our international debtor status might interfere with an all-out effort on the economic front—in other words, that exchange shortages, in particular a shortage of United States dollars, might become a bottleneck in the Canadian war effort.

There were three main dangers involved in the situation. First, there was the danger of fluctuations in the exchange rate, with unsettling effects on commodity prices and on business generally. Second, there was the danger that foreign holdings of Canadian securities would be dumped on the Canadian market and the proceeds withdrawn from the country in U.S. dollars with the result that we would be left with insufficient supplies of foreign exchange to cover our war requirements and to meet our normal current and capital obligations as they fell due. Finally, the panicky sale of securities in our market would have been highly detrimental to an orderly programme of war financing. In this respect, the main danger lay, of course, in the very large amounts of our securities held by residents of the United States, at that time a neutral country.

I wish to refer in somewhat greater detail to the anticipated scarcity of U.S. dollars. For some years before the outbreak of war, Canada's international receipts and payments on current account had resulted in a credit balance. Our current receipts of foreign exchange from the export of goods and services and from the production of newly-mined gold exceeded our current payments abroad for imports, interest and dividends on the foreign investment in Canada and other invisible items. This surplus on our current account transactions went, of course, towards improving our international capital position—we were making a start at reducing our large balance of international indebtedness.

The over-all surplus on our current account transactions with the rest of the world in the years just before the outbreak of war was made up, however, of two main elements which are clearly shown in the table on page 6 of the foreign exchange control board report which has been tabled. The United Kingdom was our most important market while the United States was our most important supplier. With the United Kingdom, the rest of the sterling area, and with the continent of Europe, we had a surplus; with the United States we had a deficit. We had to expect that wartime conditions would aggravate the situation in two ways. On the one hand, our deficit with the United States was certain to increase since many of the things required in the war production programme were imported from that country. On the other hand, although our surplus with the United Kingdom was expected to increase as a result of increased shipments from Canada, this surplus would no longer be freely convertible into United States funds in view of the necessary establishment of exchange control by the United Kingdom.

In these circumstances it was clear that we would be hard put to make both ends meet so far as U.S. dollars were concerned and that it would be necessary to supervise all foreign exchange transactions to ensure that the pressure on our U.S. dollar resources was not aggravated as a result of capital withdrawals by non-residents or capital flight by residents. In a statement issued at the time exchange control was imposed, my predecessor, Colonel Ralston, explained that the government had decided that a policy of foreign exchange control was essential to the successful organization of Canada's wartime activities, and that it was necessary during the war to make sure that the country's foreign exchange resources were used in the national interest. He went on to say that the use of Canadian monetary resources for speculation abroad or for other purposes which could not be regarded as necessary or desirable would be bound to hamper Canada's war effort, and should therefore be prevented.

Accordingly, the foreign exchange control order placed in the hands of a board responsible to the Minister of Finance control over all financial transactions between residents of Canada and residents of other countries. The board centralizes the foreign exchange resources of the country and is responsible for seeing that foreign exchange earned as a result of exports, etc. becomes available for the general use of the Canadian economy and that foreign exchange is used only for approved purposes. To discharge this responsibility all international transactions involving more than nominal amounts are brought to the board's attention through a system of permits. The only transactions which are restricted, however, are certain transactions involving the export of capital, such as the sale of securities in Canada by non-residents, and the purchase of U.S. funds by residents for the purpose of acquiring securities or otherwise transferring their capital abroad.

Subject to direction by the Minister of Finance, the foreign exchange control board fixes the rates of exchange for the currencies in which it deals. The board's buying rates for U.S. dollars and sterling have remained completely stable at $1.10 and $4.43 respectively since the beginning of exchange control. The selling rates for these currencies, originally $1.11 and $4.47 respectively, were reduced to $1.10½ and $4.45 last October. I believe that the house will agree that the complete stability of exchange rates which has been maintained since September 1939 has been of great advantage to the Canadian economy. As I shall show later, the swings in the exchange position have been very considerable and if the exchange rate had been left at the mercy of the temporary oscillations of supply and demand it would, I believe, have undergone quite wide and frequent fluctuations.

Although the exchange control had to be comprehensive in order to be effective, I think it is the general view that it has operated with considerable smoothness. Of one thing I am certain, and that is that the board has made the most conscientious effort to exercise its wide powers with prudence and restraint and to avoid giving cause for complaint that its actions were in any sense arbitrary in character or that they imposed unnecessary formalities on the Canadian public.

The early fears regarding shortage of U.S. dollars which led to the imposition of exchange control turned out to be fully warranted. True, for the first seven or eight months we were not subject to particularly strong pressure on our U.S. dollar reserves. There was an adverse balance during this period, but it was largely met out of the gold and U.S. dollars received from the United Kingdom in partial settlement of their deficiency with us. This initial lull provided a welcome opportunity to improve the machinery of exchange control and to explain the necessity for this control to those affected by it so that their cooperation in observing the provisions of the order might be ensured.

The serious pressure on our U. S. dollar reserves developed when Canadian war production got into its stride. When it became apparent that a heavy drain on our U.S. dollar resources was developing, the government passed an order in council on May 1, 1940, the so-called foreign exchange acquisition order, directing that all foreign exchange held by private individuals and corporations should be offered for sale to the foreign exchange control board. By a separate order in council the Bank of Canada was directed to sell to the foreign exchange control board all gold held in unrestricted ownership, and was relieved of its obligation under the Bank of Canada Act to maintain any minimum reserve ratio of gold or foreign exchange to its sight liabilities. Through these measures all the liquid foreign exchange resources of the country, apart from minimum balances needed for the day-to-day conduct of business operations, were concentrated in official hands. The foreign exchange control board took over from the Bank of Canada gold to a U.S. dollar value of $205 million and U.S. dollar balances amounting to $25 million. Privately held U.S. dollars amounting to $57 million were also taken over; this followed on earlier negotiated transfers of U.S. funds from private to official holdings to an amount exceeding $20 million.

The development of our military production programme after Dunkirk necessarily involved heavy expenditures in the United States for machine tools, other capital equipment, aircraft and military equipment and materials and component parts. In addition, the expansion of incomes in Canada led to increased imports of civilian goods. Our dollar earnings failed by far to keep pace with this increase in our dollar expenditures. Exports to the United States increased appreciably but the overrunning of Europe meant the loss of dollar markets and American tourist expenditures in Canada shrank appreciably in 1940.

To help meet the position, a series of exchange conservation measures were taken in 1940. In the budget of that year a war exchange tax of 10 per cent was imposed on all imports from non-sterling area countries. In July 1940 a complete prohibition was imposed on the use of our U.S. dollar resources for pleasure travel in the United States. In December 1940 the War Exchange Conservation Act prohibited the import of a long list of non-essential goods from non-sterling area countries and placed others under import quota. These measures saved considerable quantities of exchange in the aggregate—under the conditions prevailing when they were imposed the annual rate of saving may well have exceeded $150 million. In addition the foreign exchange control board exercised a great deal of ingenuity in devising many ways and means of economizing on U.S. dollar payments and adding to U.S. dollar receipts without interfering with the legitimate business operations of the country.

These steps were, however, not sufficient to stop the drain on our reserves. As the table on page 20 of the report shows, official gold and U.S. dollar reserves, which had already fallen by $72 million in 1940 notwithstanding the receipt of $225 million from the United Kingdom in that year, fell in 1941 from $332 million to $188 million. In the four months ending January 1942 we lost $85 million in reserves. If this rate of loss had continued, our reserves would have been exhausted in a matter of months. Moreover, if it had not been for the special measures of exchange conservation taken in 1940, we would already have been at the bottom of the barrel by the end of 1941. I hope that those who were inconvenienced by the travel restrictions and who co-operated so admirably with the foreign exchange control board at a time when the explanations of the exchange position had, for security reasons, to be general in character, will now be assured that these restrictions were an important factor enabling us to keep our heads above water.

The situation was indeed a serious one in 1941. We had mobilized all our privately-held reserves and had received from the United Kingdom gold and U.S. dollar payments in partial settlement of their deficit with us to an amount of $225 million in terms of U.S. funds—as much as they could afford. These extraordinary accretions to our reserves had been spent and our remaining reserves in gold and U.S. dollars were much below any figure that could reasonably be regarded as the minimum working balances of a country with Canada's volume of international transactions. In spite of the measures of exchange conservation taken, we were running a current account deficit in our transactions with the United States at the rate of some $300 million per year.

New sources of receipts of U.S. dollars were clearly necessary if Canada was to continue to purchase the great variety of United States commodities required for the prosecution of the war. The United States introduced the lend-lease programme in 1941, but Canada never wished to ask the United States for lend-lease assistance. We felt, as I have said in the house on a previous occasion, that as a nation in a favoured position, free from the ravages of war, we were in duty bound to stand on our own feet and, indeed, to share with the United States in assisting other less fortunate of our allies in carrying on the war against the common enemy.

A means of providing Canada with new sources of dollars to finance part of our war purchases in the United States, while at the same time mobilizing the resources of the continent most effectively for the production of war goods, was found in that most statesmanlike arrangement made by our Prime Minister and the President of the United States in April, 1941, and generally known as the Hyde Park declaration. It was agreed in this declaration that "each country should provide the other with the defence articles which it is best able to produce, and above all, produce quickly, and that production programmes should be coordinated to that end." Canada's purchases of war goods in the United States were already very heavy and increasing; under this agreement the United States undertook to increase its purchases in Canada of urgently needed war supplies in respect of which we had facilities for speedy and economical production.

Receipts of U.S. exchange by War Supplies limited, the company which was organized to handle the sales of munitions, ships and other war supplies under the Hyde Park agreement, amounted to $275 million in 1942, $301 million in 1943 and $314 million in 1944. These figures are net, after making allowance for price adjustments and repayment of advances in the later years.

I should like to place on record my conviction that the Hyde Park agreement and the spirit which prompted its conception and guided its execution constitute an outstanding example of the neighbourly goodwill and capacity for constructive cooperation which is so often found in our dealings with the United States. Like all good bargains, this was one from which both sides gained advantages. We were given, at a time when the outlook was darkest, the assurance that a shortage of U.S. exchange would not impede our war effort—that we would be able to go on getting the war goods we needed in the United States by producing war goods which the United States needed. The United States, for its part, got full value in the form of vital munitions of war.

In essence, what the Hyde Park arrangements involved was an exchange of war goods between Canada and the United States in accordance with the character and availability of productive capacity. In the aggregate, of course, our purchases of war goods from the United States were considerably higher than our sales of war goods to them. Net sales through War Supplies Limited amounted, as I have indicated already, to approximately $890 million to the end of 1944. From the start of the war until the end of 1945, imports of goods purchased by Canada from the United States amounted to over $6,000 million and it is estimated that the war content of our imports was about half this sum.

Notwithstanding these very large outlays we made on the purchase of war supplies in the United States, certain unexpected developments to which I shall refer in a moment resulted in additions to our cash resources in gold and U.S. dollars during the period when large contracts were being placed by agencies of the United States government with War Supplies Limited. It was not the desire of either the Canadian or the United States government that the operation of the Hyde Park agreement should have the effect, or even appear to have the effect, of building up Canada's liquid balances in U.S. funds just as it was not the desire of either government to let them fall too low. Accordingly, when it was found that our balances were rising as a result of the factors to which I shall refer, the Canadian government in pursuance of previous agreement with the United States government, offset this tendency by making certain payments to the United States treasury in the spring of 1944. I informed the house regarding the nature of these transactions on April 21, 1944.

The unexpected developments leading to an improvement in our U.S. dollar position in the course of 1942, 1943 and 1944 were three in number—sales of securities in the United States, United States government expenditures in Canada, and unusually large sales of grain to the United States.

United States interest in Canadian securities developed on a large scale in 1942 and persisted in later years. In addition, Canadian sales of Canadian held United States securities brought in appreciable amounts of U.S. exchange. The net proceeds of security sales exceeded $100 million in each of the years 1942 to 1944 and exceeded $250 million in 1945. United States government expenditures in Canada in connection with the Alaska highway and other government projects are estimated to have averaged over $80 million in these years, reaching their peak in 1943.

Finally, the extraordinary sales of wheat and coarse grains to the United States brought in approximately $150 million in 1943 and nearly $300 million in 1944. The latter figure is only slightly below our total exports of all commodities to the United States in 1939. In 1945 receipts from this source were in the neighbourhood of $100 million.

The committee will appreciate that receipts of exchange from the last two sources were of a fortuitous and non-recurring character while receipts from security sales do not cause any change in our over-all international financial position. With these comments I now propose to place on Hansard the figures of Canada's balances of gold and U.S. dollars which are given on page 20 of the foreign exchange control board report.

* Exclusive of working balances.

As the cash position improved, the restrictions imposed on current account expenditures of U.S. funds were gradually relaxed. The travel restrictions were modified in the spring of 1944 and withdrawn in the spring of 1945.

Mr. REID: The minister gave the figure of $6 billion as the amount of goods purchased by Canada from the United States. Has he the total sales by Canada to the United States in the same years?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the total here.

Mr. REID: I think you might find that they would balance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the information can be obtained from the tables I am putting on Hansard.

The import prohibitions imposed under the War Exchange Conservation Act of 1940 were repealed in the budget of 1944 and the war exchange tax was abolished in the budget of 1945.

The strong cash position shown by the figures I have placed on record naturally gives cause for satisfaction, but it would be seriously misleading to draw from these figures the conclusion that we have become richer in terms of U.S. funds in the course of the war. The cash position is only one item in the total balance sheet. To make a realistic appraisal one must naturally look behind the cash and see what has happened to our other assets and to our liabilities. I am placing on record another table which shows, by years, the wartime changes in Canada's debtor position vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar area. This table will be found on page 21 of the report of the foreign exchange control board:

Principal Wartime Changes in Canada's Debtor Position Vis-a-Vis the United States Dollar Area to the end of 1945
(millions of U.S. dollars)

Net increase in indebtedness indicated by above changes in position (B—A)	42	70	241	52	—149	—41	—227	—12

The table shows that between the outbreak of the war and the end of 1945 our liquid reserves in gold and U.S. dollars increased by approximately $1,100 million. Canadian holdings of other U.S. dollar assets, mainly securities, were reduced however by over $350 million, so that our total U.S. dollar assets rose by approximately $750 million. This increase in assets was almost exactly matched by an increase in our liabilities to the United States—about $500 million in the form of increased United States holding of Canadian securities and approximately $230 million in the form of the undistributed profits of United States owned business in Canada which have been earned since the outbreak of war and are consequently, under present foreign exchange control regulations, eligible for conversion into U.S. funds.

Taking it by and large then, Canada's net debtor position vis-a-vis the United States was just about the same at the end of 1945 as it was at the outbreak of war. We are a good deal more liquid now than we were in 1939 but the increase in our cash holdings is balanced by a reduction of other assets and an increase in our external liabilities in the form of United States holdings of Canadian securities.

In the first few years of the war, as the table I have placed on record shows, our indebtedness to the United States increased by some $400 million, but this lost ground was recaptured in the succeeding years. I think that the committee will agree with me that there is cause for some satisfaction in having come out even after paying cash for over $6,000 million worth of imports from the United States during the war years.

I wish at this point, for the sake of completeness, to refer briefly to the other half of our exchange problem, namely our relations with the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area. My reference can be very brief since the position has recently been exhaustively reviewed from time to time and most recently in connection with the $1,250 million loan.

The problem here, as members of the committee are well aware, has been that the British requirements of Canadian dollars to pay for their large purchases of munitions, foodstuffs and so on have greatly exceeded the Canadian dollars realized by them through exports to Canada and in other normal ways. It has been the determination of the people of this country that financial considerations should not impede or delay the victory by limiting the arms and other supplies that we put into the common pool. It was also their desire that our contribution of supplies should not result in international indebtedness on a scale that would be burdensome to international commerce.

I am placing on record the table given on page 30 of the foreign exchange control board report which shows the war-time changes in the balance of Canadian indebtedness to the United Kingdom to the end of 1945. This table excludes, of course, the new loan to Britain and also the $425 million commonwealth air training debt which is to be cancelled under the legislation recently approved by this house, and it also excludes certain other intergovernmental liabilities which were settled by a lump sum payment of $150 million from the United Kingdom to Canada in accordance with the provisions of the loan agreement. It will be seen that, excluding these items, Canada's balance of indebtedness vis-a-vis the United Kingdom improved by approximately $1,500 million in the course of the war.

In connection with Canada's financial relations with the sterling area I should like to invite the attention of members to a table given on pages 32 and 33 of the foreign exchange control board report which shows the main heads of sterling area expenditures in Canada from 1939 to 1945 and indicates how they were financed. Total sterling area expenditures during these years amounted to approximately $11,000 million. Receipts from ordinary sources such as imports into Canada, interest and dividend payments, etc., amounted to approximately $2,500 million, while Canadian government expenditures in connection with war activities overseas provided approximately the same amount. This left an aggregate deficiency after Canadian military expenditures of nearly $6,000 million. It was financed to the extent of $700 million by official repatriation of securities, to the extent of $340 million by private repatriation of securities, to the extent of $500 million by the sale of gold and U.S. dollars to Canada, to the extent of $560 million net (after allowing for the application of the proceeds of sales of Canadian securities by residents of the United Kingdom on the original amount of $700 million) by the interest-free Canadian dollar loan, to the extent of $1,000 million by the gift of 1942 and to the extent of $2,175 by mutual aid.

So much by way of summary of our war-time financial relationships with the U.S. dollar area and with the sterling area. We have, as the committee will see, been through some difficult moments and have had to face problems of enormous magnitude. I think that we are entitled to feel that we have done reasonably well in handling these problems. Hon. members will recall my statement of the dangers we saw originally which led to the imposition of exchange control—the danger of a fluctuating exchange rate, the danger of large non-resident sales of securities on our markets, the danger of a shortage of U.S dollars leading to a contraction of our war effort. We have fared well on all these scores. The exchange rate has been kept completely stable since September 15, 1939; we have not added the further uncertainty of a fluctuating exchange rate to the inevitable uncertainties of war. Canadian credit abroad stands higher than ever before. And we have met all our obligations in U.S. funds and are in a relatively strong cash position. The operation of the exchange control has been an important, indeed an indispensable factor, in producing these results.

The relatively strong cash position to which I have referred enables us to face the future with a greater degree of confidence than would otherwise have been possible. Since the end of the war our imports from the United States have continued to run at very high levels and it is reasonable to expect that in reequipping our industry we shall have to import many goods which have not been available, or only in inadequate quantities, during the war. Moreover, it is to be expected that the high level of incomes in Canada will lead, as it has done in the past, to increased imports of civilian goods, particularly consumers' durable goods, as they again become available in quantity. On the other hand, the special exports of war supplies and of grain to the United States which, as I have shown, figured so largely on the income side of dollar exchange during the past years, have fallen away. Our current account with the United States, which was about in balance for some time, is again showing a deficit. In the first quarter of this year the loss of United States funds from current account transactions (excluding collections on past business effected by War Supplies Limited) amounted to $50 million. The fact that we hold sizeable cash reserves means that we can face any deficit which it is now reasonable to anticipate without having to consider taking restrictive measures to eliminate it. It does not, however, mean that we can throw overboard all control over our exchange resources. In addition to the current account deficit with the United States which is now developing, we must naturally stand ready to meet all our capital obligations as they fall due. During the next 12 years Canadian bonds and debentures payable solely or optionally in U.S. dollars fall due in an amount of $1,000 million, the bulk of which is held in the United States. Of this total, some $400 million represents dominion, dominion-guaranteed and C.N.R. issues. Here, too, I hasten to say that we have no doubt that our cash reserves and prospects are such that we shall be well able to meet both these capital payments and the current account deficits I have referred to. But we feel that we cannot, as well, undertake the obligation which would be inherent in a decision to do away with exchange control to find U.S. exchange for non-residents who wish to sell securities on the Canadian market and withdraw their capital from Canada or for residents who, without valid reason, may wish to transfer their capital abroad. The exchange resources of the country must be at the disposal of the national economy and must not be dissipated through capital flight.

In reaching the conclusion I have stated, the government was naturally influenced by the uncertainties of the world outlook. In our view, these are so great that a country in Canada's position has no real choice but to continue to control exchange transactions. In introducing the Bretton Woods Agreement Act last December I dwelt at some length on those uncertainties and need therefore allude to them only briefly here. No one can say at the present time what will be the character of the economic system which emerges in the world as the war-devastated areas reconstruct their own shattered internal economic structures. We shall either go forward to a degree of co-operation among countries with regard to international trade and financial matters which is greater than anything we have known in the recent past or we shall enter a period of intense international economic rivalry and discord. The Canadian interest is so bound up with the expansion of world trade and with liberal economic relationships among nations that we must clearly throw our whole weight in favour of the first alternative. This we have been doing in every way open to us, and most recently by the decision of this house to have Canada join the two Bretton Woods institutions and to extend large credits to the United Kingdom and other countries.

Through these positive steps Canada has demonstrated its willingness to make its constructive contribution to solving the economic problems confronting the world This does not mean however, that we can afford to throw all caution to the winds and act as though the world's economic problems had been solved. For some time to come the international financial situation of many countries will continue to be abnormal and we shall have to count on providing a large portion of our exports to certain of these countries on credit terms. These exports will not produce equivalent amounts of foreign exchange which we shall be able to use to pay for our imports from the United States. We are therefore thrown back on the necessity of being in a position to control any undesirable drain on our U.S. dollar reserves, and in view of the very large amount of Canadian securites held by non-residents it is particularly necessary to be able to guard against the pressure of capital withdrawals from Canada. I have already informed the house that during the past few years the pressure has been in the other direction and that we have gained exchange and not lost it as a result of non-resident transactions in Canadian securities. I have no reason for believing that this trend will be reversed in the near future. But I am also aware that rapid changes have taken place in the past, both in our exchange position and in the attitude of non-residents towards Canadian securities. At present there is a keen interest on the part of American investors in Canadian securities, but I consider it my duty not to forget that there have been times during the recent war when Canada's premier securities sold in the American market on a 7 and 8 per cent yield basis, and were quoted at a price 40 per cent below the valuation placed on similar securities by the more confident Canadian public. In the light of such disturbing volatility, we cannot base our long-term policies on the favourable attitude towards Canadian securities in evidence at this particular moment or count on the indefinite continuance of that attitude.

The control of foreign exchange transactions which this legislation contemplates will provide the machinery for discharging certain of the obligations assumed by Canada in becoming a member of the international monetary fund. Under the fund agreement "each member undertakes to collaborate with the fund to promote exchange stability, to maintain orderly exchange arrangements with other members and to avoid competitive exchange depreciation" (Articles of agreement of international monetary fund, article IV, section 4 (a)). There are three possible methods of discharging this obligation. One would be to return to the international gold standard and make the Canadian dollar convertible into gold at a fixed price. I am not prepared to advise the house to adopt this course. The second would be to operate an exchange equalization account which would intervene in the exchange market by buying or selling foreign exchange in order to maintain exchange rates at whatever level had been determined, but which would exercise no qualitative supervision over exchange transactions. The third method, and the one we have chosen, is to operate an exchange control which will buy and sell foreign exchange at fixed rates but which will exercise a qualitative supervision over exchange transactions to ensure that any involving capital flight which are contrary to the national interest are prohibited. The fund agreement clearly contemplates that certain countries will continue to operate exchange controls after joining since it provides in article VI, section 3, that "members may exercise such controls as are necessary to regulate international capital movements."

I should like to summarize what I have said in this way. The general character of the international financial and economic relations between nations which is going to prevail in the future is still uncertain. We hope that it will be one which does not call for restrictive controls and we shall do everything in our power to bring this about. But we cannot be certain that the world we are going into will be what we would like to see. It may be a world of economic friction instead of cooperation. Canada is in an exposed international position, on account of our international debtor status and on account of the great importance of international transactions in our economic life. We cannot demobilize our main economic defence without being absolutely certain that it will not be needed. We cannot leave ourselves in a position where our choice of domestic economic policies has to be influenced by the consideration that one policy or another may lead to capital withdrawal by foreigners or capital flight by Canadians.

We have no intention of using this exchange control legislation to restrict anything but certain types of capital movement. We expect to be able to avoid any interference with current account transactions. But experience, both our own and other peoples', has shown that to control capital movements effectively it is necessary to supervise all transactions between residents and non-residents. Let me give one illustration of this point. If we attempted to control capital exports merely by refusing to sell foreign exchange for this purpose, it would be open to anyone who wished to export his capital illegally to say that he required the exchange to pay for imports. Similarly, anyone could buy goods in Canada and export them without bringing the exchange proceeds back home. In either case a transaction which appears to be quite innocent on the surface is in fact an export of capital. It is for this reason that it is necessary to maintain our over-all machinery of control even though our intention is to place no restrictions on current account transactions.

I believe that there has been general appreciation during the war years of the benefits of exchange stability, and that the business community will welcome the assurance provided by this measure that the government intends, through the continuance of exchange control, to guard against a return to the situation that prevailed in this respect after the last war. Some members may recall the difficulties and hardships caused by the wide fluctuation in the price of sterling and U.S. funds in Canada in the past. Between 1919 and 1920 the United States dollar fluctuated between 1¾ per cent premium and 19¼ per cent premium in Canada. Again in 1933 it moved within a range of 1½ per cent discount to 23 per cent premium. Sharp fluctuations of this sort are injurious to business and of advantage only to the exchange speculator. We do not wish to return to this situation. We want those engaged in international transactions to have some assurance that they will not be faced with arbitrary and erratic fluctuations in exchange rates that upset their price calculations and turn profits into losses.

I realize that the machinery of control is not without its burdens to those engaged in foreign transactions and I hope that this section of the community will understand the necessity of continuing the control. The foreign exchange control board has tried to reduce its formalities to the minimum compatible with effective control and I am sure that it will continue to make further efforts in this direction. I should like at this point to pay a tribute to the business community for the way in which they have cooperated with the foreign exchange control board during the war. I should also like to express appreciation to the public generally for its cooperation, particularly in accepting with such good grace the unpalatable but necessary travel restrictions. When the reasons for the control measures were explained and understood, the business community and the public generally were at all times willing to assist the board in carrying them out. I must also make a special reference to the chartered banks who have acted as agents of the exchange control authorities. Exchange control necessarily involved considerable additional work for them. This work has been carried out in a very satisfactory manner and they have at all times given their full cooperation to the control authorities.

In conclusion, I wish to assure the committee, if such assurance is needed, that the government's decision to maintain exchange control is not due to any fondness for controls as such. When the world returns to a more normal basis we shall have a fresh look at the question. Meanwhile, world conditions are far from normal and we cannot act as though they are. With the exception of the United States, practically every country in the world has exchange control and expects to continue it at least for the transition period. This being the case, Canada has no satisfactory alternative but to retain its control and operate it on the most liberal possible basis.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of forgetting the convenient arrangement which has been suggested for dealing with this measure, and at this time I wish to make only one or two brief observations.

I venture to suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that this measure is of such importance and will have so many technical aspects that he might very well allow a good many days before having it brought forward for full discussion. That however is a matter for his consideration.

I should like to make only a few observations respecting the situation in which we find ourselves. Speaking for myself, I do not see how anyone can dissent from the minister in his description of the world of to-day. I remember when we were debating Bretton Woods in this house about six months ago the statement was made by several hon. members that international relations had deteriorated lamentably within the preceding six months. Particularly in view of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said this afternoon, I think we shall find it hard to believe that they have not deteriorated still further in the interval. That raises the problems which the minister has described, and I doubt if any one will be able to avoid the conclusion he has reached, that some measure of control is necessary. For how long, we do not know.

I want to make just one comment on that. We have heard described this afternoon a technical job well done. I do not think there will be any grudging of credit for what has been done. I think we all feel that it has been done well.

It is obvious to say that people who have done a good job well, who have been in the position of controlling and really making the financial system tick for several years, would be inhuman if they did not somehow believe that they could go on and make it tick indefinitely.

The minister has spoken about a possibility —one does not like even to hear the words—of a period of intense economic rivalry, and then he went on to say that we must be absolutely certain—I have forgotten his exact words, but this is their effect—of our security before we let these things down. It is on that that I would like to say a word. If we are all going to make sure that we get our own security, that is the surest way of making certain that there will be no security. I agree with the minister when he says that we have to use caution; nevertheless it seems to me that if everybody uses caution, if everybody is the last to show any courage and to become cooperative, the results will not be what we want. I am sure that is not the minister's intention. From what has been said in this house by the minister and by others I am sure he will agree with what I have just said.

I should like to leave that with the committee and with the minister. He has given us this afternoon a description of a world which can easily degenerate into suspicious and economic rivalries and exclusiveness such as we had in the nineteen thirties. It seems to me that that should make us aware of our serious responsibilities in arriving at the decisions at which we must arrive. Although it is only economic danger, that faces us at the moment, I am reminded of a line from Shakespeare:

. . . We are in great danger;—

Economic danger.

The greater therefore should our courage be.

Mr. REID: I have one word to say and one question to ask the minister. The statement just made by the minister was an important one, and I think it is a little hard for the ordinary member of parliament fully to understand foreign exchange and high finance control. A thought that enters my mind has to do with the position of Great Britain and the United States with regard to trade with Canada. Great Britain buys more goods from Canada than we buy from her, and yet the pound is down to $4.38 which means that she gets less for the pound she expends in Canada than does the United States, where conditions are exactly the reverse. We in this country buy more from the United States than they do from us. I have always wondered in my own mind who actually sets the differential in exchange. We would seem to have made a contribution of $600 million to the United States since the war began in the form of the ten per cent exchange, that is, the United States dollar being worth $1.10 Canadian. The opposite is the case with Great Britain. I would have thought that in this new world that we are fashioning the very opposite condition would have prevailed. I would have thought that in poorer countries like Great Britain it would be made more possible to buy more with their currencies, and that at least the Canadian dollar would be equal to the United States dollar. During the past three years I have asked the Minister of Finance the question: Who sets this differentiation in exchange between the Canadian and United States dollars? It may be my fault, but I do not think I have had a proper explanation. I trust the committee when the bill is before it will go into the two points I have mentioned.

Mr. QUELCH: I hope the recommendation of the hon. member (Mr. Reid) will be carried out. Personally I think it would not be for the benefit of Canada if the Canadian dollar were on parity with the United States dollar. Undoubtedly this question will be discussed later. We welcome the introduction of this measure to provide for the establishment of a foreign exchange control board as a peace time measure. This board served the country well during the war by making United States dollars available to provide for the maximum production of armaments, and also by providing Canadian dollars for Great Britain. When I say that, I do not mean that we are going to approve everything that is in the bill, but we do believe it is in the interests of Canada to establish a foreign exchange control board as a peace-time measure.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is there any termination date?

Mr. ILSLEY: The bill just provides for the establishment of the board. If it becomes necessary to discontinue it, it will have to be repealed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 195, respecting the control of the acquisition and disposition of foreign currency and the control of transactions involving foreign currency non-residents.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. BRACKEN: Can the minister say when the bill will be up for second reading?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will consult the convenience of the opposition on that. I doubt whether it will be this week; we should probably give more time than that.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if this is a motion to go into supply in order to move three other departments into committee of supply to make them available for discussion, then as leader of the opposition I must oppose the motion. If the government feels that it is necessary to persist in this motion for this purpose, I shall have to ask for a division when you put the motion to the house. I object on this ground. The motion to go into supply on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays is debatable under our rules, but it is not debatable when put on a Thursday or Friday.

It is not necessary to put any more departments into supply at this time. If I am not in error, there are still ten or eleven departments to be dealt with in supply. If there were need for more I would gladly approve of more, and I say to the government now that whenever there is a need for more, there will be no objection. The opposition has the right on a motion to go into supply on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday to raise any grievance or bring up any matter regarded as of importance; and to the extent that we put additional departments into supply we are denied that right. I do not think the government should put us in that position. It does not need to. I do not think that practice is democratic, I do not think it is fair.

Under the legislation passed last year, the emergency powers bill, the government can take action that we know nothing of until it is announced here at the opening of the house, and that is a time when we are denied the right to debate it. The only opportunity which the opposition has to raise any question which is not before the house in the form of a bill or resolution is on a motion to go into supply on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday. Unless I am in error, there are, as I said, ten or eleven departments in supply now, and about ten more to go in. Why should the government ask us to put more in when there are so many already in and not yet finished? I am perfectly agreeable to having, say a couple of departments go in each week, but once we put them all in we are denied the right, thereafter to bring up any matter that may be regarded as important.

May I add this. As leader of the opposition I would say to the Minister of Finance that we feel that it is time the budget was brought down. I am aware of the reasons which the minister or the government may have for not having it brought down before this. But we have been here for three months now, dealing with some important matters, but none is more important than the fiscal problems facing this country. I would ask the government to bring down the budget as soon as possible. In a week or two we shall be running into hot weather and there will be a general demand to get away from here. Then we shall have before us not only the measures now on the order paper and the rest of the estimates but the important budget proposals as well. The budget proposals will probably be—I was going to say more important this year, but I do not like to make a comparison; I shall say only that they will be very important measures. I therefore urge the government to bring down the budget as soon as possible.

I suggest in all sincerity to the government that it should not ask us now to give up the right of raising any question we deem important on going into supply the first three days of the week. Having said that, let me assure the government that we will help them see to it that there are always enough departments in supply to carry on the work of the house. I am aware that under the rules you can go into supply and call one item in each of the departments named; then that department is in; the government can go into supply again on Thursday or Friday without any debate, and therefore no opportunity for the opposition to raise any grievance on those days. I trust that the government will not deny us this right. I am sure that the government appreciates this position. There have been eleven departments in supply already this session, only one of which is finished, and to ask us to put three more departments in at this time—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Agriculture is not all through yet.

Mr. BRACKEN: That makes my argument all the stronger because you have eleven departments in supply already, any one of which can be considered.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—EFFECT OF LABOUR DISPUTES ON PRODUCTION

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am going to avail myself for a moment of the prerogative which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) mentioned a moment ago of discussing an important matter on the motion to go into supply. I hesitate to take up the time of the house, but the question I am going to raise is of the utmost importance.

But first on the point raised by the leader of the opposition I think it would be quite in order for the government to move one of the departments into supply because I realize that the government must have a certain amount of manoeuvrability. The only thing I am afraid of is that they will manoeuvre too much. If we could only be sure that they would not do that I would have no objection to one new department going into supply because the government must have something to put before the house on Thursdays and Fridays.

I hesitated about bringing up the matter, to which I am about to refer, although not to the point of not referring to it at all. I hesitated until I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon refer to the terrible condition, the dangerous condition that prevails in Europe. If there is a dangerous condition in Europe we cannot hope in the small world in which we live to-day to avoid that danger any more than we could in 1939.

There are at the present time a number of labour disputes in progress in the country which are retarding production. I think there is no member of the house, regardless of where he sits, who will not agree with me that the greatest need of the world to-day is production, and that we should all do everything we can to see that production is not retarded. I have already referred to this need in different words on two or three different occasions this session. I referred to it in my speech on the address on March 22, when I urged that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) or some other minister of the government should call a conference of representatives of employers, representatives of organized labour and representatives of the provincial governments in order that we might come to some understanding and some conclusions in regard to the need for increased production. After that was done, the attention of the public could be drawn, as was so often done during the war, to the dangerous position that we and the world are in. We could then get the cooperation of the public in the same way as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) mentioned this afternoon we got it so often in other matters.

There is a shipping strike—a disastrous strike, in my opinion— and the Minister of Labour has worked hard, I believe, to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion. It being a matter affecting navigation, I believe it comes wholly within the jurisdiction of the federal department of labour. Last Thursday the Minister of Labcur brought together representatives of the shipping companies and representatives of the union concerned and presented them with a formula for the settlement of the strike. I am informed by the president of the seamen's union that it was immediately accepted by the union. According to a news report in the Ottawa Journal of June 14, the shipping companies decided that they would take the minister's proposals under consideration the following day. Then, according to the same report, they decided that they would not discuss them until Monday, that is to-day; and later on it was decided that they will not discuss them until tomorrow. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no matter what the grievance may be this lackadaisical manner of dealing with so urgent a matter should not be tolerated at a time like this. The government have an obligation to the people of Canada, who also are partners in these matters, because to-day there is no labour dispute in which there are not at least three parties—the employers, the workers, and the community—and the government must act for the community. I believe that the government has an obligation to-day to secure a quick decision from the shipping companies. It should ask them whether or not they are going to accept the formula proposed by the Minister of Labour, and if they will not act the government should see to it that shipping moves again.

On the west coast, in the lumber situation, we have the opposite condition. The employers have accepted the commissioner's proposals of settlement and the labour organization concerned has rejected them. Here again the government has an obligation to prevent as far as it possibly can the wastage of food and to get into operation as many lumber mills as it is within its power to do, in order to meet the urgent needs of the fruit growers.

There are other disputes. Last Thursday or Friday I brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour a dispute in British Columbia in which the moulders are concerned. I believe the moulders' organization is the union involved in the strike. But the strike is affecting a large number of plants which, I am told have no concern at all with the strike. I am informed by one of the companies that when they took this matter up with the government of British Columbia they were told that the administration of the labour relations regulations came under the federal government; but when I drew this matter to the atention of the Minister of Labour here the other day, and asked if that was a correct statement, he told me that it is wholly in the control of the provincial department of labour. Having so much experience with these regulations. I think this sort of buck-passing should be impossible. I am sorry I have not the communication which I referred to with me: I thought I had and I was going to read from the letter the definite statement that the company had the opinion before-mentioned from the premier of British Columbia.

In my view the minister has been long-suffering in these disputes; he has tried to negotiate fairly between the parties; the formula which he proposed in the seamen's strike is—as far as I know; I am not in a position to judge—a fair one. He should now see to it that the parties concerned get together, and if they do not, the government should take the necessary action in order that goods will float again on the rivers and lakes of this country.

STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER INDUSTRY —COST OF LIVING—SECURITY IN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, if there is now an opportunity to speak on the labour situation I shall take a few minutes of your time. I want to try again to impress upon the government, and particularly on the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), through you, Mr. Speaker, that in view of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said to-day, in my opinion they have even more responsibility on their shoulders than they have apparently realized up to the present time, as far as labour is concerned. I have been negotiating to the best of my ability for the last two weeks with the labour representatives, with a view to getting the box and cooperage factories reopened; I am not speaking of the lumber situation generally. As I understood the Minister of Labour, the union had agreed to man these plants, without prejudice to either side, exactly on the lines of the appeal made by the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley) on the 24th or the 28th of May, that these plants should be reopened in order to conserve the food which, in spite of what any official says, is going to waste, and which, according to the statement of the Prime Minister on his return from England, is urgently required to-day. This food is going to waste, and will go to waste in far greater quantities unless the Department of Labour accept their responsibilities to-day, and do, as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) suggested, stop passing the buck from one department to the other. Let us assume our responsibilities, and do so to-day.

I am not going into the rights or wrongs of the strike, but I say definitely, Mr. Speaker, that the international woodworkers of America have come this far. The men have agreed and guaranteed to re-man the plants with union labour. They offered to do so on Friday night, and the plants could have been working all day Saturday, all day Sunday and all day to-day if the government had accepted its responsibility, as I see it, and put in a controller. We did it some time ago in the case of the American Can plant. We did it after a lot of food had been wasted. Apparently we are adopting the same attitude to-day in so far as fruit, fish, milk and other products in British Columbia are concerned. Apparently the department does not realize that if we start these plants to-day hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of food will still be wasted in British Columbia because, by operating the plants on twenty-four hour shifts from now on, we cannot catch up.

To-day I tried to ask what I thought was a fair question, namely, when would the plants be opened if they were not opened to-day, and why were they not opened before? Every hon. member knows my stand in this matter; but I say that no union, no operator and no government can justify food going to waste by the buck being passed from the minister to the minister of labour of British Columbia or to the federal authorities at Ottawa or to the union. The unions are prepared to go to work to-night and work all night producing crates, barrels and other containers if the Minister of Labour of the federal government will put Mr. Jones or someone else in as controller to operate these plants for a period of at least three weeks during which time negotiations can be carried on.

A short time ago the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) showed me the latest edition of the Kamloops paper. These people know the situation in British Columbia; they know the situation in Kamloops, and they state that if we operate to-day we shall still lose foodstuffs because we simply cannot catch up. Surely we are big enough or should be big enough to discuss these matters without prejudice to either side while the plants are operating. It could be done along the line of the appeal which was made by the Acting Prime Minister, and which has been answered by the International Woodworkers of British Columbia. If the appeal of the Acting Prime Minister of May 27 has not been answered by the companies or the government, it has been answered by the union. Why not by the government and operators? I am now appealing to the Department of Labour of the federal government. I am appealing particularly to the minister of that department. I shall not use the word I intended to use—

Mr. MITCHELL: Use it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No. The Minister of Labour is always good-natured; I shall say that for him. As a member of parliament representing the fruit-growers, I do not want any buck-passing or side-tracking. What I want the minister to do is to tell me when these factories are to be reopened. If he cannot tell me that I should like to know why. I should like to know why he cannot take some action when the men are prepared to go to work in the factories under a controller to prevent the fruit in British Columbia from wasting.

COST OF LIVING—SECURITY IN EMPLOYMENT

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): Signs of labour unrest are obvious all over the country, and part of the reason is that the government has not yet had the courage to face up to the inevitable results of its own policies. The Progressive Conservatives would like to see the ceilings lifted just as quickly as possible. The government intends to go about the matter more slowly, but no matter how slowly they go about it, nevertheless the fact remains that to the average worker his cost of living is increasing. The increase in the cost of living does not always mean a monetary increase. It may mean a depreciation in the quality of the goods he has bought.

One of the problems which is facing the average worker throughout this country is the increase in the cost of food, particularly milk. Milk is basic to the health of a nation; yet the price has gone up by two cents a quart, and within a few months there is the threat that it will go up still another two cents a quart. The ordinary working-class family know that the cost of clothes they have to buy is going up. They find the costs creeping up all around them, and if they are to live on a standard which will grant them the minimum amount of health, naturally they must have higher wages. The labour disputes to-day centre largely around the question of higher wages.

There is also the question of security in employment. We have heard almost ad nauseam of the government's promises during the election of jobs for all. We have read the government's white paper on employment policy, and seen how its policy was to provide full employment, whatever that may mean. But full employment is not with us, and there is no sign at all of full employment because there is no sign at all of a reconversion programme on the part of the government. There is no general all-out Canadian plan which will give the people an inkling as to what the government has in mind to maintain full employment. I should like to bring this matter particularly to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) because full employment is largely a matter of fiscal policy, and we are faced with this apparent fact: according to the government's advisory committee on reconstruction, that is, the James committee, it is estimated that under full employment the savings of the Canadian people will be in the neighbourhood of $1,500 million a year. If we are to maintain full employment the costs of industry have to come back again in the purchasing stream. I differ from my hon. friends of the Social Credit party in not believing there is an inherent deficiency of purchasing power under the present economic system. I believe every element of cost has an offsetting element in somebody's income. But when we have $1,500 million worth of savings, much of which is not reinvested in the economy, then there will be an apparent lack of purchasing power. When that lack of purchasing power appears profits diminish; because profits diminish there is a tendency to lay-off men or to cut wages, and when that is done purchasing power is still further diminished. It is true that one might perhaps stabilize the national income at $8 billion as one might stabilize it at $3 billion, as happened in the thirties, but on these low levels the obvious result is mass unemployment.

If we are to maintain full employment, obviously somehow or another the government must evolve a scheme whereby the savings of the people as a whole, the savings of industrial enterprise, will again be channeled back into purchasing power. Yet according to the Financial Post's 1944 survey of firms which, I think, accounted for, about sixty per cent of manufacturing industry, these companies figure on spending slightly more than than $100 million a year on capital assets. Mr. J. R. Beattie, of the Bank of Canada, writing in the August, 1944, issue of the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, pointed out:

> (a) That "even the tremendously rapid industrial expansion . . . during the war" had not "involved more than $1,000,000,000 of capital expenditure . . . public and private . . . on plant, equipment and housing in any one year;" (b) that though "electric power is a heavy capital-using industry," its "pre-war investment in fixed assets was less than $1,500,000,000;" (c) that "one year's saving" at the rate of $1,500,000,000 a year "would more than cover the cost of all residential housing built in the twenty years from 1917 to 1937;" (d) that $1,500,000,000 "would cover nearly half the total fixed capital investment in Canadian railways;" (e) that "even the building of a new industry comparable to the pre-war automobile industry would absorb less than three weeks' saving at the rate of $1,500,000,000 a year."

That means there must be a tremendous amount of additional purchasing power spent if we are to maintain a balance between national income and the outgoings of the incomes whether they be wages or profits on other income of the people. But now comes a new survey of post-war investment plans, in the Canadian Bank of Commerce monthly letter of January, 1946, which estimates that capital expenditure for the years 1946 to 1950 will be as follows:

City and town homes	$750,000,000
Business building	250,000,000
Industrial and mining	1,000,000,000
Public utilities	350,000,000
Transportation	400,000,000
Farm improvement and extension	350,000,000

That means a total in these years of $3,100 million, or a total per annum of $620,000,000; yet on the committee's estimate the Canadian people are going to save a billion and a half dollars each year. If we are to maintain full employment this means that somehow or another another $900,000,000 must be spent in this country, preferably in capital construction, or if not, then in improving the conditions of the people; and one way in which that is being done is through the children's allowances. The Minister of Finance cannot exempt himself from some responsibility for complete employment in this country. That is a problem he must face, and it is a problem for which we in the C.C.F. think we have an answer. It means the complete control of investment in this country by the government and investment channeled out so that, as a result, socially useful purposes shall be served. If in the forthcoming budget the Minister of Finance can give us no hope at all that this policy will be followed, then I think we can say with some certainty we are coming into a period of still further aggravated labour troubles and increased unemployment.

What I should like to speak of particularly at this moment is a matter affecting the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), because here I think he has been somewhat remiss in his responsibilities. I should like to remind the house again of a situation which exists in the city of Winnipeg and which is felt in other areas where these men have gone to live. In 1919 there was a general strike in Winnipeg, during which some four thousand workers of the Canadian Pacific Railway company went out on strike. Many were accepted back by the company, but the price they had to pay for reemployment was the giving up of all seniority rights before the strike. In tribute to the government-owned line, Canadian National Railways, let me say that they took back their men; and, when they established their pension fund in 1935 they gave all men, whether strikers or not, credit for every year and every month they had worked for the company. That was not the case with the Canadian Pacific. In 1937 this company instituted a new pension plan on a contributory basis. Previously the pension plan had been on a non-contributory basis; and, when the men asked for higher wages the officials of the C.P.R. pointed to the pension plan and to their generosity in giving their men these pensions, and asked that this be taken into consideration. When the new plan was put into operation in 1937 it applied only to those of the age of forty and under. As a result, some four hundred elderly employees of the C.P.R. were given no pension rights at all. Some 2,100 others were affected because the time they had worked prior to the strike did not count toward their seniority. Mr. Coleman, who is now president of the Canadian Pacific Railway company, had a meeting with a sub-committee of the general chairmen of the union, and according to the union Mr. Coleman stated that it would take an additional $1,250,000 to meet the pensions which were asked. The report of the union goes on:

> He made it very clear that the earnings of the company made such a task quite impossible, and regretted very much that, in such circumstances, he had to deny the request of the committee.

The subcommittee went on to say:

> We are still of the unanimous view that, had the financial conditions of the company been different, we would have made progress.

The financial conditions of the company are appreciably different to-day, and I only hope the C.P.R. will take that fact into consideration when considering the claims of the men. The net income of the company in 1941 was some $46,000,000; in 1942 it was $48,000,000; in 1943 it amounted to $49,000,000, and last year it was some $31,000,000. It should be noted also that last year the profit and loss balance in the balance sheet amounted to $262,700,000. Out of that sum I should think the company could well afford to pay pensions to the men who are now leaving the employ of the company because of age and who are being wretchedly discriminated against because of the strike. The C.P.R. is one of the few companies, if not the only one, still treating in such a way the men who went on strike in Winnipeg in 1919. I have asked several questions of the Minister of Labour in that connection. Last December I asked what had happened to the report of the commissioner who had been appointed by the government to investigate the situation. The minister then told me that the report had been received and had been submitted to the company. Be it noted, Mr. Speaker, that this investigation was conducted at the request of the employees, not at the request of the company; yet the company was given the privilege of seeing this report while it has been denied to the union. Again in May I asked the minister what the outcome of the investigation was. All he could tell me was that the Canadian Pacific Railway company were still considering the matter. Therefore I wrote Mr. Coleman to ask when we might expect the company to give the government its answer. I received a reply from Mr. Manson, vice-president in charge of personnel, who said in part:

The report of the investigator is being studied; and inasmuch as he required more than seven months to complete his findings, I am sure you will appreciate the time it takes to analyse the document.

That is a lot of unadulterated nonsense. It may take a commission seven months to make certain findings, but surely it does not take seven months to consider the advisability or otherwise of implementing those findings. However, that is the case put up by the Canadian Pacific Railway company, so that I hope the Minister of Labour will get some iron into his spine and go after the C.P.R. to learn exactly what they intend to do about the legitimate plea of these men I have mentioned.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not take advice of that kind from a jellyfish in Winnipeg.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I think the minister should take the advice, because he is badly in need of it.

There is another thing. There is a dispute to-day between the typographical unions and newspapers in Vancouver, Edmonton, Hamilton, Ottawa and Winnipeg. I asked the minister, at page 2153 of Hansard, the following question in reference to this dispute:

I wish to direct to the Minister of Labour a question of which I have given him notice. What steps are being taken by the federal government to settle the dispute between the typographical union and the newspapers concerned?

Part of his answer was as follows:

In Winnipeg, basically the issues were the union's policy that its international law is not subject to arbitration, et cetera—and when I say "et cetera" I refer to the regulations set in motion by the respective governments of this country—the forty-hour week and payment for overtime if the union could not provide labour under its closed shop agreement. Unfortunately the situation had deteriorated to such an extent in Winnipeg by the time it reached the attention of my department that the appointment of two industrial disputes inquiry commissions and the holding of several conferences in Ottawa did not bring about a settlement.

I bring to the minister's attention the words, "unfortunately the situation had deteriorated to such an extent in Winnipeg by the time it reached the attention of my department". The minister may not like taking advice from the hon. member from Winnipeg North; but let me say one thing more, and that is that his answers ought to be more accurate. This one is grossly and obviously inaccurate, on the basis of an answer to a question I asked later.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North):

1. On what date did the dispute between the typographical union and the newspaper publishers in Winnipeg start?

The answer to that was:

1. The stoppage of work affecting the international typographical union and the Winnipeg Tribune and Free Press commenced on November 8, 1945, being the culmination of a dispute which had been developing for some weeks previously because of failure to agree on the terms of a new agreement to replace one which had expired September 30, 1945.

The second question was:

2. On what date was the department made cognizant of the dispute?

And the answer:

2. On October 31 my department received information that a dispute existed and that a strike was possible. On November 1,—

That was seven days before the lock-out took place.

—the publishers of the two newspapers requested the intervention of either a conciliation officer or an industrial disputes inquiry commission. A conciliation officer was appointed on November 2.

The dispute started on November 8. The third question was:

3. On what date was Mr. Justice Major appointed as a commissioner to investigate the dispute?

And the answer:

3. Mr. Justice Major was appointed a commissioner on November 9.

The Minister of Labour says that the situation had deteriorated before it reached the attention of his department. Yet, nine days before the lockout took place, the Minister of Labour had acted—and I think rightly so; I do not blame him for it; rather, I give him credit. The day after the dispute actually took place, a conciliation officer was appointed. As I said, the first answer given by the Minister of Labour was not altogether accurate.

Last summer the Canadian newspaper publishers association held a meeting in eastern Canada. I do not pretend to know what went on there, but I do know that not long after that, when the union agreement in Winnipeg was up for negotiation, certain publishers balked, insisting that the laws of the union had to be arbitrated. That had never been the case before in the history of that union. Never at any time in all its eighty years have the union refused to arbitrate hours, wages or conditions of an agreement. But they have always insisted that the laws of their own union were not arbitrable, and properly so; because were the laws of the union arbitrable, in every city one would find a hundred different interpretations of the law.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would the hon. member take the stand that the rules of the trade union take precedence over the laws of this country.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): No, I did not say that the laws of the trade union should take precedence over the laws of this country, because the trade union have stated that the law of Canada takes precedence over the law of their union. So that that is no argument.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are talking about something you know nothing about.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am talking about something concerning which I know a lot more than you do, because I have been with the men, talked the matter over with them, and they know what they are talking about, even though the Minister of Labour may not know. There can be only one interpretation of the law of the union, and that is the interpretation they put on the law themselves, because those laws are there for the government of the union, and for nothing else.

It has been said—I have seen it in print—that the printers are trying to compel publishers to publish what the printers want. That is obviously nonsense. The position taken by the typographical union throughout the years proves that that is nonsense; and it is nonsensical to say that this is a case of foreign interference in Canadian affairs. Each individual union, on its own behalf, took strike action; and that action was not dictated by the international president, Mr. Randolph or by anybody else.

There is much less foreign interference in the unions than there is foreign interference in business. When we consider that several billions of dollars of United States capital is invested in this country, I think we must begin to realize the amount of the United States interference there is in Canadian industry.

The Minister of Labour appointed Mr. Justice Major to act as commissioner, and the commissioner, I believe, did his best. He offered to the union six points to be decided upon, and stated that if the union agreed to them he would then persuade the publishers to agree to them, too. The union agreed to four of them, and they said they were willing to discuss the remaining two, and to negotiate in that regard.

The publishers refused to have anything to do with the matter at all; they virtually walked out on the commissioner. The result is that to-day all across Canada we find these strikes in publishing plants; and unless some definite action is taken, and taken quickly, I fear they will spread. We find these strikes not only in the newspaper industry, but threatened in steel and among electrical workers. Practically every organized union in the country is affected.

Nobody likes to strike. Strikes cost the country money. They cost the workers money. They cost the employers money. But a worker goes on strike only as an act of desperation, only when that is the only way he can bring his case before the people. When a worker goes on strike he knows what the cost will be to himself and his family.

It is the responsibility of the federal government to take some active stand, a more definite stand than it has taken, in trying to act as conciliator between the conflicting groups in this country. It is the duty and responsibility of the federal government, where necessary, to take over plants which are concerned. They should be taken over on one basis; that is, that any profits accruing to those plants while they are being operated by the federal government should revert to the federal treasury.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like for a moment to refer to what has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) where he pointed out that the advocacy by the Social Credit party of a sufficiency of purchasing power would not solve the problem. I remind the hon. member that labour unions are now on strike to obtain increased purchasing power. The Social Credit party contends that if labour unions were to receive their increase in wages, which we think they deserve, that would solve the whole problem. It must be remembered that the people at large would not get that increase; and therefore they would not be able to buy the goods which industry has produced.

However, I do not intend to enter upon an explanation of social credit theory for the special benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, because I have come to the conclusion that he does not understand even the policy of socialism of the party to which he belongs. The hon. member said that his party stood for complete control of investment. That was not the policy enunciated the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver East

(Mr. MacInnis), when he stated quite clearly that he advocated the total ownership of the means of life.

I do not dispute one or the other, but I believe that the hon. member for Vancouver East came more closely to socialistic doctrine than did the hon. member for Winnipeg North, and I suggest that the latter named hon. member should study the policy of his own party before he begins to criticize others.

I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to conditions among labour in Canada. Only to-day I received two telegrams from labour unions, one at Drumheller and one at Calgary, asking me to do what I could to draw the attention of the government to the state of unrest among labour throughout Canada. Labour realizes that these continued strikes are not in the best interests of the country as a whole, and I believe they are just as anxious and ready as anyone else to have matters settled. But the government cannot take the attitude that it will sit idly by and let the strikes continue, in the hope that they will work themselves out in a natural way.

I do not think the minister did much to lessen unrest among labour when he stated the other day that he blamed strikes on communists, and said that if the communists wanted a fight he was ready to give it to them. I do not think the labour unrest in this country is due to communist elements. Men are striking for legitimate reasons. The minister knows as well as the rest of us that living costs are increasing rapidly. That being so, of necessity labour must be concerned about its standard of living. As prices go up, the standard of living comes down. Not only must labour be concerned about that; the rest of the people of Canada are much concerned because these continued strikes are bound to add to the increased cost of goods.

I think the question was brought up timely by the hon. member when he spoke this afternoon. I do not intend to enter into a lengthy discussion on labour, but I suggest to the government that they will have to do something definite to solve these problems or labour and the employers will have to deal with the matter to see if settlements cannot be brought about. It would be much better if the government had some definite plan in mind so that when a strike occurs they could insist upon a settlement.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does my hon. friend suggest compulsory arbitration?

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not think it needs compulsion on the part of the government or on the part of labour or on the part of the employers. There should be some reconciliation between the three groups. If no settlement can be arrived at between labour and the employer, then the government should step in and do something. They should not stand idly by while conditions get worse and worse. It is no solution of the problem for the government to say that we have less labour trouble in Canada than in any other country in the world. If conditions do not improve quickly we shall soon reach a point where Canada will be leading the world with labour troubles.

We had better get busy. The government should have some definite policy. They should enact some regulations which would bring these strikes to an end so that the country can get on with the production that is so greatly needed.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I should like to take only one or two minutes to deal the the remarks made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), who has raised objection to calling three new departments in committee of supply, not for the purpose of discussion but simply to get them in. The situation is that at the present moment we have eleven departments in supply. One department, the Department of Agriculture, is almost completed, as is the Department of National Health and Welfare. There are eleven departments not yet in supply. The theory that getting a department into supply at an early stage deprives hon. members of the right of expression and the opportunity to ask for the redress of grievances is an entire fallacy. If a department already in supply is called on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday every hon. member has the right to debate the motion.

If the record of this session is read it will be found that supply was called earlier and has been called more frequently than in any session during the fifteen years I have been in this house. Hon. members opposite must accept some responsibility for moving a motion of no confidence and holding up supply for two weeks. Hon. gentlemen must realize that every session complaints are made in the last week or two weeks about the government, no matter who the government is, because of the congestion of the estimates. We have tried to avoid that this session. We are trying to get departments into supply, but when we do so we are met with retarding suggestions by hon. gentlemen opposite. I will meet the suggestion of the leader of the opposition and call two departments to-day and two next Monday, and I hope the house will agree to that.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I have just one remark to make on what the acting leader of the house (Mr. Mackenzie) has just said. I would draw your attention to the fact that this is a habit which has cropped up during the years of war, that of bringing in one item of each of two or three departments in order to get them into committee of supply. Members of the opposition have agreed to that because we were desirous of assisting the business of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I hope hon. members still are.

Mr. STIRLING: They still are, but with a proviso. The motion for supply provides an opportunity to members in opposition to raise matters, not necessarily matters of grievance but other matters which in their opinion should be discussed. I cannot accept the minister's view that it is always possible to have these matters discussed when the department concerned is before the house. It happens quite often toward the end of a session that a department will be called hurriedly and little discussion is possible. The opportunity is then lost to hon. members to discuss certain matters.

Over and over again the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley)—I give these two illustrations only—have suggested, when certain questions have been asked, that there would be ample opportunity to discuss the matter when the house got into committee of supply. The more departments we get into committee, the fewer opportunities will be left to discuss the motion to go into supply.

The minister now suggests that two more departments be moved in to-day, which will bring the total to thirteen. Then two more are to be introduced next week, which would bring the total to fifteen. If we go on at that pace, before many weeks have elapsed there will be no opportunities left.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Does the hon. member not hope that there will be no session left?

Mr. STIRLING: I may have all kinds of hopes, but they are not going to terminate this session before a great many weeks have passed. We have not seen the budget yet, and we have not discussed the three defence services which in past years have been discussed for weeks and weeks on the war appropriations. I suggest once more to the government that we should be chary about introducing more departments into committee of supply at this stage of the session.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I accepted the suggestion of the leader of the opposition.

[Mr. Mackenzie.]

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up the remarks of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). A few days ago the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Ilsley) made an appeal for the operation of these plants in order that containers might be provided for food. I know that right after that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) became very active. No hon. member from British Columbia has done more in connection with the settlement of this strike than the hon. member for Fraser Valley. He has spent in the neighbourhood of $200 on telephone messages; he has met with union representatives, and he has spent a considerable amount on telegrams. Along with other hon. members, I have personal knowledge of the work he has been doing.

Following the appeal of the Acting Prime Minister, and largely because of what was done by one private member of this house with the support of other hon. members, the union have agreed to go back to work in these factories if the government will put a controller in charge and agree that negotiations shall continue while they are at work. We cannot understand why the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will not take that action at this time when British Columbia is short of containers for fruit and other perishable products.

Even if these factories commence operations at the present time the tree fruit industry—the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) will agree with this statement—will be short of containers this year. What is the reason for the delay in this action? Most people know that in British Columbia within three or four weeks it is customary, particularly in the coast area, for the logging companies to shut down on account of the hazardous fire situation. Cannot the Minister of Labour visualize; cannot he possibly see that, if this dispute is prolonged any longer and the fire season comes, we shall then have a heavy slugging match between the big operators in British Columbia and the union? That would be a most deplorable situation. It would not benefit the strikers or the operators or the community. I urge the minister to give consideration to the appointment of a controller in the box manufacturing and container manufacturing plants. That at least would be a step in the right direction.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) this afternoon referred to some facts which I brought to his attention appearing in the Kamloops Sentinel, which I received to-day. For the information of the house and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) I should like to give these facts and figures to reinforce what has already been said with regard to the strike. In its issue of June 12 the Kamloops Sentinel reports an address by a veteran millman before the board of trade, in which the speaker said:

The box requirements of the whole upcountry's fruit and vegetable industry represent 55,000,000 feet of timber. It would be physically impossible for the mills to saw this amount in the time left before the harvest is in full flood.

The 460,000 fruit and vegetable containers needed for the Kamloops district's crop represent 20,000,000 feet of lumber. Only 50,000 of the boxes have been processed.

Further down:

The grower's survey led to the conclusion that "even if the mills resumed production to-morrow there probably would not be enough shooks produced to market the province's crops."

Dealing with the Okanagan valley, it has this to say:

At Penticton it was estimated that if production had resumed June 10 there should be enough containers to handle the big crop. After that date there would be a daily shortage of 5,000 boxes—a potential money value loss of $10,000 daily.

At Summerland the picture was even grimmer. The mill advised growers some time ago it could not supply the shooks ordered even if plant operation were not interrupted. Every day this mill is strike-bound 8,000 apple boxes are lost and the growers lose about $16,000 daily. No cherry boxes have yet been delivered.

At Kelowna, Simpson's, the largest mill in the interior, despite fairly steady operations from October to May 17, had delivered only slightly over 40 per cent of shooks ordered. At normal production rate it will require five months to catch up with orders. Capacity of the plant is determined by lumber supplied and it is short nearly 3,000,000 feet. It can produce 10,000 apple boxes a day.

At Vernon growers estimate a shortage of 8,000 boxes daily, with a daily loss to the community of $16,000.

There is a good deal more of the same sort of facts, but I think I have given sufficient in concrete proof of the loss facing the people in the interior of British Columbia.

As regards the strike itself, there have been some developments which have not perhaps been brought out in the statements made here in the house. One of the most interesting ones is that the union made a proposal to the British Columbia fruit growers' association that if they would support the union's wage and certain other demands they would put men back into the box factories. There was great hope that that would produce a resumption of work in the box factories, but it did not take place for the following reason—I am quoting from the same article:

The union, according to J. R. J. Stirling, the president of the association, also reserved the right to stipulate which employees could work during the truce because "there were certain former mill employees whom the union would not recognize."

The growers' association countered with an offer whereby the box factory employees would return under pre-strike conditions, with the British Columbia fruit growers' association guaranteeing to the workers the award on which the strike is eventually composed.

Also blocking acceptance of the I.W.A.'s three-week "truce" proposal was the reaction of national war labour board, when questioned by the British Columbia fruit growers' association as to the legal position.

I should like the Minister of Labour to listen to this because I am going to ask him some questions arising out of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Ask all the questions you want.

Mr. FULTON: The minister is in an unusually generous mood. Perhaps he can produce a settlement of the strike. The article goes on:

The national war labour board declared that there could be no conciliation until the men returned to work on the pre-strike basis, and the board also announced it would not authorize any wage increase such as set out in the union's "truce" offer.

The regional war labour board also indicated that there would be no isolated local increase in wages such as might come about if, for instance, a group of growers in desperate need of boxes underwrote the operation of a box factory on the I.W.A. basis.

So that hope of resumption of work in the box factories came to nothing.

In the previous discussion on this question, several hon. members suggested that in order to provide a means of settling and preventing strikes a labour code should be devised. This question has received considerable discussion. The only existing labour code is P.C. 1003. It perhaps would not be well to go into the merits or demerits of P.C. 1003, but such as it is, it is the only labour code we have. It is my understanding that it does provide a set of rules by which disputes may be submitted to arbitration and in accordance with which they should be settled. That constitutes a set of rules which must be complied with before a strike can be called. If my understanding is not correct, I would appreciate it if the Minister of Labour would correct it. The merits or demerits of the code do not enter into the question. It is the only code we have. I would ask the Minister of Labour this question. Is the present lumber strike in British Columbia an illegal strike in view of the terms of P.C. 1003? If so, why have not the penalty terms of that order been complied with in an effort to end the strike?

I would appreciate it if the minister would answer these questions. In conjunction with other members from British Columbia, I would urge him to lose no time in appointing a controller in the box factories in an effort to get the men back to work.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have listened to the hon. members here this afternoon and I was particularly impressed by the speech made by my hon. friend the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I do not think anything is to be gained by trying to be clever or smart, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Stewart) tried to be this afternoon. When he gets older and has more experience in this chamber he will understand that we can carry on only by being decent to one another, instead of sinking into the gutter like he did this afternoon.

No one underestimates the difficulties and complexities of the present situation. While the final responsibility rests upon myself, I think there is a responsibility on every member of this House of Commons, when he rises in his place, to give at least some leadership. Here we are passing through a difficult period in which we find an emotional breakdown after a long war. I do not believe that there is any short-cut to the settlement of industrial disputes. I have had enough experience to understand that. I also know that all the faults are not on one side. I know, of course, that politically it is always best to take the side of the larger numbers. You are not taking any chances when you do that; it is a perfectly safe thing to do. But what we are endeavouring to do in this country—I speak of the Canadian people generally—and what this House of Commons irrespective of party is trying to do, is, I believe, to protect the living standards of the great masses of the people of this dominion. I say that without any equivocation. While our approach may be different, I think that in the main that is the underlying motive of all the members of this chamber.

There is a philosophy or an ideology of government which holds that when you debase the currency, revolution is around the corner. There is no secret about that. Lenin preached it prior to the 1917 revolution in Russia. You may have read in last week's Newsweek what Mr. Earl Browder recently said in Moscow. In effect, what he said was that, now that the war is over, the more strikes we have, the nearer the revolution is. That is a matter of record. I say sincerely that I believe more can be done by negotiation and conciliation than in any other way. One of the Social Credit members spoke this afternoon about compulsory arbitration. I do not think he understood the import of his language.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I did not say "compulsory" arbitration.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait a minute. I listened to you. Now let me speak.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Then get it right.

Mr. MITCHELL: The effect of what the hon. member said was compulsory arbitration.

Mr. JOHNSTON: No such thing.

Mr. MITCHELL: If you say a thing you have to take the other fellow's interpretation. This is still a free country. I say that the import of my hon. friend's remarks was that there should be compulsory arbitration.

Mr. JOHNSTON: It was no such a thing. That is the minister's misinterpretation of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall be charitable to my hon. friend. Probably he meant nothing at all. However, if I cannot satisfy him, for goodness' sake let me say something of what I feel about compulsory arbitration. Neither employers' organizations nor labour organizations in North America agree with the principle of compulsory arbitration. Conditions are always difficult when one side says, "Now this is as far as we are going; we won't go any farther." The greatest progress has been made by labour and employers' organizations in this country when there has been a willingness to give and take, without resort to what labour men call the economic arm of the labour movement. As I said before, we have been reasonably successful. When you reflect that under the wartime labour relations order there have been thirty-two hundred odd cases, and only eight strikes, I think that is a pretty fair batting average.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) talked about an offer which he had received from some individual in connection with this dispute in British Columbia, to put these plants back into operation. He may have received it, but I did not. He showed me the wire, and I had the information relayed back to British Columbia, but we did not get the same kind of answer which he got from this individual. I believe that the offer of fifteen cents an hour and the revocable check-off is a fair compromise and that there is no sufficient reason for the non-acceptance of that offer by the trade union out there. At the same time I would say to the shipping companies on the great lakes that the 84-hour week is a relic of bygone days of industrial operations. Let us be frank about the matter; in this day and age, any group of employers who think they can put over the proposition of a 12-hour day and a 7-day week might as well try to push back the St. Lawrence. It cannot be done. I believe that, given the right degree of conciliation in both these disputes, there is absolutely no reason why they should have ever started. Working people never win by a strike. The leaders may get prominence; they may make a national reputation for themselves; but the men and women back in the trenches, the rank and file, have to sacrifice so heavily that often it takes them a long time to recover, and sometimes they never catch up. I believe that success in industrial leadership, whether on the part of employers or employees, requires them to have some regard for the rank and file. They are simple people, like myself, they have a spark of the divine in their make-up, and I believe that sometimes these "ships that pass in the night" are not giving the leadership which the workers justly desire and deserve.

Coming to the question of "passing the buck," let me tell the hon. member from British Columbia who raised it that I am not given to that practice, and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) knows it very well. I accept full responsibility in the matter of the British Columbia dispute so far as my responsibility goes. But by the very nature of things, having been asked by the minister of labour of British Columbia to appoint a commissioner, I must confer with him and the commissioner in connection with the settlement of this dispute. Obviously the federal Minister of Labour in a country as vast as Canada cannot be responsible for every dispute which takes place anywhere in any province. I believe every hon. member will recognize that. In the course of time, and in my opinion within not a very long time, the constitutional jurisdiction in connection with labour disputes will have to be returned to the provinces. There is a good deal of sloppy talk about the centralization of power; but, as any lawyer knows, you cannot break a law by agreement. The only reason we have a national labour code in this country at the moment is that the power was included in the jurisdiction of my department under the War Measures Act. My hon. friends opposite have their opinions about legislation by order in council, and I hope it will be possible in the not very distant future to put the jurisdiction back where it properly belongs.

It is getting near six o'clock, and I have said all that I care to say at the moment. Hon. members can rest assured that when responsibility in relation to the settlement of these disputes is placed upon me, I will not shirk it.

Mr. FULTON: Did the minister intend to answer the question about P.C. 1003?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FULTON: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) neglected to answer two questions I asked him just before the house rose at six o'clock. I wonder whether the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) would be kind enough to permit the minister to give the answers now. I asked whether the lumbermen's strike in British Columbia is an illegal strike within the meaning of order in council P.C. 1003? If so, why are the provisions of that order in council not applied?

Mr. MITCHELL: I cannot answer without the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. FULTON: I appreciate that.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): The discussion on the motion to go into supply has ranged over a rather wide field. Under such circumstances it is the privilege, of course, of an hon. member to bring forward whatever matter seems to him to have some importance; but the discussion as opened by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) had to do with the two main strikes now in process in Canada, and I intend to say what I wish to say on this matter and, if possible, to bring the attention of the house back to that issue in particular.

I listened, as I always do, with great interest to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) in his reply. I was particularly struck with the remark which he made as regards the responsibility of members of the house as well as the responsibility which devolves upon him as Minister of Labour. With that I wholeheartedly agree; and it is because I have some feeling of responsibility as a representative in this house, and feel something of the urgency of the subject itself, that I make the remarks that I am about to make.

I should like to say also that I appreciate perhaps more than most the abilities of the minister. I appreciate some of the problems with which he has to contend, and I hope that nothing that I say will ruffle his feelings or make his problem any more difficult; for it is most certainly something that I do not wish to do. But having said that, I would say that his speech was more discouraging than I felt it ought to be in the circumstances. He gave us a few homely truths which I do not suppose anybody will dispute; in fact they are so commonplace and so well known as to be almost hackneyed. He told us, very truly, that there are no short-cuts to settling strikes of this kind. He also said that there are faults on both sides—there usually are. We all agree that these two things are true in this strike as in many others. But it must be a challenge to the genius of the minister himself and to the imagination of this house to find as short a cut as possible to settle the strike, to find out on which side the greatest fault lies, and to find a method of bringing some measure of justice to bear upon the situation.

I believe the minister allows a prejudice which many people feel against communism to influence his mind in this matter. He referred to some speech that a Mr. Browder had made in Russia to the effect that the more strikes we had the better for the revolution, or something to that effect. I am not very much interested in Mr. Browder or in his views in so far as they apply to the present situation. It may very well be that there are communists in the leadership of this strike; I do not know; but I do not think that it is the point at issue with us here. It is far more important that we should examine the conditions of the workers who are taking part in these strikes and satisfy ourselves that there is or is not, as the case may be, a just cause for these strikes. If there is a just cause for the strikes, then we must not allow our prejudice against any particular leader to prevent us from seeing that justice is done.

The minister himself roundly condemned the 84-hour week and said in language something like this, that you might as well try to push back the St. Lawrence as to prevent the ultimate coming of the 8-hour day. He says that it cannot be done. But the great fact is that it is being done; that it is going on before the minister's face and before our faces while we are talking about it. Therefore there is no use saying that it cannot be done. It is being done and we are faced with that outstanding fact.

I should like to point out that, according to the information which I have, there are some 5,800 seamen affected by the seamen's strike. I am informed that there are as many as 37,000 affected by the woodworkers' strike in British Columbia. To imply that we should be careless about taking active part in settling a strike because it is alleged that some communist is in the leadership—I may not be interpreting the minister's remarks aright, but that is how I got it—is to ignore the actual conditions which govern the lives of 37,000 men in British Columbia and 5,800 seamen. That is the point that we must centre our attention on.

The Canadian great lakes seamen work twelve hours a day seven days a week. That is the first fact. That is the pivot of the strike. That is the condition for which they are seeking a remedy. The question which we have to ask ourselves is whether that is a reasonable demand of men in this age; or if it is reasonable for shipowners to use all their power, all their skill and all their finances to prevent such a thing from happening. It seems to me that should be the chief business of the representatives of the people in this house, because this is not merely a matter of the wage-earners; it is not a matter merely of the shipowners, or both of them. It is a matter of the economic life of this nation. It is also a matter of particular urgency because of world conditions as we know them. To-day we heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) review what he said appeared to be a dangerous situation in the world, and say that he thought more production and better distribution were the best remedy he could see for the world problem. I think most of us will agree, but here is a situation in which production has stopped and distribution has ceased; and by permitting that to go on we are increasing the dangers to which the Prime Minister made reference this afternoon.

The 8-hour day for seamen was recommended by the international labour office of the league of nations in 1920. That was a long time ago, and this house has had ample opportunity to take some action on that question. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) that since these seamen are not confined to one province; since they are on the oceans on both sides of the country and sail the great lakes in the centre of Canada, it is not a matter which any provincial government can handle. It is specifically a matter for the federal government to take a hand in. I suggest that the seamen's strike for an 8-hour day should never have happened in Canada; that legislation should have been passed long since making it illegal for men to have to work twelve hours a day seven days a week or lose their jobs. I am not saying that all the responsibility or blame should fall upon the Minister of Labour. I accept my share of that responsibility, together with all other hon. members; but I insist that this is something which ought to have been done long ago. When I speak of that recommendation, though it was endorsed by the delegates representing Canada it has never been ratified by this house, and most certainly it never has been implemented.

This condition, then, in my opinion should have been corrected by legislation; but instead of that being done, I am informed that when a certain company offered to introduce the 8-hour day on the great lakes the war labour board refused to countenance it. I am quoting now from the brief of the Canadian seamen's union, which says:

> Recently the Imperial Oil and the McColl-Frontenac Oil Company, who operate oil tankers on the lakes, applied to the national war labour board for permission to abolish the 84-hour week and to replace it with the eight-hour day, 56-hour week. Unbelievable though it may sound, the war labour board so interpreted P.C. 9384 that they refused these oil companies the right to introduce the eight-hour day.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I may point out to my hon. friend, that is not a statement of fact. The war labour board approved the 8-hour day on that application.

Mr. IRVINE: The minister says that is not a statement of fact. Then, of course, the judgment must lie as between the minister and the brief, and I am not competent to judge as between the two.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am saying that on my responsibility as a minister; that the war labour board approved the 8-hour day on the application to which my hon. friend has referred. That is Imperial Oil, is it?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then that was approved.

Mr. IRVINE: Well, as I say, Mr. Speaker, I shall leave the minister and those who drew up the brief to settle that matter; but it is not too late yet for the government to act.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am talking about the judgment of the board. I am not talking about something which was written by somebody else, probably for propaganda purposes.

Mr. IRVINE: I have no intention of disputing the minister's word. I merely quoted what was given to me as fact. Personally I do not know which is the fact. I must take one or the other, or both, or neither; perhaps in the long run I may take neither, but for the present I must accept the minister's statement. It is urgent, however, that our ships should be running now as they never ran before. The need for them is even greater, if that be possible, than during the war years. I suggest that the minister now introduce legislation for an 8-hour day for the seamen of Canada and that it be rushed through, with the three readings at one sitting if necessary, thus making it illegal for the shipowners to have men working twelve hours a day on their ships; and failing that, to put in a controller and take over the shipping until such time as settlement has been reached. I need hardly point out that the 8-hour day for sailors is universally accepted. Certainly it is accepted in the United States, in Great Britain, in New Zealand, in Australia, and, indeed, in all other forward-looking countries. How is it that Canada should be so backward in a matter of this kind?

I think we should note also that the seamen's union did not press for the 8-hour day during the war period. They did not permit anything to interfere with the uninterrupted operation of Canada's merchant marine. It is worth noting also that a thousand of these men went down with Canadian ships while carrying on the business of war. I think we ought to be a little more considerate of their case when we realize the real sacrifices they have made and are making to the economic life of Canada. The 8-hour day was promised by the shipowners during the war. They said that when the war was over the 8-hour day would be granted, but when the war was ended the shipowners refused to keep their promise. In 1945, when the unions were negotiating the agreement under which they were operating before the strike took place, they pressed their claim again. Still the shipowners refused, and the agreement under which they were operating was signed only after a clause had been included which permitted the renegotiation of any clause to take place on the giving of ten days' notice by either of the parties.

So it is not true, as someone has suggested, to say that in calling this strike these men have violated their trust with the employers. However, the union took advantage of this clause to call the strike when they had failed to negotiate satisfactory arrangements with the shipowners. But even when the strike had been called, they still strove to have it settled by negotiation before the actual strike took place. Accordingly they applied to the Minister of Labour. The minister acted. I understand he called a conference for April 8. On that date representatives of the unions appeared, but the shipowners had disappeared. They refused to meet; hence the conference was abortive.

Having failed in this, the union called their strike on April 9, or at least called a strike vote; whereupon the ship owners countered with expensive and elaborate advertising in many of the daily papers of Canada, issuing strong press statements to the effect that they would fight the seamen to the last against their demands for an 8-hour day.

We now come to the question: Can the shipowners afford to pay for an 8-hour day? I am not going to enter into the profits they made during the war, although that might very well be done. But I would say that morally this nation cannot afford to allow the continuation of a 12-hour day, seven days a week. Any industry which cannot afford to employ its men on an 8-hour day should either cease operation or be subsidized by the public, so that one class of worker may not have to bear more than its share of the national burden.

United States lake shipowners have an 8-hour day. Not only do they have an 8-hour day; they pay from 50 per cent to 95 per cent higher wages each month to their men than is paid by Canadian companies, and they receive exactly the same rates or charges for the freight they move. An American able seaman on the lakes receives $216 a month for an 8-hour day, while a Canadian able seaman receives $112 a month for a 12-hour day.

Mr. MITCHELL: And board, in both cases.

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Making another $50.

Mr. IRVINE: That is for both, and does not alter the relationship. An American deck-hand receives $166 for an 8-hour day, while the Canadian deck-hand receives $89 for a 12-hour day, despite the fact that both companies charge the same rate.

Here is a Canadian ship loading grain in a Canadian port alongside a United States ship loading grain from the same elevator. They are both bound for the same port; both carry the same grain for the same freight rate. Yet there is this differential both in hours of labour and in wages paid as between the United States and Canadian companies.

Those of us who are proud of Canada, and are going some day to be proud of the Canadian flag waving over us, ought to see to it that under that flag our working people have at least as good a chance to live as those under any other flag in the world. If the United States companies can afford to pay the wages they are paying, and give an 8-hour day to their seamen, when they are hauling the same goods as our men are hauling for the same freight rates, then I want to know what justification there is for our permitting Canadian seamen to work twelve hours a day, seven days a week for almost half the wages being paid by competitive companies in another country.

I need hardly refer to the condition in connection with the great strike in British Columbia. Most of us are aware of the need for more and more lumber. All hon. members have been impressed by the pleadings of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), and his efforts to save the fruit crops in his constituency and province. I am told they have in sight only about 40 per cent of the amount of lumber required to take care of the fruit crops this year. In a time like this, when foodstuffs have greater value than ever before in the history of Canada, there is a real urgency for immediate action on the part of the house and of the Minister of Labour.

I would plead that we lay aside whatever prejudices we may have in respect of any particular individual in connection with the leadership of these strikes, that we look at the great number of men affected, that we examine the facts and the conditions under which they are working, and that we take action on those grounds, and on no other.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a word to those who spoke this afternoon regarding the situation in British Columbia. First, may I comment upon the question asked by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I do not pretend for a moment to answer the question the minister was asked, because he answered his questions ably, himself.

But when the hon. member asks a question regarding an illegal strike I think we might as well face the facts. The unions draw up agreements with the owners of factories. Certain clauses appear in those agreements, one of which is that a fine of $20 and a gaol sentence shall apply to all strikers who shall participate in an illegal strike. How could you take 37,000 men who are on strike and put them in gaol, even if you did declare their strike illegal? It does not seem to make sense. We may as well face that fact, instead of saying to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), "Why do you not enforce this clause respecting illegal strikes"? It simply cannot be done. In future agreements drawn up between workers and either provincial or federal governments, I suggest that we should be more careful and not include in the orders in council clauses which cannot be reasonably enforced.

When I last spoke in the house it was pointed out to the minister just how serious the strike had become, so far as its effect on the fruit crop was concerned. But as the strike continues, it begins to affect other branches of produce as well. As recently as Saturday last the hon. member for Fraser Valley and myself, who are members of the Fraser valley milk producers' association, received telegrams from that association saying that if they did not receive barrels and boxes at an early day the canned milk and powdered milk which they produce for shipment to Great Britain could not be made available. As time goes on, we find matters getting worse every day.

I would refer for a moment to the strike which took place last fall. At that time cans already manufactured were available in the factories in British Columbia, but the workers went on strike and refused to allow the farmers who were growing peas to get cans from the factories. The farmers had to stand by and see their produce wilt and spoil. After days and days of loss, the government finally did step in and take charge of the situation, and some of the crop was saved. I appeal to the minister this evening not to allow this thing to go on and on until there is no crop and then in the last days step in and take charge of some of these factories. At that time it may be too late.

I realize the difficulties faced by the minister. We all know that the unions want to force the government to use the big stick on the owners. We may as well be frank about the matter. If the government do that in one instance, they will have to do it in every instance that occurs across the country. These matters have not been stated until now, but we may as well face the facts, and I think what I have just mentioned are the facts of the situation.

I urge the minister to do what he did in the canners' strike. If he puts in a controller I feel reasonably sure that it will not be long before a complete settlement takes place. I am assured of that by those who are handling the situation in British Columbia.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended making a speech to-night, but I want to support once again the appeal made this afternoon to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). As we approached the weekend we had high hopes that when Monday morning came around we would hear that this strike in British Columbia had been satisfactorily settled. I listened to the questions put to the minister this afternoon by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and the minister's answers. His answer to the first question was no, that the strike was not over. The second question was if he were going to put a controller into these plants and open them immediately, and the answer was no. I think that came more or less as a shock to many of us.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say "no" to the second question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. MITCHELL: Just wait a minute.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We have waited for three weeks.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I remember correctly, what I said was, "no", to the first question; and to the second question with reference to a controller, that consideration was being given.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): That is exactly the answer that the minister gave to me personally last week. I appealed to him and showed him certain telegrams that we were receiving from some of the fruit growers of British Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I might say to my hon. friend—

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): No; the minister made his speech this afternoon.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is a matter of privilege.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The matter of privilege is always your way.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think there should be some ethics as between my hon. friend and myself. If he and I had a confidential conversation last week—and I have a vivid recollection that it was considered to be within the four corners of this room—and then he comes and repeats that conversation in this house, then there is no more conversation. You cannot deal with one another on that basis.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): On a question of privilege, I want to say to the minister right here and now that I have not repeated any of the conversation he had with me. I am merely stating the answer he gave in this house this afternoon.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is changing your tune.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): That is the word the minister gave publicly in the house this afternoon. The hon. member for Fraser Valley—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): —has tried his best.

Mr. MITCHELL: Unless my hon. friend changes the record, you can read the record of what he said this evening and see that he said, "last week."

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): The minister should read the record of what he said this afternoon. The hon. member for Fraser Valley has tried consistently not to take sides in this dispute, and I have tried to do the same thing. I realized that the minister was doing his best through the appointed officials in British Columbia to settle this dispute. But what is the use of appealing for more and more production in Canada? I have listened to appeals such as that made this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and then I see the hypocritical attitude taken by the government in refusing to do something when there is an appeal from all over the country for immediate action.

As the minister said this afternoon, we ought to deal with this matter constructively. I think every word I have said in this house so far regarding this strike situation has been constructive. I have tried to follow the position in which the minister found himself. But what do we have here? Week after week the strike is going on and day after day there is in British Columbia considerable loss of fruit which we can ill spare. This is fruit that should have been saved. We are told that even if the mills began to operate to-night they could not begin to supply containers for the fruit that is still to come. I appeal to the minister to put himself in solid with the people of British Columbia by placing a controller in these mills.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would my hon. friend go in and knock the dollar down to seventy-five cents in Vancouver, British Columbia, and allow the working classes to suffer?

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): My appeal is to put in a controller at once and get these box factories opened. Then you can allow the ordinary procedure to work in order to settle the strike, no matter how long it takes. Why should so many innocent people suffer because of the attitude of this government? My appeal is to put in a controller and then let them work it out themselves, as I believe they will.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I want to add my voice to those who are asking the minister to step in and take the necessary action to bring this strike to an end. I do not suppose there is really anything I can say that has not been said this afternoon, and I am not going to speak very long. This afternoon the minister asked the members of the house for leadership. In my view the members of the house have given him an almost unanimous expression of opinion. The members of his own party, the Progressive Conservative party, the C.C.F. and I believe the Social Credit party, although I am not certain because I have not heard them in this debate, will be behind him in taking whatever steps he finds necessary in the public interest to bring this strike to an end at once.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That is exactly what we said.

Mr. MERRITT: I was not in the house when the hon. member spoke. That is a simple proposition. Surely the minister must know that if he has the whole house behind him he has the country behind him. He can give the leadership that he spoke of to-day without any fear of any consequences ensuing therefrom.

Mr. MITCHELL: If you take over the industry and they do not go back to work, what then?

Mr. MERRITT: All I can say to the minister is that we have in British Columbia a situation where the chief industry of the province is tied up by a strike affecting thirty-seven thousand people. The production of berries and all other forms of food is being affected, as well as lumber supplies for UNRRA and Great Britain and those required in Canada for housing purposes. All these activities have been stopped by this strike. The strike, incidentally, has been declared illegal by the provincial minister of labour. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) was asked to give his opinion on that point but so far he has not given it. We have had ample conciliation procedure, and we have had a report from a highly respected judge who knows the lumber business intimately from his own experience. His report has been made after a very fair and long hearing given to all parties. We have the Minister of Labour here saying that the union should accept that report not only as being a fair report but as being in the interests of the men themselves, because all this time they are losing wages. We have the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) calling for production. Most important of all perhaps, we have all the newspapers in British Columbia, the organs of public opinion, of absolutely one mind, that neither the interests of the operators nor the interests of the men are any longer the matter of prime importance, but that the interests of the people of Canada, and particularly of British Columbia, together with the needs of the whole world at this time, should be the dominent and compelling factors in this situation.

I think what is going through the minds of the members of this house is, first, the absolute necessity of constructive action being taken at once so that something will be saved of these supplies—

Mr. MITCHELL: I am looking for a way out. Would my hon. friend give me an indication of constructive action? Would he conscript labour, or what would he do? Let us bring this out into the open.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The men have offered to go back to work.

Mr. MERRITT: When the minister interrupted me with his questions—and I will come to them later—I was dealing with what I think are the two most important considerations. First, there is the necessity for speed so that something will be saved. Second, this house believes, certainly I believe, that the conciliation procedure provided by P.C. 1003 has been exhausted. We have been given no idea of what further steps the minister proposes to take. We have held off during the past weeks because we realized that there were conciliation procedures which could be followed and nobody wanted to make the minister's task more difficult. But when he spoke this afternoon he did not carry us anywhere past the provisions of P.C. 1003 or indicate to us any other measures that could be taken in a deadlock of this kind.

In normal deadlocks, once the conciliation procedure has failed, under our present law the parties are left to work out their own difficulties among themselves. But all members of the house are at one in believing that such a course cannot be followed in this case, but that some new departure in the realm of labour relations must be taken.

The minister asked me to say what further steps he could take. Naturally I am not as qualified as he is to indicate those steps. But I should have thought he had in mind several steps that he could take, and it makes me apprehensive that he should have asked me for advice because it indicates that apart from the appointment of a controller he feels there is nothing he can do.

Certainly the appointment of a controller of these plants would be one way in which a solution might be found. The minister suggests that the men might not go back to work. That is a chance that the minister must take, and from what I know of public opinion in this country, particularly in British Columbia, I believe that if the minister puts in a controller the men will go back to work. But if he should find that his fears are realized and that on putting in a controller the men will not go back to work, there may be other ways of dealing with the situation. In this particular strike—and I say this without reference to any other labour disputes—because the situation is so serious and the people of Canada, with the exception of the leaders of this union, are at one that it should be settled at once, I suggest to the minister that this is one case where, even if he were reluctant to do it as he well might be in every case, he might well invoke the penalty provisions of P.C. 1003, not, as the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) said, against the innocent men who form this union, but rather against the central body that called this illegal strike and thereby put the whole public of Canada and the needs of so many people in other parts of the world in such peril.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I know this debate is becoming irksome to the members on the other side of the house. However, I consider this matter of greater importance than the new flag. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) a few moments ago waved the flag a bit and said that he hoped that some day under that flag the conditions which the people of Canada fought for in two wars would become established. Of course, if waving the flag would solve this problem the Conservative party would have solved it years ago. But it is going to take more than just waving a flag.

We have been discussing in this house for weeks and weeks matters that are merely incidental in comparison with the major economic problems that face this country, and I say that after due consideration. I think the problem upon which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) focused the attention of the house this afternoon is one upon which we might well spend two or three days of debate with a view to settling it. You can condemn the employers and you can condemn the men of the union, but in the final analysis it is the members of this House of Commons to whom the people of Canada are looking for advice and guidance in matters of this kind. They cannot be settled outside.

I am not going to deal with the woodworkers' problem in British Columbia because that has already been dealt with by the members from that province.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: But we have had no answer yet.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, you voted for the government. You cannot blame me.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We might get some help from you.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member for Fraser Valley has done such a capable job himself that my assistance is hardly necessary. The hon. member for Vancouver East this afternoon focused attention specifically on the Canadian seamen's union disturbance and it is with that I shall deal. I have sat here and listened to the other members who have spoken, each discussing and developing the question from his own angle, and I think it must be obvious even to the minister that what he is doing will not settle these two strikes.

I am going to deal for a few minutes with the minister's difficulties. I think the machinery with which the minister has to work to-day in the federal department of labour invites difficulties of this kind. It is slow, cumbersome, legalistic, academic; it does not understand the basic problems of the workers, with the result that we have the kind of friction which has developed in this case. I have only to mention the steelworkers' union in Sydney. For four and a half years they have been patient and long-suffering, down on their knees, praying the regional and national war labour boards for a nickel to wipe out the differential in their wage rates. They are still praying, waiting and hoping. Fortunately the people of Nova Scotia have great patience. The seamen and the woodworkers are a little more impetuous, and as a result the minister has these difficulties on his hands. But I think the delay of four and a half years which I have mentioned is a good example of what I mean, and the case is still "in the slings". The seamen, heaven knows, have been waiting since 1920 for someone to implement the 8-hour day for them. Internationally, everybody said they were entitled to it, and twenty years is a long time to wait. But what I was going to point out to the minister is that the time to stop strikes is before they start, and if some attention had been paid to this problem a couple of months ago, instead of the government sitting back and waiting for a divine providence to intervene, the trouble might not have developed into a strike.

The minister is faced, in settling the difficulty with the seamen, with the unfortunate fact that the antagonisms which have been allowed to creep in will not be permitted to be forgotten for the next twenty years. I am sorry the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) is not in his seat at the moment, because I am going to be a bit legal at this time. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), of course, is interested in this too, and I am glad he is in his seat. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), some considerable time ago, and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) raised in this house the question of the status under the Canada Shipping Act of Canadian seamen who were ordered by their union off their boats because of difficulties with their employers in a collective agreement under the Canada Shipping Act. Leaving a ship without the permission of the captain could be construed as deserting the ship, and so would bring the men under the criminal code. The minister at that time stated that it was not the problem of the Department of Transport, that the strikers more properly came within the scope of the criminal code. That is now evident, because these men were arrested for deserting their ship. Somebody asked the question this afternoon if they thought the laws of the union took precedence over the laws of the country. I say no; there is not any conflict. I went through the mill on this question, so that I know something about it; I had lawyers and judges waving their hands at me for some considerable time over it. Any trades union is entitled to make laws to discipline, regulate and guide its own members within its own jurisdiction without contravening any of the laws of the country. That decision was handed down at a time when I happened to be present. I do not say that it is in Beauchesne. Under the formula worked out by the government and accepted by the union, all employees are entitled to return to the ships except those who may have committed acts which brought them under the criminal code. In my opinion, when that strike terminates, any seamen who were on strike, regardless of their position at the present time, should go back to their ships, because the men who came off these boats and are now being tried under the criminal code merely obeyed the instructions of their organization, as other members did who came off later. The individual is not at fault, it is the organization which accepts responsibility; and by sending most of the seamen back, with that group out, and in the toils of the law, you are starting the first blacklist and providing legal machinery for discrimination. In my opinion all these men should be permitted to go back to their boats.

I said a moment ago that antagonisms have crept into this strike. When it developed first it was orderly and quiet. There were no disturbances. But I drew to the attention of the Minister of Justice in this house that there was a private detective agency in Montreal, the Fidelity Detective Agency, evidence of whose activities has been supplied to us by men who were hired by it. According to affidavits which are in our possession, men were paid $10 a day, provided with transportation in trucks, and sent to the city of Cornwall with instructions that they were to wreck the poolrooms and restaurants and get out of the city as fast as they could, so that these acts of lawlessness might be attributed to members of the seamen's union. That is an old stunt; it is thirty years old; I have seen it a good many times, practised by men imported from the same city. Away back in 1909, 1910 and up to 1925 they took these protectors of private property, put them on horseback, and, armed with all the authority of the state, they would ride you off the sidewalk. That sort of thing has been practised again in the case of the seamen's union. When the Minister of Justice answered a question I asked him on the orders of the day he told me that in so far as his department was concerned they did not enforce the law. That may not be his prerogative; the enforcement of the law may be in the hands of the provincial governments; but the Minister of Justice presides over a body in this country known as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is exclusively under his direction and jurisdiction. If called upon they are required—

Mr. GARDINER: They are provincial police in five provinces.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not hear the minister.

Mr. MITCHELL: They are the only police force in five provinces. Some provinces have provincial police; some provinces avail themselves of the R.C.M.P.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but they can be called in to assist in any section of Canada regardless of the provincial police.

Mr. MITCHELL: At the request of the local attorney general.

Mr. GILLIS: At the request of the local attorney general? Well, we notice that Mr. Blackwell in Ontario is not allergic to police, because he manages to wave his wand and get as many as he wants at any time. The R.C.M.P. were used in Windsor and in Cornwall, and in each case they were requisitioned from this city. If the Minister of Justice has not any prerogative with respect to enforcing the laws, I think this House of Commons, in view of the fact that we make the appropriations which maintain that force, should have some understanding as to what they should be used for. I am not critical of the R.C.M.P. in their ordinary duties, but I do not think it was ever the intention of those who first mobilized the force that they should be used as strike-breakers across Canada when the workers of this country are looking for something to which they are legitimately entitled.

The Minister of Justice should accept some responsibility at least in investigating this detective agency which hired people in Montreal and shipped them to Cornwall with instructions to turn the public against the seamen who are on strike looking for the establishment of the 8-hour day and small increases in wages. It is time that we found out whether that kind of thing is to be permitted. I am reasonably certain that if this upheaval had not taken place in Cornwall and if McMaster had not established a recruiting agency—and I have an affidavit here with regard to McMaster which I shall read for the minister's benefit; it was sent to Mr. M. J. Coldwell—

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member does not need to tell me anything about McMaster; I know all about him.

Mr. GILLIS: He is allowed to run wild in Montreal; to act as the Al Capone of the shipping companies in organizing gangsters for the purpose of injecting them into a legitimate labour dispute in order—

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is not going to put these words into my mouth.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not.

Mr. MITCHELL: "The moving finger writes and having writ moves on." Let me put the matter straight. I was speaking of McMaster as a trade unionist.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister laughs.

Mr. GILLIS: I appreciate the minister's position. As minister he has to be dignified and he cannot call a thug a thug. He has to call him Gentleman Jim or something of that kind. But I am in the habit of using plain English in matters of this kind. What I am concerned about is the pattern which is being developed in the seamen's strike, and which is apt to spread to other industries if they get away with it.

The minister will remember the little steel formula and the strike-breaking in the United States some years ago. They were successful in exposing it after a lot of men went to gaol, suffered injunctions, broken heads and the rest of it. We do not wish to go through that kind of thing in this country. In my opinion it is that kind of action which is making it difficult for the minister. You have the employer standing behind barbed wire, completely alienated from his employees. You have the employee who has seen that mess at Cornwall.

It is that complex which makes the employee feel that the employer is the kind of a fellow who will secure a gun to shoot him so long as he does not get behind the eight-ball himself. They may be armed with crowbars, canthooks, peavies, old car springs and anything to smash things up. You cannot feel very kindly toward that kind of employer, and no doubt the employer is ashamed that he was engaged in action of that kind.

The employers of this country might as well understand one thing. They may look upon the unions as pests, but they are not going to get rid of them. They are here to stay; therefore the employers may as well learn to love them, and do business with them.

Mr. MITCHELL: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister said that he knew all about McMaster. I am going to put one epistle on the record to let hon. members know all about him.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that I knew all about him.

Mr. GILLIS: I hold in my hand a letter which was written to Mr. M. J. Coldwell, House of Commons, Ottawa. It is dated June 16, 1946, and was written by the solicitor who is handling the affairs of the seamen's union. It is as follows:

You will possibly remember reading in the Toronto and Montreal newspapers of Friday about certain statements made by H. N. McMaster, president of the national shipping federation, to the effect that the Canadian seamen's union was planning sabotage on our ships in July and other illegal activities. He is further reported as having stated he had eight men who were available to support his statements. We have procured an affidavit from one of these alleged eight men. It gives you the real story behind his statements.

That is the relevant part of the letter to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. This is one of the affidavits which was secured in the province of Quebec. It is as follows:

Province of Quebec,
District of Montreal,

Affidavit

I, the undersigned, John MacPherson Osborne, merchant seaman, residing temporarily at 1434—

This fellow would not tell a lie. I continue.

—St. Urbain street in Montreal, domiciled in the city of Toronto, do hereby solemnly declare:

I am making this declaration of my own free will and volition.

On Friday, June 14, 1946, at about 9.30 a.m., Captain H. N. McMaster, president of the national maritime federation, communicated with me by telephone and asked me to meet him at 11 a.m. in front of the clock tower on McGill university campus.

[Mr. Gillis.]

I met him there at the appointed time, and he was in the company of another man whom I understood to be a Mr. Kelland. He asked me to try to form a policy committee of eight men, preferably members of the Canadian seamen's union, who were dissenters of the union and who would be willing to create confusion and dissension within the ranks of the Canadian seamen's union for the benefit of the ship owners.

He asked me to get these men to meet with certain ship owners whom he did not name at the C.S.L. wharf office on Ottawa street, on June 14, 1946, at eight p.m.

Captain McMaster likewise stated to me that either during the day or during the evening or night of June 14 a "job" would be done either at the Lachine canal or in the Soulanges canal and that it would be made to appear as though the Canadian seamen's union were responsible for this proposed illegal act.

The affidavit is signed by Osborne and his solicitor.

Mr. MITCHELL: What is the name of the solicitor.

Mr. GILLIS: The seamen's union solicitor is Irving Himel. The name of the individual before whom the affidavit was taken is Bernard S. Mergler. They are not Scotch. I continue with the affidavit:

As a matter of fact, on Wednesday night, June 12, at about nine p.m. I was taken to a home in Westmount by Mr. McMaster, where I was introduced to Captain Reoch and to Mr. Campbell, who was supposed to be the host. There were about eight other men there to whom I was not introduced, and I was told by Mr. McMaster that they all represented the owners of various shipping companies. I was questioned by some of the persons there as to what connections I could establish with the Canadian seamen's union and these ship owners told me to keep in communication with Mr. McMaster who would advise me as to what to do.

It was obvious that from my conversations and from my dealings with Mr. McMaster that he was closely connected with and in close cooperation with the ship owners and he was endeavouring to break the Canadian seamen's union for the benefit of the ship owners.

In consideration for my cooperation, Mr. McMaster offered me a job as personnel director of a proposed national seamen's benevolent association which would serve as an employment agency for the ship owners.

I 'phoned C. Sauras at the Canadian seamen's union office in order to give him this information of my own free will.

And I make this solemn declaration . . .

It goes on to give the regular form of declaration. There are several others here which were taken from some of the thugs who were sent in to Cornwall by the detective agency. They were taken after they landed in hospital, and they state who hired them, what they were hired for, and what the remuneration was to be.

It is all right to stand up in the house and to pull the Minister of Labour to pieces, to blame everything on him. We shall have to remember that behind the scenes there are, in my opinion, greater influences in this country than the Minister of Labour or the government. There is an invisible government in this country, and that invisible government is the government which wields economic power. They are in a position to tell the Minister of Labour, or any shipping company, or any steel company, or textile company or packing house or any of these major organizations that they have to play ball or there will be no production. I believe that is going on to-day. I believe that will continue until, not only the minister, but each and every member of this House of Commons accepts the responsibility delegated to him by the constituency which sent him here, namely, to stand up and call a spade a spade.

A thing is right or it is wrong; and in my opinion in a country that has provincial police, mounted police and police of all descriptions it is wrong to allow a detective agency or a private concern of any kind to promote civil strife. They are making it difficult for the minister; they are confusing the public; they are trying to smash legitimate organizations, and it is time we all came to grips with that kind of thing and exposed it. If the only function that agency has to perform is to use hired thugs as catspaws when decent citizens of this country are merely trying to maintain decent standards; if private concerns have the right to promote the sort of thing that was promoted in Cornwall, then I think it is time we folded up and gave up the pretence that we are here representing the people and making laws that are fair and equitable to everybody.

I would not have taken part in the debate to-day at all but for the fact that I too listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) this afternoon. Some members of this group had the privilege of going to Europe in the latter part of 1944. I could not describe what I saw there then, and I can imagine the situation there now in the way of misery and human suffering. This is no time for strikes or interruptions of production on this North American continent. I believe that if the workers of this country are met fairly and squarely, with the cards laid on the table, they will not want to interrupt production. They realized in fighting this war that it was our war; they know we must follow through and attain the objectives for which we fought. One of the first requisites is the establishment of decent standards of living in the countries devastated by war. We should keep our shoulders to the wheel. Every machine in this country to-day should be producing foodstuffs, clothing and everything we can ship to these countries, because it is not going to be possible to solve the problem on this continent alone. The other countries have to be brought up, and we shall not be able to do this by fighting among ourselves and thinking in terms of thirty years ago, as those who are opposing the seamen's union are doing to-day.

I thought this sort of thing belonged in the past, hiring thugs to shoot people who are in legitimate organizations. I believe we should put our foot down and abolish these agencies if they serve no other purposes. They must be able-bodied men, and we should put them to work producing something instead of carrying on activity of that kind in this country in this day and age. There is no use in the Prime Minister going over to Europe and discussing the food problems of that continent with Attlee, Morrison, Cripps and these other people; seeing the situation as it exists there; coming back and trying to impress it upon us in this house and then, when he looks across the country, seeing the chaos which exists in the machinery of production, all over small, trivial matters. I have never yet met with any body of men who would not be fair and reasonable if you sat down with them and put the cards on the table face up. The only time they get suspicious and afraid of you, and do not trust you, is when they see the sort of activities that have been carried on in connection with this seamen's strike.

I see the Minister of Justice is in his seat now. I am not going to repeat everything I have said previously, but I say that the minister presides over the R.C.M.P. I believe they are a decent body of men—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the hon. gentleman permit an interruption, just to suggest this? I listened to what the hon. gentleman said; and if the things described in that affidavit actually took place I agree with everything he said about them. I agree it is outrageous that things like those could happen, but I wanted to suggest to the hon. member that he read the affidavit again now that the Minister of Justice is here. I suggest that this house has a right to know whether these things have taken place. The hon. member is good enough to allow me this interruption, and I should like to ask if he knows any of these men himself, if he thinks they are responsible people. From what he said I gathered that he did not know them. To me the whole thing sounded like a kind of Oppenheim story. If it is true we should know it, and I suggest he should put it right up to the authorities, so that this house and this country may know if these things are true.

Mr. GILLIS: I have already read the entire document. It is on record, and the minister can read it in Hansard. I am quite prepared to accept the statements contained in it, because we did meet with this Mr. Irving Himel, the legal representative of the Canadian seamen's union who is handling this problem. We met with him personally, together with a member of the union; we discussed with them these affidavits, and I believe they are all certified. I do not think any lawyer in this country would draw up a document of that kind and send it to members of the House of Commons, requesting us to make use of it, if it were not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: The local chief of police also made the same statement.

Mr. GILLIS: I think it would be imposing upon the time of the house to read it all again. The Minister of Justice can read in Hansard what I have said about the R.C.M.P., which comes under his department. They can be requisitioned from one end of this country to the other to engage in activities which, in my opinion, are beneath their dignity; that is, when they are called to take part in the sort of situation in connection with which they were sent to Cornwall, where private detective agencies were promoting civil strife and trying to blame it on the seamen's union. The R.C.M.P. should not be involved in a situation of that kind. I have too much respect for them to see them dragged into a mess like that. I do not think they were ever organized for that purpose. When I asked the minister a question in reference to this matter a few days ago he said it was not the prerogative of his department to enforce the laws. I quite agree, but I say that when a body such as the R.C.M.P., which functions under his department, is requisitioned for service in some part of the country, he should be reasonably sure that the service they are going to perform is in keeping with the purposes for which they were organized.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I suggest to the hon. gentleman that the R.C.M.P. had absolutely nothing to do with the mess he speaks of in Cornwall. They went there for one purpose only, to protect government property.

Mr. GILLIS: That is always the excuse. I have heard the same excuse for the last twenty-five years.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is not an excuse; it is a fact.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. GILLIS: Why were they not sent there when these two truckloads of thugs from Montreal invaded Cornwall? One of the first people assaulted in the city of Cornwall was a sergeant of police, who was rescued by members of the Canadian seamen's union. There were no R.C.M.P. requisitioned then.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. The hon. gentleman refers to an officer of the township police—

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly.

Mr. CHEVRIER:—who was placed in that position. I may add that the chief of the township police investigated the circumstances to which my hon. friend refers and charged McMaster and several others, who are now before the Cornwall police court.

Mr. GILLIS: I know that; but you say the mounted police were sent only there to protect government property.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I say they had nothing to do with the mess to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. GILLIS: They were sent to Windsor, also. They were not sent there to protect government property. That is always the excuse, you see, that it is government property or that it is private property; but the same consideration is not shown to those who established that property, who provided the labour and who should have an equity in the property, when they are trying to feed their families, as is the case with members of the Canadian seamen's union. During the process of fighting the war I saw many people in this house weeping salty tears for the Canadian merchant navy, the only part of our forces that fought the war under the banner of free enterprise. Why, if their wages were computed on an hourly basis, they were as low as sixteen cents an hour, working a twelve-hour day. Everyone spoke of the contribution they made, and that was all true. I think in proportion to number they suffered greater losses than any other branch of the service during the war. I do not believe the other branches would have been able to fight the war but for the Canadian merchant marine. They would have starved to death but for them.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No one denies that.

Mr. GILLIS: The war is now over. The seamen were patient and long-suffering. They fought the war; they took their chances and did not interrupt shipping. The war is now over, and they have believed what we told them. I heard the Prime Minister say that we were fighting this war for a new philosophy and a new order of society; that when this war was over, those who contributed or who offered their lives for their country were not going to come back to things which existed in pre-war years. Every last soldier, sailor and airman believed that sory. They accepted our word.

The Canadian seamen's union is not asking for much. They are asking for an 8-hour day, instead of the 12-hour day they are working, and for three watches on their ships. Then they want a little upward revision in their wages. Surely they earned that in the process of fighting the war. They were dealt out of everything. They did not have uniforms; they got a tin badge and that is all they got. Surely the least we can do is to protect them from thugs hired by private detective agencies. That sort of machinery should be outlawed, and that is why I rise to-night to bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice. We went through all that thirty years ago.

Why, I could stand here for the next ten hours, and tell stories—

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member has said that that was all they got. I want to say to him, on the authority of positive knowledge, that our merchant seamen of Canada got five times the benefits that merchant seamen of Great Britain got, as a result of the war.

Mr. GILLIS: You see, to compare this continent with Great Britain is below the intelligence of the minister. They are still getting their people out of air raid shelters in Great Britain; they are still depending upon this continent to feed them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The merchant seamen saved England.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, I concede that, and for England to get back on her feet again is still part of our job. But I like to get away sometimes from taking England as a yardstick.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do not let us decry our own effort.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not doing that. What I said was that after a lot of struggle, for five years—and I am not blaming the minister for it, because I know he was as sympathetic as anybody in the house; but unfortunately he has that invisible treasury board to deal with—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not only that; he is a member of it.

Mr. GILLIS: Very likely a junior member.

Mr. CLAXTON: A senior member.

Mr. GILLIS: I can see the shadow of the Bank of Canada over him, and it frightens him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. GILLIS: After a lot of pressure we did do some things for the merchant seamen. We restored benefits to them, when they had no uniforms. Their incomes were taxed during most of the war—even their war risk bonus. They were never relieved of that, the taxation on war risk bonus; and they got back certain pension rights.

Mr. MACKENZIE: But the hon. member said they got only a tin medal, and that is not right.

Mr. GILLIS: You do not see them going around wearing ribbons.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is not fair.

Mr. GILLIS: The only recognition they got for service—

Mr. MACKENZIE: They got 80 per cent of the benefits of the service men in the three fighting forces.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, but still they have not the right to educational benefits, and things like that. I am expecting it will be 100 per cent before the veterans affairs committee finishes its work this session.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend is always an optimist.

Mr. GILLIS: Well, it is just as well to be optimistic. When one loses hope, then it is time to get out of the picture.

As I was saying, however, I am strongly urging the Minister of Justice to examine into the activities of this detective agency, and into the organizing of thugs to break strikes.

I say that with a great deal of feeling, because I could tell the house many stories in connection with the establishment of unions in this country in the earlier days. In those days we met the same kind of people, many of them from the same city, evicting people from their homes, leaving them out on the sidewalk, chasing them out of town two or three times. I thought all that was finished at least fifteen years ago. It is unfortunate that we find it still existing in this province of Ontario, and allowed to exist in Quebec.

I am going to promise the minister that this is one question I will not forget. I shall continue to find out something about this until such time as we abolish illegal agencies of that kind in this country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Earlier in the debate it was suggested that the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) had quoted a wire without authority, owing to the fact that it was signed by one E. Dalskog in reply to a wire sent by B. G. Melsness.

My question of privilege is that another wire was handed to me three minutes ago. I particularly wish this to be put on the record, because it was implied that I was not speaking with authority or with correctness in respect of the wire I quoted, as coming from E. Dalskog, the international representative of I.W.A.

I wish now to quote the wire handed me:

Re letter following wire filed June 14 by E. Dalskog answering yours of 13th to me—

And this is the part which solves the fruit problem of British Columbia.

"—union prepared to immediately return men to work box factories under government controller with settlement of demands made with government after return to work." Letter following.

Mr. MITCHELL: Who signed that?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Signed by B. G. Melsness. I wish now to conclude the matter of privilege. My responsibility as a member was questioned in respect of a wire I quoted and an answer I gave. I now wish to quote a letter from Mr. A. MacNamara, dated June 15, as follows:

The minister asked me to acknowledge receipt of copies of your correspondence with the international woodworkers association. I am sending copies to Hon. George Pearson and Hon. Mr. Justice Sloan by airmail.

"By airmail"—and we spent thousands of dollars in long distance calls. Then I am questioned as to whether I quoted correctly, and as to whether I had authority to speak for I.W.A.!

Mr. MITCHELL: On the request of the minister of labour of British Columbia I appointed Mr. Justice Sloan of the British Columbia appeal court to act as commissioner. In disputes of this kind one has to act with the principals, not with the fellows down in the trenches without any responsibility.

My hon. friend has quoted a wire from the organizer of that union. I may say that matter was checked. I am informed by Mr. Justice Sloan, in connection with the leader of the men's organization in British Columbia, and the terms indicated in the wire could not be carried out by the leader of the men's organization.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: As I indicated this afternoon, by agreement we are going to call two items which will be allowed to stand.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

SECRETARY OF STATE

356. Departmental administration, $106,210.

Item stands.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

369. Departmental administration, $199,115.

Item stands.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

National health branch—

223. Advertising and labels division, $70,463.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister was to give us certain additional information on this item, particularly as compared with expenditures made in 1945-46.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The leader of the opposition asked a question which I can best answer by telling the committee what happened. The work which is planned to be carried on by this advertising and labels division was carried on previously in part by the director of health services, by the food and drugs laboratory, by the laboratory on hygiene and by the proprietary or patent medicine division, four different divisions of the department's activities. It was found that the work was not being satisfactorily done because there was some overlapping. There were also some inconsistencies in the rulings made by departmental officers dealing either with radio advertising or with labelling. So it was decided, after the estimates for last year were prepared, to create a new division called the advertising and labels division.

This division was created on January 16, 1946, and an item of $13,000 was sought in the supplementary estimates to cover the expenses of the division for the remainder of the year. This item will be found on page 32 of the supplementary estimates. This vote represented the estimated expenses of the new division for the remaining three months of the year. It was not possible to set up the division before the end of the year, so that the amount actually expended was $100.11. The work of setting up the new division is proceeding and officers and employees from the old divisions are now being transferred. When the operation is completed the director of health services will not have anything to do with this operation except in an executive and administrative capacity. The food and drugs laboratory and the laboratory of hygiene will no longer have anything to do with this. The proprietary or patent medicine division will be absorbed and the new division will carry on the functions I described last Friday night.

In view of the operation which I have just described and which is still under way, it is not possible to say how much of each of the previous expenses will be met out of this estimate. We are still engaged in forming this new division which will render better service to the trade, to advertisers and to the public of Canada. The amount sought here will be sufficient to carry on the work of the division after it has been set up, but as it is not by any means fully set up the amount will be prorated throughout the year and the full amount sought in this vote will not be expended. Because of lack of staff and space we have not been able to set up the positions which were created in the new division and the salaries for these will lapse. There will be no duplication of payment.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
224. Grants to institutions assisting sailors, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $2,400.

Mr. MacNICOL: This vote covers grants of $200 each to twelve societies or organizations assisting sailors, but I wish to refer to only two, namely the Navy League of Canada at Halifax and the Navy League of Canada at Sydney. I am fairly familiar with the work that has been done by the navy league at all ports at which they have institutions, and in particular at these two. I assume that this grant is merely a gesture of appreciation for the work that is done by those associated with the navy league. There is a long line of men and women in the communities across Canada who have given sincere and hard service to this work. They have been able to provide large sums of money, great quantities of clothing, many varieties of comforts, ditty bags and so forth for distribution to sailors. I know the minister must be familiar with the work, but I wonder if the country generally knows what was done by the Navy League of Canada during the last war?

Mr. CLAXTON: I agree with everything the hon. member for Davenport has said.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—
225. Medical services—Indians and Eskimos, $4,103,390.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not my intention to deal with this item at any length, because the matter of Indian affairs is before a special committee and I must be careful about any reference to that committee. There is an increase of over one and a half million dollars and I suppose the minister will have more complete details than are furnished on page 167 of the estimates. If this is to be used to provide medical services and so on for the Indians, I shall not oppose it.

Through many years I have visited about twenty-five Indian reservations, some in remote areas and others in the settled areas of Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba, so that I know something about this matter. Looking at page 167, I notice that three medical officers are being provided this year for the northwest territories. The next item shows an additional medical officer for the northwest territories. I have no doubt the minister will explain what these extra medical officers are going to do in that very large area. Last year there were thirty-two physicians, and this year there are thirty. That is going backward instead of forward. There were three graduate nurses last year, and two this year. The total medical service employees are fifty-six last year and fifty-six this year. There is an increase for temporary assistance of about $275,000 over last year. That would mean a lot of temporary assistance, and I hope the minister will explain what these additional temporary assistants are going to do.

There is a new item of $10,000 for publicity and information. I should like to know what that has to do with the Indian affairs branch. What does it want publicity for? It might have to do with instructing the Indians where to go for medical service, but I do not recollect any such item in any previous year. There was no such item last year. I notice that there is an increase of $5,000 for equipment maintenance and a considerable reduction in the item for acquisition of equipment. Is that equipment for hospitals for Indians? I am not opposed to reductions, but it is a large reduction and I had hoped that under the new minister the Indians would be getting a much better deal than ever before. There is a large increase in the item for construction of works and buildings. What is that for? Hospitals, schools or what? Another large item is for professional and special services. I presume that is for doctors, surgeons and nurses. Travelling expenses are up considerably, about $75,000. What does that large vote cover?

There will be another opportunity to discuss Indian affairs when the report from the Indian affairs committee comes before us. All I wish to say now is that I am anxious that a real change for the better will be made under these votes. I have long made up my mind, after consultation with teachers in the day schools on Indian reservations, particularly in remote areas such as around lake Nipigon, where you have to engage a boat and go anywhere from twenty-five to fifty miles—I travelled over 100 miles by boat and paid $25 a day to make my own investigations—to bring this matter before the house. In one school I met a very bright teacher, and she strongly recommended—and I pass this on to the minister—that all teachers in the Indian schools be sent in their summer holidays by the department to some hospital or training school for thorough instruction in first aid. On one reservation I learned that the day before my visit an Indian had died just because there was no one present who could apply the most simple remedies for whatever sickness or illness he had. So I made up my mind that at the very first opportunity I would urge as strongly as I could that the teachers in the Indian schools in these remote areas like Fort Chipewyan, Fort Resolution, lake Nipigon and many other Indian reservations throughout the west—I met a very bright teacher at Fort à la Corne—be sent out at government expense and given a thorough training in first aid and applying the first remedies in all ordinary sicknesses until the Indian could be sent out for proper medical attention or a doctor brought in. This vote is largely for medical services and I am for anything that will improve the health of the Indians.

There is one other point. The Muncey reservation in Elgin county is a substantial Indian reservation, and if the minister had a talk with the doctor in charge—I do not know whether it is the same man now—the doctor would tell him one thing, and that is that if the Muncey reservation had a hospital like the one at Oshweken on the Six Nations reserve, it would be of great benefit to the Indians. The great trouble in getting the Indians to go to hospital some distance away is that the love of the Indian father and mother for their children is so great that they cannot bear to see one of them go away to a hospital at London, Chatham, Windsor or Woodstock. Much better results would be obtained if there were a small hospital on the Muncey reservation, and then the Indians would not have to send their children a considerable distance away to hospital. The department has a first-class doctor at Muncey, perhaps more than one. At least the man I met was excellent and very sympathetic. I have the highest opinion of him. He may not be there now because I met him some years ago.

I leave these two suggestions with the minister, that a small hospital be put up for the Indians where there is a substantial reservation, and, second, that the teachers in Indian schools in the remote areas be given thorough instruction in first aid.

Mr. CASE: The hon. member for Davenport has pretty well covered the ground with respect to the Indians, and I endorse what he has said. I am pleased to see an increase in the estimates for medical services to the Indians and Eskimos. If the money is properly spent—and I hope it will be—great good can come therefrom. I propose to address myself now to the problems of the Eskimos.

We know that the Eskimos are badly in need of medical and dental care, care for their eyes and so on. I understand that each year medical services are made available on the Nascopie, which travels to the far north. A medical doctor and a dentist provide inspection, care and corrective treatment for the Eskimos who present themselves on the boat during the time it is being unloaded. Coming from the war expenditures committee I have heard reports that boats are being sold at a very small sum compared with the original cost. I am not mentioning this by way of criticism because it is not my intention to go into that at the moment. My purpose is to recommend to the minister that his department give consideration to acquiring a suitable vessel from the Department of Munitions and Supply or War Assets Corporation with a view to equipping it as a hospital ship to be devoted largely to the health and welfare problems of the Eskimos, who would then not have to depend entirely upon the Hudson's Bay company boat which puts in at northern ports for a limited time while it is unloading. In other words, I am suggesting that the department give more particular attention to providing better services to the Eskimos, and I am suggesting, as a means to that end, that it acquire a suitable vessel, properly equipped as a hospital ship, and send it on its voyage so that it can play an adequate part in the health and welfare and general advancement of the Eskimos, for whose care we are largely responsible. That is about the only observation I have to make, along with my endorsation of what the hon. member for Davenport has said with respect to our Indians.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to take the minister back to Manitoba for the time being. I have a great number of Indians in my constituency. I do not rise in a critical mood, but I want to be sure that the services of the Department of Mines and Resources and of the minister's own department are not duplicated. I am going to take him to Norway House and ask him to consider the position of an Indian there with tuberculosis. I want him to tell me what is done. Has he a superintendent of medical services for Indians, in Winnipeg? If the minister can answer me as I go along it may save time.

Mr. CLAXTON: At Norway House there is a resident full-time doctor.

Mr. BRYCE: When Doctor Corrigan at Norway House decides that a patient must have treatment in a hospital, what is the next step?

Mr. CLAXTON: Move him to the nearest general hospital.

Mr. BRYCE: How are you going to move him?

Mr. CLAXTON: If necessary, by air.

Mr. BRYCE: Who is going to sanction air transportation?

Mr. CLAXTON: We usually do it here in Ottawa.

Mr. BRYCE: You do not mean to tell me that somebody is lying dying at Norway House, 425 miles north of Winnipeg, and you have to come to Ottawa to ask for sanction to move a dying patient?

Mr. CLAXTON: The hon. member is just a shade ahead of us. We are planning the appointment of eight regional superintendents who will include that as their responsibility and duty.

Mr. BRYCE: I asked you if you had one at Winnipeg.

Mr. CLAXTON: Not yet. We are setting up these posts.

Mr. BRYCE: There will be one at Winnipeg? Well, then, what is the Indian agent going to do, if your doctor does him out of his job? You cannot employ a highly paid doctor to do the work of an Indian agent. Doctors are more valuable to-day.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know whether the hon. member is in favour of our having more doctors or less.

Mr. BRYCE: I am in favour of having more doctors.

Mr. CLAXTON: We have a resident full-time doctor at Norway House; we propose to have a regional superintendent at Winnipeg; and they will not compete with the Indian agent in any sense whatever. They will work very closely with him. If the Indian agent receives word of anyone being ill he will tell the nearest doctor. If he cannot reach a doctor he will get out word by radio if he has that equipment, and we will take the necessary action.

Mr. BRYCE: Do you intend to have an aeroplane of your own for moving these people?

Mr. CLAXTON: An air ambulance?

Mr. BRYCE: An air ambulance.

Mr. CLAXTON: We have not any, but we have been immensely assisted during the war, as I believe the hon. member knows from the statement I made in the Indian affairs committee—I think he was there—by the assistance given us by the Royal Canadian Air Force and the United States Army Air Force, both of which had extensive establishments in the north country. That will now be replaced either by Royal Canadian Air Force assistance or by our hiring, as we frequently do, privately owned planes or else borrowing an R.C.A.F. or Department of Transport plane. We do not at present propose to have a private air force of our own. The territory is so great that it would take a considerable number of planes to cover it. It would not be an economic way to use planes; they would not be in the air a sufficient portion of the time to be economically used. What we aim to do is to use by one means or another the resources there are, and when we get stuck we shall find some other way of doing it.

Mr. BRYCE: At the present time, if anyone takes sick at Norway House and is brought to Winnipeg, will your branch be responsible for the movement from the train to the hospital, or will that be done by the Indian agent in Winnipeg?

Mr. CLAXTON: As far as the patient's health is concerned we are responsible for that.

Mr. BRYCE: But it is not only the supervision of his health, but transportation, and everything—

Mr. CLAXTON: Everything in relation to his health will be attended to by us.

Mr. BRYCE: You have to make that plainer for me. I want to understand this thoroughly before I leave it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I ask the hon. member to address the Chair.

Mr. BRYCE: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman I will try not to hurt your feelings any more. Mr. Chairman, I want to carry this farther; I want to get to the bottom of it, because I know the trouble the Indians have had in coming from these places—Norway House, Grand Rapids, Berens River—they are three or four days on the way. Somebody must be responsible for them. When Doctor Corrigan puts them on the boat his duties are ended. Does the minister intend to increase that service by having somebody to look after them on the boat, or is there to be an Indian agent to do it?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have already answered the hon. gentleman. In so far as the health of the Indians is concerned this department is responsible, and if an Indian is to be moved for reasons of health this department will be responsible.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are so many Indians at Norway House, Berens River and Grand Rapids that I suggest the minister follow the same plan he did at Oshweken, as far as he can, and put up a small hospital there.

Mr. CLAXTON: We have a hospital there. We aim, as part of the programme of construction, to replace that with a larger and fire-resistant hospital.

Mr. MacNICOL: At Norway House?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. Also to have a number of nursing stations in that area, which has a total Indian population in that agency of 3,740.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is the hospital now?

Mr. CLAXTON: At Norway House.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought there was a hospital there, and I wondered why my hon. friend was speaking about the necessity of taking patients away from Norway House.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like the hon. member for Davenport to know that it is only a twelve-bed hospital; we have people dying there with tuberculosis, dying like flies, and they have to be moved to the new hospital at The Pas. Can the minister tell the committee what progress has been made with the hospital at The Pas; how many beds it contains; who has been appointed as doctor there, and give other information about it?

Mr. CLAXTON: At The Pas there is the Clearwater Lake Indian hospital, which was taken over from the United States army. It is a 100-bed hospital, and it is planned to enlarge that hospital quite considerably so as to make a more efficient use of the large central equipment they have. The number of beds will then be increased considerably. I cannot give my hon. friend the number of beds planned for yet, because the plans are still being prepared.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How many beds are there?

Mr. CLAXTON: One hundred.

Mr. BRYCE: It is not the intention of the minister to have tuberculosis patients placed in the little twelve-bed hospital at Norway House?

Mr. CLAXTON: It would depend on the situation. If the patient is in an acute or very infectious stage he would be put there for a time until he could be moved somewhere else. Certainly a hospital of that kind is not suitable for the care and cure of tuberculosis. It has twenty-two beds.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The United States army have a modern hospital at Churchill. Has it been taken over by the department?

Mr. CLAXTON: It has not.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What is being done with the hospital?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am not familiar with the situation of the United States hospital at Churchill.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister mentioned the hospital at The Pas. When I made my inspection of the hospital at The Pas I was informed that the government had contributed a large sum of money toward the building of that hospital. It is a big building, and I understand that the Indian department has the operation of the whole of the main or ground floor. How many beds are on the ground floor of the hospital at The Pas?

Mr. CLAXTON: One hundred.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of course the Indians are all up and down the river, west as far as Cumberland House, and down the river as far as the Chimauawin and Moose Lake. I suppose the hospital will have to take care of all these Indians?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Davenport and the minister are speaking about two different hospitals. The minister is speaking—

Mr. MacNICOL: No; I am speaking about the one that has been up for some years.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister is speaking about the United States hospital about fifteen miles out of The Pas at Clearwater lake.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister said it has accommodation for a hundred patients at the present time.

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like the minister to give us a breakdown of this large amount. How much of it is for hospitals; how much for doctors who devote their full time to the work and how much for doctors who devote part of their time? I know that in some provinces some of the reservations, such as those in Saskatchewan for instance, are some distance away from doctors. That may still be true. I know for a fact that sometimes the doctor makes a visit to treat an Indian who suffers perhaps from eye trouble and the bill amounts to about $25. Is there a maximum charge which the doctor can make? The doctors used to charge so much a mile, and then so much for the visit. Is that the system in vogue at the present time? If so, then the question arises as to whether the reservation should not have a doctor, or whether the doctor should not live closer to it, or whether some other means could be found to keep down what seems to be a large expense.

Mr. CLAXTON: Perhaps I should answer the various questions raised by the hon. member for Davenport and other hon. members. As has been said, the increase now being sought from the figure of $2,526,000 to $4,103,390, an increase of $1,577,390, is a substantial increase. That is sought because we are determined to take positive steps about the health of the Indians and Eskimos of Canada. The plans were made by the Indian affairs branch of the Department of Mines and Resources before the Indian health services were transferred to this department, to take effect from November 1, 1945. Since then we have gone over them carefully with the advantage of having direct contact between the Indian affairs doctors and our own doctors; we have drawn up a programme for Indian health services which hon. members who are interested will find summarized at page 75 of the proceeding of the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, appointed to examine and consider the Indian Act, when I made a submission on June 6, 1946. The proposals of the programme of the department for the Indian health services are summarized there, and hon. members will see throughout the proceedings information which would answer many of the questions asked here.

One of the questions related to the general scope of the increased services proposed. These include greatly improved health services to Eskimos, opening three hospitals in the current fiscal year with a total bed capacity of 650, increasing by more than fifty per cent the departmental hospital bed capacity. These additions are the Miller Bay near Prince Rupert, taken over from the air force about a year ago with 150 beds, the Edmonton Indian hospital taken over from the army about November 1, 1945, with 400 beds, of which at least 100, with 100 more temporarily, are earmarked for veterans so long as they need them, the Clearwater Lake Indian hospital taken over from the United States army, 100 beds. The programme also provides for more adequate health services, and consequently the treatment of many more patients.

The hon. member for Davenport asked about the considerable increase in the amount sought for professional services, and that was referred to by another hon. member. This amount covers the expenditure by the department on part-time doctors. These doctors are engaged on various bases, depending on the local circumstances. Some of them are paid on a fee per patient basis; others at an amount per month. Altogether I can assure my hon. friends that the amounts paid are not regarded either by the department or by doctors as excessive. Their accounts are submitted in detail. They are gone over and, after verification, are paid according to the scales which have been established. I am sure that in some respects the amounts paid are not in line with the amounts paid for medical services rendered to other patients in the same area.

Mr. FLEMING: Are they higher or lower?

Mr. CLAXTON: They are lower. On the other hand, in ordinary times it does provide a steady source of income for doctors; but at the present time when doctors are overworked it is not quite as attractive as it used to be.

In addition to the departmental hospitals, Indians are hospitalized in general hospitals. During 1945, 16,239 Indians were hospitalized outside departmental hospitals for a total of 404,730 days in 417 hospitals. We intend to render more hospital service.

Reference has been made to tuberculosis, and the incidence of tuberculosis among Indians and Eskimos is very much greater than that among the white population.

Mr. MacNICOL: About seventeen times as great.

Mr. CLAXTON: On the average the figures are fifteen times as great as for the white population of Canada. They vary from place to place. In places like the Mohawk, the Six Nations reserve, they are three times as great. But there are localities in which it is even greater than fifteen times as great as among the white population. That presents a special problem of diagnosis, isolation, treatment and cure. As we know, tuberculosis is a disease which can be cured. We have reduced the tuberculosis mortality among the white population from something like 200 per 100,000 at the beginning of the century to something in the neighbourhood of 45 per 100,000 to-day. In other words, among the whites we have wiped out three-quarters of the killing power of tuberculosis. That is not the case with the Indians; and in order to tackle that job we require a considerable increase in hospital beds, in X-ray equipment for diagnosis, and so on. This plan we have under way aims at achieving as much as we can do with the staff and space and facilities we can expect to get during the next year. In other words, this year money is not a limiting factor. The limitations on the service will be those of securing adequate, experienced staff and being able to do the amount of construction we aim to do. The results will not be immediately spectacular, because tuberculosis and other conditions of this kind cannot be dealt with in a year; but with a determined effort and a long-term programme there is no doubt at all but that we can substantially improve the health of the Indians. The building programme for this year includes a new hospital at Moose Factory which we hope to begin—

Mr. MacNICOL: Is that to be built out on Moose island or on the mainland at Moosonee?

Mr. CLAXTON: My understanding is that it will be on the mainland, but I shall verify that and give the hon. member the information later. At Fort Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan, there is to be a fifty-bed extension to the present hospital; also a building replacing a nurses' home destroyed by fire; provision of adequate power house and doctor's residence. At Coqualeetza Indian hospital at Sardis, British Columbia, we are to build a nurses' home, power house, doctor's residence and children's ward. At the Edmonton hospital, Edmonton, we hope to do the necessary alterations and complete the building. Then at the Clearwater Lake Indian hospital, Le Pas, Manitoba, we are to build a doctor's residence. We also aim at least to commence the construction of five additional nursing stations at Bersimis, Quebec; Eskasoni, B.C.; Fort George, Quebec; Gypsumville, Manitoba, and St. Regis, Quebec.

[Mr. Claxton.]

The hon. member for Davenport also asked the reason for an item of $10,000 for publicity and information. That is designed to begin an educational programme among the Indians and Eskimos. There, as elsewhere, we find the greatest obstacle to health is ignorance and failure to put into practice what we know we can do. This programme involves the preparation of two simple leaflets in colour on child care and the rules of hygiene; the purchase of some pamphlets for use in hospitals; some simple, colourful posters; a film strip; a motion picture news clip, and then the translation of these into the Cree syllabics. This will account for this expenditure. In answer to earlier questions I should say that the hospital at Moose Factory will be on Moose island. The Clearwater Lake hospital at Le Pas, to which the hon. member for Selkirk referred, is about one hundred miles from Norway House by plane. I should add that the local doctor has authority, in the event of an emergency case and it being impossible to deal with the matter in any other way or to refer it to Ottawa, to take the responsibility upon himself of getting a plane.

Mr. MacNICOL: One hundred miles from where?

Mr. CLAXTON: From Norway House.

Mr. MacNICOL: There must be some mistake. Even by air it is 110 miles from the Pas to Cedar Lake, and it is thirty-six miles across the lake and then twenty miles from the lake to Grand Rapids; then from The Pas across to Norway House is a trip requiring a whole night and a morning by boat. I should say it would be 150 to 200 miles if it is a mile.

Mr. BRYCE: I should like to ask another question on that. The Norway House residential school was destroyed by fire a couple of weeks ago. Has the minister any information as to the data and information collected at that school concerning vitamins and nutrition? I am sure he is aware of the manner in which the school was divided into four sections and, how they all got different biscuits so many times a day or so many times week. Does the minister know if the material they were able to build up in that study has been destroyed?

Mr. CLAXTON: I have the report on that nutritional survey in my hand at the moment. It was completed.

Mr. BRYCE: I think it would be interesting to mention it to the committee. It was good work.

Mr. CLAXTON: It is exceedingly useful work. This survey of nutrition among North American Indians was conducted by the acting superintendent of the medical service, Doctor P. E. Moore and by Doctor F. F. Tisdall, who is very well known and who was consultant to the armed forces, as well as by the local doctor, Doctor R. S. C. Corrigan, and by Doctor Kruse of the Millbank memorial fund of New York. They obtained valuable results, which are being used not only in connection with health services to the Indians and Eskimos but also in connection with family allowances to the Indians and Eskimos in kind.

Mr. BRYCE: My question was really about the records in the school. Do you know if they were destroyed?

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not know.

Mr. ROBINSON (Bruce): We have two Indian reserves in Bruce county, and I am glad to say they are among the healthier reserves which were mentioned by the minister a few moments ago. The fact is, however, that we are still short of hospitals in Bruce, and we are having two built, one very close to the Cape Croker reserve and the other close to the Saugeen reserve. These hospitals are being built largely by public subscription, and I should like to ask the minister if his department would consider helping out with a donation, large or small as they may see fit, in order to help in the hospitalization of these Indians.

Mr. CLAXTON: We would have to know the circumstances of the case. In a limited number of cases grants have been made to hospitals, but only where the Indians in the locality represented a very large proportion of the population and the services necessary for the Indians could not be provided more economically in any other way, or as part of the regular services of the hospital. We have had many applications, and I had occasion to mention this two weeks ago, when the matter came up. We have had applications from every part of Canada; but, as hon. members know, hospitalization ordinarily is a matter for the provinces. In the great majority of cases the Indian health service pays the daily cost of hospitalizing an Indian as its contribution, in accordance with arrangements worked out with each hospital. Ordinarily we do not make capital grants.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would the minister give consideration to taking over the American army hospital at Churchill? I visited there in 1943, at which time there were seven American doctors at that point. Frequently they were called out in emergencies to some of the Indian settlements and also to attend the Eskimos, and they were greatly concerned about the type of medical service we were providing in that area. In view of the fact that the supply situation is to be a factor, and since I understand that this establishment has been taken over by the Canadian government, it seems a pity not to make use of it. I can think of no good reason why the minister should not use these facilities for the benefit of the Eskimos and Indians in that north country. Could the minister state whether this has been given any consideration?

Mr. CLAXTON: I can state in a general way that consideration has been given to the taking over of every hospital occupied by the navy, army or air force of Canada or of the United States in Canada. We have looked at every situation, and a great number of them are still receiving consideration, so I shall be very glad to see that this is looked into further.

Mr. MERRITT: I note that the amount for temporary assistance under this vote has increased by almost $300,000. Does that include professional assistance or non-professional? If it is professional, why is it not included under the item for professional and special services which appears farther down in the list? It seems to me it must represent a change in policy, when we find such a considerable change in the amount of the item. I notice further that the item for cash allowances is more than doubled, going from $21,000 to $90,000. What is the nature of those allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: An item for temporary assistance appears in the votes of almost every department. That item covers salaries or wages of personnel whose positions have not yet been made permanent, but who may continue in service for some time. In this instance it includes a considerable increase in professional personnel, owing to the fact that we have taken over the hospitals I mentioned, with a bed capacity of 650.

We propose, too, to have eight regional superintendents, including one from Manitoba and western Ontario. It also includes the addition of a considerable number of nurses for nursing stations, as soon as we can get them.

Mr. MERRITT: What about cash allowances?

Mr. CLAXTON: I shall answer that a little later on, if that is satisfactory to the hon. member.

Mrs. STRUM: What is the infant mortality rate among Eskimos and Indians? Are those separated from the general rates for all Canada?

Mr. CLAXTON: The infant mortality rate among Indians is given at page 91 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the Indian Act. I should make it clear that they are there given under the heading of diseases peculiar to the first year of life, and the rates are set out per 100,000 of population.

Infant mortality rates are usually shown per 1,000 of live births. Here, however, the figures on the number of live births are not reliable, with the result that the figure given is a rate per 100,000 of population. It will be seen that the rates for 1942, 1943, and 1944 are, roughly, three times as high as the white rate for all Canada, exclusive of the northwest territories. However, we do not know accurately the number of live births. So that if there is a greater proportion of births among the Indians and Eskimos than there is among the rest of the population, the infant mortality rate per 1,000 live births will be relatively smaller than shown here. However, as shown here it is three times as high as the whites.

Mrs. STRUM: Is any clinical or pre-natal care taken, or any attempt made to reduce the rate?

Mr. CLAXTON: In the Six Nations reserve, where there are 6,600 Indians, I believe every baby is born in a hospital, and the rate compares favourably with that among the white population. In other localities every possible assistance is given, in relation to the possibilities in those localities. There are only nine doctors in the whole of the northwest territories and the Arctic, but we hope to establish more doctors and more nursing centres to supplement the doctors. We also hope to do much more by way of education among the Indians, and also by way of special training of traders, factors, members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and others in the north, including missionaries and teachers, so that they will be able to give more than just first aid assistance.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Can the minister tell the committee in what percentage of reserves across Canada are nursing stations with well-equipped dispensaries? I am of opinion that we have a large number of small reserves located at great distances from hospitals. Those reserves are visited rarely by Indian agents, and I am wondering what such people will do in the future. Will nurses be stationed at such points to help them in their health difficulties, or does the department plan any extension work to place nurses on such reserves, so as to administer to the needs of the people before they have to go to hospital? I am referring particularly to the north Pacific coast.

Mr. CLAXTON: Every band of Indians in Canada has been surveyed. We have drawn up a long-term plan which provides by one means or another for their securing adequate health services. This plan has to be developed as people become available to carry it out, and as we develop the technical and administrative experience requisite to enable us to handle it. But every band—in fact, every group of Indians across Canada—is plotted on this map, and we aim by one means or another, where they have not existing services, to provide them with adequate health services.

Mr. CASE: I did not hear the minister's comment replying to the suggestion for a special hospital ship for the far north, and I therefore wish to address a further question in that connection. Does the minister consider the facilities of the Hudson bay boat adequate to meet the demands of this trip? I understand that the quarters are cramped, and that the facilities can be considered only as makeshift. What is the feasibility of the department's owning a ship which could be properly equipepd as a hospital ship? Does the minister consider the facilities of the Hudson bay vessel adequate?

Mr. CLAXTON: I believe I overlooked answering that part of the hon. member's question. We have looked into the matter of providing a special hospital ship. My recollection is that the cost of such a vessel would be about $250,000. This vessel would have had to be taken over from War Assets Corporation, and reconstructed. The amount I have mentioned would be largely the cost of putting it into shape for a northern voyage. The annual cost of operation would be something like $25,000. The effective period during which it would be in the far north where it would be useful would be somewhere betwen six and ten weeks, depending on the season. It would be an extremely expensive operation.

As I say, we have considered the matter, and still have it under consideration. But it would seem to us that that is not the most effective and economical way of doing the job.

As to the hon. member's further question concerning the adequacy of the services provided by the Nascopie, let me say that we are extremely glad to have those services. As hon. members are aware, the ship carries two doctors—usually most distinguished ones—who render service during that trip. Relief doctors and nurses are also sent up. It would be much better if the ship could stay longer at each port of call, but primarily its visits are not for reasons of health but to provide service for the Hudson's Bay company and the other people who are on it. However, it does a very useful work and we are glad to have it. My hope would be that if the Hudson's Bay company are planning to replace the Nascopie they will do it with a larger vessel which would permit us to provide greater services on board.

Mrs. STRUM: Are trained Indian nurses going to New Zealand to take courses in midwifery?

Mr. CLAXTON: I did not know of that.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has not answered the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in connection with cash allowances, $90,580.

Mr. CLAXTON: Those are paid as maintenance to professional people and others who live away from the hospital or the nursing station to compensate for board and lodging.

Mr. FLEMING: It is a living allowance to people on the regular staff?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister explain the increase from $21,360 to $90,580?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is due to the large increase in hospital bed capacity and other development work being undertaken this year.

Mr. FLEMING: It is hardly likely you will require this amount this year. The minister can hardly expect to get all this hospital development under way.

Mr. CLAXTON: That would be the target. We shall not get the number of nurses and professional help to use the full amount the way things are going.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister has given considerable detail in connection with the item for construction of works and buildings, but I do not think we have had a summing up. What is the cost per bed of this type of hospital construction given in terms that we can compare with hospital construction elsewhere? What bed accommodation is expected to be provided out of this item of $840,000?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am afraid I have not it broken down in that way. The cost per bed in most of these hospitals is much less than the cost of general hospital construction in cities after you have provided for transporting the materials. You can imagine that the cost of transporting materials, workmen and equipment to do a job at Moose Factory would add enormously to the cost, but actually the cost of this type of hospital construction is much less than that of general hospital construction in the larger cities.

Mr. FLEMING: What will be the total hospital bed accommodation provided by this item of $840,000?

Mr. CLAXTON: It will be in the neighbourhood of 200 beds.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like to pursue the question raised a while ago by the hon. member for Selkirk about the lack of medical care on the Indian reserves. I understood the minister to say that the medical care of Indians has been transferred to his department from Mines and Resources. Who is responsible for reporting cases of tuberculosis or other diseases found on the reserves? I suppose the Indian agent would still be under the Department of Mines and Resources, but medical care of the Indians is now under the Department of National Health and Welfare. Where do the two tie up? Does anyone take the initiative in reporting cases of disease on the reserve, or does the department depend upon the provincial health and welfare departments who send public health nurses around to the schools? What system is used?

Mr. CLAXTON: There is no difference at all in reporting cases from what it was before, except that we hope to have a larger personnel in the field. We hope to have more trained dispensers and a closer tie-in with the provincial authorities. Apart from that, the Indian agent, the doctor, the nurse or the provincial representative report the cases just as before. There is no division to prevent the Indian agent from communicating directly with us; in fact in some places the Indian agent is the same person as the Indian health service doctor.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: To what extent is there cooperation between the provincial health departments and the Department of National Health and Welfare? Is any use made of the reports submitted by the provincial public health nurses who visit the schools on the Indian reserves? There is a lot of data and information obtained in that way that could be used by the department if it were channeled into the department. Is there any liaison there?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. On the Six Nations reserve we are undertaking a mass survey of all the Indians for tuberculosis. They are to be X-rayed in July and August by arrangement with the provincial health authorities. Close cooperation with the provincial authorities obtains right across Canada.

Mr. FLEMING: The figure of 200 beds given by the minister works out to approximately $4,200 per bed.

Mr. CLAXTON: The figure I mentioned includes the provision of a power house and doctor's residence in one place and a nurses' home and doctor's residence in another. The hon. member asked for the total number of beds to be provided by this construction item. If the hon. member wants the cost per bed per hospital I can easily send that to him in detail.

Mr. FLEMING: Would this item include the cost of equipping the hospital, or is it simply for construction?

Mr. CLAXTON: For construction.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: There is an increase from $12,000 to $20,000 for meter rates; what is that?

Mr. CLAXTON: That is to cover meter rates for water service to Miller Bay and Edmonton hospitals.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

226. Grants to hospitals which care for Indians and Eskimos, $204,320.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister indicate where these hospitals are located and what is the basis of selection for grants?

Mr. CLAXTON: This item provides for the payment of amounts of $1,080 to the Roman Catholic mission hospitals at Fort Smith, Fort Simpson and Aklavik; and a like payment to the Church of England hospital at Aklavik. Those are grants which are paid from year to year in accordance with a long standing arrangement. The item of $200,000 is granted to the Fort William sanatorium board for provision of an 80-bed hospital for Indians there. That is the most economic way of providing for the hospitalization of a large concentration of Indians in that neighbourhood who could not be served as well in any other way.

Mr. MacNICOL: How much was there for the hospital at Aklavik?

Mr. CLAXTON: That was $1,080, as well as for each of the other three hospitals I mentioned.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is there any grant under this vote for the training of Indians nurses? In Arizona a successful school has been established for the training of Indian nurses. It is found that they are very much more effective when dealing with their own race than the white nurses. Has there been any attempt, or does the minister think there may be an attempt to train Indian nurses?

Mr. CLAXTON: We have had a number of Indian doctors and nurses in the service and are anxious to get more. There is no regular machinery for assisting in the training of Indian nurses. That is usually provided by the bands or the Indian affairs branch, but we will certainly look into the question of facilitating that training.

Mr. ADAMSON: Do the Indian nurses go to the ordinary nursing schools?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes, and the Indian doctors too.

Mr. FLEMING: Would the minister give figures indicating the incidence of venereal disease within, say the last two years, to establish trends, including both the civilian population and the armed services?

Mr. CLAXTON: I should have replied before to the question of the hon. member for Red Deer. I have looked into it and find there are no figures that are really reliable prior to 1943, when we reinstated this grant, partly as a war measure, and secured effective cooperation from the provinces and local authorities in securing reports. Figures on the incidence of venereal disease are apt to be misleading unless they are read by someone experienced because, as you secure a greater degree of cooperation and greater efficiency in collecting figures, the rate seems to go up, whereas it may simply reflect, not an increase in venereal disease, but increased reporting as a result of cooperation by doctors, patients, municipal and provincial authorities, so that the figures should be taken with that qualification. I have the figures for 1943 and 1944 here.

Mr. FLEMING: If it is not convenient for the minister to give them now, perhaps he will give them later.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister mentioned Aklavik. There is one doctor there. Is he a departmental doctor?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does he take care of both the Roman Catholic and Anglican hospitals?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does he also look after patients at the Reindeer camp forty miles across the river delta and at Fort MacPherson and Arctic Red River?

Mr. CLAXTON: I am afraid the hon. gentleman's knowledge exceeds mine, but I think the doctor does look after those patients.

Mr. MacNICOL: He is an extremely fine man. He does a fine job and is highly respected.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—

227. Welfare branch administration, $37,635.

Mr. MERRITT: Would the minister explain the publicity item?

Mr. CLAXTON: The item of $4,000 comprises $2,000 which is sought for the establishment of a film library on welfare—the pictures have already been taken and we want to secure copies of the prints for distribution—and $2,000 which is unallocated.

Mr. MERRITT: With respect to this item of $4,000, I wonder again where it really fits into the picture. The welfare branch consists of the family allowances division, which has its own and a quite large publicity vote, the old age pensions and pensions for the blind division, and the national physical fitness division, which again has its own item for publicity. I said, when I first raised this question about publicity, that I was sure the minister could give some reason why each one of these publicity or educational items should be in the estimates. Naturally the members have to rely to a great extent upon the discretion of the minister, but I think it would be appropriate for me to say here that, as we have gone through the various items, I have not seen any general coordination of these quite large sums of money, totalling over $500,000, which would lead me to be certain that the money was being spent in the right place for the most useful purposes. It has been my impression, from the answers the minister has given, that the items are usually made up upon separate requests from provincial organizations or from the dominion health council which the officers of the department have met, and which have all seemed perfectly right and proper and been approved by the departmental officials and then have appeared in the estimates. We are dealing here with something which is nebulous and the value of which cannot be gauged as easily as the value of a doctor's services or the expenditure of a certain amount on drugs. I should very much like to see that this money was spent according to certain general principles laid down by the minister, in order that the money may be well spent. It would seem to me, although I am an absolute amateur at the game, that were I in the minister's position I should like to see this $500,000 spent perhaps in five large chunks for five specific services this year, so that at the end of the year I could tell whether the story I had to tell had definitely got over to the Canadian people in each of these five directions. Then next year perhaps take five other services. That is only my opinion. I would urge that the minister work out an over-all policy for publicity and educational expenses which will satisfy him, because he is the person who must be responsible to the house for the efficacy of his expenditures, that he is really getting over to the Canadian people the picture he wants, rather than a hundred little pictures which are requested by a hundred different agents.

Mr. CLAXTON: I appreciate the hon. member's comment. It seems to me that he is now contradicting one of the principles which he laid down when he first spoke on this subject. He said he thought one of the first principles should be that the publicity be directed to some particular group to which it was suited and from which it was hoped to obtain definite response. That is something we have had in mind with regard to publicity generally, but not in connection with family allowance publicity because there, since we deal with the parents of 92 per cent of the population, we deal with virtually everyone.

I should like to quote in this connection an interesting comment on this discussion, when it occurred last, from the Winnipeg Tribune for June 3, in which it is said:

> Health and welfare is an important concern of the Canadian people, educational work on a large scale is essential to it, and the colonel might well be asked what other department has in his judgment a better right to stand second to trade and commerce in its publicity appropriations.
> Colonel Merritt conceded that booklets dealing with child and maternal care were a good investment. He has perhaps heard—since the opinion is universally held by parents who have made use of these booklets—that they are of unrivalled excellence. But he apparently does not know that these booklets are distributed by and through the provincial departments of health "who have trained staffs in the field." Far from "by-passing" the provincial departments, as the colonel charged, the national department works in close and constant cooperation with them at every point where such cooperation is feasible.
> "Telling people what to eat on picnics" may seem an absurdity to Colonel Merritt, but the fact is that the department's manual on camp feeding is a model of its kind—

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the minister permit an interruption? Is he not offending against a well-known rule of the house by reading editorials here?

Mr. CLAXTON: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not asking the minister's point of view on it. I should like to know the views of the Chairman, because he is the one who rules the house.

Mr. MERRITT: I should like to say—

Mr. CLAXTON: I should just like to finish this, if I may:

> —and meets a real need in an important sector of the nutrition field.

Mr. GRAYDON: One moment, please. I know the minister rules the department, but he does not rule the committee—yet. Perhaps the Chairman would give a ruling on the question I raised, because many of us have been stopped before, and I hope there is not one rule for the rich and one for the poor.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is something which should not be done. I hope the hon. member will see to it that the rule is observed, and I would ask the minister also to observe it.

Mr. MERRITT: May I say that it is not my purpose and never was my purpose to criticize proper expenditures on education, and if any newspapers in the country have a different view I suppose I cannot correct them, but I do not think the minister and I have any misapprehension as to what I have said throughout this debate. I simply indicated to him—and I thought this was the appropriate time—that one member of this committee does not feel satisfied that there is a proper over-all policy in regard to these expenditures, and I merely asked him if he would take that in consideration in his department for the next estimates.

Mr. KNIGHT: Would the minister care to comment on the matter of the supply or lack of supply of trained case workers for family welfare work? Theirs is a work which requires a particular type of individual and an intensive and specific training. Has the minister considered granting, say national scholarships to encourage young people to go into this work, because unless I am wrongly informed there is a sad dearth of people able to carry it on in the proper manner?

Mr. CLAXTON: Item 232, which we shall come to, provides $100,000 expressly for that purpose.

Item agreed to.

Welfare branch—

228. Family allowances—administration, $1,961,250. Family allowance payments, $250,000,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This item brings up the question of old age pensions.

Mr. CLAXTON: No, family allowances.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Surely they come under item 228.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Old age pensions is item 229; item 228 is family allowances.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to discuss the question of old age pensions.

Mr. FLEMING: There was a good deal of information which I was going to ask the minister for. If I indicate it now, it may give him an opportunity to muster the information and make it available to the committee at the next sitting.

Mr. CLAXTON: I may say that, in view of the fact that this month we complete almost a year of family allowance administration, I thought the committee and others would be interested in a fairly complete statement with the filing of figures showing eleven full months of administration and some general observations on the way it has worked out, and I am prepared to do that just as soon as we get another opportunity. I think some of the hon. member's questions would be anticipated in the statement I intended to make.

Mr. FLEMING: Would it assist the minister if I indicated now, in just a word or two, the points I think might be covered? In the first place, we had, on December 15, 1945, shown on pages 3603 and 3604 of Hansard, certain tables. Would the minister bring down comparable tables for the last month for which figures are available?

Mr. CLAXTON: They will be filed right up to May.

Mr. FLEMING: In the item of $150,000 for publicity and information could we have the expenditures and the projected plan?

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: In the next place, the expenditures contracted for by months to date from the commencement of the operation of the family allowances, in respect of publicity.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the minister wish to put the tables on Hansard?

Mr. CLAXTON: If I might, I should like to file, first, a table showing family allowance payments for the months from July, 1945, when the first payment was made, to May, 1946, when the last payment was made; second, a table showing statistics based on the May, 1946, family allowances payments; and, third, further statistics, broken down by provinces, of the payments in May, 1946. May I have the unanimous consent of the committee to put this on Hansard? We have some further tables to be filed later, but it will, I hope, be a convenience to hon. members if I file these now.

Hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. CLAXTON: The tables are as follows:

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Eighth report of special committee on veterans affairs—Mr. Tucker.

WHEAT

NEGOTIATIONS FOR LONG-TERM CONTRACT WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), having to do with the reported discussions now going on between British and Canadian officials with respect to a long-term contract for wheat. Is the minister in a position to-day to make any statement in regard to that matter?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I am not in a position to make any statement to-day with regard to the matter, other than to say the negotiations are proceeding.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO REPORTED "VOW OF SILENCE"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of personal explanation. I have read in the press to-day that I am said to have taken a vow of parliamentary silence. It is not true. I never took such a vow, but I decided to try an experiment. I was told so often that my speeches were delaying the progress of the session that I wanted to make an experiment, so I stopped talking a month and a half ago, expecting that prorogation day would come at once. Unfortunately I see that very little progress has been made, and I wonder if it will be necessary for me to start making long speeches again to bring the session to an early close.

To complete what I said yesterday, that General Chisholm—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

COAL

OPERATION OF FISH CREEK MINE, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): On June 13 the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) asked for information about the quality of coal in the Fish Creek mine. The answer I have obtained is that the 1946 edition of "Coal Mines in Canada" shows that the Fish Creek mine, located in the Priddis area of Alberta, is classified as high volatile bituminous. For that reason the coal is not suitable for domestic use.

BUILDING MATERIALS

SHORTAGE IN SUPPLY OF WINDOW GLASS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. What is the situation in respect of the shortage of window glass, or, to be more specific, the lights used in windows of houses? One cannot buy this material in the cities, towns or villages, and as a result the building of many houses is being delayed.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): For some months there has been a shortage of window glass. Prospects are that the shortage will be corrected, in view of the fact that increased shipments are now coming in. Canada does not manufacture that product, and for our supply we are entirely dependent upon imports. We are doing everything possible to improve the situation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE IN TEXTILE INDUSTRY—FEDERAL INTERVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour respecting the strike in the textile industry, which affects the employees of Montreal Cottons at Valleyfield. Does the minister intend to intervene in some way in order to bring about a satisfactory settlement for the workers?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): All disputes affecting the textile industry in the province of Quebec come under the labour relations laws of that province. My department has not been asked by the Quebec government for assistance. If they should require assistance, we shall be only too glad to render it, as we always do.

STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA LUMBER INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he has any statement to make respecting Mr. Justice Sloan's meeting yesterday with the union?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I believe I shall have something to say later in the afternoon.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LENNARD—PURCHASE OF PROPERTY IN WENTWORTH COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. LENNARD (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In Votes and Proceedings No. 51, page 1, for June 3, a question appears in my name which was partly answered yesterday. The question referred to properties bought or sold by the government in the township of West Flamborough, Wentworth county, Ontario, during the past several years. Further to this question I asked what prices were paid for these properties by the government, and at what prices they were sold. This question was not fully answered, as these amounts were not given. I would ask that it be returned to the order paper until fully answered.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PUBLIC CONTROL AND SUPERVISION OF DEVELOPMENT, APPLICATION AND USE

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply) moved the third reading of bill No. 165, relating to the development and control of atomic energy.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AS TO RULES FOR READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed from Thursday, June 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to effect an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion of the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) because I believe it corrects an injustice, and I believe further that it comes the nearest to representation by population, when one considers our peculiar historical, geographical and economic position in Canada.

I shall oppose the amendment offered by the official opposition, because I believe its adoption would create a precedent which would put this parliament into a position inferior to that of provincial legislatures. The provincial legislatures have the right and power under our constitution to change their representation. Why should not the federal parliament have the same right? I believe the adoption of the amendment would be contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act, our constitution.

I should like briefly to deal with the legal and constitutional aspects of the resolution and the amendment before us. Before proceeding to do that, however, may I commend the Minister of Justice upon the clear and lucid exposition he gave of the historical and constitutional background of the resolution. I am also forced to congratulate the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who made a convincing address. He is one of those few persons with the gift of making an eloquent argument on a weak case. After listening to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) I feel I must also include him in my commendation, because I was keenly interested in his argument and, at first blush, deeply impressed. However, I cannot now see the position of the official opposition on the resolution Their official position seems to be, as enunciated by the hon. member for Lake Centre, and as disclosed in the amendment, that they are in favour of the principle of the resolution but first want the provinces consulted.

While in the closing paragraph of his address the hon. member for Stanstead said he was going to support the amendment, still he told us we did not need any amendment at all; that all we needed to do was to change the interpretation of section 51(4) of the British North America Act, so as to have representation by population.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) took another view, that there should be some amendment to provide that the representation in any province could not be reduced below the number such province had at the time of joining confederation. So in the light of these observations, I am at a loss to know just what the official opposition wants.

Since the argument of the hon. member for Stanstead is fresh in our memories, I shall deal first with what he said. He told us that for the last seventy-nine years we have been in error in our interpretation of section 51 (4) of the British North America Act. I disagree with the hon. member on that point, and it is with great respect that I express my disagreement. Section 51 says that we are supposed to have a census every ten years, and that after each census we shall have readjustments. We have had such readjustments after every census since confederation. The argument of the hon. member for Stanstead is that if a province does not lose any representation, or if its standing is not changed after such readjustment, then there has been no readjustment for such province. On close study of the act I must disagree with that interpretation.

Besides that, we have the judicial interpretation of section 51 (4) of the British North America Act. Both the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Stanstead quoted the closing paragraph of that decision, and it is unnecessary for me to place it on Hansard again. This was a decision of the privy council as the result of an appeal following a dispute between the attorney general for Prince Edward Island and the attorney general for Canada. As indicated, the decision is found in 1905 Appeal Cases, 37.

The hon. member for Stanstead said, by way of a second argument—and it sounded plausible at the time—that the decision of the privy council with respect to subsection 4 of section 51 was only an obiter dictum. I disagree with him on that point; I think it is a decision of the highest court of the empire. I quote the hon. member, as reported on page 2425 of Hansard, as follows:

—so the statement of the bench is purely an obiter dictum which was never argued and is not a binding authority.

The hon. member then went on to quote the last paragraph of the judgment of the privy council, and then continued:

That is an obiter dictum. It has no bearing on the case then at issue. It was not argued.

Reading the case I would say that it certainly was argued before the privy council. The province of Prince Edward Island objected to a reduction in its membership, and according to the judgment of the privy council it advanced two reasons; first, that they should not be reduced below the number they were entitled to when they entered confederation, and second, that on the interpretation of subsection 4 of section 51 their representation could not be reduced. I should like to put on record the two preceding paragraphs of the judgment of the privy council, as follows:

The case put forward on behalf of Prince Edward Island was somewhat wider in its scope. It was suggested that section 51 applies only to the distribution of representatives between the four original provinces. But the terms on which Prince Edward Island was incorporated expressly declared that its representation was "to be readjusted from time to time under the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867."

[Mr. Jaenicke.]

The hon. member for Stanstead said that it was not argued, but this is what the learned law lords said:

It was further argued that, supposing section 51 to apply to Prince Edward Island, still it was not liable to have the number of its representatives reduced in 1903 for the following reasons: that by the terms of subsection 4 there could be no reduction on any decennial readjustment unless there was a previous readjustment to afford a comparison, so that for any province the first readjustment could not entail a reduction though it might permit of an increase, that there was no readjustment for any province unless its representation was altered, and that therefore, by the combined operation of section 51 and of the terms on which Prince Edward Island entered the confederation, its representation could not be reduced unless it had been previously increased.

I submit that the same argument was put forward by counsel for Prince Edward Island before the privy council as is put forward by my hon. friend. I should like to compare a sentence in that judgment with what my hon. friend said, and I quote from page 2423 of Hansard. The hon. member for Stanstead made this argument:

I submit that you must go back to the last time the members were reallocated to the province; not to the last census but to the time the twenty members were allocated—

Counsel argued that there could be "no readjustment for any province unless its representation was altered." I submit the argument in the one statement is almost the same as it is in the other. With great respect I submit that the decision of the privy council was not an obiter dictum. I submit that that is a decision which is binding upon us and it is as we have correctly interpreted subsection 4 of section 51 of the British North America Act for the last seventy years.

I think I shall concern myself only with the legal aspects of the amendment proposed by the official opposition. The hon. member for Lake Centre quoted in support of his argument a number of opinions of statesmen and others which had been offered during the course of years. He argued that the British North America Act should be amended only with the consent of the provinces, but he did not tell us whether he meant unanimous consent or majority consent; in fact he was very vague. If it were to be unanimous consent, I would venture to say it would be practically impossible to amend the British North America Act even if the amendment concerned only the business of this parliament. If the official opposition wanted to establish a precedent, one would have thought they would have put forward some concrete proposition to show just how many provinces should consent or how many should be in favour or against a proposal of this nature.

As I said, the hon. member for Lake Centre quoted a number of opinions offered in parliament and outside of parliament by statesmen, politicians and other legal authorities. I have done quite a bit of reading myself on this constitutional question, and I could quote some eminent statesmen, politicians and others who took the opposite view. However, I am not concerned so much with opinions as I am with the law. Opinions are of little value so far as the law is concerned. I would point out to my hon. friends to my right that the actions of Sir John A. Macdonald and of Sir Robert Borden under like circumstances would indicate that those two former prime ministers would have used the same methods for amending the British North America Act that the government are using at this particular time.

My hon. friend stated, and I quote from page 2229 of Hansard:

> I am not going to enter into a discussion today, interesting though it might be, of the question whether the British North America Act is a pact, a treaty, a statute or a contract.

It would have been illuminating if he had told us at that stage of his argument just what he thought it was. I would conclude from his remarks later on that he thought it was a pact, or a contract, or a treaty. Knowing him to be a very able lawyer I was surprised at his attitude. Looking at the British North America Act, looking at all the amendments since 1867 and how those amendments came about, I would say that our constitution is a statute and nothing else. As such, it is amendable only by the British parliament through an address presented by the parliament of Canada.

The hon. member for Lake Centre laid particular stress upon the importance of precedents. Lawyers appreciate the value of precedents which become part of our law, and it is upon the precedents of the previous amendments to the British North America Act that I am basing my argument. As reported on page 2234 of Hansard the hon. member for Lake Centre called the resolution a novel scheme. With great respect I submit that there is nothing novel about it. We have established precedents which give us the undoubted right to pass this resolution without any reference to the provinces. I endorse the statement of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) who said:

> It is an indisputable fact that our constitution is founded not only upon the British North America Act, but also upon precedents which have become, so to speak, a part of the constitution.

The hon. member then gave a short resume of the amendments since 1867. I would have refrained from referring again to those amendments if he had given the house a little more information as to just how they came about and why they offered such excellent precedents for the resolution now before us. I will turn first to the amendment of 1871. At that time we asked the British parliament to amend the British North America Act in order to dissipate any doubts which had arisen as to the powers of the Canadian parliament to establish provinces in territory added or to be added to the dominion. They proceeded rather peculiarly in connection with that first amendment. The government, not parliament, requested the British government to submit a bill to the British parliament for the passing of the amendment. The British parliament accordingly drafted a bill and sent it back to Canada, and for some reason or other which I have not been able to find in the records, this bill found its way into parliament, where a resolution was passed and carried unanimously in these words:

> The executive government ought not to ask for amendments to the British North America Act without the assent previously obtained of the parliament.

At the time, one Mr. Mills, a member of parliament, made a further suggestion. I cannot find from the record whether he offered a separate resolution or an amendment to the resolution I have just quoted, but he said that when it came down to the representation in parliament of the provinces, the provinces ought first to be consulted. This resolution or amendment or suggestion was negatived without ever being debated, and the resolution which I have just read, that "the executive government ought not to ask for amendments to the British North America Act without the assent previously obtained of the parliament", was passed unanimously, 137 to 0, or something like that. That was the first precedent, and I think the most important precedent. I would ask the house to consider this. This was an amendment passed in 1871. At that time the Quebec conference, the Charlottetown conference, the London conference, and the British North America Act itself were fresh in the memory of the Canadian people. As a matter of fact most of our statesmen of the time whom we are pleased to call the fathers of confederation were members of parliament, sitting either in the House of Commons or in the Senate, and yet none of them except Mr. Mills rose at that time to argue that the provinces ought to be consulted on an amendment to the British North America Act. I think that that precedent established in 1871 was a most important and distinguished one, and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that precedent has been followed ever since under similar circumstances.

Then we have the amendment of 1875, and it is curious to note that although parliament in 1871 had passed a resolution that "the executive government ought not to ask for amendments to the British North America Act without the assent previously obtained of the parliament," the 1875 amendment seems to have been passed simply upon the request of the then dominion government, although that was the first and only time this was done. That amendment concerned the privileges, powers and immunities of parliament. The provinces were not consulted.

Then we have the amendment of 1886, the third amendment to our constitution. Its object was to empower parliament to provide representation of the territories in the Senate and House of Commons. The procedure adopted was that the act was passed by the British parliament in accordance with the terms of an address of the Senate and House of Commons. The provinces were not consulted, and according to the authority of Doctor Ollivier, whose book "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty" has been quoted on different occasions in this debate, the provinces did not ask to be consulted about this amendment to the British North America Act.

In 1907 the British North America Act was further amended. The house adopted a joint resolution asking the British parliament to pass an amendment to permit the increase and regulation of federal subsidies to the provinces. It seems that this amendment was discussed by the provinces, but we have nothing on record as to any consultation by the government with the provinces. In any event we know that British Columbia objected to it. But just the same the resolution was passed and an amendment was made by the British parliament to the British North America Act as requested by this parliament. In reality there was no form of consent or consultation with the provinces.

Now I come to the most important amendment of 1915, which was mentioned at length by my hon. leader when he first spoke on behalf of this group in this debate. This was a very important amendment, as was pointed out by him and by the hon. member for Stanstead. It not only fixed the representation of the senate, but led to the enactment of section 51(A) of the British North America Act by virtue of which the membership of this house is affected, because that is the section which puts a floor underneath the representation of the provinces in this parliament. The hon. member for Stanstead in his address said that there was a consultation with the provinces in connection with this amendment. I have been looking that up, and the only authority I can find is the book of Doctor Ollivier, which I mentioned before. Doctor Ollivier states emphatically, at page 367 of his book, that there was no consultation with the provinces with respect to the 1915 amendment.

Then we have the amendment of 1916, which extended the life of parliament by one year. Parliament had been elected in 1911, and shortly afterwards we found ourselves at war and the British North America Act was amended in 1916 to extend the life of parliament for one year. There was no consultation with the provinces at that time.

In 1930 an amendment to the British North America Act was passed to give back the natural resources to the western provinces. Of course the western provinces were consulted about that. As a matter of fact they had pressed for this amendment so that they could control their own natural resources. But there was no consultation with any of the other provinces, so far as I have been able to find out.

Another amendment was made to the act in 1940, for the purpose of including the subject of unemployment insurance among the classes of subjects enumerated in section 91 of the British North America Act. In other words this amendment took away the power of the provinces to legislate on unemployment insurance and transferred that power to the dominion. This amendment clearly invaded provincial rights, and in this case I understand that the dominion first consulted with the provinces and they all consented to this amendment. It is very easy to see, of course, why they did consent. But I think it established a precedent, and, speaking for myself, I agree with the principle of this precedent, namely, that if there is to be any interference with the powers of the provinces under section 92 of the act, they ought to be consulted. But I make the statement with a certain amount of reservation, because in the course of time a certain matter assigned by section 92 to the provinces might easily become of such national importance that it would be imperative for this parliament to legislate upon it.

The next amendment was that of 1943, which extended the time for redistribution. It does not appear that the provinces were consulted, the precedent having been the same as had been established on like occasions previously. I know that a protest was made by the legislature of the province of Quebec against the adoption of this amendment, but apparently it was ignored for good and sufficient reason.

So far as the law is concerned I maintain, Mr. Speaker, both as to the act itself and as to the precedents which have been set, that there is no doubt that this resolution can be passed by this parliament without any reference to or consultation with the provinces.

Much has been made by opponents of the resolution that the British North America Act may be a pact, a treaty, or a contract. While these opinions have been expressed ever since the act was passed, the final opinion always seems to have been that such assumption is founded upon a false basis. In order to make a contract or a pact or a treaty, the parties thereto must have the capacity to contract, and I doubt very much whether the four provinces—or three provinces, if you will—in 1867 had the capacity to contract. They were colonies, and as such, I submit, Mr. Speaker, they lacked the capacity to enter into a valid contract. The last resolution of the Quebec conference has this to say:

> That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty praying that she may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be submitted to the imperial parliament for the purpose of uniting the colonies of Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island in one government.

The resolution itself proves to me that they were colonies at the time and that therefore they had no capacity to contract.

If the British North America Act were a contract or a pact as my hon. friends to my right contend, I should think that the parties thereto would have provided for some amendment or for the preservation of their rights in the pact itself, and that there would have been a provision in the British North America Act to provide for the amendment and to provide for consultation with or consent by the provinces. If it was in the minds of the framers of our constitution that it was a contract, surely some provision would have been made for the consent of the contracting parties to alter the contract; and that by the way, I believe, is the expressed opinion of the late Professor Stephen Leacock, who at one time wrote or talked about this subject matter.

Furthermore, if our constitution were such a contract at the time of confederation, 1867, the provinces would have objected long before this. I know there have been objections, objections which I mentioned when I discussed different amendments to the act, and I know there was a conference some time in the eighties, when Sir John A. Macdonald was still prime minister. This conference was called by one or two of the provinces, and concerned itself solely, or at least principally, with amendments to the British North America Act. I understand that two of the provinces refused to attend. The dominion government was invited, but Sir John A. Macdonald declined the invitation and wrote in reply what I regard as a fairly sarcastic letter indicating that the dominion was not in the slightest degree interested in this conference.

Apart from this, Mr. Speaker, I think we must consider the effect of the statute of Westminster. According to that statute the British parliament would have no right to pass any laws affecting this country, including any amendment of the British North America Act, unless it was first requested by this parliament. The statute of Westminster does not say anything about the provinces; and on the authority of that statute, also, I maintain that an amendment to the British North America Act can be enacted only by the British parliament on an address from the parliament of Canada.

The hon. member for Royal, whom I mentioned a few moments ago, and who claimed that the representation of the provinces should never be lower than the representation they had at the time of confederation, was very much concerned about the maritime provinces. He said something which I am sorry he said. He remarked that he was not afraid of the province of Quebec, they had got along well for years. He was speaking at the time for all the maritimes. He said he was not afraid of the province of Ontario; but he said that with the western provinces it is a different proposition. He did not say that he was afraid of them, but I think by implication he meant as much. He also mentioned that a great many maritimers had gone to the west and had made their contribution to the colonization and upbuilding of the west. I think he was right in that. Speaking for the province of Saskatchewan, I think we are grateful for the migration we have received from the maritime provinces, not only with regard to agriculture and business but, especially in my province, for the contribution they have made to our law and our education; and I can assure the hon. member for Royal that the foundations so well laid by those migrants from the maritimes and Ontario have made true and good Canadians of all of us. He mentioned also that the C.C.F. have in their platform either the abolition or the reform of the senate and suggested that if this was carried out the maritimes would lose their representation. Undoubtedly the policy of the group is as he stated, but that does not mean that we are opposed to a floor underneath the representation of any of the provinces, and I do not see why the representation in the senate should form a floor for the representation of the provinces in this House of Commons. We can easily make an amendment to put a proper floor under the representation of each province in this parliament.

Before I conclude there is one appeal I should like to make to the Minister of Justice. It concerns a matter which has been mentioned in this debate by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and also by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Townley-Smith). It concerns the representation of the northwest territories in this parliament. I do not think I need to make any further argument. The hon. member for North Battleford especially confined his remarks solely to this aspect of the debate, and I think he made out a case. The Yukon territory has a population of four thousand; the northwest territories, in round figures, more than twelve thousand. I think their conditions are entirely different. The northwest territories are vaster, and I think the minister should consider amending his resolution by adding one more member to the number he proposes in his resolution so as to provide for a member for the northwest territories.

Mr. J. W. MacNAUGHT (Prince): Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of this debate I had not intended to take any part in it, because I am reasonably sure that the people of my province are perfectly satisfied with the terms of the resolution; but certain statements have been made which render it desirable that I should put upon the record a brief history of the causes leading up to the senate rule amendment. That amendment is contained in paragraph 3 of the present resolution.

Also requiring some comment is an editorial appearing in the May 18 issue of Toronto Saturday Night, under the caption "Equality in the Commons". The parts of it to which I take exception are the following:

> The drawing of a sharp line of demarcation between the specially protected areas (Prince Edward Island and Yukon) which can never have their representation reduced, and the rest of the country where rep. by pop. is the unvarying rule, should act to put an end to the business of establishing such favourite areas. The case of Yukon is special because of its isolation, but there was never any justification for the four-member privilege for Prince Edward Island, and it would be most unfortunate if the habit of granting such privileges became general whenever political expediency should suggest.

And further down:

> Adjustments during the next few decades will, it seems likely, be to the advantage of the western half of the country and perhaps at the expense mainly of the two maritime provinces which are not protected by special privilege. The special privilege of Prince Edward Island will become more outrageous with each succeeding decade, if there is any substantial influx of population into the rest of Canada, as from henceforth it will be the size of the electoral unit that will increase and not the size of the House of Commons.

I have always had the highest regard for editorials appearing in that publication. I have usually found them fair, well-written and accurate. I am therefore forced to the conclusion that the editor is unaware of the history leading up to the adoption of the senate rule amendment. All hon. members are aware, I am sure, that the first meeting leading up to confederation was held in Charlottetown in 1864. Any hon. member who has visited the colonial building in Charlottetown must have been shown through the confederation chamber and have looked upon the very tables and the very chairs occupied by the fathers of confederation at that time. That conference was originally called for the purpose of discussing maritime union, but to the conference came delegates from Canada to discuss a broader union. The records of that conferenec can be found in Sir Joseph Pope's "Confederation Documents". The principle of the broader union was accepted, and the conference adjourned to meet in Quebec. On looking up the records I find that the delegates from Prince Edward Island were willing to discuss any question with regard to confederation except the question of representation. They pointed out that, unless they got six representatives, so far as they were concerned, confederation would not be considered.

The delegates from the other colonies did not see their way clear to granting this privilege, and so when confederation was consummated some three years later Prince Edward Island did not enter. The records of that conference showed that Mr. Brown moved that Upper Canada should have 82 members, Lower Canada 65, Nova Scotia, 19, New Brunswick, 15, Newfoundland 7, and Prince Edward Island, 5. That motion carried, but Prince Edward Island voted nay. Mr. Haviland, one of the delegates from Prince Edward Island, who was strongly in favour of confederation, said:

> Prince Edward Island would rather be out of the confederation than consent to this motion.

Further, the suggestion was then made that the delegates from Prince Edward Island should withdraw to reconsider their decision. They accordingly withdrew from the meeting and returned the next morning to give their answer. Colonel Grey, speaking for the others, said:

> I am instructed by my co-delegates to say that the provision of five members is entirely unsatisfactory.

When the delegates returned to Prince Edward Island they were upheld by the legislature, by the people and by the press. The people of Prince Edward Island were willing to discuss any other feature of confederation, but on the question of representation there was no compromise. Negotiations were continued by the parliament of Canada, but the delegation from Prince Edward Island were determined to obtain, and they finally did obtain, six members, although their population at that time entitled them to only five.

I think it must be clear to all hon. members of this house that the point that kept Prince Edward Island out of confederation for six years was the determination to secure six representatives. I am sure that the delegates of the day felt that the representation of six was to be a representation in perpetuity. No other conclusion is logical; no other conclusion is consistent with the long delays. Unfortunately, through some oversight or mistake, call it what you will, this safeguard was not written into the letter of the act, and in 1893 the representation of Prince Edward Island was reduced. From that time the legislature and the government of Prince Edward Island, as well as the representatives of Prince Edward Island in this House of Commons, have kept up a continuous agitation to have the representation of the province fixed at six. This continuous agitation was the cause of the senate rule amendment in 1915.

In this connection I should like to quote from Sir Wilfrid Laurier as reported in the debates of the House of Commons for the session of 1915, volume 1, page 330:

> . . . henceforth no province shall have less representation in the House of Commons than it has in the Senate. That was a departure from the principle but it was after all what seemed to me to be a fair compromise. The larger western provinces—Quebec, Ontario and the young giants of the west—are too strong to have reason to begrudge the slight increase in representation which this would give to the eastern provinces. We accepted that compromise—for my part, I was glad to support the committee in that respect—and it seems to me that our friends in the maritime provinces ought to be satisfied that in so doing we endeavoured to dispose of this irritating question in a fair and just manner.

It is therefore apparent that this senate rule amendment was not a mistake but was a sincere desire of the parliament of Canada to dispose of an irritating question in a fair and just manner.

I wish now to refer to a statement made by the late J. S. Woodsworth, as reported in the debates of the House of Commons, session of 1932-33, volume 2, at page 1592:

> If a mistake was made in giving a fixed number of representatives to Prince Edward Island, there is no reason why we should follow a bad precedent. The way to get away from that is to amend the British North America Act so that Prince Edward Island would have only its due number and not a number out of proportion to the rest of the country.

I am very glad that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) does not share these views. I think that is a fair deduction from his remarks as reported at page 2237 of Hansard. This is what he said:

> I will take it for granted that Mr. Woodsworth said that. But what I will add is that Mr. Woodsworth may have said that, and in logic he was sound, but in the matter of representation in parliament regional representation may be as important as population representation.

In connection with the statement made by the late Mr. Woodsworth I wish to quote the answer given by the Hon. James Layton Ralston, at that time. It will be found in the debates of the House of Commons, session 1932-33, volume 2, page 1593:

> The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has been rather strong in his intimation that we must stick to the letter of the pact and that the calculations must be made directly in accordance with the terms of the British North America Act.
> Let me remind him—and I do not do it in any spirit of criticism—that when Manitoba entered the confederation she had a representation amounting to less than the required unit for one member. Yet Manitoba was given a representation of four members. In 1881, I believe it was, a readjustment was made as had been provided in the act admitting Manitoba. At that time it was found that, under the strict arithmetical basis to which the hon. member has referred, Manitoba was entitled to only three members. The fact is, however, that when readjustment took place she was given five.
> Let me remind the house further that when British Columbia entered confederation the strict principle was not applied. I need not be tender in my remarks because hon. members must realize that I am making these statements to the house simply to show that the arithmetical basis has not been the only principle upon which we have acted when fixing representations. When British Columbia entered confederation it had a total population of about 40,000 and was given representation of six members, and an irreducible minimum of six. Ten years after British Columbia entered she had only two units of representation, that is to say, her population entitled her to only two members. Ten years later, in 1891, she had a population which entitled her to only four members, if the unit of representation applicable to the maritime and other provinces which came into confederation originally had been applied. Prince Edward Island had only five units of representation when she entered confederation, but was given six members. At the present time the representation of Prince Edward Island is four, the irreducible minimum.

It is abundantly clear, therefore, I submit that representation by population has not always been the rule; but that regional representation or adequate representation has been the goal always strived for.

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this redistribution measure as it affects Nova Scotia. I am a bluenose from away back, in spite of the somewhat reddish hue of my countenance. Being a bluenose I am also a maritimer, and being a maritimer I consider that I am a very good Canadian. I have listened with great interest to the able addresses which have been delivered on this most important matter by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), by my hon. friend from Prince (Mr. MacNaught) and the masterly address delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke), who saved me a great many words because he thinks very much as I do.

I agree with a great deal of what was said by the hon. member for Royal and the hon. member for Cumberland, up to a certain point; that is, that the maritimes were discriminated against in years gone by, and possibly to a certain extent up to the present time. But I have noticed a great betterment in recent years, and I think if we deal with each item as it comes up, as far as it affects the maritime provinces, and take care of that item, we shall fare far better than if we just keep talking about maritime rights and blue ruin. I have great faith in the maritimes; I think we have a future ahead of us. We have young men of courage there. They say it takes three generations to go from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves. Many of the wealthy families of the maritimes made their money in shipping; then for a while there was a lag. Now the third and fourth generations are coming along and they have had to get right down to work. I really think they intend to stay within their provinces and make those provinces prosperous.

Last year I was pleased when I learned that the dominion-provincial conference was to be held, and I was much disappointed in its results. It was obvious to me that the dominion was trying to help the maritimes and those less fortunate financially in Canada at that time, and I hope this conference may resume in the near future. I am not digressing, Mr. Speaker; I am merely stating that the maritimes and maritime rights are being recognized now and that they will be recognized in the future if we go about the thing in the right way.

[Mr. MacNaught.]

As far as this resolution is concerned, I cannot see that we are hurting the maritimes at all. As a matter of fact it will add one seat to my province of Nova Scotia; that is, we will gain one seat of the ten. Figure that out. I would be very foolish if I did not support this redistribution resolution, even if I were to take it from a purely provincial standpoint. But I do not believe we should think just provincially; we should think as a country. In this house we must recognize certain things. One of them is that the provinces must deal with provincial matters and the federal parliament must deal with federal matters. We talk so much about passing the buck, and so on, but here is a case where we are endeavouring not to pass the buck. Obviously redistribution, since it affects the federal parliament, should be a matter to be dealt with by the federal parliament. I cannot see it in any other way. I may be asked, Well how about the original contract or pact or treaty or whatever you may call it, that was made at the time the four provinces entered into confederation in 1867? All right. Those four provinces were signatories to the contract, if you want to call it that; but how about the other five provinces and the Yukon? Are they not to be considered? If originally it was a contract, you might say that to a certain extent it is now null and void, inasmuch as others have been taken in since it was originally consummated. I think we must recognize that from time to time we must have changes. I can see nothing unconstitutional in the dominion parliament taking this up with the imperial parliament and having the British North America Act amended. It has been pointed out quite clearly that this has been done previously, so we are not establishing any precedent. I remember a few lines from when I went to school; I hope I have them right:

> The old order changeth, yielding place to new,
> And God fulfils himself in many ways . . .

In a young country like Canada, Mr. Speaker, we have to recognize the truth of such statements. I say let the dominion parliament look after its business and let the provincial parliaments look after their business, and have a clear delineation between the duties of the two. In other words let us render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's.

As far as the maritimes are concerned I feel that minority rights are protected. I would object to this resolution if I felt that the maritimes were being unfairly discriminated against. Surely we must have representation by population, provided that minority rights are recognized. While I agree with most of what was said by the hon. member for Kindersley, I do not think the other place should be abolished. I believe it is most important that we have the other place. If it is desired to establish a retiring age limit there, or something of the sort, that would be a different matter, but it serves a very useful purpose—increasingly so, as I think has been obvious during the last two sessions.

I am not going to deal with this matter at length, but I did want the people of my constituency to know how I felt about it. I am sure they feel the same way. They realize that if this resolution goes through and the amendment is passed by the imperial parliament, Nova Scotia will gain one seat and the membership of this house will be increased, and certainly we need that increased membership. I do not know about other hon. members, but it takes me some weeks to get around my constituency. To do it properly I have to cover a part of it by boat, and it takes a long time to get around. I feel that I am here as a representative of my people, and that I should go and see those people. I did my best last year, but I was not able to get around; and this year it looks as though I will not be getting home until September. However, if things are speeded up I may be able to get around this year, with some luck. I do not believe we should cut down our membership at all, if the poeple are to be properly represented. It is of no use to compare our membership with that of the parliament of the United Kingdom. The areas which have to be covered are small. This is a vast territory, and we should not reduce our membership; if anything we should increase it.

I have been watching the press from the maritime provinces, but in the editorials I have read I have not seen evidence of any great objection to the principle of the redistribution bill. They say chiefly that there should be some alteration in the process of voting, some having a preference for the alternative vote. But they have not objected on constitutional grounds, so far as this resolution is concerned. Therefore I do not believe they are opposed to it; on the contrary they recognize it is a proper procedure.

In the light of what I have said, and what has been said by the Minister of Agriculture and other hon. members who have spoken with reference to the maritime provinces, I hope all hon. members from that part of Canada will back the resolution. It is not only in their interests but in the interests of Canada as a whole that they do so.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate after so many lawyers have expressed their opinions and read their speeches respecting the law in the matter, an ordinary layman must speak with extreme care. Let me say at once that I am not a lawyer or the son of a lawyer, lest, before I conclude what I have to say, some hon. members may say about me what I have heard said about some lawyers—"God forbid that that fellow should defend me in a serious case".

I take part in the debate, fully conscious of the fact, as indeed have been most hon. members, that this is one of the most important debates we shall have this session. On most occasions we deal with matters of local concern, while on this we deal with one which dates back to the birth of our nation. It is a matter of vital importance to national unity and to the future of our dominion. It is important therefore that we understand clearly what it means, and that we should not allow politics to warp our judgment. It is my intention to deal with the matter briefly, from the Canadian point of view; but, like most other hon. members, I shall deal particularly with my province.

Time does not permit my discussing the speeches of hon. members who have preceded me, but I feel I must refer briefly to the remarks of one able debater who spoke a few nights ago. I refer to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who in his observations made specific reference to the maritime provinces. I am sorry the minister is not in his seat, because he told a story of having travelled around the maritime provinces, and that all he found being manufactured was coffins. I do not know whether he told it as a joke or as a slur against the maritimes. However, I shall accept it as a joke and in reply tell a story about his province. It is told—no doubt the Minister of Agriculture has heard it—that there were two Scotsmen, Donald and Sandy, who met on a street in Chicago. Donald said to Sandy, "Guid morning, Sandy; why are you so depressed and sad looking?" "Ah weel," replied Sandy, "I've had great sorrow. My brother died in Lemberg"—or Limburger, or Limbo, or whatever it was—"Saskatchewan." The other Scotsman said, "That's nae worry tae what I have. My brother is still living there."

I am not going to attempt to depreciate any province of this great dominion; but if I have any bouquets to throw, I shall throw them to my own province. Introducing the resolution on May 28 the Minister of Justice (Mr. St.

Laurent) made several references to Prince Edward Island. As a representative from that province, the cradle of confederation in Canada, I believe I am right when I say that our people in general are most apprehensive of any move whatsoever which would affect their representation in the parliament of Canada. In regard to our present representation, or even our present representatives, be they good or otherwise, the people from Prince Edward Island will say to the government, to parliament and to the Minister of Justice who introduced the resolution. Ne touchez pas.

Just because we are the smallest of the provinces in geographical area and in population, why should we be discredited, discriminated against and neglected? Since 1867 we have gained little from the confederation agreement that the four provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia made. Indeed, since we have not prospered in proportion to the larger and newer provinces in Canada, it is fair to say that we have lost much through joining this union. However we were coaxed into it. I am free to say that had the different governments of Canada since 1873 implemented the terms under which we entered the union, we would have to-day a population of more than 300,000 rather than a population which has declined since the time we entered confederation.

Why do I say we would have a population of 300,000? I say it because we have the best possible agricultural conditions of any province in Canada. Ours is the one province which has tried to hold its own without even the semblance of a square deal from the dominion. Admitting that my province is a small one, let me say that my constituents, and those of the whole province, did a splendid job during the war years through which we have just passed. We led the entire dominion in voluntary enlistments in the different armed forces, and supplied a type of soldier that had few equals, much less any superiors. Our farmers made a real contribution in the production of foodstuffs, working under great difficulties, and our fishermen likewise did their share in the work of producing food. We did not share, as did the other provinces, in the wealth brought to the working men because of war industry. We had no war-time houses, and we had no loans under the National Housing Act. Our average income was lower than that in other sections of the country.

A moment ago I said that our farmers produced foodstuffs for war; but what did our farmers and our labourers receive from this government? They did not receive even a thank you. On April 13 last they were handed a plaster of a twelve and a half per cent raise in the price of farm machinery and they need to buy a good deal at this time. Furthermore, although the government said that they were going to increase the price of farm machinery they would not permit the farmers to raise the prices of their farm products and voted down a resolution to take the controls off those prices.

We in our province see in this redistribution bill a threat to our representation in parliament. The minister has given the assurance that at no time will the members in the Commons from Prince Edward Island be less than the number of senators from that province. Be that as it may be, the fact is that the minister cannot bind future governments or future parliaments any more than I can if this resolution goes through as it is. When the Minister of Justice was introducing this resolution, in the able speech he is so capable of making as one learned in the law he made this statement, as reported on page 1932 of Hansard of May 28:

> The government has come to the conclusion to recommend to parliament the adoption of a petition to His Majesty to cause a bill to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to provide for the repeal of section 51 of the British North America Act as it now stands . . .

The minister said, "The government has come to the conclusion." The cabinet, without the Prime Minister, must have arrived at that conclusion. Is it any wonder that a SOS call went out for the speedy return of the Prime Minister? During the war, one amendment—possibly two—was made to the British North America Act. That amendment was put through so swiftly that it opened the eyes of many people. They realized how precarious were the guarantees that the act provided, and it suggested also to the people the need for further consideration of this act, not as something that was rigid or unalterable but as something the alteration of which should require a greater measure of consultation with the provinces whose whole position depends upon the British North America Act.

It is true that there has been a prolonged and involved legal controversy as to just what constitutes Canadian federation. One group of lawyers hold the opinion that at confederation the original provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia actually surrendered their independence in order to create a body greater than themselves. Another group of lawyers contend that the essential basis of the confederation agreement was an intimate alliance rather than a submergence of local autonomies. I am not going to enter into the details of that legal controversy, except to say that for practical political purposes it does seem to me that the provinces cannot be expected to regard themselves simply as creatures of the federal authority, to be made or unmade as the federal authority may decide.

If the claim of the dominion government that it can alter the British North America Act at its own discretion without consultation with the provinces is allowed, then there is established a very dangerous precedent. The present government or some subsequent government may increase its powers and decrease those of the provinces just as it wishes by a majority vote of the house. During the debate on this claim of the government most of the great political leaders from the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald down to the present day were quoted. It was shown that most of them were in favour of consultation with the provinces.

If this power of no consultation be given to the federal government, the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Quebec have the most to fear. In the case of Prince Edward Island we could have our representation reduced to one, or probably to nothing; we could be kicked out altogether and the terms of our agreement of 1875 entirely obliterated. The province of Quebec with its essentially distinct religious and racial character, must regard the integrity of the British North America Act as the only ground and protection of its position.

If the claim of the government that it may alter the British North America Act at its own discretion without consultation with the provinces is carried into practice, it will undermine the confidence and unity of the whole dominion. Putting it in the words of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who so ably debated this resolution, it might open the door to a denial of the rights of minorities by the action of a majority in parliament.

To my mind the point is not whether any proposed amendment is drastic or slight, desirable or undesirable; the point is that the procedure in every case of change should be such as to prevent any federal government from so acting as to impair the position and rights which the provinces possess. The only connection with the British North America Act, 1867, is found in section 2 of the interprovincial agreement of 1866:

> Provision being made for the admission into the confederation, on equitable terms, of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, the Northwest Territory and British Columbia.

Again, section 146 of the British North America Act grants the federal parliament the power to make an agreement with respect to the admission of Prince Edward Island. In other words, it grants the federal parliament the power to carry out that portion of section 2 of the interprovincial agreement of 1866, but does not give it power or authority to violate that agreement. Well-known legal authorities who have studied the agreement have stated that the government of Prince Edward Island, by constitutional force or court action, can compel the carrying out of the dominion-provincial agreement in letter and spirit. If this could be done and were done, it would remedy many of the disadvantages and discriminations under which our province has endeavoured to exist, and which have so greatly retarded its progress.

The greatest objection to this resolution is the arbitrary and undemocratic course that parliament is taking of entirely ignoring the provincial governments. It is for this reason that Premier Duplessis of Quebec is protesting to the federal government even to-day. It is important to note that the point of Premier Duplessis' protest is not the redistribution of seats itself, by which Quebec is certain to gain the most. It is a protest against the right of the federal authority to alter the British North America Act when and how it sees fit, without consultation with the provinces, whose position may be greatly changed by the amendments in question. The fact that in this particular case Quebec would be the gainer by the amendment is of less importance than the possibility that on another occasion it might find its position seriously impaired.

The Minister of Justice claims he has the consent of the provinces through their federal representatives. Here is one, Mr. Speaker, whose consent he has not. Whether it amounts to anything or not in a house of this size, I will make a minority of one at least. In his reference to provincial consent the Minister of Justice stated on May 28 last, at page 1936 of Hansard:

> The provinces, that is to say the people of the provinces, are all represented in this parliament, and for the purposes of such matters as are confided to the jurisdiction of this parliament, it is by those representatives here that the people of the provinces speak.

While the Minister of Justice is supposed to be the highest legal government authority in parliament, I would take the liberty, even as a layman, of disagreeing with that statement. It seems absurd to claim that the agreement arranged between the parliament of Canada and the legislature of Prince Edward Island can be changed in any manner that the majority of the commons and senate may decide upon, at any time, and without consultation with the government of Prince Edward Island. In 1873 we entered into the agreement with the federal parliament, and we thought that it could not be changed at will by a vote of either or both houses at Ottawa. For instance, at the present time the feeling is that there should be reduced representation in certain of the provinces. On the other hand there is the feeling that there should be increased representation. A very good argument was brought forward to-day by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacNaught) with reference to our entering into confederation in 1873 with six members. We did not go into the agreement in 1867 because they would not grant us six members; we came in under a separate agreement in 1873 granting Prince Edward Island six representatives in the House of Commons and four in the Senate, and three supreme court judges. None of these things, according to our agreement, can be taken away from us. They can be added to, but they cannot be taken away from. Let any attempt be made to change that provision for three supreme court judges or to reduce our representation in the senate. The same kind of agreement was made with regard to our representation in this house. But we lost out. Whether it was our own fault or not I do not know. Around the corridors Dame Rumour might turn the argument of the Minister of Justice to read: No province shall have a smaller number of members of the House of Commons than it has senators, and the western members then might make a drive to increase their numbers of senators in the west. That may or may not come.

The ground we take in objecting to this resolution is simply that the provinces are being ignored in not being given the right of consultation with the federal government. If a move of this kind is made easy by adopting this resolution, it might be followed by a move to upset the balance in the senate, which would be a very dangerous thing. It would really be a deliberate assault on the very ramparts of confederation. We remember well that while Prince Edward Island entered confederation with six members, that number was whittled down to five in 1891, cut to four in 1901, and was about to be reduced to three after the redistribution bill which followed the 1911 census. But in 1915 our province was consulted with regard to this, and we had our representation restored in that year from three to four members. But we should not have had it cut down from six. However, there will be an opportunity later on for us to urge that matter in this parliament, to bring in a new amendment to go back to the terms of the agreement of 1873 and give us the fulfilment of the agreement in every respect and the representation of six under which we entered confederation.

I cannot see that this measure gives us any sense of security. We of the island have too often witnessed our arguments rejected, our claims dismissed, and our views snowed under by the sheer weight of overwhelming majorities.

It is my feeling that this resolution offers little protection to us. I am apprehensive of a move which might reduce Prince Edward Island's representation in the other place; this would be followed by a reduction of membership in this chamber.

The amendment seems to me to offer a substantial measure of protection to minorities. Consultation with the provinces in an established practice in our Canadian democracy. I feel that by consultation with the provinces protection can be given against the power of numbers. In measures of this kind that is the course which the government should take, and not assume to itself arbitrarily the right to dictate to the provinces.

In closing, let me say that it is not solely the matter of representation which concerns Prince Edward Island. If the claim made by the Minister of Justice and embodied in this resolution is established by the defeating of the amendment and the passage of the resolution, Prince Edward Island's agreement of 1873, by which she entered the dominion, is not worth the paper it is written on.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): I wish to deal briefly with four or five points in regard to this proposal and the amendment thereto.

The first point, which I should like to see cleared up definitely, is the effect of the passing of this resolution as regards the future. We are asking the British parliament to enact, as section 51, subsection 1, "The number of members of the House of Commons shall be two hundred and fifty-five," and so on. I take it that, since we are not proposing to repeal section 52, we are not binding ourselves for all time to a membership in this house of 255, and that section 52 will still be in force, that—

> The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

The only difficulty about it is, as I see it, that this is a subsequent enactment and it is in such precise and definite terms that it may be that we are binding ourselves never to increase the representation in the future. That is an important matter. It may well be that if the industrial part of Canada grows rapidly the maritimes will very shortly reach the number—twenty-four—provided for as a minimum, at which time the quotient will be obtained by dividing the population of Canada, west of Quebec and including Quebec, by 230, and if in the meantime the industrial areas in Canada have increased heavily it would leave the prairies in danger of having their representation cut down drastically and without any such protection as has been, in my opinion quite properly, given to the maritimes.

Much has been said about the essential justice of representation by population. But our representative system is designed, its purpose is to give proper representation to the will of the people, so that that will shall find appropriate expression in governmental action and legislation. I submit that actually mathematical representation by population has not been accepted as the basis on which you set up your seats within the provinces, where you can take into account these other factors. Obviously it is much harder properly to represent in this house the wishes and hopes and feelings of a widely scattered agricultural population than to represent a compact urban group.

Another thing: each part of the country should have a fair representation as respects the right to have its views prevail. Urban centres have great organizations: boards of trade and the like, great newspapers, and other means of pressing their viewpoints, whereas agricultural areas have to rely almost entirely upon those whom they elect to their legislatures and to parliament. So it is not surprising that at the time of the last redistribution, when it fell to the provincial groups here in the Commons to establish constituencies within their boundaries according to what they thought right, they did not follow strictly the rule of representation by population. Take, for example, the three largest seats in Quebec. I find that their average unit of population is 89,871, whereas the three smallest seats in that province have about 23,000 each, or roughly one-quarter of the population of the three large city seats. Or take Ontario; the five largest seats have an average unit of representation of 95,614, and the five smallest seats have 21,491, so that the unit of representation in these latter is less than one-fourth of what it is in the larger seats. This indicates that when representation is placed upon a basis which is regarded as fair and just, agricultural areas are held to be entitled to smaller constituency populations than are required in the larger urban areas, so that these seats can be properly represented in this house. Every province, with the exception of the maritimes and the prairies, has large urban centres, so that, by putting large numbers into those urban seats, they can give the rural population a reasonable representation. But we, at least in Saskatchewan, have not that safety valve, and if this particular resolution had not been introduced and we had been reduced in Saskatchewan to seventeen seats it would have meant that our rural constituencies would have been so large that it would have been difficult adequately and properly to represent them in this house. That is a problem which must receive the attention of parliament in the days ahead—how to give adequate and fair representation to a predominantly, an almost exclusively, agricultural province like Saskatchewan, in comparison with other agricultural communities in the rest of Canada.

In regard to what has been done in the maritimes, and their minimum, I do not think anything can be said against it. Theoretically, if you did not give them a minimum, you might come to the time when a province, one of the basic provinces of confederation, might be reduced to the point where it would not be represented at all in this house, which would obviously be a ridiculous state of affairs. A minimum representation must be provided in connection with such a province; the same situation must be kept in view and we must see to it that proper representation is given to an agricultural province.

Something has been said in this house, and it has been repeated more than once, to the effect that there was no justification for increasing the number of members in the House of Commons, because of the cost involved. If there is one way in which democracy can be strengthened in a country like ours, it is to see that the people are made to feel that they are adequately and properly spoken for in the parliament of their country; and if you have a unit so large that people do not feel that they know their members, or that their members are able to speak for them fully and properly, they are bound to lose faith to some extent in our representative democratic institutions. To suggest that we should allow the extra cost of a few thousand dollars to enter into the picture, and to prevail against the best interests of our representative institutions, is indeed strange.

I looked up the estimates for this year and I have found that there is provided for legislation, for the cost of running parliament and for other costs in connection with legislation, the sum of $3,486,000. I find that we are going to spend as a country, according to these estimates, the sum of $2,769,000,000. In other words, as a parliament we are going to spend, in the supervision of these expenditures and in the passing of laws for this great country, a little over one-tenth of one per cent of the money that we shall spend, about one-tenth of a cent for every dollar we spend. I ask myself this question: Can those who say that we cannot afford to have proper representation of the people in this house be really serious?

What price liberty and freedom? Well, that is one way in which we can ensure liberty and freedom, to have our representative institutions functioning properly; and if it is necessary to have more than 255 members, bearing in mind that in Great Britain the representation is something under 600 members in their House of Commons, then I say it should be done and the extra small amount should not enter into our consideration, since we are doing something to promote the welfare of our country and its democratic institutions.

One other matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the house is the argument that was raised on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party. They argue, I understand, that this proposal should not be carried into effect until there has been consultation with the provinces. I have read the debate carefully and I am not clear as to just how far they intend to go in that respect. Do they mean that if we cannot get the consent of the provinces to the proposed change we should do nothing; or do they mean that we should go through the form of consulting the provinces and, if they do not agree, we should go ahead anyway? I suggest that in justice to the people they should state definitely where they stand. They are inviting the members of this house to vote for their motion that this proposal should not be carried into effect until the provinces have been consulted. They should state what they intend to do if one of the provinces should decide to stand on its alleged constitutional rights and say, "We will not agree to it." If they intend to allow the matter to drop there, after consulting the provinces, and to go no farther if one or more of the provinces say no, then what my hon. friends are doing is this. They are saying that nothing shall be done if the provinces disagree. Is that what they mean?

Do the Progressive Conservatives in this house suggest that a conference should be held at which Mr. Drew would represent the province of Ontario and that he would give up what is his by alleged constitutional right, eight members more than the province is entitled to on the basis of population in this house?

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Certainly he would. It is the only fair thing to do.

Mr. TUCKER: My hon. friend may think he can speak for Premier Drew—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I can do it better than you can.

Mr. TUCKER: —but I am not sure that he can. I do not think he expected Premier Drew to take the stand he did recently.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Now let us stay in order. We can argue that at the proper time.

Mr. TUCKER: No one can speak for Mr. Drew in this house except Mr. Drew.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And he is not here.

Mr. TUCKER: Have we the assurance of the Progressive Conservative party that the provinces will agree to this resolution if it is referred to them? Is that what they mean? If so, their motion means nothing and it is simply window-dressing. If, on the other hand, they do not know, then they are putting themselves in the position where we may be bound to this admittedly unfair situation. That is the position of the Progressive Conservative party, and I say to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) that he owes it to the house and the country to say what the attitude of his party is. Suppose we consulted the provinces and the provinces did not agree. Would they say that Ontario should keep eight members to whom it was not entitled, Saskatchewan lose four, and Manitoba three? Let them speak out and say frankly to the people of the country what their attitude is.

The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) took a slightly different attitude. As I understood him, he took the view that under section 52 we could actually bring about the situation which we shall have after this resolution goes through the British parliament, that we could increase our membership to the numbers proposed, that subsection 4 would not apply because we are not decreasing the membership of any province except Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Subsection 4 would not protect Saskatchewan—and I presume the same is true of Manitoba—and we could bring about this situation that is proposed without an amendment of the constitution.

If it is within the power of this parliament to do this very thing, what becomes of the argument of the Progressive Conservative party that we should not ask for a constitutional amendment to make sure that we have the right to do it. The hon. member for Stanstead, in an able address, argued that parliament could do this very thing. Very well, if it can, why should he vote that before it is done the provinces should be consulted. If his argument is sound, the only effect of the amendment is to clear up all doubts and difficulties. If parliament proceeded along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Stanstead, and by chance he was wrong and the courts so held, we might have in existence a parliament which the courts would say was set up on a wrong basis. What kind of confusion would that bring about? That is a possibility arising out of the argument of the hon. member for Stanstead. But if we have a constitutional amendment merely making it quite clear beyond doubt that we have a right to do this, if his argument is correct we shall have taken no rights away from the provinces because, according to the hon. member, we had the right to do this in this parliament. I marvel at the hon. members of the Progressive Conservative party. Here we have one of their outstanding members saying that we have a right to do this thing in this parliament; and we have other members of the party saying that before we do this, or before we make sure we have a right to do it, the provinces should be consulted and perhaps given the right to veto what the hon. member says parliament has a right to do without a constitutional amendment. To me that is a strange attitude to adopt, and I invite the leader of the opposition or someone speaking on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party to indicate exactly where they stand on this matter and why they seek to stultify this parliament by the stand for which they have argued.

Another matter I should like to deal with briefly is the importance of addressing ourselves at a very early day to the problem of setting up some means of changing our constitution within Canada without having to go to the British parliament for that purpose. We say and believe that we are an absolutely autonomous, self-governing nation, co-equal with the United Kingdom. Yet it is quite possible that certain situations may develop which may throw a doubt on that position in the minds of those who do not understand the position. We should bear that in mind, and try to act to prevent them from developing. It is possible, for example, that a party might be endorsed by the country having as one of its planks the abolition of the senate. There you would have our self-governing nation electing a government having that as its policy and putting through this House of Commons, we will say, a resolution to abolish the other place. I take it that some of the provinces would object. Then the British parliament would be asked to hear representations on behalf of the sovereign people of Canada, as expressed in their House of Commons, to do one thing, and they would have representations from some of the provinces not to do it. So that you would have the British parliament in the utterly impossible position of being forced to act as an arbiter between Canada as a country and parts of Canada as provinces. Again, you might have this situation develop, that this house and the other place would concur in a resolution asking for a change in the constitution, and one province might feel very strongly that this should not be done. I take it that that province would have the right to make representations at Westminster, so that again you would have the parliament of another country being put in the position of having to act as an arbiter between one group of Canadians and another group.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If the hon. member will permit one question, does not the privy council now do exactly the same thing he is talking about?

Mr. TUCKER: What do you mean by the privy council?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do they not act as an arbiter between the dominion and the provinces? Is that not what they do all the time?

Mr. TUCKER: As far as I am concerned, the sooner we do not have to resort to a court outside Canada to interpret our laws, our constitution or the rights of one Canadian as against another, the better pleased I shall be.

Mr. COLDWELL: You mean the sooner we cease doing it?

Mr. TUCKER: The sooner we see to it that we do not have to refer matters for decision to the judicial committee of the privy council, a court outside Canada, the sooner we shall stop misleading other nations as to the essential sovereignty of the Canadian nation. To suggest as an argument why we should have to go to Westminster to have our constitution amended and perhaps, as a sovereign people, act as a suppliant before the parliament at Westminster as against a province which might be opposed to what we wanted to do, that the Canadian government has to go and argue before the judicial committee of the privy council, with the provinces arguing on the other side as to what our constitution means, I think is trying to prove that because you have one wrong you should have two. As far as I am concerned, the sooner Canada stands on her own feet; the sooner Canada has the right to amend her own constitution, the right to have her constitution and laws determined by courts within this country, the sooner the possibility of misunderstandings between Canada and other parts of the empire and between Canada and other nations will be done away with. There is no doubt in the world but that other nations looking at Canada, realizing that we have to go to Westminster to have our constitution changed and to have our laws interpreted by the judicial committee, would be almost bound to misunderstand the essential sovereignty of this nation, and the sooner that is changed, the better I think it will be for the United Kingdom and for us.

That is all I wish to say about this redistribution measure. I compliment the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) on having brought it in, because at any rate it restores the position under which we shall at least have the same representation, on the basis of our population, as other parts of Canada, which we would not have had on the old basis. I urge, however, that the minister as well as future students of this problem give consideration to the question posed by the difficulty of providing proper representation in this house of the great agricultural area of western Canada and by the present mode of amending our constitution.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LUMBER INDUSTRY—STRIKE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to announce government action to deal with the situation in British Columbia due to stoppage of work in plants engaged in the manufacture of wooden containers for use in the harvesting and marketing of fruits and vegetables. I now table copy of an order in council passed to-day, which provides:

1. For the appointment of Mr. Gordon Bell of the city of Vancouver as controller of such plants.

2. That the operators of establishments engaged in the operation of a sawmill or woodworking plant and in particular those normally engaged in the manufacture of wooden containers for use in the harvesting and marketing of fruits and vegetables or of a logging camp normally engaged in the supply of logs for any such plant shall reopen the plants for business at twelve noon on June 19, 1946, which is to-morrow.

3. That employees formerly engaged in these plants return to work at twelve noon on June 19, 1946, at the wage rates which prevailed at the time of the work stoppage.

It has been arranged that the chief justice of British Columbia, Hon. G. McG. Sloan, shall act as an industrial disputes inquiry commissioner and negotiate with the bargaining representatives of the employees and the management of the plants with a view to settlement of the wage rates and other matters at present in dispute between them, on the understanding that whatever rates and conditions are agreed upon shall be effective from June 19, 1946. I shall not delay the house by reading the text of the order in council, but with permission of the house shall lay it on the table and ask that it be printed with my statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MITCHELL: By telegram I am urging upon the president of the union and the secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, who has been acting for the operators, that union and plant operators give full cooperation to this plan in order to get the mills started up again because of the importance of preventing further waste in food. Hon. members will understand, of course, that this action is being taken as a joint decision of the federal and British Columbia governments and therefore carries with it the authority of both governments. I sincerely hope that the action will be endorsed and accepted by those immediately concerned in the dispute.

I should like to make it plain to hon. members that there is still the major problem brought about through the stoppage of work in the lumbering and logging industry, mainly in the coastal region. Chief Justice Sloan, it will be recalled, has been acting as a commissioner and has made a recommendation for an increase of fifteen cents an hour with a revocable check-off of union dues. These proposals have been accepted by the operators. In my judgment they are fair and reasonable and should be agreed to by the men. I would urge upon them that they adopt the proposals and go back to work. It is my earnest wish that members of this house use their influence to bring about an acceptance of Commissioner Sloan's proposals and a return to work of those engaged in production that is so vital to the economy of the nation.

The order in council is as follows:

P.C. 2503

At the Government House at Ottawa
Tuesday, the 18th day of June, 1946.

Present:

His Excellency
The Governor General in Council:

Whereas upon a dispute arising between certain operators of several logging camps, saw mills, woodworking plants, shingle and planing mills and sash and door mills in the province of British Columbia, and the employees in those camps, plants and mills who are members of International Woodworkers of America, the Honourable G. McG. Sloan, chief justice of British Columbia, was appointed an industrial disputes enquiry commissioner to inquire into and report on the said dispute as the same concerns wage rates and other conditions of employment;

And whereas on the fifteenth day of May, 1946, the said International Woodworkers of America, acting on behalf of the said employees, declared a strike whereupon the employees went on strike, and since the said date have continued to be on strike;

And whereas the Honourable George S. Pearson, minister of labour for the province of British Columbia, has advised that in consequence of the continued work stoppage resulting from the said strike, wooden containers are not now available for use in harvesting and marketing the fruit and vegetable crop of that province, and, further, that unless sufficient quantities of such wooden containers are made available immediately for such use, great loss will be sustained by the fruit and vegetable growers in the province and great waste of essential food will result;

And whereas the said Honourable George S. Pearson recommends that a controller be appointed to take charge of and to operate such and as many of the said camps, mills and plants as he considers necessary to produce the requisite quantities of the required types and sizes of the said wooden containers for the uses aforementioned, and, further, that the controller shall have power to direct the said employees or any of them to return to work;

Therefore, his excellency the governor general in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, and under the authority of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, is pleased to make and doth hereby make the following order:

Order

1. Gordon Bell, esquire, of the city of Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, financial agent, is hereby appointed controller of the business, undertaking and establishment of every person, firm or corporation in the said province, engaged in the operation of a saw mill or woodworking plant and in particular every woodworking plant normally engaged in the manufacture of wooden containers for use in the harvesting and marketing of fruit and vegetables or of a logging camp normally engaged in the supply of logs for any such plant.

2. The said controller shall have the custody and control over the property and assets of any such person, firm or corporation as he, in his uncontrolled discretion and judgment, may deem necessary in order to manage, operate and carry on the business of such person, firm or corporation, and he shall, for such purposes, have and exercise the powers, authorities and rights of the board of directors of any such corporation.

3. The controller shall exercise the foregoing powers and authorities subject to such instructions and directions, if any, as may from time to time be approved by the Minister of Labour for Canada.

4. The Minister of Labour for Canada may, for purposes of this order, from time to time appoint one or more deputy controllers who shall have and exercise any and all of the powers conferred on the controller subject to any restrictions thereof which the controller may from time to time impose and subject, in all cases, to review by the controller.

5. The controller, any deputy controller or any person acting for or on behalf of or under the authority of the controller shall not become liable to any person for anything done or omitted in the exercise or purported exercise of any powers or authority from time to time vested in or conferred upon the said controller.

6. The authority of the controller shall commence at 12 o'clock noon, the 19th day of June, 1946, and shall continue until the same is revoked by order in council which shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

7. The authority of the board of directors of any corporation affected by this order is, subject to section 10 of this order and insofar as the same is abrogated by or pursuant to section 2 of this order, suspended from 12 o'clock noon, the 19th day of June, 1946, until the powers, authority and rights of the controller in respect of such corporation shall be revoked.

8. It shall be the duty of every person who was in the employ of any such person, firm or corporation on or immediately prior to the 15th day of May, 1946, to perform the duties of his employment as and when required to do so by the controller and he shall continue to perform such duties until the authority of the controller is revoked; and every person who fails to perform his duties as aforesaid as hereinafter required without lawful excuse, the onus of proof of which is upon him, is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine of $20 for each day or part of a day in which he fails so to perform his duties.

9. Each and every person who was in the employ of any person, firm or corporation affected by this order shall forthwith return to his place of employment and shall be paid wages at the rate in effect for him on the 15th day of May, 1946.

10. The Minister of Labour for Canada shall request the said commissioner, the chief justice of British Columbia, G. McG. Sloan, to commence his duties as commissioner; and the bargaining representatives of the aforesaid employees and each person, firm or corporation concerned herewith shall enter into negotiations with a view to the settlement of the matters presently in dispute between them, and shall negotiate in good faith with one another and make every reasonable effort to conclude a settlement. If by reason of such further negotiations, the parties agree upon an amount as an increase in the wage rates for the said employees, such increase shall, subject to the approval of the regional war labour board for British Columbia, be effective as and from the date upon which the employee returns to work.

11. Any person who (a) interferes with the exercise by the controller or any deputy controller of any of the powers, authorities and rights conferred upon him, or (b) interferes with any employee or other person seeking to comply with the terms of this order or (c) counsels or procures any person to violate this order, shall be guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding in the case of (a) $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years or to both such fine and such imprisonment; and in the case of (b) or (c), to a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

[Later:]

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): With the consent of the house I should like to make a short announcement. This afternoon I read a statement and tabled an order in council in reference to the labour dispute in British Columbia. To-night I am happy to tell the house that I have been informed through Chief Justice Sloan that both parties to the dispute have accepted the advice given them, and I understand that work will commence to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the house has reverted to the order for motions, I move, seconded by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent):

That there be an intermission in the sitting of this house this day between six o'clock and nine o'clock, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 6 in relation thereto.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is acceptable to us.

Motion agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AS TO RULES FOR READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to effect an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on this important resolution, and the amendment thereto, I should like first of all to say that I have been greatly impressed by the speeches delivered by many hon. members who have spoken before me, and I say this in all sincerity. Naturally I do not agree with all that has been said in the debate, but I wish to say what has impressed me most is that so many hon. members have done so much by way of preparation and research before making their contributions to the debate. I believe the whole house will agree with me when I say that this comment applies to members of all political parties. I feel it speaks well for this parliament, and, further, that it augurs well for the future of Canada, especially when one realizes that so many who have spoken so well are new members in the house. They have set a high standard in debate, and it will be difficult for me to maintain the same high standard. I feel, however, that it is incumbent upon me to make some remarks on this occasion, not especially because I am a member of the government, but because this resolution has been attacked by two members from my own province who are members of the Progressive Conservative party.

In 1867 there was passed by the imperial parliament what is known as the British North America Act, which is really not only the constitution of Canada, but also the constitution of the various provinces which make up our country. Time will not permit, nor is the house interested at this stage, in the details respecting all the preliminaries which led up to the passing of that act. At any rate it is sufficient to say that it was the result of Canadian statesmanship—and not British—and that it was the guiding genius of Sir John A. Macdonald, ably assisted by Sir George Etienne Cartier, Messrs. Tupper, Tilley and others, who paved the way for the passing of that act. One should add that, taking all things into consideration, they did an extremely good job. However, I feel that those of us of the third and fourth generation of Canadians since that date have just a little bit of criticism to make. They did not provide any means of amending our own constitution. The omission may have been deliberate or it may have been accidental, especially as there was little interest or little enthusiasm in the imperial parliament at the time of the passing of the act. Sir John A. Macdonald compared its progress in the British House of Commons to that of a private bill uniting two or three English parishes. The record is not clear, I believe, as to just how this omission occurred.

In discussing the question before the house, I do not pretend to do so as an authority on constitutional law. There are others in the house far more capable and competent to do so than I am. I speak, however, as one who is keenly interested in Canada and in Canada's future. While I am deeply conscious of the glories of tradition, as a Liberal I do not feel that I should be steeped in tradition. I therefore do not feel that our constitution should be like the laws of the Medes and the Persians, which altereth not. I regard our constitution as being like a suit or garment which was made in 1867 to fit the Canadian body politic. It has been an extremely good suit, and it has been made of extremely good cloth. It has worn well, and still has a lot of good wear in it. But time has marched on, and the Canadian body politic has grown up. Our suit is now a bit tight in spots; and, what is more important, it is no longer appropriate for the various occasions on which we have to wear it. One obviously feels that it is necessary that it should be altered. But the questions are and will be for the future, how should it be altered and who will be the tailor who is to make those alterations? As a Canadian I feel that we should be our own tailors.

Other members of the British commonwealth have the right to amend their own constitutions, and we should have the same right. If Australia and South Africa can amend their constitutions, why should not we? However, as yet we have not yet that privilege; and it will no doubt take much study on the part of many good Canadians before some suitable machinery can be adopted to enable us to amend our constitution. As I said before, the British North America Act is the constitution not only of Canada, but also of the provinces; and in order to arrive at a conclusion as to just what the machinery should be to amend all sections of the British North America Act, it would of course, be necessary that the provinces, or the people in those provinces should be consulted. At the present time all we in this parliament can do is to pass a resolution asking the imperial parliament to amend the act. That is just what the government of the day is proposing to do in connection with this redistribution bill.

That brings us to the question as to whether or not the provinces should be consulted before we pass this particular resolution. That question has come up before, and no doubt will come up again, as long as the present system of amendment exists. I am going to repeat what our able Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said on May 28, when moving the resolution, since it is a statement with which I am in complete accord:

> The provinces, that is to say, the people of the provinces, are all represented in this parliament, and for the purposes of such matters as are confined to the jurisdiction of this parliament it is by those representatives here that the people of the provinces speak. There are other matters given by the act to the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and the provincial governments; with respect to any of those it is my view that it would not be possible to deal with them without the consent of those to whose jurisdiction they have been confided.

With that statement of the Minister of Justice I repeat that I am in complete accord. I am sure no one in the house contends that we would be in order in passing a resolution requesting an amendment which would materially affect any of the matters which come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial governments or provincial legislatures without prior consultation with those provinces. Does anyone for one minute really believe that this or any other government would dare to endeavour to amend sections 92 or 93 of the British North America Act without consultation with the provinces? If we did, I am sure the imperial parliament would not accede to that request. With regard, however, to those other matters, such as the present resolution before the house, I am firmly convinced that it is not necessary that this house should consult the provinces in dealing with this question.

I believe there have been nine amendments of the British North America Act, and only on two occasions were the provinces consulted prior to the passing of those amendments. I am sure that when the Minister of Justice makes his reply he will deal quite fully with the same. Others have spoken as to what was done by Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier in other cases. But let us consider for the moment just what happened only a few years after confederation, and when the fathers of confederation were still alive. To begin with, there is not the slightest doubt but that at the time of the passing of the British North America Act Sir John A. Macdonald was most keen that this country should have a strong central government and central parliament. It should be borne in mind that our act was passed just after the awful American civil war. Sir John and the fathers of confederation knew what disastrous consequences might occur if there were not a strong central government. He was therefore desirous that this country should be called the kingdom of Canada, but in that he did not succeed. He was also desirous that all the residuary powers not specifically assigned to the provinces should be assigned to the new government and parliament of Canada, and in that he did succeed. As we all know, this characteristic of our constitution is the direct reverse of the constitution of the United States.

After dealing with the problems which arose shortly after confederation, it was proposed to extend better terms to Nova Scotia. Mark you, that was in 1869, two years after the passing of the B.N.A. Act. On this occasion, Mr. Holton, a member of this house, on the second reading of the bill moved as follows:

> That in the opinion of this house any disturbance of the financial arrangements respecting the several provinces provided in the B.N.A. Act unless assented to by all the provinces, would be subversive of the system of government under which the dominion was constituted.

That resolution was the first formal enunciation of what is known as the compact theory of confederation or the doctrine that all the provinces must be consulted and must assent before any change can be made to the constitution. The resolution was rejected on that occasion by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald and by the House of Commons, which included in its members at that time many of the actual fathers of confederation such as Messrs. Macdonald, Cartier, Galt, Tilley and Tupper, who voted against the resolution. That was in 1869, two years after confederation.

Again in 1871, two years later, the question of provincial consent was revived in connection with the passing of an act by the imperial parliament for the purpose of removing doubts as to the power of the Canadian parliament to pass the Manitoba Act. At that time Mr. Mills, then a member of the House of Commons, moved several resolutions protesting against the procedure followed by the government of the day. One of those resolutions was as follows:

> That the representative legislatures of the provinces now embraced by the union have agreed to the same on a federal basis which has been sanctioned by the imperial parliament. This house is of opinion that any alteration by imperial legislation of the number of representatives of the House of Commons recognized and fixed by the 51st and 52nd sections of the British North America Act without the consent of the several provinces that were parties to the compact would be a violation of the federal principle in our constitution and destruction of the independence and security of the provincial governments and legislatures.

Again this was a definite assertion of the theory that the provinces should be consulted before any changes should be made which would affect representation as provided by sections 51 and 52 of the British North America Act. This was only four years after confederation, but again the government, under the leadership of Sir John A. Macdonald declined to approve such a principle and the motion was rejected without debate. Not only was it rejected without debate, but I believe it was rejected without a recorded vote. The provinces were not consulted on that occasion, and there was no united protest on their part against the procedure that was followed. The fathers of confederation were still alive and were for the most part sitting in this House of Commons. They did not either suggest or approve the procedure which is being suggested to-day by the amendment to the resolution. Surely they, with the memories of the Charlottetown, Quebec and London conferences still fresh in their minds, were in a far better position to decide what the procedure should be in such cases than should the Progressive Conservative party be some seventy or eighty years later.

The main part of the amendment to the resolution before the house reads:

> Now therefore be it resolved that the government be required to consult at once the several provinces and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations be authorized to present an humble address to His Majesty in the following terms.

We, therefore, have again in the wording of this amendment a request to consult the provinces. The gist of the amendment seems to be in the words "that upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations." I should like to ask hon. members on the other side of the house, when they use the expression "satisfactory conclusion" to whom do they consider that these conclusions should be satisfactory? Do they mean that these consultations should be satisfactory to this parliament? Or do they mean that they should be satisfactory to each and every one of the whole nine provinces which make up Canada? Do they mean that they should be satisfactory to seven provinces and not satisfactory to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario? Or do they mean that they should be satisfactory to some provinces and not to others?

We in this house are fully aware just how difficult a matter it is to get all the provinces to agree with the dominion government or to agree among themselves. We recently had the spectacle of an interprovincial conference which dragged on and on. I am sure that no one in this house will contend that the result of those consultations was satisfactory in any sense of the word. To my mind, the amendment to the resolution is not a practical one without further explanation as to just what the word "satisfactory" means. I am going to vote against the amendment. I do not believe it is a practical suggestion, nor do I believe, according to our constitution, that we have to consult the provinces on matters of this kind.

To come now to the main resolution which has been debated at considerable length from many corners of this house and which I am going to support, in my own province I am not known as a "yes" man. My political record there speaks for itself. I want to assure the house that I arrived at the conclusion that I would support such a proposition as is contained in this resolution only after careful study and serious consideration. I feel that in all our deliberations in this house we should remember that while we sit as representatives for certain constituencies, we are first and foremost members of this House of Commons of the parliament of Canada and that in fairness to this great country of ours we should always decide what is best for Canada as a whole.

In making this statement I know that I am on sound ground. I would direct the attention of hon. members to something which I believe has been read to them already by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne's third edition, page 11, where our learned and genial Clerk quotes from Blackstone as follows:

> Every member as soon as he is chosen becomes a representative of the whole body of the commons, without any distinction of the place from whence he is sent to parliament . . . that every member is equally a representative of the whole has been the constant notion and language of parliament. Every member, though chosen by one particular district, when elected and returned, serves for the whole realm. For the end of his coming thither is not particular, but general, not barely to advantage his constituents, but the commonwealth.

That is taken from Blackstone, volume 1, page 159. He then goes on to quote Edmund Burke.

Mr. MACKENZIE: To the electors at Bristol.

Mr. BRIDGES: Yes, to the electors at Bristol. This is the quotation:

> Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests; which interests each must maintain, as an agent, and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation, with one interest, that of the whole; where, not local purposes, not local prejudices, ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole.

I recommend to each and every member of this house the reading of these two articles, and I recommend not only that they read them but that they should read, mark, learn and inwardly digest them. These words should be our guiding principles in our deliberations in this house.

What do I like about this resolution? I like the fact that it is going to make a new unit of representation which, with some safeguards for the smaller provinces, treats us all alike. The unit will no longer be based upon the population of the province of Quebec. It will be based upon the population of the whole of Canada. In this way we shall all be considered alike, whether we be of French or English descent, whether we be of Scottish or Irish descent, whether we be of Dutch or Ukrainian descent or any other kind of descent.

Mr. KNOWLES: Or even Canadians.

Mr. BRIDGES: Or even Canadians, as I am myself. That is one way in which we can build up a united Canada, and I want to build up a united Canada.

What else do I like about this resolution? I like the fact that, for the time being at least and, I think, for a long, long time to come, it sets a limit of 255 to the size to which this house can grow. If I must speak from a sectional point of view—and I do not believe I have to—in order to answer the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), who, I regret, does not happen to be in his seat at the moment, that limit of 255 is a protection and a safeguard for the maritime provinces. Under the present system there is no limit to the size to which this house can grow, and if the rest of Canada grows faster than the province of Quebec we may some day have a house of more than 255 members. It even might go as high in the distant future as 300, and if our maritime provinces did not maintain the same rate of increase we would then have a minimum of, only twenty-four members in that number of 300. One might say an increase in population of this kind could never happen, but we are, I believe, entering upon a new era in Canadian history. All one has to do is to look at the map of Canada and see how much of this country is undeveloped, and with some vision he can see that there is such a possibility.

If, in order to reply to the hon. member for Royal, I must speak from a further sectional point of view I would point out to the hon. member that under this resolution we shall have the representation in this House of Commons to which at present we are entitled by population, and by reason of this safeguard I have mentioned we shall not have fewer than ten members in a house of 255.

In my opinion, this resolution is, first of all, in the best interests of Canada, and if I must speak on the same level as the hon. member for Royal and some others who have spoken from a sectional point of view, I say it is also fair to the maritime provinces. In making that statement I am fully conscious of the fact that I happen to be a member of this government and the only member of this government from New Brunswick. So far as I am concerned, I shall never turn my back on the province in which I was born and in which I have lived practically all my life. I am just as good a citizen of New Brunswick as any other member from that province. But I am also a citizen of Canada, and in addition I have the high honour to sit in this House of Commons of Canada. In my deliberations in this house I shall, I hope, always act in the best interests of Canada as a whole. I want to see a strong, virile and united Canada. We cannot, as has been said by other speakers in this house, Balkanize Canada.

I have listened to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) and the hon. member for Royal when they have outlined the woes and misfortunes in the past of the maritime provinces. I have heard the same story over and over again in parliament and out of parliament. I am quite frank to admit that confederation has not proved as beneficial to us as we had hoped it would be. But does any member from the maritime provinces in this House of Commons say that we should get out of confederation or secede from the union? What good has the relating of all these woes of the past accomplished? We are in confederation, and, taking it by and large, the vast majority of the people, especially the younger people of the maritimes, rejoice in the fact that they are Canadians. They fought as Canadians in two wars—not as Nova Scotians, not as New Brunswickers, not as Prince Edward Islanders. The people of the maritime provinces to-day are interested in the future, and, what is more important still, they are interested in the results to come in the future. They are interested in what legislation will be best for them. They are and have been interested in old age pensions, pensions for the blind, family allowances, and social security of all kinds. These are the things in which they are interested, much more than in relating the woes of the past. They to-day know that they can count, as they have counted, on the Liberal party under the able leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) more than on any other party to bring about such reforms as are required.

There are two things in which I firmly believe. They are, first, a true spirit of Canadianism, and, second, national unity. One should be the corollary of the other. As a follower of our great Prime Minister, I shall ever follow those principles of Canadianism and national unity which have been so clearly and ably enunciated by him in the past.

I believe that this resolution is in the best interests of Canadianism and of national unity. I am a Canadian, a Canadian to the core. We are all Canadians. But let us develop a true spirit of Canadianism. I am proud of Canada, and I am proud too, as our leader said yesterday, that Canada is a member of the British commonwealth of nations. I rejoice in that membership. I do not want any misunderstanding about that.

Confederation was born in a spirit of compromise, and if this country is to become the great country we all want it to be, the same spirit of compromise which permeated the conferences of the fathers of confederation at Charlottetown, Quebec and London should ever be present in this House of Commons.

I am not going to ask the maritime members of this house to vote for what they regard as in the best interests of the maritime provinces, as did the hon. member for Royal. I am going to ask all members of this house, whether they come from the maritimes or anywhere else, to vote for what they regard as in the best interests of Canada as a whole. I want a united Canada. God save Canada from sectionalism.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I must compliment the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) on the early part of his speech. It reached a high place in reasoning and a very high place in rhetoric. We have not heard enough of him. If, in the later stages of his speech, when the applause grew so generous, just a tinge of the soap-box entered, I am sure he can readily be forgiven for that.

I also agree with him most heartily in complimenting members on the high tone of this debate. It only fell by the wayside slightly once, and that was when my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) followed the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and with a shade of annoyance, for which, of course, he is forgiven, accused the hon. member for Lake Centre of reading his speech. His remarks were that he could not tell when the hon. member for Lake Centre ceased quoting and when he was reading his own speech. It occurred to me at the time how greatly pleased the leader of the C.C.F. party would have been if someone could honestly say of him that he did not know when Laurier ceased speaking and the hon. member began. I am inclined to think that would be a great compliment to anyone in this house, and indirectly the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar paid that compliment to the hon. member for Lake Centre.

We were asked a couple of direct questions this afternoon, and I intend to reply to them. But before doing so I am anxious to say this. Everyone agrees that representation by population is an ideal much to be desired; but, like many other things, coming to its practical application, we cannot in this as in many other things carry it through 100 per cent. We have already in Prince Edward Island a variation from that principle, and I am happy to say that I have heard no one in this debate object to the situation as it there exists. If we go to other countries we find that the same thing prevails there. In the United Kingdom there are counties; there are boroughs; there are even members for the universities, whose electors cast two votes, one for the university member and one in the place where the voter resides. Take a little trip to the south, to the United States, and what do you find there? In the house of representatives there is representation by population, but in the senate, the more powerful from a legislative point of view of the two bodies, the representation is purely regional. In other words, the state of New York, with its teeming millions, has exactly the same representation—two—as the state of Nevada with a population not nearly as large as the city of Montreal. So that while representation by population is an ideal, I agree with what has been said by hon. members from Saskatchewan, the maritimes and elsewhere, that it cannot be carried to an extreme degree. I have in mind one constituency, that of Acadia. It is tremendously large; it is a poor constituency; it is a place where they do not get very much rain. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has been looking into that for some time and he is either going to irrigate it or bring in a rainmaker as we did at one time at Medicine Hat.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We might bring in a bit of Vancouver.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We might bring them a bit of Vancouver, as the minister suggested. However, there are other things in Vancouver which we would not have at any price. The minister is not one of them. But, as I was saying, Acadia is a poor place. The roads are not good. It has railways going in two directions; but they are many, many miles apart, and the north and south railway, running between Calgary and Edmonton, is not in the constituency at all, so that if you wish to travel from one point in the hon. member's riding to another by railroad, which you must do when it rains because you cannot drive motorcars then—they know something about mud—you must come clear around into Lacombe, to Calgary, and from there by the Goose Lake or the Hanna line. So that in a case like that I agree with the application of what the parliamentary assistant to the minister has said. In this country, with so small a population spread over such tremendously wide areas, we must give some consideration to regional difficulties.

A few moments ago somebody sent me statistics of the population of greater Montreal and greater Toronto. I believe that, according to the last census, the population of the dominion is 11,500,007. The population of the two cities I have mentioned is over two million. So that I think the point made by the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) was well made. If you want to tie in Vancouver, with 338,000, and Winnipeg, with 287,000, it is even more evident that to follow rigidly the principle of representation by population would necessarily increase the size of many rural areas, and the people who have been struggling along in those places would not have proper representation.

I now turn to the constitutional side. Modest as I am, like the Minister of Fisheries, I am far from being a constitutional lawyer. Frankly, I have learned more about the British North America Act in the last couple of weeks in this house than I knew in the last thirty or forty years. But certain things in that act are apparent, and here is where I commend and compliment the Minister of Fisheries. The great defect of the act is that it has no provision for its amendment. That was done in the other commonwealth countries, and that, it seems to me, is the major difficulty which is confronting us now.

I come to the direct question asked by the hon. member for Rosthern. He said this: granted that you consult your provinces—and he wanted to know the meaning of certain words—and then you do not have unanimity, where do you on that side of the house go from there? I think that is, as accurately as I can put it, the question which the parliamentary assistant to the minister asked. I am not going to reply to that directly at the moment, because I say that it all comes back to what the Minister of Fisheries said: there is no method of doing it. As a lawyer with some regard for the constitution, even without perhaps very much knowledge of it, I am not going to accept the hon. member's view that because there is no regular means we should adopt this means of bulling the thing through. The fact that there may be a majority one way, and of course a minority the other way, does not mean that we shall accept the majority view. I am sure that no one on the other side of the house will give it as his legal opinion that if there is but one dissenter, there is power in the act to accept the view of the other eight. We come squarely back to the fact that we have no method of amendment. So it seems to me of great importance, that we should have a conference, after this bit of a measure has been dealt with, whereby we shall arrive at some scheme for amending our constitution. If we had that now we would not be in this long debate and the various difficulties which we are in.

Mr. TUCKER: Will the hon. member, then, permit a question? I permitted one from him.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes.

Mr. TUCKER: Is he saying that until we can get the power to amend our own constitution we should leave this the way it is, without doing anything about it; that we should leave Ontario with eight members she is not entitled to, and cut down Saskatchewan by four and Alberta by three?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I first say this. Quebec is entitled to increased representation. I have no doubt about that at all. I know there are some people who think that I do not mean what I say and that I am suggesting these things by way of delay. But I tell the parliamentary assistant to the minister that if there is no legal method of amendment we have no right to construct one of our own unless it be based on legal and solid grounds. I hope I make myself clear.

Mr. TUCKER: We have acted to amend the constitution seven times in the past. Does my hon. friend say that that was illegal?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If the hon. member is asking my view, I will say that confederation is a pact. It was a pact among equals. The Dominion of Canada was born of four mothers, or perhaps two mothers and two fathers.

Mr. BRIDGES: Three.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Well, make it as many as you like. I am getting into trouble now with these legitimacies.

Mr. BRIDGES: What were the four?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am wrong. I can remember New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, Upper and Lower Canada. I thought that was four.

Mr. BRIDGES: No. There was only the one province of Canada at that time.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The act of 1841 did come in, so let us make it three. You are getting me on the 1841 act. To show you I am a great constitutional lawyer, I even remembered that there was an act of 1841, so that I will go to the head of the class now.

Mr. BRIDGES: Does the hon. member recall that the act of 1867 was a statute and not a pact? It was a statute of Westminster and, in my opinion, it is a statute and not a pact.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I admit frankly that the statute of 1867 is a statute—doing what? Confirming a contract. That is exactly what it is. It is a statutory contract, an agreement made between these three people. That is what it is. Let me go farther. Someone may say that I am quite wrong, and I greatly respect the opinions of other people, certainly on any subject with respect to which they know perhaps a great deal more than I do. However, for what it is worth, that is my humble view. But leaving aside all legalizing, all legalities and everything else, what is confederation but the joining together of a number of people to create a whole for the common good? And be the act of 1867 the confirmation of a pact by statute, or a statute standing alone, it is equally the constitution for those who joined it and for the dominion, and there can be no doubt about that. That being so, it seems to me only reasonable and logical that at least consultation should take place.

Going a step farther, I will ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), when he replies, if he can tell us in his judgment whether or not the earlier part of section 133 can be dealt with by a majority in this parliament; that is, the section of the act which provides for the French language in this house and in the province of Quebec. It also provides for the French language in dominion courts and in the courts of the province of Quebec. I am now the questioner and the great constitutional lawyers over there will perhaps answer me on that point. If I am right, my view is this. It is a severable section. If this parliament by a majority can change the proportion of membership in this House of Commons, that is the proportion by provinces, and if it is held that that is entirely within our jurisdiction, then I assert, with, I hope, some force and with, I hope, some reason, that on the same basis this same body can change section 133. Let us hope that is not so, because those rights granted at that time should never be left to the whim or sometimes, in heat, even to the anger of majorities.

We who are over here say to our friends of French extraction: We want that maintained and it will never go without your consent. That is our attitude with respect to that. But becoming lawyers once more, my view, and my considered view, is that if we can do constitutionally what we are now doing, we can certainly do that one thing.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at nine o'clock.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Through the courtesy of the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, since unfortunately I was not able to be here this afternoon when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) made his announcement, I wish, on behalf of the province of British Columbia, to express my appreciation of the action he took and to assure him of all possible cooperation on the part of the farmers, I think on the part of the union, and, I hope, on the part of all other parties interested.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I join with the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) in complimenting the Minister of Labour as he has done. This is no time to say it might have been done earlier. We on this side join with the hon. member in his appreciation of the stand the Minister of Labour is taking. We express the hope that those people in British Columbia within whose power it lies to save food for Canada and for Europe will act under Gordon Bell, who incidentally is a friend of mine and who has been named to take charge of this operation.

I am going to try to conclude my remarks with a summation of what I have been trying to say. It seems to be agreed throughout this house that we are all anxious to relieve the province of Quebec of the handicaps under which it labours at the present time. I appreciate that in making this statement there may be some in this house, though I hope not, who will answer it with school-boy, smart-aleck expressions and wisecracks of one kind or another. If that sort of thing is attributed to myself I shall treat it with the silence and contempt it deserves, because in opening my remarks I put on record, lest there be any doubt about it anywhere or at any time, that this was my view, my hope and my conviction.

I should like to join with the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) in complimenting this house on the high plane and high quality of this debate. May I just add that my difference with the resolution is solely a matter of method. I am firmly convinced that we should not lightly contemplate—and I do not use that expression lightly, if I may repeat the word—changes in our constitution. To me, and I think to all who have grown up under it, the constitution is almost a sacred thing. It is that by which we have lived. It is that by which we have known our individual positions, our party positions and all other positions in the government of this country; and, more than the government, in the economic life of this country. My criticism is as to the matter of method. I may be wrong, but my legal view is that it was a contract made between three people, in which six people later joined. The dominion government was a creature of their making, and it could come into existence only by their agreeing that it should be so made. I do not like poetry much, but a few moments ago I was sitting in my room and the only thing I could think of was something said by Aytoun in one of his poems. Hon. members may laugh; they may not think it apropos, but these words occurred to me:

> Sirs! I charge you, keep it holy;
> Keep it as a sacred thing,
> For the stain ye see upon it
> Was the life-blood of your king!

I hope no one will doubt my sincerity, though I may have gone far afield; I hope no one will laugh at my idea that irrespective of what we have done in the past, when the interest may not have been taken in these matters, we are told that now we are a nation. But let us be a nation within the law. Let this parliament not concern itself for the moment with how many members there should be in this House of Commons, though repeating that Quebec still suffers. Is not the task which now commands our attention that of joining parties to find a proper method for the amendment of our constitution?

Let me say this word in closing. May we not all join in saying this. We are all seeking the same thing; we differ only as to method. We on this side fear that if this method is adopted it may open the door to certain things which many of my hon. friends on the other side would not care to see happen. I am not suggesting that the matter be deferred for any length of time, but I am suggesting that perhaps a reference as to our legal position might be worth while. In saying that—and I speak for my party—I am suggesting only a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada as to what is our position. I am bound to take issue with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Tucker) in this. The hon. gentleman had a good deal to say about some other country amending our constitution, and he did not want any other person as an arbiter between the dominion and the provinces. I asked him this simple question: are not the privy council the arbiter now, as they have been for a long time? I am going to say this to the hon. gentleman, because he and I belong to the same profession, though I suggest he adorns it infinitely more than I do. I am in complete agreement with the abandonment of appeals to the privy council except in matters between the provinces and the dominion. I say with the greatest respect to every individual who belongs to the Supreme Court of Canada that they live here, and nowhere else; they associate here even with humble people like myself, back-benchers in an opposition party, and there is no doubt but that those intangible things do affect people. I am only saying to my hon. friend—and I think if he gives some thought to it he will agree with me—let us be through with appeals to the privy council. But in constitutional matters only, as between provinces and the dominion, let it continue. We want an outside referee.

The Minister of Labour has been seeking an independent chairman for a long, long time. So I say this: I disagree with him only in that little particular—and I know what I am saying is unpopular with my profession. But for the good of this country, and for the preservation of provincial and dominion rights I insist that that be carried on.

I close with this one word, that I trust the Minister of Justice will answer frankly the question I put to him a minute ago. I trust that no infinitely smarter lawyer than I am—and there are many on the other side—will grasp at some phrase, word or sentence which I have used, but that this House of Commons will treat it with consideration, particularly my French compatriots when I mention section 133. Even though you defeat the amendment, what is more important still is that you will believe that those of us over here, as we believe with respect to you over there, have only one high purpose and one high principle at heart, and that is the good of this Dominion of Canada.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak at this stage in the debate. But in view of the earnest question put to me by the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) I think I should make an immediate reply.

However, before making that reply, I believe there are a few observations I should make upon the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I do not propose to discuss any more than he did the abstract question as to whether or not confederation is to be regarded as a compact, a treaty, or a contract. I think that discussion turns upon the meaning one gives to those words. There was no doubt a solemn agreement reached on some definite principles by those individuals who, in fact, purported to represent and to act for the two major groups of the population then inhabiting the lands which are now the territory of Canada, and that agreement is one we, their descendants, are in honour bound to respect; but there was no operative contract or treaty between free and autonomous states capable of making the kind of contract or treaty which would, by its own operative force, bring into effect a new federal state, as a creature of their joint agreement. That is where I differ sharply from the hon. member for Calgary West.

There was only one government at that time for Lower Canada and Upper Canada which comprised by far the larger portion of the two contending elements of the population, and that was a colonial government exercising delegated power to make laws, with the advice and consent of the legislative council and the legislative assembly, which laws, when assented to by Her Majesty or in her name, were to be valid and binding by virtue of the express enactment of the imperial parliament.

The original constitution of 1791, which was only partly repealed by the Act of Union of 1840, expressly stated that there would be set up legislative councils and legislative assemblies for Upper Canada and for Lower Canada, and that in each of the said provinces respectively—

> . . . His Majesty, his heirs and successors, shall have power during the continuance of this act, by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council and assembly of such provinces respectively, to make laws for the peace, welfare and good government thereof, such laws not being repugnant to this act; and that all such laws, being passed by the legislative council and assembly of either of the said provinces respectively, and assented to by His Majesty, his heirs or successors, or assented to in His Majesty's name . . .

And so on.

> . . . shall be, and the same are hereby declared to be, by virtue of, and under this act, valid and binding, to all intents and purposes whatever, within the province in which the same shall have been so passed.

The Act of Union of 1840 provided:

. . . that all such laws being passed by the said legislative council and assembly and assented by Her Majesty, or assented to in Her Majesty's name by the governor of the province of Canada, shall be valid and binding to all intents and purposes within the province of Canada.

That was the nature of the colonial legislature which had this delegated jurisdiction over Upper Canada and Lower Canada, and the two major elements of population were under that one legislature. Those who represented them respectively in the conference of Prince Edward Island, in the conference of Quebec and in the conference at London were the members of the executive council enjoying the confidence of that assembly.

The constitution of Nova Scotia, the constitution of New Brunswick and the constitution of Prince Edward Island were not even in statutory form but resulted merely from the commissions of their respective governors and the instructions to them from the sovereign.

There was an address voted in this house in 1882 requiring copies of the charters and the constitutions granted by the crown to the provinces of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; and the Secretary of State communicated with the lieutenant governors of these provinces and received under date of December 20, 1882, from the lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia, that province to which reference has been made in this debate as a sovereign state, a letter in which the lieutenant governor said, among other things, as it is found in the sessional papers of 1883, No. 70 at page 7 of the volume:

The constitution of Nova Scotia has always been considered as derived from the terms of the royal commissions to the governors and lieutenant governors, and from the instructions which accompanied the same, moulded from time to time by dispatches from secretaries of state, conveying the will of the sovereign, and by acts of the local legislature, assented to by the crown; the whole to some extent interpreted by uniform usage and custom in the colony.

The situation was the same with respect to New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

I suggest, therefore, with great respect that it would be a mistake to try to transfer back to the years which preceded the British North America Act the concepts we have to-day of dominions within the British commonwealth. At that time this concept which has been expressed, in the language of Lord Balfour, as free dominions equal in status with the United Kingdom itself, and master of every aspect of their own affairs, is something which just did not exist. These were colonies exercising delegated powers under the full control of the imperial parliament or the crown advised by its ministers. There is no doubt that the members of those provincial colonial governments rose above the stature of the institutions which could no longer contain them, and they succeeded in founding a Canadian nation. But they had no power to do so by contract or treaty or agreement of their own.

I should like to cite a short passage from an essay on that subject by Professor W. P. M. Kennedy of Toronto university, as follows:

It is impossible to reconstruct those days without emotion: the sordidness of domestic colonial life; the harrowing tragedy of civil war among a kindred people; the thinly veiled neutrality of political opponents; the scarcely restrained clash of religious and racial animosities. They were brave men, those fathers of our country, of the stuff of which nation-builders are made, who in this city, where Wolfe and Montcalm fell as foes, achieved, as Frenchmen and Anglo-Saxons, a deeper and more fruitful victory. There is a note I fain would sound: "We are fast ceasing to be dependencies" . . .

It will be noted that that ends with the words of Sir John A. Macdonald that we would soon in fact cease to be dependencies. In spite of the vision and statesmanlike attitude of those brave men, legally they still were dependencies, but as a result of their labours the British North America Act was passed. Dependencies they were in fact, and the legal theory appears to be that stated by Lord Haldane in an Australian case in 1913 reported in 1914 Appeal Cases at page 237. Speaking of the Canadian constitution, he said:

Of the Canadian constitution the true view appears, therefore, to be that, although it was founded on the Quebec resolutions and so must be accepted as treaty of union among these provinces, yet when once enacted by the imperial parliament it constituted a fresh departure, and established anew dominion and provincial governments with defined powers and duties both derived from the act of the imperial parliament which was their legal source.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister permit a question which I am asking only that I may understand? Is his argument that because the authority of the colonies was delegated from the master source, therefore it could not mean anything without affirmation of the master source of that power? Do I get him correctly?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. The argument I am trying to make is that it would be entirely wrong to believe that in 1867 there was set up by a voluntary act of autonomous pre-existing states a union which derived its existence and its powers from those who made the agreement.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Your criticism is that because they did not have power of their own, they all had delegated powers and therefore were not able to unite without the higher powers agreeing?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, my argument is that at that time there were not in existence autonomous states and they did not have powers which they could transfer to the central power. The central power does not derive its existence and its authority from the provinces and it does not need to go back to the provinces in order to say what Canada shall be in the future.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Surely the only limitation was that they were acting under delegated power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I did not interrupt the hon. member. I would appreciate it if he did not interrupt me so that I might develop my argument to its conclusion without taking up too much time. That conclusion will include a specific answer to the question the hon. member asked.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I apologize? I thought I was saving time but apparently I was not.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There was a treaty of union, but the Quebec resolutions did not constitute a treaty. Those resolutions were merely the occasion for the adoption of a statute by the imperial parliament which had full authority and control over its colonies. I should like to refer hon. members to Pope's "Confederation Documents." At page 121 they will find a report of what took place on December 14, 1866, when Mr. McCully spoke as follows:

> Mr. McCully—We have adopted the Quebec scheme as the backbone, but I think we are here to bring our judgment and maturer reflections to bear upon it. We are tied down to nothing, but should not depart unnecessarily from the Quebec scheme. I will act with the majority of the conference, although contrary to my own opinion.
> Mr. Macdonald—The Maritime delegates are differently situated from us. Our legislature passed an address to the queen praying for an act of union, on the basis of the Quebec resolutions. We replied to inquiries in our last session of parliament that we did not feel at liberty ourselves to vary those resolutions. It is quite understood in Canada, though never reduced to writing, that if any serious objection should be made by the maritime provinces, we should be prepared to listen and consider.

That was the stated attitude. There had been addresses voted by the legislatures of Upper and Lower Canada which represented the two major elements of the population, but the London conference departed in substantial degree from the resolutions that had been adopted in Quebec, and the statute which was finally adopted departed in many specific degrees from the resolutions of the London conference. I am still using Pope's "Confederation Documents." In the Quebec resolutions, No. 23:

> The legislature of each province shall divide such province into the proper number of constituencies and define the boundaries of each of them.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is, the legislature?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is Quebec resolution No. 23.

Mr. MacNICOL: But it is the legislature that would do it?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the same method as they have in the United States.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. 24.

> The local legislature of each province may from time to time alter the electoral districts for the purpose of representation in the House of Commons, and distribute the representatives to which the province is entitled in any manner such legislature may think fit.

No. 24 was just dropped, and instead of it there was drafted the section which is in the bill; that it is the parliament of Canada which will from time to time make the redistribution of the territories to be represented by members in this house of parliament.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): What section is that?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The section of the British North America Act is No. 51:

> . . . shall be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time, as the parliament of Canada from time to time provides . . .

What became the conditions of section 51 is to be found in resolutions 19, 20 and 21. There is clearly set out a provision, a scheme which would be a firm basis for the argument made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett). The resolutions clearly showed that whenever there was a diminution of five per cent in the proportion of the popualtion of a province there would be a reduction. But that language was dropped in the bill, and instead of it there was used the language which is now found in section 51 of the act, on which the privy council decided; and I must differ from the hon. member from Stanstead in holding that they decided it—it was not an obiter dictum—an argument having been made by the province of Prince Edward Island that there was not a readjustment every time there was a comparison on a census between the population of a province and the number of the representatives elected from that province in the House of Commons. That was the matter which had to be decided in the Prince Edward Island case, and it was so decided. The suggestion has been made that we might have a reference as to whether under section 52 we could not increase the number of members in this house and bring about a readjustment in proportion to the population.

Mr. HACKETT: Before taking up that question, would it interfere with the minister's argument if I asked him a question?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not at all.

Mr. HACKETT: I ask him if he is aware that Mr. Newcombe, who represented the dominion in the privy council and in the supreme court, said, when he was asked by the bench to consider this argument, "I don't think that what I am about to say has anything to do with the case"?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is in the New Brunswick case, is it not?

Mr. HACKETT: No; that is in the Prince Edward Island case, and it is found at page 653. He is referring specifically to the point which I have submitted to the house was obiter dicta.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the New Brunswick case Mr. Justice Sedgewick said, at page 548 of the same volume which my learned friend has in his hand, that this subsection 4—

> . . . is a great protection to the representation of the decreasing provinces, because there must be a decrease of more than one-twentieth during the ten years. It may be a little smaller decrease than the one-twentieth for the ten years, and the result may be that not a single one may be left in the province after a time, and still they would be entitled to their full representation.

That was in the course of the argument. In delivering the judgment, Mr. Justice Mills said, at page 584:

> If the population of a province bore to the aggregate population of Canada a less proportion by one-twentieth than it did by the previous census, its representation was to be diminished.

If hon. members will turn to page 593 they will find that that judgment was concurred in by Mr. Justice Taschereau, Mr. Justice Sedgewick and Mr. Justice Armour, and they will find that it was confirmed by the privy council.

I toyed with the idea and with the arguments which were submitted to this house in such an interesting fashion by the hon. member for Stanstead, precisely for the purpose of suggesting to the law officers of the department that it might well be worth while to have a reference to the supreme court on that score. I was turned down cold, and convinced by them that I could not get anywhere with that suggestion; and it is because of that that I agreed with my colleagues on the procedure which is now before this house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Even deputy ministers have precedents.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Well, the deputy minister who expressed that view left a lasting mark upon the rulings of the Department of Justice.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Agreed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: He became later Mr. Justice Newcombe. None of his successors has found it necessary to depart from the rulings which were made under the one who became later Mr. Justice Newcombe.

Mr. HACKETT: He was the very gentleman, though, who said that the argument was irrelevant to the issue.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Whether he said it or not, the privy council said otherwise, and said that it rendered its decision because of its construction of the subsection of 51; and I was convinced that we could not get around that through any other method than by an amendment. The fact that the language of this section 51 was changed in London shows that the delegates there did not regard that as a matter of treaty, because if they were bound by the treaty which was expressed in the Quebec resolutions, John A. Macdonald and George Etienne Cartier, as they then were, in London, representing the two major elements of the population, are not, from my reading of their biographies, the kind of men who would have violated the treaty or concurred in its violation by the language put into the act. There was, among other reasons which had induced them to search for a workable constitution for the nation they had envisaged, that very problem of proportionate representation. Every hon. member knows that was the very thing which started the movement for confederation—the deadlock that occurred in the parliament of the Canadas because of the equality of representation of Upper and Lower Canada, though there was substantial inequality in the populations of the two sections. If hon. gentlemen who are interested will look at Mr. O'Connor's report to the senate in 1939 on the British North America Act, in the fourth annex, at page 67, they will find a lengthy tabulation of the substantial differences between the Quebec resolutions and the London resolutions and between the London resolutions and the British North America Act. They cover several pages. I shall not take the time of hon. members to read them into the record, for they are in this public document which is available to anyone in the library of parliament. That is the story of how the act came to be passed. It was not an act which, as suggested this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary West, ratified an agreement. It was an act which contained something substantially different from the resolutions which were the occasion for the legislation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is that not an attribute of draftsmanship?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Then there is nothing more than draftsmanship in what is being proposed to this house at this time. The principle that was agreed upon was that the people of the provinces would be represented in the central parliament in proportion to their population; clauses were drawn which experience has shown do not bring that about, and we are attempting to redraft the document so that it will, in fact, carry out what was agreed upon in substance.

Let us see what occurred after the passing of the statute. I shall not take very long to deal with it. Many hon. members, among others, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges), have shown what was done in 1869 and what was done in 1871, when this very restriction than which nothing could be more foreign to the concept of John A. Macdonald was moved in the first parliament of the Canadian nation and turned down flat. Eighty years afterwards it is raised—I will not impute motives—in a form which would have the effect of destroying the concept of the Canadian nation and making the national parliament the mere creature or delegate of sovereign provincial states who would exercise their superintendence over its attempts to keep in step with the progress of Canada as a national entity.

This is something which is raising great objections, but how many times has it been done? In 1868 an act was passed for the admission of Rupert's land. In 1871 an amendment was passed to make sure that the new province could be established. In 1875 there was amendment to section 18 of the act. In 1886 there was an amendment with respect to representation. All these were done under administrations directed by the leaders of the party of which the Progressive Conservative party pretends now to be the heir, and for none of these amendments was the consent of the provinces sought.

In 1907 there was an increase in subsidies. That was discussed with the provinces, and one of them dissented vigorously from the suggestions that were agreed to by the others, but notwithstanding its dissent the addresses were voted by both houses of parliament and the amendment was made.

Some hon. members have said that what was done in 1915 had all been gone into and agreed to by the provinces, but I happen to have referred to the sessional papers which contained the report of what took place at the provincial conference of 1913. It was just an interprovincial conference without the federal government being represented. In sessional paper 119, of 1914, printed in volume 28 of sessional papers, at page 5, we find the following:

> On the debate respecting representation of the provinces in the House of Commons, it was moved by the Hon. Mr. Fleming, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Matheson, that in the opinion of this conference the representation granted to the maritime provinces at the time they entered confederation should be restored and rendered irreducible.
> This motion was withdrawn . . .
>
> It was moved by Hon. Mr. Fleming, seconded by Hon. Mr. Matheson:
>
> That this conference would favour and request that an amendment be sought to the British North America Act providing an irreducible minimum in the representation of the maritime provinces, and that the irreducible number of representatives be as follows: for Nova Scotia, eighteen; for New Brunswick, thirteen; and for Prince Edward Island, six.
> This motion was withdrawn . . .
>
> It was then moved by Hon. Mr. Matheson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Fleming:
>
> That this conference having heard and considered the special claim of Prince Edward Island for the restoration to that province of its original six members in the House of Commons as a minimum, deems that it should receive the favourable consideration of the government and parliament of Canada.
> A debate having arisen thereon, it was
> Resolved,—That this conference expresses the opinion that, not representing the provinces for the purposes of this matter of representation, it declines to take any action in regard to it.

That was all. I tried to get the debates which had also been produced as a part of the return, sessional paper 119A, which had not been ordered to be printed, but unfortunately it was one of the papers destroyed in the fire of 1916.

That being the situation, the provinces having said, "We are not going to take any responsibility with respect to that", the government of Sir Robert Borden introduced a motion for an address which was passed by the Commons and by the Senate for an amendment to the British North America Act. It is curious to note that it came up in the last days of the session. The Senate sought to amend the address by adding a provision that the amendment would not take effect during the life of the then existing parliament. The House of Commons refused to concur in that amendment; the Senate persisted in its amendment, and the matter was not further dealt with. The amendment was made, but it does not recite that it was made on a joint address of the houses of parliament. The amendment which was made contained the reservation which the senate wished to have in the address. Apparently at that time the facts were disclosed, and it was made clear to the parliament of the United Kingdom that the houses of parliament were agreed on having an amendment made which affected the representation in a manner which everyone now sees is proper, and which protected the representation of the maritime provinces. That was made, with the provinces saying that it was none of their business and they would not take responsibility with respect to it.

In 1916 the life of parliament was extended for a year, and to do that there had to be an amendment to the British North America Act. There was no suggestion that the consent of the provinces should be sought or obtained. In 1930 agreements were made with the western provinces for the return of their natural resources to them, and there was no suggestion that the other provinces should be consulted. In 1940 there was a proposal to amend the British North America Act by taking from section 92 something which was under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. For that purpose the consent of the provincial legislatures was sought and obtained and an amendment made. But in 1943 hon. members belonging to the party opposite—I do not know whether it was then the Progressive Conservative party, but the party of which they pretend to be the continuators—accepted without any whimper the suggestion that redistribution should be postponed until after the war without there being any suggestion of consulting the provinces, and though it was known that there had been some objection, at least from Quebec.

I submit again that the statute apportioned the sovereignity to parliament for certain purposes and to the legislatures for other purposes, and what is assigned to the legislatures is in no wise under the jurisdiction of this parliament and cannot be touched without the consent of those who have jurisdiction over it. But what is within the powers of this parliament, this parliament can deal with without requesting the consent, or submitting to the superintendence of any provincial legislature. Here arises the question which was put to me by the hon. member for Calgary West: What about section 133?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. gentleman, but he has spoken for forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. gentleman having the unanimous consent of the house, he may continue.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sorry I have taken more than forty minutes and I did not intend to do so, but there is that question which was asked by the hon. member for Calgary West. The hon. gentleman asked, what about section 133, which provides:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

Can that be dealt with without the consent of the provincial legislatures? Legally I say it can. The situation appears to me to be this. There are persons and nations who reach a high estate in the affairs of men, and the high estate they reach imposes upon them high obligations. There was no obligation on the Tribune Festus to say to King Agrippa that he could not deliver Paul to the Jews when they requested that he be put to death. It occurs to one, however, that they also had reached a high estate, which imposes a corresponding obligation. I copied out of the bible on the table of this house, from the Acts, the quite natural statement of Festus:

> It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have licence to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him.

There was no statute; there was no law which required that this be done; but there was the concept in the Roman conscience that it was the proper thing to do. This country has now been under British institutions for 187 years. Only twice in that period have things been done, under the pressure of the circumstances then existing, of which we of French origin in my province could legitimately complain, and we did not have to complain long. After the treaty of Paris, a clumsy attempt was made to substitute the common law for what was the law of the French population of the lands which had come under the British crown; but immediately the law officers of the crown reported that that was something against the law of nations, and in 1774 it was corrected, and has remained corrected for all time.

After the troubled events of 1837, there was a suspension of the constitution and the creation of one parliament, and a clause was put in at that time providing that only the English language would be official in that parliament. But that lasted for only a very short time, and I feel—and I believe my fellow Canadians of my race and my religion can feel—that a better guarantee than anything that might be found in section 133 is to be found in that respect, for those who have been formed under the principles of British freedom and British fair play, to protect what are our essential rights.

It is not the manner of those who have themselves had, and whose ancestors have had, the formation that comes from that long history which has brought us to this point in the civilization of mankind, to do things which the conscience of humanity at large would regard as dishonourable; and the conscience of humanity at large would frown upon an assemblage in this house that attempted to take from me and from those of my race the right to speak the language I learned in my infancy as one of the official languages in which the deliberations of this house may be carried on. So it is of everything else that is not within section 92. If it is fair; if it is just; if it is proper according to the standards of human decency, it will be done, if it is unfair; if it is unjust; if it is improper, all members of this house will say, "It is not our manner to do such things."

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that at this stage of the debate it would not be proper to do more than touch on what one conceives to be the essential issue presented by the amendment before the house. I do not propose to review in detail the many matters that have been touched upon in this debate during which so much learning concerning Canadian constitutional history and Canadian constitutional law has been displayed. In passing, however, I offer the observation that I think many of the supporters of the government resolution, when their observations are reviewed with more detachment than has been evident in this debate thus far, will find that they have made some extreme statements which may prove embarrassing in times to come. Some of the supporters of the government resolution have made sweeping and general statements which I contend are not supportable in the light of constitutional practice and usage in this country.

It is unfortunate that the procedure in connection with a resolution of this kind, unlike that in connection with a bill, does not afford an opportunity to distinguish in debate between principle on the one hand and method and detail on the other. Therefore one must treat a question like this on balance. What is the essential principle involved in the resolution presented by the government and the principle of the amendment offered by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party? On the one hand, we have the government resolution offered as an attempt to eliminate an injustice which exists at the present time in the distribution of seats and which admittedly weighs most heavily on the province of Quebec because of the operation of subsection 4 of section 51 of the British North America Act. On the other hand, we see this principle involved: that to remedy that admitted injustice the government has resorted to a method which is fundamentally unsound and highly dangerous in its implications; that is to say, to proceed with a far-reaching amendment of the British North America Act without the slightest attempt at consultation with the provincial governments concerned.

In the beginning may I clarify one or two points to make quite clear my point of view in reference to the way in which subsection 4 of section 51 is operating at the present time. I say at once that it surprised me that many hon. members supporting the government resolution found it necessary to offer to the house laboured arguments to establish that the principle inherent in the British North America Act, with certain exceptions relating to the maritime provinces, was representation by population. Of course that is the principle. That is the foundation. When the fathers of confederation set about drafting the resolutions which eventually took legislative form in the British North America Act they were faced with two principles which had to be harmonized in some way or another. The first was the federal principle, the fact that certain states were going into confederation; and, second, that the citizens of those various states were to become common citizens of a new state or dominion. To harmonize those two principles they gave, through the Senate, certain recognition to the federal principle, by giving regional representation, a principle which is still to be found in the representation in the Senate to-day; while in the distribution of seats in the House of Commons they gave full effect to the principle of representation by population, with a qualification in the case of the maritime provinces which took fuller effect in the amendment to section 51 in 1915.

Let us be quite clear. It has been understood by all of us, I think, in the references that have been made to speeches in this house on earlier occasions, that no one has been quite able to understand how subsection 4 came to be introduced, except that, as Mr. Bennett said in one debate, apparently it was introduced for the purpose of protecting the rights of the maritime provinces.

There is the principle. It is representation by population, and at the present time it is not working out adequately, so that admittedly a way must be found to remedy the injustice under which the province of Quebec is suffering at the present time. We on this side of the house are just as anxious as any on the government side to see that injustice remedied at once. But we say that on balance the method by which the government in this resolution proposes to seek to remedy that injustice is unsound, and that on balance it is not such a resolution as ought to be supported until it has been first submitted to the provinces for their views.

No occasion arises in this debate for an attempt—and I saw traces of it in the remarks of one or two speakers—to try to set Ontario against Quebec or Quebec against Ontario. There is no occasion whatever for an attempt of that kind in this debate.

We on this side of the house say, in the first place, that this question is urgent, that it is important, and that it should be the subject of reference to the provinces. We have a dominion-provincial conference still pending, though not actually sitting at the moment, and that is the proper place where this matter should be raised for discussion.

There have been complaints about the necessity of going to Westminster for amendment of the British North America Act. Well, what is the use of complaining? We could have it otherwise if we wished. If there were some way in which agreement could be reached on this side of the water on a method of amending this constitution without reference to the parliament at Westminster, those who would be happiest would not be in this country; they would be the people at Westminster. They would be glad to be relieved of the necessity of passing special statutes from time to time at the request of Canada, to amend its constitution. When hon. members say, as the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) said this afternoon, that it was something in the nature of an oversight that some provision was not contained in the British North America Act for its amendment, I think they overlook the fact that this question must have been considered by the fathers of confederation. They had before them the model of the American constitution, which had already been amended in a number of particulars. It was not because that problem was not before them that it was not dealt with in the act. They provided for the amendment of the provincial constitutions under subsection 1 of section 92, and it is perfectly obvious that the reason provision was not made in the British North America Act for the amendment of the constitution in relation to dominion rights is that the fathers of confederation could not go farther on the path of agreement. It is open to this country to have whatever other method it desires of amending its constitution, whenever it can agree on some constitutional method. That is a subject which ought to engage the attention of the dominion-provincial conference. We can have these conferences deal with financial questions; why can we not also have them deal with such important questions as have arisen during the course of this debate?

There were two arguments offered by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), as to which, with respect, I should like to say a word. In the first place, the minister says that the people of the provinces are represented in this parliament. Well, in a vague sense they are. But I want to make it perfectly clear that, speaking for myself, I do not come into this chamber representing a province. I have no mandate from the province of Ontario. I was elected to the parliament of Canada by a constituency in the province of Ontario. The number of seats in the province of Ontario happens to be fixed under the British North America Act in relation to the decennial census of 1931, but I do not claim to speak for the province of Ontario. I doubt very much if any member of this house is entitled to rise and say that he speaks for the province in which his constituency happens to be located. I say that nothing could be more completely divisive of national unity than such arguments. The man who speaks for the province of Quebec in matters affecting the affairs of that province is Premier Duplessis. The man who speaks for Ontario in matters pertaining to the affairs of that province is Premier Drew, and so on. It is not for those who sit in this chamber to usurp that role.

The other point made by the Minister of Justice was that this amendment does not concern the provinces, and that it has to do simply with that field of jurisdiction which, he says, belongs exclusively to the dominion. I take issue respectfully with the right hon. gentleman on that point. I think, if I may say so, he overlooks the fact that under section 51 representation is fixed according to provinces, and it is stated that the representation of the provinces shall, after each decennial census, be readjusted on a provincial basis.

I said that we do not sit here as representatives of the provinces, but the number of seats is determined according to provinces. I think for that reason alone the provinces have a direct concern in this matter. In any event, I affirm that the provinces have a concern in this matter, first, because of the provisions of section 51; second, because of the pact which, regardless of legalisms, nevertheless is a political fact, embodied in the British North America Act and, third, because of the effect of what we are doing here to-day creating a precedent.

Another point is that the amendment before us is not one of limited or temporary effect. It is not like the amendment of 1943, which merely postponed redistribution until the conclusion of the war. It is not like the amendment of 1916, which simply had the effect of lengthening the life of the existing parliament. The amendment we are now asked to make is intended to have permanent effect; and so I say it is one in which the provinces are entitled to be consulted.

Just a word about the British North America Act itself. It is not, as one might think after listening to the recent speech by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the C.C.F., a statute like any other ordinary statute. This parliament is not above the British North America Act; it is the creature of that act. All the provincial legislatures, like this parliament, are the creatures of the British North America Act, and we had better be more careful when we are invited to put ourselves above the act from which we derive our existence as a parliament. This, I say, is a fundamental statute.

What do we mean when we talk about parliament? Let us consider that, in relation to the suggestion that, without consulting the provinces, parliament should have the right to seek amendment to the act. The fact is that parliament, so called, acts through a majority; and that can be a narrow majority. If we are content to see amendments brought about simply at the direction of parliament, leaving aside the one exception found in section 92 of the British North America Act, mentioned by the Minister of Justice, then in all other cases it will lie within the power of a very narrow majority in the house to bring about amendments to the act.

Ponder what that means— "a narrow majority." It means that it would be legally possible, on the argument of the Minister of Justice, so long as an amendment does not affect section 92, to bring about an amendment to the British North America Act by a majority of one in the house.

In the second place, let us remember that a majority in the house does not necessarily mean a majority in the country. It does not mean such at the present time, because this government was not elected by a majority of the people in the country. Under the method referred to by the Minister of Justice an amendment which might be quite unacceptable to the majority of the people, could be made simply because it happened to have the endorsation of a narrow majority in this chamber.

Let us also remember that apparently hasty decisions are made by parliament from time to time. It is not always possible, on the successive readings of a bill, to have time to think the matter over carefully, and to refrain from hasty and unwise decisions, decisions taken out of caprice or whim. A resolution on the other hand, may be passed rapidly and be on its way to Westminster before the country understands its full significance. Let us bear in mind that the Westminster parliament is not going to take the responsibility of sitting down and hearing representations from the parliament of Canada, and contrary representations from the provincial governments. That was made clear by the parliament at Westminster in 1943, when the government of Quebec made representations to Westminster urging that an amendment sought by this parliament should not be passed. On that occasion the parliament at Westminster was not prepared to take the responsibility of listening to the province, when the amendment had been sought by parliament.

That is a reason we should move slowly in parliament. That is a reason for making very sure that the rights of the provinces are fully safeguarded before any request goes forward from Canada to Westminster for an amendment to the British North America Act. As we were informed by the Minister of Justice, it took just ten days in 1943 from the time the resolution was passed in this chamber until the amendment to the British North America Act was made. Let us not be parties to hasty decisions which will result in rapid amendments to the British North America Act.

I suggest that if ever there was a time which has proven to be more dangerous than any other to embark on amendments to that act, without first fully safeguarding the rights of the provinces, it is this particular time.

There has been in session in this country since last August a dominion-provincial conference, which has been discussing financial agreements. Apparently not one word was breathed by the dominion government to that conference—one session ended only a month ago—about its intention to introduce the present resolution. Not a word was breathed. Why not? Surely if the dominion-provincial conference is called into being for consultation between the dominion and the provinces on matters of mutual concern, it was reprehensible in the extreme on the part of the dominion government not to discuss this question with the premiers of the various provinces.

What conclusion may we draw to-day? The dominion government is not getting its own way in the dominion-provincial conference. It was most inflexible in its proposals. It was adament. It did some talking down to the provinces; and on the whole those provinces have indicated that they are not the children of the dominion and that they have the right to support a status of their own within the terms of the pact of confederation.

It would seem now that the dominion government is going to attempt to teach those provinces a lesson, and show them that the dominion can go to Westminster and have the British North America Act amended without consultation with the provinces. Is this intended to be a lesson to those provinces that they had better be careful in the way they talk back to the dominion government at the dominion-provincial conference, and that, after all, they have no real and abiding right to what we would call provincial status or provincial rights, if parliament is prepared to act on the dictation of the government and pass quickly a resolution requesting amendment to the British North America Act?

I say that this whole procedure is fraught with serious danger. Whether members in the house argue to the contrary or not, the fact remains that if we pass the resolution and defeat the amendment offered by this party we are creating a precedent. We create the precedent of providing for an amendment to the constitution in an essential particular without first having consultation in any form with the provinces.

It is not enough to say that in times past there was not complete consultation with the provinces. Let us keep our eyes open. If this amendment is defeated and the resolution passes in the form in which it is introduced, we are creating a precedent, a precedent which, I suggest, any dominion government whose purpose is served by it, can put to work to seek other amendments in the future.

Finally, every word that has been uttered by hon. members to your right, Mr. Speaker, every word uttered by the Minister of Justice in his speech to-night and in his speech when opening the debate which referred to the rights he contends parliament has to obtain amendments to the British North America Act, in a particular such as this, without consulting the provinces, is in the teeth of arguments in this house on more than one occasion by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. When the Minister of Justice discards completely the compact theory and discards completely the argument that the provinces are entitled to be consulted in the light of the compact to which the British North America Act gave form, he is arguing against the very principles championed in this chamber year in and year out by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe.

I am not in the least impressed with the jubilant support given to the government's resolution by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the C.C.F. He is only too anxious to see power centralized in parliament so that the rights of the provinces may be ridden over roughshod, if necessary, in order to bring about the socialist state he wishes to see created. Confederation is one of the surest guarantees we have in this country against bringing about a completely socialist state. The reason the socialist allies of the government are so vocal in support of a resolution of this kind is that it simply lends momentum to a movement which has progressed so far under the present government and which is daily progressing farther.

There has been a trend toward centralization, a trend toward amassing in the hands of the dominion government more and more power at the expense of the provinces, a trend which started during the war. The same mind that dominated the government in usurping the powers of the provinces in time of war still dominates the dominion government to-day. That same mind now states that they are prepared to disregard the fundamental rights of the provinces under the constitution. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has talked about Balkanizing Canada, but there is no surer way to Balkanize Canada than to ride roughshod over the constitution and the constitutional rights of the provinces.

Why has the dominion government failed to consult the provinces while the dominion-provincial conference has been pending? The only conclusion one can draw is that they wanted to find an easier way, a more direct way of achieving constitutional amendments; they wanted to achieve an easier technique for bringing about constitutional amendments when it suits their purposes. The whole method is fraught with peril for this country and for its federal system of government.

(Translation):

The present resolution presents an adroit political plan on the part of the government to deal with the redistribution of seats in the House of Commons as among the provinces.

On the surface it offers the province of Quebec an increase of eight members in the House of Commons.

An hon. MEMBER: An increase of eight Liberal members.

Mr. FLEMING: British Columbia two members and Ontario one member. What a tempting offer! But let us look further. By what means and at what ultimate cost is this gain to be attained? The resolution proposes an amendment of the British North America Act in a very important particular, namely section 51, which has defined the basis of representation of all provinces in the House of Commons. Nevertheless, not one province has been consulted in regard to the amendment. Not one province has been asked to say whether it approves the proposal or not.

Only one month ago the dominion-provincial conference was in session at Ottawa, attended by the Prime Minister of Canada, the Minister of Justice, several other cabinet ministers and the premiers of all the provinces. Nevertheless, not one word was breathed at that conference by the dominion government as to its intention to present this resolution to parliament.

Now the Minister of Justice says that there is no need to consult the provinces. He contends that as long as an amendment of the constitution does not involve matters allocated in the British North America Act to the provincial jurisdiction, such as property and civil rights under section 92 of the act, the provinces have no right to be consulted by parliament. This is dangerous doctrine. Its full significance should be clearly understood. If parliament can bring about an amendment of section 51 of the constitution without consulting the provinces, it can also bring about without consulting the provinces amendments of other sections of the British North America Act. How long will the rights of minorities which are now guaranteed by the constitution be safe if this doctrine, expounded by the Minister of Justice, prevails? It would mean that a narrow majority in parliament could, if it wished, bring about an amendment of section 133 of the British North America Act, and thereby eliminate the use of the French language in parliament—all without consulting the provinces. Let us then be on our guard against creating so dangerous a precedent. The proposed increase in the number of members of parliament would be gained at too high a cost if it is to be acquired on that basis.

The British North America Act is not an ordinary statute to be amended at the whim of parliament. It is our national constitution; it contains the pact entered into by the old provinces at the time of confederation, binding the dominion and each province; and it is the great charter of the rights of minorities, particularly of those of the French tongue and culture. Let no bold hand be lightly laid on this constitution to overturn its provisions without consultation with the provinces.

The present government has departed far from the views championed by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe in this chamber.

The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, on January 28, 1907, said in this house, as reported in Hansard, page 2199, volume II:

Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same. My hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket) stated in the course of his argument that we have announced in the speech from the throne that we are going to ask parliament to alter the financial terms of confederation. That is very true; but my hon. friend should know that we did not come to that conclusion except after conference with the provinces and after all the provincial governments had united in a prayer for the same.

And, in 1924, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe said in this house, as reported on page 520 of Hansard:

The British North America Act and the limitations which are imposed upon our powers, if there are such limitations, are made of our own free will. There is no inferiority in that. It is the result of a treaty as my hon. friend from Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) said. It is a treaty between various colonies which entered into an agreement. They fixed what the powers of the central parliament should be, and they also fixed what the powers of the various provinces which succeeded the colonies of that time would be, and this was ratified and accepted by the imperial parliament of the time. Everything we have or have not is because we wanted it so. Now this treaty cannot be changed, it has been the contention of many constitutional authorities. and I think it is only fair that no change should be accepted, without the consent of all those who were parties to it. It is a sacred treaty just as is any other treaty; it is no "scrap of paper."

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. FLEMING: And in 1925, page 300 of Hansard, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe is reported as follows:

Surely, the British North America Act cannot be made a scrap of paper, as that treaty was made at that time. There is a way, perhaps, yes; but the only way is the friendly way, is the legal way, is the constitutional way. It is to approach the various parties to the agreement with a view to arriving at an understanding as to the changes which may be necessary and which may be agreed upon by all the parties to the pact. As I have said, I do not think there could be any other way; I believe that any arbitrary action in the matter would simply defeat its own purpose and would strike at the root of our national unity. I think I cite history correctly when I say that every time there has been a dispute in Canada as regards provincial rights, those who were on the side of provincial rights were victorious in the end. I do not think there can be any attempt to change the mutual charter of both the dominion and the provinces by the arbitrary action of this parliament. I do not think it is possible to do it. To those who want changes, and I am willing to admit that there might be the necessity for changes, I would say that the ony way to get them is the constitutional way, to ask the consent of the various parties to confederation. Mr. Speaker, after sixty years of confederation I think we may safely say that notwithstanding the great obstacles which were in their way the fathers of confederation who gathered in 1865 did a great work; I think we may boldly say after sixty years that their work has been a very satisfactory one. It was not perfect; there is no perfection in human devices, but certainly they did the best they could.

As I have said, I would not like to leave the impression that my own view is that no changes should be made at any time, or that no changes are possible.

And further on:

I am not one of those who are riveted to the past and who are prepared to deny to our children the liberty of the future, but those changes the necessity for which may be seen as a result of our experience of sixty years cannot be made unless you proceed in a legal and constitutional way; they cannot be made arbitrarily; they cannot be made only at the will and at the request of the dominion parliament; but those who are just as much interested as the dominion parliament in this matter must have their say, must be consulted, and must give their assent.

And finally, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, speaking on section 51 of the British North America Act made the following statement in this house during the 1932-33 session, as reported at page 1593 of Hansard:

A suggestion was made that in order to equalize with Ontario, the number of representatives from Quebec should be increased. I do not think that would be a fair way of settling it. I believe the representation of Quebec should remain at 65, as fixed by the British North America Act, but that subsection 4 of section 51 should disappear. Then we would have a real representation by population.

The right hon. gentleman opposite has stated that before parliament meets again at the end of January there will be an interprovincial conference. There are certain changes in our constitution and with regard to taxation which seem desirable. I submit the Prime Minister should place this matter before the premiers from the various provinces. If that were done I believe they would come to the conclusion that subsection 4, which certainly works unfairly, ought to be repealed.

The voices of the great Laurier and Lapointe are stilled. Their wise words are no longer heeded by this government. The cause which they championed has been renounced by those who lead the Liberal party in this house to-day.

On the other hand, the Progressive Conservative party subscribes to these views so eloquently championed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and takes issue with the present Minister of Justice and the government. The Progressive Conservative party declares that the provinces should be consulted before this, or any other amendment as far-reaching in its effects and implications, is sought by parliament in the constitution. In this important question the Progressive Conservative party is willing to abide by the results of consultation with the provinces.

Mr. EDOUARD RINFRET (Outremont) (Text): We have before us a resolution the express effect of which will be a more equitable apportionment of members of parliament between the various provinces. Everyone in this house seems to be satisfied with the merits of the resolution, but some hon. members are critical of the method proposed to be adopted to achieve what seems to be a common goal. We have heard criticism to the effect that the desired result could be obtained without the necessity of applying to the imperial parliament. We have been criticized both in and outside this house because we have not consulted and we do not intend to consult and have the authorization or consent of the provinces. It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to consider and analyse these two contentions and to try to show that they are far from conclusive, as was claimed, and that they should be put aside.

When I listened to the learned and strong exposé of his case made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) I was really and genuinely impressed by his logic and I was tempted to agree with him completely; but upon a more careful study of the question and upon a more lengthy scrutiny of the decisions of the Supreme Court and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island references, I have come to the conclusion that his argument could not possibly be sustained and that the course followed by the present government was the only adequate one to cope with the situation.

In his exposé of the decisions on the two references the hon. member for Stanstead contended that the courts had not been seized of the question covered by the third considerant of the resolution before us. With that part of his contention I am in accord. The two questions put to the learned judges did not directly cover the matter at issue in the present debate. I shall read them from Canadian Reports, 13 Appeal Cases, page 343:

> In determining the number of representatives in the House of Commons to which Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are respectively entitled after each decennial census, should the words "aggregate population of Canada" in subparagraph 4 of section 51 of the British North America Act be construed as meaning the population of the four original provinces of Canada, or as meaning the whole population of Canada including that of provinces which had been admitted to the confederation subsequent to the passage of the British North America Act?

And the other one, at page 342:

> Although the population of Prince Edward Island as ascertained at the census of 1901, if divided by the unit of representation ascertained by dividing the number of sixty-five into the population of Quebec, is not sufficient to give six members in the House of Commons of Canada to that province, is the representation of Prince Edward Island in the House of Commons liable, under the British North America Act and amendments thereto and the terms of union of 1873 under which that province entered confederation, to be reduced below six, the number granted to that province by the said terms of union of 1873?

I said that it did not directly refer to the specific question. Everyone will have noticed that in both the New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island references there is an implied directive for the consideration of the whole of subsection 4 of section 51.

By reading such subsection and by comparing it with the above two orders of reference, one cannot but conclude that, in order to decide whether Prince Edward Island's representation in the House of Commons should be reduced below six, as a consequence of the operation of section 51 of the British North America Act, it is absolutely necessary to consider the terms of the whole subsection 4 thereof.

I was struck by the argument of the hon. member for Stanstead when he said that this question had not been discussed except by Mr. Newcombe, acting as counsel for the federal government, and then only occasionally, as a casual answer to a question put to him by one of the judges. I found, however, that all or practically all the counsels representing the central government and the governments of the various provinces argued the question of readjustment in a more or less elaborate manner.

Mr. Irving, representing Ontario in the New Brunswick reference, touched upon it in his argument, as appears from the report of the case to be found in 33 Canada Supreme Court Reports, at page 479. Mr. Pugsley, counsel for New Brunswick, explains the workings of the "saving clause" after a question of Mr. Justice Sedgewick at pages 500 and 501 of the same report. He asserted that this saving clause was "no safeguard at all, if every ten years you can bring in a new province from the vast territories of the northwest, the whole population of which is to be counted against you." Mr. E. M. Macdonald, for Nova Scotia, just mentioned the "saving clause" at page 511. Mr. Fitzpatrick, for the Dominion of Canada, gave a lengthy illustration of its practical application to Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. His figures, which strangely resemble those of the hon. member for Stanstead, are to be found at pages 527 and 528 of the report. It is to be noted here that the comparison is established between 1891 and 1901, a ten-year period. Again, at page 543, Mr. Fitzpatrick insists that a readjustment is to take place on the completion of each census, which under section 51 is to be held every ten years. Mr. Cannon, for the province of Quebec, says, at page 560:

> Now, representation by population being the accepted principle in the British North America Act, section 51 goes on to state how this representation by population will be readjusted. This readjustment is to take place under section 51 every ten years, after each decennial census, and subsections 1 and 2 fix the unit of representation under which the redistribution shall take place.

Is it any wonder, then, that Mr. Justice Girouard should, in his reasons, at page 578, conclude that:

> . . . the provision (of section 51) was intended to cover the cases of all the provinces for which the previous section had provided that there should be a decennial census . . .

Is it extraordinary that Mr. Justice Mills should have expressed himself in this manner, at page 584:

> It was agreed that the census should be taken every ten years, beginning with the year 1871, and the number of representatives mentioned, with which a province entered the union, was to continue to be the number by which it was entitled to be represented in the Commons of Canada until its population was ascertained by the taking of the census, after which a readjustment was to be effected, if this was found necessary. If the population of a province bore to the aggregate population of Canada a less proportion by one-twentieth than it did by the previous census its representation was to be diminished, but if the relative diminution was less than one-twentieth it was not thought desirable to necessitate the disturbance of these electoral districts by requiring readjustment.

It is also interesting to note that the three other judges, Judges Taschereau, Sedgewick and Armour, concurred in the opinion of Mr. Justice Mills.

To turn now to the Prince Edward Island reference, Mr. Newcombe says, at page 653 of the same report:

Now if you consider a case happening at the end of each decade where the diminution is the twenty-first part or upwards of the one-twentieth part, you see that there is a check in the process every ten years, and the province starts over again, and you cannot go back to the beginning for the purpose of considering the proportion. Therefore it may be that a province will have a very much larger representation ultimately in the House of Commons than its population would entitle it to having regard to the unit of the population of the province of Quebec, because if it can barely avoid during each ten years the proportionate reduction of one-twentieth part, it gets a new proportion established . . .

Mr. HACKETT: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RINFRET: With pleasure.

Mr. HACKETT: Does he agree that Mr. Newcombe, in submitting that argument, stated that it was irrelevant and could have no bearing upon the case?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes; and then he went on for a page and a half to explain what he meant by this one-twentieth proposition. He was followed by Mr. Aylesworth, for Prince Edward Island, who continued exactly the same discussion. Mr. Aylesworth said, at page 660:

From 1881 to 1891 the population of the island increased in fact but still they lose a member. Why? Because they have not increased as fast as Quebec and because their diminution is in fact more than one-twentieth part of the whole. Therefore that protective clause did not protect us in 1891, and it does not protect us to-day in 1901. It will not protect us ten years hence, for although we do increase in population we do not increase proportionately. That is the trouble and just as certainly as we lost one member in 1891 and another in 1901, we shall lose another ten years hence and another twenty years hence.

The opinion of the court was delivered by the chief justice, and it contains the following remark, at page 665:

. . . the representation of the province shall be readjusted after every decennial census, as provided for by section 51 of the British North America Act . . .

Before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, by reason of the similarity of the two questions, they were argued together and the judgment of their lordships was delivered by Sir Arthur Wilson. His reasons are in part as follows. I have already quoted Canadian reports 13 Appeal Cases at page 360:

Their lordships think (this is more than an obiter dictum by only one judge. It is the judgment of the committee)—their lordships think this is to give too narrow a meaning to the word—

The word being "readjustment".

In their opinion, when, as a result of a census, the representation of the provinces is reconsidered and the necessary changes, if any, made to bring it into harmony with the result of the census, that is a readjustment within the meaning of subsection 4, whether there be or be not any change in the case of any particular province.

When my hon. friend says that this is a mere obiter dictum which is not binding upon us, I cannot follow him, because it is the unequivocal opinion of their lordships. I believe that even if we accepted my learned friend's contention that it is an obiter dictum and referred the matter to the supreme court and afterwards to the judicial committee, their lordships would certainly adhere to their former judgment and would to-day give the same interpretation as they did in 1904. Not that I like that interpretation; I think it is erroneous. I would much rather accept the opinion of the hon. member for Stanstead. But our system of justice is so organized that in case of a conflict between the advice of counsel and the ruling of a judge, it is usually the latter that overrides. Under the common law, the jurisprudence is made up of judgments from our courts and our magistrates and not of opinions from our attorneys and barristers. It is sometimes disappointing, but it is so. I know that in this case I would be much more pleased to favour the doctrine enunciated by my learned friend the hon. member for Stanstead than the principle incorporated in the privy council decision. But, alas, I have no choice.

It seems extraordinary that our constitution should have been altered in the way it was by this decision. Of course, it sometimes operates in a gradual way, and Doctor O. D. Skelton recognized that the constitution could be changed by progressive judicial interpretation. Upon his appearance before the special committee on the British North America Act in 1935 he admitted that "theoretically the courts merely decide what the law is and do not make law, but inevitably, at the end of a long period of time, it is found that the constitution is different from what it was at the beginning". As an illustration, Doctor Skelton cites the case of Canada where, under the guiding hand of Lord Watson and Lord Haldane—I cite him—"a constitution which, in the mind and intent of the fathers of confederation, was to make the central government the predominant factor, the residuary legatee, has been interpreted definitely in the contrary direction." I may add that this is not only true of the privy council but also of the Supreme Court of Canada. But in all other instances changes have been gradual. Here, in this event, it was brutal, abrupt and instantaneous. The members of the judicial committee advised His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given. His Majesty in council issued an order in council, and so it was that the constitution of Canada was changed without any consultation with the parliament of Canada—not even with the government of Canada, nor with the advice or consent of the Canadian provinces.

It is well that all Canadians should remember that their constitution, being an imperial statute, may be amended by the imperial parliament alone. Students are discussing whether our constitution is a pact, a compact, a treaty, a contract, a compromise or a statute. These words have been used successively by Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, to cite only those who have left this chamber. I have stated my opinion, and I offer it with all the deference due to those great men, but strong in the support of the parliamentary counsel of the Senate in 1939, whose opinion is to be found in his report to the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate in 1939, relating to the British North America Act. At page 17 of the fifth annex thereof he classifies the British North America Act as the—> . . . result of legislative compacts between the imperial government and the original provinces of confederation. These compacts are now at law merely part of the history of the statute. They have been executed by and they are at law merged into the statute, which statute could be totally repealed by the imperial parliament at any time without Canada's consent and despite Canada's protest, notwithstanding the history, terms, intent or purpose of the statute.

I am not alarmed over this possibility, because I feel certain that the imperial parliament would not of its own volition, without Canada's request, alter, amend or a fortiori repeal the British North America Act. But this is technically the legal situation. I wonder if those who oppose our obtaining the right to amend our own constitution have considered this possibility. I wonder if they have realized that, of all the British Commonwealth members we are the only nation not yet capable of amending our constitution. To think that the procedure for obtaining this right would be so simple: "Any time we wish to amend our constitution, or to obtain the power to have the constitution amended of our own right, independently of Westminster altogether; all we have to do is to present an address from both houses of this parliament to the parliament at Westminster and that address will be given effect to, in legislation, at Westminster." Those are the words of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the House of Commons in the debate of February 24, 1930, and can be found in Hansard of that day at page 46.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Who ever disputed that?

On motion of Mr. Rinfret the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 19, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on June 13, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) on behalf of the leader of the opposition asked if I could supply copies of a report by F. P. REMEMBRANCE DAY

QUESTION AS TO OBSERVANCE ON FIRST SUNDAY IN NOVEMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. The statement was made at noon to-day over the air that His Majesty the King had set the first Sunday before the eleventh of November as Remembrance day and that the cenotaph was to be marked "1939-1945" accordingly. Has any consideration been given to taking similar action in Canada and, if not, will the government consider it?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am informed that the matter has been considered within the recent past, and a definite announcement will be made later.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SEAMEN'S STRIKE—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour what is the situation on the great lakes with respect to coal and shipping. Are we going to have to wait for settlement of this dispute until Santa Claus comes round at Christmas? Has there been any change in the situation?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I do not think my hon. friend is serious about Santa Claus. In reply to the hon. member I regret to confirm the news that the large majority of owners of lake shipping have refused to agree to the government's proposals for the settlement of the seamen's strike. These proposals, which the strikers belonging to the Canadian seamen's union had approved as a basis of return to work, are as follows:

1. That the companies and the union, as well as the companies in respect of which the union has been certified under the wartime labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003, will make joint application to the national war labour board for permission to introduce immediately the eight-hour day, three-watch system (four hours on watch, eight hours off) on all their vessels and pending decision thereon by the national war labour board the companies shall introduce the eight-hour day, three-watch system, with a minimum extra personnel of one wheelsman, one oiler, one watchman and one messman. Any further details regarding the method whereby the three-watch system can be most effectively applied shall be negotiated by the parties.

2. That the agreement between the companies and the union dated August 1, 1945, shall continue in effect and negotiations will be immediately entered into for a new agreement covering wages, union security and other working conditions to be effective as from August 1, 1946. To assist such negotiations the union and the companies will jointly request the Minister of Labour of Canada to appoint an industrial disputes inquiry commissioner.

3. That all crew members required by the companies during the period until a new agreement is negotiated, will be hired in accordance with the terms of the existing agreement referred to in clause 2 hereof.

4. That the companies agree to reinstate without discrimination all members of the union who were on their ships at the time the strike commenced except those employees who have been convicted of violations of the criminal code, and the union shall, on the signing of this memorandum of agreement, declare the strike ended.

Consideration is now being given to the next step which should be taken in order to bring this unfortunate, costly and unnecessary strike to an end. As I have stated before, no thinking citizen can approve a twelve hour working day for any man. The strike started on this issue, but since then the operators of ships have made application to the national war labour board for authority to institute an eight-hour day. The other questions now at issue are keeping the parties from getting together.

I suppose the attitude of the owners of the ships is largely due to certain lawless acts along the St. Lawrence and Welland canal systems and in the upper lakes. No one can condone lawless acts committed by anyone. Violence never yet won for a just cause. An uncompromising attitude on the part of employers and employees is not in the interest of the employers and employees nor the country at large. I still hope that reason will prevail in this dispute. If that is not apparent very quickly, suitable action will be taken.

Mr. CHURCH: I cannot understand why the government does not operate the ships on the great lakes pending a settlement.

Mr. KARL HOMUTH (Waterloo South): In view of the statement from the shipowners appearing in this morning's press that any report given out would be given out by the minister, can he tell us whether or not the shipowners have made counter-proposals?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can read the telegram from the shipowners. It is addressed to myself and reads:

This wire being sent to the Ministers of Labour, Transport and Reconstruction and Supply:

"The undersigned companies operating vessels on the great lakes and St. Lawrence waterways have considered the memoranda of proposed agreements submitted by the Department of Labour under date of June 13 and have decided that, first, they will not enter into any negotiations whatever with the individuals who are the present officers of the Canadian seamen's union. Second, they will, however, negotiate with responsible representatives of their employees on the following basis:

(a) Provided they return to the ships immediately all former crew members will be re-engaged under previous terms and conditions with the exception of those members implicated in acts of violence, the eight-hour day dealt with in (d) below to be effective immediately the national war labour board permits the operators to institute it.

(b) All interference with the manning and operation of ships will come to an end immediately.

(c) The government will be requested to appoint a commissioner to deal with all questions in dispute as quickly as possible.

(d) The companies will make every effort to implement the eight-hour day by requesting an early decision from the national war labour board in accordance with application made May 21, 1946. Third, failing acceptance of paragraph two the operators request in view of the national emergency caused by the shortage of coal, oil and other essential commodities resulting from this totally unauthorized and illegal strike that the government authorities direct that control of operations of all vessels on the great lakes and St. Lawrence waterways be entrusted to the Canadian shipping board as during the war or to some other properly constituted government authority and that the striking seamen be ordered back to work on the terms and conditions prevailing prior to the strike on the understanding that the eight-hour day in accordance with the application made by operators on May 21, 1946, to the national war labour board will be placed in effect immediately if the national war labour board will permit the whole matter then to be adjusted according to recommendations of a commission or commissioner to be appointed by the government."

The telegram is signed by the following:

Canada Steamship Lines Limited; Paterson Steamships Limited; Colonial Steamships Limited; Sarnia Steamships Limited; Algoma Central Steamship Line; St. Lawrence Steamships Ltd.; Powell Transports Ltd.; Northwest Steamships Ltd.; Coal Carriers Corp.; Diamond Steamships Ltd.; Hindman Transportation Co. TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION AND SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour about the dispute between the typographical union and the Southam newspapers. I have sent notice of the question to the minister. As he knows, it deals with what is recognized as the crux of the dispute, namely, the Winnipeg Tribune's objection to the provision about union laws not being subject to arbitration.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules the hon. member is not permitted to give information. His question should be brief and to the point.

Mr. KNOWLES: This is my question: Is there anything new about this provision? Are the Southam newspapers other than the Winnipeg Tribune willing to agree to this same provision, and has the Winnipeg Tribune offered to submit its company by-laws to arbitration?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In answer to the first part of the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the fact is that in the provinces where the wartime labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003, apply to printing establishments, namely in British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, all the terms of the collective agreement between the employees and the employer are subject to final and binding arbitration. This is provided for in sections 17 and 18 of the regulations.

The typographical union insists that its own general rules, including local union rules, must become a part of the collective agreement with every employer with whom such agreement is negotiated. One provision of the general rules of the union is that such rules are not subject to arbitration. In view of what I have just said it will be seen that the union law in that respect is in conflict with the provisions of the wartime labour relations regulations.

With respect to the second part of the question, I am informed that the Winnipeg Tribune did not insist that its by-laws should become part of the collective agreement between itself and the union.

CLOTHING DRIVE

QUESTION AS TO CONTRIBUTION OF NEW CLOTHING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. RODNEY ADAMSON (York West): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) or the appropriate member of the cabinet. It concerns the clothing drive now in progress to collect clothes for Europe, and it arises from a statement made by Doctor Murdock. I should like to know if both new and used clothes can be sent to Europe.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I do not think I am the proper minister to which that question should be addressed.

Mr. ADAMSON: Would it be the Minister of National War Services?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National War Services): It is intended that only used clothing should be donated in the drive.

PRIVILEGE

MR. POULIOT—REFERENCE TO DOCTOR CHISHOLM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday one of my colleagues was too quick in referring to a previous statement I had made about Doctor Chisholm. I was asking a question, and referring to my statement I said that he was speaking through his hat. Is it not possible to confiscate it and burn it?

An hon. MEMBER: What, the hat?

Mr. POULIOT: The hat.

COAL

FINANCIAL AID TO OPERATORS TO INCREASE PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): On Monday last the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) asked this question:

I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Will the minister make a statement to the house at an early date indicating how many Alberta coal mine operators have sought financial aid from federal government agencies in order to increase production, and whether or not such financial assistance has been refused?

The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton then asked:

Will the minister include British Columbia in the statement that he is to make?

With reference to the question asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge, I would state that the number of coal mine operators in the province of Alberta who have or who still are receiving financial aid is seventy-one, and there are nine in the province of British Columbia. No financial assistance has been refused to any coal mine operator where in the opinion of the emergency coal production board or coal control such assistance would have aided the over-all situation.

WINDSOR DISTRICT TORNADO

INQUIRY AS TO DAMAGE AND RENDERING OF ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Does the government intend to make any report to the house on the widespread damage caused by the recent storm in Kent and Essex counties, and is consideration being given to providing assistance, particularly to the farmers who have lost their crops and to persons who have been made homeless?

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows, the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Brown) and myself went to the county from which we come, to see for ourselves the extent of the damage in that area. On our way by plane we had a good opportunity of viewing the country from about the Chatham area into the precincts of Essex county. It was evident from the air that a tremendous amount of damage had been done to farm areas by the storm which began some time on Sunday.

With regard to the damage by the tornado in the city of Windsor and its environs, the situation there is not as serious as at first glance it was thought. That, however, does not mean that the situation is not serious. It is difficult at the moment to assess the full amount of damage both to private and to public property.

The house, I know, will regret to learn that somewhere in the neighbourhood of fifteen to twenty deaths are definite. We visited some hospitals yesterday and it was evident from the condition of some of the patients there that there may be additional fatalities.

At this juncture I simply want to thank the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) for taking steps long before any request was even made to him to provide priorities for reconstruction purposes; the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Gibson), who because of a threatening water supply situation sent in the necessary equipment, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) for his immediate assistance and offer to assist in providing medical supplies and the like.

A number of individuals have had their homes and their possessions completely wiped out. The chairman of the Red Cross emergency fund committee, in a telephone call to me a few moments ago, stated that from many quarters in Canada offers of assistance were coming in. Until there is a full opportunity of appraising the extent of the damage I need say no more, except, on behalf of the people of Essex county, that we are all very grateful for the expression of interest from this house and from the people of Canada generally.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I suggest to the minister that he include in his thanks the authorities at Detroit?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. The people in the city of Detroit and neighbouring cities of the United States have been of great help, and I am sure that all of us from the area concerned are very grateful to them.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved:

That the first report of the joint committee of both houses on the library of parliament, presented on May 30, be now concurred in.

It is non-controversial, I think.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have just a word to say. Formerly I was a member of that committee; now I am not. There are treasures in the library, and these treasures are in the cellar. There are pipes passing over a most valuable collection of newspapers. The whole history of Canada is there; the collection is unique. Very often we have urged that there be a fireproof library to house all these treasures. I remember when I first made the suggestion ten or twelve years ago the then minister of public works, under another administration, told me that the floors were so wonderful that they had to be kept waxed. They are wooden floors; they are noisy to walk on. I understand that vigilance is practised, that a constable is on duty in the library twenty-four hours of the day. But that is not enough. There might be a short circuit anyhere which would result in destruction of the library. Is it not possible to have a new library, a national library in Ottawa, where all these treasures could be kept, and where they could be utilized by students and scholars who wish to be informed on the history of Canada? Moreover, it is impossible to work in the library. I praise the staff very highly. It is composed of most efficient men, and they are always ready to serve. Members of parliament of both houses are privileged in that they can have books from the library in their rooms, which are also fireproof, but people outside, university men and others, cannot take advantage of the library. Who can work there? There is so much noise when anyone walks the floor, the light is bad, and there is no accommodation for anyone to work there.

In the first place there should be a complete classification of all the books to help all those who want to work in the library. We are here to work, and our work should be facilitated. In this matter I have only the highest praise for all members of the staff from Mr. Desrochers and Mr. Hardy down, and I make special mention also of Mr. Tarte; I should like to mention them all, one after the other. I hope, sir, that something will be done in the supplementary estimates, not merely for the use of members of parliament, for that would be selfish, but for the use of all of those who want to learn the history of Canada. What we have there should be publicized. The catalogue we have is insignificant, because it does not tell us what we could find in the library. The matter has been studied by the separate school board of Ontario, and by my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin), who gave a very fine address on the subject; there is no better-read man than the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) is most congenial. I hope they will come to an agreement to do something in this regard for the benefit of this country, and to preserve treasures which we could not replace with millions of dollars.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I am not going to delay the house, but I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) upon taking this opportunity of raising the question of the library. In my opinion Canada should have a national library. I have thought for a long time that if we were to have a national memorial the most suitable one would be a national cultural centre in this city, and I would hope that the provinces might follow the example of the capital city and establish similar centres in their own areas. When I came to Ottawa some years ago I thought that, coming to the capital city, one would be able to enjoy good opera, good drama, good pictures, a good library. Many countries with smaller populations and fewer resources than Canada have facilities of this kind which put our country to shame. Most of us are interested in what has been done over the past twenty years in welding this country into a real nation, and it seems to me that nothing would bring about a greater national consciousness than the establishment of a national library and a national cultural centre. I warmly congratulate the hon. member for Temiscouata and thank him for giving me the opportunity of rising to say these few words. I feel that no matter how beautiful we make Ottawa—and I want to see it the "city beautiful", which I know has been the dream of the Prime Minister himself—it should also be a cultural centre which would epitomize the various cultures we have imported into this country and assist in welding them into one Canadian culture distinctive of Canada herself.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I rise to make a suggestion which is very much less dignified and important than those which have been made, though I fully agree with them, and that is that the library would be a very much better place to work in if it was regarded as a library and not as a congregating room for the purposes of all kinds of personal conversations.

Motion agreed to.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

MR. LENNARD—PURCHASE OF PROPERTY IN WENTWORTH COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Wentworth raised the point that the answer I made to his question on Monday last was not complete. I would refer him to remarks made by myself as reported in Hansard, page 951, in regard to a similar question.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member has referred to something else. The hon. member for Wentworth asked for an answer to a certain question, and an answer given at any other time is not an answer to his question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, just the principle established; that was all.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AS TO RULES FOR READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to effect an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. EDOUARD RINFRET (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, last night when the house adjourned I was discussing the simplicity of the procedure for the obtention of the right to amend our own constitution. What would not be so simple would be the procedure for possible future amendments of the constitution. It is to be hoped that the endeavours of the Dominion-Provincial Conference of 1927 will be carried on and implemented as soon as possible. This would, once and for all, put an end to the dispute concerning the necessity for all provinces to be consulted when an amendment is sought.

It would not, to be sure, terminate the discussion of the true nature of the constitution, whether it is a contract or a statute, but it would, it is hoped, eliminate the occasion for such discussion.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Would you permit me, Mr. Speaker, in this connection to place on Hansard these few phrases from Keith's Constitutional Law of the British Dominions, edition of 1933:

This view—

That expressed by Mr. Ferguson when premier of Ontario, that no change of importance can be made to the British North America Act without provincial consent.

—is based on the idea that the federal bond is the result of a compact or treaty, a term which admittedly was often used in the debates in the Canadian legislature when that body in 1865 approved the agreement achieved with the maritime provinces in 1864. To this view it is objected that in fact the Quebec agreement was never accepted by the legislatures of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and that in fact in certain matters the constitution prepared in 1864 was modified under imperial auspices before enacted in 1867, while as regards the other provinces, especially those created by the dominion, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, any idea of a compact is absurd.

As I have said, I hope the question will soon be settled and the right of amending our constitution conferred, with as little delay as possible, on some authority within the confines of Canada, with all guarantees necessary to assure the full exercise of the rights by minorities. Then it is hoped it will no longer be necessary to ask the question, have the provinces to be consulted, and have they to consent to amendments to the constitution.

At the Dominion-Provincial Conference of 1927 on amendments to the British North America Act, it was proposed that:

In the event of ordinary amendments being contemplated the provincial legislatures should be consulted, and a majority consent of the provinces obtained, while in the event of vital and fundamental amendments being sought involving such questions as provincial rights, the rights of minorities, or rights generally, affecting race, language and creed, the unanimous consent of the provinces should be obtained.

This proposition was unfortunately not acted upon. What then have we got to base an opinion upon? The Canadian constitution, like the British constitution, is made up of customs. Let us see what has been the custom here in Canada.

There have been, in all, nine amendments to the constitution. All were granted without discussion by the imperial parliament. In all cases the demand was made by the central authorities—in one case, by the federal government, but this was condemned by the unanimous vote of the house upon motion of Mr. Holton seconded by Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. The vote was, yeas, 136; nays, none. All subsequent addresses were passed by parliament.

In two instances, when it was felt that provincial rights were affected, the legislatures were consulted; otherwise they were not. In two cases there were protests on the part of one province, once from British Columbia and once from Quebec. A single attempt was made by the provinces to alter the British North America Act without the consent of parliament at Ottawa. The incident is related by Doctor Ollivier in his "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty". He tell us how the provinces convened in October, 1887; how they adopted eighteen resolutions, of which twelve were readjustments of the constitution, with a view to extending the power of the provinces at the expense of the federal parliament; how the central government refused to give its support to the proposed amendments; how the resolutions of the conference were forwarded through the usual channels to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, who formally acknowledged receipt thereof. But he concludes with these words:

No action was taken upon the resolutions by the imperial parliament.

I have cited these various examples to show that the imperial parliament, which is the amending power, will act only upon the request of the federal authorities and notwithstanding the absence of consent or even the opposition of the provinces. That is the situation as we have it to-day, and when we are told that by voting for the resolution now before the house, we are creating a precedent, I say that if precedent there is to be created, then it was created a long time ago, less than five years after the sanction of the constitution, at a time when the fathers of confederation were still alive and in parliament at Ottawa. Yet there was no question at that time of asking the approval of the provinces.

It may be argued, I know, that in the other instances the amendments had to do with matters not strictly connected with provincial rights, but that now it is different, and that the proportionate representation of the provinces is an encroachment upon the provinces. I have often asked myself whether here, in this house, I was a representative of my constituency, whether I was a representative of my province, or whether I was a representative of Canada as a whole. Listening to some hon. members, I wonder whether they—or I—understand their duty correctly as members of parliament. Some have treated this question as one from Nova Scotia; others, as one from British Columbia; still others, as one from Saskatchewan. Few have considered the matter in the interests of the whole of Canada. I was glad the other night to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) explain that the government plan had not been conceived by Quebec, because sometimes I was annoyed by some people wishing to make this a Quebec problem when it is not.

There is a marked leaning on the part of certain persons towards envisaging everything as a Quebec problem. I think it is high time that such wrong tactics be abandoned, and I am glad for this reason, Mr. Speaker, to see that reference to Quebec as the pivotal province will cease to be made as soon as this resolution is passed. Quebec was unfairly treated in the last redistribution. Even members of the Progressive Conservative party are ready to admit it. Yet it was their party that affected the distribution of seats. British Columbia is entitled to higher representation; Saskatchewan and Manitoba would lose respectively four and three seats; Ontario would have to abandon seven members if we were to adopt the argument of the hon. member for Stanstead.

Is not a member, wherever he comes from, to take note of these facts? Is he supposed to refuse to see whatever takes place in any other than his own province? Is he not supposed rather to consider his local problems in relation to the whole Canadian picture? Is he not in a much better position to be of assistance to his own people when he does take the problems of others into consideration? On the other hand, are we to forget completely where we come from? Are we to close our eyes to all local difficulties? I do not think this would be fair to our electors and our fellow citizens. Be that as it may, I consider myself—and I feel quite sure every member of this house coming from the province of Quebec considers himself—just as good a Quebec citizen as the present premier of that province. We in this house have been elected by the same electors as elected his party in Quebec and defeated his independents in the federal field; and we claim to have as much at heart, as he claims he has, the interests of the province of Quebec. We might even be in a much better position than he to weight our problems in the light of the general good.

I claim for myself and my compatriots the right to represent Quebec if need be, and I believe we can do it in a much better way than he can in his own ivory tower called Laurentie. He had a wonderful opportunity for protecting his province as far as federal representation is concerned, and he has done all in his power to prevent the increase of eight members offered by the Liberal government. If he were serious he would not find all sorts of excuses, and faux fuyants to guarantee to his province the eight members to whom it is rightly entitled and who are long overdue.

How can he possibly claim that voting for the resolution would create a precedent when he knows very well that on seven previous occasions the provinces have not been consulted in connection with similar amendments to the constitution? If he were sincere he would rather say: The essence and the spirit of the constitution have on seven previous occasions been amended without the provinces being consulted; is it not time therefore that the constitution be amended in the same fashion in order to restore the essence of the act, which has been badly deformed by the judicial body?

I contend that my representation here is of the same kind as that of Sir George Etienne Cartier and Sir John A. Macdonald. They both served as members of the federal government after creating confederation, and they both continued to defend the rights of their respective provinces in relation to the whole of Canada. Why should the right that was granted Cartier and his fellow members in 1867 be refused the present members representing the province of Quebec? Why can we not claim to act for the province of Quebec when it is deemed necessary that provincial consultation be made? Why should it not be left to the federal members to decide whether the provinces should be consulted? Is it not upon this theory that, in the past, all seven amendments, not specifically identified with purely provincial rights, have been treated? There were in the House of Commons representatives of the province of Quebec having the same rights as had formerly Cartier and others, and they were consulted the same as we are to-day consulted concerning the proposed change.

I purposely have not used the word amendment because I do not think it is one at all. In my opinion it is an explanation; it is an elucidation; it is the restoration of the spirit of the constitution. It has been variously argued that the basis of our representation is population. I believe it would be more adequate to say that proportionate representation was the keynote of the British North America Act. Quebec was entitled to sixty-five members and the other provinces to the numbers of representatives which corresponded to the proportion which their respective populations bore to that of Quebec. Each member was to represent the same proportion of the population of Canada. "So that a man in Quebec—" to use the words of Mr. Fitzpatrick in the New Brunswick reference—"should have by reason of his vote, the same political influence in Canada as a man in any other part of the dominion. If this Act, (the British North America Act) is construed properly, then every man in the Dominion of Canada will have the same amount of political influence as a result of his vote."

The proper balance was fairly well kept, although in 1904 it was a little off keel. Each unit of representation then represented: for Quebec, 25,367; for Ontario, 23,727; for Nova Scotia, 22,978 and for New Brunswick, 23,651. From 1904 on, with the interpretation given to subsection 4 of section 51, the disproportion has been more and more noticeable, so that to-day the unit of representation in Quebec is 51,213, and that of the other provinces as follows: Nova Scotia, 48,163; Prince Edward Island, 23,761; New Brunswick, 45,740; Ontario, 46,190; Manitoba, 42,926; Saskatchewan, 42,666; Alberta, 46,833, and British Columbia, 51,116. All except British Columbia and Nova Scotia show a quotient of more than five thousand fewer than that of Quebec. This has been qualified as "an unjust and illegal consequence under section 51" by Mr. Cannon, counsel for Quebec in the New Brunswick reference.

The purpose of the resolution is to reestablish the balance as it was originally, to restore the true spirit and the keynote of the constitution. It was felt, however, that if we adhered strictly to the letter of the British North America Act, certain provinces would be harshly treated. Saskatchewan would lose four seats and Manitoba three. It was thought, moreover, that this would not correct the inequality which gradually took place as a result of section 51, as interpreted, and specially would not have reduced to seventy-four the number of seats for Ontario, which would have been equitable on a strict population basis.

The resolution attains these various results in complete fairness to all concerned. If it is creating a precedent in this country to effect fairness to all concerned, and to correct an injustice, then I am in favour of creating such a precedent, and I do hope that the precedent will be followed often, and that the present premier of Quebec will follow suit.

In voting in favour of the resolution I do not feel that I am creating any other sort of precedent, and particularly I feel convinced that I am not altering the essence of the British North America Act, but rather restoring it. I reserve for myself the right to ask that the provinces be consulted should I think that, at some future date, an amendment attacks the essence of the constitution.

May I again revert to the New Brunswick reference in this connection, and draw the attention of the house to the fact that Mr. Justice Mills, at page 584 of the report, recognizes the principles which I tried to express, namely, that under the British North America Act the number of members of the House of Commons might be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided that a proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by the act was not thereby disturbed. And might I suggest that according to this decision the proposed resolution comes within the orbit of the constitution, more particularly under section 52. This is the section upon which Mr. Newcombe, the former deputy minister of justice was relying to argue that the number of members of Quebec could be increased. He said in the Prince Edward Island reference at page 645—and this was away back in 1904:

> The power given under section 52 has never been executed, but it may be executed and only in one way, that is, by increasing the number fixed for the province of Quebec. If parliament were to provide that Quebec shall have 75 members and that the representation of the other provinces shall be increased accordingly, that would be an enactment quite within the authority of the dominion parliament and referable solely to the authority conferred by section 52.

In closing I think it is fair that I should correct certain wrong impressions which have been created by certain speakers who have participated in the debate. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) mentioned that Montreal was over-represented, and made a comparison of its representation with that of Glasgow. He claimed that Glasgow had fifteen members for 1,280,000 of population, whereas Montreal had sixteen representatives for 903,000. I made an addition of the figures for Montreal which the hon. member had before him when he spoke, and he will agree with me that they came to 1,271,584, a little less than 9,000 under the Glasgow figure.

As to the assertion that Montreal is over-represented, I think it would be fair to make a comparison with the next ranking city in the dominion. According to the last census, the island of Montreal has sixteen members, for a population of 1,116,800, or a quotient representation of over 70,000; whereas Toronto has eleven members for 667,457, or only some 60,000 per constituency. Montreal has ten counties with more than 70,000, whereas Toronto has only two.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) complained that Quebec territory had been increased by 500,000 square miles at some time or other. That is so, but it is not the area that is the basis of representation but the population. In this 500,000 square miles there are approximately 3,700 people, and for the purpose of determining the population of Quebec they are not included at the present time. But even if they were, does the hon. member suggest that they should not be included? What then would he suggest that we do with them—that we give them one representative over and above the representation of Quebec? They have a right to be represented just as much as the inhabitants of the Yukon.

I have mentioned Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier. I can assure my English-speaking compatriots that I have in their fair play the same faith as Cartier had in that of Macdonald, and that they may be assured of our cooperation in the same fashion as Cartier offered it to Macdonald.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Rinfret) denied the over-representation of Montreal, and the question arose in my mind as to how Montreal could be over-represented with representatives such as he himself. I am sure the house must agree that the greater the number of people of his calibre who come here from Montreal, or from any other place, the better off this parliament will be. In my first words I am glad to pay him a sincere and heartfelt compliment on the excellent, comprehensive and most adequate exposé of the law upon this question. I think it is fitting that he should have done it at this time. It is altogether to the general benefit of parliament that such a dissertation as he has presented to us should be upon our records for future use.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), sitting beside me not long ago, remarked that this debate was very largely a lawyers' debate; and so, I realize, it must have seemed. Although a lawyer myself, I do not intend to discuss the various decisions in the courts and the various legal opinions which have been given here in the house from time to time, because I consider that has already been adequately done. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who presented the case in the beginning for the Progressive Conservative party, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), to mention only two or three of them from the opposite side of the house; then, the Right Honourable the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and, last, but most decidedly not least, as will be clearly understood from what I have already said, the gentleman who has just concluded his excellent discourse upon the subject—all these have discussed the matter from the legal standpoint. For that reason I believe the law has been sufficiently laid before the house.

But certain aspects of the matter have arisen in debate which commend themselves to me as subjects for comment. Perhaps I would not have spoken at all had it not been for the fact that I felt some member from each province should make a statement. So far, hon. members from my province of Manitoba have not taken part in the debate, and I felt that one should.

So far as I am concerned—and I am sure in this respect I speak for many, indeed, if not all, my colleagues—I would support the motion, because in the first place I believe it is a most reasonable proposition. Hon. members have not attacked the basic idea of this redistribution resolution. I am not sure that that is the course they would have followed had they had a little more temerity. At any rate, whether or not they had the courage to do so, the fact is that they have not attacked the fairness of this sort of redistribution. It does not seem to me that it is possible to attack it. It is, after all, an attempt to seize again the principle under which we desire to operate our political life, the principle we accepted in 1867.

In 1867, without doubt, we had representation by population; but before long we failed to have it, by reason of what has been termed the "joker" clause in the British North America Act, as a result of which undoubtedly Ontario came to have a greater representation than she would have been entitled to have under a strict representation-by-population distribution.

True, even in the beginning the principle was mitigated to a certain extent by ideas of territorial representation. But on the whole it was representation by population that the fathers of confederation sought; and that is the principle to which all Canadians have subscribed from that day onward—although it would seem to me, in the light of the voting of the Progressive Conservative party to date, that sometimes that subscription was more in the nature of lip service than it was sincere.

Before dealing with what I consider some of the practical aspects of the compact theory which has been advanced, I should like to address a few remarks to the thoughts left with us by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). He has complained—and he is about the only one—about the effects of the resolution before us, because he does not think it is quite fair to British Columbia. But, Mr. Speaker, British Columbia is to be assigned that number of members which its population warrants, according to the latest authoritative count. British Columbia, like every other province, must receive according to its population, and according to some definite count. The last authoritative count was in 1941, and we have to operate on that basis, or on some other. It is true that estimates of population can be made between then and now; but we cannot take estimates. We cannot proceed on the basis of any other sort of count than that which has always been the accredited manner of checking up on the number of our people.

As a matter of fact, British Columbia is better off when she is receiving two additional members, as a result of using the 1941 census, than she would be if we deferred the matter until 1951. That is to say, clearly she is going to suffer an injustice if we do not have this distribution; she has been suffering an injustice right along, and the present procedure will take care of that to a certain extent.

The complaint coming from the hon. member from New Westminster amuses me somewhat, bearing in mind as I must the number of times he has inveighed against the Japanese and Chinese. You know, out in British Columbia at the present time, under the 1941 census and by reason of this distribution, the hon. member for New Westminster and the people of that province will be accorded an additional member of parliament by reason of the fact that there are in their midst a large number of Japanese, Chinese and other orientals. These people cannot vote.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): They pay taxes, though—and those in Vancouver East are represented.

Mr. MAYBANK: They have out there at the present time about 22,000 Japanese, 18,500 Chinese and 1,343 East Indians, a sufficient number of persons to supply any province with an additional member. They do not vote, although they are counted for purposes of representation. So British Columbia is getting some benefit from the Japanese. After they have them all shipped out of the country, and all the Chinese shipped out of the country, and all the East Indians shipped out of the country, the province still have the extra member. So that I say the hon. member from New Westminster really has not very much to complain about. True, I understand British Columbia members have complained about not having enough senators, but I believe we shall hear from the hon. member who has interrupted me, and that that will be adjusted in a short time. It will come a little later in the day, when arrangements will be made for increased representation in the senate for British Columbia, and probably for other places.

Mr. ADAMSON: A little later in life, too.

Mr. MAYBANK: Yes, later in life, too.

I do not think it is desirable that the country should overlook the strange inconsistency of the Progressive Conservative party in this matter. I said "strange" inconsistency. Perhaps I was wrong; perhaps that was the wrong word to use; maybe I should not have emphasized the word "strange" and should only have referred to the inconsistency. Some might think it usual, while others might think it strange. At any rate I think it is just as well to emphasize the fact that there is great inconsistency between the actions of that party in connection with this redistribution, as they express themselves in speech, and the manner in which they have dealt with other amendments to the British North America Act, as they have expressed themselves in action. Only a few years ago—1943—a proposal came up that we should amend the British North America Act, and that we should amend it in respect of redistribution—as to whether we should have redistribution or whether we should not. When it came to voting on that, all the gentlemen who have spoken in this debate voted without any reference at all to the provinces. They never suggested that the provinces should be consulted; they all voted that the British North America Act should be amended. That was the time when they were preventing redistribution.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the hon. member think it is a fair argument to invoke what was done as a war measure, when the interest of the country was centered on winning the war, as a precedent for what is going on at the present time?

Mr. MAYBANK: That is a simple question to answer. If it was in the mind of any hon. member of the Tory party of that day to think that they were acting in a manner unusual, he could have said so. If he had done so, he would have been adequately explaining his action in case a similar proposition should develop in the future. It was perfectly plain from the way they all acted at that time that they had no thought whatever of consulting the provinces, either then or at any other time. If the gentleman who has just sat down had remarked, even casually at that time that the provinces should be consulted—

Mr. HACKETT: Unfortunately I was not here.

Mr. MAYBANK: The hon. member was not here, and so far as I know he did not coach anybody. Whether he would have spoken so if he had been here, I do not know. He seems to be most careful and cautious, and he may have done that if he had been here. At any rate none of his colleagues took that position at the time. Why? Not because it was a war measure; not because of the time at which the problem came up, but because they wanted to hold the representation as it then was. That is the real explanation of their position.

Mr. FERGUSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. MAYBANK: If the hon. gentleman desires to put a question I will yield, as long as it is a question and not an argument.

Mr. FERGUSON: Does the hon. gentleman intimate that due to the fact the Tories did not stress the fact that there was a war on, that is a forerunner to an explanation of the actions of the government during this war, due to the fact that they did not stress that there was a war on when they brought into effect some of their most unusual orders in council; and are we to take it for granted that from now on that they are going to carry on in that manner?

Mr. MAYBANK: That question also is very easy to answer. However, it is not worth answering, and I will deal with it in another way. It is so involved and so unclear that it becomes silly and, therefore, should not be dealt with. Let us look at this compact theory which is being supposedly seriously advanced to-day by the Tory party. Let us get away from all question of what is written in certain records, of what is written in the law itself and deal only with the simple proposition that three or four provinces came together and as a result of their discussions an agreement was made and a law was passed, and, therefore, the law cannot be changed. That is the principle that the Tory party would import into the domestic constitutional politics of this country. I believe I know where they get their inspiration. They have observed, as we all have observed, the veto principle which has been incorporated into the proceedings of the united nations. Every person regrets the veto arrangement, although it is understandable why it should be there. These gentlemen of Canada's Tory party now desire to import that veto principle of the united nations into the domestic politics of Canada. It is a vicious principle and would be destructive of all possibility of progress.

One realizes upon examination how ridiculous it is. There were three organizations, one called the colony of Nova Scotia, another called the colony of New Brunswick and another called the colony of Canada; to-day there are nine provinces in a nation called Canada, and it is suggested that these nine must be consulted because an agreement was made. In the first place the government of Alberta made no agreement; the "agreement" was made only by Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Canada. There are only two of the makers of this supposed agreement who could be consulted at all. If you wanted to consult the three parties, whom would you consult? Would you consult the legislature which is headed by Mr. Drew, or the legislature which is headed by Mr. Duplessis? Neither one of them to-day represents the Canada of 1866. The Canada of 1866 passed out of existence. There is no continuing body that could be consulted and the practical difficulties in the way of the compact theory are insuperable in themselves.

Then take my own province. Manitoba had no hand in making the "agreement". Manitoba is in confederation by virtue of the fact that certain money was paid to a private company for the land and for the jurisdiction and for the monopolies it held over the country. That province has no right to ask for any form of consultation at all. The same is true of the two great provinces that were called the northwest territories. The territories of that time became the two provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. They could not make any agreement because they did not exist. They were owned, lock, stock and barrel, by the Hudson's Bay Company. The Hudson's Bay Company had jurisdiction over them as well as owning all the land. The Hudson's Bay Company passed laws for them. They certainly made no agreement about coming in, so how could they be consulted?

If it be said that these three provinces by reason of their being brought in as provinces were granted the same rights as the other provinces, I would say that is correct. But the word "rights" imports a legal enactment, imports something written down, some record that is discoverable some place. So far as the compact theory advocates in this house have shown there is certainly no law granting a right of consultation. They say there is no law granting this right, but there ought to be. That is virtually their position. These three provinces have come in with all the rights of the other provinces, but they get only the rights that there are in law. After hearing the dissertation of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) last evening and of the hon. member who just sat down a short time ago, it would seem to be clear that there certainly are no legal rights of consultation.

I do not think any person will deny that in the years just before 1867 there was an agreement. There was an agreement between outstanding men in those various colonies. The Minister of Justice quoted from an essay by Kennedy who said that they were men who transcended the institutions of which they were a part. Undoubtedly those men got together and made an agreement. But there is no evidence even there to suggest that they made an agreement providing for the colonies from which they came being consulted thereafter in the event of any change being desired. The true nature of the agreement they made on that particular point is made clear in a passage to be found in the life of George Brown, and another passage in the same book from the life of Sir John A. Macdonald. We will see the nature of the agreement with reference to representation by population if we take a glance at a paragraph in the life of George Brown which appears on page 83 in the Makers of Canada series. Dealing with something which the opening sentence does not adequately disclose and which does not matter at the moment for the purposes of the text, the paragraph reads:

> Lower Canada complained of the injustice, and with good reason.

That was the injustice of gerrymandering, as it was called, the two parts of Canada by giving them equal representation. It goes on:

> In the course of time Lord Durham's prediction was fulfilled; by immigration the population of Upper Canada overtook and passed that of Lower Canada. The census of 1852 gave Upper Canada a population of nine hundred and fifty-two thousand, and Lower Canada a population of eight hundred and ninety thousand two hundred and sixty-one. Brown began to press for representation by population. He was met by two objections. It was argued on behalf of the French Canadians that they had submitted to the injustice while they had the larger population, and that the Upper Canadians ought to follow their example. Mr. Brown admitted the force of this argument, but he met it by showing that the Lower Canadians had been underrepresented for eight years, and that by the time the new representation went into force, the Upper Canadians would have suffered injustice for about an equal term, so that a balance might be struck. A more formidable objection was raised by Mr. Hincks, who said that the union was in the nature of a compact between two nations having widely different institutions; that the basis of the compact was equal representation, and that Brown's proposition would destroy that basis. Cartier said that representation by population could not be had without repeal of the union. The French Canadians were afraid that they would be swamped, and would be obliged to accept the laws and institutions of the majority.

That was the sort of picture which these men had in front of them when they came to make an agreement and submit it to what was then called the mother parliament. And later, respecting it, Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> The vexed question of representation by population was solved in a manner justly styled by Macdonald "equally ingenious and simple" since it granted this much desired boon without joining thereto his bugbear of manhood suffrage.

"By adopting the representation of Lower Canada as a fixed standard," he said, "as the pivot on which the whole would turn—that province being the best suited for the purpose, on account of the comparatively permanent character of its population, and from its having neither the largest nor the least number of inhabitants, we have been enabled to overcome the difficulty I have mentioned. We have introduced the system of representation by population without the danger of an inconvenient increase in the number of representatives on the recurrence of each decennial period. The whole thing is worked by a simple Rule of Three. For instance, we have in Upper Canada 1,400,000 of a population; in Lower Canada, 1,100,000. Now, the proposition is simply this, if Lower Canada with its population of 1,100,000 has a right to sixty-five members, how many members should Upper Canada have, with its larger population of 1,400,000? The same rule applies to the other provinces, the proportion is always observed and the principle of representation by population carried out. If an increase is made, Lower Canada is still to remain the pivot on which the whole calculation will turn."

Those two passages show the difficulties of those days, and Macdonald's clear statement afterwards shows that what they were agreeing upon was a principle, not a particular clause in a law such as the law we are now dealing with, which refers to a one-twentieth decrease in population before any change in the representation can be effected. They wanted to introduce the principle of representation by population, and they thought they had done it, and we found out in the course of time that they had not done it. All that it is desired to do now is to return to the condition in which the fathers of confederation thought they had left this country. There is no more to the proposal before us than that, to adhere to the general principle of representation by population, mitigated in respect to certain sections by certain constitutional changes we have already made granting a degree of territorial representation.

I will go so far as to say that I do not think there is any part of the constitution that requires consultation of provinces by this parliament before it votes an address to the British parliament for a change in the British North America Act. There is no part of our constitution in my opinion where that would be legally necessary. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) gave a complete answer to the argument for the need of protection of minorities in this country when he spoke last night. I would not deny and I do not think anyone would deny the wisdom of consulting the provinces when a matter may be dealt with which affects their rights particularly. I do not think any person would deny that. It would be the part of wisdom to consult them just as they were consulted a few years back when the dominion took over by virtue of a constitutional change the power to legislate with respect to unemployment insurance. The Prime Minister at that time carried on a lengthy series of negotiations by way of consultation with the provinces, and after a satisfactory condition of assent had been received all round, he was able to recommend the appropriate resolution to result in legislation by this house. That is an example of the wisdom of proceeding in that way, against an absolute right of consultation.

Having regarded this matter from the viewpoint of the practical difficulties in the way of consultation; practical difficulties in the way of what is called the compact theory, I conclude with this. I agree entirely with what several speakers have said, particularly the speaker just before me, in reference to amending the British North America Act in Canada. I am, you know, in fiscal matters in favour of as easy an importation policy as possible, and I think we ought to signalize our belief in almost free importation by importing the British North America Act itself into this country. I think that the sooner we do that the better. I have spoken on this subject before. I think it is most outrageous and an anachronism that this parliament should have to be sending over to the old country saying: "Please pass this law for us." It is not merely derogatory of our own dignity but it is definitely insulting to the ideas of dignity of the parliament at Westminster. I think it is an effrontery on the part of this country to continue to use the parliament at Westminster as a chore boy. It may very well be that this debate will have the result of bringing some relief in that respect. It may very well be that this country will see that its present way of attempting constitutional change cannot be continued. I am not in a position to say at the moment what would be the right way in which this country should proceed from now on to amend its constitution. It might begin by allowing matters to develop, just as the British methods of legislation have grown over there. That is not so important at this moment. The main thing is to take on the authority and the power to amend our own constitution, and not to keep going on these constant pilgrimages to Westminster that have been necessary whenever changes in our constitution were desired.

I have always been impressed with the suggestion made by the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe. His view was that we might effect an amendment to our constitution by a two-thirds majority vote of the provinces. He thought that should be sufficient to carry an amendment of the constitution in anything except racial and religious matters, but in the case of an amendment trenching upon these two subjects there would have to be unanimity. Well, that seems to me to be a pretty reasonable way of proceeding, a fairly reasonable formula. However, I am not wedded to any particular formula, but I am very strongly in favour of the idea that Canadians had better begin to act as members of a nation, and not members of a colony as we were in 1867, and that we should do our own work hereafter, and not keep passing it over to Westminster after long debates of this sort.

(Translation):

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the redistribution proposal that is now before us seems to be something in the nature of an act of munificence and generosity toward some provinces, and especially Quebec. The latter is told: you will have eight more members. However, the constitution must first be amended and for that purpose a procedure which I deem improper and irregular is being resorted to. The British North America Act is considered by the government as an ordinary legislation which can be amended at will and according to the whim of the party in power. It is now desired to amend its provisions so as to give Quebec a few more members, but at some future time it will again be amended to her detriment. That is an unfair procedure as well as a serious blow to national unity.

The provinces, which were parties to the federal covenant, are not consulted while Westminster, which has nothing to do with our affairs except to play the part of the notary who certifies a document, in the words of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe is called upon to give its consent to the proposal. The London government is to change our constitution and the provinces will have to abide by its decision.

It is perhaps imagined that the granting of a few more members to Quebec will silence the legitimate claims of those who, in that province, believe that confederation is more than an ordinary piece of legislation but a treaty, a covenant which cannot be altered without the consent of the contracting parties. The stand taken by the province of Quebec is clear-cut and logical. If, because she found it momentarily advantageous, she agreed to the principle implied in the act which the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has brought to our attention, the other provinces would consider her to be making a mere show of sincerity, and her behaviour would mean that she is prepared to allow the central government to change the constitution whenever such change is to her advantage and that she will oppose a change only when it is of benefit to others.

She would be an accomplice in sabotaging the achievement of the fathers of confederation and her attitude would bear out her belief that the British North America Act is a mere bauble in the hands of the Ottawa centralists.

Confederation has been a compact between the provinces; it has been one, especially, between the two races in this country. The fathers of confederation were the first to say so.

(Text):

Speaking in the house on February 3, 1865, Sir John A. Macdonald, in introducing the resolutions adopted at the Quebec conference, referred to what he called the "treaty of union" which had taken place. Sir John further said:

> The government desire to say that they presented the scheme as a whole, and would exert all the influence they could bring to bear in the way of argument to induce the house to adopt the scheme without alteration, and for the simple reason that the scheme was not one framed by the government of Canada, or by the government of Nova Scotia, but was in the nature of a treaty settled between the different colonies, each clause of which had been fully discussed and had been agreed to by a system of mutual compromise.

On February 6, in the legislative council, Hon. Alexander Campbell referred again as follows to the scheme, which was not the work of the government alone, but that of delegates of all the other provinces. "It was the result of deliberation, accommodation and compromise," he said.

On February 6, Sir John A. Macdonald further said:

> As I stated in the preliminary discussion, we must consider this scheme in the light of a treaty.
> I trust this scheme will be assented to as a whole. I am sure this house will not seek to alter it in its unimportant details and, if altered in any important provisions, the result must be that the whole will be set aside and we must begin de novo. If any important changes are made, every one of the colonies will feel itself absolved from the implied obligation to deal with it as a treaty. Each province will feel itself at liberty to amend it ad libitum so as to suit its own views and interests.

On February 8, Hon. George Brown, resuming the debate on the resolutions, said:

> This scheme cannot be carried and no scheme can be, that has not the support of both sections of the province. . . .(Ontario and Quebec).
> It was necessarily the work of concession; not one of the thirty-three framers but had, on some points, to yield his opinions.

On February 9, Hon. D'Arcy McGee went further and said:

There may be no doubt about our position in regard to that document. We say, question it you may, reject it you may, or accept it you may, but alter it you may not. It is beyond your power or our power, to alter it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Beyond whose power, if I may ask?

Mr. GAGNON: The power of the federal government. He continued:

There is not a sentence, aye, or even a word you can alter without desiring to throw out the document. . . .

I repeat, after all my hon. friends who have already spoken, for one party to alter a treaty is, of course, to destroy it.

All the fathers of confederation who supported the resolution in the house, namely, Langevin, Cartier, Galt, Brown, Taché and others, made similar assertions.

(Translation):

Let us now turn to the testimony of British jurists and statesmen:

Lord Carnarvon, who has been called the "draftsman of the Act of 1867" solemnly stated, on second reading of the bill in the House of Lords:

"That the British North America Act must be considered as a treaty."

In Montreal, at the occasion of a banquet in his honour, Lord Carnarvon also stated:

(Text):

I believe it would be the opinion of the highest tribunal that your federation act is not to be construed merely as a municipal act; it is to be viewed as a treaty.

(Translation):

I quote from the report on the B.N.A.A., annex 4, page 149. Mr. Adderley, British under-secretary of State said:

It is a treaty which has only been ratified by the imperial parliament.

Professor Keith also states:

The constitution is a compact which cannot be amended without the consent of the federal government and the provinces.

(Text):

In 1930, during the imperial conference held in London, England, in October, the provisions of the proposed statute of Westminster were discussed. Hon. Howard Ferguson was then premier of Ontario. In a strongly worded dispatch he expressed his opposition to the adoption of the statute of Westminster by the dominion—without consultation with and approval by the provinces on the ground that the statute was in effect an amendment of the British North America Act, and that this act was a compact between the provinces and as such could not be amended without their consent.

Hon. Alexandre Taschereau, then premier of Quebec, seconded Mr. Ferguson in unequivocal terms.

(Translation):

On page 108 of his book entitled "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty" Mr. Maurice Ollivier comments as follows on this statement:

This decision of the imperial conference gave recognition to the fact that the constitution is founded on a pact entered into by the provinces which must be consulted when a suggested amendment to the constitution concerns them.

Let us now hear from the privy council:

In 1914, Viscount Haldane stated that the British North America Act—

. . . must be accepted as a treaty of union amongst the provinces.

When the aviation case was under study in 1932, Lord Sankey also claimed that it was a contract.

In 1935, when Lord Atkin made known the ruling of the judicial committee of the privy council concerning social legislation, he declared:

(Text):

That no one can doubt that his distribution of power between the legislatures and the federal parliament is one of the most essential conditions, probably the most essential condition, in the interprovincial compact to which the British North America Act gives effect.

(Translation):

Now let us examine some of the views expressed by Canadian statesmen and jurists. In 1883 Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated:

I repeat, each time that this parliament (Ottawa) succeeds in depriving a province of a right which it holds, no matter how insignificant such right may be, it is a step further along the path leading to legislative union.

On November 24, 1871, he declared:

It is an historical fact that the federal form of government was adopted solely in order that Quebec might retain the exceptional and unique position which it occupied on the American continent.

Honourable Justice Mignault said:

The British North America Act is merely the legalization of a pact entered into by the provinces.

Honourable Justice J. T. Loranger declared:

The confederation of the provinces was the result of a pact and the imperial parliament merely ratified it.

On April 7, 1884, Hon. Honoré Mercier declared in the legislature:

The provinces came into existence before the dominion, and it is from them that the latter received its powers. The provinces enjoyed the responsible government of 1867; they had their legislatures, their laws and the full autonomy inherent in a colony.

They are sovereign within the limits of their powers, and any attempt to interfere with that sovereignty is a violation of the federal pact.

(Text):

Speaking in Toronto in 1925, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen said:

The pact of confederation is undoubtedly a contract.

(Translation):

On February 24, 1930, the Hon. R. B. Bennett said in the House of Commons:

(Text):

The British North America Act is a treaty, a pact made between four provinces.

Furthermore, the royal commissioners of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations of 1937 make, in their report in 1941, frequent allusions to the confederation pact and the compromises agreed upon in 1867. They expressed their admiration for the splendid work carried on by the fathers of confederation. Let me quote what is found at page 9 of the second volume of their recommendations:

In the course of our work we have come to appreciate as never before the achievements of the fathers of confederation. Not only did they devise an instrument of government which has successfully withstood the test of seventy years of rapid and in large part quite unpredictable change, but they secured assent to the adoption of this instrument under circumstances which, in the minds of some, have given it the same sort of sanctity that the most solemn treaty might possess. By their achievements they laid the foundations of national unity and of the federal system, both of which our instructions enjoin us to respect.

(Translation):

Hon. Ernest Lapointe, said in the House of Commons, in the course of a speech on this question:

(Text):

If our constitution is to be considered as a treaty, surely we cannot alter its provisions without at least seeking the consent of the other parties to that treaty.

Now has it been considered as a treaty? I heard it suggested some time ago that this idea at confederation of a treaty is an antiquated idea. Maybe it is. But the truth does not cease to be truth when it gets old. An old truth is always true. You cannot prevent facts from being facts whether you like them or not.

(Translation):

Here is what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, in 1907:

(Text):

Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it and I submit that this compact should not be lightly altered.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

(Translation):

About the same time, Sir Robert Borden had this to say, on the same subject:

(Text):

Inasmuch as this (our constitution) is a federal compact which we are asked to vary, it is only right that each province should be consulted in its decision given, in the right of its separate entity.

(Translation):

In his handbook of parliamentary law, His Honour Justice Mignault, after showing that Canada is a federal union, added: "Confederation is but the fulfilment of a pact entered into by four provinces."

Have all those jurists and statesmen erred, and is their opinion unsound to-day because this government holds opposite views? I, for one, prefer to rely on the testimonials of the builders of confederation rather than upon the arguments of people who are bent on destroying it, and who, especially since the war, have done so much to undermine its essential foundations.

Reverend Father Louis Lachance, O.P., has said:

Every constitution, except in cases where the instinct of savagery must be repressed through the use of force, is necessarily a contract.

If the consent of the provinces was needed for the establishment of confederation, it follows that the constitution cannot be amended without their concurrence. May I quote for the benefit of those who claim that the constitution is just an ordinary piece of legislation, what Mr. Leo Pelland had to say in a March 1936 issue of L'Action Catholique:

What is a legislation based upon an agreement, a compromise, and retaining some of the features of such agreement and compromise, if not a legislation having a clearly contractual character?

Mr. Maurice Ollivier has made the following statement at page 68 of his book "Problems of Canadian Sovereignty":

Those who hold that our constitution is a contract are on quite safe ground, and they can easily find, throughout our history, outstanding men who have shared their views or used the term "federal pact."

Confederation is a contract between two races and, as was so forcibly stated by Father Richard Arès:

If there exists to-day a Canadian confederation rather than a centralized state, it is first and foremost because of the explicit will of Lower Canada.

Upper Canada preferred a legislative union.

An English-speaking Canadian, Mr. John Boyd, had this to say in his book "Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, Baronet":

Without Cartier, Quebec's assent to the union would certainly have been impossible to obtain, and without Quebec confederation would never have been more than a noble dream.

The provinces are deprived of a sacred right when the constitution is amended without any previous consultation with them.

At the present time Quebec is not willing to barter away her rights for eight, ten or event twenty seats in this house. Respecting as she does the rights of others, she wants the rights conferred to her by the constitution to be respected. Jealous of her prerogatives, she does not want to be frustrated by any government in this country. We ask for no privileges, we want no special favours, but we insist upon the full implementing of the provisions of the constitution.

Mr. PINARD: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. GAGNON: Surely.

Mr. PINARD: If the hon. member intends to vote against the motion, does he realize that he will probably be the only French-speaking member to do so?

Mr. GAGNON: I shall point out to the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pinard) that the stand I take is consistent with the principles I advocate and I shall defend my stand even were no other member of the house to support me.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Hear, hear!

Mr. GAGNON: I continue. We claim no special privileges, no special treatment, but we insist on the full conformance to the clauses of the constitution and, above all, we do not want the spirit in which the discussions on the confederation pact were conducted to be ignored. The end does not justify the means; encroachments do not create rights and precedents in this connection are so dangerous that we must not repeat them.

Speaking on precedents in the matter of amendments to the constitution, Hon. H. Ferguson, then prime minister of Ontario, said:

(Text):

The result of these precedents has been to undermine the constitutional right of the provinces to be consulted regarding amendments to the British North America Act. The province of Ontario holds to the view that this agreement should not be altered without the consent of the parties in it. . . .

(Translation):

It is claimed in certain quarters that it is the duty of the members of the dominion parliament to express the views and the wishes of the province which they represent at Ottawa, and that in the matter of constitutional legislation, their views prevail over those of the provincial governments. If such were the case, why not simply abolish the provincial legislatures and centralize all the powers in Ottawa? It would be easier then to set up a dictatorship?

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Would the hon. member permit me a question? If the hon. member succeeds in convincing us, does he realize that he will thus deprive Quebec of eight seats?

Mr. GAGNON: If my hon. friend will bear with me he will find that I am not against the principle of granting eight or ten additional members to the province of Quebec; I am against the proposed method of achieving this result. Most assuredly it is the duty of the members of the dominion parliament at Ottawa to deal with federal matters, as defined by the constitution, but it is untrue to claim that they have authority to amend the constitution itself.

If the representation of the province of Quebec is to be increased, so much the better, and I am all for it; the price of this recognition of our rights should not be the destruction of the very foundation of our Canadian constitution.

I claim that the right to amend our constitution belongs jointly to the provinces and to the dominion.

The London parliament only ratifies decisions taken here. Once again I quote Mr. Lapointe on this subject:

The British North America Act, says he, is the result of lengthy and complicated deals, and finally of a compromise which the provinces approved through their officially accredited representatives. We have, therefore, a legal agreement, drawn up in due form, and freely ratified. Hence, the power to alter our national constitution is vested in the provinces whose good will made the alliance possible and whose unanimous good will is requisite to effect any desired amendment.

As for Westminster, we might say that it merely fulfilled notarial functions when the compact of 1867 was entered into and its present duties, similar to those of the past, consist in no more than authenticating the clauses of the Canadian federal agreement.

For these reasons, I shall vote in favour of the amendment.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): It is indeed with a sad heart that I rise to speak after the regrettable speech just spoken by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon).

Mr. GAGNON: Don't be sorry for me.

Mr. MARQUIS: The hon. member is perhaps not sufficiently aware of his responsibilities to feel sorry about it. But when he pits himself against the recognized right of fair representation in this country, he should realize that we have to feel sorry in his stead.

It had not been my intention, Mr. Speaker, to share in this discussion, for in marshalling arguments from this country's foremost constitutional and political authorities, the speeches you have heard so far made it unnecessary for me to take part in this debate. This resolution is so clearly based on justice that its discussion should have appeared unnecessary and it should have carried without comment or opposition. Until this afternoon however, the debate had remained on a plane and within bounds worthy of admiration.

The advocates and opponents of the measure have gone into the constitutional and the legal aspects of the matter, and have reviewed it from the standpoint of justice and common sense, with such skill and logic that I feel the voice of Chicoutimi should have remained silent. It is also because I am from the lower St. Lawrence region that I should not like to give the impression that this voice, however pleasant, expresses the feelings and the thoughts of our people.

This resolution concerns not only the premier of Quebec and his followers, but every Canadian citizen. It involves constitutional law and is highly important from a national standpoint; it is in the first place a measure of fair play. I wish to pay special tribute to the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who has dealt masterfully with this question with the calm and the competence of an eminent statesman.

This resolution is based upon law and justice. I shall not enter into legal technicalities; I shall not attempt to recall utterances of past and present statesmen or to quote the sections of the constitution. Such quotations have been numerous during this debate. However, if we examine the quotations submitted to the house, we find that, on the whole, the authorities on parliamentary law hold that the dominion, in matters coming within its purview, is not subservient to the provinces in regard to the amendments or adjustments to be made to the constitution. It is necessary to distinguish between external sovereignty and internal sovereignty, as it were. In regard to the administration of provinces, to their own jurisdiction, undoubtedly no Canadian government would entertain the idea of amending our constitution without consulting the provinces. But as regards powers exclusively reserved to the federal government— namely our external relations—things are different. So far as the right of the hon. member for Chicoutimi to sit in this house is concerned, it is the responsibility of his constituents. Besides, I believe the hon. member for Chicoutimi is entitled to speak for himself but not on behalf of the Hon. Mr. Duplessis. After hearing all the arguments of all those who took part in this debate and especially the speech of the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret), whom I take pleasure in commending specially, I believe we may admit as a matter of principle so that in the matter of representation, the federal government has the undoubted right of amending its constitution, in order to redress a wrong resulting from a false interpretation of this document. However, if there were any kind of doubt—and to my mind there is none—I fail to see, if there were any doubt, Mr. Speaker, should it prevent us from acting on a matter of absolute justice? Is there a single member in this house who, prior to fulfilling a duty of plain justice, would say: I shall refrain from acting due to a technicality, to a mere doubt and I shall adopt an attitude which will prevent the interested parties from obtaining justice. Mr. Speaker, we seem to recognize unanimously that it is a matter of plain justice. This may be gathered from the statements of the hon. members for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Chicoutimi admitted that this is the case. But, Mr. Speaker, if our province has an absolute right to a representation corresponding to its population, are we authorized to resort to excuses and technicalities in order to shirk our duty and deprive our province of eight representatives? Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the House reflects completely the wishes of all the provinces. It provides for representation of the provinces on the basis of population while protecting minority groups in Prince Edward Island and the Yukon. This resolution favours representation according to population in all parts of the country, it is in the interest of Canada for it prevents any province from gaining undue advantage to the prejudice of others. It allows all parties and all groups to express their views adequately in parliament.

The arguments set forth against the present resolution seem quite specious to me. Some say: "The measure is fair and should be passed, but not before the provinces are consulted. If any province objects to it, it cannot be passed. Therefore we shall vote against the resolution so that the provinces might be consulted and the measure thereby defeated." Such is the logic of the opponents of the resolution. They fight for an alleged principle founded neither on law nor justice to prevent the adoption of a fair and just measure.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. MARQUIS: Who sounded the alarm? Who are the opposition?

Perhaps from a letter written by the Quebec premier. This brings to my mind the words from Holy Writ "The letter killeth but the spirit giveth life." The letter of the Quebec premier will kill him, because it is against the rights of the province of Quebec. Unfortunately, as a result we shall soon lose the company of the young member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) who has listened to his master's voice. Hearing him a few moments ago, and looking at him, I said to myself: "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau." And that French voice from the province of Quebec has been raised in opposition to the granting of some rights to the French element in Canada and in the province of Quebec. That is why I have deemed it my duty, on behalf of the French-speaking group, who were the first to come to this country and whom we represent in this house, in the name of those among the fathers of confederation who were French-speaking, and who wanted to include in the constitution the means whereby we could obtain a fair and proportionate representation, on their behalf, Mr. Speaker, I have deemed it my duty to protest against such a treasonable act.

Some people hide behind a screen, they put on a mask, and they use the bugbear of autonomy in order to avoid facing the true situation and doing their duty. Will the autonomy of the province be better upheld if there are eight less or eight more members? Does not the value of Quebec's autonomy lie in the worth of her sons, in the endeavours of her representatives in a fair and equitable representation in this house? Does not our duty to the autonomy of the province consist in following the example of the fathers of confederation and endeavouring to protect the spirit rather than the letter of the constitution, which latter course would entail the risk of distorting it, especially in so far as the province of Quebec is concerned? The autonomy of the province of Quebec lies solely in her right of administration, of government, of management, within the exclusive limits of her jurisdiction, especially in matters of education, language and religion.

Should sections 92 and 93 and even section 133 of the British North America Act be amended without consulting the provinces. I am sure that the honourable members both on this side of the house and opposite would rise in protest against such action; they would want to prevent the spoliation of our rights and the sabotaging of the constitution, and, finally, to ward off civil war in this country. To-day we are dealing with a right which must be granted to all citizens of Canada, of whatever race, creed or language.

Mr. Speaker, as I said at the outset, I am scandalized to find that an honourable member, heeding his master's voice, should have risen in this Canadian parliament in order to prevent French Canadian influence from becoming greater and stronger in this house.

Mr. Speaker, we have been elected by people of our language, our creed and our race.

These citizens have shown their faith in us; they have given us a mandate, for what purpose? For the purpose of representing them here and safeguarding their rights. It is our right to have a representation proportionate to our population, and it is our duty to demand that right—I regret, however, that the hon. member for Chicoutimi had to leave the house before he was convinced—it is our duty to claim that right and we shall be united in trying to obtain proportionate representation for our province and also for the other provinces, according to their population.

When the question of representation in the Canadian parliament arises, when administration and internal economy or external affairs of Canada are concerned, do we, who have been elected to the national parliament, to represent our electors and the whole of Canada, and to legislate for and safeguard the future of our country, do we have to consult Mr. Duplessis who, for political purposes, will say that we want to sabotage the British North America Act? I feel sorry for the hon. member for Chicoutimi, who will have to answer not only to his constituency but to his province and to future generations for the step he has taken to-day. He will be responsible for the gesture which, translated into words, means that the children who are called upon to replace us will have no say in the nation's business because his leader in Quebec was not consulted, and that the hon. member does not wish them to have a fair representation in the Canadian parliament.

This may be the voice crying in the wilderness, but it is not the voice of John the Baptist, patron saint of French Canadians, since the voice of John the Baptist brought prosperity and happiness to people of good will. This other voice, however, sows the seeds of sadness and death. Under the present system, Mr. Speaker, even though the population of Quebec increased to five millions while that of Ontario would be at the four million level, the latter province would still have seventeen more representatives than the former. If the provinces are consulted, one alone need dissent to deprive us from Quebec or you from British Columbia or any of the others from representation in proportion to its population.

The hon. member for Outremont has explicitly defined the issue from this viewpoint. Some hon. members opposite, realizing that consultation with their provincial colleagues from Ontario would defeat the measure, object to it on the grounds that such advice is not sought.

It gave me great pleasure to hear the sympathetic hon. member for Eglinton, but it will require more than the French section of his speech, which was very well delivered, to do justice to Quebec, as the latter is well aware. The Quebec premier simply asks that the provinces be consulted so that our lot may be settled by the premier of Ontario. If the premier of Quebec is of the opinion that the British North America Act is a treaty or a pact and that we should consult him to gain an undisputed right to eight more members, we believe that such consultation might prove dangerous and prevent the province of Quebec from securing materialization of this prerogative. But let the premier of Quebec immediately declare himself willing to amend the constitution! Thus he will not give up the right to consultation which he claims as his own nor will he prevent the province of Quebec from securing adequate representation.

The hon. member for Chicoutimi said, a few moments ago, that the province of Quebec may, at some future date, be a victim to some amendment to the constitution, although it would benefit by the change now contemplated. I wonder whether the hon. member fears that a tornado will strike the province of Quebec with such force as to decimate its population or that some other cataclysm will prevent us from maintaining our proper proportion of the total population of Canada. What is certain, however, is that the population of Quebec cannot fall to the extent of determining such a spread between the relative populations of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, for at least two hundred years. Mr. Speaker, how could this amendment be even remotely detrimental to the province of Quebec? Its sole purpose is that of placing representation on a population basis. Quebec will never complain as long as it is given representation according to its population. I feel also that the other provinces will have no grounds for complaint if they have representation based on their respective populations. I have heard with my own ears a preposterous statement by a Progressive Conservative member for Prince Edward Island, the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure), who complains about this measure, although, under its provisions, his province would be granted four representatives. This hon. member was opposed to the principle of representation based on population. Nevertheless, this measure takes care to safeguard the minorities of Prince Edward Island and Yukon.

May I say here that the hon. member for Chicoutimi has spoken of centralization by the Ottawa government? The fact is that we are endeavouring to decentralize, giving to Quebec the number of members to which she is entitled. We want thereby to have more members from Quebec to take part in the management of the country.

He tells us that to-day we are being generous to the province of Quebec. We are not being generous, we are not rewarding Quebec. We are granting it exactly what we are giving the other provinces, nothing else. He said that the province of Quebec was not to be bought with eight or twenty seats. Does the hon. member wish to imply that we, the representatives of the province of Quebec, have been paid to obtain these additional seats? And what of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion), who sits next to the hon. member for Chicoutimi, has he been paid to support the resolution under consideration?

In conclusion he said: why not abolish the provincial legislature if it has been decided, in order more securely to entrench dictatorship in Ottawa, not to consult the provinces? Well, Mr. Speaker, dictatorship, in Ottawa, is in the hands of 245 hon. members who constitute parliament; in the next house, dictatorship will be exercised by the 255 members who will have been elected to sit here. Is representation of the people by the men of their choice to be called dictatorship? However, these members must speak for themselves and their constituents and not on behalf of members from other legislatures. As for me, I speak as member for Kamouraska. The hon. member from Chicoutimi does not speak for the electors of his constituency but on behalf of the prime minister of the province of Quebec. However, that is his own business.

We have a specific mandate and special responsibilities. We have a duty to perform here and we do have to take into account any instructions given by provincial members. As a federal Liberal member, I do not have to take orders from any provincial legislature although I am always open to suggestions and advice. But, Mr. Speaker, when members of a provincial legislature attempt to invade the field of federal legislation, I think we should be sufficiently proud and dignified, we should have, to a sufficient degree, the courage of our own convictions to defend the rights of our race and our province and to ensure their triumph.

In closing, I wish to state definitely that I shall never hide behind a screen, that I shall never seek cover behind a curtain and that I shall never shirk my responsibilities.

We now have before us a measure of the utmost importance designed to establish a representation according to population, that will be fair to all provinces. In considering this measure, mindful of my country's future, mindful of the voters of my constituency, and of my family, I feel it my duty to support this resolution as a Canadian imbued with truly national feelings.

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after the grandiloquent speech of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Marquis), I was almost reluctant to address the house. However, every hon. member has a part to play under his oath of office, in accordance with the interests of his constituents. I would like as a French Canadian from the province of Quebec, to express myself briefly in French as follows on the matter now before the house.

Had it not been amply established by parliamentary debates in the last fifty years, had not that fact been brutally disclosed by several interprovincial conferences, had it not been emphasized by numerous decisions in our courts of justice, the present debate on the redistribution bill (which does away with the principle of a pivotal province which had caused so much worry to Cartier) would show luminously on what weak foundations our federal structure is built, how difficult it is to govern a country where ten sovereign parliaments are to be found in fields which have been more or less clearly allocated to them; where are to be found also racial groups of different origins and mentalities, languages and religions, with different economic problems and political creeds which cover all the ground from repulsive communism to complete centralizing socialism and even to miserly and extreme capitalism, from a broad and sincere Canadianism to an avowed imperialism, which is sometimes concealed under a more or less hypocritical internationalism, depending on whichever attitude is necessary to insure an immediate political triumph.

The numerous and excellent speches made to date on the measure now before us and which I have read with care, show conclusively the inevitable clash of these various trends of opinion. Personally—and I wish to emphasize this fact—I do not question the sincerity of all members of this house, convinced as I am that they are all eager to serve their country and their constituents well.

We must accordingly respect such divergent opinions, inasmuch as they represent the beliefs of important groups (at least, of groups which think they are important) in our country. In such a matter, it would be wise to follow the advice given by scholarly Father Simard, on page 144 of his book entitled: "Pour L'éducation dans un Canada souverain," which I beg to quote:

That fact must be taken into account in our parliamentary era. Because politics, to be effective, must enlist the cooperation of the people it follows that discussion of public questions is generalized. But weighing programs and estimating the value of social legislation are operations to be performed without injuring the respect and love which must be bestowed on men in authority, men who, in that capacity, have a right to be treated according to patriotic devotion. In that respect, our world is the saddest thing to be seen. Not only are bills and party platforms put to shreds—which is permissible—but too often are insults thrown at those who are entitled to "cult and service" as Cicero and Saint Thomas Aquinas said.

Mr. HEON: It is therefore in this light, Mr. Speaker, that I would like to deal very briefly with the problem before this house. We are asked to ratify a measure involving two great and divergent principles. The first one, by establishing representation on the basis of population, would grant, at this time, eight new members to the province of Quebec. Although the cry of "rep by pop" was first raised in this country by someone who feared French-Canadian preponderance, and although this principle may again operate against us, we cannot deny the immediate advantage of the proposal.

Our province and our compatriots will never have too many representatives in this house, if we consider particularly the veiled, but constant and crafty hostility nursed against us by certain fanatical elements, which is apparent not only in the civil service and the various federal departments, but in the committees and boards and sometimes even in this house.

These eight new members coming from Quebec after the next federal election, if the resolution is passed, might well mediate on this thought expressed by the same Father Simard, whom I quoted a moment ago, on page 155 of his book:

> Were you to ask me now what should be said and done in parliament, I would tell you: Come to Ottawa, please, not as foreigners or as children expecting a spanking. Be thoroughly versed in questions bearing on the common good of Canada. Hold to a uniform national creed and always place it above party slogans. In this respect, all your forefathers have sinned, the Liberals in 1905 and the Conservatives in 1912. Make it understood that Canada is both French and English and that as far as you members of the French-Canadian group are concerned, you will never divide on the three following points: freedom for our faith, freedom for our culture, a happy relation between the central and provincial authorities.

I quote further:

> You may discuss the means of implementing this threefold plan. In fact, you will cling to these things above all. Not by threatening to leave your house when your rival claims it for himself, but by establishing your rights of ownership and shouting back: "You shall not oust me from my home. If you want a fight, you will have it."

The second principle involved in the resolution bears on the procedure concerning amendments to the British North America Act which may be suggested from time to time.

Mr. LALONDE: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he in favour of the first measure? Did he say so in his speech? Perhaps I have misunderstood him.

Mr. HEON: Nobody can deny, as I said, that the province of Quebec is gaining an immediate advantage by having eight members added to its representation.

Mr. LALONDE: You are in favour of that?

Mr. HEON: I am in favour of the additional representation, and I believe that I will be able to justify my attitude with a number of reservations.

Mr. LALONDE: I beg my hon. friend's pardon for interrupting him. I had not grasped what he meant.

Mr. HEON: My hon. friend has a right to enlighten himself. I hope that I will be allowed to express forthwith my stand on this highly contentious matter, upon which even the most prominent jurists of England and of Canada are not in agreement. In the first place, I find it absolutely ridiculous that a country such as ours should be forced humbly to pray an imperial and foreign parliament, which knows nothing or practically nothing of our political problems, to allow us to amend our own constitution. It is the weakest and the most inexcusable denial of an autonomy which exists in fact and which only an obsolete and uncalled for sentimentalism, or a dishonest concern for an immediate political advantage, prevent from freely expressing itself.

When shall we have the gumption to express our sovereignty and our autonomy by courageous and practical actions? When shall we cease to close our eyes upon the facts? Have not those tens of thousands of Canadians who made the supreme sacrifice during two world wars, in defence of freedom and of independence for the peoples of the world, gained for Canada the right to speak for herself?

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEON: I thank my hon. friends on the government side for approving my statement. We should have the courage of our convictions; we should take advantage of this opportunity to request the imperial parliament to waive its prerogative to approve the amendments to our constitution and to surrender to us the full and exclusive right in the matter. Let us be logical. If Canada is a free and self-governing nation, we must remove the purely artificial impediments to our freedom and autonomy.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we should face the facts; it would be much easier for our French-speaking compatriots, in view of their mentality, to give their approval to an amendment to the British North America Act, emanating from the House of Commons of Canada and her provincial legislatures, where they have their own representatives, rather than from an imperial parliament where they have no representatives. I have said so on numerous occasions and I shall repeat it again: we should not have to ask anyone's permission; we are our own masters and the sooner we assert ourselves, the sooner we shall establish in law a situation which exists in fact and which the other nations, especially those to whom we tender a helping hand, are eager to recognize, even if only to flatter our national pride and because they are desperately in need of our assistance. Everything depends, in this respect, upon our own will, since we hold the upper hand, but our claims must be submitted with intelligence, courtesy and honesty.

Therefore the house must once more request a government which is not ours to amend our constitution. Some hon. members have referred to the procedure to be followed; several have reversed the stand which they had taken in 1943. Thus we have seen certain people who, in 1943, were in favour of amending the constitution without consulting the provinces, without securing their consent, and who now claim that the consent of the provinces should first be obtained.

Mr. LALONDE: Who are they?

Mr. HEON: If my hon. friend will see me after I have concluded my remarks I shall give him this information freely. Others who, in 1943, claimed that the consent of the provinces was required, no longer voice such views this year. It is therefore a problem which everyone must solve according to his own conscience and convictions. Invectives and reproaches which may be cast at one another for purely political reasons and to vent one's spleen against the premier of the province of Quebec, will not help to solve it. I am one of those who believe that we must respect, without necessarily endorsing the political convictions of the provincial and party leaders.

Coming as I do from Quebec, I have made an earnest effort in the last two weeks to ascertain the views of my constituents in respect of the proposed measure, and they appear to be as follows:

It is true that Quebec would have eight more members; however, if the constitution is thus tampered with, what guarantee have we that eventually we shall not be the losers? And if we do not protest against the method of amending our magna charta, even though such an amendment would result in an immediate and apparent advantage, how shall we later on sincerely and seriously protest against a proposed amendment which would be detrimental to our interests?

This is then a matter of the utmost importance, which deserves the most careful consideration before a definite and final stand is taken. Personally, therefore—and I now express my own convictions, as I consulted no one and need not consult anybody—I endorse the opinion expressed by Lord Watson, Lord Haldane and Lord Sankey in the aeronautics case, by Lord Atkin in the minimum wage case, by Professor Barriedale Keith, and especially by the writer I now wish to quote. In 1939, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation asked professors of constitutional law in our Canadian universities to express over the air their legal opinion of the changes that should be made to the constitution. In the course of these talks, the province of New Brunswick was called upon to express its views, and this was done by Mr. Alfred G. Bailey, professor of British North American history at the university of New Brunswick. He was asked, at the same time—and this is important—to voice the official opinion of the New Brunswick government of which, I understand, the Hon. Mr. Dysart was then leader.

An hon. MEMBER: That's right; hear, hear.

Mr. HEON: I shall merely quote excerpts, for I do not wish to take up too much of the time of the house.

(Text):

The nature of the constitution, as one based on the principles of compact and consent, was formally recognized by the parliament of Canada in 1907. The Subsidy Act of that year, by which the allowances to the provinces provided in the British North America Act were to be substantially increased, was based upon the principle of consultation with the provinces. In confirmation of this principle it was acknowledged that the act of 1867 gave effect to a treaty, and that no amendment to disturb the terms of that treaty could be effected without the consent of the parties that were bound by it. The most recent recognition of the compact principle was that given by the lords of the judicial committee of the privy council, in rendering judgment on certain legislation of the parliament of Canada, on January 28th, 1937. In this judgment reference was made to "the interprovincial compact to which the British North America Act gives effect".

Moreover, it is not irrelevant to recall that the Statute of Westminster, which gave legal effect to the national status of the dominions did not increase the legislative field of the parliament of Canada at the expense of the provinces, nor did it apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Act, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

(Translation):

And it concludes as follows:

(Text):

In addition, it is regarded as noteworthy that the compact principle of confederation has been generally recognized in connection with the rights of racial minorities within the dominion. Few persons, perhaps no one, would have had the temerity to suggest that an amendment to the constitution which would affect the rights of a racial minority should be carried through without the consent of that minority. On the basis of the facts that have been presented, it is maintained here in New Brunswick, that Canada is a confederation as proposed at the London conference, not a federation as proposed at Quebec. This status, it is held, determines the fact that the union is based on a compact, the terms of which cannot be amended without the consent of the contracting parties; or in other words, that Canada derives its being an authority from the provinces with imperial sanction, and that this authority is a matter of agreement between the provinces. Finally, it is deemed (by the government of New Brunswick) of vital interest to demand a strict adherence to the letter and spirit of the constitution as thus conceived.

(Translation):

That is not an opinion from the province of Quebec and it is not Mr. Duplessis who speaks. Here is the opinion of an English-speaking province which cannot be accused of political motives and which apparently thinks along the same line as some of our Quebec fellow citizens.

Other opinions which I shall not quote may be added to that of Professor Bailey, but if we read the speeches of Hon. Honoré Mercier, Sir Lomer Gouin, Hon. Alexandre Taschereau, and Hon. Maurice Duplessis, the present prime minister of the province of Quebec, we find that our constitution is a contract which may not be changed without the consent of the signatories.

Mr. LALONDE: Will my hon. friend allow me a question?

Mr. HEON: Yes, sir, with great pleasure.

Mr. LALONDE: Is it my hon. friend's opinion that it is impossible for parliament to propose or to accept amendments to our constitution without having previously consulted the provinces? In other words, is it absolutely forbidden to the dominion parliament to amend the British North America Act for any reason? Are there no cases when the federal power could amend our constitution without consulting the provinces?

Mr. HEON: If my hon. friend will only allow me to finish my speech, I think I shall cover this point in my next few remarks. I now make a distinction between legal and administrative matters which may affect our racial group.

I feel quite free to express an opinion I have always held. I don't have to pipe a different tune. I am not asking the members of this house to share this view, but it is one I have always held and which I shall continue to uphold.

Mr. LALONDE: An opinion which we respect.

Mr. HEON: Thank you, sir. By referring indeed to the principles I set out in the 1938 by-election in Argenteuil, to the speeches I made at the Conservative party convention in Ottawa in 1938, in Winnipeg before the board of trade, in Toronto on two occasions, in Montreal at the Monument National, at Victoriaville, at Carillon and on two occasions in this house in 1939, it will be seen that my views have remained unchanged. Not later than last year, during the last election, I upheld this proposition before the electors. There is logic, therefore, in my attitude toward the measure now before us, and I am not revising my opinions. Let my constituents be my judges.

The stand taken by the province of Quebec, through its present government, on the procedure for amending our constitution is also mine, and I have no hesitation in joining them on this point; I believe that in amending our constitution, we would be creating an extremely dangerous precedent, for the following reasons. And by the way, I wish to point this out to my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Lalonde), who is listening to me.

Mr. LALONDE: I am listening very carefully.

Mr. HEON: I am not one of those who think that the province of Quebec should entrench itself within the walls of an absolute irredentism and be adamant on questions of details as on questions of legal principles.

Is it not true that we could better show the present situation in its proper perspective by reviewing the bargainings which preceded confederation? It can not be said that Quebec is a province like the others and has no more rights than those which were granted to the other provinces of Canada. At the time of confederation, Quebec was dealing as an equal with the other provinces and was representing a nationality more than a territorial entity. It was a compromise between two races rather than an exclusively legislative arrangement. To-day our compatriots seem to persist in this reasoning which might be expressed in the following words: You want to amend the constitution in a way that might or might not be advantageous to us, but the precedent you are creating will mean that there is no limitation in the constitution, and that you could always amend it without our assent.

We are concerned and worried about the rights that have been conferred on us and for which Cartier had to fight unceasingly; as long as no written guarantee excluding any possibility of amendment is given us that our rights shall forever be safeguarded as regards religion, language, customs and culture, and administration based on our financial, economic and cultural requirements as a race, we shall have to resist any proposed amendment to our constitution, because once we are headed along that path no one can tell when we shall stop. Could we not make the following suggestion: Consult us officially or otherwise, but consult us; you will obtain our approval upon whatever course is likely to help this country, but consult us, because we are one of the parties to the pact; we signed it honestly and generously. Be as honest and generous in requesting our consent to the amendments you are seeking.

To my mind, no political matter is involved in the proposition now before us and I dismiss the political angle altogether; it is rather a recurrence of the old problem of the right which the provinces who were parties to the pact have to concur in the constitutional amendment which is proposed.

There may be an immediate political advantage in the measure now contemplated, and this advantage will remain, provided our birth rate is maintained and provided we are not at some future time overwhelmed by a tide of immigration into our midst. However, should we countenance the precedent alas already established, that the British North America Act may be amended without the consent of the contracting parties, who knows but that some day a hostile group or government will not avail itself of the precedents which we have established, and change the compact to our detriment?

For, after all, there is no provision in the British North America Act to protect us against this movement of hostility. The act makes no difference between purely administrative matters and others that we consider essential to our free development. Therefore let us at once take a definite stand. Let us say to our English-speaking fellow-citizens: Give us the solemn and written assurance that you will not prevent the expansion of French-speaking Canadians throughout the country; steep yourselves in the spirit which guided the fathers of confederation, and all will be well. You wish us to preserve national unity? We are ready and willing to do so; but please respect the spirit of the confederation compact. We are your loyal partners, but never forget that a partnership cannot endure or prosper unless its members preserve harmony and frankly and openly cooperate in the success of the undertaking. In conclusion, may I point out that last night in this house, the right hon. Minister of Justice, after admitting that from the legal point of view, section 133 of the British North America Act, bearing on the rights of the French language, could be settled—"dealt with" is used in the English text—without the consent of the provincial legislatures, spoke most eloquently of the intrinsic guarantees of human conscience. If we could forever be assured that the conscience of humanity would always remain as fair as that of the hon. members of this house, if we could, without fear, take it for granted that this same human conscience would always be guided by the uprightness and integrity which are the characteristics of our present leaders and particularly of the right hon. Minister of Justice, we might feel entirely secure in depending on it.

Unfortunately, the annals of history afford us too little assurance in that respect and record too many capricious and sudden changes of front in this same human conscience. To its eternal shame, the conscience of humanity, too often stirred up by agitators devoid of all sense of remorse or honour, opened the lengthy history of Christianity by crucifying Christ, martyrizing its apostles and disciples, and burning Joan of Arc at the stake; in modern times, it has begotten two world wars and may be sowing the seeds of a third.

Ask Poland, the small Balkan states, the masses of India and China, and the famished populations of Europe what they think of the conscience of humanity. And in our own country, what did it achieve under the guidance of certain leaders? It tolerated the hanging of the leaders of the rebellion of 1837 at Pied-du-Courant, in Montreal; it saw the exile of our present prime minister's grandfather who wanted to establish responsible government; it witnessed the hanging of Louis

Riel; the shameful trial of Honoré Mercier, the violation of the spirit of confederation in the settlement of the school question in Manitoba, the infamous rule 17 of Ontario school laws, the acts of the Anderson government in Saskatchewan and the staccato of machine guns in the streets of Quebec in 1917.

Considering all these facts, and speaking strictly for myself under my responsibility as a private member, and because I belong to the French-Canadian minority, I prefer the security and the guarantee of a statute held as sacred, to the goodwill of the future generations who will come after us in this house and to the human conscience which might inspire their acts.

There is an amendment before the house, and I do not have to look for its motives; it calls for previous consultation with the provinces; it represents my opinion on this point, and I will support it.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg) (Text): In the few minutes remaining before six o'clock I should like to refer briefly to the remarks made on redistribution by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on Thursday, June 13, at page 2473 of Hansard. In this speech the minister replied to certain statements made by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) and dealt at some length with conditions in the maritime provinces. In many respects his statements about the maritimes were correct, and I know the minister had no intention of being derogatory. The spirit of his remarks was constructive, and, knowing him as I do, I am certain that what he said about the maritimes was meant to be in a friendly and helpful vein. However, he made several statements which gave rise to the impression that the maritimes do not stand on their own feet. The unfortunate thing is that some local maritime papers chose to interpret these remarks as being derogatory. In an editorial, dated June 17, 1946, the Halifax Herald dealt with the minister's remarks and emphasized the fact that he accused the maritime provinces of lacking vision and initiative. It classifies the minister's statement with those made a few years ago by the minister's predecessor from Saskatchewan who said:

> The chief ambitions of the maritime people were birth, marriage, death and a free ride on the intercolonial railway.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who said that?

Mr. WINTERS: Mr. Dunning. Most emphatically I do not wish to adopt a provincial stand on behalf of the maritime provinces. I for one have always deplored that attitude and have said so in this house. Neither is it the feeling of the majority of people in the maritimes, that they want to be provincial. They are Canadians and they want to be regarded as Canadians in every sense of the word. On the other hand, they want equally to enjoy all the benefits of Canadian citizenship on the same basis as Canadians eleswhere in Canada.

I think this house will agree history shows that maritimers, man for man, have been able to stand on their own feet in Canada or in any other country on the same basis as their fellow-Canadians. While I do not deny that vision and initiative are required wherever success is to be achieved, our problems do not all lend themselves to solution by this simple formula.

At page 2478 of Hansard the minister said that if we in the maritimes had the kind of vision as to what this country can become, we can have plants running twelve months a year. In the field of manufacturing I have known of many instances where we have been able to compete on even terms or better with our central Canadian competitors in the production of commodities.

On motion of Mr. Winters the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 20, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION AND SOUTHAM NEWSPAPERS LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday I directed a question to the Minister of Labour with respect to the typographical dispute. The minister's reply, which is recorded on page 2633 of Hansard, reads in part as follows:

> The typographical union insists that its own general rules, including local union rules, must become a part of the collective agreement with every employer with whom such agreement is negotiated. One provision of the general rules of the union is that such rules are not subject to arbitration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman's statement of the question of privilege should be brief and to the point.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am stating it as briefly as I can. I am simply reading one paragraph of the minister's statement which I regard as giving me a right to raise a question of privilege. The rest of the paragraph reads:

One provision of the general rules of the union is that such rules are not subject to arbitration. In view—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had risen to a question of privilege and I did not hear Your Honour refuse to hear that question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: I asked the hon. gentleman to follow the rules of the house and to state his question briefly and to the point, and he started to repeat what he had previously said.

Mr. KNOWLES: My question of privilege refers to the fact that the minister made a statement, which I was endeavouring to quote, in which he claimed that the union's laws are in conflict with the labour relations regulations. That is not so. My point of privilege is that ever since January 31 the proposed typographical union agreement has included these words:

—except in so far as arbitration and the results thereof are compulsory under Canadian law.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to resume his seat. That is not a question of privilege.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I would like to rise on a question of privilege and say that my hon. friend is playing low politics.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Presenting reports by standing and select committees.

Mr. KNOWLES: On a question of privilege, I insist that the Minister of Labour withdraw the statement he made that I am playing low politics. I am just placing on the record—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe I have been very generous with the hon. gentleman in permitting him to make his statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would point out that my hon. friend is drawing to the attention of the house a statement made by the Minister of Labour which he claims is a reflection upon what he himself had said.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already told the hon. gentleman that he is out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is another point of order entirely. The Minister of Labour accused my hon. friend of playing low politics. That is against the rules of the house, and I ask the minister to withdraw it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will withdraw it and say that my hon. friend was playing high politics.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope hon. members will help the Speaker keep decorum in the house and preserve its dignity. I have already said that the hon. member did not have a question of privilege. He has stated what he thought was a question of privilege, and I would now ask the house to resume its business.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Minister of Labour said that the hon. member was playing low politics. He now says that he was playing high politics, and I ask the minister to withdraw those words.

Mr. MACKENZIE: "High politics" is quite parliamentary.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Minister of Labour cannot act the buffoon and get away with it. He is doing too much of it.

RADIO BROADCASTING—ADVERTISING PROGRAMMES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation banned or refused advertising programmes offered to it at any time during the past year?
2. If so, which programmes were banned or refused?
3. Why was each refused?
4. By whom was the decision made in each case?

Mr. McCANN: I understand that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has already been supplied with the information asked for in this question. If that is so, would he be good enough to withdraw his question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I received a letter from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation giving me in confidence some information. I suggest that the question be allowed to remain on the order paper because, while the information I received was accepted in confidence, it is no answer to the question.

Question stands.

HOUSING—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. McKAY:

1. How many houses (a) have been constructed; (b) are under construction, in Saskatchewan under terms of the National Housing Act?

Mr. McILRAITH: Figures are not available to show numbers of houses constructed or under construction at a given date. However, the following loans have been approved for home owners and builders for sale under the National Housing Acts in the province of Saskatchewan up to May 31, 1946:

	Approved Loans	Residential Units	Total Amount of Loans
National Housing Act, 1938	91	162	$ 446,351
National Housing Act, 1944	205	205	875,500
Total	296	367	$1,321,851

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL—SPECIAL EXCHANGE FUND ACCOUNT

Mr. ADAMSON:

1. What was the sum realized from transactions in gold of the special exchange fund account of the foreign exchange control board, for the fiscal years of 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945? How is this revenue derived?

2. What revenue accrued from the marketing charge of thirty-five cents per ounce on gold bullion received from Canadian producers for the years 1935 to 1945 inclusive?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. The following figures giving revenues from transactions in gold by the foreign exchange control board are taken from the report of the board tabled in the House of Commons on June 5, 1946:

Calendar Year	Amount
1941	$ 8,503 42
1942	-65,255 49*
1943	263,757 17
1944	113,502 01
1945	270,013 98

* This was a temporary book loss reversed in 1943.

Gold is carried on the books of the exchange fund at a price based upon the realizable value in New York which allows for shipping expense and handling charges made by the United States government. Opportunities arise from time to time to sell gold to other countries at a slightly more favourable price and these earnings arise from this source.

2.

Fiscal Year ended March 31	Amount

FARM MACHINERY

DISTRIBUTION FROM WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware that there are pools of farm machinery in western Canada and that the machinery is being held and not distributed? Is he aware that this machinery is urgently needed by veterans? Is he aware that in some cases—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not in order in giving information. His question should be directed to receiving information.

Mr. WRIGHT: In view of the fact that in some cases it is proposed to reship this machinery back to the United States, will the minister make the necessary inquiries and issue the necessary orders to see that this machinery is distributed in Canada and not sent back to the United States?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make inquiries and find out what the situation is. I do not know what action will be taken in regard to it because I do not know what the facts are.

REDISTRIBUTION

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT AS TO RULES FOR READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. St. Laurent for an address to His Majesty the King praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to effect an amendment to the British North America Act with respect to readjustment of the representation in the House of Commons, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when the debate was adjourned I was referring to remarks made about the maritime provinces during this debate on redistribution. In particular I was attempting to rectify an erroneous impression that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was speaking in a derogatory vein when he stated the the maritimes needed vision and initiative more than a new system of redistribution in order to cure certain of their ills.

I have no quarrel with the resolution on redistribution. It would appear to be in the best interests of Canada. I cannot, however, support the amendment. Much has been said in a legal vein as to whether or not the federal government can take the action it proposes to take without consulting the provinces, but in the final analysis this house would appear to accept in general the principles set forth in the resolution.

I do not feel that we in the maritimes have any grounds to fear that the proposed plan for redistribution, if adopted, will react against us.

My last remarks before the adjournment yesterday dealt with the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), at page 2478 of Hansard, to the effect that with clearer vision as to this country's future, we in the maritimes can have plants running twelve months a year, and sell our goods to central and western Canada.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I had started before the adjournment yesterday to place before the house the fact that although in many instances we are able to compete on even terms or better with our central Canadian competitors in the production of commodities, we have lost orders because when freight rates are added, the price of our goods laid down in central or western Canada is greater than the price for the same goods manufactured closer to their destination. We most certainly do not lack the vision to recognize this problem. We have realized for years that it is working to our disadvantage, but neither vision nor initiative has altered the situation appreciably. The Minister of Agriculture knows full well that the same conditions are encountered by the western provinces, and British Columbia, in particular, faces problems that are not unlike those we face in the maritimes.

The following statement made by the transportation commission of the maritime board of trade crystallizes the disadvantage we are suffering in the maritimes because of our geographical location:

> Inasmuch as transportation exerts a tremendous influence upon the location of economic enterprise, it appears that some recent studies on the economy of the maritimes from the post-war viewpoint have failed to give sufficient weight to the effects of the transportation factor in the locational pattern of industry.
> The tendency has been for manufacturing to be located close to the markets, away from the raw materials due to the "value of service" principle in railway rate-making, which results in increased charges as fabrication progresses.

If vision is required in solving this problem generally, then I would say to the house that it is vision on a broad Canadian basis, and not vision on the part of the maritime provinces alone. However, when considering our transportation problem, maritimers should not blame the Minister of Agriculture in any respect. In fact, it was he who was chiefly responsible for the arrangement whereby feed is shipped into the maritimes free of cost, to circumvent this problem of transportation.

The minister suggested that fuller advantage be taken of water routes in bringing our goods to central and western Canada. At page 2478 of Hansard the minister recommended that the maritimes use the water routes by way of Hudson bay and the St. Lawrence river to place their goods on the central Canadian and western markets. It is true that developments in science have brought us to the point where it may now be possible to visualize longer navigation seasons on these two routes, but if we are to take a practical view we must realize that we are still confronted with difficulties, in that the St. Lawrence river and Hudson bay are inaccessible for many months of the year. I would say that vision and initiative of the magnitude required to make these water routes accessible on a year-round practical basis are not yet available to this generation. Science and other developments simply have not gone that far.

In the maritimes we feel we have the same natural endowments as Canadians elsewhere, and we are just as willing and eager to apply them; but the fact is that to achieve the same results as people in central Canada, it has been and still is necessary for us to bring to bear on the problem a disproportionate amount of vision, initiative, facilities, abilities and so on, to compensate for our geographical location. The alleviation of our disadvantages is a matter of cooperation on a federal or national scale; and it is here that we find ourselves in the ruck, because vision and initiative are not always applied to as great an extent as we in the maritimes sometimes wish. When discussing the matter of lack of vision and initiative we can accuse central Canada, and sometimes the federal government, just as easily and with as much justification as they have for any accusation they direct at us. However, it is not a matter of accusation; it is a case for cooperation. We must regard it as a Canadian and not a regional problem.

I would invite the attention of the house to the June 15 issue of the Financial Post and commend it to readers; it may be that they will get some idea from this issue that we in the maritimes attempt to show some initiative. The article is entitled:

Maritimes Streamline Trade Methods, Modernize Production to Gain Markets

It states in the first two paragraphs:

Maritimers have long ago come to learn that their economic well-being hinges largely on the kind of trade agreements Ottawa makes with other world countries and they are perhaps more conscious of that fact to-day than ever. But, with world trade policies still in the making, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island aren't waiting for Ottawa to put them on their post-war feet or otherwise.

They are taking direct action to stimulate trade by producing better quality goods at competitive prices, new and more advanced techniques, a higher standard of products and greater continuity of supply.

May I quote one more paragraph, to show that somebody else thinks the problem is not purely a maritime one, but one for cooperation by Canadians everywhere:

Because of geographical disadvantages to trade with the rest of Canada, maritimers must look to the sea and to the fifteen million potential customers to the south. But they must gain access to these markets on more favourable terms than in the past if the economy is really to develop. And this depends on national and international trade policies over which they can have no effective control. Hence the maritimers naturally hope that Ottawa will give them the appropriate tariff framework within which their export economy can properly breathe.

It is recognized that the problem is a difficult one, and I do not pretend to know all the answers, but I do not wish the impression to go unchallenged that we are in the predicament in which we find ourselves simply because of lack of initiative and vision. We know the difficulties and fully appreciate them. We know that we are at a disadvantage in selling to central Canadian and western markets, but on the other hand, I would emphasize that we are just as fully aware that we are favourably situated to place goods on foreign markets, by virtue of our position on the Atlantic seaboard. We have the vision to know that what we need, and want, is freer access to these markets through the medium of favourable trade agreements and tariff structures.

This is an old story, and I won't labour it further at this time. I would say, however, that we have recently made available to ravaged foreign countries vast sums in the form of loans, to make it possible for these unfortunate countries to purchase goods produced in Canada. We in the maritime provinces are more favourably situated than anybody else to deal with these foreign markets. This is one instance in which this government can apply not only vision but a fair measure of justice on its own part, and recognize that while we are at a normal disadvantage in manufacturing for the Canadian market, we have a decided natural advantage with respect to foreign markets. Those concerned with making goods available for foreign consumption through the medium of these loans should ensure that orders are placed accordingly.

In conclusion I would say that the majority of maritimers interpreted the minister's statements in the helpful spirit in which they were given. It is hoped these few remarks will help to clear up the wrong impression that has developed in the minds of some of our citizens.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the subject before us is recognized as one of great importance, and the debate upon it has been extremely interesting, but it does seem to me that it has wandered far afield and that it has been longer than necessary in view of the clear-cut proposal which is before us. Having said that in my view the debate has gone longer than necessary, it behooves me to state my view on the matter very briefly, and I shall do so.

The proposition before us has just two points, and they are direct and specific. The first relates to the method of representation of the Canadian people in this parliament. The second relates to the question as to how we should go about making any changes if it is necessary to do so to achieve the best method of representation.

With reference to the first question, we all seem agreed that representation in a democratic parliament such as ours should be by population. It has been argued in a good many speeches during the course of this debate that in the past we have not had exactly proportionate representation at any time, nor have we such representation at the present time. That is quite true, bearing in mind the points which have been made. But the fact is that the resolution before us comes closer to representation by population than anything that has yet been proposed in this parliament or to the Canadian people. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the answer is simple—that we in this parliament ought to vote for the resolution.

I confess that I have found it difficult to follow all the arguments which have been made by speakers who professed their loyalty to this principle and yet have suggested other ways and other figures which should be arrived at than those which would follow from the application of this principle. But there it is. It is very simple. We believe in representation by population. The formula before us comes closer to that than anything yet proposed. Therefore we in this group are in support of the resolution.

I join with those who have expressed the view that, after the resolution has been carried and the British North America Act amended accordingly, we should pay attention more closely to that principle of representation by population. I agree that there are other considerations to be thought about, such as small provinces like Prince Edward Island and areas like the northwest territories. I agree also that there is something to be said for a smaller population per constituency in large areas such as in some of the rural parts of our country. But I suggest on the other hand that that idea has been carried too far. In a province such as my own, for example, where we have constituencies varying in population all the way from 22,000 up to 70,000. That wide discrepancy obtains not only as between rural and urban constituencies but amongst rural constituencies themselves. For example, there is one rural constituency in Manitoba with a population now of 22,000; there is another with a population of 55,000. However, the resolution before us does not prevent adjustment of that kind of situation, and therefore, even from the position I am taking, one can have no quarrel with it. And so on the score of representation by population we in this group are in favour of the resolution.

The other question before us involved in this proposition is the method of making a change if we are agreed that change is necessary, and under that heading we have a mass of legal arguments and involved consideration of the question whether confederation is a compact, or whether Canada is a nation. I suggest that we should realize not only the force of the argument put forward the other day by my colleague the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), that what was achieved in 1867 was a nation, but also that the people of Canada to-day think of this country not as a collection of sovereign states but as a nation; and on that basis we should act in this matter.

I agree with those who contend that the amendment of our constitution should be in Canadian hands, and also that the formula for amending it should be definitely worked out and laid down. But pending that, I do not think we should act in any way that would make us less than a nation. We should not return to the status which this land held when it was a collection of individual colonies. Rather we should regard this matter as one that is of concern to all the people of Canada as Canadians, and one that should be decided in the place where the people are represented as Canadians.

The Minister of Justice made one statement which has elicited replies from various members which, I suggest, has taken the discussion a little wide of the mark. I refer to his suggestion that the provinces are represented here by the members from the various provinces. In reply to that, hon. members have made the statement that they do not feel that they represent their provinces, and so the argument has gone back and forth on that point. What we should realize is that in this house we do not represent provinces. We do not, if we appreciate our position correctly, represent our people on a provincial basis. We represent Canadians. I do not presume to represent the province of Manitoba. I represent 60,000 Canadians who happen to live within the province of Manitoba, and my concern is to represent them with respect to their Canadian interests. Their Canadian interests are decided here in this parliament, and we should think of the matter on that basis. On the score of method as well as on the score of basis of representation, the resolution hits the mark and therefore the vote of this house should be in favour of it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Is the hon. member not aware that when I spoke of the provinces being represented here I particularized my remarks very carefully? I stated, as appears at page 1936 of Hansard:

> Another question, which has arisen each time there has been any move to ask for an amendment of the British North America Act, has been whether or not the provinces had been consulted and had agreed to it. I think that when the question is put in that form it is ambiguous. The provinces, that is to say the people of the provinces, are all represented in this parliament, and for the purposes of such matters as are confided to the jurisdiction of this parliament it is by those representatives here that the people of the provinces speak.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad that the Minister of Justice has interjected into the record that quotation from his speech. I recognize that in that statement he made the point I am trying to make. But my contention is that the position he took has been misunderstood and it has been thought of by some members in the house in the terms I suggested earlier.

One other comment I wish to make is this. It is deplorable that sectionalism should have crept into the debate to the extent that it has. Sectionalism has been with us not only in the speches of some members from the different provinces who have tried to state the case for more members for their particular provinces; it is also involved in the whole argument that the matter should be referred to the several provinces. My objection to sectionalism and my desire for everything possible in the direction of Canadian unity is not just for the purpose of intellectual tidiness, but rather because I feel that nothing can more successfully retard social and economic progress in this country than the attempt to keep us divided. We have had examples of this in connection with the dominion-provincial conference, which has been referred to so often in this debate. For several months now the Canadian people have been hoping that, in consequence of the proposals made to that conference, a better old age pension scheme and a health insurance plan were just around the corner. Maybe they are still around the corner, but it becomes a very long corner because of provincial superintendence, if I may use the phrase of the Minister of Justice, over national affairs. The whole question of social security, labour legislation and other matters in these fields are of concern to all citizens of this land. These things are our concern as Canadians, right across the country, and to the extent that the forces of reaction can keep us arguing over provincial rights, and can keep us divided on provincial, racial or any other lines we delay the possibility of dealing with these important social and economic problems. I hope that in future debates in this house we shall give serious thought to what sectionalism does to the expectations of the Canadian people for a better life, for better social and economic conditions. To keep sectionalism alive is surely, in this day and age, unthinkable. We all feel that the united nations organization will succeed only if we surrender a measure of our national sovereignty and become one world, and surely we should no longer have to argue the point that within this country we are not nine separate sovereign states, but one Canada, the main concern of which should be the best possible life for all Canadians.

Mr. W. F. KUHL (Jasper-Edson): Inasmuch as I have been interested for some time in one phase of the discussion on this question there are a few thoughts to which I should like to give expression, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the house, that I shall endeavour in doing so to be as brief as I possibly can, and to the point. As I have said on previous occasions, in discussing this matter I have never presumed to pose as a constitutional or legal expert. On each occasion on which I have spoken on this question I have said that I considered the issues which were involved were those with which every individual citizen of Canada should be familiar; and it is only the fundamental and basic principles that I wish to concern myself with in this discussion to-day.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) raised the essential principle which is involved in this discussion. He pointed out that in the government's endeavour to eliminate an injustice with respect to the distribution of dominion seats, a fundamental principle was involved, namely, a method of amending the British North America Act. I believe that that principle raises the whole fundamental question of how we are to proceed with amendments to the British North America Act in the future. Certainly this is not going to be the last occasion on which discussions are to arise as to ways and means of amending the British North America Act.

One question that comes to my mind—it has been raised by many hon. members who have already spoken—is this: Why does the British North America Act not contain a definite procedure which can be followed in amending the act? Why has the British North America Act no provision of that kind? Speaking on this point, the Minister of Fisheries

(Mr. Bridges) suggested that it was a mere oversight on the part of the fathers of confederation. From what little reading I have done on the subject I personally cannot credit them with being guilty of an oversight upon such a fundamental question. The hon. member for Eglinton went further and suggested that it was because the fathers of confederation could not agree. He did not support his contention with any evidence, which I should like to have seen him do. From my study and reading I feel that the reason there is no provision in the British North America Act for its amendment is far more fundamental than the reasons advanced by these two hon. gentlemen.

I would suggest that the whole constitutional position of this country is on an unsound basis, and that accounts for the fact that there is no provision in the act for its amendment. There are many things with which we are dealing in these days which indicate that. On every occasion that an amendment must be made, a debate arises of the kind that we have been having for the past few weeks. We have the question of the flag, appeals to the privy council, the matter of the disallowance of dominion and provincial legislation, the matter of an appointed upper house, and so on. These are all anomalies in our constitutional position. They, and the lack of any recognized way of amending the British North America Act, are symptomatic of the fact that there is something fundamentally not right in our whole constitutional basis.

We proclaim that we are a nation, that we are sovereign, that we are politically independent of the imperial parliament. We have been proclaiming that ever since the passage of the statute of Westminster in 1931, and yet all these anomalies prevail to-day. Why are we confronted with this situation? Why is it that we are discussing the matter of adopting a distinctive national flag? Why were not these things taken care of in 1931? Why were not all these anomalies eliminated then. That is a pertinent point. It indicates that there is something fundamentally unsound in our whole constitutional set-up; otherwise we should not be confronted with these situations from time to time.

If we are to endeavour to lay down definite procedure for the amendment of the British North America Act in the future, whatever we do will have to be determined by what took place in 1867. Whatever we do to attempt to rectify the situation must be done in the light of what took place in 1867 at the passage of the British North America Act.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) made some points with which I should like to deal. He made the statement that at the time of confederation the provinces were not recognized as autonomous units. His exact words were, as reported at page 2617 of Hansard:

> These were colonies exercising delegated powers under the full control of the imperial parliament or the crown advised by its ministers. There is no doubt that the members of those provincial colonial governments rose above the stature of the institutions which could no longer contain them, and they succeeded in founding a Canadian nation. But they had no power to do so by contract or treaty or agreement of their own.

Does it not logically follow from that that Canada did not become a federal union in 1867? Certainly in the consummation of a federal union and a federal arrangement, federation presupposes a condition of sovereignty, and if the condition of sovereignty must precede confederation or federation, then how does that harmonize with the position which the minister claimed prevailed prior to 1867? So I think I am arguing logically when I suggest that if the provinces were not free and independent, as the minister says they were; if they were dependencies in 1867, then that which was consummated was not a federal union but rather a united colony. I think that is completely in harmony with opinions which can be brought to bear; it is completely in harmony with the preamble of the act itself, and is also in harmony with the Interpretation Act of 1889, which says that the expression "colony" shall mean—

> . . . any of Her Majesty's dominions, exclusive of the British islands and of British India; and where parts of such dominions are under both a central legislature and local legislatures, all parts under the central legislature shall for the purpose of this definition be deemed to be one colony.

So if the minister's statement is correct and in accordance with the true position at that time, the condition that has prevailed ever since has been that the united colonies have been dependencies. Since that must have been so, the question I should like to ask is in what manner and by what process has Canada become a federal union and this parliament a federal parliament. A federal union and a federal parliament could be consummated only through an agreement reached by the provinces as sovereign entities. Therefore the whole constitutional position is left in a confused state, so far as I am able to understand it. On the one hand we have an act by which we are governing ourselves, which is actually an imperial statute and not a constitution proper. On the other hand we contend that we are a nation independent of the imperial parliament; yet there is nothing in the records to indicate the manner in which a federal system has arisen.

The only conclusion I can draw from this situation, therefore, is that when the authority which the imperial parliament exercised over the people of Canada was surrendered in 1931 through the statute of Westminster, it was surrendered to the provinces of Canada; for it is contrary to natural law that the imperial parliament could create any federal government in Canada. A federal government can be created only by the provinces which compose the union. Consequently I feel justified in asserting that the authority previously held by the imperial parliament over the colony of Canada has now been relinquished to the provinces of Canada, and remains there until such time as they create a federal union and a federal government of their own choice. If there were an agreement or compact among the provinces of Canada, surely a certified copy of it should be in the records, with the signatures of the appropriate authorities; but there is none. Hence the confused situation that exists in this country. We are deemed to govern ourselves by an imperial statute, while at the same time claiming that we are a nation, independent, free and sovereign. If we are a nation proper, then surely it follows that we should have the right and there should be a specific process to amend our constitution, but that is not so. We still proceed as we are doing under this measure, to the imperial parliament, petitioning them to grant us a particular amendment.

So far as rectifying this whole situation is concerned, I do not agree that it should be undertaken by this parliament, by a combination of this parliament and the provincial premiers, or by any small representative body. I believe the issues involved in removing the anomalies which exist in our whole constitutional position, including the matter of amending our own constitution, are of such fundamental importance that the people of Canada as a whole must be consulted. As far as my reading and information go the people of Canada have never been consulted on the British North America Act as a constitution. If the British North America Act is regarded as an imperial statute, they could not have been consulted in 1867; it could not be expected that they would be consulted. If it is an imperial statute, and we are to function under a proper constitution, then surely logic dictates that such constitution should be submitted to the people of Canada for ratification; and until such time as that has been done, how can it be asserted that the people are responsible for the circumstances which prevail?

I suggest that the only democratic way to take care of methods of amending the constitution in future is by consulting all the people of Canada. The people of Australia certainly were consulted on their constitution. They were permitted to vote by ballot; in fact they voted on their constitution twice, and it did not become legal and binding until such time as a majority voted in favour of it. We in Canada claim that the British North America Act is our constitution, yet we have never been consulted on it. I have found no record to indicate that the people of Canada were ever consulted. Therefore how can it be said that there is in Canada a constitutional arrangement agreed to by the people of Canada? I suggest, therefore, that we shall never proceed in a businesslike manner, we shall always have debates and arguments and differences of opinion on this subject of amending the British North America Act, until we as a nation lay down some formula and some technique which we can follow logically from begining to end.

On previous occasions when discussing this subject I quoted at length some of those who gave evidence before the special committee on the British North America Act in 1935. Some good advice was given before that committee, and I cannot understand why parliament, having set up the committee, having summoned those who were recognized as constitutional authorities, having had those persons suggest ways and means of taking care of this situation, has never acted. Here we are to-day still debating how we are to proceed. As I say, we have had already the benefit of the deliberations of that parliamentary committee before which outstanding constitutional authorities gave their opinions and made their recommendations, and still we are carrying on in this fashion.

As I have said on previous occasions, the most democratic and best advice given on that occasion was given by Doctor Beauchesne, the worthy Clerk of this house. I cannot understand why the government, this parliament and the provincial legislatures have not acted on that advice. I dislike repetition in myself just as much as I dislike it in anyone else, but as this is such a fundamental matter I feel I must place on record once more the suggestions made by Doctor Beauchesne with respect to removing the anomaly with which we are now concerning ourselves, as well as other anomalies which exist in our constitutional position. I should like to quote from page 126 of the proceedings of the special committee on the British North America Act which sat in 1935, where Doctor Beauchesne is reported as follows:

—the Statute of Westminster has altered our status . . .

The time has come in my humble opinion, when the British North America Act, except as to minority rights, should be transformed and a new constitution more in conformity with present conditions should be adopted. Amendments here and there would be mere patchwork which could not last. The people of 1935 are different from those of 1867. What we want is a new constitution . . .

The new constitution must leave nobody with a grievance. A spirit of conciliation should predominate. For these reasons, the task must be entrusted to an independent body in which all the elements of the country will be represented. I therefore beg to suggest an imposing constituent assembly formed of eminent men coming from all parts of Canada. Provincial conferences, attended by a few ministers meeting behind closed doors, would hardly satisfy public opinion. The debate should be public . . .

I should like to interpolate there and say that I think that is the most commendable suggestion as to how to deal with this anomalous situation. It is in entire conformity with democratic principles, and is certainly worthy of the support of the people of Canada. As Doctor Beauchesne indicates, the circumstances are of such a nature that this matter should not be considered by a small body of representatives of the provinces and the dominion; it should be considered by a constituent assembly elected by all the people of Canada and charged specifically to deal with this whole problem. Doctor Beauchesne went on to say:

I want the assembly to sit in a city in the west. It would not be necessary for a delegate to be a member of parliament or of a provincial legislature . . .

Then again on page 128 Doctor Beauchesne is reported as follows:

I would suggest that the assembly do not sit in Ottawa, in order that it may not have the appearance of being dominated, or even influenced by the dominion power; and, as the western provinces are of such paramount importance in the country, I suggest the best city for the representatives to gather in would be Winnipeg.

And again on page 131:

There have been many disputes about provincial rights since 1867, and it seems certain that when a new constitution is drawn up, the distribution of federal and provincial powers will have to be modified.

And again on page 135:

I think the time is ripe for a change in the constitution. I do not think you would need much publicity in order to draw to the attention of the people of this country that the British North America Act is inadequate.

And again on page 129:

Whether our country should be changed from a dominion to a kingdom is also a subject which might be discussed. I would suggest that the country should be called "the federated states of Canada."

[Mr. Kuhl.]

I consider that a comprehensive and all-inclusive suggestion as to how to rectify the present anomalies and confusing constitutional position. I cannot understand why the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the representatives of the provinces have not considered carrying out that proposal. This parliament appointed a special committee to study this subject, and here are the recommendations that were made. Surely there could not be a more democratic way to deal with it; consequently I again suggest and urge and recommend that at the earliest opportunity the suggestions of Doctor Beauchesne be implemented.

There could not be a more logical place in which to do that than the dominion-provincial conference. On the last occasion on which I spoke on this subject I said that I would be watching carefully to see what the delegates might have to say on this particular subject, but I must confess that I have been disappointed. I still hope that we may see the day when someone will take up Doctor Beauchesne's proposals and initiate action along that line. I believe it is only by adopting such a procedure that we can democratically and in the interests of all sections of Canada rectify the present unsatisfactory constitutional position.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu-Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, although this question has been under consideration for a number of sitting days, because of its importance I feel not at all disposed to apologize for expressing my views upon it. It has been said during this debate that the question under discussion is one of the most important that we have had to deal with over a very long period of time. I perfectly agree with that view. We are not to-day proposing to amend the Confederation Act of 1867 in the same manner and for the same purposes as we have done in the past. We are dealing to-day with the very foundation of the representation of the provinces in the dominion parliament. We are in a way affecting the basis or foundation of the pact of confederation which has been for a number of years now the source of our liberties and the source of all our powers, politically speaking, socially speaking, and nationally speaking. Therefore we should not approach such a problem without very serious consideration of the consequences of our action.

Being of this view, I regret that such a question has not been, from the very beginning, declared by the government and by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) a free question upon which all members of the House of Commons would be at liberty to express their own personal views and the views of the province which they represent in this house, without fear of being jeopardized in their relations with the party at present in power. This question is so important that it should be dealt with from a general, yes, from a national point of view, and not from the narrow point of view of a majority in this house or of a political party in power. It is too important a question to be left to the authority of the government in power or to a majority in this house.

As I said, by this resolution we are touching the very basis of our political, social, and national life, and nobody can say how far we are going to go along that line and what will be the consequences of our action.

It is unfortunate also, Mr. Speaker, that in relation to such an important problem as the amending of our constitution we should proceed in the same manner as if it were proposed that the house should sit on Wednesday night—by a simple resolution presented by a minister, and upon which there can be only one kind of debate, what we generally call a full-dress debate, when no questions can be asked of the minister introducing the resolution, and when no elucidation of any difficult point can be made. We are bound, when this resolution is submitted to a vote, to say yes or no without having had the opportunity of inquiring about the details of the motion and receiving definite answers from the minister, and without having had the advantage and benefit of the views of persons knowing something about constitutional law who are unable to express their views in the House of Commons because they are not members. It is unfortunate, I repeat, that an amendment to our constitution is to be made in such a manner.

It is unfortunate also that we have had propounded in this house from as high an authority as the distinguished Minister of Justice that we can do this without any regard to the views of the provinces whatever may be their interest in the matter. I know there are precedents. I have been a party man and a member of this house long enough to know the precedents that have been cited during this debate. But I contend that precedents such as those that have been referred to should not be the guiding rule when we are dealing with the very basis of the representation of the Canadian people in the House of Commons.

What we are doing now is not a repetition of the precedents that have been referred to. In those days there was no question of changing the basis of representation in the House of Commons. Exceptions were made to the general rule in favour of minorities. And when I speak of minorities I include small provinces in the Dominion of Canada, because, after all, they are minorities. Exceptions have been made to the general rule established in the constitution of 1867, and all the precedents mentioned provided for such exceptions being made to remedy a difficult situation existing with respect to the smaller provinces. But here we are changing the very basis of the representation in the house, and we discard the principles and ideas exposed when the act of 1867 was put into force and effect and as they have been interpreted since, on many occasions.

To say that Ottawa is the only authority to amend our constitution, even concerning matters in which the provinces may be interested, is in my humble judgment going a little bit too far. It was never in the mind of the fathers of confederation that the federal parliament would have authority, without the consent of the provinces, without even the courtesy of consulting them, to change dispositions of the act which are material to their welfare and which are essential to the preservation of their way of life, their traditions, laws and liberties.. It was never in the minds of the fathers of confederation that parliament would be vested with such wide authority.

And what is the consequence? We have heard the Minister of Justice say in reply to the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr Smith) that the federal parliament would have the authority to make representations to the imperial parliament to amend the constitution by wiping out section 133 of the British North America Act which protects the French language in this country, and that without consulting the provinces. That is one consequence of the theory which has been expounded by the Minister of Justice in this house, contrary to the views expressed by his distinguished predecessor, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, and all public men in Canada since 1867.

In all the discussions which took place in regard to amending the constitution it has always been contended by all parties that we could never touch the privileges of any province, of any race or any religion, without giving them the opportunity of being consulted and of expressing in detail their views on the proposition.

The Minister of Justice rested his case, if I understood him aright, on Professor Kennedy's work on constitutional law. Not later than an hour ago I happened to open the report of a committee which sat in 1935 to consider the constitution of Canada and the proposals for amendment and the extent of the respective jurisdictions under the act of 1867. What did Professor Kennedy contend? The minister made the argument that the federal parliament had alone the right to deal with redistribution because it was within the powers attributed to the house, but that we would have no right at all to deal with the rights reserved to the provinces by section 92. When Professor Kennedy appeared before the committee in 1935 he said clearly, in answer to questions put to him, that the federal parliament could make representations to the imperial parliament to amend the constitution even on matters covered by section 92, and defining the privileges and the authority of the provinces. So, if the federal case rests on the views of Professor Kennedy, we must conclude, from the proposal now before the house, that the federal authority claims in fact the right to invade provincial rights and to deprive the provinces of the jurisdiction and powers which were given to them by section 92 of the British North America Act.

If Ottawa enjoyed jurisdiction in matters of that kind, it would amount to the very thing which many Canadians were afraid of at the time of the passing of the act—legislative union. That interpretation would give the House of Commons the authority to deal with everything, including matters of education as well as matters of language and religion. I object to such an interpretation, and I do not want to see the federal authority have the power to deprive the provinces of even the least of the privileges which were given to them.

"Balkanize Canada"! This is a wrong expression which is being popularized because it is a nice-sounding term. Canada is what she is to-day because of the strength of the different provinces, because Canada is a confederation and not a country governed solely by the authority which legislates in Ottawa.

Let us see, Mr. Speaker, how the new theory is applied in the field of practical politics. The contention is that there is no necessity to consult the provinces, that the provinces have no right to dictate to the government in such a matter, that they have no authority to express their views on such a question. I say that it was not the case in 1943. In that year the federal parliament listened to the voice of two provinces, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and the resolution which was then presented to the house, to postpone redistribution until after the war, was passed at the request and at the insistence of those two provinces. It is to the credit of the ministers who represented Saskatchewan and Manitoba in the cabinet that such a thing was done. The government then showed that they were ready to listen to the voice of two provinces, and the ministers from these provinces indicated that they were not only representing Canada as a whole but were thinking first of their own provinces. They insisted upon obtaining the postponement of redistribution in 1943 against the will of the province of Quebec. Sometimes I envy the courage and solidarity of the representatives of the other provinces, and I wish that we in the province of Quebec had the same amount of solidarity and courage to claim what is our due and to insist on our privileges and our liberties.

"Balkanize Canada"! Is the British commonwealth of nations a Balkanized organization? The British commonwealth of nations is composed of nations who claim independence for themselves. The provinces can exert a certain amount of independence at least in the field which is allotted to them, and to do so is not to Balkanize Canada in any way, shape or form. The opposite would be centralization. And what has centralization done to the world° It gave Mussolini to Italy; it gave Hitler to Germany. That is the result of centralization. In the centralized organization the value of the individual disappears; he is absorbed in the great mass of the majority, and his identity and personality are lost.

It has been contended that we who come from the different provinces represent the provinces. I claim that we do not represent the provinces. We represent constituencies in the Dominion of Canada, but we do not speak for the provinces as such. We have not the authority to speak for the provinces. We can speak as members for the constituencies which have done us the honour of electing us to this house, but we are not representing the provinces. We are members of the federal parliament coming from different sections of the country, but, I repeat, we cannot speak for the provinces. It would be a little boastful on our part to say that we alone can speak for the provinces, that we alone have the proper light on the general problems affecting the provinces and the country as a whole. That is a mistaken view.

I submit that the constitution of 1867 is a document—call it a statute if you will; call it a pact or a compact—it is a document that must be taken in its entirety and cannot be torn apart so that we can say that on a particular section of the law of 1867 we are masters and can do what it pleases us to do, while on other sections of the pact of 1867, the provinces have the authority. That is a mistaken attitude. We have to accept the pact of 1867, or the statute of 1867, as a whole or discard it. It has been established after many conferences, and it is the result of a compromise, even if it is now in the form of a statute.

I know it has been argued by the very pleasant Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges), and by the distinguished Minister of Justice that we could deal with certain sections which are more clearly within our jurisdiction, and not touch others. May I repeat here that the doctrine upon which the Minister of Justice rested his case is the doctrine of Mr. Kennedy, who says that we can even interfere with the powers that have been given the provinces.

That opinion or view, that the act of 1867 is a statute which can be amended by the imperial parliament on the recommendation of the federal parliament, in certain cases—to accept the views of some members who have spoken—without the consent of the provinces, is a view that is new. In the past it has always been contended that at least in matters of importance the provinces should be consulted particularly on questions in which they thought they had an interest. Even on the question of redistribution the provinces are interested. They are as much interested as the federal parliament.

It is true that the parliament at Ottawa has the authority to divide the country into a certain number of seats, to fix the limits of those seats; but the number of representatives in any province in Canada is something that concerns and interests all the provinces. The provinces have the right to be consulted when we change the number of their representatives or when we adopt measures which are capable of modifying their representation in this House of Commons.

This has been the interpretation of all parties. It has been indicated, though not too clearly or too definitely, that certain elements in certain provinces were interested in creating difficulties for the federal authority. Reference has been made to the present government of Quebec and the present government of Ontario. Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the representatives of all sections of Canada, that what has been said by these provincial premiers reflects the opinion of all the members of their respective legislatures. What has been said by the present premier of the province of Quebec has been said by the Liberals of the province of Quebec sitting in the provincial house.

The protest I am making now is the same protest I made in 1943. That protest I made in 1943 has been supported by as good a Liberal as the hon. Mr. Godbout, who was premier of Quebec, on June 22, 1943, when he wrote to the Prime Minister of Canada, as follows:

Dear Mr. King:

I regret to hear that you consider delaying the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons according to the 1941 census. This decennial readjustment is an essential part of the compact between the provinces out of which arose the Canadian confederation, and therefore the British North America Act cannot properly be amended, in this respect, without the assent of the provinces.

This is not the Hon. Mr. Duplessis or the Hon. Mr. Drew; it is the present leader of the Liberal forces in the province of Quebec, and the man who is followed by most of the members from the province of Quebec sitting in this house. He concludes this letter:

I have no doubt that due consideration will be given to these representations, and I sincerely hope that no attempt will be made to have the British North America Act amended against the wishes of this province.

These are the words of the then premier of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Godbout, in 1943; and what is being said by others to-day is only a repetition of what Mr. Godbout himself said in Quebec.

Later, in 1944, there was a debate on this question in the provincial legislature of Quebec and one of the brightest members of the Godbout government, Hon. Hector Perrier, a man of knowledge and experience, a talented man, said, according to the report:

(Translation):

Speaking on behalf of the government, the Hon. Hector Perrier emphasized the strong stand taken by the Prime Minister last year. He added that if the federal elections take place under a redistribution scheme contrary to the constitution, it will be our duty to protest.

(Text):

May I translate the quotation. Mr. Perrier agreed with the energetic attitude taken by the then premier of the province, Hon. Mr. Godbout, in the previous year. He added that if federal elections took place in accordance with a redistribution which is not in conformity with the constitution our duty will be to protest. That is the attitude and the language of a man of authority. It was the attitude of the Liberal party in Quebec, to which I have given the best years of my life and the strength of my health.

I am in favour of unity, but I am against unification. I am in favour of unity and union of all the contracting parties to the pact of confederation, but I want to respect the privileges, rights and liberties of all the component parts of the Dominion of Canada. This question is so important that it should have been submitted to a conference of some kind, or at least to a committee, before which all interested parties would have had the privilege of appearing and expressing their views.

It has been said that in framing the constitution of 1867 representation by population was contemplated. Yes, that was the object and the intent of the fathers of confederation. Have we that measure? We have not representation by population, having made many exceptions to the rule. At the present time we are going even a step farther. The representation of Prince Edward Island is to remain as it is. I am in favour of that, but in so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned it is not representation by population. So far as New Brunswick is concerned it is not representation by population. So far as Nova Scotia is concerned it is not representation by population. I say that the proposed amendment goes a step farther. The exceptions are not being disturbed by the present resolution, not at all. The step farther that we are taking is that we state here that if one of the provinces suffers a reduction in its population to such an extent that the number of representatives might be fewer than the number of senators, then the number of representatives in the House of Commons should be fixed at the number of representatives in the Senate, and that in any future calculation for the representation in the House of Commons the population of that or those provinces will not be taken into account. That is section 4 of the bill which it is proposed to send to the imperial parliament to amend our constitution. Therefore, if any of the maritime provinces or any other has a reduction in population and is exposed to a decrease in the number of representatives to a number fewer than the representatives in the senate, the population of those provinces will not be counted when ascertaining what population will justify electing a member to the House of Commons. We are told that this will be representation by population. It is not representation by population at all.

Some other people try to justify their attitude by saying that it is to correct an injustice. Such injustice could have been corrected otherwise. The injustice which Quebec suffered could have been corrected in 1943. Quebec agreed to the fixing of members for Prince Edward Island and the maritime provinces, but I do not want the same exception to the rule being applied to other provinces in Canada. But we are not correcting the injustice. We had only to listen to the speech delivered by the brilliant Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to learn that. He easily dispelled the illusion of some hon. members that this resolution had been prepared to correct an injustice. He said that was not the purpose of the resolution. Therefore he did not agree with those who try to find comfort in the proposed increase of the number of representatives from Quebec.

Yes, Quebec is being given eight more members, but we have to agree to Saskatchewan receiving three or four more than she is entitled to; to Manitoba having three more according to the B.N.A. Act as it stands. We have also to agree to Ontario having one more than she is at present electing, and to British Columbia having two more. We are to have eight additional members, but the rest of Canada are to have eleven more members. That is the consolation that is being offered and the illusion that is being created in order to get our friends to agree, and this without consulting the provinces. Parliament is presently doing what the Hon. Mr. Godbout and others opposed in 1943. We are agreeing to something which is the very opposite to what he proposed—consultation with the provinces.

I do not wish to proceed any longer. In closing, I wish to impress you, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues in the House of Commons, with the fact that in expressing my views I have been unable to be different from what I have always been.

I have been unable to avoid arguing my point without a certain amount of heat. It is my nature, my temperament; and to those of my party I can only say, as a justification or excuse, that they did not complain of my temperament in the past. They had no objection in the past when I was arguing my case in the same way as I am now presenting it to the House of Commons. My campaigns in the province of Quebec on behalf of my party for the last thirty-five years were carried on in the same tone, with the same voice and the same element of sincerity I am exemplifying to-day. I am ageing, but I am the same man I have always been; and even if my views are not in accord with the views of those to whom I have the honour of addressing myself at the present time, I ask that they be treated as the opinion of a sincere man who tries to express himself in his own personal way; who presents his arguments as best he can in the interest of his constituents and in the interest of his fellow Canadians.

Whatever was the tone of my remarks; whatever terms I have used; whatever way I have expressed views, I have always been a Canadian to the core. Though I am attached to the privileges, rights and liberties promised to my province, I do not want to be looked upon as a narrow-minded Canadian, but rather as a Canadian capable of looking upon his country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I am not an isolationist. I am a Canadian, strongly in favour of preserving the liberties, rights and privileges of all the component parts of Canada, and I want them to be respected on all occasions and in all circumstances.

I had something else to say. I imagine I am near the limit of my time and I do not want to transgress and speak any longer than I should. I want to close, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I am going to vote in favour of the amendment, because it supports the principle of consultation with the provinces. I am not scrutinizing the motives or interest that may be in the minds of some people who have been supporting the amendment, any more than I am scrutinizing the ideas and motives of other hon. members in this house. I am taking the resolution as it stands. I am taking the amendment as it is and, as it is worded. The amendment asks for consultation with the provinces and the obtaining of at least their advice before proceeding with the resolution. I am in accord with that view, and in that stand I remain in the family of the old Liberals among whom I have been brought up in my political life. I stand with Blake; I stand with Laurier; I stand with Lapointe, and on that constitutional issue I also agree with leaders of the Conservative party in the past. No, I am not alone. I am at present preaching the gospel they all have preached, the gospel I myself have been advocating in my province and in Canada as a whole for the last thirty-five years.

I was in favour of redistribution being carried out in 1943 according to the principles of the constitution of 1867, meaning that I wanted the representation in the House of Commons to be as nearly as possible according to population. I am still in favour of redistribution being carried out. If the government persists in claiming that it alone has the absolute power to deal with the question, and if the amendment suggesting consultation with the provinces is rejected, I shall then have no other alternative but to vote for the resolution.

Mr. RENE HAMEL (St. Maurice-Laflèche) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this debate, and in order to dispel any misunderstanding, I feel constrained to explain clearly my stand on the matter that is now before us.

The right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has moved a resolution the purport of which is to establish one of the basic principles of the democratic system: representation by population. Before dealing with the main resolution, it may be proper for me to discuss the proposed amendment, which reads as follows:

> Be it resolved that the government be required to consult at once the several provinces and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations be authorized to present an humble address . . .

The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) has dealt with the constitutional aspect of the problem; I shall confine myself to a review of the facts and an appreciation of the practical consequences of the amendment. This amendment will either be rejected or carried.

If it is accepted, the dominion government will have to enter into consultations with the provinces. This gives rise to countless difficulties that are well nigh insoluble in the present state of our legislation. In what manner will such consultations with the provinces be carried out? Will the provincial prime ministers themselves be asked to express the desire of their respective legislatures, or will the latter be called upon, in a regular or special session, to express their views through a resolution? No one has told us, and the matter has not been provided for.

However, let us suppose that an appropriate method of consultation is agreed upon. The problem will then in no way be solved. For the amendment continues "and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations." Who will decide whether the result is satisfactory or not, and on what basis will a decision be reached in that connection? Those are two more questions that remain unanswered. To my mind, it is obvious that the proposed redistribution will abolish certain unjustified privileges, as regards representation in the House of Commons. Anyone can foresee at once that consultations with the provinces are likely to bring out opposite views. Will the consent of the provinces have to be unanimous, or will a majority be sufficient? In that case how will those opposite views be appreciated? Will they be taken up and thoroughly examined?

Should the views of Prince Edward Island be at variance with those of Ontario, will they offset the latter? And how long will such an inquiry last? No one knows. Meanwhile, we would see the perpetuation of a glaring injustice which is a disgrace to democracy and which could make available to its opponents the most powerful weapon they can desire.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURENDEAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. HAMEL: Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been the intention of those who have moved it, the practical effect of this amendment would be to kill the main resolution. This debate clearly shows that it is imperative that some thought be given to the drawing up of a method for the discussion of constitutional matters, so that this country may be spared the judicial insecurity which now exists, and I need not emphasize that such a discussion should be held in close cooperation with the various provincial authorities. But, in view of the proposed amendment, and under the present circumstances, when the sole effect of the resolution will obviously be to do justice to the province of Quebec, I wonder why we, from that province, should have to assume all the expenses and accept all the risks of a dilatory procedure, to put it mildly, when in the past action taken without our consent and to our detriment, has so often deprived us of certian fundamental rights?

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against the amendment, I am quite convinced that I shall thereby be rendering a loyal service to my compatriots; and taking a stand likely to bring closer together the rightminded elements of the two racial groups. Finally, I am confident that I shall thus uphold in our province and in a practical way, the democratic system. What will happen now if the amendment is defeated? We shall revert to the main resolution which, in turn, will carry or be rejected. If it be rejected, we shall nevertheless be compelled to go on with redistribution, as provided for in the British North America Act. But how shall we go about it? We shall have to choose between the various schools of thought as to the meaning of the section dealing with the ratio of twentieth. How shall we appraise the decrease in the population of a province in relation to the total population of Canada? Shall we do so in relation to the last readjustment, as referred to by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), or on the basis of the last census, as was done in the past?

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that I have been deeply impressed by the theory so ably propounded by the hon. member for Stanstead, but I cannot fail to realize that it finds opposition in many a precedent and in a judgment of the Lords of the Privy Council. Under the circumstances, I cannot take upon myself to expose my fellow citizens to a risk I myself should be unwilling to face.

Besides, in refusing to support this resolution, may I count on the adoption of a basis of representation in the House of Commons that will be fairer, more equitable, more consistent with sound democratic principles? I quite frankly confess that I cannot. My plain duty therefore is to accept it loyally, and to share both its merits and its responsibility. I feel all the freer in supporting it that it does not modify, but on the contrary, reaffirms the principle of the confederation compact. It redresses an injustice to the province of Quebec.

Finally, if, as I hope, the resolution carries, what will happen? I do not see the necessity of reading the text of a document we have been discussing for weeks. I feel I accurately sum up its meaning when I state that it confirms the principle of representation according to population. It will remedy the glaring injustice of the present system and restore the Canadian citizen's status of equality before the House of Commons.

In order to oppose the measure now under review, certain reasons have been advanced upon which I should like to dwell briefly before resuming my seat.

The first objection was raised against the surplus expenditures entailed by an increase in representation. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the danger and futility of such an argument is self-evident, when it is recalled that the very ones who are opposing to-day an average contribution of less than three cents yearly per family for the establishment of democracy at home, were voting willingly $19 billions, or an average of $7,600 per family, for the defence of democracy in the world.

An hon. MEMBER: That is true.

Mr. HAMEL: Others argue that the 1941 census cannot be considered a reliable basis, because of the extensive migrations brought about by the war. Here is my answer to that:

When it was decided in 1943 to postpone readjustment of representation, discussions arose about the census, but it was agreed then that redistribution would be adjourned until the first session following the termination of hostilities and not until after the next census.

Finally, opponents of the resolution point out the danger to minorities arising out of the violation of provincial autonomy. This contention would carry more weight had not most of those who uphold it now ignored or fought against it in 1943, when the proposal notwithstanding the merits of the reasons which secured the approval of a majority in this house, gave rise to an injustice against which only a few Quebec members protested. There is no inconsistency, as some have suggested, in the stand taken by those who, after having opposed the 1943 resolution, support that of 1946. In 1943, an injustice would have resulted from that resolution, while in 1946 the object of the resolution is to correct an injustice the perpetuation of which would suit some people. In either case, they have fought valiantly to ensure the triumph of justice. In either case, they have endeavoured to support what they deemed just and fair.

We have been warned against abandoning the system in which Quebec is the pivotal province. But for eighty years this system has been working against common sense and against us. Certainly if the object of the resolution were to do away with provincial boundaries in regard to the representation in the House of Commons, no one would oppose it more strongly than I. But such is not the case. On the contrary, the resolution confirms the separate identity of the provinces. After the unit of representation has been determined, the population of each of the provinces is divided by that unit. Is this not an efficient and formal recognition of the separate identity of each of the provinces?

The resolution must be considered as it is, without ascribing to it consequences which it does not imply. I would like to know how the application in the House of Commons of the principle of representation based on population can infringe upon the rights of a minority.

Further, the chief practical result of the resolution will be to give to the province of Quebec the additional eight members to which it is entitled according to its population. I would like to know which rights of which minority would be interfered with.

But I know quite well the objection raised by those who contend that it is not the immediate result of the resolution which is to be feared, but the far-off consequences of what is claimed to be a dangerous precedent. If it is a precedent, let us agree upon its nature. If it is a precedent, it is a novel one, inasmuch as it will redress an injustice.

Several amendments to the constitution were passed without previous consultation with the provinces. Such was the course adopted in 1871, a second time in 1875, a third time in 1886, a fourth time in 1915, a fifth time in 1916, and a sixth time in 1943. Shall we be so naive as to refrain from resorting to a precedent—even if one were involved, which is not the case—which would serve our legitimate interests and the cause of common sense when, invariably such precedents are applied successfully against us?

Furthermore, it has been shown that the resolution now before the house will not bring about an amendment to the federal compact, even if we change its wording. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie has supported this view which is confirmed by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) and, to a large extent, by the hon. member for Stanstead.

Mr. Speaker, several authorities and statements by politicians have been quoted on the nature of our constitution; shall we be taken in, however, by academic speeches and theories, since some of the very men who wrote or spoke on the subject, flatly contradicted in practice the doctrines set forth in books or speeches?

Mr. Speaker, I loyally support this motion; however, I consider as a humiliation the fact that this house has to crawl before a foreign parliament in order to settle the problem of representation in the Canadian commons. I hope that, before the next general elections, this procedure, together with the appeals to the privy council, both of which are vestiges of a colonialism incompatible with the dignity of a sovereign state, will have disappeared from our statutes.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was paired with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak at this time, I do so because the remarks I am going to make could not have been made on the amendment, and the amendment which I propose to move at the end of my remarks could not have been offered as an amendment to the amendment. It is not so much with what the resolution proposes to do that I am concerned as with one or two omissions or deficiencies in the resolution itself. I had hoped that these omissions would be explained by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) when he made his eloquent explanation of the bill, but since that was not done I feel that I should call to the attention of the house what I regard as grave omissions from the resolution as it stands at present.

This resolution purports to put the representation of the House of Commons on the basis of representation by population. I use the word "purports" advisedly, because I do not think the resolution accomplished that aim. As far as the people of the country are concerned, the most immediate effect of the resolution is to increase the membership of this house by ten at a cost to the country of $60,000 a year in indemnities alone. At a time when there is a demand from coast to coast for rigid public economy, when people are hoping that next week the Minister of Fin. ıce (Mr. Ilsley) will be able to announce subs.antial reductions in taxation, I think we should give careful scrutiny to such an increase the cost of conducting the business of the ıuse of Commons, especially in view of the f. .t that last fall we increased our own indemnities, rightly I believe, by fifty per cent. There was considerable criticism of that increase in some parts of the country, though I am glad to say that in my riding there was little criticism. On the contrary, both trade unions and the boards of trade endorsed the action then taken. They said that if such compensation would allow a member to represent his riding better they were for it.

That brings me to the first point I wish to make. There are many private members in this house—and I am in the class to which I refer—who are not representing their constituencies as well as they might, not because of lack of compensation, not because of lack of ability or of any desire to represent their constitutents properly, but because of the deplorable working conditions, the absence of proper office space, the absence of proper secretarial help, the total lack of any research assistance in the library, and, so far as those unfortunate members in the far corner of the house are concerned, the lack of any method by which they can properly follow the debates in this house.

I had intended to speak on this matter when the estimates of the House of Commons came up for consideration, since that is the proper time; but since the government by this resolution proposes to aggravate the situation by pumping ten more M.P.'s into already crowded offices, this is the proper time, in my opinion, to bring the matter to the attention of the house and of the government. Normally I would be wasting my time telling my audience, who are mostly private members, of these disabilities; but it is a curious thing that neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who is leading the government, nor the Minister of Justice, who sponsors the bill, nor the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who apparently drafted it, has been a private member in this House of Commons. These hon. gentlemen have been either ministers of the crown or leaders of the opposition, and so have enjoyed good office space, adequate secretarial help, research assistance and certainly excellent seating space in the centre of the house.

Therefore I am going to indicate briefly to them some of the disabilities that private members labour under. Because of attendance in the house and committees the only time a member has for correspondence and interviews is from nine to eleven o'clock in the morning, from two to three o'clock in the afternoon and from seven to eight o'clock at night. Other hours are occupied in attending committee meetings and attending in the house as hon. members should. It is impossible to dictate, or even to try to dictate, letters when your office-mate—and most of us share offices —is a yard away dictating to his secretary. Under such circumstances it is also impossible to concentrate on the study of a bill or the preparation of a speech. It cannot be done while your office-mate is dictating at the same time. More than that, it is embarrassing to members. It is more embarrassing to constituents who come to see their member on matters affecting them, and are forced to discuss these matters in the presence of a third person who is a stranger. Most members, of course, withdraw to the hallway when such things take place, but there is no reason why a member of parliament should spend most of his time out in the hallways.

No business firm in this country would pay an executive $6,000 a year and then not give him a proper place in which to work. The real irony of the situation, however, is that this magnificent new parliament building has adequate office space for members of parliament. Unfortunately, because of the encroachment, throughout the years members of the staff are now using large offices which should be occupied by members of parliament. The greatest encroachment takes place between parliaments when there is no Speaker, and our genial friend, Doctor Beauchesne, is supreme. I need only remind hon. members that at the end of the last parliament there were two offices on the top floor which were occupied at that time by the leader of the Social Credit party in this house, but he has been moved out of those offices and the offices have been taken over by the manager of the restaurant. The point is, is it better for a member of parliament to be moved out of an office to find a place for the manager of the restaurant? There is the old story of the Arab, the camel and the tent. I do not need to tell it here, but the camel got his nose in to keep warm, and in the end the camel was in the tent and the Arab was outside. If this procedure goes on, in a few years we shall be working in the pool and the stenographers and staff will be occupying all the rooms. We need only to walk around the ground floor of this building and see the offices occupied by minor officials of the House of Commons. You need only to walk along the fourth and fifth floors of this building and see office after office occupied by secretaries of committees. These are valuable men, and they deserve office space, but the space for them is over in the west block. There should be a tunnel between these two buildings, and members of parliament should be allotted the space occupied by these men. Probably that would mean the displacement of some department in the west block, but these enormous national defence buildings which were built as headquarters for our huge wartime army must now have space which could be occupied by the displaced department, despite the objections of the permanent force empire builders.

The situation has become so bad in the offices of the press gallery that some of the gentlemen of the press are forced to work in one of the corridors in this building. Such a move as I suggest of putting the staff over in that building would give decent accommodation to the gentlemen of the press.

The second disability is secretarial help. Very few private members to-day have what a business firm would consider a good secretary. Some of them have good stenographers, but the reason there are not more good secretaries is that the girls are here for only three or four months, and there is a lack of security. They come here for a session and they have not the protection of the civil service. At the end of the session they go, and some of them are fortunate enough to get a permanent job. If they get that job they stick to it. If we had even a fraction of the secretarial help which the United States Congress provides for its congressmen and senators we would be able to do a much better job.

A third thing is the absence of research assistants in the library. Anyone who has gone to a university and has done research work does not find it too great a problem to dig out and assemble material. But, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said yesterday, this is not a good library so far as ease of digging out the necessary documents is concerned. However, quite a few members of the House of Commons are not university graduates and have not done research work; they are farmers, seamen, engineers, loggers and so forth. They have not had that training, and there is no reason why they should spend hours of their time foraging around the library trying to assemble information which a competent research assistant would get for them in an hour. It would be very simple to acquire such people. In the universities of this country there are dozens and dozens of young men and women who are working for research degrees, their master's and their science degrees, and they would welcome the chance to come here and put in part of their time working in this library which, after all, is the best in Canada, and also meeting the members of the government and of the House of Commons and senior civil servants, the people who are running this country. They could be of inestimable value to all private members.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) is, I believe, one of the most persistent in the matter of the great difficulty hon. members in the remote corners have of hearing speakers, especially speakers on the government benches who seem to look upon it as their chief function to relay information only to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). This problem has often been brought up in this house, and requests made for a public address system.

When we place another ten members in the far corner this chamber will be completely filled. These ten additional members will be new members and certainly will be entitled to hear all the debates in this house. I wish to make it quite clear that this is not a personal complaint on my part. I am very fortunate; as hon. members know, I share an office with one of the quietest and most industrious members here. I have one of the best secretaries in the House of Commons. It took me five years to acquire her, five years of changing a girl every session because they would go from here after the session and secure permanent jobs. However, I am forced to share her services with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

As I have pointed out, university men have not the same trouble in doing research work as have members of parliament, and no member of parliament should be obliged to do work in the manner in which we attempt it, particularly when we are sent here to study policy and not be library assistants.

Lastly, thanks to the minister from British Columbia, I have a good seat in the House of Commons, but there are many members here who suffer greatly from these four disabilities. I had hoped that the Minister of Justice would —perhaps he will when he closes the debate— indicate that the government is going to take the required action to see that the present members of parliament are given a chance to do their job in a better way by providing better working conditions.

The second omission in the minister's speech is a significant one. I have followed this long debate with the greatest of interest. I have studied science myself, and therefore I am amazed at how lawyers can start out with the same set of facts and arrive at quite different conclusions. Apparently in this resolution we are making a drastic change in our representation in this country. In other words, we are going to bring our constitution up to date to fit the needs of the country. If we are to do that, then at the same time we should change the mechanics of selecting our representatives, and bring it up to date. At the present time we elect our members by the single vote, which was good in 1867, when they had just the two parties. It is not good now, when we have at least five national parties. How many hon. members can stand up in the house and say: "I represent the majority of the constituents of my riding?" Very few. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) is one who can do that. One member out of sixteen in British Columbia can say that, and we have five parties. The question came before parliament with the advent of the Progressive party in 1920. At that time the Prime Minister was quite inclined to try to introduce a measure of proportional representation.

Mr. MacNICOL: That has been discarded almost everywhere throughout the world.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): A bill was started and dropped. I do not believe in proportional representation and I do not know much about it, except the Winnipeg elections—

Mr. MacNICOL: That is enough.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is enough. You must have large multi-member ridings, which means in the case of Winnipeg in the provincial election ten members with five parties, fifty candidates on the ballot.

The first few names on the ballot are apt to receive more votes than those down below, or the members whose names are better known to the electorate. That is the worst feature of it. There is also that lack of intimate connection which should exist between the member and his constituents. On the other hand, in Manitoba they have the excellent single transferable vote in rural ridings, and certainly that is what we should have in this dominion parliament when we have four or five national parties.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): We also have it in Alberta.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Yes. There are progressive provinces in the West.

I quite realize that such a matter would require an amendment of the Dominion Elections Act; but at a time when we are changing our whole basis of representation I think it would be quite appropriate for the minister to indicate whether or not we are to have a change in the method of electing our members, so that hon. members here could rise in their places and speak with more confidence in the knowledge that they were representing a majority of their constituents. That is a feeling I do not now have. I had what was considered a fairish plurality in British Columbia, but I consider that I represent only about one-third of those who cast votes in Vancouver North in the last general election. Two-thirds of the people who voted did not vote for me; and you cannot have the same confidence between a member who knows he does not represent a majority and the constituents who know the member does not represent a majority of them.

I now come to my third point, which I think represents my major opposition to the present resolution. The purpose of the resolution is said to be to bring about real representation by population. We have got rid of what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) called one joker clause, the five per cent clause which has given Ontario an artificial membership, a greater membership than it deserves. At the same time, however, we have not got rid of the other joker clause which gives one other province, and could give other provinces, greater representation than they are entitled to on a strict representation by population basis. As far as the Yukon and the northwest territories are concerned, that can be justified because, despite the fact that they do not have the national quota, unless they are given a member for that fraction they do have they will be disfranchised. They have no provincial governments to which to turn, and few municipal governments. South of us, in the United States of America, we have the good example of a congress based entirely on representation by population, with no reservation except one, corresponding to the Yukon. When states such as Nevada and New Mexico first came into the union they did not have a population sufficient to justify a congressman, but they were given a congressman as soon as they entered the union.

Mr. MacNICOL: And Arizona.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): However, when we come to the other exception, Prince Edward Island, I find it difficult to justify in my own mind, and I have not heard the Minister of Justice justify it, why this small, compact economy, which has municipal government, which has a provincial government, should be given, in fact, twice the representation given the rest of the country, by population. I agree, mind you, that Prince Edward Island is in a difficult position, but the remedy is not in creating an artificial condition in the House of Commons. The remedy is in the other chamber, where representation was set upon a regional basis. The fathers of confederation were patterning the House of Commons and the Senate, I think, quite closely on the plan followed in the country to the south.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was starting to comment upon what I thought was the weakness in this resolution in that it purports to be a resolution to introduce strict representation by population. I had justified, in my own mind at least, the granting of a seat to the Yukon and northwest territories, despite the fact that they have not a full quota under the present system. I had touched briefly upon the other safeguard of senate representation which is protecting Prince Edward Island at the moment. I pointed out that Prince Edward Island is a small compact economy, provided already with both municipal and provincial governments, and therefore had not the same reason to be protected as have the Yukon and the northwest territories.

I cannot understand why the government would consider objectionable the five per cent clause, that is section 51 (4), which gives to Ontario artificial representation and not at the same time remove section 51 (a) which gives to Prince Edward Island to-day, perhaps to New Brunswick to-morrow, and to Nova Scotia some years hence a similar artificial representation. Such protection is not supplied to all the small provinces by that section, because in British Columbia at the moment we have six senators. That means that the only protection of this clause would come on the day when our population falls below 6/250ths of the population of Canada, or falls below 2·4 per cent of the population of Canada, which is obviously absurd.

Therefore it is apparent that this plan of representation by population rests on a very shaky foundation indeed. It rests upon this clause which introduces senate representation into House of Commons representation.

In this country in the last thirty or forty years there has been little criticism directed against the representation in this house. On the other hand, ever since 1893 there have been continued outcries in this country against the other house; yet nothing has been done. To-day we are presented with this new system of redistribution for the House of Commons. We find that one of the pillars upon which this new redistribution bill rests is representation in our outmoded senate. As long ago as 1893 my own party was impressed with the inadequacy of the senate. I think it was at our first national Liberal convention held here in the city of Ottawa that the following plank was presented:

> The present constitution of the senate is inconsistent with the federal principle in our system of government, and is in other respects defective, as it makes the senate independent of the people and uncontrolled by the public opinion of the country, and should be so amended as to bring it into harmony with the principles of popular government.

It was in 1893 also that the great Sir Oliver Mowat made an excellent speech in which he said:

> The senate as now constituted is the weakest point of our constitution.

In the election of 1900, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was able to go to the country and say this about the resolutions of the 1893 convention:

> This is the only plank that so far has not been effectively dealt with by the Liberal government, but the subject has not been lost sight of.

That was forty-six years ago. Just for fear hon. members may think that all the criticism of the senate has been confined to the Liberal party, I should like to read just one sentence of what R. B. Bennett said in 1915, as follows:

> The senate is an irresponsible body which has thwarted the will of democracy as expressed by the House of Commons.

An interesting point about the criticism of the senate is that the strongest criticism has not come from the party in opposition but rather from the party which had got into power but found that it was in opposition in the senate. So that we have the Conservatives in 1915 protesting against the senate and we have the Liberals protesting at other periods against the same upper chamber. Perhaps the finest comment on our senate is found in the work of Viscount Bryce, entitled, "Modern Democracies". He spent a considerable time in discussing the upper chambers in various countries, and his conclusion is this:

> Amongst these the French senate is the strongest and that of Canada, the weakest.

That again was in 1903. Therefore I feel that the greatest weakness in this resolution is the fact that it is amending the representation in this house about which there has been little criticism, when apparently nothing is being done about amending the representation in the other house, particularly when there has been so much criticism about that representation for forty or more years.

I believe in a senate or an upper chamber. I am going to quote what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, because he expresses so well what I think about the upper chamber. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in the great debate on the senate in 1906 said, as reported at page 2301 of Hansard of April 30, 1906:

> But one consideration which, to my mind, is absolutely conclusive and paramount, is that under our system of government, a second chamber is an absolutely needed safeguard for the smaller provinces against a possible invasion of their rights by the larger provinces. The system we have has been largely borrowed—not entirely, but largely—from the constitution of the American republic. As we know in that republic, the house of representatives is elected according to population. The people of the different states are represented in congress according to population. But in the American senate no such principle is admitted. In order to favour the minorities, the constitution has provided that every state, big or small, should be represented in the senate by two members.

He then went on to point out that the great state of New York had forty-five representatives and only two senators, and he referred to Vermont, which at that time had only one representative but had two members in the senate. To-day in the American congress there are four states which have only one representative each, because they have only a fraction of the quota of population necessary to elect a representative, but every one of those states has two senators. New York has forty-five members in the house of representatives and two in the senate; Wyoming has one member in the house of representatives and two in the senate. Sir Wilfrid went on to say:

> Here in our senate, as in the senate of the United States, we have not adopted the principle of representation by population. We have not altogether adopted the system of the American republic, but if we were to have a reform I would not be adverse to adopting in that respect the system of our neighbours and have each province represented by an equal number of members, whether that province be large or small. This principle having been adopted admittedly for the protection of the smaller provinces, everyone will admit at once that if we were to remove that safeguard, there would be a natural discontent in the smaller provinces, so that I contend that we cannot seriously entertain, even for a moment, the idea of ever abolishing our senate. The arguments which we see from time to time in the press have altogether ignored that view of the constitution, which is a true one, and a paramount argument in favour of the maintenance of a second chamber.

I do not think the senate should be abolished as do some of my friends in the C.C.F., but I think if ever there was a time to reform the senate, it is now. The senate should be the protector of provincial rights, but it is not fulfilling that task. At this time we need as never before a strong senate which would serve as the protector of provincial rights. We have heard the speeches of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Winters) who emphasized the disadvantage which their province admittedly has suffered since confederation. The prairies can tell the same story.

We in British Columbia, although we are regarded as one of the rich provinces, have suffered more from domination by the two central provinces than any other part of Canada. Briefly, this is our position: We sell the things we produce, timber, fish, minerals, fruits, in the open markets of the world at low prices. We buy the things we need in the protected markets of Ontario and Quebec at very high prices. The only reason we have been able to continue, selling our products at low prices and paying high prices for what we buy, is by plundering our natural resources, robbing our fisheries, denuding our forests, high-grading our mines. That cannot go on. The same is true of the prairies.

Before the war there was a strong feeling in British Columbia for provincial rights; but, like the people of the maritimes, having seen what this country can do under strong government during the war, the people of British Columbia have resolved that we are going to go ahead as a nation and not as nine Balkan provinces. But they are reluctant to give up any authority to a central government if they are to continue to be dominated in both houses of parliament by the power of the central provinces, by high tariffs, by mountain differentials on freight rates, by trade policies that primarily help the industrial east. That is why we need a reformed senate to protect provincial rights. The fathers of confederation realized that. They set up a senate to represent the main divisions of Canada, Upper and Lower Canada, the maritime provinces; they gave them equal representation in the senate, twenty-four for each division, and they added a fourth division when the west was was developed and gave twenty-four to that division.

It is now time to recognize that there are five divisions. Our government does recognize that the economy of the maritimes, of Quebec and Ontario, of the prairie provinces and part of Alberta and British Columbia constitute something quite different from any other economy, but until the senate is reformed we shall continue to be dominated in the house and in the senate by the weight of numbers of the central provinces.

I am not suggesting for one moment that the senate should have five divisions of twenty-four senators. The people of Canada want a smaller, not a bigger senate. But if there were twelve members from each division, four each for Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick; twelve for Quebec; twelve for Ontario; twelve for the two prairie provinces which are so much alike, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and twelve for the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, that is six apiece, then we should have an upper house which would prevent the colonies of Canada, because that is what the maritimes, the prairies and British Columbia have been, from being exploited by the central provinces. We would have three divisions as against two in the upper house, and the maritimes, the prairie provinces and British Columbia, would not be dominated in both houses of parliament by the central provinces.

If such a plan were adopted we would save thirty-six times $6,000—the indemnity—or $216,000, which would be quite ample to provide good secretarial help for us and the other things I mentioned a little earlier, and also provide thirty-six more offices in this building for members of parliament.

The next point is, should the senate be elected or appointed? That point was thoroughly canvassed in the great debates in this house in 1906, 1915, 1925, and it was generally agreed that because of our irregularly spaced elections for the House of Commons it would be difficult to have an elective senate. Therefore the senate may have to be an appointed body, but most people do not believe in appointment of senators for life. If the senate is to be a body that will be a check on hasty legislation obviously the term of appointment of the senators should be for more than the life of one parliament. The United States provides for a six-year term. We could do the same, with one-third retiring after the end of each two years.

The most important thing about the senate from the point of view of the west and the maritimes is not whether it should be appointed or elected, but who should appoint it. That, to my mind, is the great weakness of the present situation. Two years ago, members will remember that we had a long debate on the wage control order, P.C. 9384. In setting up our national war labour board the government proposed to name equal representation for employers and for labour. Both sides objected very much, and both the national labour congresses said that if labour was to be represented they wanted to nominate their own representatives. That principle was accepted, and this principle should also apply to the senate. If the members of the senate are the protectors of provincial rights they should be appointed by the provinces, by the lieutenant-governors in council, and not by the governor general in council. The provincial governments, I am sure, would give better provincial representation. For example, in my own province we have six senators. It is a big province; yet I find from the official record that three of them reside in Victoria—one has retired—and three in Vancouver. So that there is no representation of the Fraser valley, of the Okanagan valley, of the Kootenay valleys or Cariboo and Skeena counties which are empires in themselves. Can Ontario imagine half of their senators being appointed from Toronto, the other half from Ottawa? Also, if the provincial governments appointed senators to present their problems at Ottawa, the seats in the senate would not be left vacant. In British Columbia we have had seats vacant over much too long a time.

An objection to this proposal might be that if the provinces pick the senators, the senators will have a provincial outlook. Anybody who takes part in the deliberations of the House of Commons or the Senate soon loses any provincial outlook. If Mr. Drew and Mr. Duplessis had served terms in the House of Commons or the Senate they would have been bigger and better premiers; they would have the Canadian outlook rather than the provincial outlook.

There are groups in this house that should be interested in this proposal. In Alberta, since 1935 the people have shown in no uncertain way, both provincially and federally, that they want to be represented by people who believe in the social credit philosophy. Yet in the senate, where this provincial outlook should be represented, they have not a single voice. The same is true of Saskatchewan and its new party.

I had intended to move an amendment to amend sections 21 to 32 of the British North America Act to reform the Senate as well as the House of Commons. I realize how brash that would be for a young member. More properly it should be done by the government, and more properly still it should start in the senate itself. A simpler way would be to remove all mention of this outmoded senate from the present resolution. In other words, put the membership of the House of Commons on a strict representation by population basis. That would force action to be taken by providing proper senate representation to protect those areas which need protection, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, the prairie provinces and British Columbia. The effect of this would be, using the population figures of the last census, that Prince Edward Island would have two members; Nova Scotia, 13; New Brunswick, 10; Quebec, 73; Ontario, 82; Manitoba, 16; Saskatchewan, 19; Alberta, 17; British Columbia, 18. That makes 250, plus one seat for the Yukon. The 255 seats mentioned in the resolution before us is an odd figure. Obviously 250 was first tried and did not work, whatever work they had in mind for it to do. So they tried 254. A House of Commons of 250 members is a much more understandable figure for the average citizen in Canada.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) gave the impression that unless British Columbia got the twenty to twenty-one members to which we are entitled by our estimated population—according to the dominion bureau of statistics British Columbia had a population of 994,000 on December 31, 1945, as against 845,000 for Saskatchewan—we should go back to the old sixteen. I cannot agree with that. By all means we should have the two extra seats provided by the 1941 census, and if the next census gives us twenty-one members, well and good.

I hope that the Minister of Justice will comment on the four points I have mentioned. First, in increasing the membership of the house is there going to be any improvement in the conditions under which members of parliament can work? Are we to get adequate office space? Are we to get adequate secretarial help to lift the load of routine off our shoulders? Is there to be a change in the electoral system designed to suit a multi-party system such as we now have? Why is the senate not being reformed? And why is one safeguard left in this resolution which makes it, not representation by population, but only slightly better than the last method of representation?

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Gibson):

That the motion be amended:

1. By striking out the words "two hundred and fifty-five" in subsection 1 of the proposed section 51 of the B.N.A. Act 1867, as quoted in the resolution before the house, and substituting therefor the words "two hundred and fifty-one."

2. By striking out the words "two hundred and fifty-four" in rules 1 and 2 of the proposed section 51 and substituting therefor the words "two hundred and fifty."

3. By deleting rules 3 and 4 of the proposed section 51.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have appreciated the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) who has preceded me in this debate. I share his views on the reform of the senate. I believe that the latter should be an elected body. Allow me, at the outset, to tender my heartiest congratulations to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) who has delivered to-day a masterly speech. Once again he has uttered stirring words. They were the words of those who were leading the Liberal party a few years past.

When I spoke on the amendment a few days ago, I warned the government against any interference with the prerogatives of the provinces. I referred to the humiliation we felt at the thought of having humbly to petition the London government for the right to amend our constitution. I stated that this constitution is not our own, and that Canada is a country without a constitution and without a flag. However, for a number of years, without the contracting parties being consulted, with the connivance and the permission of Westminster, institutions, contracts and laws have been tampered with. The only voices which could properly be raised in protest—those of the provinces—have been silenced. An endeavour is made in this house to drown out protests under a storm of charges directed against the prime minister of Quebec. Blows are aimed at him with an ever increasing fury.

But the premier of my province rises above this useless din. He has just vindicated the jurisdiction of our legislative assemblies and upheld their cause on a plane beyond the reach of those who refuse to acknowledge a right which is theirs to exercise. He fears, as we do, a threat both immediate and remote.

Who could censure his attitude? Let us refrain from exaggeration and violence. Canada's future rests upon the cooperation of all men of good will. Even at the cost of great sacrifice, the Dominion government should return to the provinces the freedom to exercise their rights within the scope of their jurisdiction.

As I said before, I support this measure because I wish the influence of my province to grow in this house. I shall vote for the resolution because of its good points, provided that provincial prerogatives are respected.

Let the government cease to play with fire. Let them interfere no longer with the privileges of the provinces. Let them consult the legislatures before amending a contract which they ratified. Otherwise the government will plunge headlong into an adventure which can but lead to anarchy.

There is nothing noble or magnanimous about the attitude of the government. It reflects only a feat of strength. You will find, before long, that we are faced with new difficulties because the government neglected to consult the provinces. I object to our perpetrating an injustice for the sake of redressing a wrong. Like many others, I want to do justice to each province and trust that when the question is put, our vote shall take into account the future and the building of a nation which can rest only on right and justice.

During the debate, I heard members emphatically declare themselves proud to take part in the amendment of the constitution. That is an illusion. We have no power to effect any change without the consent of the British House of Commons. Some members of this parliament have asserted that the British North America Act was altered several times without the provinces being consulted. They approved of such precedents. I respect their opinion but have a right to express my own. Such instances represent an abuse of power detrimental to the provinces and to minorities. If previous governments erred, why should the present authority blunder irreparably by amending the constitution without consulting the provinces?

The constitution is the guarantee of the rights of all. It is the legal consecration of the nation.

I deeply regret to find that serious-minded persons overlook the importance of protecting our rights, thinking only of the immediate advantages to be gained. It is not too late however. When the government has received from London the authority to amend the constitution, let them consult the provinces. History will emblazon the part played by the true statesmen who defend the rights of the provinces and of the minorities and will condemn those politicians who support the infringement of contracts, of the constitution and of the laws.

During the debate, the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) claimed that since 1867 French-speaking Canadians have seldom had occasion to complain of the treatment meted out to them.

I respect the minister's views, but if looking over the history of Canada I were to mention all the injustices which we have suffered, it would be an endless task. Therefore, I prefer the joint protection offered by the dominion and the provincial governments rather than entrusting solely to the central power the fate of my race, its prerogatives and its rights. Inseparable in my mind and in my heart, our constitution and the rights of minorities seem to be so closely related, that it would be heinous to entrust them to the good will of the human conscience which, alas, is so fragile and sometimes so elastic. Discussing the matter from the standpoint of plain common sense, I wish to remind the house of the seriousness of the present situation. We must keep within the bounds of moderation when dealing with such a far-reaching resolution. The nation is being led along a path which may mean the end of the Canadian constitution. Eighty years have been spent in humanizing this charter of our rights. The provinces of confederation have played their part in this work of civilization. Why not consult them?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. Since the beginning of his remarks, he opposed the motion before the house on the ground that the provinces have not been consulted. Before six o'clock, the house voted on an amendment suggesting that this be done. As the matter has been settled by the house, the hon. member is not entitled to discuss it.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member claims that the provinces should be consulted on the question of making the senate an elective body, a matter which has not been dealt with in the previous amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order!

Mr. LACOMBE: Speaking on the point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! I have listened closely to the hon. member's remarks. He has spoken to the amendment dealt with by the house before six o'clock. I urge him to avoid discussing that amendment and to speak to the motion before the house.

Mr. LACOMBE: I realize that we are presently discussing a motion dealing with the constitution. I shall confine myself, as far as possible, to this matter and if I fail to do so, I invite Mr. Speaker to call me to order.

On the ground of some petty political grudge of one kind or other, doubts are raised concerning the courage of the upholders of constitution. As the right hon. the Minister of Justice stated himself, is not the constitution a token of civilization? Have not those who have upheld civilization by laying down their lives; those who have fallen in the name of justice, freedom and right; those who, beyond the seas and beyond life itself, from the midst of this vast cemetery, point to the sacrifice they were worthy to make; have they not, I say, the right to demand that we honour, for the sake of Canadian unity and the future of our country, those very compacts that have been torn and trampled under foot by the dictators?

Am I in order, Mr. Speaker?

I know of a document which bears the sacred name of contract. It is the constitution of Canada. Why change this Canadian bill of rights in defiance of its drafters and without the consent of the continuators of their work? Defamatory charges cannot outweigh eighty years of tradition and history. If so gross an injustice is to prevail, let us seal the doom of the constitution.

But a tangible fact exists, a tangible fact remains. The British North America Act has been ratified by the provinces. Irrecusable evidence of this is found in the constitution itself. The provinces and Canada at large are even now asking us to consult them regarding this resolution. Once the British house of commons has given its consent, it will still be possible and even easy to put off changing our constitution in order to consult the provinces. It is never too late to perform an act of justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: (Text): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): On division.

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion.

Mr. IRVINE: Before you put the motion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright):

That the motion be amended by striking out the words "two hundred and fifty-five" as they appear in lines one and two of subsection 1 of the proposed new section 51, and substituting therefor the words "two hundred and fifty-six," and by striking out subsection 2 of the said proposed section 51 and substituting therefor the following:

"(2) The Yukon territory as constituted by chapter 41 of the Statutes of Canada, 1901, shall be entitled to one member, and the Northwest Territories shall be entitled to one member."

I should explain why I have taken the time of the house to move the amendment. There are no legal entanglements in connection with this simple alteration to the motion. May I say, sir, that I am speaking now for a number of people in Canada who are completely disfranchised, although they are just as good Canadians as any hon. member in the house. The people who live in the northwest territories have no vote and they have no representatives. They are anxious that they be granted a representative and have a voice in the government of their country. Therefore, in order that they may have that opportunity I am now speaking for them and moving this amendment, which would provide them with a representative which they desire.

An hon. MEMBER: How many are there?

Mr. IRVINE: I shall tell my hon. friend in a moment. I know the house is now ready for voting. This has been a long debate; I am just as ready as any other hon. member to vote on this question, and therefore I shall be as brief as possible.

Hon. members will remember that the situation was put most excellently by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. Townley-Smith). I shall take just a few moments to summarize the main points which he made. For example, he pointed out that the total area of the northwest territories is forty-two per cent of the total land area of the Dominion of Canada and that at the present time there is only one member for that vast territory. Those who live in the northwest territories section of that half of Canada do not even have an opportunity to vote for the hon. gentleman who represents the Yukon. The Yukon area is 205,000 square miles by itself; but exclusive of the Yukon territory there is an area of one and a quarter million square miles, with a population that is three or four times as great.

I need not point out, sir, that the natural wealth of that part of Canada is such that it might be taken for granted that in a short time there will be in that area a sufficient population to reach the unit of representation which is being provided for in the resolution. The country concerned is one of great wealth and of certain growth. I believe that that section is growing faster in population at the moment than any other part of Canada.

May I pause for a moment to point out that in a country such as ours we must take more into consideration than numbers of people when we are dealing with redistribution? One thing that we must take into consideration, at least for some time to come, is the extent of country which it is possible for one person to represent. We have in the British North America Act a consideration also for people being represented not on a population basis. We also have a precedent in the special act which provides for a representative for the Yukon. We cannot speak now as if we were making an exception of some other section of Canada which has just as much right to representation as the Yukon or any other part of Canada which may have extra representation because of constitutional status.

The next point is that we pride ourselves on our democratic recognition of the rights of minorities. I am now speaking for a minority; it is not a racial minority. Presumably in the population of that section of the country there are peoples of all races which make up the population of Canada. It is not a religious minority. Presumably amongst that population there are people who practise all religions; but it is a minority nevertheless of all races and of all creeds. They are Canadians, and they are disfranchised.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: What does the hon. member think of giving the franchise to the Eskimos?

Mr. IRVINE: The Eskimos are Canadians, if there are any Canadians, and they should have the franchise also, most decidedly. But we may come to the Eskimos some time later. I wish to confine myself now particularly to this one point. I emphasize that the people who live in the northwest territories are disfranchised. They have no say in the government of the country in which they have been born, the country in which they live, the country in which they work, and the country for which their sons fought. I think it is better that we should take time by the forelock now and meet the legitimate needs of these people before they become rebellious as people will in any part of the world who have spirit enough to rebel when they find themselves without representation, without an opportunity to take part in the government of their country, and find themselves completely neglected. That has happened in other periods of Canadian history, and it has happened in other countries as well.

This amendment is merely the application of the democratic principle of representative government in which we pride ourselves greatly. Here is a small section of our people, living in a large and wealthy area and with no opportunity to engage in representative government. We are now amending our constitution. We are reforming our House of Commons membership and the basis of it. This is the proper opportunity for us to correct this situation in so far as the people of the northwest territories are concerned.

There is also the matter of economic interests. These should be given some consideration in a redistribution bill. I have already emphasized that the area is indeed a wealthy one. In 1941 the small population of that territory produced $9,500,000 worth of minerals and oil, and in 1943 they produced fur to the value of $3,500,000. Then there are extensive opportunities for fishing and for navigation. In that territory are both Great Bear lake and Great Slave lake, each larger by half than lake Ontario. Indeed, the waterways provide the chief means of transportation in that section of the country at the present time Then, of course, all hon. members know that in that section of Canada we have the great uranium deposit which is of such great value in connection with the development of atomic energy. There are great promises of extensive development in that regard, and from that source alone we may anticipate that in the next two years there will probably be enough people living in that section of the country to bring the population up to about 40,000, which would be pretty close to the actual unit basis for representation in accordance with the amendments proposed in the main resolution.

I have referred to the virtual disfranchisement of these inhabitants of the northwest territories. I wish to conclude, Mr. Speaker, on this note. The public business of the territory is carried on by a commissioner, a deputy commissioner and four councillors. This governing body is not appointed by the people who live there; it is appointed from Ottawa. The people have no say in who comes to Ottawa to make the appointments. The members of the governing body are mostly absentees, too, and they do not understand the conditions of the people. But the point is that the people thus governed have no say either in the selection of the apointees to whom I have referred or in the selection of the appointers of the appointees. They have no adequate and democratic way of giving expression to their grievances. They have very poor roads, and few of those, and no means of communication. Naturally they have very little in the way of the ordinary public works we find in all other parts of Canada. In addition, their cost of living is from fifty to three hundred per cent higher than in other parts of Canada. Finally, they are taxed without representation, a principle with which I do not believe this house in its heart agrees.

Therefore, I hope the government will give consideration to this very simple amendment. I think the government will agree that in all I have said I have been true to the democratic principle to which the government adheres; that I have been in line with the principle of representative government to which the government adheres; that it is reasonable to ask that no considerable population such as the 12,000 people now living in that territory should be without some means of representation; that we are now providing a new basis for representation throughout Canada, and now is the time to make this correction. So that I urge the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to allow his heart to warm up and melt just a little bit, and accept the amendment I have moved.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Notwithstanding the great sympathy we all have for the people inhabiting the territories of the northwest at this time, Mr. Speaker, I have to submit that this amendment is not in order. It proposes to do a thing which has just been refused by the house. The house has just refused the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) to strike out the words "two hundred and fifty-five" and substitute other words, in the first portion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Oh, yes; the house has just rejected that. We now have an amendment to strike out "two hundred and fifty-five" and substitute some other number. If the hon. member had wished to have that considered he should have moved it as an amendment to the amendment. There was an amendment to strike out "two hundred and fifty-five" and substitute some other number. Had the hon. member not been satisfied with the suggested amendment it was open to him to move a subamendment; but since he did not do so, the house has now passed upon that part. The rule, as I find it in paragraph 399 of Beauchesne is:

> After a decision has been given on an amendment to any part of a question, an earlier part cannot be amended. In like manner where an amendment of any part of a question has been proposed from the chair an earlier part cannot be amended unless the amendment so proposed be withdrawn.

There could have been an amendment to the amendment; but since there was none, the question of striking out "two hundred and fifty-five" and replacing it with something else has been decided on the amendment itself.

Mr. IRVINE: Let us assume that this amendment is out of order, which I am not granting. Would the minister not think it would be a wiser thing to accept the principle and never mind the order, to include it in his own motion without having this at all?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The matter of substance referred to has been given consideration. The proposal before the house is that the Yukon territory and—

. . . any part of Canada not comprised within a province which may from time to time be included therein by the parliament of Canada for the purposes of representation in parliament, shall be entitled to one member.

As to that matter, the suggestions which have been made from time to time that the sectors north of the provinces be included in the existing provinces are still under consideration, and that is something upon which no decision has yet been reached. If that were done, I do not know whether this would be north of British Columbia or north of Alberta—

Mr. MacNICOL: Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would then come within the general provision; and when a decision has been made as to what will be done with that territory, consideration will be given to a proper method of having it represented and administered. In any event, it should have representation. The population of a portion of the northwest territories is growing so rapidly that the present system of administration soon will be inadequate, and something will have to be devised as there was for the territories which are now Alberta and Saskatchewan. They were under territorial administration for a time, but when they got a larger population they had to be given democratic institutions. The growth now taking place in a certain portion of the northwest territories will have to be taken care of in an adequate manner. I submit that the amendment cannot be made. If it could, we could deal with all the digits, substituting each one for "245".

Mr. IRVINE: Surely whether this is in order or is not in order depends upon the fact that we are removing the digit.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would have been an excellent reason for a subamendment to the amendment.

Mr. COLDWELL: We did not think so.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would have been an excellent reason for amending the amendment. I submit that, the amendment having been disposed of, if the rule is to be followed it cannot be the subject of further alternative amendments.

Mr. MacINNIS: Before you make your ruling, Mr Speaker, I should like to draw to your attention what I think are the important words in citation 399. I think the important words are "earlier part". That citation reads:

After a decision has been given on an amendment to any part of a question, an earlier part cannot be amended.

I submit that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Cariboo is not to an earlier part. The hon. member for Vancouver North moved to reduce the number 255 to 250, and the hon. member for Cariboo moved that the 255 be increased to 256. I submit that this is a proper amendment because it does not deal with a matter that is an earlier part of the resolution now before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member for Cariboo to citation 413 on page 129 of Beauchesne's second edition which reads:

No amendment shall call in question a principle on which the house has given a decision by its vote on a former amendment.

If the hon. member will compare his amendment with the amendment which was presented by the hon. member for Vancouver North and on which the house had an opportunity to vote he will see clearly that the principles of both amendments are the same. Therefore, I really believe the amendment moved by the hon. member is out of order.

Mr. IRVINE: May I say that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to find a shadow of resemblance between the principle of the one and the principle of the other?

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have an amendment to move to section 5 of the resolution. This amendment is based on the municipal law of the province of Ontario. I move, seconded by the hon. member for High Park (Mr. McMaster):

Provided that such readjustment shall not take effect until after the next census in 1951 and then only after a favourable vote of those entitled to vote at the next federal election on a plebiscite or referendum and that such address to His Majesty the King be postponed until then.

That is the principle of municipal law in Ontario in municipal elections, I read it. Let the Clerk read it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I cannot accept the amendment moved by the hon. member. The rules state that a motion or amendment should be presented to the Chair in such a way that it can be read by the Speaker.

Mr. CHURCH: On a point of order, section 5 deals with the time of the coming into effect of the readjustment and I am moving an amendment which is quite in order. I am moving that a rider be added to section 5 to postpone this readjustment until after the census of 1951 and then carry it out only after a referendum or plebiscite has been taken.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rules are quite definite that a motion should be presented to the Chair with the name of the mover and the name of the seconder and presented in such a way that the Chair can read it to the house. Unfortunately I cannot do that in this case.

Mr. CHURCH: The British North America Act is like the law of the Medes and the Persians.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity the other day of saying something on the amendment. I advanced with as much force as I could command a proposition which seemed to me to be a reasonable one—an interpretation of section 51(4) of the British North America Act. I admit that this is not a forum in which legal arguments can achieve very much. The appraisal of arguments by majority is not a satisfactory way of determining their value, but I do not complain. I wish, however, that the house be made fully aware of this fact as representing the view of the party of which I am a member.

This party stands for the correction of any inequality that obtains at the present time in the representation in this house of the different provinces. May that be quite clear. The Progressive Conservative party wishes that each province be completely, fully and fairly represented in this house.

There are two questions raised by the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). One has to do with fair and equitable representation and in so far as that principle is concerned this party is with him. This party regrets sincerely that for a certain period of time there should have been inadequate and unfair representation in this house of at least one province.

The other question raised is, how is this proper, fair representation to be brought about? I suggested the other day that the very text of section 51, subsection 4, of the B.N.A. Act placed the instrument in the hands of the government and of the house. Nobody has contradicted, strange as it may seem, the interpretation that I placed upon subsection 4 of section 51. In fact, some hon. gentlemen opposite have gone out of their way to say that it is a reasonable, fair and, indeed, the only proper interpretation to be placed upon that subsection.

What is the objection? The objection is that somebody in the Department of Justice has advised that in one case this subsection has been interpreted in a way which runs counter to the interpretation that I have given. There is the issue. This judgment I have submitted has no bearing on my interpretation of section 51, subsection 4, and somebody else of experience and whose integrity I do not doubt says it has. Is the matter to rest there? It is very easy to submit this simple question to a tribunal. The machinery is available. The supreme court will even provide a special session or a special sitting to hear the issue. I know of no valid reason why the Minister of Justice himself might not go and argue the point. Whether the decision is an obiter dictum or not, does anybody think for one moment that the question which is now before the house was ever argued in all its meanings and implications before any court? To ask that question is to answer it. It was not. I submit that that is one way of dealing with this matter which is perplexing the house and possibly the government. Submit it to the courts.

There is another way of dealing with it without amending the constitution, and that way, in my submission, is found in section 52 of the British North America Act. That section states:

> The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

I had my day in court earlier in the week and I do not wish to weary the house with a further technical legal argument. But as we have sat here we have heard praised, and rightly praised, a certain Mr. Newcombe, who was deputy minister of justice for many years and later became Mr. Justice Newcombe of the Supreme Court of Canada. He in one instance apparently gave an interpretation of section 51(4) that I do not share. But this is what Mr. Newcombe says of section 52 and the use to which it may be put. Speaking in the Prince Edward Island case, as reported in volume 33 of the Supreme Court Reports at page 645, Mr. Newcombe says:

I submit that section 52 has no office whatever so far as the present inquiry is concerned; section 52 has never yet been invoked by parliament. The power given under that section has never been executed, but it may be executed and only in one way—that is, by increasing the number fixed for the province of Quebec. If parliament were to provide that Quebec shall have 75 members and that the representation of the other provinces shall be increased accordingly, that would be an enactment quite within the authority of the dominion parliament and referable solely to the authority conferred by section 52.

I shall not read farther. One of the learned judges questioned Mr. Newcombe and asked him if it was not to apply to a certain set of circumstances, if it was not to apply to the admission of the northwest territories and Mr. Newcombe replied in the negative.

I say that if it is deemed desirable to increase the representation of Quebec, if one wants to give Quebec seventy-three members in order that it may have eight more than it has now, it is not necessary for the purpose to amend the British North America Act. Nobody has ever said that it is necessary to amend the constitution to increase the membership of the house under section 52; and we have a high authority, Mr. Newcombe, later Mr. Justice Newcombe, who says that it is not necessary. I say therefore to the government, by all means let us give each province full and fair representation, and that immediately. But to correct one injustice do not initiate a second one. You may refer to the court, if you think it necessary, section 51 (4) for interpretation and you can have a decision in three weeks. If you want to go to the privy council with it you may go at the autumn session. If you wish to increase the number of members from Quebec you can bring in your legislation and this parliament has the power, so long as it preserves the parity, the proportionate representation of the provinces, to enact the means that will enable you to give Quebec more members than it has at the present time. At the same time you will, of course, have to give added representation to the other provinces.

Oh, somebody may object, you are going on with Ontario on the basis of eighty-two members. Of course you are not. You can submit that to the court, if need be. Ontario does not seek any unfair representation in this house. The unit of representation is 51,213. Divide Ontario's population by that number and it will take what comes to it without complaint.

That brings me to this point. I know that in my native province I shall be called a Tory, an imperialist, somebody who is colonially minded; I shall be called many other things. All of that does not weigh very heavily with me because name-calling does not always redound to the glory of him who indulges in it. But I am anxious that it be known fully and clearly that this party stands for justice, that it is not Francophobe and that it is not hostile to the majority of the population in my own province.

I believe it is a great misfortune that a whole ethnological group should find itself in one party. I think it is unfortunate for the party to whom that ethnological group has gone, to seek shelter, if you will. It places that party in a position of ascendancy over that element and causes it to treat it frequently shabbily and as a poor relation and as if it did not enjoy that which is essential to parliamentary government and to representative government; that is, the freedom to go elsewhere if it does not like the treatment it receives at the hands of those to whom it has given its allegiance. It is unfortunate for the party which has the entire support of any ethnological group, because it brings about that type of domination which is undesirable and which is repugnant to the very essence of fair and representative government.

It is unfortunate for another reason. If an ethnological group gives its entire self to one party there is always the danger and temptation that another ethnological group will range itself in opposition to it; and when a people begins to divide, not according to political conviction, but according to race, creed and other divisions of that kind, then trouble awaits that body politic.

Moreover, it is unfortunate for the group which gives itself to—I was going to say, which seeks sanctuary with—one party, because it believes that it can only find protection and self-expression within the party to which it gives its adherence. That is a misfortune, because it places that ethnological group in a position of subservience and forces it to take treatment which it could not and would not take were it entirely free.

But the misfortune does not stop there. It weighs heaviest on a party like mine which is deprived of the wisdom, the culture, the foresight and the tradition of those who make up that ethnological group. We in this party are poor, because in a crisis like this we are denied knowledge of how the heart of him who is most affected—the French Canadian—beats, what he wants, and how he would express himself were he free to break party bonds and do so.

I cannot hold myself out as the interpreter of any group. I have no title to speak for the French people. None of their blood courses through my veins. But I have the great honour—and I consider it a high honour —of representing a constituency in which the big majority of the voters are French, and I consider that, inadequate as is my interpretation of their sentiments, faltering as my words must be, I would be untrue to my mandate if I did not say that which I feel impelled to say here to-night. I want to say that if I went back to my people and had to tell them that by my vote I had consented to make their constitution, that by which they live and thrive and hope to be perpetuated, a mere statute, a mere third-rate statute such as regulates the height of a railway crossing, I would hang my head in shame and feel that I had been unfaithful to their trust in me.

When I go back to my people, regardless of what I may be called in the press, regardless of what my opponents may say of me, I want to say to them, "I believe that the constitution gave you rights and afforded you protection compared with which eight seats in any legislature—eight seats in the parliament of Canada, if you will, much as I honour the position which goes with a seat in this house—seem very small, very meagre, very mean. In contrast to what was yielded up you got nothing."

Consider for a moment this aspect of the matter. Something was said about section 133; I have nothing more to say about that. But when hon. gentlemen opposite accept this method of amending the constitution—and let me point out that although the constitution has been amended in the past easily and lightly, but not frequently, this is the first time that the big issue as such has ever been before parliament—this time we are taking the irretrievable step. Never again will this parliament or anybody in it be heard to say that the constitution is a pact or a treaty. Never again, once this motion has passed, may any hon. member who votes for it raise his voice and say, "My rights have been taken from me", provided that they are taken from him at the behest of the parliament of Canada. We are at the end of a debate in which that contention must vanish forever; and the constitution of Canada will stand, when we emerge from this debate, as the merest statute which can be torn to shreds whenever the exigencies of a political party or a diminishing political majority exact it.

When we have done that, what have we from Quebec surrendered? As the constitution stands to-night, whether the population of Quebec be 100, whether it be 100,000, or whether it be 10,000,000, the province of Quebec, the minority, the people who were here first, the people who were just a little island in a whole sea of peoples of different origins, different cultures, different speech, different aspirations, the people of the province of Quebec have for all time at least sixty-five members in this house. To-night we tear up that guarantee; we throw it to the winds; we put ourselves exactly where Prince Edward Island is, and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HACKETT: Somebody says "poof", but time plays strange pranks with peoples. There was a time when Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were mighty among the colonies on this continent; but times have changed and they are now small, insignificant, and two out of the three of these provinces are dependent upon the amendment which gives to those provinces that pittance of representation in this house equal to that in the senate.

I am no predictor of ill; I forecast no evil for Quebec. But the day may well come when those fertile prairies of the west, that rich hinterland of the north, will possess a proportion of our population which will reduce Quebec to sixty members, to fifty members, to forty members, to thirty members, and to the mere handful of twenty-four secured to it by section 51A of the constitution. Oh, you may say that I am drawing on my imagination. Well, I recall a page in Macaulay—I may not cite it accurately—in which he foresees the day when England will no longer be mistress of the seas, when England will no longer be ruler of the world, and he speaks of that day as one in which "a single naked fisherman shall be seen washing his nets in the river of ten thousand masts". We know what has happened to the greatness of Massachusetts, for example, and to the population in the industrial centres of that state who have gone south. We have not to go far to find considerable shifts of population such as have occurred recently in the New England states. I say, therefore, to hon. gentlemen opposite: If you wish to support this motion to-night you are yielding yourselves up to a fortune which may play you a sorry prank; and I for one, wishing to be true to the mandate that was entrusted to me and entrusted to me despite grave temptation to the contrary, because appeals were made to a majority, which I could not very well resist, I would feel, I say, unfair to those men and women; I would feel that I was unfair to their children and their children's children, if I sold them out in order that my province might for a short time have eight more members in this house than it has to-night.

There was a time when Ontario had eighty-one members, another when it had 92 members, and it is universally admitted to-night—and Ontario does not flinch from it—that if the account were properly made it is entitled only to seventy-four. All right; seventy-four from the top; that is nineteen off. Treat Quebec in the same way; take 19 from Quebec, and it does not require much imagination to appreciate the result. However, I am doing that which I deem to be my duty when I say to my hon. friends opposite: You are writing finis to the chapter; you are putting an end to your right ever to complain of any inequality, of any unfairness, of any encroachment upon your rights, because you of the province of Quebec know as well as I do that, without your support, this parliament, this government, is powerless. Without your support, without your wish, without your will, the British North America Act cannot be amended, so that your rights and privileges may be torn therefrom it any time to suit the exigencies of a parliamentary majority.

I do not like to be disagreeable to anybody. My hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) the other day said that it was not the first time the Tories and the Nationalists of Quebec had united for nefarious purposes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HACKETT: "Hear, hear"! It may lie in the mouths of some people to say that, but not in the mouth of the party represented by the hon. gentlemen whence the "hear, hear" came. May I say to the hon. gentleman who made the charge that unless my memory plays me false an agreement was made between a gentleman before whose memory I bow—he was a God-fearing man—the late Mr. Woodsworth, and the right hon. gentleman who leads the government to-day, whereby the late Mr. Woodsworth dictated the policy of the Liberal party in the period between 1926 and 1930, in order that the party opposite might remain in power.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has made the statement that an agreement was made between Mr. Woodsworth and myself whereby this government was in some measure controlled. I say there never was at any time any such agreement.

Mr. HACKETT: I will ask the right hon. gentleman whether he received the letter in which Mr. Woodsworth accuses him of not carrying out the agreement, and which was put on Hansard on January 20, 1926, at page 560, to which the right hon. gentleman replied on January 28, 1926.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That matter has been discussed half a dozen times in this house, and if my hon. friend will look at the volumes of Hansard where the matter is referred to he will find a complete reply. I am giving him my word at the present time that there was no such agreement made by myself with any party in this house.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the hon. gentleman should read both letters. I do not think there is any accusation in the letter written to the Prime Minister. There is in it something which I am not a bit ashamed to have read, but my hon. friend, I say, should read both letters.

Mr. HACKETT: The two letters are here, and the letter from Mr. Woodsworth to the Prime Minister is this:

As representatives of labour in the House of Commons, may we ask whether it is your intention to introduce at this session legislation with regard to (a) provision for the unemployed; (b) old age pensions?

We are venturing to send a similar inquiry to the leader of the opposition.

Then Mr. Woodsworth went on to explain that he had been informed that these undertakings would be carried out, and the Prime Minister wrote him a letter.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Do not read excerpts; read the text.

Mr. HACKETT: The Prime Minister wrote him a letter on January 28, as follows—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Finish the other letter.

Mr. HACKETT: I shall:

We are venturing to send a similar inquiry to the leader of the opposition.

Yours sincerely,

J. S. Woodsworth,
A. A. Heaps.

I now read the Prime Minister's letter:

Dear Mr. Woodsworth:

Replying to the letter received from Mr. Heaps and yourself, dated January 7, in which you ask whether it is the intention of the government to introduce at this session legislation with regard to

(a) provision for the unemployed, and

(b) old age pensions, I would refer you, respecting provision for the unemployed, to the answer given in the House of Commons to-day by the Hon. Ernest Lapointe on behalf of the government in reply to a question by yourself and which indicated the government's intention of carrying out with respect to emergency relief the practice adopted in cooperation with provinces and municipalities in the years immediately following the war. In answer to a question from Mr. Neill, Mr. Lapointe further intimated that it was the intention of the government to introduce at this session legislation with respect to old age pensions. You will observe that the statement made by Mr. Lapointe was in accordance with the intimation which I gave to Mr. Heaps and yourself at the time of our interview, following the receipt of the communication herein referred to.

With respect to amendments to (a) the Immigration Act; (b) the Naturalization Act, and (c) the criminal code, which were referred to at the time of our interview, I would say that having since taken up the proposed amendments with the ministers concerned, I feel that I am in a position to assure you that legislation on these matters will also be introduced in the course of the present session.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is wrong with that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say one word? I have been asked repeatedly by leaders of the opposition and of other parties in the house what the intention of the government was with respect to certain legislation. I have given the information as best I could; but it is quite a different thing to answer a question and give information from entering into an agreement with any party to do a certain thing. There was no agreement. I was stating the intention of the government in reply to an inquiry, just as I would expect the leader of the opposition in reply to an inquiry, to state his intention. I do not call that entering into an agreement or subjecting one's party to the control of another party.

Mr. HACKETT: I draw the attention of [illegible] for Rosetown-Biggar referred to combinations between the Tories and the Nationalists; [illegible] they were following a very bad example which was set by the C.C.F. party and the Liberals who were then almost in a minority and who were dependent upon the good will of the party headed to-day by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for support and for their very parliamentary existence.

The other evening the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said that we had no reason to fear that anything would happen to the rights and prerogatives of the province of Quebec. These words are not his, but I quote them from Le Canada, the paper of his party, which gives him the following flaming headline:

La conscience universelle et le fair play britannique protègent la langue française.

The translation is:

The universal conscience and British fair play protect the French language.

I am going to say to the Minister of Justice that British fair play is not restricted to the British isles. I hope, I believe, I know that there is fair play not only in one but in all provinces. That being so, is there any reason why the other parties to this contract, from which the B.N.A. Act emerges, a contract the observance of which is so important and vital to them, should not be consulted? I submit that the very essence of British fair play would impel the minister to take any amendment to this document to the provinces before going abroad with it. Is there any reason to suspect that these provinces will be unfair in considering it?

Then there is the wail that this party is in collusion with the government of the province of Quebec. So far as I am concerned I wish it were. I see no impropriety in parties finding expression both in the legislatures and in the House of Commons. I see no impropriety in closer relationship between the members of this house and the government of Quebec. Unfortunately that relationship does not exist, but in so far as I at least am concerned I would see no impropriety in such a relationship.

There is also the question which possibly I should have raised a little earlier in my remarks had I treated it in its proper place, namely, the question of cost. According to the British North America Act, 230 representatives from the various provinces of this dominion should constitute the next parliament of Canada. It will mean a reduction of twenty-five members if one considers the 255 mentioned in the motion of the minister. It is impossible to maintain a member of parliament for less than $10,000 a year. He receives as an emolument and, for expenses, the sum of $6,000. Add to that travelling expenses; the salary of a secretary and other incidentals. I submit that the public accounts show that the cost of maintaining a member is something in excess of $10,000 a year. The sum of $10,000, multiplied by twenty-five, is $250,000, and on that basis, taking current interest rates, it entails a capital of $10,000,000, which even in these days is worth while saving.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to say to the government that they have no mandate whatsoever for this proposed legislation. They should consider the time, the place and the manner in which they are asking for this legislation. The British North America Act, at the time it was passed, was looked upon as the law of the Medes and Persians; it could not be changed. You may call it a pact, a compact, a contract, an agreement or a treaty; you can call it anything you like. There is a difference of opinion on the part of those who have taken part in this debate. Some have been for one thing and some for another.

So far as this particular resolution is concerned, we have no right, for political purposes, to make a scrap of paper out of the British North America Act. That is what we are doing, making a scrap of paper of the work of the fathers of confederation. Let us look at what the government is doing to-day. If we open the door at all we shall have what happened in the United States. The house will remember what happened over there when they tried to interfere with the written constitution. There is in Canada a written constitution, the British North America Act. There is an unwritten constitution, consisting of customs, usages, conventions, precedents and all these things, which is called the unwritten law. These things have been expounded. If you open the door at all, what is to become of section 133; what is to become of section 55 of which the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) gave a learned exposition?

I can tell you what happened in the United States. They annexed ten states; some were bought from one country and some from another. In Louisiana they had a condition somewhat similar to the condition we have in one of the provinces of Canada. They had a government under Huey Long there, and look at what they did notwithstanding written law, unwritten law, the terms of a treaty and purchase or language or anything else.

The government has no mandate for this proposed legislation. Who is asking for it? Has any provincial legislature passed a resolution in favour of this legislation? I say no. I know a great many people in the province of Ontario, and I tell you the answer of this province is going to be, "No surrender." This comes at a very unfortunate time, when we consider what we have been doing since this parliament met last March. We are to have a new flag and a new anthem, and they want to abolish appeals to the privy council. I can tell you this, that the privy council is one court where a litigant can get justice. I remember a decision in 1914 of Lord Haldane, referred to by an hon. member the other evening, in connection with public ownership of light, power and transportation in the province of Ontario. We never would have had the cheap light and power had it not been for the privy council. Injunction after injunction was issued. I insisted upon an appeal to the privy council, and a great victory was won in 1912 and 1914 for municipal institutions in this province.

I am going to ask the Minister of Justice a question, because he is always polite and courteous. I want to point out that the municipalities and the provinces have a practice of submitting election matters to the people by a referendum or plebiscite. The people should vote on this resolution. Many provinces have that municipal legislation. It is a good and wise provision, because it protects the taxpayers and the voters, by a vote of the people, from what the legislatures occasionally do. I have brought into this house on other occasions a bill providing for the holding of plebiscites or referendums on these great national questions, and I should like to ask the minister if that practice could not be adopted here. After all, as has been shown in this debate, the last census was not taken properly. That was not the fault of the census officials, but resulted from the fact that the war was in progress. There were 70,000 soldiers from the Toronto district spread all over Canada and overseas; women and war workers moved to other parts of the country, and they were not counted when the census was taken from door to door. For that reason we should wait until after the census of 1951. Then we should have a referendum or plebiscite before we change the whole system of representation which we have followed since 1867.

We would not be doing something new in holding a referendum, because late in 1941, on motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), a referendum was held in connection with changing what had been done previously in regard to one matter, and a vote was taken in every federal constituency. Here you are going to change the whole federal law and alter the present situation, which means you are going to open the door to changes in the British North America Act and make a scrap of paper out of that part of the act. The provinces exist to-day because of a treaty or agreement or contract, a pact and a compact. The provinces have their constitution under section 92; the field of federal matters is laid out in section 91. Now, over the heads of the representatives of the people, of our own accord we are going to make an application to His Majesty the King and the parliament of the United Kingdom along certain lines. I can tell you, from what has been said in the debates on the last two or three applications of this kind, that this request will not be sanctioned by the British house without a very lively debate, and questioning as to what consultation has been had with the provinces. We have been changing many things. Through isolation and separatism we have almost closed the door on the old land. Here we have a compact of 1867 upon which the two old provinces agreed, and it cannot be changed in this way.

There is another matter I should like to mention in conclusion. The first thing this house should do is recover some of the rights, privileges and functions we have lost to outside boards. Call this a free parliament! I would not call it a free parliament at all. The press was founded on the ruins of the old type of parliamentary representation they had in England. The press has been the only organ of public opinion. The defects in our parliamentary system brought about this. From the time of the reform bill in 1834 right down to the change in the constitution which wiped out the rotten boroughs and the pocket boroughs and all that kind of thing, the press had a part to play, and they fulfilled the functions which were later performed by the House of Commons when it had real parliamentary representation. Now, if you are going to tinker with the constitution in this way you are going to cause wide disunity in this country. The people back in the constituencies must be considered. We have no mandate from them. I have no mandate from my constituents to support an application like this; neither has any other Ontario member sitting in this house. Shades of Wallace and McCarthy and John Ross Robertson and John R. Robinson, while all this is going on in this House of Commons over the heads of the electors back home!

In my opinion the procedure is all wrong. If you make a scrap of paper out of certain sections of the British North America Act the whole thing will be wrecked, and we shall be back where we were before confederation. You will notice that no bill has been brought in with regard to this matter. In other days, when an amendment of the British North America Act was considered, the resolution was supported by a bill which had to pass both houses of parliament. I believe that should have been the practice followed here, because you cannot move the six months' hoist under this resolution. To-night I tried to introduce an amendment under which we would adopt the municipal law, but it was not even read to the house, although seconded by the hon. member for High Park. I want to point out that a private member has certain rights, privileges and functions in this house which cannot be interfered with. I remember reminding this house the other evening that when King Charles marched into parliament and addressed his honour, Speaker Lenthal, the reply was, "I have neither eyes to see nor ears to hear but as the house gives me utterance."

Once more I am going to ask the Minister of Justice, will he not agree to postpone this matter until after the census of 1951 and a referendum to the people on it? I see the minister shaking his head; apparently he is not going to answer directly. Then will he agree to adopt the municipal law? Again I see his answer is no. Well, the minister has given only two noes; once in the province of Ontario we had to vote on four noes, in connection with the temperance vote. I suppose we shall just have to swallow this and say nothing more about it. If that is what parliamentary government in Canada is amounting to, the quicker the house of parliament prorogues and we have an election, the better. We shall have one in the fall anyway over this very matter of provincial and federal rights.

As I said before, the provinces are a duplicate municipal system, and they have grave questions to deal with. The British North America Act came about because of a compromise, and there should be some compromise about this matter.

I am sorry the government have taken this stand. They have no authority; they have no mandate. If the province of Ontario, which contributes about forty-one per cent of the taxes, is to have its membership cut down, then the people of Ontario will find out about it. There is no better way to wreck confederation than to pass the proposed resolution. It will not provide a system of checks and balances, or improve parliamentary representation. It is simply an application to the mother of parliaments, and I hope before long it will be thrown out over there.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there are just a few points about which I wish to say a few words. First of all, I shall dispose of some that I had noted prior to the continuation of the debate this afternoon, and then perhaps I shall have a little to say about some of the later speeches we have heard. There seems to be some anxiety as to whether or not the enacting of the amendment proposed in this resolution would affect the provisions of the British North America Act known as section 51 (a) and section 52. Section 51 (a) reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province.

Section 52 reads:

> The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

Sections 51 (a) and 52 will not be affected in any way. It is a principle of interpretation that has even been inserted as a text in our Interpretation Act. Section 10 reads:

> The law shall be considered as always speaking, and whenever any matter or thing is expressed in the present tense, the same shall be applied to the circumstances as they arise, so that effect may be given to each act and every part thereof, according to its spirit, true intent and meaning.

Section 51 as proposed in this resolution; section 51 (a) as I have read it and section 52 as I have read it will still continue to speak and may, if and when occasion arises to resort to them, provide authority for whatever may be found to be the right thing to do at the proper time. The United Kingdom interpretation act, which would probably apply to this statute in view of the fact that it is a statute passed by the imperial parliament, provides in its section 8 that every secion of an act shall have effect as a substantive enactment without introductory words. Then section 32, subsection 1, provides:

Where an act passed after the commencement of this act—

That was in 1889.

—confers a power or imposes a duty, then, unless the contrary intention appears, the power may be exercised and the duty shall be performed from time to time as occasion requires.

I submit that section 51 as contained in the resolution; section 51 (a) as it already is in the act and section 52 as it already is in the act, shall all three remain there as separate enactments providing powers that may be exercised whenever occasion requires them to be used.

Mr. BROOKS: May I ask the minister a question just for my own information? With respect to New Brunswick where we have ten members out of 245, if the representation is changed to ten members out of 255 would that not change the proportionate representation of New Brunswick and would that not be a violation of section 52?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Section 52 is not a section which restrains in any way the powers of the parliament of the United Kingdom; section 52 is a section which deals with the powers of the parliament of Canada. The parliament of Canada could not, by increasing the number of members of Canada, change the proportion. According to part of the argument of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr Hackett), with which I will deal a little later, he would seem to contend that that would be representation by population, disregarding other restrictions. But that would not be my construction. My construction of the act would be that if section 52 were used at the present time or at any time in future the number of members of parliament for a province would have to be the proportion it had prior to the increase, and if there were an increase from 255 to 355, New Brunswick would have to have 10/255ths of 355.

Mr. BROOKS: Why not 10/245ths?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is not what we are asking the imperial parliament to enact at the present time. In 1915 Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick got something which they did not have before, something which gave them representation not based upon their numerical proportion of the population of Canada. On this occasion an application is being made to get a new basis of distribution which will not reduce the representation of Prince Edward Island but which will not give it the additional half member it would receive if it were an increase made by the parliament of Canada under section 52.

I should like to call the attention of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin), who was so much concerned about the vote that he did say he would give after the amendment that was then before the Chair had been defeated, to the vote and proceedings of the legislative assembly of the province of Quebec of March 7, 1945. He will find there that the following resolution was moved, seconded and voted upon after debate:

Whereas, under the amendment to the constitution in 1943 our province was deprived of its proportion of representation in ratio to the other provinces;

Wherefore this house invite the federal government to revise the electoral map before the elections so as to render justice to the province of Quebec.

That motion was put and the vote was 82 yeas, no nays. Among those who voted with the yeas was the Hon. Mr. Godbout, the same gentleman of whom the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres spoke this afternoon, and the Hon. Mr. Duplessis, of whom the hon. gentleman also spoke this afternoon. They and eighty of their colleagues in the legislature voted to invite the federal government to revise the electoral map before the elections so as to render justice to the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Stanstead has said that the party to which he belongs regards the raising of the representation of the province of Quebec to seventy-three, provided the representation of Ontario is to remain at eighty-two, as an act of justice. If that is so, if that is the view that those who are opposing this resolution take, then I can say to the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres that the eighty-two members of the legislature of Quebec who voted that resolution have invited us to do that act of justice.

With respect to the legal argument advanced by the hon. member for Stanstead, with the first portion of his speech I was very much impressed. I thought it was helpful, something that would be of great value to the national unity of this country. But I was unable to persist in that impression of his speech as it developed. The legal argument is that under section 52, without an amendment, if it were desired to have the representation of Quebec at seventy-three, a redistribution could be made which would give Ontario eighty-three. Let us see just what that section says.

The hon. member for Stanstead and I have grown up together. We very often have the same ideas, and this is one which I put to the law officers of the department, asking them if we could not by using section 52 bring about this fair readjustment, eliminate this over-representation which the province of Ontario does not want, which the members of the Progressive Conservative party, speaking through the hon. member for Stanstead, come into the house and say: We do not want it to continue. Nevertheless in fact we see what measures are being taken to prevent the over-representation from being adjusted. Section 52 says:

> The number of members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this act is not thereby disturbed.

The opinion I got from the officers of the department was that the proportionate representation prescribed by this act was 82/245ths for Ontario at the present time and 62/245ths for Quebec at the present time, and that if there were an increase in number that would bring Quebec's up to seventy-three, then Ontario's would have to go necessarily to ninety-two, Nova Scotia to thirteen and New Brunswick to eleven, each one being increased by just a little bit less than one-eighth; Manitoba, seventeen on the basis of the last census would go from fourteen to sixteen; Saskatchewan, on the basis of the last census, would go from seventeen to nineteen; Alberta from seventeen to nineteen; British Columbia from sixteen to eighteen.

The hon. member says: Well, if you want Quebec to have seventy-three, give them seventy-three. But what difference in the proportionate representation would that make? To what degree would that cure injustice if it means adding ten to the eighty-two already representing Ontario?

The hon. member says: Well, submit it to the court. I suggested submitting it to the court, and I was told that it was quite useless to attempt to get a decision that would be anything but a strict interpretation of this section 52, which requires the increase in number to respect the proportion of representation at the time it is made.

What objection is there to doing it in this way if it is the fair thing to do? This is a way that will do it, and do it in a manner the legality of which cannot be questioned by anyone. Nobody can pretend, if this resolution carries and an amendment is made to the British North America Act in these terms, that it will not be absolutely valid, that there can be any question whatever about its legality. Is that not the right thing to do with respect to the representation in this house? If it is the fair thing to do, why not do it in a manner about which no one can raise any question? If the hon. gentlemen on the other side agree that it is the fair thing to do, why all this debate and all this opposition and all these amendments that have been brought forward?

But it did not stop there. I shall not impute motives; I am just drawing conclusions as to what would be the effect of the attitude, taken, and contrasting it with the speeches made from the other side in opposition to this redistribution. I am not over-impressed by the dismal picture of the future of my race in Canada drawn by the hon. member for Stanstead. I do not foresee an early day when the descendants of the French who have inhabited this country for over three centuries will be reduced to the poor fisherman washing his nets on desolate banks of the St. Lawrence. I feel that my people, those of my race, can stand on their own feet and that if they get in the parliament of their nation the right to be represented by a number of elected members proportionate to their own numbers they will be very well taken care of and they will have no occasion to complain of any unfairness. This bugaboo that is brought forth to scare them away from the restoration of something that no one here dare say is not the fair thing to do impresses me very little. Your language, it is said, will be taken from you! Your rights will be taken from you!

If this thing goes through, it will be the last of the contention that the provinces have to be consulted and then there is no protection for the rights of the minorities! If it is to be the last of the contention that the constitution of this nation cannot be amended in respect of national matters unless the proposal be subjected to the veto of the great powers who sit in the provincial capitals, then I think this is a happy day for Canada. This veto business is something which is proving very difficult in the assembly of the united nations, and if in this assembly of the representatives of the Canadian people we can down it forever we shall be performing a service to the Canadian nation.

I think all hon. members who have participated in the debate and who have brought forward all the arguments that could be used for or against such a contention. I agree with the hon. member for Stanstead that there will be no occasion hereafter to say that the decision which is to be made on this resolution is an obiter dictum. It is a thing which will have been argued and which will have been considered and about which the will and judgment of the representatives of the whole of the Canadian people will have registered their finding. May it be a finding that will endure.

Another objection is: Oh, yes, we want fairness, we want justice, but be careful; it is going to cost $10,000,000 to give it to you. It is going to cost $10 million to give Quebec that justice which Ontario is so anxious Quebec should have, but about which they want references to the courts; they want referenda to the population; they want the application of municipal law. All this is nice talk. "We want you to have that, but just try this, or that or the other thing before you get it; and in the meantime, of course, we will have", according to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), "another census, and we will try to see if you cannot do with a little less than we are so anxious to have you get, provided that you do not get it now".

I am glad that officially the Progressive Conservative party is taking the position that it is fair that Quebec should have this representation. I am glad and I think it will be helpful to national unity that the party go on record as taking that position. But I hope that it will not only do so only in words written into Hansard, that it will be not only a line of convenient pronouncement, but a line of actual conduct to be followed. I agree with the hon. member for Stanstead that it would be a more healthy situation if the party to which he belongs could get some representation in the constituencies of my province. It may be unfortunate that they cannot do so, but it is not my conduct that is the cause of that unfortunate result. I hope that the language used by the hon. member for Stanstead will be translated into action by the members of the party to which he belongs. It is by actions and only by actions that they can hope to win support from the constituencies of my province.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution has now been sufficiently debated and that the time has come when the question can be put to the members of this assembly.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

96. Departmental administration, $199,970.

Mr. FLEMING: The Minister of Justice will recall that when the estimates of his department were before the house last December he made a statement in regard to his intention to introduce a bill with reference to judges' salaries. His words are to be found at page 3473 of Hansard and are as follows:

> I hope to have a bill dealing with that matter at the next session, to come into force at a later day, not upon adoption. I hope to have it for consideration of parliament at the next session, with the proviso in it that it will come into operation on a day that would appear to be a reasonable one to fix, hoping that the ceilings on salaries would by then have been greatly loosened or removed.

May I ask the minister whether it is the intention to introduce such a measure at the present session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The bill has been prepared, and I hope that a resolution providing for its introduction will soon be recommended by His Excellency for the consideration of the house.

Mr. FLEMING: At the present session?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: At this session.

Mr. FLEMING: There is a problem connected with the matter of judges' pensions of which the minister is fully aware, arising out of the statute of 1944 amending the Judges Act which permitted the judges then holding a judicial office to make an election so that their pensions might be shared with their widows. The effect of the legislation was to confine it to judges then holding office, without affording any opportunity in any of its terms to permit the election to be made by any person who had at the date of the enactment of the amending act been retired as a judge. The form of the legislation was certainly not broad enough to include those persons, and if such persons, namely retired judges were to be included within the scope of such a scheme it would be necessary to introduce legislation in quite a different form, I think, because of the difference between the grant by letters patent of the pension prior to 1944 and the right to pension subsisting under the amendment of 1944. It does not require any words from me to suggest that there was a measure of injustice to those who had been retired prior to the enactment of the amendment in 1944. It may be that there were reasons pressing on the government and parliament at the time which might have made it difficult to extend the scope of the legislation. But the principle is sound. The principle of permitting judges to make within a given period—in that case I think it was ninety days—an election to share their pensions with their widows so that in the event of their death the portion assigned to the widow could pass to her for life, was sound. I would urge that it ought to be extended to those who happened to have been retired at the date of the enactment of the amendment to the Judges Act in 1944. I am sure that the Minister of Justice must take a sympathetic view of these cases. I would ask if it is not possible for the government to indicate whether it is proper to widen the scope of the principle which received effect in the 1944 amendments? This need not be made compulsory any more than section 26A of the act as enacted in 1944. It would be purely optional to give those who are retired an opportunity, within a reasonable period, say, ninety days, to make a similar election.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are two matters in that connection which have been under consideration and which, I hope, will come to be dealt with before very long. One is the position of those who had retired prior to the amendment made in 1944, and who are still with us and able to make an option. The other is with respect to widows of judges, and there are several. There are a large number of judges who died before there was any section in the act permitting them to make this kind of provision. I think both will have to be considered together. I consider they are desirable things to be done, but they are not the only desirable things before the government for consideration and study, and I did not feel it would be an opportune time, at this session, to ask parliament to deal with those judges who had retired prior to 1944 and with the widows of those who had died before the 1944 statute was adopted. There were suggestions and proposals for the establishment of a system of old age pensions on a contributory basis among the things suggested to the dominion-provincial conference. Had something definite and generally satisfactory become possible as a result of that conference, I then would have felt it much easier to bring before parliament a measure to make provision for those widows and judges. I hope there will come a time, at a not too remote period, when it will be possible to consider the position of those judges who had retired and of those widows, without having to meet the criticism that there are many others just as worthy of sympathetic consideration by this parliament who should be provided for at the same time. For that reason I felt this was not the proper time to attempt to deal with the problem referred to.

The other was dealt with in 1944 because it was an option that was granted and with respect to that it could be felt that it did not impose any serious burden on the treasury. It did not increase the amount of pension which might be payable, through two-thirds to the judge and the other one-third to his consort. It was the same amount and there were the same chances of longevity, so that it did not appear to impose any substantial burden upon the treasury. But this other provision which I should like to be able to recommend to my colleagues just as soon as we can get to it would impose quite a substantial burden upon the treasury, and I do not think it would be the kind of measure that should be recommended to this house at this session, because there are too many other things that have also to receive consideration.

Mr. FLEMING: Does the minister think it necessary to wait and couple those two measures together? As he has said, the extension of the option to those judges who had been retired prior to 1944 would not involve any additional burden upon the dominion treasury. Could it not then be dealt with without waiting to deal with the other question, namely pensions to judges' widows? There are some retired judges who feel—I know the right hon. gentleman is aware of this—that an injustice had been done them in comparison with those who were on the bench when the amendment was passed in 1944. These are men who are on in years. Many of them are anxious that they should make provision for their widows by undertaking to share their pensions with them; and, since it does not involve any additional burden to the treasury, I wonder if it is not a matter that calls for early remedy.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I should not like to do that. I prefer taking them together. To do one would increase the pressure for the other. There are quite a large number of charming ladies who have been left in circumstances which make it difficult for them to provide for their requirements according to the manner in which they had lived previously; and I think they would consider that when anything else is done about this, it should take them in as well. I should not like to recommend doing one thing without the other. I think it would give them the impression that their case was becoming more and more remote, so that I prefer to have the two things done together. When they are done, they will take care of everything then existing. If one of the retired judges, alive to-day, should die before this is done, leaving a widow, his widow would be in the same class as the other widows to be dealt with or whose cases would come up to be dealt with.

Mr. FLEMING: That would be the intention of the government if it introduced the legislation?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. If legislation is introduced it will apply not only to widows whose husbands died in office but also to the widows of those who had been judges and had retired before their death. So that all the cases would be covered. Of course they are all anxious to have it done just as soon as possible; and the explanation I have given to large numbers of frequent, repeated representations, often from the same persons, has had to be that I did not feel I could ask parliament to deal with these cases while there were many other things that many hon. members would consider even more urgent.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may say so, I think the Minister of Justice is taking the right attitude. While the question which has been asked regarding pensions to widows of judges appeals to one's sense of appreciation of the position of a judge and to the family that he leaves, nevertheless I think the minister is quite right that at this stage, when people are looking for something better in old age pensions and perhaps something in the way of a national health plan and so on, the masses of the people would expect that the government would do some of these things that have been pressed upon all of us and that many of us have warmly advocated, before singling out the dependents of a certain class of persons who during their earning years have been receiving relatively high remuneration.

PRIVILEGE

REFERENCE TO SPEAKER'S RULING ON AMENDMENT, JUNE 20

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is not often I do. I wish to call Your Honour's attention to what happened last night, in order to keep the record straight and right. I moved an amendment, which I had put in writing, to the resolution that was then before the chair. Standing order 47 says:

All motions shall be in writing, and seconded, before being debated or put from the Chair.

My motion was in writing and was seconded by the hon. member for High Park (Mr. McMaster). I know that my writing is not as good at it was a few days ago, but I hold it in my hand now, and it is clear enough to read. My only point is this: I wish to assert the rights and privileges of a member of parliament in moving an amendment. My amendment was to the effect that the readjustment should not take effect until after the next census in 1951 and then only after a plebiscite or referendum. My amendment was ruled out of order by Your Honour, in these words:

I am sorry, but I cannot accept the amendment moved by the hon. member. The rules state that a motion or amendment should be presented to the Chair in such a way that it can be read by the Speaker.

I submit that there is no such regulation. Standing order 47 says that the motion shall be in writing, and my motion was in writing, and was seconded, and I read it aloud to the house. Your Honour further said:

The rules are quite definite that a motion should be presented to the Chair with the name of the mover and the name of the seconder and presented in such a way that the Chair can read it to the house. Unfortunately I cannot do that in this case.

There is no such provision in our standing orders at all. It was a very simple matter to read my amendment. I had not time to have it typed. I believe that ninety-nine per cent of the members here could read it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is my duty to answer the hon. member. I understand perfectly well that it is the duty of the Speaker to do everything possible to help hon. members of this house, particularly when they have a motion to introduce. But I understand also that it is the duty of hon. members, if they have a motion, and especially if the motion is important, to draft it in such a way that the Speaker can present it to the house.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. CHURCH: May I call Your Honour's attention to the fact that if the Speaker cannot read it, then under the standing order it should be read by the Clerk of the House and duly recorded in Votes and Proceedings, which it was not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I cannot permit any debate.

SEAMEN'S STRIKE—GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF SHIPPING COMPANIES AS OF JUNE 24

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, since it is now apparently impossible to expect the inland shipping owners and their striking crews, members of the Canadian seamen's union, to get together and effect a settlement which will stop this serious tie-up on our great lakes transportation route, the government has decided to take over the operations of 29 of the shipping companies affected, as of 9 a.m., Monday, June 24.

Captain E. S. Brand, O.B.E., R.C.N., of Ottawa, has been appointed controller of the operations of these companies. Mr. Justice S. E. Richards of Winnipeg, member of the Manitoba Court of Appeals, has been appointed an industrial disputes inquiry commissioner to conciliate the matters at issue between the two parties while the controller is in charge.

These steps have been taken by the government under order in council P.C. 2556, dated June 20, and passed under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. I now table a copy of the order.

I would like to say that the order has been passed on the joint recommendation of myself and my colleague, the Minister of Transport.

I want the house to know that I would have been happier if the action taken had been unnecessary but this dispute has lasted beyond all reason and is causing serious dislocation in the movement of highly essential products, grain, coal, oil and other commodities.

I would far rather see all such disputes settled by representatives of both sides sitting down together and ironing out their differences in a fair and equitable way. Since the strike began on May 24, all the conciliation machinery of the Department of Labour—and it is adequate machinery—has been utilized to bring the parties into agreement. The attitude of both sides has been the stumbling block and that is why the government has taken the action which I have just announced.

I now table the following documents:

1. Copy of the commission appointing the Hon. Mr. Justice S. E. Richards;

2. Copy of a communication addressed to me by the national war labour board providing for the immediate introduction of the eight-hour day, three-watch system, on vessels operating on the great lakes and St. Lawrence waterways.

We hope that the operators and the employees will give 100 per cent cooperation, and we hope also that through the good offices of the commissioner a firm agreement will soon be consummated between the disputing parties so that the government control can be lifted.

The task of negotiating the terms of the contracts to take the place of the agreement which has existed heretofore between many of the companies and their employees is not going to be an easy one. However, Mr. Justice S. E. Richards, if given reasonable cooperation by the parties, will, I am sure, obtain results which will be satisfactory.

Under the order in council which I have just tabled, control is also taken of oil tankers operated by the oil companies. Most of these companies are already working on an eight-hour day by direction of the national war labour board. However, since these vessels in consequence of the strike have not been operating, it was deemed advisable in the public interest to bring them under the control order.

I would like to say a few words about the qualifications of Captain Brand for the position of controller. He holds his rank because of service in the imperial royal navy, and during the war period has been on loan to the Royal Canadian Navy with the temporary rank of captain.

Throughout the war he has been serving as naval intelligence officer and director of the trade division. For the last year he has been one of the key officers on the naval headquarters staff, and has served since July, 1942, as a member of the Canadian shipping board.

He has been selected as controller because of his long experience in naval and navigation matters and because of his administrative capacity and good judgment.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that one of the companies involved in the dispute, the Upper Lakes and St. Lawrence Transportation Company Limited, operating one of the largest services on the lakes, consisting of twenty-seven vessels, has accepted the strike settlement formula which appears on pages 2632 and 2633 of Hansard, and pursuant to clause 1 thereof has to-day signed a supplementary memorandum of understanding with the Canadian seamen's union which provides for the practical application of the eight-hour day, three-watch system. This company's vessels are now being manned and will commence to sail to-morrow.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of his statement a few moments ago. Perhaps I did not understand him correctly. In appointing the controller is he taking over only the ships which transport the commodities he mentions —coal, grain and oil—or are all commodities included?

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend would like to have a copy of the order I will see that he gets one. It is all-inclusive, with the exception of passenger transport, and I have been assured by the men's organization that there will be no interference.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask the leader of the government a question. I understand that the special committee on the revision of standing orders has presented its final report. When will this matter come up for consideration? This is the fifty-sixth day of the session. The chairman of the committee is not here.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid the chairman of the committee will have to give my hon. friend the information he is asking for. I cannot give him any answer at the moment.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

MR. BRIDGES—STATEMENT WITH REFERENCE TO REPORT IN CANADIAN PRESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a personal explanation. In the five o'clock edition of yesterday's Ottawa Journal there appears a news item, as a Canadian press dispatch from Fredericton, on page 6 of the same under the heading of "Beaverbrook Accepts Chancellorship of N.B. University". The final paragraph reads as follows:

A few months ago, visiting a military hospital in England with fisheries minister H. F. G. Bridges, he told the nurse who escorted him that he only had time to talk with the New Brunswickers. The nurse, an Ontario girl, remarked that Ontario is the "heart of Canada." "Madam," said His Lordship, "the heart is where the head is—and the head is in New Brunswick."

I was not Minister of Fisheries when I visited that hospital in England, as that was in February, 1945. I was then an officer in the Canadian army and I met my friend and benefactor of twenty years ago—Lord Beaverbrook—as we happened to be visiting the same hospital at the same time. What actually occurred on that occasion was this: he told the nursing sister that he wanted to visit the boys from New Brunswick or the maritime provinces. To which she replied: "My, you people from the maritimes are clannish. I come from Ontario and we regard Ontario as the heart of Canada". To which he quickly answered: "The heart was never the head, madam." Then as we walked along—and I do not believe the nursing sister heard this—he said to me: "Bridges, I hope she doesn't find out I was born in Ontario".

In fairness to Lord Beaverbrook and myself, I feel I should make this correction.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE IN CHRYSLER AUTOMOBILE PLANT, WINDSOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram a few minutes ago on which I wish to base a question: I have not been able to give notice of it to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), and I apologize for that. The telegram is from Mr. George Burt, of the United automobile workers, Windsor, drawing attention to the strike in the Chrysler plant, intimating that it is likely to spread, and asking what steps are being taken to endeavour to bring an end to this strike, which will interfere with the production of farm machinery and automobiles.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): That dispute is being handled by the conciliation department of the Ontario government.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO FACILITIES FOR INVESTMENT IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce to the house the decision of the government with respect to peacetime facilities for the investment of general public savings in government securities.

As the house is aware, the active life of the national war finance committee ended after the ninth victory loan. It was considered that this organization had completed its great work of meeting financial requirements for the prosecution of the war, and should not be asked to carry on in peace time.

It is clear, however, that the activities of the national war finance committee helped many people to save to an extent that no one had thought possible. Many Canadians have built up substantial personal reserves that they might never expect to acquire by other means. This is particularly true of savings made by regular deductions from pay. At the time I announced the termination of the national war finance committee, I mentioned that the government had received many suggestions that the savings programme be continued in a form adapted to peace time. I said that this matter would be given careful study.

I am now able to say that this study has been completed and that it fully supports the proposal to continue some sort of government savings facilities suitable to the times. The government has, therefore, decided to make facilities available, and has created the Canada savings bond for this purpose. The Canada savings bond is designed to replace both the victory bond and the war savings certificate as the government security in which personal savings may conveniently be invested. At the time of the introduction of the new security, the sale of war savings certificates and stamps will be discontinued.

The main purpose which influenced the government to extend facilities for investment of savings and to create the Canada savings bond was to meet existing public demand. The government is also fully aware of the value of this kind of saving and investment to the welfare of this country. There is no doubt that the nation will benefit in the long run if the ordinary citizen is able to accumulate a reasonable reserve of personal savings. These savings help to meet family emergencies, to make higher education possible for children, to build homes and to acquire many things that contribute to a comfortable, satisfying and happy life. It is clear that a majority of citizens save most readily through a government investment programme of some kind. This has been the experience of other countries, including the United Kingdom and the United States. In the United States steps have been taken to continue government savings facilities, and in the United Kingdom such facilities have been maintained since the war of 1914-1918.

I believe that hon. members will agree that it is important to any country that great numbers of citizens should continue to acquire and to hold a tangible stake in their nation.

Turning now to the nature of the new security, Canada savings bonds will be issued in denominations of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, with annual interest coupons attached. The exact rate of interest and the maturity date of these bonds cannot yet be announced, but I can say that the terms will be more favourable than those existing for comparable investments at the time of issue. For this reason, a limit will be placed on the amount of Canada savings bonds anyone can hold, and they will be sold only to individuals. The bonds will be registered in the name of the owner. This registration, in addition to providing control of purchases in the name of one holder up to the limit decided upon, will render service to the holder in protecting him against loss of his investment through theft or destruction of his bond. The Canada savings bond will be redeemable at 100 per cent plus interest at any branch of any chartered bank in Canada upon presentation of the bond by the registered owner. Identification of the person presenting it as the owner will, of course, be necessary.

The government will have the Canada savings bond available for sale this fall in time to permit continuance of payroll deduction plans now in effect. It is understood that employees will feel free to adjust the amounts of these deductions to their peacetime needs. The Canada savings bond will also be available to the general public at all branches of chartered banks, investment dealers, trust companies, and some other financial institutions. There will be no organized personal sales coverage of prospective buyers, except that which I have mentioned as applicable to payroll groups. Every appropriate means will be used to inform the general public of the availability of the Canada savings bond. Banks and financial organizations will undertake to draw their advantages to the attention of their clients.

It is hardly necessary for me to emphasize to the house and to the general public that the procedure I have outlined is very different from that followed in the wartime years. This will not be another "victory loan". It would not be practicable, nor indeed desirable, to build up the great organization of salesmen which would be needed for a house to house canvass. The government will take all necessary steps to acquaint the public with the characteristics and merits of the new Canada savings bond, but the initiative in purchasing these bonds will lie, for the most part, with the people themselves. Sales of these bonds are not expected to cover the government's total borrowing requirements. A substantial part of these requirements will be met by public offerings of the usual type at appropriate times. It remains true, nevertheless, that we hope for widespread acceptance of the new security. The success of the programme is highly important despite the different terms in which that success will be written. This new programme for saving must operate on a broad and embracing national basis to achieve maximum benefits to individuals and to the country. I have no doubt that Canadians will see in the Canada savings bond a desirable successor to the victory bond, a suitable means to store up personal reserves. But it is also important that Canadians see in themselves the successors to the victory bond salesmen; for they will be responsible in large part for initiative in making their own purchases, and for the maintenance of the habit of saving so generally and beneficially established in the war years.

I should also point out to employees that their employer is acting solely in their interest in offering the opportunity for deductions from their pay. Although the government has attempted to lighten the work, the administration of payroll deduction plans still involves employers in expense and responsibility.

While we are not trying to re-create the national war finance committee, I have no doubt that members of that organization and the many public-spirited associations and groups who aided in its work will be interested in the new savings programme. I feel sure they will see in this plan a continuation of the work they so ably performed, and they will also appreciate the reasons why the war-time organization cannot be recalled to duty.

In the past I have had many occasions to urge Canadians to support victory loans and war savings campaigns for patriotic reasons linked with the war effort. While the new programme does not call for just this type of appeal, I feel that it is appropriate for me to emphasize to the one-time members of the national war finance organization, and indeed to all Canadians, the advantages of personal thrift. To the extent that former members of the national war finance organization agree that the new programme will bring benefits, I am confident that they will lend moral support to this new national endeavour by example, by word of mouth, and by other means within their sphere of influence. To the extent that Canadians in general agree, they will find simple means of expression in their own personal investment in Canada savings bonds.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice that the lowest denomination is $50. Is nothing to be done to encourage small savings up to $5 and $10, in view of the discontinuance of savings certificates?

Mr. ILSLEY: To a substantial extent these will be paid for by payroll deductions, which will naturally be in small amounts.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought this was to be a voluntary saving.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is voluntary, but the method by which much of the money will be obtained will be by payroll deductions voluntarily allowed.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is to be voluntary deduction from the payroll of the individual.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. That is clear from the statement I made, and the lowest denomination will be $50.

Mr. LOW: Will these bonds be assignable?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; they must be registered.

Mr. COLDWELL: Principal and interest are guaranteed. There will be no fluctuation in the value of the bonds?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. There is no fluctuation in value.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is a good feature.

JAPANESE IN CANADA

REPATRIATION TO JAPAN—ARRIVAL OF FIRST PARTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Hon. members will be interested in knowing that a cablegram was received by the Department of Labour to-day informing us that the first party of Japanese repatriates from Canada has landed in Japan. As I previously stated, the number in this first party was 668.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

96. Departmental administration, $199,970.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to refer to the administration of the Department of Justice and a few matters which I have had before the house for some time. The first matter to which I should like to refer is judicial reform which I have raised in the house for many years, along with parliamentary reforms, constitutional reform, cabinet reform, and law reform. Under the item, departmental administration, an opportunity is provided hon. members to refer to the administration of the department. For years I have urged in the house that the time has come for us to revise the criminal code which was passed in 1905 for the first time. Amendments have been added each year to this code, and some of them have become obsolete.

In the second place I have urged on the minister and on his two predecessors the appointment of a legal committee such as they have in some of the legislatures. We had evidence of the need of a legal committee in the past few weeks when we were considering the British North America Act and other private and public and legal bills. The Ontario legislature has a legal committee, and I believe that province was the first to establish one. The other provinces have, I believe, now followed suit.

Many bills are coming before us. A private bill was introduced this afternoon and it had for its purpose the changing of the constitution and structure of a private society. A private bill such as that is a legal bill, and it should go to a committee.

Another thing we require is a consolidation of our statutes. You have to take the original criminal code and go through thirty-two or thirty-four years to seek amendments which are made every session.

We are now in the sixty-eighth day of the session and we have yet to learn whether the Department of Justice proposes to bring down this session any statutory amendments to the criminal code. Many recommendations have been made to the minister by the chief constables' association, judges, municipalities and law societies regarding law and order in the country, which is difficult to obtain at the present time. The chief constables' association, the Canadian Bar Association and many other public bodies have made representations, and something should be done about it.

In the office of the Minister of Justice we have an obliging and able minister, and I sometimes feel sorry for him in the heavy work he has. Of what does the Department of Justice consist? In the first place it has all the powers of the attorney general of England. It has the power of the solicitor general of England; it has the duties of the home secretary over penal institutions. The Minister of Justice is also the Attorney General for Canada, and the department has the powers of the lord chancellor to appoint judges and to look into the conduct of their office. That is an important matter.

Recently a solicitor general was appointed in Canada to aid the minister in his work. Some of his work has reference to the War Measures Act and other war acts which were passed during the war. In the old days, as I understood it, the solicitor general had charge of penal institutions and the prerogative of pardon, which is a most important one.

I may say that there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction in recent years with regard to some of those who have been chosen as judges by this department. I should like to find out whether the Canadian Bar Association has made any recommendations, and what these recommendations are. In the old country the bar associations do make recommendations to the lord chancellor.

I should like to refer to the county court bench. In Toronto we used to have as many county court cases, civil and criminal, as the rest of the province put together. In the old days we had three county court judges; Judge Morson, who tried division court cases, and who did as much work as any five or six judges. He had a junior judge, the late Judge Morgan, and as senior county judge, Judge McDougall, who was succeeded by two able men, Judge Winchester and Judge Coatsworth. We have an able and efficient senior judge in York county to-day, His Honour Judge Parker. He is one of the finest county court judges we have. But there is dissatisfaction with some appointments. We are going all over Ontario and bringing into the county of York judges who know little or nothing about the district over which they preside. That is a wrong principle. We brought in some who were not in the legal profession for years. One was a town clerk and another acted in a similar capacity in another county. They were appointed junior judges of York county and brought in to try judicial cases. It should not happen; that principle should be obsolete.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer, namely, two bills which I have before the house. As the committee knows, I consented to allow my bills having to do with the Judges Act and motor car accidents to stand until such time as progress was made on other important bills. I was promised that I would have time to make some reference to them on the minister's estimates. The bill to amend the Judges Act states that judges should not serve as commissioners. A few of the judges who have been appointed have yet to hear a case in the law courts, or at least very few. The bill also states that they should not be appointed to travel all over to try commission cases which are political. In the bill I referred to the fact that congestion has taken place in the law courts as a result of judges being appointed as commissioners. In one paragraph I said:

> The frequency, of recent years, with which judges are drafted for all kinds of such work impairs the efficient administration of justice and causes congestion in the law courts, and, as they are largely only fact-finding commissions when appointed, they duplicate the efficient powers and functions of parliament, of the committees thereof, and of the many outside boards of recent innovation in war work, and furthermore they are a costly adjunct to good parliamentary government of the people, by the people and for the people, cause delays and interfere with parliament's right to immediate solution of social and economic problems of urgency to good government, thus a system of "judicial commission government" is slowly being built up in Canada.

The second amendment was that courts of last resort must be bound by the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council. That is a good proviso. I referred to it last night. The judicial committee of the privy council is one court where the litigant can get substantial justice. We never would have had the cheap light and power movement in Ontario but for that great judicial institution and its decisions in 1912 and 1914.

Then there is another bill to which I should like to make a short reference, in regard to the terrible loss of life through motor car accidents. We see this parliament without five minutes to devote to the appalling loss of life which abuse of the motor car is causing in this country. After all is said and done, science has won the admiration of the world in the last seventy-five years. Why? Because scientists base their conclusions on facts, unlike the politicians, who argue from theories, opinions and all that kind of thing. With the motor car, as with every other invention, its use is one thing and its abuse is another. I had a return brought down in the house this year giving the number of lives lost through these road and other accidents. I need not take time to read that return, but every highway in the province has run red. This is one of Canada's greatest scandals. In the province of Ontario the government spent nearly $65,000 in the prosecution of a young man for murder on Toronto island; yet in this house we talk about secondary matters and we have not five minutes to devote to these casualties on our highways, whose number almost equals the number killed and wounded in the great war.

Then in addition we have the drowning accidents, of which there were fourteen on the front pages of the newspapers last week end. From 1938 to 1944 we had 149,000 people injured in traffic accidents, and last year some 9,028 were killed by motor cars. Over the same number of years the drowning fatalities numbered 5,097. Did you ever hear of such loss of life? Fatal accidents at level crossings numbered 727 last year, and some 2,264 were injured at level crossings. The number of persons who died from fires in homes was 1,221, while 22,000 people were killed in other accidents during the war. During the war we had a great opportunity to do something about the great loss of life in Canada through automobile accidents, but we failed to take any action. In my opinion, whenever a person is killed in a motor car accident there should be an inquiry before the county judge. At present there is a coroner's inquest, which sometimes does a little good, but it should be the duty of the county court to inquire into the death of every person killed in a highway accident in each county. That would be one way of trying to check these accidents.

In the bill I introduced this session I proposed an amendment in connection with the practice of withdrawing cases from the jury in connection with motor car accidents, which is done by many of our judges. As a result the accused person almost always escapes punishment. In my bill I proposed several amendments to bring the law up to date, following the law of New York state, which provides suitable penalties for those who drive while under the influence of alcohol, for instance. The bill also dealt with careless driving, culpable negligence and hit and run drivers. Why, we almost present a gold watch and illuminated address to anyone who kills a person on the highway and runs away. I think the most cowardly person in Canada is the man who leaves an injured person—man, woman, or little child—lying on the pavement, races away from the danger and does nothing about it. That is the most contemptible form of murder. I suggested extra and heavy penalties for these people, without the option of a fine. If the minister is considering amendments to the criminal code this year I hope he will also consider all the amendments I have suggested in this bill.

I also suggested an amendment dealing with persons who cause death in a criminally culpable and negligent way. Even though the person killed should be fifteen or twenty per cent to blame, the driver of the car still would be eighty to eighty-five per cent to blame, and he should not be allowed to escape punishment. A penalty should be provided, as is done in the state of New York. Another amendment provided that a jury should decide in these motor car cases. The explanatory note states:

> On the trial with a jury of persons who cause death or serious injury, it is desirable that the functions of the jury should not be curtailed or abolished. There has been much criticism of many cases of gross negligence having been taken from the jury. The jury are required to take the law to be what the judge says it is, and, owing to the many cases withdrawn by order of the judge, trial by jury in those cases is negatived, and there are so many loopholes that many persons guilty of gross negligence get off. The increased accidents require that the law should be brought up to date to meet the changing conditions, while preserving also the liberty of the subject.

The last matter dealt with in my proposed bill was the right of women to serve on juries. In the last election fifty-one per cent of the voters were women, and I proposed the following amendment:

> On the trial of any female person by a jury under any provision of this act, one-third of the jurors chosen to try the issue shall be female persons duly qualified on the same basis as male jurors.

Unfortunately there is not the public opinion there should be in regard to this great national disaster, the loss of life in motor car and other fatal accidents, to which I have referred. We do not have the courage as a house to stop it. As I said here the other day, we have lost most of our functions. The decay of parliament and the decline of the House of Commons of late years are most appalling to the average ratepayer in this country. The press has now become the organ of public opinion; it has assumed that title, and the assumption is rendered legitimate by the decay of our Canadian parliamentary institutions. The power of the press is based upon the ruins of real representation. We spent days and days on a judicial bill which was passed last evening. Just look at the importance of that matter. It should have gone to a legal committee to be examined in detail. The periodical press has become the rival of the House of Commons, but it will remain a successful rival only as long as the house does not represent the people, and not one day longer. A few years ago we had in the House of Commons the great men I referred to last evening, and many others. When I think of those who have occupied these seats in the days since confederation I am filled with a spirit of deep humility; when I look at our parliament as it is constituted to-day, and see its impotence and incompetence to recover its rights, privileges and prerogatives, from various irresponsible bodies, I wonder if it will ever become a free parliament again, which it is not to-day. As I have said on previous occasions, the time is long past when we should do in the way of parliamentary, constitutional cabinet, and law reform what was done in Britain twenty years ago. We are that many years behind the old country in all these reforms.

For a moment I should like to refer to the cost of the administration of justice. This is a very important item in the estimates, and I should like to call attention to one or two other matters. One is the pay of the judges. Are we getting value for the money expended? Judges should be paid more liberal salaries, if we are to get the right class of men to take office. As hon. members know, on many occasions judges who travel the circuits are heavily burdened. We have twelve high court judges on circuit in Ontario, but some are sick, and the others are heavily loaded with work. There should be a proper increase in the pay of judges, so that the minister may have the satisfaction of securing the best possible men for this work. I have been arguing that for many years.

I should like to present another matter on behalf of the chief constables association. I refer to the damage done by air rifles. In that connection I would refer to one lady who was travelling on a Bathurst street car in Toronto. A reckless boy, who had one of these air rifles—I have seen hundreds of them on the streets in the past—fired the rifle, broke the window of the street car, and put out one of the lady's eyes. Yet nothing is done about it—although this happened in 1941. Surely the Department of Justice should bring in an amendment to the criminal code preventing the manufacture of these air rifles. I hope something will be done along that line.

I believe the time has now come when the government of Canada should reimburse the municipalities for a great portion of the cost of the administration of justice. The policing of Toronto at the present time costs several millions of dollars, and one reason for the expense is that they are loaded up with work which arises from legislation of the federal parliament to enforce federal law. The taxpayers must pay the bill, from taxation on real estate. During the war, and until the present time, the police force of that city has had to enforce hundreds of federal orders in council. Hon. members are aware that since confederation the enforcement of federal law has been under the jurisdiction of the attorneys general of the provinces. That authority is redistributed among the various police forces in the provinces. The result is that heavy work is placed on those municipalities, and I believe the parliament of Canada should pay for it. If the federal authority wants this work done, it should pay; and the law should be enforced accordingly. The enforcement of these federal orders in council takes up a great portion of the time of municipal police forces.

To-day sixty per cent of the men on police forces are engaged in traffic work, with the result that there is not sufficient time to travel beats throughout the various wards of our cities. We do not have the protection we should have, and the protection of property and civil rights within the provinces suffers.

I would call the attention of the minister also to the fact that a high court judge recently told a poor woman to go out and buy a hat if she wished to give evidence in court. The hats I have seen women wearing have been so small that I have been reminded of the paper cartons in which marmalade is served in our restaurant. I called the attention of the hon. member for Temiscouata to that fact—he is not in his seat to-day—and he said that the paper cartons were too large for the ladies to wear in court rooms.

We have heard a complaint about the air force officer who did not come to a salute with his hat on. I think the time has come when the judges in our supreme court might take direction from the high court of parliament, where the very estimable lady member, who is now sitting in the chamber, suggested that the ladies in the gallery need not wear their hats—and they look the better for it. I thank her for what she did. If she can only remain here long enough to convince some of the judges on the benches to consider their cases—

Mr. COLDWELL: She will be.

Mr. CHURCH: —rather than a lot of minor troubles, it will be much better for the administration of justice.

Then, we know that grand juries should have the power to visit the various institutions. The late Chief Justice Meredith, in one of his charges to a grand jury, referred to the fact that, rightly or wrongly, these federal institutions were managed by crown officers, and that it was the duty of the juries to visit and to inspect them. Under the act members of parliament are listed as visitors. I wonder how many ministers or private members have ever paid visits to institutions; yet it was one of the cardinal principles of magna charta that the people should take a large part in the administration of justice.

The time has come when we should have some real law reform. I have urged a consolidation of the criminal code, and that a legal committee should be set up so as to save the time of the house many days and weeks in the discussion of various legal bills. There are many other matters to which I might refer at this time, but no doubt an opportunity will be given later on.

I appreciate what the present Minister of Justice has done, and commend these suggestions to his consideration. Surely when we can waste $60,000 to $70,000 in the trial of one person charged with murder, we should have some new method of checking up on these motor disasters on the highways, particularly at level crossings, as well as drownings, and fires in old houses, and with respect to such other matters I have placed before the house, but the consideration of which has been delayed because of the war.

Mr. HACKETT: How many judges, whose appointments are made by the federal government, have been engaged in duties outside their statutory duties in the past year? If we could have the figures for the last three or four years, they would lend point to what I wish to say.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I am not in a position to give precise information on the point, because frequently requests are made to judges by provincial authorities to engage in some activities which are not within their normal judicial duties, and concerning which no information comes to the Department of Justice. The hon. member will realize, of course, that the Minister of Justice is not an inspector of the courts of justice in the provinces.

The federal government makes the appointment of judges, pays their salaries, and presumes they are carrying on their duties in a proper manner until information is received officially to the contrary. During the period of war there have been many occasions on which it was found necessary to ask judges to perform duties which would not normally fall within their judicial activities. That seems to be inevitable. At times there are certain things which cannot be dealt with through the ordinary processes of the courts, but which must be considered by persons having judicial temperament and such detachment from ordinary business, professional or political pursuits as is required to inspire confidence in those who happen to be interested in the issues dealt with.

[Mr. Church.]

I think there are at present about fifteen judges who are doing some work that is outside the performance of their ordinary duties. Every hon. member knows that there are two from the Supreme Court of Canada who have been for a considerable time now, much longer than I thought at the outset it would require, engaged on the royal commission investigating the leakage of information from the departments of the Canadian government. There is one of the judges of the court of king's bench in Quebec who is absent in Japan as a member of the international court trying war crimes against the personnel of the allied armies. Two judges of the high court, one of Nova Scotia and one of Alberta, have been for some time investigating the coal situation. The Minister of Labour announced to the house to-day that Mr. Justice Richards of the court of appeal of Manitoba had been invited and had agreed to try to bring together the employers and the employees engaged in the operation of inland shipping. Mr. Chief Justice Sloan has just succeeded in bringing together the operators and their employees in the forest industries of British Columbia, and I may add that he seems to be particularly fitted to do that work because he had been doing for some time previously investigational work in forestry for the government of British Columbia. A judge of the high court of Nova Scotia presided for quite a long time over the national war labour board but has now returned to his judicial duties. A judge of the appeal division of the court of Alberta acted as chairman of the labour relations board but has since returned to his judicial duties.

During the administration of the selective service regulations there were—I would not venture to say how many, but several judges who were acting as chairman of the selective service boards. That was not a normal part of their functions but it was the kind of thing that seemed necessary to have done by a member of the judiciary.

I think it would be fair to say that of the total number of judges administering justice in Canada during the war period and perhaps even at the present time there would be as many as fifteen who were doing other things than their ordinary judicial work.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I am not of those who believe that a rule may never suffer any exception, but I am speaking of a practice of long standing which has become peculiarly disturbing by the frequency of its recurrence, that of appointing judges to the performance of tasks outside their judicial office. In its less repugnant forms, judges have been appointed to commissions, to re-draft codes, to consolidate and revise statutes, and perform other tasks for which their training and sometimes their leisure make them apt candidates. To the extent that these tasks are paid for, they are subversive of the principle of independence which is the bedrock of our whole judicial system. If a judge is to receive remuneration in excess of his statutory compensation, which has been horribly inadequate for generations, he is beholden to the body paying him, be it the political party in power or be it a labour union or employer who commands his services. But if the practice in the form to which I have just alluded is reprehensible, it becomes more objectionable when judges undertake tasks highly pigmented by politics.

It is impolitic for a practising barrister to say anything which might be construed as criticism of the bench. It is most unfortunate that stern necessity imposes on me the duty of pointing out the dangers to the greatest of our institutions inherent in this practice. I do not accuse the government in power of being the sole offender, but circumstances have made it the most frequent and the most recent offender. Whenever it has had a difficult problem to solve, whenever it is confronted with a perplexity, it has pulled members of the bench down into the dust of the political arena in quest of a solution acceptable because of the high authority and so far unimpeached integrity of the bench.

I say with sorrow that the reputation for impartiality, dignity and honour enjoyed by the bench has been exposed to criticism by this practice. All who believe in the law, who depend upon its fearless administration, and admit that the people at large must have complete faith in the integrity of the judiciary, must oppose the continuance of this practice.

If it is necessary to refer labour disputes to the judiciary, let us set up a "labour court" and name a judge for that purpose. At the present time, in the clubs, in the market place, wherever men meet and discuss, one hears a judge classified as "favourable to labour," another as "favourable to the interests," another as "weak and not knowing exactly which side he is on."

My language may seem strong. As head of the bar of Montreal I made a mild protest a year ago last May. As a member of parliament I condemned this practice in the house less than a year ago. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) dealt with it at length nearly two years ago. Still the practice continues. It is because I believe in the rule of law, because the rule of law cannot be maintained unless the bench be free from all taint or suspicion of partiality, that I speak as I do. Either we have too many judges, or they are neglecting their judicial duties, if they can devote as much time as they are at present devoting to work beyond their statutory duties. In many parts of the country judicial work lags, litigants suffer, while judges are engaged in tasks foreign to their function.

I take from the English Law Times remarks of Lord Esher when responding to a toast to the bench. His words are exceedingly appropriate to the present abuse. Speaking of a certain judge, he said:

> Their education—

Referring to the bench.

> —and training made them impartial and determined to do what was right in any question that came before them. This, indeed, was so well known and recognized, and when the judges of England acted within the scope of their ordinary duty, nobody ever attempted to suggest that they were not impartial. At the present time, however, they knew that one of the judges had been asked to go beyond the scope of his ordinary duty, and he, for one, was surprised and sorry that the judge in question had consented to do so. The result was inevitable. That judge had been fiercely accused already of partiality or of want of desire to do justice.

There is no excuse for the government to appoint judges to work beyond their judicial function. It should sternly deny them the right of undertaking such duties for provincial governments or other bodies.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that when the promise of the Minister of Justice has been carried out and the judges are finally given adequate salaries, they will be able to decline invitations which lower the repute of their high ministry and which tend to undermine public confidence in the bench.

This practice has now become one of almost daily occurrence. I understand why the government refers these questions to judges. It is because the people of our country still have confidence in the bench. But if these problems which are beyond the judicial function are to be submitted to the judiciary, we are taking the hazard of losing one of those institutions upon which we rely and one of the institutions which has brought the greatest glory to our country—the rule of law and the unimpeachable integrity of the bench. I therefore hope that the minister will exercise his power and great influence to discourage this practice. There are men learned in the law who are not on the bench, men eminently suited for the tasks which are so frequently being allotted to judges. Let us have recourse to them. Let us preserve that great heritage, that great boon, the integrity of the Canadian bench.

Mr. KNOWLES: There are two matters which I should like to call to the attention of the Minister of Justice in the hope that he may act on them. First, I should like to raise again the question of a retirement age for judges of the superior courts of the various provinces. As I understand it, there is a fixed retirement age for judges of our federal courts —the Supreme Court of Canada and the exchequer court—and there is also a fixed retirement age for judges of district and county courts. But in between those two groups there is this middle bracket, if I may call it that, of superior court judges, designated by various names in different provinces, for which there is no fixed retirement age. Some of them do retire, but many go on to quite advanced ages. I would be the first one to recognize that in men of advanced years one frequently finds both physical and mental vigour the equal of some much younger, but as a general rule, I think, we would all agree that it would be better for the administration of justice and better all round if the principle of a fixed retirement age applied to all the courts of our land.

When this question was raised before, the minister commented favourably on the principle which I am advocating. On occasions I have introduced a bill to try to achieve the principle in what is admittedly an indirect manner, by providing that the salaries of judges at a prescribed age shall become what their pensions would be, thus encouraging retirement. I admit that when I introduced that bill I recognized that it was an indirect way of going about it. I would have preferred that it be done directly, but not being in a position to introduce such a measure I introduced the bill to try to focus attention on the matter and get discussion on it as well.

Two years ago, in April 1944, both the former member for Saskatoon, Mr. Bence, and I spoke on this matter and received from the Minister of Justice a favourable reply. His words, as recorded in Hansard for April 21, 1944, at page 2248, read in part as follows:

> Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think in about two minutes I can give the assurance that hon. members have sought, that at the very first opportunity the matter of an amendment to the British North America Act to deal with the provision which now gives judges of the provincial superior courts a life tenure in their office will be considered. This is in my opinion a matter which should not be presented for amendment to the imperial parliament without previous discussion with the provinces, because the administration of justice and the establishment of the courts are matters that are within provincial jurisdiction. It is my view that the proper procedure with respect to amendments to the British North America Act when dealing with any portion that gives jurisdiction to provincial legislatures should involve prior conference and consultation with the legislatures, and if it is sought to take away from them something which has been allotted to them, their consent should be obtained.

I will not read the record further. I will simply say that it goes on to report an argument over that last point. But what I would like to ask the minister now is whether it is still his view that this is a matter for an amendment of the British North America Act, in the way he indicated at that time, after our experience which culminated in the vote last night on redistribution. The other question I would like to ask him, in the light of the other things he said on that occasion, which I have not taken the time to read to the committee, is whether the matter was presented at the recent sittings of the dominion-provincial conference, and in general, where we stand on this whole question of fixing a retirement age for judges.

About two years ago I secured from the Department of Justice a return showing the names and dates of birth of all the judges in superior courts of Canada. The return revealed that at that time there were 29 judges between the ages of 70 and 75 still sitting on the bench in the superior courts, and 11 over the age of 75. I have not asked the department to bring that return up to date, so I wish to make it clear that in what I am going to say now there is an element of surmise, because I do not know how many of these men have since retired or have passed on. But if all these men—and I emphasize the if—were still on the bench there would now be 23 between the ages of 70 and 75, and 26 over the age of 75 and on up into the eighties. That figure will of course have to be corrected in the light of retirements or deaths that have taken place in the meantime. I know the minister agrees with our contention that something should be done about this matter, and I shall appreciate it if he will indicate how it now stands.

The other question upon which I would ask the minister to comment is one which I admit at once is ticklish in this parliament, and I want to be quite fair about it and avoid any embarrassment to the minister, because not only do I respect him personally but I respect his religious faith. I refer to the question of divorce bills coming before parliament. As the minister knows, every time a batch of these bills comes through there is a feeling on the part of many of us, to say the least, that it is not quite the dignified way of dealing with the matter, and many expressions of protest have been made from time to time. It has been suggested on the other side, and rightly so, that it is not enough merely to protest but that some alternative should be put forward. In reply to that, both the leader of this group, the member for Rosetown-Biggar, and others of us have suggested on occasion that without doing violence to anyone's religious convictions in this regard it might be possible either to pass legislation referring divorce to some federal court already in existence, or to establish some kind of federal court in the city of Ottawa. When I say that such a scheme would not do violence to anyone's convictions, what I have in mind it that it would not be establishing a divorce court in Quebec, where, as is well known, it is not wanted; nor would it provide for the citizens of Quebec seeking divorce a facility which they have not already, because they have that facility in the fact that they can come to Ottawa to the federal parliament.

Moreover, the whole question of the basis of divorce is not involved in what I am now discussing. The proposal that there should be legislation to take these cases out of parliament and put them under the jurisdiction of some federal court merely transfers the place to which these people would go when they come to Ottawa from one building to another, where it seems to me the proceedings might be carried on with a little more dignity and with proper regard for legal procedure.

I should be glad if the minister would comment on this point. I am not asking his opinion as a lawyer, since he does not have to give it, but I should like to know whether the matter has been considered, either by the government or by his department, in order to see whether something can be done in that direction. My interest in the question at this stage is not the general question of divorce but rather in maintaining the dignity of parliament and its reputation in the eyes of the public. I think it would be well if the minister at some stage in the discussion would comment on the two matters to which I have called his attention.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If it is convenient I can comment on them at once, while the hon. gentleman's remarks are fresh in my mind.

With respect to the first, it has to do with the retiring age for judges of superior courts. I will not go over again the matters that have already been put before the house with respect to tenure of office of judges in the provincial courts by virtue of the terms of the British North America Act, but I will deal with the two basic questions which the hon. gentleman put to me. One was this: Is it still the opinion of the Minister of Justice that an amendment to the British North America Act, which would provide power to retire judges at a stated age, would require the consent of the provincial legislatures? To that my answer is that, notwithstanding the vote of last night, I persist in that view. I attempted to make it clear in that debate that I considered there had been an allocation of jurisdiction and that this parliament had no right to deal with matters which had been allocated to the provincial legislatures, and that when there was joint responsibility, if any change was to be made that would affect such control as the provincial legislatures and governments have under the constitution, their consent would have to be obtained.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would it have to be the consent of all the provinces?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In my opinion it would have to be the consent of all the provinces that would be affected thereby. I consider that they have been given jurisdiction, sovereign powers, which they get not from this parliament but from the imperial parliament, and it is their jurisdiction; so we cannot take it from them without their consent, any more than if we wanted to take from a legislature of a state of the American union some of its powers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Every province would be in that position.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Every province would be in that position, in my view. As to the second question—was anything done towards endeavouring to secure the consent of all the provincial governments to an amendment of that kind—let me say to the hon. member that during one of the adjournments of the dominion-provincial conferences, prior to January—some considerable time, in fact, before the December meeting—I had written to all the attorneys general asking them to give some consideration in advance to the subject so that they might be in a position to discuss it when we met afterwards, if there was opportunity for doing so. When they came together in Ottawa I was told by one of the attorneys general, who happens to be at the same time the premier of his province, not to bring the question up, that he would have to take an attitude that would make it absolutely useless to pursue it, and that it might be the occasion for embarrassment with regard to other things about which agreement could perhaps be secured. And the reason given was that he expected that at this session a bill would be introduced to amend the Judges Act, providing more in the form, not of a larger proportion, but of more dollars in the matter of pensions. It was his opinion that there were several who were waiting until that happened to offer their resignations, and that we would see what would come about then. If the situation thereafter still appeared to be as embarrassing as it was at the present time he would perhaps change his views. In the meantime he would have to take such a firm attitude that it would not lead us to a solution and it might be harmful in other matters that were to be discussed.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then I take it that the minister's ideas are stymied by the great powers that sit in provincial—

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not know that I would say that. Perhaps stymied is all right, because it may be possible to get over the obstacle.

Mr. MACKENZIE: And hole out.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And hole out. I know from information I have had from various sources that there is substance in the suggestion made by that gentleman that there were apt to be some resignations just as soon as the scale of salaries and pensions had become definite. Even though they were not perfectly satisfied with the scale, if they knew that there was not going to be any more available within any proximate period, there were several who would be apt to take what there was available. However, I intend—though the bill to amend the Judges Act will not become operative in all its terms until the first of the new year—to have the provisions dealing with pensions operate as soon as they are sanctioned by His Excellency, so that we shall see what the result will be.

Mr. KNOWLES: Before the minister leaves that subject I should like to ask one other question. First, may I say that we over here are enjoying the comments the minister is making about the judiciary, particularly with regard to their materialistic interest. I trust he was not casting any reflections. In view of what the minister has now stated, has any consideration been given to providing for retirement at least of those who are appointed judges in the future? I can see the argument with respect to those already on the bench, but surely with respect to judges now being appointed there should be some understanding on this point.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, I do not think there is any difference. The life tenure does not result from the situation when they were appointed. It is the view of the law officers of the department that under the British North America Act we cannot make any other kind of appointment to the provincial courts; that whatever appointments we make are life appointments.

Mr. KNOWLES: Unless the minister does something under section 100 dealing with salaries, pensions and so forth.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As the hon. member himself recognizes, that would be an indirect way of doing something which parliament is not entitled to do directly, and its validity would be questionable.

Mr. KNOWLES: Keep on trying to get over the stymie.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member suggested that he or some others might be enjoying the statement that there was a materialistic interest in these hon. gentlemen. It must not be forgotten that those to whom it would apply have been a good many years on the bench with salaries which a good many find to have been low for the duties they have to perform, and paying taxation at rates which a good many have found to be extremely high. And it might not be materialistic to have them say: Well, it is only proper that I should wait and see what kind of provision is to be made at an early day.

In his second question, I understand that the hon. member was not dealing with the aspect of the divorce question which has been brought to the attention of the department in a great many letters, namely, the enlarging of the grounds under which divorce could be granted. As to that I have had to reply that those who take their law from the bible have to take it as it is. Those who admit that there is a divine law about it disagree as to what the interpretation of the law is. Roman Catholics say that it does not provide for divorce a vinculo matrimonii on any ground, but merely for separation without right of remarriage. Others say that it does justify a divorce a vinculo matrimonii and right of remarriage on the ground of adultery. But no one who takes his law from the bible says that there can be a divorce a vinculo matrimonii for anything else but adultery. Now, to enlarge the ground means either to deny the existence of a divine law or to say that the human law can override the divine law. In either event you get no ne plus ultra left. If you get away from the existence of a divine law you have no stymie beyond which you cannot go. It then becomes just a matter of determining by human law where you should stop. Though there are deplorable individual cases, there are still a great many who believe that the indissolubility of marriage is of such public value that its public value outweighs the inconvenience to which a certain number of individuals are put and the suffering which is put upon them, probably through no fault of their own. But there do happen things which are most regrettable, and which cannot be adequately dealt with.

As to the other matter—

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister understands I was not discussing that general point at all, at the present time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; but I thought it might be just as well, while dealing with the question, to give here indirectly an answer to these representations which have been made about the extension of the grounds for divorce.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who made the representations?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Individuals.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Canadian Bar Association?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; individuals submitting individual cases of great hardship. Perhaps there have been associations as well endorsing the representations and transmitting statements of cases of individual hardship.

With respect to the other point, the situation at the present time is that for those who are domiciled in Quebec there is no divorce as of right. When a divorce is obtained it is by virtue of a special act which does not recognize divorce as an institution, but deals with a special case. There is widespread objection to the recognition of divorce as an institution or as a right one can request from a court if he is within the conditions laid down. For that reason there would be very much opposition to the establishment of a code of divorce which would make divorce a matter of right to be granted by a court of justice under a rule of law. I have suggested to others interested, who have been discussing the procedure which is followed and which is not edifying in connection with these large numbers of divorce bills that are dealt with by parliament, that of course one solution to get away from the inconvenience or distastefulness of such practice would be to refuse to grant any divorces. They do not have to be granted. No one has a right to one. It is just a matter of whether or not a special act will be passed to deal with a special petition of one who asks for something which is not provided for by law.

Mr. KNOWLES: On that point may I ask the minister if these special acts of divorce are not passed under section 91, subsection (26) of the British North America Act, which would seem to recognize the institution of divorce as far as the powers of parliament are concerned.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The heading in question under section 91 gives jurisdiction to parliament in that matter, but does not go beyond giving it jurisdiction.

Mr. KNOWLES: The heading is "Marriage and Divorce."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes. There is no doubt the word "divorce" is something that has a connotation understood by human beings. The British North America Act does not say there shall be any divorce but says the matter of divorce is one that can be dealt with by the Canadian parliament.

Mr. KNOWLES: And we deal with it one hundred and fifty times a year.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And parliament deals with it. One solution to eliminate these things which are considered distasteful and so on would be to refuse to deal with them. There are some who believe that there should be divorces in some cases which they would look upon as proper cases, and that it would not be exercising the jurisdiction or discharging the responsibility that the having of the jurisdiction places upon parliament to refuse to deal with any. I have suggested to hon. members of parliament concerned with this that there might be some other solution that would not set up divorce as a matter of right but would largely relieve parliament of the inconvenient features of the practice now going on. The courts of the province of Quebec pronounce decrees of separation for adultery. If parliament were to say, "We will not consider an application unless it is supported by a decree of separation based upon a finding of adultery," then the committee of parliament would not have to go beyond looking at the documentary evidence. Anyone who wanted to ask parliament to grant a divorce first would have to go to the courts and get a decree of separation and a finding that there had been adultery, and there would be no need of any investigation, consisting of the hearing of witnesses, by a committee of the senate.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is that decree granted on other grounds, or just adultery?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It can be granted on other grounds.

If that were to become the attitude I think the legislature of the province of Quebec probably would be invited to amend the Quebec law which provides that if the wife is found guilty of adultery a decree of separation is a matter of right, but that if it is the husband who is guilty of adultery it is a matter of right only if he has kept his mistress in the common domicile. Though that may have been looked upon as a proper rule in days gone by, I think the feeling of the public now is that in this matter there should be equality of treatment for both sexes. If it became known that parliament was going to refuse to deal with applications for divorce unless there was from the courts a decree of separation, founded upon adultery, I think the legislature would be apt to amend its law to make that kind of decree available to the wife as well as to the husband, if adultery were established.

Mr. KNOWLES: This idea appeals to me as having merit, in the sense that it gets rid of the farce we have here, and also in the sense that it ties in with their provincial laws and thus keeps the people of Quebec in the picture. Since that is the case, has any consideration been given to a procedure to bring about that result? Does it require an act of parliament, or a pronouncement by the government, or what?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have made the suggestion, and I hope it is under consideration. I have offered the suggestion to members of both houses of parliament interested in the question, and I have been told that they were going to give it consideration, that it was a suggestion which did seem to have some merit. I have also made the suggestion to confreres of mine of the bar of my province that if something like that were done probably it would be necessary for the Quebec legislature to amend the code and put both sexes on the same footing in that regard. I have found no one to frown upon the suggestion, but so far it is still under consideration. I must say I am not promoting anything that will facilitate divorce; it did not appear to me that making suggestions of that kind would be promoting anything that would facilitate divorces. The courts of Quebec would then have the responsibility of securing, for these separations, proper evidence, genuine evidence, evidence of real grounds, and not evidence of things prepared for the purpose of getting the result.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I rather like the minister's idea. I think it is the first suggestion we have heard in this connection that has real merit.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The legislature of Quebec has provided that the attorney general may intervene in any case for a judgment of nullity of marriage, because there had been quite a large number of marriages declared null by courts of justice in Quebec, and public opinion had become disturbed. So the Quebec legislature provided that the attorney general might intervene in all such cases, and I understand that since this provision was made he has been instructing counsel so to intervene.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Similar to a king's proctor, you mean?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: In the role of a king's proctor. The same thing could be done, and would be the responsibility of the Quebec authorities, with respect to these decrees of separation, which would become an essential requirement for getting a special act of divorce from the dominion parliament. So there the Quebec authorities could assume and discharge their responsibility of seeing that no decrees of separation were granted on trivial grounds or trumped up grounds.

Mr. KNOWLES: Matters relating to children, if that procedure were adopted, would still go back to the province?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If that procedure were adopted matters relating to property, to families, to the care of children, to alimony and so on all would have been disposed of in the decree of separation. I believe that with proper care taken to see that only genuine cases were dealt with by the courts it would afford relief to parliament, and probably diminish the number of applications which come before parliament. And even those which come before parliament could then be dealt with on documentary evidence, without the requirement of a special investigating committee to hear oral testimony.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): They would not be bothered with finding facts at all. They would take them right from the decree.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: They would take the facts from the judicial findings in the decree, and then do whatever would appear to parliament to be the right thing to do.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister says that his proposal does not deal with some broad considerations connected with divorce; but I think it is one of the most commendable suggestions yet made—perhaps even better than my own—for getting rid of the present situation. I for one hope it will be actively considered.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It arose out of my first suggestion that parliament could get rid of some of its troubles by refusing to deal with applications for divorces. I appreciate some said that would not be discharging the responsibility that is upon us, because we are the ones who have the jurisdiction. I then said if you feel that you should discharge the responsibility, say that you will not attempt to discharge it until there is a judicial finding beforehand that there are what you consider proper grounds.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, there are three points I should like to discuss. An announcement has been made respecting the appointment of a commissioner to supervise the penitentiaries. Those of us who are intensely interested in the care of those who make mistakes now have hope that the findings of the commission which were made public about seven years ago will now be put into practice. I commend the minister for the appointment of the commissioner; it shows that we are going to get action.

When the minister's estimates were before the committee last year he said he commended a practice whereby, when a man has served a certain length of time in a penitentiary, it was better not to enforce his serving the complete time. He approved letting the prisoner out a little early, so that the prisoner would feel somewhat more sympathetically inclined toward the country of his birth or adoption. At that time I mentioned the cases of two men. I can tell the minister to-day that those two men are out, and that they are behaving as respectable citizens. They are making good, and looking after their families. To-day I shall give him the names of two others whom I hope to have out in the near future. I have just as much confidence in these two men, although they did bad things.

I believe our penitentiaries have been improving in the teaching of trades to the prisoners. But it is not enough to have a trade, as the minister well knows. I have in mind a young man who was confined in Stony Mountain penitentiary who, upon his release, was in a position to earn eighty cents an hour as a carpenter. I was able to get him a job. He told his employer where he had been, where he had learned his trade, and the situation seemed hopeful. However, in the fall of the year the young man got the urge to make more money. He seemed to think he was not making it fast enough, with the result that he got into more trouble, and he is back in the penitentiary. The minister will agree with me that a trade is not enough to make a man.

In passing, let me pay tribute to the chaplain service in the penitentiaries. They are just as important as any other officials in those institutions. But a young man must have some outlook in life greater than a call for money, or a call for the satisfaction of his lower nature. He must see Him who alone can help him to live right. If he does that, his trade will help him.

May I commend the minister for something concerning which he has been criticized, namely the way he handled the espionage incident. I should have been disappointed had the minister, when appointing the commission, told it how it was to act. The minister was not responsible for the manner in which the men were arrested or detained. That was the way the commission thought best to have it done.

When the Prime Minister appoints a cabinet minister, he does not tell that minister in detail how he must act. The man is accepted, and put on his own resources. That is why we have so many ministers who think for themselves and act honestly without supervision by the Prime Minister. They are to be commended for this.

There are organizations in Canada which condemn the government for the way in which the espionage affair was handled, and for the unveiling of that dastardly thing which, if left unhindered, would have undermined the best in our country, namely the loyalty of our citizens. While perhaps I might have liked to see them treated in another way, I believe the minister is to be commended for what he did.

Others have been arrested without their crimes being made known to them. I have known men who were arrested without being told what their crimes had been. Perhaps they were not clear enough in the head to understand at the time of their arrest; but they found out later on.

These are things for which I commend the minister. I approve his treatment of prisoners who have served long terms in the penitentiaries. I still take the stand that if a man is a criminal he should be in; but when he has ceased to be a criminal, the sooner he is out the better for him and all concerned.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am sure the introduction by the last hon. member of the subject of espionage did not please the minister too well, because I have no doubt he wishes to have his estimates passed. That is one subject we discussed on another occasion, and I trust too much praise will not be given the government for its handling of the espionage affair. If that were so, it would be necessary to discuss the matter somewhat further.

My remarks to-day will have reference to the judiciary. During the last two years how many appointments have been made of members of the bar over sixty years of age, and over sixty-five years of age? I am informed that a gentleman has been appointed to a county court judgeship, although he is more than sixty-five years of age. At the outside he will retire in no more than ten years, because that is the age of retirement for county court judges.

The minister has said that many of the judges would retire now, were it not for the fact they are considering the possibility of an increase in their salaries, and a consequent increase in pensions. To-day in Canada there are six supreme court judges between 80 and 90 years of age; 31 between 70 and 80; 49 between 60 and 70; 36 between 50 and 60, and only 14 under 50. That was the situation only a few months ago. I think one of the reasons for this situation, as the minister realizes, is that these men do not desire to retire because their retirement allowances would be so much less than the salaries they are now receiving. While he said that the adoption of a plan whereby the salary after a certain age would be reduced to the amount of the pension would be an indirect way of doing what could not be done directly, my understanding is that the law officers of the crown have given their opinion that such legislation would be effective and within the competence of parliament.

I should like to make one suggestion in connection with the supreme court. In at least one case recently there has been criticism of the supreme court for not having heard an appeal in a case that was brought before it from the province of Ontario. I think the right of appeal to the supreme court should be enlarged. To-day the situation is this. If a person desires to appeal from a provincial court of appeal to the supreme court he is denied the right of appeal unless a matter of pecuniary or economic interest, present or future, is to be determined. Except where there has been leave by the appeal court of the province, the supreme court is denied the right to grant that leave. Within the last few days, in a case known as Greenlees vs. the Attorney General of Canada, the supreme court decided that it did not have the right to grant the appellant an appeal to the supreme court against a dismissal by the court of appeal of Ontario of his application for a declaration that he was a minister of a religious denomination. The appeal court of Ontario refused this man the right to appeal, and the supreme court, before whom an application was made, stated this in the conclusion of Mr. Justice Kerwin:

> On the ground that we have no jurisdiction to grant leave, application must be refused.

This question has been up before the supreme court on previous occasions, but except where there is a matter of pecuniary or financial interest involved the supreme court has not the same powers as a judge of an appeal court of the province from which the appeal is taken. There should be an enlargement of the right of the supreme court in order to ensure that in spiritual matters affecting the individual the right of appeal to the supreme court shall be granted.

I should like to ascertain from the minister the present position with regard to the application to the privy council as to the power of the parliament of Canada to pass legislation doing away with appeals to the privy council. This matter has been before the court for a very considerable time. The appeal has been before the privy council for many, many months. It was impossible during the war to have the case argued. My recollection is that the minister told the committee last November that the case might be heard in May or June of this year. I should like to ascertain from him what the position is to-day.

There is another matter I would bring up. It has to do with the necessity of there being some review by the Department of Justice of sentences passed by courts martial during the war. In the United States there has been in effect a system similar to that followed here in recent months of having court-martial sentences reviewed by a superior court judge. The review in this country was by a committee the chairman of which was Mr. Justice Keiller Mackay. That committee went about the country and reviewed many of the verv heavy sentences passed by courts martial, sentences often inhuman and unfair; it reduced many such sentences to reasonable proportions and secured a degree of uniformity which otherwise there would not have been.

In the United States, however, proceedings are now being taken to have a review of individual cases of claimed injustice made by groups of lawyers appointed from within the war department but in collaboration with the Department of Justice. There are many cases of unfairness here that have not yet been reviewed. I have in mind officers who were dismissed from the service. Dismissal from the service follows for conduct unbecoming a gentleman, and regardless of the offence and regardless of the injustice of the sentence the officer has no opportunity to have his case presented before Mr. Justice Mackay's tribunal or any other. My suggestion is that these cases should be reviewed. I have in mind sentences passed recently in connection with the army in Holland. Junior officers received heavy sentences, but the senior officer received no sentence. When recently production was asked of the report into this matter by General Montague the government refused production of the report on the ground that the matter was sub judice and that the report should therefore not be produced. I ask the minister now, the trials having taken place, whether it would not be proper to produce the report dealing with a judicial investigation by a member of the appellate court of Manitoba, so that any suggestion of unfairness or injustice to the junior officers may be considered in the light of the evidence and of the report made by Mr. Justice Montague. I refer to him as Mr. Justice Montague because General Montague has returned to Canada and is resuming his position on the bench of his province. I have before me a number of individual cases which I shall not bring before the committee, but I make the general representation that where there is any suggestion of injustice the place where the appeal must be made is to the Department of Justice and the person to whom it must be made is the Minister of Justice, the custodian of the king's conscience and of justice in this country.

Mention has been made to-day of the necessity of a revision of the criminal code. I have referred to that on a number of occasions. There is no lawyer in Canada to-day, however eminent he may be, who can with certainty say in certain cases whether jurisdiction rests in one court or in another. The criminal code to-day is a mass of archaic principles which often are not in keeping with present-day developments. In Great Britain measures are being taken to bring their law up to date. I mention only one example, the law respecting insanity. Without regard to developments which have taken place in scientific knowledge over the last thirty years, we are still determining the question of insanity on the basis of a case decided 103 years ago. Then, in regard to punishments and penalties, the general attitude toward them has changed with the years; yet the penalties in the criminal code are in the main as they were in 1892.

Three years ago I raised a question with regard to juries in the province of Saskatchewan—I raised it again last year—that we had a six-man jury there, and there was a disagreement among the lawyers as to whether a six-man jury was better for the crown than it was for the defence, or whether it was more difficult to secure a conviction before a six-man jury than before a twelve-man jury. Whatever the conclusion may be—and there is disagreement among members of the bar—three years ago I raised that question; and last year the minister said that if the province of Saskatchewan would indicate its desire to have twelve-man jury restored, it would be restored. This was done. I should like to know whether at the present session legislation will be introduced to provide for a twelve-man jury in Saskatchewan as was the case prior to 1932.

With regard to the question of judges' salaries, I realize that some will say that, in supporting the minister in the attitude he took last year that these salaries should be increased, one is doing something for which he should be subjected to criticism. I personally was critized in a speech which was made over the radio because I had supported an increase of judges' salaries. That has not changed my viewpoint at all. The great difficulty to-day which the Minister of Justice is in is that, judges' salaries being at a level which has not been changed for many years, the best men—outstanding counsel and leaders of the bar—cannot be recruited for the bench. For the moment it is popular to take a stand in opposition to increases.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, it is not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: However, take as an example the Supreme Court of Canada. I know the difficulties which the minister has had to secure appointees to that court which above all must be representative of the most outstanding members of the bar, men of good judgment, men of ability; above all, men with the desire and the ideal of justice. Yet it is impossible to get men to accept appointments. Our own judges in western Canada would refuse to be appointed because they would have to change from the surroundings of many years and come to Ottawa, and all they would receive additional to what they are receiving as judges in the western provinces would be approximately $75 a month.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They cannot afford it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As the minister says, they just cannot afford to do that. It may be argued that the old age pension should be increased. I support that. At the same time I believe that all the material things of life are meaningless unless in the courts of this land men are assured that those who administer justice will so with ability and dispatch and certainty and with honour to this country.

While on the subject of judicial responsibility and improvement of standards of the judiciary, may I repeat what I have said before, when possibly it was not supported, that we should use our judges for judicial purposes and not misuse their services for commission purposes. During the war there was some excuse for doing so. I know what a royal commission is, and I know how it operates when you put judges on a commission to deal with conflicting viewpoints wherein partisan politics enters. No matter what a judge does in a case like that as a commissioner, though his integrity may not be impugned there is nevertheless the suggestion that past political considerations enter into decisions he makes as a royal commissioner. It is impossible to take a man from the bench and place him in the cockpit of political considerations and conditions as a royal commissioner without in some way reducing him to a position where the suggestion of the possibility of bias applies. What a position one gets into when judges find themselves in that situation! Only in the last few days in the supreme court of another country an argument has started, arising out of political bias, which threatens to undermine the respect for justice held by people in that country. I suggest that we should, first and foremost, take the stand that judges shall not be used on commissions. I notice that to-day the Minister of Labour announced the appointment of Mr. Justice Richards, who has been an exceptionally fine conciliator, to conciliate as between the claims of labour and capital.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They are the best qualified, are they not?

Mr. MITCHELL: Whom would you get?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not so sure that they are the best qualified. They are qualified by law. But whether they are the best qualified or not, that judge, while dealing with these matters—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Both law and equity.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, it may be a matter of law and equity, but there are other considerations, economic considerations, which detract from the sanctity that should surround the members of the bench.

I am not alone in that viewpoint. One of the best articles I have read on the matter appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press some months ago. The editorial says this:

> The . . . principle . . . that judges shall be entirely independent of the executive government and of the legislature . . . has been seriously transgressed since the beginning of the war, with unfortunate effects on the whole machinery of justice. Throughout Canada, under the federal and provincial governments, judges have been compelled to undertake the functions of executive government and, in many cases, the virtual function of lawmaking.

I point out the case of this espionage investigation. Two judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, both estimable men, Mr. Justice Taschereau and Mr. Justice Kellock, are put on a royal commission. When appeals are heard from the cases arising from that investigation the final court of appeal will be the court on which these two gentlemen sit, although they will not be sitting on the case in question. That is a serious situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says it is not? Let me point this out—

Mr. MACKENZIE: They do not have to sit.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, I said they do not sit. But they belong to the Supreme Court of Canada. Certainly they will not sit.

Mr. BROOKS: Their services are lost, too.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Those who will be sitting will be those members of the court who in other cases will be sitting with those two judges.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What they did was absolutely right. I know that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In 1936 Lord Sankey said it was wrong in Great Britain. He said this is the most dangerous principle that can be followed. My hon. friend says it is all right. But let me point out this. In 1943 Mr. Justice Taschereau, in the Supreme Court of Canada, decided that no man, when suspected, could be questioned by a police officer, unless he was warned that he did not need to give evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE: To save the country from traitors.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was the decision in 1943. In 1946 the same judge who gave that judgment in 1943 sits on a royal commission and directs persons who are suspected that they must give evidence, and they are not entitled to the protection of the court, that protection which every court in this land grants.

Mr. MACKENZIE: They were traitors.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not entering into the propriety of the matter, but I am pointing out that these are considerations that lower the judiciary in the public mind. When you appoint judges to the bench you expect those judges to be on the bench. We have in Saskatchewan one who was appointed in 1938; he will always be able to say that he has never been reversed on appeal, for the reason that he has never sat on a case, and yet he has remained a judge of that court since 1938. These, I say, are things that cause the public to condemn the judiciary. These are things that cause many people to believe that judges are being paid enough to-day. That is why I place such reliance in the Minister of Justice. He did much, during his term as president of the Canadian Bar Association, to press for the elevation of the standard of our judiciary, and I am willing to say that in the appointments he has made which have come to my notice, he has entirely lively up to the principles that he espoused when he was president.

I believe there are still things that can be improved, and that is why I suggest that a declaration be made by the minister that judges are to be judges and to be used as judges and not as commissioners, and that men who are appointed judges shall not act in any other capacity, leaving the bench. Think of our position in Saskatchewan. We have a four-man bench because one of our judges has never sat. Not so long ago an appeal was dismissed on an equal division of the court. These things do not elevate justice. I should like to know what the situation is in regard to this judge to whom I have referred. I should like to know whether or not he will come back to the bench or, if he leaves, what pension he will be entitled to.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I do not wish to take up too much time because I should like to get some money voted, but there are some questions which I must answer. As to the last one, if the hon. member would allow that to remain unanswered until I have my bill before the house to amend the Judges Act, he will find at that time that a satisfactory answer is forthcoming.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He will be off the bench?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member will find that provision is being made to take care of situations of that kind, because it is intended to provide for meeting the pension hiatus that might otherwise arise. The hon. gentleman asked me how many appointments have been made of members of the bar over sixty-five years of age. I do not think there has been any appointment and I would be disappointed to find that there had been, because I make it a point to inquire closely about the age of those who are recommended. If the hon. member will give me privately what information he has I shall endeavour to have it verified, and if it should prove that Jupiter nodded I shall try to have arrangements made to ensure that he will not do so again, because it is not something I would wish to do.

The hon. member inquired as to the position of the reference or appeal to the privy council with respect to the right of parliament to deal with appeals to that body. That case had been inscribed for the session that is now in progress and everyone felt it was going to be proceeded with, but the counsel who had been retained to argue the case in the supreme court had to go to hospital for an operation—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Geoffrion?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Aimé Geoffrion. He went to the hospital for an operation, and I considered the question whether the deputy minister could go over himself to conduct the hearing. It was found, however, that he could not go; and I felt that, having already waited so long, it would be worth while waiting a few months longer. If at the next term it is found that Mr. Geoffrion will not be able to attend and the deputy minister cannot go over, we shall find someone else to take the case. We felt, however, that it was the sort of case that should be argued by one known to the public as experienced before the privy council, so that whatever happened the public would be satisfied that adequate argument had been submitted.

The hon. gentlemen referred to the reviewing of sentences of courts-martial and the fact that the Minister of Justice was the custodian of the king's conscience. Under king's regulations he is not the custodian of the king's conscience with respect to sentences of courts-martial—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I realize that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —and the information to which the hon. member referred will have to be obtained from the Minister of National Defence.

As to the next question, it is intended to provide at this session for the restoration of the twelve-man jury in Saskatchewan, and as a matter of fact there are two draft bills in preparation, one to amend the criminal code, containing that provision, and another which will have nothing but that provision in the event of its being decided that there will not be time to deal with the more extended bill making a certain number of other amendments to the code.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would it be too forward to ask the minister what the anticipated changes will be in the criminal code?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not care to say at this time what will be in the bill, because there have been a very large number of suggestions and there are some which are certainly not to be brought forward at this session. There is still a lot of legislation to come before parliament, and the officers of the department are determining which are the things that are most urgent. The matter of providing for a twelve-man jury in Saskatchewan is the first item, and if we have the feeling that parliament would have time to deal with anything else in respect of the criminal code we shall have that. If we have the feeling that there is time to get consideration from parliament for other matters we shall determine which are the ones that appear to be most urgent and the number will depend upon how much time parliament could be asked to devote to a consideration of them.

I share with the hon. member the feeling that it is desirable that judges should devote all their time to the discharge of the ordinary functions of their offices; but there are occasions, even in peace time, when the public interest requires that they be asked to perform some other function for the state, and I hope that these occasions will be much less frequent than they were during the war. During war time there were a great many things which could not be dealt with under the ordinary processes of the courts. They required to be dealt with by gentlemen of the same temperament, learning, standing, ability and repute as those who preside over the courts. I hope there will be fewer such matters in the future.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the minister tell me something about juries in Alberta? I refer particularly to the question of challenging. Last fall I defended a young fellow who was charged with murder. I was quite successful in that he was convicted. In Alberta I was allowed to exercise six challenges, while the crown had, in effect, forty or fifty. They have so many challenges and so many stand-asides, as we call them, that it runs to the figure of forty-six. Incidentally, during the vacation I appealed the verdict and a new trial was ordered. My brother, who must be quite a lawyer, defended the same chap and he was acquitted, so that ends that part of the story.

But in that case, as in all other cases, we used our six challenges. It means that the crown just looks over the remainder of the panel and takes anyone he wishes. Do not think for a moment I am saying that the prosecutor there, a great lawyer, and a personal friend of mine, Mr. Blanchard, is the type of man who would unduly take advantage of the position. But I think it a terrible comment on the administration of justice that a man charged with murder in Alberta has six challenges and the crown has forty odd. It means they select whomsoever they want. That is just what it comes down to. I raised the point with the minister last fall and I know that he has made some inquiries out there. I know what they did. They circulated a questionnaire to the benchers of the law society of whom I am not one, but my partner is and I saw it, and two or three telephoned me. The point is this, they were not men who knew anything about criminal law or had any experience whatever with it. They thought perhaps it might be all right. I do not suppose the attorney general wants to alter it. I am not so keen on the twelve-man jury. We have had a six-man jury ever since we have had juries, and to my mind a six-man jury works just as well, no matter which side you are on, as does a twelve-man jury. That is only my own view, but it is pretty generally held out there.

I suggest to the minister that when a person is accused, without anybody being consulted, of the most serious of all crimes, namely murder, in Alberta, the law should put him in the same position as he would be in, in any other part of Canada. Out there we are standing alone in that miserable position. Every other province permits twenty challenges. It seems to me that this parliament should not wait longer to rectify what is even more of an anomaly and, in my judgment, a perpetuation of a state of affairs which is unjustified from any point of view.

The minister is looking at the book, and I think he will find that it goes back to the old Northwest Territories Act. That is where it originated. It was fixed up for Saskatchewan. They were put in the same position as the other provinces. But for some reason we were left out on the end of the limb where we have remained ever since. It can be changed by the addition of three or four words. Just put us in the same position as all the other people in Canada. Alberta is made the exception in one of these sections. I think all hon. members will agree that it is not right to have a man charged in one province and have him put in an inferior position to that in which he would be if he were charged across the border in Saskatchewan or British Columbia. The minister will remember that I mentioned the matter. I know he has made inquiries in the area because benchers showed me letters which they had received.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I fully agree with the hon. member for Calgary West that the provisions for the trial of a man charged with murder should be the same in all the provinces.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the minister do something about the matter?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall endeavour to have parliament do something about it at this session.

Mr. ADAMSON: I should like to discuss briefly a matter which has caused considerable discussion in the press and is the subject of live controversy between several of the provincial attorneys general and various charitable, fraternal and church organizations throughout Canada. I refer to the game known as bingo which, I understand, is considered a gambling practice under the criminal code, and the playing of it is therefore an indictable offence. I raise this question because there is considerable confusion in the minds of many Canadians, particularly in Ontario, as to whether the pastime is gambling or not. I am informed that the game may be played occasionally without fear of the law, but if it is regularly played it then becomes an offence under the criminal code. Not being a lawyer, this would seem to me a peculiar situation. If the playing of the game in public is gambling if you do it repeatedly, surely it is gambling if you do it at all, or if you can play bingo on regular occasions without risking fine or incarceration, surely you should be able to play it at stated and given intervals without fear. To those of us who are not learned in the law it is like saying that you may rob a bank or you may murder a man: if you do it occasionally, that is all right, but if you make a practice of it you will get into trouble with the police.

I bring this question before the committee at the present time because in my opinion the playing of bingo is, despite the occasional professional operator who may run a racket, a useful and happy form of social contact. I say this because bingo cannot really be considered as gambling, in that the amount wagered in each game is small, seldom going over twenty-five cents. In many cases for an entry fee of one dollar or less a whole evening's entertainment may be had. The outlay to the individual cannot be great and is normally less than that of most commercial entertainments. It is certainly less than the amount expended even for a few bottles of beer. Therefore I feel that the playing of bingo is not apt to cause a financial strain on anybody or work an injustice or hardship on the family.

I believe practically every hon. member in the committee knows what the game is. I have no intention of describing it or its advantages. It is extremely simple. You are not likely to be involved above your original stake. I think it has a great advantage over bridge, in that there are no postmortems after the game is over. You do not accuse your partner of not having led the ace or returned your suit. It has another great advantage. During the war the game of bingo was used successfully by a large number of fraternal and charitable institutions as a method of raising money for charity. I think practically every legion, many churches and a great number of other societies used to make it a practice of having a regular night playing at this pastime. There has been an anomaly created as to whether this is a gambling practice or not. In my opinion, the banning of the game has brought about some hardships and, if continued, will reduce the funds available for charitable purposes at a time when reestablishment and readjustment make a personal or local helping hand so much more important than the cold relief of federal or provincial charity. I realize that it is not the function of the Minister of Justice to interpret the law, but I feel that it would be extremely helpful if he could make some statement on this matter at this time.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is a matter upon which I would feel obliged to refrain from making any definite statement. Representations have come to the department from a large number of church organizations to the effect that the law should be made even more restrictive and that such exceptions as are now recognized should be removed. On the other hand, a large number have made representations to the effect that these bingo games were susceptible of being used and were being used for worthy purposes. There are bingo games that have been organized in such a way as to make it difficult to assert they were not gambling, and this is a matter about which the opinion of honest people sharing opposing views will have to crystallize before I could take the responsibility of saying to parliament, "This is the right thing to do." I am not sufficiently informed to be able to recommend anything to parliament in that regard at the present time. I have had representations which, if they applied to all games of bingo, would show them to be terrible things. I have had representations which, if they could be applied to all games of bingo, would show they were worthy, charitable undertakings which should be encouraged. I know the representations on both sides were made sincerely, by respectable Canadian citizens, and I am not in a position to recommend anything to parliament in that connection at this session.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any reason why amendments to the criminal code are always brought in late in the session? Ever since I have been a member I think that has been the practice, but it seems unfortunate, because there is not the same opportunity to consider them as there would be if they were brought in earlier. I suggest that they are of great importance and should be brought in each year quite early in the session so that both the house and the people would have an opportunity to give them consideration.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The reason given me for having bills to amend the criminal code prepared and brought down at a late date was that we did not want to have two bills in the same session and that frequently, while the session was in progress, recommendations came to the department which were worthy of consideration and which at times resulted in suggested amendments. It had been found by experience that it was better to wait until the session was well advanced before crystallizing the bill to amend the criminal code, because it was undesirable to have more than one such bill at any one session.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any particular objection to having two amendments to the criminal code during one session? Surely they are absorbed into the code itself anyway. As the minister has pointed out this afternoon, the result of this practice may be that this session many amendments to the criminal code will not be brought forward.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure there is other legislation quite as important and urgent as those amendments that will be left aside and will not receive consideration at this session. We have been sitting here pretty consistently; we have been dealing with many matters, but there are many more to come. I am not suggesting that members of parliament take too much time with them, but there is a limit to what can be done during a session at the pace this house sets in dealing with the matters submitted to it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the hon. gentleman think we are near the end of the session?

Mr. GREEN: I hope so. Will the minister give some consideration to the present practice? In my opinion, the result has been that the same time is not spent on these criminal code amendments that would be spent if they were brought in earlier in the session. The public do not have the same opportunity to know what is going on, and this is detrimental to the administration of the criminal law of the country.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I can only repeat that I have been told a bill to amend the criminal code will be considered if there is time for it, but there are other matters that have to be considered. Desirable though these amendments may be, we can get along without them if we have not time to consider them, while there are other things we cannot get along without. That is still the situation this year. There are certain things the government feels it is necessary to place before parliament, that it is absolutely essential to put before parliament. The criminal code is the poor relation and gets consideration if there is time for it, time which does not have to be devoted to something else.

Mr. GREEN: I was not referring so much to this session, because it is already quite late in the session, I hope. I was referring to future years. Will the minister give consideration to the wisdom of bringing in the amendments to the criminal code earlier in the session, in the years that lie ahead?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Certainly I would be only too delighted to have the bills coming from my department placed before the house at the earliest possible moment and given first reading so that they could be distributed, then allowing some time to elapse before having them considered, because I think that would be helpful and would assist in disposing of them more rapidly when they come to be considered by the house.

Mr. GREEN. That is very true.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Inasmuch as amendments to the criminal code are being considered, I wish to refer to what has already been mentioned by the hon. member for Broadview. I do not think anyone can exaggerate the seriousness of the situation with respect to motorcar killings. Our law is such now—I mean our judge-made law—that in instructing a jury the judge must tell them that the negligence must be so gross as to shock the public conscience, and so on. I am quite certain the minister realizes what I am talking about, though I have forgotten the exact words. This matter can be taken care of in only one way. I have no statistics on the matter, but I prosecuted motorcar killings over a period of years. I do not think I was a bad prosecutor, but out of twenty cases I think I had about one conviction. The answer is just this, that to-day nearly every man who sits on a jury owns a motorcar. He promptly says to himself "Oh, well, I might be in that position myself some day", with the result that they are gentle in matters of this kind.

I am going to make a practical suggestion which I believe will help a good deal, and that is that the word "manslaughter" be eliminated from the criminal code. I say the word has no meaning. We have homicides of various kinds—and "homicide" is a big enough word, in itself. But if one tells a person that another is accused of manslaughter, that person will say, "Oh, boy, that's real murder, isn't it, with a vengeance!" That is the ordinary chap's idea of manslaughter. Then, attached to these motorcar killings is the term of life imprisonment. I suggest in all seriousness that that out-of-date word be removed from the code.

I hear someone ask what word I would use instead. I could give a hundred, if necessary. But the question of negligence, and the amount of negligence as it has now been defined by our courts, I suggest should have the careful scrutiny of the law officers. I will go as far as to say this: Granted that there was someone whom I knew and wanted to murder; I could get him out on the street, run him down with my motorcar, kill him, run back and pick him up, report it to the police, follow him to the hospital—and I would not go to gaol for five minutes. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. KNOWLES: I hope that does not happen.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have no desire to try it. But I say that is one section which urgently requires reform, having regard to the number of people who are killed each week in this country by motorcars.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member knows that there is an efficient committee of the Canadian Bar Association now giving careful study to the matter of substantial amendments to the criminal code. I shall see to it that at its forthcoming meeting it shall have available copies of to-day's Hansard. Attorneys general of the provinces are represented on that committee. The suggestion by the hon. member for the deletion of the word "manslaughter" from the criminal code would be looked upon as an important change. It is a suggestion concerning which I should like to have the considered opinion of those gentlemen who constitute the commitee and who represent the bars of the different provinces, and the attorneys general of those provinces.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I agree with that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I believe it should be carefully considered, and that part of the public made up of members of the bar who practise law should be ready for it, when it is done.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is it not a fact that about 10 per cent of the drivers cause 60 per cent or 70 per cent of the accidents, and that there is a type of driver who is responsible for by far the greater number of accidents? I believe insurance companies have been able to typify the driver in that class. Has a document not been published discussing that point?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Undoubtedly during the war, and at the present time, because of the shortage of motorcars, less care has been taken in the inspection of cars used on the highways. The result has been the exercise of less care over the conduct of persons using motorcars than one might expect under usual conditions.

The idea of compulsory insurance to cover civil liability is spreading, and through that agency a considerable degree of control would be exercised.

I acted for the defence only once in an assize court in my province. On that occasion I defended a young man who had been unfortunate enough to cause the death of a fellow man. There may be some whom it is proper to describe as motorcar killers; but sometimes there are genuine accidents.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Indeed, yes.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Those accidents cause great pain to the ones who have been the occasion of the accidents. So that one has to be careful when sorting the sheep from the goats.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is true. The fact that there is only one prosecution to every three deaths shows great discretion in the matter of laying charges.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes; and one has to be most careful in that regard. I appreciate fully the humane feelings of the hon. member for Broadview, and that it was such feelings which found expression in the bill submitted by him. But I believe, if the hon. member for Calgary West will look at it, he will realize that it cannot be accepted in its present form.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was not advocating that.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No; I am sure the hon. member would not advocate it in that form. I believe that as soon as it becomes possible to exercise care in seeing to it that people do not travel the highways with conveyances which are not in a proper condition there are apt to be fewer accidents.

Mr. ADAMSON: I think so too. Reference has been made to compulsory insurance. In the commonwealth of Massachusetts, it has been found the compulsory insurance increased the number of accidents, because many drivers, because of holding insurance, felt they were relieved from responsibility. I believe the underwriters' rate actually went up.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The house in committee of supply. Mr, Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

96. Departmental administration, $199,970.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to speak for a few moments on a problem that has been brought up in the house over quite a long time, and I am sure that no one will be more pleased than the Minister of Justice when this problem is solved. I refer to the after-care of gaol prisoners. I have not read anything showing how much progress the minister has made in attacking this problem since the last session, but I know he does take a great interest in it. It was a problem that was also very much on the mind of his predecessor. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver Centre will recall how earnest the former minister was in advocating, in this house, reform in the after-care of prisoners. I very well remember his saying that unless we passed a certain bill at that time, which I am sorry to say it was found afterwards could not be put into operation, he did not feel that he could continue with his arduous duties in connection with the rehabilitation of ex-prisoners.

What has been done in this matter since last year I do not know, but I was very much interested to read a few days ago some remarks made by the Reverend Walter B. Craw of Brantford, Ontario, a clergyman of Zion United church in that fine city of yours, Mr. Chairman, one of our greatest manufacturing cities. This clergyman is known everywhere for his interest in the rehabilitation of released prisoners and their after-care. His remarks which I shall quote were not made with any idea of casting reflections on the minister's department, for this is a matter that the provinces have a lot to do with, and we are all hoping that after the passing of the resolution by the house yesterday it may be a little easier for the Minister of Justice to bring about needed changes. The item is headed, "Prison system said outmoded," and reads:

Brantford, May 20—(special) Rev. Walter B. Craw last night told his congregation at Zion United Church that though we are one of the youngest nations in the world we are still maintaining one of the civilized world's most outmoded prison systems and paying for it with skyrocketing crime waves.

As I see it, the biggest problem in the minister's department to-day is the instituting and bringing about of reforms in after-prison care. I know and the minister knows that many societies in Canada, churches and institutions of every description, are ready and anxious and willing to help in every way they can to provide better after-prison care.

Only the other day I read a report issued by Mr. J. Alex. Edmison, K.C., of Toronto, who is particularly well known in our city for his humanitarian efforts and for his activity in the Prisoners' Rehabilitation Society of Ontario. I like to follow the proceedings of this society, knowing a number of the personnel of the organization and being interested in its work. The president is Brigadier-General D. C. Draper, C.M.G., D.S.O., and the executive officers include Mr. T. F. Monypenny, vice-president; Mr. J. Milton Cork, treasurer; Rev. Gilbert Agar, B.A.; Mr. J. A. Edmison, K.C., and Mr. R. H. Carpenter. The executive council is composed of distinguished men, most of whom and their achievements I know. During the last few years that this Ontario Prisoners' Rehabilitation Society has been in operation it has reclaimed, through providing jobs for them, some 5,483 former prisoners.

I get a good deal of satisfaction myself in assisting ex-prisoners to rehabilitate themselves. Many of them got into trouble in the first place through lack of funds, not from any desire to lead a criminal life, but just because they did not have a job and needed money. I am speaking of those with whom I have been in contact. If an ex-prisoner can be provided with a job which will supply him with funds this particular society has found that a large per cent of the ex-prisoners can be reclaimed. That has been my own experience in a very small way, with ex-prisoners.

I have in mind two young men. One had been in prison for two and a half years. He had a Christian mother, and when her son was let out of prison she came to see me. I asked her to send her son to see me; he came, and I gave him the best talk I could about walking straight and keeping straight, that I depended upon him and that I would get him a job. It was quite a job to get him a job, because here is the trouble. When he approaches an employer the first question he is asked is, "Where have you been working?" What answer can he make? This particular boy had been in the Ontario reformatory at Guelph, and I made it my business to call up one employer after another and plead with them to give him a job, saying that I would be responsible for him. I am happy to say that he got a job and has made good, and his mother, a widow with a big family, is very happy over it.

That case is similar to another one with which I had something to do recently. This is what one might call a big brothers' movement. The minister knows better than anyone else that if each one of us would do his part to assist him and his department in rehabilitating and getting jobs for worthy ex-prisoners we could achieve something that is well worth striving for. This Borstal prisoners' rehabilitation department has found that 58 per cent of the ex-prisoners make good. Let me quote from an article, "The Problem of Prison After-Care", by J. Alex Edmison, K.C., published in May, 1946:

> The report of the royal commission on the penal system of Canada in 1938 is generally conceded to be the most exhaustive penological study ever attempted in this country. The fact that no major steps have been taken to implement the recommendations of Judge Archambault and his colleagues is a source of despair to penologists in Canada and of bewilderment to those experts abroad who advised the commission during their exploratory tour overseas.

I do not blame the minister for the fact that the recommendations in this report have not been carried out, but I should like the minister to tell us what the trouble is, why the proposals cannot be carried out, and then it will be up to this house to do the best it can to assist him in taking effective action. Certainly the commission, which was appointed during the term of the minister's predecessor, has presented a comprehensive and exhaustive report. I have heard it said in the house two or three times that effect could not be given to it because of the division of authority between the provinces and the dominion. I for one hope that some modus operandi will be arrived at whereby the two authorities can work together in order that the whole penal system can be modernized, much as has been done by Borstal in the old country.

In an address on June 13 to the Rotary club at Hull, Judge Archambault gave a learned address on this subject, in which he referred to the principles of rehabilitation and the sort of scientific approach which should be taken to the subject. In the course of his speech he mentioned the Borstal system. I am not going to dilate on it at the moment. I would rather hear the minister tell us what programme has been instituted, perhaps in his department, to adopt something like the Borstal system in this country. It is a system of which I have made an exhaustive survey, visiting many prisons in England and observing their procedure. I believe they have seven main institutions. First, prisoners are sent to Wormwood Scrubbs. They are there examined, and there it is determined what other institution they should be sent to, with a view of directing their thoughts along the lines of improving their best aptitudes. A wonderful work is being accomplished, as the minister, perhaps, knows better than any of us. My own knowledge comes from having investigated quite a number of these prisons and learning, while there, how they work. In the course of my survey I was told on many occasions that quite a number of these young lads went astray because of mental deficiency. As I remarked a few days ago in relation to another matter, the Prisoners' Rehabilitation Society of Ontario state in a report that, in 1945, of the 2,810 inmates of Ontario prisons and reformatories, 10·13 per cent are markedly mental defectives. That being so, a prison is no place for them. They can be restored through new systems of mental hygiene which the Minister of National Health and Welfare supports in his estimates. Perhaps many of these young lads could be reclaimed by being sent to some institution where their mental status could be improved. This report also states that 14·04 per cent were on the borderline of being mental defectives. A prison is not the place for that type of young man. I hope that the minister's department, cooperating in some way with the provinces, will see to it that such lads are not sent to a prison, where they will only learn more crime from older people, but will be sent to some institutions where their mental condition can be improved.

Judge Archambault is undoubtedly one of the most distinguished, if not the most distinguished of penologists in Canada, mainly because of his long and exhaustive experience in connection with the investigation by his commission, and I hope that some method can be found to carry out the programme he has so strongly recommended.

Others will help, I know of the work Lieutenant-Colonel Wallace Bunton of the Salvation Army in Toronto. I know that on many occasions numbers of young people have been delivered into his care right out of the police courts in Toronto, and everyone who is familiar with that fine man's splendid work knows what a wonderful success he has made in reclaiming prisoners. The view expressed, quite rightly, by those engaged in reforming these lads is that the trouble most frequently arises from lack of home training. These young folks need love and affection, and when they find men like Lieutenant-Colonel Wallace Bunton who are sympathetic to them it does them a great deal of good. It would be a great thing for this country if some programme could be initiated by which many other people in every city in Canada could be induced to assist in the rehabilitation of these young lads.

I should like to hear the minister say what progress has been made in instituting in Canada something comparable to the Borstal system, and what progress has been made in bringing together remedial agencies in line with the recommendations of the report of the royal commission, so that all, working together, can do in Canada something like what is now being done in the old land. I realize that our geographical position is quite different from that of the United Kingdom; yet it should be possible to put in operation a system something like the one they have over there. Would the minister tell us what is now projected and being done toward instituting in Canada something along the lines of the Borstal system?

Mr. McKAY: Is it the wish of the minister at this time to continue the discussion on item 106, which has to do with penitentiaries, or would he rather carry on with item 96?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Of course the estimates are in the hands of the committee. We are on item 96. It has always been the practice, on the item dealing with general administration, to discuss matters which are not particularly dealt with in any separate item, and I do not want to raise any objection to anything dealing with matters under the jurisdiction of my department which hon. members wish to discuss. But we have now had several hours of this discussion. I am not suggesting that it should be shut off, but as soon as it suits the convenience of the members of the committee to take up separately the consideration of the items which are before the committee for its study I think we shall be able to make more progress.

Mr. McKAY: Perhaps the minister could answer all the suggestions in regard to penal reform when we deal with section 106, on penitentiaries.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think it would be more convenient to reserve those matters until we reach the item which relates to the branch administration of penitentiaries.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the committee will discuss the question raised by the hon. member for Davenport, that is to say the Borstal system, and other matters affecting penitentiaries, when we come to item 106?

Mr. FAIR: There is one question I would ask the minister in regard to men who have joined the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I have heard a number of complaints from some of the younger men because they are not allowed to marry until they have had so many years' service.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I suggest that the hon. member allow that question to stand until we reach the estimates of the R.C.M.P. They are not part of the Department of Justice, and there are special items dealing with that branch, namely, 348 and following.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I doubt whether the matter I am about to discuss may properly be brought up under any further estimates which we may consider. I would suggest to the minister that there be an amendment either to the Admiralty Act or to the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, to provide that action may be maintained against the ship herself by the dependents of a person who has lost his life through the negligence of those in charge of the navigation of the ship. The law to-day is that those whose property is destroyed or damaged by a ship have a cause of action against the owners of the ship in cases where the damage has been occasioned by some wrongful act on the part of those responsible for the ship. Likewise, if anyone is injured he has an action which can be brought against the owners of the ship where his injuries have resulted from negligence on the part of those in charge of the ship. However, the law to-day provides no remedy or redress in the case where death has occurred, and the dependents are looking for some relief. That is not the case in the United States or in Great Britain. In both those countries an action does lie on behalf of the dependents against the owners of the ship, and that action may be enforced in the admiralty courts by the arrest of the ship.

This is a matter to which I have called the attention of the Minister of Justice and of the deputy minister many times in the last few years. I understood, however, that, owing to war-time legislation and the necessity of giving priority to important legislation arising out of the war, the time had not come when the necessary amendments to either statute whch I have mentioned could be made. It involves a very simple proceeding to create this action. All that is necessary is the insertion, in either of the acts that I have mentioned, of a provision similar to those which we have in the fatal injuries act of Nova Scotia.

The matter has not been of such great importance during the war years, for the reason that during those years shipping—American, British and allied—has been for the most part controlled by governments, and ships owned by governments or under charter to governments were immune from arrest. The matter is now quite important, however, because from time to time we have cases where men lose their lives at sea. The ship that has caused the death may be a foreign ship, and under our present laws the dependents of the man, even if Canadian citizens, have to go to foreign tribunals to recover damages for loss that has been sustained. They have not the right to arrest the ship in this country for the enforcement of their claims.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I understand that representations were made before the war, and there is a file in the department dealing with the subject. It involves questions that will have to be given careful consideration, because I understand that the hon. gentleman not only wishes a matter of procedure dealt with but wishes something that will establish legal right for compensation—a civil right, something which may perhaps be within provincial jurisdiction. It is a matter that will have to receive careful consideration. It does not mean merely creating a bit of legal machinery.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I agree with the minister that it is not solely a matter of procedure; but a statute can create the right of action—a federal statute, I believe.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The matter of determining to what extent a federal statute should create civil liability between an employer and his employee will have to be considered carefully, because it may well be something within provincial jurisdiction. However, I am informed that, for the reasons which the hon. member mentioned, it did not appear to be urgent during the war, and now that shipping is getting back into private hands it is necessary to come to some conclusion. I can assure him that the matter will be given careful consideration.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With respect to the imposition of fines, in the United Kingdom changes have recently been made whereby, when a fine is imposed on a person who by reason of poverty is unable to pay, provision is made so that such person shall not be required to serve the alternative penalty, namely imprisonment. As things are at the present time, that condition is ameliorated in many cases by magistrates who postpone, sometimes for a considerable period, the imposition of the alternative penalty by failing to sign the warrant of commitment, thereby enabling the convicted person to raise the fine and costs. In the United Kingdom that has been done away with, so that those who are poor should not be penalized in consequence, discretionary power rests in the magistrate with respect to the imposition of the alternative. That, I think, is one matter which should receive the attention of the department. We all know of cases where, in respect of petty offences, a fine is sufficient to meet the ends of justice; but accused find themselves, through inability to pay, facing the alternative of imprisonment. It is a matter, as I say, which will require considerable thought in its application, but I believe the system adopted in Britain to-day might very well be brought into effect here.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is aware that there have been representations by the Canadian Bar Association along those lines, and there are many recommendations for amendment of the criminal code, which recommendations have accumulated and are receiving consideration. As many of those recommendations as appear to be urgent, and for which it is felt there will be time in which parliament can give them consideration, will be included in the bill to amend the criminal code. They will be included if it is found that there will be time for the proper consideration of that kind of bill.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It would be a commendable move.

Item agreed to.

Justice—

97. Remission service, including remuneration to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Force (to be expended under order in council, and not to exceed $1,600) for assistance to this service, and an amount of $10,900 to reimburse the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Force the amounts disbursed by them in ordinary pay and allowances to their men on loan to this service, $55,945.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I understand that there is no uniform remission service applicable to all sentences at the present time. In South Africa there is in effect a system whereby, immediately after a convicted person has been sentenced to a penal institution, there is automatically a review of his sentence with a view to securing uniformity in all parts of that country. It is a system which has worked out very well for all. In some provinces heavy penalties are imposed and in other provinces lesser sentences are imposed for the same offence. If the suggested system were adopted a degree of uniformity would be secured.
